

Election Calling

Repentance Faith

Conversion

Justification

Regeneration

Adoption

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY

BIBLICAL & HISTORICAL

ROBERT DUNCAN CULVER

Sanctification

Persistence

Glorification

Systematic Theology

Biblical and Historical

Robert Duncan Culver

MENTOR

Unless otherwise indicated, all Scripture quotations are from The Holy Bible, English Standard Version, copyright © 2001 by Crossway Bibles, a division of Good News Publishers. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked (niv) are taken from the HOLY BIBLE, NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION®. niv®. Copyright© 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked (nkjv) are taken from the New King James Version. Copyright © 1982 by Thomas Nelson, Inc. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked (nasb) are taken from the New American Standard Bible®, Copyright © 1960, 1962, 1963, 1968, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1975, 1977, 1995 by The Lockman Foundation. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked (nrsv) are taken from the New Revised Standard Version Bible, copyright 1989, Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked (rsv) are taken Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1952

[2nd edition, 1971] by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

© Robert Duncan Culver 2005

ISBN 1-84550-049-0

Published in 2005

Reprinted 2006 in the Mentor Imprint

by

Christian Focus Publications, Ltd.,

Geanies House, Fearn, Ross-shire,

IV20 1TW, Great Britain

www.christianfocus.com

Robert Duncan Culver asserts the moral right to be identified as the author of this book.

Cover Design by Alister MacInnes

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publishers.

Contents

Abbreviations

About the Author

Acknowledgements

Foreword by Walter C. Kaiser jr.

A Prologue to the Reader

PART 1: Theology Proper—Introduction and Doctrine of God

PART 2: Anthropology—Man as Created

PART 3: Hamartiology—Man as Sinner

PART 4: Christology—Person and Work of Christ

PART 5: Soteriology—Salvation Applied

PART 6: Ecclesiology—Church Local and Universal

PART 7: Eschatology—Last Things, Personal and Universal

Bibliography

Scripture Index

General Index

Part 1: Theology Proper: Introduction and Doctrine of God

1. An Introduction to Christian Theology
2. Preliminary to Talk about God
3. Special Terms of Talk about God
4. Why People do Believe in God
5. Reasons for Believing in God
6. How God has Revealed Himself to Mankind
7. The Names of God
8. The Attributes of God
9. The Spirituality of the Godhead
10. The Unity of the Godhead
11. The Greatness of the Godhead
12. The Goodness of the Godhead
13. The Trinity of the Godhead in Biblical and Christian History
14. The Trinity of the Godhead: Questions, Traditional Expressions, Illustrations, Values, Refinements, Cautions
15. Predestination or the Decrees of God: God's Eternal Plan for the Heavens and the Earth (I)
16. Predestination or the Decrees of God: God's Eternal Plan for the Heavens and the Earth (II)
17. God's Work of Creation (I)

18. God's Work of Creation (II)
19. The World of Unseen Spirits: Their Place in Creation
20. Satan and Demons: Fallen Created Spirits
21. God's Work of Preservation and Providence
22. Appendices on God's Preservation and Providence (Chapter 21)
23. God's Blessedness, or Impassibility

Part 2: Anthropology: Man as Created

1. Introduction to Anthropology
2. The Origin and Unity of Mankind by Creation
3. Mankind the Image of God
4. The Non-Physical Aspects of Human Nature
5. The Elements of Human Nature
6. The Origin of the Soul
7. Mankind's Original Environment, Circumstances and Capacities
8. The Divine Purpose In and For Mankind
9. The Apostasy of Mankind: Probation, Temptation and Fall
10. Consequences of the Fall of Mankind
11. Fallen Mankind in the order of Nature
12. Fallen Mankind, in their World

Part 3: Hamartiology: Man as Sinner

1. Introduction to Hamartiology
2. The Vocabulary, Common and Biblical, About Sin
3. The Nature of Sin: Sin As Moral Evil
4. The Nature of Sin: Sin As Disposition
5. Sins As Acts Committed by Sinners

6. Divine Control and Human Extremes
7. The Transmission of Sin Through the Generations of Man
8. Theories of the Imputation of Sin
9. Analysis of the Problem of Imputation of Sin and a Proposed Solution
10. The Worldwide Reign of Sin
11. The Personal Consequences of Sin

Part 4: Christology: Person and Work of Christ

1. Introduction to Christology
2. Preparation for the Coming of Christ
3. The Preexistence of Christ
4. The Deity of Christ (I): Introduction; Names and Attributes of Deity
5. The Deity of Christ (II): Works, Claims, Honors, Assumptions, Position of Deity
6. Anthropotēs, The Human Nature of Christ
7. The Virgin Birth of Jesus
8. The Incarnation of the Son of God
9. The Incarnate Person of Jesus Christ
10. The Saving Work of the Incarnate Son of God: Topics, Terms, Issues, Development
11. Humiliation and Exaltation: Two States of the Incarnate Life of the Son of God
12. The Sinless Life of Jesus
13. The Passion and Death of Jesus
14. The Meaning of the Death of Christ (I): How to Explore the Revealed Mystery
15. The Meaning of the Death of Christ (II): The Biblical Vocabulary of the Atonement
16. The Meaning of the Death of Christ (III): Atonement by Vicarious Satisfaction
17. The Extent of the Atonement

18. Further Benefits and Accomplishments of the Death of Christ in our Place
19. The Doctrine of Atonement before Anselm
20. The Resurrection of Christ (I)
21. The Resurrection of Christ (II)
22. The Ascension of Christ
23. Enthroned in Heaven at God's Right Hand
24. The Present Heavenly High Priestly Work of Christ our Lord

Part 5: Soteriology: Salvation Applied

Preface

1. Introduction to the Doctrine of Salvation
2. What Salvation Is
3. Ordo Salutis, or the Order of Salvation
4. The Doctrine of Grace
5. The Doctrine of Union with Christ
6. The Doctrine of Election
7. The Doctrine of Calling
8. The Doctrine of Regeneration
9. The Doctrine of Conversion
10. The Doctrine of Repentance
11. The Doctrine of Faith: Linguistic Factors and Specific Elements
12. The Doctrine of Faith: The Theological Construct
13. The Doctrine of Justification by Faith
14. The Doctrine of Adoption
15. The Doctrine of Sanctification: Linguistic Factors and Past Positional Aspects

16. The Doctrine of Sanctification: Present and Future Aspects
17. The Doctrine of Perseverance
18. The Doctrine of Assurance
19. Salvation Through Christ Alone
20. Is Christ Present in Non-Christian Religions?

Part 6: Ecclesiology: Church Local and Universal

1. The Critical Importance of the Doctrine of the Church
2. Defining Ecclesiology
3. The Words 'Church' and Ekklēsia
4. Metaphors, Images and Ideas Related to the Church
5. The Twofold Aspect of the Church, Universal and Local
6. Foundation for the Church
7. The Establishment of the Church
8. The Church in Relation to Israel
9. The Church in Relation to the Kingdom of God
10. The Essential Nature of the Church
11. The Unity of the Church
12. The Gifts of Christ to the Church
13. The Mission of the Church in the World
14. The Present Purposes of God for the Church and Her Destiny
15. The Nature of the Local Church
16. The Form of the Church: Organization and Governance
17. Church Polity: Theories of Church Government
18. Church Offices and Ministry (I)

19. Church Offices and Ministry (II)
20. Church Discipline
21. Public Meetings for Worship in the Church
22. The Ordinance of Baptism: The Church's Rite of Initiation, (I)
23. The Ordinance of Baptism: The Church's Rite of Initiation, (II)
24. Worship at the Lord's Table (I)
25. Worship at the Lord's Table (II)

Part 7: Eschatology: Last Things, Personal and Universal

1. Introduction to Eschatology
2. Death, Mortality and Immortality
3. Where Are the Dead Now and What is Their Condition?: the Doctrine of the Intermediate State
4. The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead (I): Its Main Features and Unique Position in Biblical Religion
5. The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead (II): Time and Order of the Resurrection of the Dead
6. The Doctrine of Judgment
7. The Final Destiny of the Unsaved (I)
8. The Final Destiny of the Unsaved (II)
9. Heaven, the Eternal Home of the Redeemed
10. The Second Advent of Christ and Related Events
11. The Time of the Lord's Return
12. Precursors to the Day of the Lord: The Great Tribulation, the Great Apostasy and the Revelation of the Man of Sin
13. The Thousand Years of Revelation 20
14. Recent and Current Views of 'The Millennium': Postmillennial, Amillennial, Premillennial
15. The Future Eternal State

Abbreviations

No formal system of abbreviations except for the names of books of the Bible is employed. Most abbreviations are obvious in context of the chapter. The following are a few of the less obvious abbreviations employed. Full bibliographical data are in the Bibliography.

ABD—Anchor Bible Dictionary, 6 volumes

ANF—The Ante-Nicene Fathers, 10 volumes

Barth—Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics, 13 volumes

Bauer, or Arndt and Gingrich—Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

Bettenson—Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church

BDB—Brown, Driver and Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament

Calvin, Institutes, or Institutes—John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

Catholic Encyclopedia—The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes

Denzinger—Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma

EDBT—Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, Ed. Walter A. Elwell

EDT—Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, Ed. Walter A. Elwell

HDB—A Dictionary of the Bible, Ed. James Hastings, 5 volumes

Liddell and Scott—A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

LW—Luther's Works, Ed. by J. Pelican and H.T. Lehmann, 55 volumes

McClintock and Strong—Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

NPNF, I—Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, First Series, 14 volumes

NPNF, II—Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Second Series, 14 volumes

OED or Oxford English Dictionary—The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary

Philo—The Works of Philo, New Updated Edition, Complete & Unabridged in One Volume

Strack & Billerbeck—Kommentar Zum Neuen Testament Aus Talmud und Midrasch, 6 volumes, Herman L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck

TDNT—Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

TWNT—Theological Wordbook of the New Testament, 2 volumes, Eds. R. L. Harris, G. L. Archer,
Jr., B. K. Waltke

ZPEB—The Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, 5 volumes, Ed. M. C. Tenney

About the Author

Robert Culver was born in rural Yakima County, Washington. It was there that he became, along with parents and family, part of a new small village congregation of believers, that has sent many of its sons and daughters into various missionary and pastoral careers. Early education was in the public schools. He is a graduate of Heidelberg College (A.B.), Grace Theological Seminary (B.D., Th.M., Th.D.) and did post-doctoral theological studies at Chicago Lutheran Theological Seminary and ancient Near-East languages at the Graduate School of the University of Minnesota.

Dr Culver received formal ordination to the ministry immediately after graduation from seminary but has been a preacher, pastor and teacher all his adult life, to the present. His career as a professor has taken him to Grace Theological Seminary (Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew), Wheaton College and Graduate School (Associate Professor of Bible and Theology) Trinity Evangelical Divinity School (Professor and Chairman of Theology). He was annual director of the Near-East School of Archaeology at Jerusalem (1962). He has been special or visiting lecturer at schools in Canada, several states in USA, Jordan, Hong Kong, France, the Netherlands and Argentina. Among his several publications perhaps best known are The Life of Christ, Civil Government: a Biblical View, Daniel and the Latter Days and the section on “Daniel” in the Wycliffe Commentary.

Acknowledgements

Production of this volume, by God’s grace, involved the careful and persistent efforts of many competent people besides the author. Malcom Maclean, the editor of the Mentor Imprint of Christian Focus Publications, at the first, examined a portion (Part Six) of the manuscript and secured acceptance of the whole for publication. Willie MacKenzie, Editorial Manager, patiently shepherded the whole project from initial editing through indexing, printing and distribution. Colin Duriez edited the majority of the book and guided editing of the whole. He offered many helpful suggestions, notably adoption of the English Standard Version for all otherwise undesignated Bible quotations.

Several typesetters and proofreaders, Jonny Sherlock, Annella MacDonald and Martin Maclean and others whose names I do not know, helped preserve the integrity of authorial intent and correct form of the final product. Susan Hart, Director of the Rushford, Minnesota Public Library has kept the author supplied with needed books and documentary information through the library search facilities and inter-library loan system over the years of the writing of this volume. Jonathan Burd prepared the lengthy Scripture Index and David Craddock, within a narrow time frame, prepared the General Index.

Special acknowledgement is due Celeste Knipmeyer Culver, my loving wife of thirty years and loving stepmother, grandmother and great grandmother. She has worked steadily on this project, almost full-time since before 1990, when we decided to devote all our best energies to it. She put every word and mark into a series of computers, having already checked my handwritten 8 ½" × 14" sheets—on through revisions, rewrites and transmission to editors and final corrections before going to press. Without her cheerful contributions and moral support this book of systematic theology would never have come to be.

Likewise my three children, Douglas, Keith and Lorraine have steadily encouraged me to complete a project begun, as they well know, long ago.

As Jesus Himself said, in another connection: "Others have labored and you have entered into their labors" (John 4:38).

Foreword

By

Walter C. Kaiser Jr.

Not every book that has seen the light of day should have been written, but this volume by the Rev Dr Robert Duncan Culver entitled Systematic Theology was one that just had to be written. Without it, we would have been deprived of one of the strongest examples of the exegetical use of the Bible in forming a Systematic Theology for our day. Parts of this line of teaching have only been known through the oral presentations of a stream of great teachers that Dr Culver represents as the highest achievement in the area of Systematic Theology of that line of godly teachers.

Even though we are seeing all of a sudden a flurry of activity in the number and size of volumes on this subject, this volume has such uniqueness about it that our generation and those that follow us, if our Lord tarries, would have been left with some major gaps in our understanding of the system of thought found in the Scriptures. I have had the privilege of hearing much of these volumes as a student, colleague and friend.

My acquaintance with Robert Culver and his teaching goes back to the latter part of the 1950s when as a graduate student I served as his teaching assistant. As I assisted him in marking the doctrinal tests of his college students and occasionally teaching a class for him, I became aware of his thought and strong Biblical approach to all of doctrine. Later I was able to take on the graduate level his course in Ecclesiology and Eschatology. But that would not be the end of our relationship or partnership in the gospel, for as a graduate student I later became an Assistant Pastor with him in a nearby Church for a year and a half until I finished my graduate work. Sometime after this we served together on two separate faculties. Therefore, I am in deep debt to him for many lines in my own thinking as I have been challenged over and over again to be more radically Biblical in my thinking while being systematic in my thought.

All too many in our day feel that Systematic Theology is a poor cousin to the newer forms of Biblical Theology with its diachronic methods as opposed to the systematic categories involving metaphysical, epistemological and logical thought. That is most unfortunate, for eventually our generation will see that, despite whatever validity may be found in the distinctive methods of Biblical theology (and there are many), nevertheless, neither discipline by itself can perform all the necessary duties laid upon it by the extraordinary issues, questions and expectations of our day. A mere perusal of this volume on Systematic Theology will demonstrate that point very readily.

It is not that Systematic Theology is indebted to Greek philosophical categories, as well as modern ones, whereas Biblical Theology is without any of these accoutrements. That is to understand badly one's own method without critically assessing the baggage that one may bring along with his or her study of the Scriptures. We must not be shy in our day of laying claim to the possibility of holding a 'correct' or 'objective meaning' or interpretation of the text of Scripture, for to deny that one can have a correct or objective meaning is objectively to state that there is none to be had! It is like saying, as one of my university professors said so blatantly, 'There are no absolutes!' When I asked him as casually as I could if he affirmed this absolutely, he unthinkingly replied, 'Absolutely!' He too had to be involved in precisely what he was disallowing!

Therefore, I am deeply grateful to my teacher, colleague, and long-standing friend for giving to all of us this extraordinary work that represents the fruit of a lifetime of studying God's word and teaching theology to collegians, seminarians, and the body of Christ. May our Lord use it to further the work of the gospel around the world in this new century when new believers are coming into the family of God at the phenomenal rate of two new believers every second, especially in the two-thirds world.

Walter C. Kaiser, Jr.

President and Colman M. Mockler Distinguished Professor of Old Testament, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary,

Hamilton, Massachusetts

The student or scholar who holds this large book in hand or on desktop, open to this page, likely has had strong reasons for buying or borrowing it. It was not a casual decision. Nor is a decision to proceed on to read such a large tome a casual one. The opening chapter of ‘An Introduction to Christian Theology,’ and the next following five chapters, though in the section of theology proper (the Doctrine of God), are intended to prepare the reader’s mind and will for the whole discipline of systematic Christian theology. Both mind and will must be prepared, for only with clean hands and a pure heart do we ascend the hill of the Lord (Ps. 24:3, 4).

Some treatments of systematic theology preface it all with a separate book or large section called prolegomena (Greek for ‘things said beforehand’) similar to prologue, a Greek term from dramatics for a monologue to introduce the main action in a stage play. I share the view of many others that these recondite matters (history of the subject, theories of knowledge and of hermeneutics, competing systems, sources, etc.) fit best in two other places: when the questions and topics arise—as inevitably they do—at various places over the whole of systematic theology or, the same may be taught as apologetics and philosophy of religion concurrently with or after the theology.¹

Source and Resources

A sound evangelical theology should make a distinction between the source of Christian doctrines (or church dogma) and resources for understanding these doctrines and how to formulate them in a system of thought. The only source of theological doctrine is the Word of God. Man, said Jesus, lives ‘by every word that comes from the mouth of God’ (Matt. 4:4). In the present time, long after the close of the ages of revelation, our only access to those words is the canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament and New Testament, the source of our theology. The chief acknowledged resources for deriving truth from the source are tradition, reason and experience.

Tradition—in the sense of the history of exegesis and interpretation of the words of God in the Word—is a resource all theologians depend on in one way or another. The tradition is embodied in creeds, confessions and all the commentaries and works of theology, plus the instructions of teachers, parents and pastors. No writer of theology starts from scratch. Every author of theology draws on this tradition and passes it on with his own contributions. Otherwise his book would fall as short of an adequate grasp of the Christian revelation as the faltering efforts of the first ecclesiastical writers back in the second Christian century.

I owe a debt for almost all the theology I know to all my teachers, the books of theology written by godly men of learning which I have read, and every sound lecture and sermon I ever heard—especially to my seminary professors and, of course, their teachers.

Reason is another resource for theology. Most ‘reasonable’ Christians assume that as beings made in the image of God our minds have a capacity for thought, of taking notice of cause and effect, of turning perceptions into conceptions, of organizing facts and truths in arrangements demonstrating relationships. We assume that the world we perceive with our senses is real and capable of being truly understood adequately if not perfectly. If we are both industrious and devout we may employ this capacity, or faculty to derive truths from Scripture, establish apparent relationships, place them in order and draw inferences. The Reformation creeds took special note of this. There are no metaphysical or epistemological commitments necessary except the common-sense realism which is spread over every page of the Bible. God would not make a world where all our sense impressions of the external world tell us lies.

Christian experience is not accepted by every orthodox theologian as a resource for theology. Some good Christians have claimed mystical experiences as revelatory. Yet mystical experiences are by definition impossible to report. Early neo-orthodox (Krisis) theology and successors make the whole Bible a fallible human report of ineffable (I-Thou) meetings with God. This the historic Christian theological consensus rejects. Yet the teaching of a ‘seasoned’ scholar or an ‘experienced’ pastor or professor is valued more than the opinion of novices. Further, would there be a world-wide church today if the first and succeeding generations of believers had not truly experienced ‘O taste and see that the Lord is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him’ (Ps. 34:8 kjv).

Sola Scriptura

Yet, because the Bible is the only source of theology, and judges all the proposed findings of the other resources, biblical truth should pervade every paragraph of this volume and scripturally derived norms should control as well as inform every sentence.

The Bible is perspicuous in the sense that any literate person ‘in due use of ordinary means, may attain to a sufficient understanding’ (Westminster Confession of Faith I. vii). Nevertheless, deep theological insight is served by going behind translations to the original languages. This book does not assume the reader’s acquaintance with Greek and Hebrew. Hence, when citing words from the original languages they are made approximately pronounceable by a non-technical, but traditional, transliteration. Theologians, I think, should practice scientific exegesis but report results rather than process in a book not designed for language specialists. A few passages, such as Romans 5:12–21 (in connection with sin and atonement) and the first verses of Genesis (in connection with creation), are exceptional and require furnishing some technical exegetical treatment of the original texts.

The formal scheme of systematic theology sometimes includes a section on the doctrine of Holy Scripture. The section may be entitled bibliology, inspiration, revelation or revelation and inspiration. One of the most successful orthodox evangelical volumes (Systematic Theology by Louis Berkhof) has no section on the Bible as such, yet throughout relies unapologetically on the veracity, integrity, inspiration and divine authority of the Canon of the sixty-six books of the Old Testament and New Testament. Regretfully, for several reasons, I have followed Berkhof’s example. J. O. Buswell (A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion) tucks in a few pages after the doctrine of God. W. G. T. Shedd (Dogmatic Theology, three large volumes) supplies fifty or sixty pages on the subject, while Francis Pieper (Christian Dogmatics), deep in Lutheran controversy about the Bible, has more pages on Holy Scripture than The Doctrine of God. The first six chapters of this volume supply some features of a doctrine of Holy Scripture, though I have included no formal section on the Doctrine of Holy Scripture. I endorse plenary, verbal inspiration, i.e., the words of Scripture though in human languages and written freely by men are also fully the words of God. The words of Scripture, not merely the ideas, are God’s words, without error in original documents, true and of divine authority.²

It is assumed the reader is already familiar with the entire Bible, not necessarily previous classroom courses in Bible, but the acquaintance which comes through reading the Book. With extra effort in diligently reading the Bible references furnished and use of reference works, an inadequate knowledge of Scripture may be overcome. Reading fifty pages a day in a moderately large-print Bible will take you from Genesis through Revelation in a month.

Sound doctrine will be founded on sound interpretation of the Bible. Hence many departments of systematic theology offer a course in biblical hermeneutics. Sadly, the contemporary field of hermeneutics is plagued with a plethora of aggressive proponents of nihilistic to weird theories of meaning and of non-meaning of documents, including the Bible.³ We have been compelled by our times to come to terms with assaults but not to surrender to them. The same common sense realism (formal or informal) which took you through fourth grade geography and college chemistry will take you through Bible and theology. A course in hermeneutics is hardly prerequisite to theology. It can wait.

Theology must also be aware of the importance of biblical introduction both general (text and canon) and special (date, authorship, genuineness, sources, etc.). Several kinds of destructive scholarly criticism have relentlessly attacked Christian belief from this quarter for two centuries. These subjects are almost unbelievably complicated. They should be pursued under competent guidance and good literary sources. Yet systematic theology serves as well, perhaps better, as preliminary to critical studies than the other way around. This book takes neither a pre-critical nor an uncritical approach to Scripture, but one of informed rejection of that form of biblical criticism which assumes rejection of the Christian, theistic, weltanschauung (world-view) as a precondition of scholarly study. We have the canon of Holy Scripture and accept it as inspired and truthful in all its parts. We gratefully adopt and promote all the positive fruits of modern study of the science of interpretation and both special and general introduction to the Bible.

The goals in this volume do not include references in text and notes to every author or teacher who over the author's life has informed or affected my thoughts about theology. I document quotations and give credit to immediate sources even if not directly quoted and supply some guidance to further reading. Readers are pointed to far more ancient, Reformation, post-Reformation, recent and contemporary evangelical authors than to the offerings of the largely university-generated, burgeoning theological marketplace of today. It does not seem wise to let the spoilers set the agenda for constructive theology for Christians—even as we try to take due note of any positive corrections or refinements their work suggests. The hot trails of ephemeral controversies and faddish 'new theology' do not lead to the deposit of acknowledged, Christian consensual truth about God and His ways.

The program of investigation and instruction is systematic because God is not the author of confusion (1 Cor. 14:33). If it is God's will that in the church all things be done decently and in order (1 Cor. 14:40; cf. 14:2 and 34) then thinking about eternal truth should also be in some systematic order. The Apostle commands the interim pastor at Ephesus to 'Follow the pattern of sound words' which he had already heard from his systematic theology professor ('sound words ... heard from me' 2 Tim. 1:13 rsv). He is to 'guard the truth that has been entrusted to you' (2 Tim. 1:14 rsv). Down through the seventy-five-plus generations of our era comes the charge:

Do your best to present yourself to God as one approved, a workman who has no need to be ashamed, rightly handling the word of truth. Avoid ... godless chatter, for it will lead people into more and more ungodliness (2 Tim. 2:15, 16 rsv).

Very early in my ministry as a pastor I found I had not achieved competence to do what these and similar passages demand. My college education had been interrupted by prolonged and acute hard times. There was no money to move a pastor from the center of things to our rather remote church. So when our young pastor resigned to finish seminary education the congregation invited me and my bride to move into the parsonage, preach, teach and shepherd the flock at the tender age of twenty-one! Things went fairly well. Youthful enthusiasm and a strong voice in a community of many loyal friends old and young carried quite a distance. The congregation was even attracting a few new people.

I already had a fair grasp of the historical structure and literary content of the Bible and was thoroughly familiar with all the notes in the most popular study Bible of the time. Some college courses in Bible, church history, Christian evidences and twenty semester hours in Greek enabled the aspirant pastor-teacher to ascertain the surface meaning of the text of the Epistle to the Ephesians and some of the depths. But in the very first chapter he came up against election, the Holy Trinity, the sovereign will of God, a present reign of Christ in heaven and a seemingly complicated doctrine of the church. Nothing in his background had provided definition and a logical structure of doctrines whereby these grand truths of revelation could be defined and related to one another and to the ‘whole counsel of God.’ The ancient church used katholikos (catholic) both of the whole church through all the world and the canon of faith, or scheme of beliefs—in other words, systematic theology. What this aspirant pastor-teacher desperately needed, in America, is usually called systematic theology, that is, ‘What the church of Jesus Christ believes, teaches and confesses on the basis of the word of God: this is Christian doctrine.’⁴

No theologian or denomination has a lock-hold on all the details, though each writer or lecturer necessarily places his own distinct character on structure and details. Yet, to be of interest to any beyond the author and his immediate sympathizers, systematic theology will consist mainly of historical, consensual, orthodox, biblical doctrine—in the language of Vincent of Lerins, that which has been believed ‘everywhere, always, by all’—orthodox believers, that is.

The opening ‘Introduction to Theology,’ follows up on the questions aroused by these opening sentences and lays ground for all to follow.

¹ Since the time of Schleiermacher, 1768–1834, apologetics is sometimes called Fundamental Theology. A large symposium of Roman Catholic scholars about how to approach theology is entitled Problems of Fundamental Theology (New York: Paulist Press, 1982). Louis Berkhof presents a good discussion of the relation of how and when apologetics is ‘introduction’ or defense and at what point in Introduction to Systematic Theology, Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1932, pp. 48–51. It is significant that his Systematic Theology is published without his Introduction to Systematic Theology.

² I have set forth a more comprehensive summary of the doctrine as The Doctrine of Holy Scripture in a large section of a book published jointly with Dr Lloyd M. Perry, How to Search the Scriptures (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1967, 1979). I intend, God enabling, to enlarge that modest effort into a book on the subject. This is only one of several writing projects that preparation of this volume has provoked.

³ A good brief survey of the subject from a non-committal point of view is Hermeneutics by Bernard Lategan in The Anchor Bible Dictionary, vol. 3, pp. 149–154, corrected somewhat by Interpretation of the Bible by F. F. Bruce, EDT, pp. 565–568. A highly recommended recent textbook is Introduction to Biblical Interpretation by Klein, Blomberg and Hubbard.

⁴ The first line repeated often afterward in Jaroslav Pelikan's, The Christian Tradition, 5 vols., Vol. I, p. 1.

PART 1

THEOLOGY PROPER

Introduction and Doctrine of God

1

An Introduction to Christian Theology

I. What Theology is

One may rightly say Christian theology is study or organized treatment of the topic, God, from the standpoint of Christianity. To leave the matter there, however, would be grossly misleading, for theology is not merely an interpretation of the meaning of God from the outside; theology is a part or aspect of Christianity itself. On a deeper level theology is of the essence of Christianity. It is so much of the essence that to dispense with theology is to dispense with Christianity.

Christianity is not merely a mixture of ceremonies, beliefs, adherents, history and the like. The Christian religion is all of these, perhaps, but that also is a misleading statement, for it is not an aggregate or mixture of things like baptism (ceremony), the Apostles' Creed (beliefs), a congregation of Baptists (adherents) and a book of church history.

Authentic Christianity is a single thing. We may compare it to a chemical compound such as sulphuric acid (H_2SO_4). H_2SO_4 is not two parts hydrogen, one of sulphur and four of oxygen, somehow mixed together in a glass beaker. It is a single thing in which there are three elements so integrally united as to form a substance different from any one of the three alone, and from anything else. The distinctive features of Christianity are really of little importance singly. They are always together in authentic Christian religion. They are each explicit in Scripture. There are four: (1) certain acts of God in history, or redemption; (2) the meaning of those acts of God as set forth in Holy Scripture, or doctrines; (3) the lives of countless believers, the Christians themselves through the ages but particularly those alive today; and (4) the congregations of believers throughout the world, the churches, or, considered in their spiritual oneness, the church.

Redemption—History of what God has done

First, in historical and logical order, Christianity has been rendered what it is by what God did a long time ago. The Second Person of the Godhead became a man. He lived, suffered and died for us and for our salvation. He arose, ascended to the right hand of God where presently He reigns till His enemies are made the footstool of His feet and where He exercises certain ministries for us in the presence of the Father. Essentially, however, redemption is finished: 'After making purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high' (Heb. 1:3). His sitting down signified, in part, that His redemptive work had been completed.

What God did in the redemptive career of Jesus of Nazareth was a consummation of events of God's doing from eternity past, through all of the preparatory history of the Old Testament and up to the point when in 'the fullness of time ... God sent forth his Son' (Gal. 4:4).

Christianity, one may justly say, is a history, in the sense of a finished work of redemption performed in a certain period of linear time. The events of redemption may be precisely located in time and place. The first four books of the New Testament are the only extensive authentic sources of information about those acts of God.

The four Gospels are not precisely of the genre history, but they contain a very special species of history, truthful reports of events in time. Though not very specific about the timeframe, the nature of the events themselves is clear if the records are permitted to speak for themselves.

The first Christian generation heard the story of redemption from eyewitnesses—at least the earliest ones did. We, however, depend upon the written testimony of the eyewitnesses. There is no alternate dependable source at this late date.

The element Christianity calls history (events which happened, not mere reports of them) in our religion accounts in large part for the preponderance of narrative in most of the Bible up to the Epistles in the New Testament. It also is the reason why the 'Gospels' are Gospels—more about this later.

Doctrines—The Biblical Meaning of the Redemptive History

There is an essential second element in our religion. The events of biblical salvation history—God's acts of redemption—have meaning. They must be interpreted, and are seminally interpreted, in the same Scriptures which report God's acts. This interpretation is known as doctrine.

The late J. Gresham Machen explained this matter well:

From the beginning, the Christian gospel, as indeed the name 'gospel' or 'good news' implies, consisted of an account of something that had happened. And when from the beginning, the meaning of the happening was set forth there was Christian doctrine. 'Christ died'—that is history. 'Christ died for our sins'—that is doctrine. Without these two elements joined in an absolutely indissoluble union there is no Christianity.¹

The death of Christ taken as a naked fact is not a doctrine, not even a very significant fact. Julius Caesar died. So did my dear father over forty years ago and my dear mother over fifteen years ago. 'It is appointed for man to die once.' There is no special meaning for the human race in the fact that a man, even a sinless man, died unless someone in a position to have the facts tells us why and what for. The death of Christ, as we sometimes hear it correctly said, had a cosmic meaning. Statement of the fact with the meaning it has for the world of sinful people is a statement of Christian doctrine. We call it the doctrine of atonement.

There is a modern approach to Christianity which holds all doctrines to be assertions of and interpretations of religious experience. My liberal-Niebuhrian college professor of religion, for example, claimed that Luther's doctrine of Justification by Faith was the Reformer's interpretation of his religious experience of forgiveness and acceptance by God. Of course, Luther himself, who found the doctrine in evangelical Psalms, Galatians and Romans as he prepared his sermons for the congregation of one of the churches of Wittenberg, said it was the other way around. First he learned the doctrine of Justification of David and Paul on the ground of Jesus' shed blood, appropriated by faith alone. After he believingly appropriated the righteousness of God he had wonderful Christian religious experiences.

The distinction between redemptive facts of Christianity and doctrine must not be pressed too far, for it does not apply to all doctrines or facts. Some teachings, which must be called doctrines, are revealed truths. Among these are the present ministry for us by Christ in heaven, His Second Advent and the present ministry of the Holy Spirit. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is part Christian interpretation of events of history (e.g. events at Jesus' baptism) and part revealed truth.

Furthermore, there are some doctrines uniformly believed by Christians everywhere, confessed and proclaimed, that are not spelled out in any verse of the Bible, but are quite as certain as if they were. Some doctrines have comprehensive exact statement in a single text of the Bible. Some do not. Why that is true and what theologians have done about it must be reserved for later.

Insistence on proclamation of these two elements, the interpretation of facts, and history and its meaning, is found repeatedly in the New Testament. Yet, in spite of that, about every generation or so, another emphasis, 'another gospel', 'which is not another', is proposed. When I began to learn about such things in college the prevalent notion in Protestant centres of ministerial training in America was that the apostles' superior grasp of eternal, moral principles taught by Jesus and exemplified by Him was the gospel that conquered the empire of Rome. Another world depression, Hitler, a Second World War and general dissolution of liberalism scotched that fable. Then in America the gospel of existential experience (neo-orthodoxy) came and went. After that 'the image of God in man' theology, promoting self-fulfilment as the essential Christian gospel came along. There have been and are other theologies. A whole series of books about these and other ephemeral theologies sits on the back shelves of many a preacher's private library today. Like the rest of the world (1 John. 2:17) they are all 'passing away'.

The Lives of Countless Believers

It probably seems obvious to anyone who thinks about it that in some manner Christianity is properly to be equated with all the Christian people one knows. This is at least partially correct. Christianity is life, human life of a very special kind. Here we must briefly consider some more biblical history and apostolic testimony.

Notice how Paul ties redemptive history and the meaning of it within his own life as essential, true religion: 'Christ will be honoured in my body, whether by life or by death. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain' (Phil. 1:20, 21). 'I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me' (Gal. 2:20 niv).

This is what Christianity has been from its beginning. The beginnings of Christianity, as reported in Acts and Epistles and Revelation, are now again acknowledged even by many critical scholars as definite historical phenomena, not mythical or imaginary. This is in spite of two centuries of every conceivable attack on the genuineness of the accounts. Christianity began a few days after Jesus' resurrection and ascension. It was not an absolute beginning for it existed in preliminary form as soon as Jesus gathered that original group of five or six who accompanied Him the first year of His public ministry. They did not even have a collective name until years later, at Antioch of Syria, their neighbours named them, 'Christians' (Acts 11:26).

Somehow the fact got abroad into public knowledge that not only was Christ their teacher, example and Savior, but that He lived in them and with them. Paul did not invent the theology of Christian life we read of in these statements quoted above from Philippians 1:20, 21 and Galatians 2:20.

Development of the idea of Christian life, individual and as a group, will come later in these studies. The dynamics of it, however, are on display beginning with the first chapter of Acts through the end of Revelation. In a nutshell, the elements were constant attention (proskarterountes) to apostolic doctrine (didachē), to the fellowship (koinōnia), to the special central fact of worship, i.e. 'the breaking of the bread', to their prayers together (Acts 2:41, 42 and 4:23–31) and to their public testimony (Acts 2:43–47 and 5:12–42). These were irresistible to outsiders, purifying to insiders and enviable to competitors for the hearts of mankind.

There has been much interest among historians and philosophers about what caused the Christian movement to succeed. What forces were at work in overwhelming the Roman Empire by Christianity in the three centuries from about ad 30 to about ad 315? Industrious readers will find the matter discussed learnedly in Edward Gibbon's multi-volumed The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Adolph Harnack's The History of Dogma, Ernst Troeltsch's The Social Teachings of the Churches, Kenneth Scott Latourette's The History of Christianity and even Arnold J. Toynbee's multi-volumed Study of History. There are many differences and agreements in part among these five writers. All agree, however, that moral quality of the lives of these early Christian people, in concert with their love one for another, and care for the welfare of all mankind, set them apart. These qualities came gradually to be grudgingly admired in spite of harassment by a succession of emperors, in vain hope of saving the corrupt society of ancient Roman paganism from ruin, without deigning to acknowledge any of the claims of Christianity.

The same quality of life is of the essence of biblical Christianity. Professed religion anywhere without it is less than the religion of which Jesus is the heart, life and centre.

An Institution-Church, Churches, and Organization

There is a fourth element—the public association of believers together in congregations. They have a corporate life together, partially observable to all men. In John Bunyan's classic, The Pilgrim's Progress, Christian is introduced, rather early in his journey from the City of Destruction to Mount Zion, to the great house 'built by the Lord of the hill, for the relief and security of pilgrims'. There he became acquainted with Prudence, Piety and Charity, was furnished companionship and nourishment and sent on his way toward the celestial destination panoplied with the full armour of God. This he found useful at every future stage of the journey.

The people in these visible local associations also think of themselves as members of a world-wide spiritual commonwealth of believers. These living believers, together with all deceased believers now in heaven, are all together ‘the assembly of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven’ (Heb. 12:23) and constitute ‘the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all’ (Eph. 1:22, 23).

This unity of the believers both locally and universally is so central in the New Testament portrayal of Christianity that our religion can neither be discussed nor possessed without reference to it. There is no such thing as having Christ, or loving, admiring or confessing Him without similar participation in ‘the church’. This is the way Christ Himself, determined the matter to be. For reasons of space and good order an adequate exposition of the church as a doctrine will await its proper place in this treatment of doctrines. The features of the church which distinguish it from other social groups will then be examined. The church of today is inseparable, in reality and thought about it, from the church of yesterday and the church of tomorrow. It is both a heavenly reality and an earthly entity. The history of Christianity and the history of the church may be distinguished but not separated.

Christianity, to summarize, exists under four inseparable aspects: (1) redemptive acts of God in history; (2) doctrines, which are apostolic interpretation of the meaning of that history; (3) the lives of those who have embraced the redemptive acts of God in history and the apostolic interpretation of them; and (4) the Church (Heb. 12:23) ‘of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven’.

II. What Systematic Theology is

It is apparent that a book of ‘theology’, even though we have not fully defined theology as yet, is connected closely with the ‘doctrine’ aspect of Christianity. ‘What the church of Jesus Christ believes, teaches and confesses on the basis of the Word of God: this is Christian doctrine ... The Christian church would not be the church as we know it without Christian doctrine.’²

When what the church teaches is announced as it emerges portion by portion from the Bible the discourse is properly called exposition. The process of exploring the texts and bringing out the meaning in preparation for exposition is exegesis. Particular teachings are doctrines. These doctrines are believed and confessed regularly by Christians in their gatherings for worship, in classes and groups as well as privately to their neighbours. When these doctrines are organized into some logically coherent arrangement there is systematic theology. As shall become evident, systematic theology is more than logical arrangement of biblical doctrines, but it must not ever be less if it is rightly to claim the title, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion.³ There are other adjectives used with ‘theology’—biblical, historical, practical, dogmatic, symbolic—but for now we will attend only to systematic theology.

Sustained study of doctrines of the Word of God cannot avoid organized, coherent arrangement of the doctrines, nor should it. Meaningful study of botany, zoology, law, history, medicine, agriculture or any other topic cannot proceed without organized, coherent arrangement of the data.

If new believers are to be instructed, false doctrines exposed, described and corrected, and if the teachings of the Bible are to be seen in their wholeness, then something not in the written book called the Bible but written in human nature must be brought to it. We call it orderly arrangement or system.

To illustrate, nature has put a hundred species of plants all together in one acre of hillside forest on my small farm. But to know and use what is there—even though I was reared on a farm and my ancestors for at least ten generations have been ‘yankee farmers’—I have bought several books on botany: one on flowers, others on shrubs, deciduous trees, coniferous trees and so on. I even bought several on lumber and another on firewood. Similarly the topics of theology loci, (Latin for ‘places’, in English lo-see, singular, lo-kus) were born of rational necessity for thinking people. These loci usually begin with God, then move on to revelation (Holy Scripture), mankind, sin, redemption (Christ’s person and work), salvation (application of redemption), church and last things. These loci can no more be avoided than hooks in a closet, shelves in a pantry or library, or drawers in a filing cabinet.

Persuading Objectors to Theology

The moods of recent decades, even in theological schools, have not always been favourable to the study of systematic theology—not even to the study of doctrines of church, denomination or even of Christianity itself. This may be the fruit of commonly low opinions of authority of all kinds among the young—though that may be passing. Yet, even among those hardly to be regarded as lawless in spirit, there has been widespread genuine suspicion of systematic approaches to Christian doctrines. The ‘pietist’ flavour of popular, evangelical theology certainly has had something to do with this distrust. ‘How can you say anybody’s beliefs are right and another’s wrong’ was one new student’s response to my third lecture and twenty-five pages into the textbook for the course, not long ago. I wondered who had admitted this sophomore (‘wise fool’) to a graduate course in theology. ‘Post-modern’ was not yet a respectable category.

Whatever it is that causes suspicion of systematic theology, it frequently comes out as a preference for something called ‘biblical theology’ even when the objector may not know what biblical theology is. It seems very intellectual and pious to assume prejudice or hoary-headed sectarian controversies control ‘systematics’ while to derive doctrines from fresh, inductive study of Scripture gives the Holy Spirit a chance to teach us. John 16:12 may be cited out of context to support this outlook. It is not an entirely unworthy attitude, however erroneous. If one has not yet thought through the implications of what the Bible has to say about the gift of ‘teacher’ and ‘teachers’, Christ’s Lordship over truth and warnings against theological independence, an atmosphere of doctrinal non-commitment seems quite admirable. The subtlety of Satan has taken quick advantage of many who looked at revealed truth in this way.

A true story about a theological student will convey the matter neatly. He was a bright young man in a course leading to the M.A. degree in church history at the seminary. There was a required ‘minor comprehensive’ examination in systematic theology which, to his dismay and disgust, he failed utterly. As department chairman in charge of a second try, and with some lenity, I allowed the student to read the college level Manual of Christian Doctrine by Louis Berkhof, and to document and to make a satisfactory written report in lieu of a second try at the examination. Reading this standard work was his very first experience with theology and it completely changed his mind about the value of systematic theology in education for a Christian ministry of any kind. In his report I was pleased to read the following conversion—uncoerced by me, for he did not need to respond personally. ‘I came to Trinity with a strong anti-theological bias and I wanted to study church history without studying theology. The fact that I imagined such a thing to be possible ... indicates the extent of my ignorance of both disciplines. As one might expect, I spent an extremely foggy first year.’

He goes on to say he did poorly on his papers in church history, the area of his major, because he did not understand the theological issues involved. He acknowledged that the theology book I required him to read had not only fascinated him but compelled him to change what he now called ‘unsupported dogmas’ of his own. The report closed as follows:

The greatest value of the book was in setting boundaries for discussion. When one studies church history, the field looks infinite ... there is no end to the topics and this is extremely frustrating. There is something reassuring about being able to examine a book from cover to cover [Berkhof’s Manual] and know that one has at least an introduction to all the subject area within a given discipline. I have never had a course in introduction to theology: the reading of Berkhof could not actually replace such a course, but it did provide the general overview of the field which I needed but did not want [desire]. I am not yet a theologian, but I know what I will need to become one.

It is good to know that this young man settled down to complete a standard course of education for the Christian ministry, including, of course, all the required systematic theology studies.

Biblical Mandate for Formal Theological Training

Is there a specific biblical mandate for setting up schools of training for pastors, missionaries and evangelists and, if so, must systematic doctrinal study be a part of it? Do we really need teachers? Is it not true that if serious Christians would only gather together with Bibles on their laps, read together, and share their insights and experiences, this is all they need to understand the Word of God? Is something less explicit than formal, guided study under authorized teachers possible and, if so, is it desirable? Is there intellectual depth to Christianity which justly challenges the best minds? If so, does that require the same sorts of intellectual rigour which is the case in many other areas of human culture? The answer to all these questions is not far to seek.

Let us start with Jesus. He lived out His days as a biblical Jew, according to the requirements and instructions of the Law and the Prophets. They spoke to Jesus with authority. The synagogue, its school and rabbis were part of His youthful training. He asserted that to search the Old Testament is a part of the true way of eternal life.

This attitude of Jesus He passed on to the apostles, all of whom were already committed to the same outlook. They followed Jesus everywhere, being schooled thereby in one of the accepted pedagogical methods of the ancient world, i.e. they were true ‘Peripatetics’ though not quite after the Aristotelian model.

Many times He promised they would understand fully what He had been saying only after His resurrection. So, at one of His first post-resurrection meetings with the apostles He ‘opened their minds that they might understand the Scriptures’ (Luke 24:45). From then forward the Hebrew Scriptures became for Jesus’ followers a Christian book. All the vast resources of that treasury of religious literature instantly became part of the Christian tradition with distinctly Christian meaning. All truth of Old Testament biblical religion, all that was true even in first century Judaism, became sources of Christian doctrines. This great body of truths answers the deepest questions ever to occupy human minds—about the origin of the world, the nature of humanity, about the Godhead, sin, evil, salvation, the future life and many other things.

The apostles were custodians of their Master's teachings, truths to be transmitted to those who would believe through their word. From the first the Christian congregations gathered regularly to give attention to the apostles' 'doctrine'. There is merit, if not pressed too far, in distinguishing their preaching of the good news (gospel, evangel) from their instruction in doctrine. Doctrine in the Acts and Epistles often translates didachē, from the Greek word to teach. Didachē is not usually 'proclaimed as by a herald' whereas gospel or evangel was proclaimed as by a herald; hence its preaching was kerygma, from kērusso, to proclaim. The gospel, when considered narrowly, is only a segment of the proclamation of Christianity, as Paul shows in 1 Corinthians 15. The teaching (didachē) contains the gospel, but the gospel does not contain all the teaching. After a lesson or two anyone can tell someone else the good news with its simple corollaries. Hence there are useful tracts like 'Four things God wants You to Know'—in use as long as most of us have been alive.

Doctrine is something else. It is like the halakoth, or moral precepts of rabbinical Judaism. Minimally the many passages in the New Testament, employing didachē and the several other words for doctrines, require that we distinguish a more complete statement of Christianity alongside the proclamation of salvation. The didachē may be characterized as a statement, with full explanation, chiefly to believers, of the entire Christian revelation. Most of these doctrines were already contained in the Hebrew Scriptures, what Christians call the Old Testament. Christ had opened their minds that they might understand these Scriptures in a Christian way (see Luke 24:25, 26, 44–49).⁴ This was and is the basis of Christian theology along with the New Testament revelation.

This task of instruction was of sufficient magnitude and importance that the first congregation 'devoted themselves [proskaterountes] to the apostles' teaching' (Acts 2:42). It was also boldly stated to unbelievers of the Jewish nation (Acts 5:28). It sometimes accompanied, even preceded, announcement of the gospel in missionary evangelism (see Acts 13:12; 17:19).

This body of doctrine was a treasure committed by the apostles to the next generation of believers. Paul, though he did not derive his message directly from any of the Twelve, nevertheless preserved the same methods and emphasis in regard to the instruction of Pauline churches. Therefore, typically a Pauline Epistle will devote the major first part to Christian doctrines and in the second turn to ethics and practices of Christian living.

In the Pastoral Epistles Paul instructs leaders of the churches to devote prior attention to this deposit of truth. These three letters (1 and 2 Tim. and Titus) are among the most conservative in tone of any literature. The last thing Paul or his corps of pastors wished to be was 'innovative' in their doctrines. They may have pioneered new methods of evangelism (though always through 'the foolishness of preaching' [1 Cor. 1:21 kjv]) but they thought of themselves as conservators of known truths not inventors of new ones.

There is considerable evidence that the gist of doctrinal affirmation took on a fixed verbal form for liturgical recitation. Researches of C. H. Dodd a couple of generations ago promoted this understanding among many scholars. Whether the words were the same everywhere or not, in this early period of apostolic and Catholic Christianity, it was important to all the Fathers whose writings comment on the matter, that doctrines (what was believed, taught and confessed) be the same in every congregation. The Fathers inherited this outlook from the apostles, especially Paul whose speeches in Acts and exhortations in his Epistles show how great was his concern for uniformity of doctrines everywhere.

Paul besought the Corinthians all to ‘speak the same thing ... perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment’. There is but ‘one faith’, he said. The pastor’s sermon was to contain only ‘sound words’, ‘the trustworthy word ... sound doctrine’ and ‘sound doctrine, in accordance with the glorious gospel of the blessed God’ (1 Cor. 1:10 kjv; Eph. 4:5; 2 Tim. 1:13; Titus 1:9; 1 Tim. 1:10–11). These are some of the expressions demonstrating Paul’s insistence on a uniform orthodoxy, perhaps even a standard verbal form or creed-like outline of doctrines, in the apostolic churches.

Such mandates for giving ‘constant attention to the apostles’ doctrine’, that is, doctrines announced in the Old Testament, refined by Jesus, illuminated by the Spirit, enlarged by apostles, uniform in all the churches, would have been impossible to effect without a staff of exponents—teachers, elders—call them clergy if you like, educated for their vocation. The churches everywhere were in immediate need for the services of teachers who had mastered the body of doctrine received from the founders.

The notion that Christianity ever was for any extended period capable of maintaining itself as a ‘wholly spiritual’ movement bound together on spiritual, ethical and social principles only—without organization, having no recognized trained leadership and committed to no official teachings (only the word dogma seems to fit)—is impossible to maintain in light of the evidence. It certainly was not true of the early church. Even some Plymouth Brethren have conceded that not every new ‘assembly’ comes to birth with all the spiritual gifts and those gifted to be ‘pastors and teachers’. Very late they have ‘discovered’ that their founding Fathers were all thoroughly educated and theologically trained Anglican clergymen.

If there were to be teachers who had mastered what Scripture, Jesus and the apostles taught, there had to be some programme of instruction. If so, then there were likely also recognized schools of theology. We know of several located in metropolitan churches, for example, in Caesarea, Antioch and Alexandria in the subapostolic age. How about schools for the training of pastors and teachers in Paul’s time among the churches he founded? All the twelve apostles were graduates of the ‘peripatetic’ school of Jesus. Paul was a learned man already and mentions his private studies after conversion over several years (Gal. 1:18; see Acts 22:3; Phil. 3:4–6) before setting off on apostolic mission. He, himself, schooled his own missionary corps.

It should be expected that he would establish means of perpetuating a trained ministry to serve on after he was gone from earth—schools of theology—in any centre where Christians became numerous. Ephesus was such a place. It is close to certain Paul established such a school there. This is the significance some theologians and exegetes have found in 2 Timothy 2:1, 2: ‘You then, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. And the things you have heard me say in the presence of many witnesses entrust to reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others’ (niv).

I quote only two of several theologians who could be cited. Francis Pieper, a leading theologian for the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, wrote this summary statement, ‘Timothy performed the work of a theological professor when he committed the things he had learned from the Apostle Paul “to faithful men who will be able to teach others also” (2 Tim. 2:2).’ He quotes the Lutheran scholar Quenstedt on oral teaching by professors of theology to student ministers in theological schools. This text, he goes on to say, ‘teaches and establishes the mysteries of the faith and refutes the errors contrary to sound doctrine more accurately and copiously, and is the province of bishops and preachers in the church’.⁵

A most convincing argument that this verse mandates a theological seminary in the ancient city of Ephesus was proposed by Alfred Plummer as now follows. I quote only certain leading statements from Plummer’s comments on 2 Timothy 2:2 in The Expositor’s Bible, The Pastoral Epistles:

In this tenderly affectionate address we have a very early indication of the beginnings of Christian tradition and Christian schools, two subjects intimately connected with one another ... He [Paul] ... exhorts him [Timothy] to make proper provision for continuity of sound teaching in the church [Ephesus] committed to his care. In other words, before leaving his flock in order to visit his spiritual father and friend, he is to establish a school,—a school of picked scholars, intelligent enough to appreciate, and trustworthy enough to preserve, all that has been handed down from Christ and His Apostles respecting the essentials of the Christian faith ... [the authentic and only gospel and didachē, Gal. 1:6–9].⁶

Plummer goes on to say that Christ in Matthew 28:19–20 ‘from the outset’ commanded such provision for ‘the tradition’ and for ‘Christian schools’. He further showed how ‘experience has proved how entirely necessary such [schools] are’ (p. 466). The doctrine and order of the churches tend to be only as sound as the sources (schools or otherwise) where their pastors receive their training.

Plummer wrote as a thoroughly informed orthodox Anglican. He was fully aware of the school of thought embodied in the Modernism of Adolph Harnack, which contended Paul had overthrown original Christianity, that continuity between Jesus’ teachings and the doctrine of the second century church had been almost totally lost. This gives both importance and poignancy to Plummer’s still fully relevant closing remarks on 2 Timothy 2:1–2, as follows:

But what is certain respecting the earliest ages of the church is this, that in every Church regular instruction in the faith was given by persons in authority specially selected for this work, and frequent intercourse between Churches showed that the substance of the instruction given was in all cases the same, whether the form of the words was identical or not. These facts, which do not by any means stand alone, are conclusive against the hypothesis [Harnack’s] that between the Crucifixion and the middle of the second century a complete revolution in the creed was effected; and the traditional belief of Christians is not that which Jesus of Nazareth taught, but a perversion of it which owes its origin mainly to the overwhelming influence of His professed follower, but virtual supplanter, Saul of Tarsus.⁷

In view then of the obvious importance of this text (2 Tim. 2:2), let us enlarge upon it.

Theological education for ministers is a very large undertaking. It is utterly reasonable that every seminary or department which intends to prepare pastors and missionaries will have some distinct features since its mandate, is distinct from all others. Let us therefore seek to understand in detail and as fully as possible what this, the only such text in the New Testament, has to say to the people who found or manage such schools and to tell students what they have a right to expect.

1. Mandate

The mandate for a special theological school for the ministry is provided in Paul's 'Therefore' (kjv). He had been expressing concern for 'the pattern of the sound words that you have heard from me' throughout chapter 1 (see 2 Tim. 1:13) and was aware of a particular doctrinal peril from heresies originating in the very province (Asia) in which Ephesus was located. So this very practical Apostle has in mind two reasons for founding a school of theology. The primary one was catechetical, the necessity of thoroughly grounding the preachers in the doctrines of Christianity; the secondary one was apologetical, preparing the teacher to repel the perversions of aggressive promoters of error and heresy. There are therefore sound reasons to assume schools of Christian theology have existed from the very beginning and will of necessity always exist in some form or other for these same two reasons.

2. Subject Matter

Nor are we without guidance as to the subject matter of a sound theological education. Timothy knew exactly what it was: the things that he had heard Paul say. As 2 Timothy 1:13 puts it, he was to 'Follow the pattern of the sound words that you have heard from me'. The content of teaching was to be a body of truth, elsewhere designated as 'teachings' (didaskalia), truths 'committed to ... trust' imperiled by 'godless chatter and the opposing ideas of what is falsely called knowledge' (1 Tim. 6:20 niv). No doubt Timothy knew something about inductive study and the methods of historical research, as anyone in a learned profession, but neither was particularly relevant to the heart of the Christian Theological Academy of Ephesus where Timothy served as dean. His assignment was faithful transmission of truth already defined and made available to him through the Apostle Paul's oral instructions. He was not therefore directed to head up a research project—valuable as research in the present age of the world may be. Paul's Ekousas (aorist) 'what you have heard' sounds for all the world like listening to sermons and lectures and not at all like doing research and writing papers (again, valuable in a certain context). The origin and authority of these teachings in the Apostles, and ultimately from Christ, Himself, has been mentioned earlier and will demand extended attention again in connection with the doctrine of Holy Scripture.

3. Public Quality

The public quality of these teachings is plain. Timothy had heard it dia pollōn marturiōn, 'among many witnesses' (kjv and asv), 'before' (rsv), 'in the presence of' (nasb, niv). The Greek preposition dia with the genitive, as here, ordinarily means 'through', though the translations give the necessary sense that what Paul had transmitted to a group, of which Timothy was a part, and has now become common property, is to be transmitted in similar public manner (church, classrooms, etc.) to another generation. Here is a sort of freedom of information statute for Christian doctrine. Though we do not ordinarily conduct our doctrine classes in the street (even a university setting is generally inappropriate), our lectures are open. Only the interested will come, but the information is not a gnosticism which only the initiated may hear. Observers of all sorts may be admitted, though membership may be restricted to believers. Strictly to the point, tenets of the Christian religion have nothing in common with rituals and formulae of secret societies and mystery religions which only initiates and lodge members may know. Christ tells us not to cast our pearls before swine or give holy things to dogs, as it were, but truly interested people are neither intellectual nor spiritual swine and dogs. They are welcome to learn. This being true, no special jargon is strictly necessary to theology, however useful specific, technical terms may be. A good term, say 'Providence', may save a lot of time in discussion if everyone understands it. Such words—and there are many useful ones—are of value as they serve to conserve time, summarize or elucidate ideas, and promote clear communication of ideas. As mere marks of erudition they are useless and should be avoided. On the other hand, beginners must be both patient and industrious enough to learn the special terms as they come along. Anyone can master the ideas which they represent, given industry, a little time and spiritual inclination.

4. Pedagogical Method

The pedagogical method is specified in 'entrust', or more exactly, these things (Gr. tauta) 'entrust to faithful men'.

The usefulness of scientific experiments, of data-gathering and inductive reasoning, in many areas of knowledge may not be questioned. There is a widely diffused notion that skills, techniques and special information basic to professions such as law, medicine, engineering and the like need not be mastered by those aspiring to be pastors and Christian teachers in the office of the ministry. Such thinking is contradictory to common sense, and here, contradictory to Scripture also. From the beginning there was a body of Christian doctrine to be learned. It was not going to be codified and organized for a long time into the future, but in seminal form it was all there, not to be researched, but mastered. The truths were to be set before or put before as food on a table. The Greek word is paratithēmi, also used of Jesus' setting His parables before the disciples (Matt. 13:24, 31).

5. Recipients

The subjects, that is the ones instructed in the theological school, are 'faithful men' ('reliable men' niv).

An important matter is present here. The word is not 'believing men' but 'faithful men'. The former would be pisteuosi; the latter (in the text before us) is pistois, dative plural of pistos, faithful.

Christian truths belong to all Christians, but not everyone is equipped by nature and the special gifts of the Holy Spirit to be a teacher. So the church needs to make provision that some be trained in order to be 'able to teach others also'. Paul's rhetorical question 'Are all teachers?' (1 Cor. 12:29) implies that not all are teachers. This is true in the home. Parents teach the children, not the other way around. Not every Christian is required to be a teacher of the Word. Only a small group must be 'able to teach' (1 Tim. 3:2, didaktikon, related to didaskō to teach), i.e. the bishop (=elder or pastor). It is therefore both lawful and wise that those admitted to this kind of education at church expense be approved ahead of time. Or if that is impractical, then at least, as Francis Pieper wrote: 'Therefore men must not be elected to the teaching office by lot or in any other haphazard way; only such may be chosen as possess the qualifications set down in 1 Tim. 3:1 ff; Titus 1:5–11, one of which is a special aptitude to teach [others].’⁸

6. Goal

The goal of special theological education is that those so instructed be ‘able to teach others also’. This is not, specifically, evangelism. Only by a very loose employment of language is it ‘discipling’. If one wishes to speak exactly, disciples are not made by theological education, though certainly it is not irrelevant. Disciples of Christ are His confessed followers—i.e. public Christians. Ordinarily they become so by public baptism. Of course, the ones who are instructed and who are obedient are better disciples than those who are uninstructed and disobedient. The preparation of these men is in order to teach all the believers: ‘able to teach others [other Christians] also’. There is a large body of Scripture information on the ministry of pastoral teaching. Let it await the proper locus in the doctrine of the church.

Every experienced preacher and teacher knows that there are several levels of theological teaching. The one appropriate for everyone at the same time is the sermon. Yet, as we should know, preaching good sermons takes extraordinary skill, especially when they must be delivered by the same minister one to three or four times a week to the same band of listeners, week after week, year in and year out.

The study of theology is therefore particularly important for ministers of the Word throughout their years of preaching and teaching. Since all believers are admonished by Scripture to deepen their understanding of divine things, the study of theology in a structured manner is appropriate for everyone. ‘In fact, though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need someone to teach you the elementary truths of God’s Word all over again. You need milk, not solid food! Anyone who lives on milk, being still an infant, is not acquainted with the teaching about righteousness. But solid food is for the mature, who by constant use have trained themselves to distinguish good from evil’ (Heb. 5:12–14 niv).

¹ J. Gresham Machen, Christianity and Liberalism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1923), p. 27.

² Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine vol. I (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 1.

³ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion 2 vols. (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962, 1971).

⁴ I explain further the relevance of all the Old Testament to Christology in my book The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1976, 1991), pp. 1–36. This book is now The Earthly Career of Jesus, the Christ (Fearn, Tain, Ross-shire, Scotland: Christian Focus Publ., 2002).

⁵ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics vol. i (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 43.

⁶ Alfred Plummer, The Pastoral Epistles. The Expositor’s Bible (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1908), p. 466.

⁷ ibid., p. 469.

⁸ Pieper, op. cit., p. 40.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

2

Preliminary to Talk about God

The most striking statement in the whole Bible may be the first one: ‘In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth’ (Gen. 1:1).

The Bible begins with talk about God. It also ends that way (Rev. 22:18–21).

There is no preliminary introduction to the leading person or ‘idea’. God is simply encountered at the start. It is assumed those who hear the Bible read for the first time already have the idea of a person called God in their world of thought. God’s name appears twenty-eight times in the first chapter—God did this or God said that—yet not a single sentence is devoted to identifying or defining Him. Nothing is said about where God came from or what He is like. Later in Scripture God is identified in contrast with other non-gods, which are regarded by mistaken people as real (Isa. 41:21–24; 44:6–17; 1 Cor. 8:4–6). There are a few very important statements about God’s being (e.g. ‘The Lord our God, the Lord is one’) and some formal statements about His character (e.g. ‘I the Lord ... am a jealous God’). The clear position of the authors of Scripture is that people come to the Bible already knowing God exists. The burden of Scripture is to tell of God’s dealings with mankind. In process, enough is disclosed about God and the world that it is quite correct to say Scripture tells us all we need to know about the One who is Creator, Savior and Lord and all we need to know of ourselves as well.

This spirit and outlook were shared by the Reformation Fathers who shaped the great creeds and confessions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Luther’s Small Catechism, for the instruction of the children of believing parents, for example, begins: ‘I believe that God has made me and all creatures.’¹ John Calvin, who after 400 years still informs most evangelical Protestant teachers, began the first (and archetypal) complete work of Protestant theology with the sentence: ‘Nearly all the wisdom we possess, that is to say, true and sound wisdom, consists of two parts: the knowledge of God and of ourselves.’²

Most informed students of the Bible are convinced that people do not need to be told that God exists. We already know too painfully well He does exist. The Christian mission is, in part, to address this painful awareness, to clear up the garbled understanding of God with correct information and to relieve the conscience of its weight of guilt, provided, of course, that the ‘good news’ is received into the heart. To bring people true awareness of the living God lays them in the dust of despair. Like the Israelites before God’s presence at Sinai (Exod. 19:16–20; Deut. 5:23–27; 18:16) and like that startled man in the Gospel (Luke 5:8), they are apt to cry: ‘Depart from me, for I am a sinful man’. Or like Isaiah, they may exclaim: ‘Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips’ (Isa. 6:5). According to the Apocalypse of John, everyone on earth—‘the kings of the earth and the great ones and the generals and the rich and the powerful, and everyone, slave and free’—finally shall be compelled to be present while God acts and to respond when He speaks. When that happens they will call to mountains and rocks, ‘Fall on us and hide us from the face of him who is seated on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb’ (Rev. 6:15, 16).

General Awareness of God

But let us press the point of awareness of God among all humanity much further. Basic to all the preaching and exhortation of Scripture is the assumption that all people everywhere already know something about God. They are not unaware of their dependence upon Him or their accountability to Him. The book of Jonah furnishes a striking example. The Hebrew prophet, after obstinate delays, did finally preach his divinely imparted message in the great, pagan city of Nineveh. He cried, ‘Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown’ (Jon. 3:4). Significantly, the narrative runs on: ‘So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast’ (Jon. 3:5 kjv). Jonah obviously delivered no preliminary lectures on monotheism or biblical theism. There was already sufficient awareness of the one God even in Nineveh to produce understanding of Jonah’s preachment.

When the word came to the king of Nineveh he joined in, announcing national repentance. ‘Let everyone turn from his evil way ... Who knows? God may turn and relent ... so that we may not perish?’ (Jon. 3:8–9). The pagan Ninevites evidently had a more exact understanding of divine truth as ground for evangelism than did the scripturally informed Jews of Jesus’ time. For the Lord said, ‘The men of Nineveh will rise up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold, something greater than Jonah is here’ (Luke 11:32).

This knowledge of God which sinful people have does not bring them pleasure and peace, for that knowledge is largely guilty knowledge. The prophets of Old Testament times relied on this guilty knowledge, even in heathen hearts, to rebuke their sins. Amos, for example, directed prophecies of judgment against five of the neighbour lands of Judah and Israel (Amos 1:1–2). God condemned Damascus for excessive violence in conduct of war (1:3), the Philistines of Gaza for unnecessary cruelty to a whole nation in time of war (1:6), Tyre for treaty-breaking (1:9), Edom for lack of fraternal feeling and murderous anger (1:11), Ammon for atrocities against the women of a conquered district (1:13), Moab for desecration of a neighbour people’s cemetery (2:1). This last, against Moab, is very instructive, for no familiar verse in the Bible says one must respect others’ graveyards. Yet people somehow know they should do so. Even though they may never have heard of God’s covenant name, Jehovah, these people had some moral standards which they knew God would enforce.

On the other hand, even without the special aid of supernatural revelation, this knowledge has benefited mankind. It has improved our morals and put some restraint on our sins. Almost all of the world’s best art has been Creator-directed. Families have been moved by this dim awareness to dignify and beautify their homes. Parents seek the training of their children and improvement of their lives.

The Bible very quickly moves on to show that the ‘creator of heaven and earth’ is not some obscure principle or power. He is a certain Being who tolerates no rivals. Though there are many claimants to deity, there is but one being in the category of God. In the first chapter of the Bible God is called Elohim (El-o-heem). This is joined in chapter 2, with Lord to form the name Lord God or YHWH Elohim. The pronunciation of those four letters, rendered ‘Lord’ in our Bibles, will be discussed later. Several other names and name-like terms appear farther along in the Bible. But they all belong to Him that is true, ‘The Lord our God, the Lord is one’ (Deut. 6:4). The possible reasons for this variety of names, their meanings and significance for the doctrine of God, will be considered shortly.

Necessity and Importance of Worship of God

A report of the earliest efforts of people to worship God is the immediate sequel of the narrative of creation and fall (Gen. 1–3). Such is the primary importance of the story of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:1–15). Its relevance to doctrine is immediately apparent. No discussion of God’s being, person or attributes precedes the story. Nor are there recorded instructions on time, manner and means of worship. The record simply states the first two men born into the fallen race were fully aware that God is and if God exists He may not be ignored, the way we have come to ignore so-called background music. If God the Creator exists (and we know He does) then man, the only visible rational creature on earth, must worship Him as also do the angels in heaven. The two sons of Eve knew this. We have no knowledge of how they came to have this information. Various explanations have been offered. But, know it they did. All generations of mankind since have known no less, however garbled and corrupted the knowledge may have become.

One God, Lost and Recovered

Though, as we have seen, the first generations of humanity worshipped God (Elohim), when the narrative of redemptive history moves on to the call of Abraham that event is interpreted as a recovery from paganism. There is a certain reverence for the superiority of the religion and morality of people of Abram’s origin over the Canaanites, among whom Abram and his descendants to the fourth generation dwelt for 215 years; they were nevertheless polytheists. Abram’s obedience therefore involved something like a ‘change of religion’. True, there were survivals of primitive monotheism (Melchizedek was priest of ‘God Most High’, Gen. 14) and Moses’ father-in-law seems to have worshipped Him, yet passages such as Joshua 24:2 and Rachel’s attachment to her father’s teraphim, or household gods (Gen. 31:25–35), shows that their Aramean ancestral tribe were corrupted in some degree at least by polytheism.

This is not the place to discuss rival views of the religion of the ancient Semites from whom Abram took his origin. Nor is it the place to discuss to what degree his faith in the Lord (YHWH), who revealed Himself at the oak of Moreh (Gen. 12:6, 7) and whom he worshipped at Bethel (Gen. 12:8), was mixed with the false notions of Ur and Haran from which he came. The title of a once widely used book, Hebrew Religion, Its Origin and Development (Oesterley and Robinson) aptly phrases the subject, which continues to attract the interest of biblical scholars and archaeologists.

The Abrahamic (Hebrew) people became worshippers of the Lord God alone. The perfection of that new faith and its development is an emphasis of the rest of the Bible. It is appropriate now to show what the Bible itself has to say as to some of the specific means employed in divine providence to bring that to pass. What specifically convinced Abram to follow ‘God Most High’ and what means was employed to perpetuate that faith among his posterity?

We do not know what external means the divine Spirit employed to convince Abram belatedly to follow the initial call (Gen. 12:1–4; Heb. 11:8). We do know how God strengthened his faith, as reported in Genesis 12–25 and as interpreted by the New Testament (Rom. 4; Heb. 11).

Miracles, Prophecy and Biblical Monotheism

Considering the utterly anti-supernatural spirit of the epoch in which we live one might wish to avoid the plain truth of the matter. Nevertheless, the biblical narrative from Genesis 12 to the end of Revelation employs what we call miracles and prophecy (in the sense of fulfilment of specific prediction) in showing how first the messengers of the Lord (Moses and the prophets) and then the people to whom they spoke came to be intellectually convinced of the Lord as the sole living and true God. Monotheism, as such, will be discussed later at greater length.

First we consider a striking exemplary case. In a time of national apostasy Elijah the Tishbite suddenly appeared before King Ahab announcing the beginning of a contest. It was to be between Jehovah (YHWH) and His prophet on the one hand and the fertility gods and goddesses of the Canaanite pantheon with their many so-called prophets on the other. The fascinating story composes 1 Kings, chapters 17 and 18.

The correct pronunciation of the covenant name of Israel’s God is not known. Modern scholars have proposed the vowels a and e to accompany the YHWH, hence Yah-weh. There is an older, more Arabic-like pronunciation of Hebrew (Sephardic) as well as the presently preferred Eastern European (Yiddish, Ashkenazic). The traditional ‘Jehovah’ has the merit of centuries of use in English translations. I am not consistent in use of either Jehovah or Yahweh; I prefer usually to translate the name as LORD (all capitals) as in kjv, asv, rsv and esv.

The significance of it is pointed out near the end of Elijah’s prayer and the people’s response: ‘Elijah the prophet came near and said, “O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, let it be known this day that you are God in Israel, and that I am your servant, and that I have done all these things at your word ... that this people may know that you, O Lord, are God’ (1 Kings 18:36, 37). Immediately the fire of God fell on the water-soaked sacrifice which Elijah had prepared and consumed it, together with the stones of the altar and the wood. Then, ‘when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces and said, “The Lord, he is God” [Jehovah is the Elohim]’ (1 Kings 18:39). This is not the only such contest reported in the Bible but it is certainly the most striking one. They are in the Scriptures to teach us. What do they teach? That God has demonstrated Himself to be true by the mighty acts of power which are performed at His messengers’ word. In each case the messengers of God were authenticated by the same great acts of God’s power. Other such incidents involving the prophets of ancient Israel are reported at 1 Kings 22 and notably at Jeremiah 28 (see also Ps. 106, esp. v. 12).

The contest of Elijah with the prophets of Baal has been mentioned first because it is such an outstanding example of the biblical method of demonstrating that the God of the Bible alone is God. God's action in omnipotence and omniscience (miracles and prophecy) are united in a remarkable way in Scripture.

It may come as a surprise to see just how thoroughly woven into the faith of ancient believers the use of prophecy and miracle really was. Let us look further in the Old Testament. Herein the Bible itself is telling why it must be believed. It addresses us with kinds of evidence all human beings must believe in if they are to be saved, the kind which will surely convince everyone at the end of life and at the judgment. These statements of evidence lying in the midst of narrative constitute the ancient 'apologetics' of the Bible, itself.

There is first the faith of the patriarchs. Abraham was told his wife would have a son through whom God's many promises to the family (Gen. 12:1–3; 15:14–16) would be fulfilled. When faith was weak (Gen. 18:10–12), Sarah being ninety years of age and Abraham one hundred, God promised them a son within the following year (Gen. 18:11–14). Within the year a son was born to them (Gen. 21:1, 2). Sarah had laughed in her doubt (Gen. 18:12) and, as if to rebuke her, Abraham named the child 'Laughter', for such is the meaning of the name, Isaac. Similar experiences were granted to Isaac, Jacob and especially to Joseph, as the stories of these men in the last half of Genesis report.

One may think of Moses as a veritable giant of faith and so he became, but he was not always so. When God first found him he was weak-kneed and vacillating (Exod. 3:11; 4:1, 10). The method of prophecy and miracle convinced him as it did others who heard of it. At the time of the 'burning bush' God told Moses his brother Aaron, then in Egypt far away, would meet him in the wilderness (Exod. 4:14, 27, 28); God said, 'this shall be the sign for you, that I have sent you: when you have brought the people out of Egypt, you shall serve [worship] God on this mountain' (Ex. 3:12). Both the prophecies were quickly fulfilled in detail (Exod. 19:1–25). These experiences were important parts of the enactment of the Mosaic covenant at Sinai, which in turn is the main part of the Pentateuch, the foundation of all biblical religion and written revelation.³

In one sense the ten plagues of Egypt and the remarkable dividing of the waters of the Red Sea were marvels of God's power. They were also each a marvel of divine omniscience—in each case a prediction fulfilled—of water turned to blood, lice, darkness, death of the first-born, etc. Each was fulfilled on schedule as announced by God's messengers, Moses and Aaron. Both the messengers and the God they claimed to represent were thus certified as genuine. This was 'apologetics' indeed! When this marvelous series of divine manifestations was over, climaxed by the Israelites' crossing of the Red Sea between walls of water, the drowning of the pursuing Egyptian army and its Pharaoh, just as Moses had predicted, there was not an Israelite who did not know in his heart that the Lord is God and Moses his servant: 'Israel saw the great power that the Lord used against the Egyptians, so the people feared [worshipped] the Lord, and they believed in the Lord and in his servant Moses' (Exod. 14:31).

Forty years later, with the migrating nation poised for the attack on Canaan, Moses was about to die. The new civil and military leader, Joshua, had already been selected. But there was no one yet to take Moses' place as God's messenger. At this juncture the aged lawgiver proclaimed the office of prophet, with a succession of men to fill it (Deut. 18:9–18). The several qualifications of the prophet need not concern us here, with one exception. There was a possibility of impostors. One of the means by which the impostor might be infallibly detected was his inability to predict the near future (Deut. 18:21, 22). These were not to be long-range prophecies of the remote future but short-range predictions that could be observed and tested by the people of the prophet's own time.

A prophet had to be an Israelite 'from among their brothers' (Deut. 18:15, 18); he spoke only in the name of Jehovah—'in my name' (Deut. 18:20); he must be able to predict near future events (Deut. 18:21, 22). Further he might be asked to perform a miracle (Deut. 13:1 ff.). But even if he met all these requirements the supposed prophet had to honour the one Lord God of Israel and his message had to be conformable to previously authenticated revelation from God, specifically the Mosaic covenant-law (Deut. 13:1–18). The utter seriousness of the matter is demonstrated by the extreme measures employed to enforce the rule. Deuteronomy 13 explains why later Elijah forthrightly demanded extermination of 500 prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18:40).

The last great prophet, the consummation of the line of the prophets, was our Lord Himself. There were others in the apostolic age who spoke by special divine revelation, but all these spoke by His authority and were but channels of His revelation. When Jesus came, He too was certified as a true messenger of God in the same way. The Jews asked for a sign of His authority, and He predicted His resurrection (Matt. 12:38–40; John 2:13–22). When John the Baptist wanted a sign that the Messiah stood before him, God let him know ahead of time that in some visible manner he would see the Spirit of God descending on the Messiah (John 1:33). When at Jesus' baptism John saw exactly that, fulfilled prophecy had again given its seal of certainty (John 1:29–32). When later, John the Baptist, from his cell in jail, asked for further assurance, Jesus only alluded to His fulfilment of ancient prophecies (Matt. 11:2–6; cf. Isa. 29:18; 35:5, 6; 61:1).

The most extensive evidential use of fulfilled prophecy in the Bible itself is in the portion of Isaiah which begins with chapter 40 and leads up to the marvelous prediction of our Lord's career in chapter 53. In this section the Lord God Himself is represented in contest with the impotent gods of paganism for human minds. The theme running through the passage, in part, is that the Lord alone is God for He alone can act. Among His mightiest acts is true prediction of the future. The entire section should be read at this point, but let us extract a few verses.

Set forth your case, says the Lord; bring your proofs, says the King of Jacob.

Let them bring them, and tell us what is to happen. Tell us the former things, what they are, that we may consider them, that we may know their outcome or declare to us the things to come.

'Tell us what is to come hereafter, that we may know that you are gods; do good, or do harm, that we may be dismayed and terrified. [At least do something.] Behold, you are nothing and your work is less than nothing; an abomination is he who chooses you' (Isa. 41:21–24).

In this manner God demonstrates His magnificent solitary grandeur, showing that He alone is God—for He alone can either reconstruct the unknown or forgotten past, or predict the unknown future. In the same tenor, but even more emphatically, the Lord later says: 'I am God, and there is no other; I am

God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things not yet done' (Isa. 46:9, 10).

Thus we have seen that from the very earliest times in the history of biblical revelation and redemption the fulfillment of prophecy has been a strong proof of the validity of God's own claims and the claims of His messengers. We have observed this in the assurance of the pre-Mosaic patriarchs, in the accreditation of Moses to the Israelites, in the support of the faith given to the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus, and from thence onward to New Testament times. The Messiah Himself and God His Father have placed their confidence in this mode of apologetical proof.

Validity of Apologetical Use of Fulfilled Prophecy

Fulfilled prophecy, however, is only part of the base of biblical evidences. In fact, standing alone it would prove nothing except that some people in the history of the world have had a strange, inexplicable knowledge of the future. It is the connection of this supernatural power with the miracles of Scripture (i.e. those reported and authorized therein), the relation of both miracles and prophecy with the Jewish people and the claims of their prophets, apostles and Messiah, that makes the case for Christianity an infallible one.

Even so it must be remembered that even though God has declared the case a certain one, it is possible for us to deny it (Isa. 53:1–3; cf. John 12:37–41; Acts 3:1–4, 22, especially 4:13–18; Acts 17:30–32). The gospel will always remain foolishness to the minds of sinful people until the Holy Spirit enlightens them (1 Cor. 1:18; 2:14). The important thing for us to see in this connection is that if people fail at this point, the root of the failure is not in their mental faculties but in their spiritual ones: that their rejection is not based on intellectual obstacles but on moral ones. Their active resistance and arguments prove that they are vital and active mentally, but as to spiritual things are 'dead in ... trespasses and sins' (Eph. 2:1–3; cf. 1 Cor. 2:14).

Sometimes people simply reject fulfillment of prophecy as impossible and, without bringing the 'case to court', refuse to examine the evidence. When the evidence is thrust upon them, various expedients are devised. In the case of people who endorse outright materialism or atheism, we must seek to convince them of the existence of a personal, transcendent creator-God. Until this is done, they will not even consider the evidence. Yet it must be admitted that the only conclusive proof of the existence of the Christian God lies in the miraculous deeds by which He has borne witness to Himself. The nature of the situation requires supernatural acts as proof. This, to use a technical phrase, is to say the rational arguments of natural theology are useful in that they may remove philosophical objections to the true Christian evidences. Fortunately, most people will at least consider the evidence. The average citizen, however this-worldly his interests, does not find it difficult to accept the possibility of the supernatural.

The common device for voiding the evidential value of biblical prophecies appears to have been invented in the third Christian century by a pagan philosopher named Porphyry (ad 233–304). This man was the most noted disciple of Plotinus, the father of the movement known as Neoplatonism, a system of thought which taught that the universe emanates out of God and that salvation is achieved by ascetic practices. St Augustine reports that Porphyry was brought up a Christian and after becoming apostate wrote against Christianity from a spirit of revenge. A very clever writer, Porphyry saw that if he could convince others that the predictions of the Old Testament, especially the detailed ones of the book of Daniel, were written after the events they predict had transpired, then he would have destroyed one of the main supports for their faith in the inspiration of Scripture and in Christianity. Little has been added to Porphyry's arguments (as far as they are known), though his method has become exceedingly popular among liberal higher critics.

Essential Features of Predictive Prophecy

It must be recognized that prophecies of the sort under consideration will have some distinctive characteristics. They will not be mere sage remarks, or scientific prediction based on laws of nature. Neither will they reflect a humanly controlled situation wherein the prophet or his supporters fulfill the prophecy. They must be predictions of the future such as only God could know and bring to pass.

Another necessary feature is a degree of obscurity in many of the predictions. At first thought this might seem seriously to weaken the evidential value. Actually, it is the basis of its strength. The prophecy ordinarily will have a true but obscure reference to future events. Let us pursue this thought.

Jesus' predictions of His resurrection will serve as typical examples. In His prophecy of Matthew 12:40 He did not clearly say He would die, that His body would be buried, and that three days later His body would be resurrected, leaving a tomb empty. Rather He made an enigmatical reference to Jonah's experience in the 'great fish' and indicated that He would have a similar experience in the 'heart of the earth', i.e. underground. When He predicted the resurrection in connection with His cleansing of the temple (John 2:18, 19), He said, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up.' Actually, except for Jesus Himself, no one on earth really understood those predictions until after the resurrection and then only with considerable reflection (John 2:20, 21). When prophecy had become history, with reflection, it was then seen that our Lord was speaking of the resurrection, and that unmistakably (John 2:22). If this obscurity were not initially present, prophecy might actually produce either its non-fulfillment through the efforts of those who might wish to oppose it, or its evidential value might be destroyed by the bungling efforts of other too-helpful friends who would try to bring it to pass.

Thus, far from being a flaw in the evidence, this feature is one of the strengths of the evidence of fulfilled prophecy. It is like a case presented either by the prosecution or the defence in court when a true verdict is issued at the time of decision. As the case is being assembled, the pieces may seem difficult, disconnected and obscure. But once the truth is known, all fit a pattern. It is also like a disassembled jigsaw puzzle, which seems only dimly connected with a picture when lying in its box but assumes an unmistakable picture pattern when once it is assembled. The full design cannot be known till the pieces are put together. So the full design of prophecy, dimly seen at first, becomes clear with fulfillment.

The doctrine that God alone is God is nowhere spelled out more faithfully than by Paul in an exceedingly helpful passage. Let us lay some background. The common knowledge that God the mighty Maker does exist was important to the Greeks. This truth, however, had been perverted. The public religion of Greece was a gross, expensive, corrupting worship of many gods. At Corinth there was particularly offensive development of this feature of Greek culture. Idol worship got mixed up with the marketing of meat (the flesh of animals). It was hard even to buy a piece of fresh meat in the ‘shambles’ (butcher shop, 1 Cor. 10:25) that had not been previously offered to an idol. What should a Christian do? The believers there wanted to know. So Paul wrote, ‘Therefore, as to the eating of food offered to idols, we know that “an idol has no real existence,” and that “there is no God but one”. For although there be so-called gods in heaven or on earth—as indeed there are many “gods” and many “lords”—yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist’ (1 Cor. 8:4–6). In view of the nonentity of gods other than the true God, Paul went on to say, the flesh of animals offered to an idol by someone else had not been harmfully affected. So the flesh could be bought in the market and eaten in all good conscience by a Christian. Idol-gods are nonentities. They cannot therefore do anything at all. The only God who acts is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the following chapters our attention will be directed first to the vocabulary by which scholars discuss the subject of God and later to the names by which we may address or refer scripturally to the true and living God.

¹ Dr Martin Luther, Small Catechism (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., ed. of 1943), p. 9.

² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 vols., (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960, I, 1.1.), p. 35.

³ The covenant of the Law was miraculously confirmed at Sinai (=Horeb). The Old Testament historical books trace Israel’s obedience and disobedience to the Law of the Pentateuch; the poetical books celebrate the Law; while the prophetic books report the prophets’ efforts to rebuke disobedience of the Law and to encourage obedience to it. Jesus came to fulfil the law and to announce its successor covenant—which we have in the New Testament.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (12). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

3

Special Terms of Talk about God

Through all the chapters of this book the discussion will necessarily employ a minimum of somewhat special vocabulary. Most of these terms and the ideas which they designate have been in use for centuries. If the reader already lives in a world of discourse where one is at home with theological vocabulary, fine. Unhappily, public education, now fully secularized, by simple omission of our religious culture, has about eliminated even simple theological vocabulary from discourse.

The godly wisdom of the Reformers of the sixteenth century rejected most of the ultra-refined vocabulary of late medieval scholastic philosophers and theologians. These denizens of the university faculties gave formal endorsement of the doctrine of grace, that is salvation from start to finish as a free gift. Most of them claimed to follow this doctrine as found in Augustine’s expositions of Paul’s Epistles and in his anti-Pelagian writings. Yet, following persistent streaks of legalism (salvation by keeping rules), moralism (salvation by being good), sacerdotalism (salvation mediated through sacred ceremonies) and accumulation of merit—all with some rootage in certain church Fathers—they mixed grace with human merit as necessary for salvation. These same philosopher-theologians created an ever-growing, never conclusive body of controversial theology—distinction after distinction, refinement after refinement—that continued up to Reformation times. In the vocabulary of this scholastic theology—petrified and perpetuated in canons of councils and decrees of popes—there are said to be innumerable kinds of faith and grace, justification and sanctification, for example. Sadly, in each distinction there was (and still is in Rome's theology) some affirmation that grace saves by enabling the Christian to accumulate merit for salvation.

The first line of Reformers—notably Luther, Melanchthon and Calvin—rejected the scholastic project of relating theology to any theory of the nature of substance (metaphysics), of epistemology (how knowledge is gained) or the status of universals, whether realism or nominalism, and the like.

The leading reformers were schooled in the learning of the day, hence well acquainted with late scholasticism, which in turn had as subject matter the philosophy-science of antiquity. They did not, however, interpret Scripture or teach theology as partisans in philosophical debate. Where some of the rich vocabulary of that learning was helpful, they used it, but only sparingly, taking care to explain. They addressed the multitudes of their time, not the university professors. Leaders of the Reformation wished to win the church people as well as the pastors and did so in plain language. Paul Althaus remarks: 'Luther recognizes the inner relationship and even identity of religious intellectualism and moralism. He shows that both are in opposition to the cross.'¹

Melanchthon, author of the first Protestant manual of evangelical theology (1521), in the dedication of his book wrote:

Rightly oriented teachers are needed, therefore, to clarify and preserve the proper meaning of the words of the prophets [O.T.] and apostles [N.T.]. And such true teachers do not invent new or peculiar doctrines about God; instead, they stay close to the unadulterated [einigen] meaning, which God himself revealed through the words which are found in the writings of the prophets and apostles and in the creeds.²

The creeds to which Melanchthon refers, contrary to what some unfriendly critics say, use technical terms sparingly and then only to make matters clear rather than obscure.

Calvin, in the Prefatory Address of the Institutes, addressed King Francis I of France, saying:

I undertook this labor especially for our French countrymen, very many of whom I knew to be hungering and thirsting for Christ.... The book [the Institutes] itself witnesses that this was my intention, adapted as it is to simple and, you may say, elementary form of teaching.³

The period of Protestant scholasticism (mainly seventeenth century) reverted somewhat to over-refinement, but since that time evangelical theologians have intended to produce a more chaste and limited special vocabulary of their specialty. As new or renewed controversies, errors and heresies have arisen, a few new terms of necessity have been borrowed or coined, and some ancient vocabulary has re-entered our discourse. Further, since philosophers also think and speak about God and some who write theology, if not philosophers, are acquainted with philosophy, some of the language of modern philosophy has been found useful.

The Bible itself furnishes most of the terms of theology and usually in such context as to be understood upon close attention. Some other terms have entered the discourse from writers critical of historic, orthodox understanding of the language of Scripture, the creeds and evangelical theology. We need to know these terms and the ideas behind them to relate our interpretation and proclamation to them.

At the end of this chapter, I propose some of the most important questions about God and His ways and hope to lead the reader into preliminary decisions about how those questions ought to be answered.

We shall discuss, firstly, the several uses of the word theology and modifications thereof. The most influential modern philosopher, Emmanuel Kant (1724–1804), made memorable and important a distinction between the world of phenomena and the world of noumena. This kind of distinction is at least as old as Aristotle (384–322 bc). Whether they know it or not, this distinction affects the manner in which people today, learned or not, understand all discussion of ultimate matters. Theology makes ultimate concerns, as Paul Tillich has taught us to say, its stock-in-trade. More recently, a distinction between propositional and existential truth has become so prevalent that one must decide early as to how to receive biblical statements about God. A very influential modern writer has introduced certain ideas about ultimate concerns, essence, being, being in itself that must be heeded if one is to read about the doctrine of God in anything other than purely Bible language. Notice must also be taken of the special use which theology makes of the words apology and apologetics. Then some more ancient questions must be raised—the relation of faith and reason, the meaning of knowledge when we say we have knowledge of God, and, finally, the meaning and relation of anthropomorphism to proper interpretation of the Bible.

Theology

This word (Greek, theos, God, plus logos, science of a thing) and its modification, theological, is used in at least four distinct, somewhat technical, senses.

(1) The broadest signifies all techniques, training and information related to the Christian religion. Thus, we refer to a theological seminary, meaning a school that teaches a very broad scope of studies related to training for the Christian ministry. Sometimes divinity is employed as an approximate stand-in for this sense of the word theology. In former times, divinity was often employed rather than theology. It is in this sense John, author of the last book of the Bible, was called John the Divine, i.e. the theologian. This archaic use is perpetuated familiarly in Bachelor (or Master) of Divinity, the commonest theological seminary degrees.

(2) Theology is also a name for one of the four comprehensive areas within the theological seminary curriculum—biblical, historical, practical and theological. Here the word theology means the doctrines of Christianity—how they are formulated, their history in the church, their defence and organization.

(3) Still more narrowly, only the formulation and explanation of these doctrines is theology, that is, systematic theology. A single topic of doctrine is called a locus (plural loci). When arrangement of the topics is guided by the creed of a church, each creedal article is a dogma, hence a treatment of all the articles is dogmatics. Sometimes arrangement and treatment in creedal order is called symbolics, from ‘symbol’, an old word for a creed.

(4) Still more narrowly, a single topic of doctrine, the doctrine of God, His person, nature, attributes and works, is theology proper. Other doctrines (or loci) are mankind, sin, Christ, the church, last things and so on. This book falls particularly in the category of number three, the doctrines of Christianity, and the doctrine (locus) in particular now under consideration is God, that is, theology proper, the narrowest meaning of ‘theology’. Study of the development of Christian doctrines through the Christian centuries is called historical theology.

Biblical Theology

Biblical theology is an expression whose meaning is determined by the context in which it is used. Most generally, (a) In a non-technical sense, it simply means teachings derived from the Bible. (b) In a more special sense biblical theology is a discipline, or approach to discovering the message of the Bible. In controversies about doctrine, biblical theology is sometimes exalted in contrast with ‘proof-texting’, church dogmas and merely traditional interpretations of the Bible, as opposed to judging dogmas and opinions by careful interpretation of Scripture in context. (c) As a method of study, biblical theology ‘seeks to discover what the Biblical writers, under divine guidance, believed, described and taught in the context of their own times’.⁴ All this is for the good of sound theological expression. However, biblical theology (like Christian education and ‘biblical counselling’) is also the name of a recent movement with specific agenda. It produced several scholarly journals and a large literature and, though now diminished, has not fully run its course.⁵ As a method it has been productive of great gains in modifying some merely inherited views of God and His ways with the world and mankind. As a movement largely in the hands of less than thoroughly faithful exponents of evangelical theology, it has drawn its world-view from worldly, elite academic cultures and plagued sound theological enterprise with unrelenting attack to the present moment.⁶

Phenomena and Noumena

We meet the former, plural of phenomenon, in science classes, though not ‘noumena’. These two terms draw distinction between the world where persons, things and events are observed by the five senses and the world of the supposedly real lying behind them. Idealistic philosophy—Christian and otherwise—affirms that whatever factuality or reality there is in the sensible, the basis of the sensible is not sensible. It is the invisible, intangible, inaudible, ineffable. There is an element of biblical truth in this. Paul expressed it succinctly: ‘we look not to the things that are seen [sensed] but to the things that are unseen. For the things that are seen are transient, but the things that are unseen are eternal’ (2 Cor. 4:18).

Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) and his disciples wish to convince us that nothing of the unseen world of the noumenal, the unseen world of the truly real, can be known certainly by human beings. All we know are phenomena. Yet the Scripture quoted above does not say that. The difficulty of sensing the unseen is there quite clearly conveyed. Nothing elsewhere in the Bible tells us that the invisible God is not conveying—however dimly—certainties about unseen, eternal things (life, God, spirit, heaven, hell, angels) through the messages of prophets and their enscriptured words. Nor are the mighty works of God such as creation, miracles, preservation of the universe and the like, impossible for God to tell us about. He has, indeed, told us about them in the Bible and in many ways they speak for themselves (Ps. 19; Rom. 1). The Son of God, who was and is God and was eternally with God, became flesh so that people beheld God's glory in Him. Certain witnesses of His life and career wrote down what they saw and heard and we can read it (John 1:1, 14, 15).

Kant was responding to the empirical philosophy of John Locke (1602–1704), Bishop George Berkeley (1685–1753) and its consummate expression in David Hume (1711–1776). The agnosticism of some of these philosophers comes up later for attention in a later chapter.

The Special Vocabulary of Neo-orthodoxy

Certain words and expressions are peculiar to a group of thinkers who have come to be called 'neo-orthodox'. The early advocates most influential in North America were Emil Brunner, Paul Tillich and Karl Barth. All three wrote in German but their writings were rather quickly translated into English and avidly read in liberal circles first, and later in all religious circles, Protestant, Orthodox and Catholic. Among these philosopher-theologians, a proposition is a statement of fact; a proposition employs language to pass on a datum of truth. Relying heavily (though not entirely) on the distinction between phenomena and noumena and the epistemology of empiricism it is held that all eternal, divine facts lie in the world of the eschatological. By this is meant supernatural (emphasis on super), though the word 'supernatural' is not often employed. The eschatological cannot enter the space-time world (Kant's Phenomena) without destroying itself, they say. Nevertheless, it can be known in the event or Krisis (=crisis) of personal encounter between God and men. These are always I-thou encounters (also called confrontations), never I-He. That is to say, the experiences are true confrontations with the person, God, not discourses about God by a third party, say an angel or a prophet. Though the encounters may be reported, there is no propositional content, there are no data to report about the eschatological. So the Bible may not be read to collect data about God. Let us pursue this matter briefly.

Emil Brunner wrote with disciplined brevity and readable clarity. Hence I cite his view of truth and the vocabulary of his theology of truth. He stated his developed views in a book translated into English as Reason and Revelation.⁷ Shortly afterward, he summarized that book in the first chapter of the first volume of his Dogmatics. I cite the chapter. Biblical revelation—truth about God—cannot be expressed as an abstract idea. Even in the revelations witnessed to by (and in) the Bible God is both concealed and disclosed. Truth about God is always personal, experienced as an encounter. The abstract concepts in traditional theology—with an infallible Bible for Protestants and an infallible pope for Roman Catholics—are equally reliant on Greek ideas imposed by the framers of the early creeds. After asserting at length the Bible itself contains no revelation, only several sorts of witness to revelation(s) about primal history, The incarnation is a major example, apostolic and prophetic experiences are other such events. Dr Brunner summarizes:

[R]evelation is certainly not a 'Something', a 'thing'; but a process, an event which happens to us and in us. Neither the prophetic word of the Old Testament, nor Jesus Christ, nor the witness of the Apostles, nor of the preachers of the Church who proclaim

Him, 'is' the revelation; the reality of the revelation culminates in the 'subject' who receives it... If there is no faith, then the revelation has not been consummated: it has not actually happened ... but is only at the first stage. All objective forms of revelation need the 'subject' in whom they become revelation. The Bible itself calls this inward process [not the matter made a matter of record] 'revelation'.⁸

What Brunner denominates 'revelation', the Bible really calls enlightenment or illumination and theology 'the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit'. All italicized words in the above quotation are my emphasis as characteristic ideas and terms of neo-orthodoxy which have passed into almost all recent theological discourse. Barth used most of them, though he likes the word Krisis (= crisis) for the event of 'revelation'.

Every Bible reader knows that there are indeed reports of personal meetings with God in the Bible. But contrary to the above notions, while the element of the unreportable and incommunicable is often present (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1–3; Acts 7; Rev. 1–22; and especially 2 Cor. 12:1–4 are examples), the people who had these experiences frequently report words heard and sights seen. These words and sights (visions) are not presented as a meeting of God 'in Himself' or of 'reality in itself' (der Ding am sich of Kant) or of the eternal heavenly world, but they are represented as valid, true (though partial) insights. They pass on to us, through the Bible, true knowledge of eternal things. Where some of the experience is incommunicable, the Scripture author plainly says so (see 2 Cor. 12:1–4 asv, nasb, rsv). The later Bible authors plainly obtained their basic knowledge of divine things from the earlier writers of Scripture and sometimes plainly say so. Some of their knowledge obtained by reading Scripture already in existence was measurable—or quantifiable, as the current idiom has it—information. Daniel, for example, knew what the length of the servitude of the Jews to the king of Babylon was to be by reading the prophetic writings of Jeremiah (Dan. 9:2; cf. Jer. 29:10; 2 Chr. 36:20–23; Ezra 1:1, 2).

Even the neo-orthodox theologians, whose ideas we have just reported, like to use the Bible to support their teachings. Some even try to discover their teachings in the Bible. Therefore, despite their special views, they seem often to use the Bible the same way the rest of us do.

Another group of terms, often quite helpful in stripping down a problem to its true dimensions, derives from the writings of the late Paul Tillich, a philosopher-theologian, though hardly a biblical one. His definition of religion and the religious as a matter of ultimate concern is perceptive and once a Christian thinker gets a hold on the term he will almost inevitably begin to use it. Tillich's ideas about God and revelation, that God is being in itself, and of being as essentially unknowable are variant names for another variety of Krisis theology (another name for neo-orthodoxy) and of Kantian philosophy just stated above. We shall have opportunity to meet Tillich's philosophy of religion later.

Apologetics

Apologetics designates a certain area of study associated with systematic theology. Specifically, apologetics is the division of theology that rationally answers attacks upon Christianity. In doing so, it seeks to establish the truth of the Christian faith by various forensic methods and evidences. There is some intramural debate among apologists as to the usefulness of evidences and arguments. Not all scholars will agree on a definition, but it is important to know that when the word ‘apologetic’ or ‘apologetics’ appears in theological writing it designates positive, aggressive action. Apologetics seeks to meet the enemy and to defeat him at his point of attack. This is apology in the original sense, not an admission of fault with a request for pardon as now, in common speech. The Greek word is translated ‘an answer’ (Gr. apologian) at 1 Peter 3:15 niv.

In a broad sense ‘apologetics’ is sometimes (confusingly) applied to all the philosophical extensions of theology (philosophy of religion, or philosophy of Christianity): also to the study of evidences of Christianity and the way Christian truth may relate to Christian culture.

Special Questions in Talk about God

(1) Faith and Reason

These are terms we shall meet, sometimes in association. Are they friends or enemies? Fortunately, these words should mean about the same in religious discussion as in any other. They are often introduced as if they were incompatible. It is commonly supposed that faith represents one way of knowing God and reason another. In such a case, the former is biblical and Christian while the latter is Greek and pagan. But this is to have a defective understanding both of reason and faith. Actually, in biblical thought, each has to do with response to knowledge, whether imparted by divine revelation or otherwise. Some authors have even juxtaposed reason and revelation as competitors, as if the former were allied with false religion and the latter with true biblical religion. Again, faulty understanding of biblical ways of looking at things is the root of difficulty. In Scripture, faith is not the source of our knowledge of things of God or of anything else. ‘Natural light’ (see below) and divine revelation are the sources. Reason (rational faculties, processes, categories, terms) furnishes the organization of those truths too. Nothing else can associate the revealed data (God is all-powerful and is all-knowing, are examples) and the experimental facts reported (Christ arose) into knowing relation. Therefore, faith and reason are twins, not enemies. Of course, if one does not use faith in response to God’s Word, then our reason will oppose both God and His Word. That, however, is non-faith and reason falsely employed. True faith and sound reason are still steadfast friends. The Bible does not even hint that one must be unreasonable in order to believe God’s Word.

This matter requires some enlargement. Systematic theology is a scientific enterprise. The Bible presents truths in the form of facts and ideas, but it does not follow any historical system of logic. Although there is progress in divine revelation there is also unity of truth; it is a system of truth even though a growing system of which the several parts are always organically connected. Those who know the Bible and believe it to be true will inevitably seek to bring these truths into systematic logical relation with one another. This is both necessary and feasible, for truth is in harmony with itself. Again, to cite Robert Yarbrough:

While contrasts and tensions exist within the biblical corpus due to the local and temporal soil from which its components first sprang, a solidarity underlies them. This solidarity is grounded in the oneness of God’s identity and redemptive plan. It is also rooted in humankind’s sinful solidarity in the wake of Adam’s fall. Scripture’s undeniable diversity, commonly overplayed in current critical discussion, complements rather than obliterates its profound unity. Scripture is its own best interpreter, and uncertainties raised by one portion are often legitimately settled by appeal to another.⁹

The theologians' task is therefore, 'to think God's thoughts after him under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to assimilate comprehensively the truth revealed in the word of God and to reproduce it logically in systematic form'. Speculative reason is not a source or norm of theological truth. Rather the rational faculties of the theologian function to unite 'particular ideas and facts contained in the Word of God' and to organize them into a coherent system of truth. Reason should not be committed to function independent of faith. In theology faith corresponds with the revealed knowledge of God and serves as a necessary instrument for appropriating divine truth. To summarize: faith appropriates revealed truth, reason organizes and systematizes it.¹⁰

(2) Can Mere Men Truly Know God?

The knowledge of God is another idea that needs explanation before extended study of God's being, attributes, works and relations. If by knowledge of God one means exact information about measurable data relating to the wholly spiritual being of eternal, infinite God, no one can possess it. Yet we observe, upon reflection, that in a measure the same is true of one's knowledge of all persons. I scarcely know my own wife or my children in this way. Our bodies, our voices, our tastes vary from day to day and they change permanently with age. Yet we know the persons we meet. We have acquaintance with the ones we 'know' intimately. It is instructive to observe that the first reported act of sexual intercourse in Scripture—about as intimate a form of acquaintance between persons as it is humanly possible—is reported as a knowing: 'And Adam knew Eve his wife, and she conceived, and bare Cain' (Gen 4:1 kjv). Of course we never tangibly encounter God's being any more than we touch one another's being, but we can have acquaintance with them as they manifest themselves.

The division of philosophy known as epistemology would like to claim jurisdiction over the subject of knowing other persons. In real life, however, we yield neither to philosophy nor science. If life is to go on we must assume that on the level of our present earthly existence the way most things appear to be has essential correspondence to the way they really are. Neither science nor philosophy interferes with the kind of knowing involved in a lover's kiss. Science might propose some ingenious contraption to gauge temperature of skin surfaces, others to measure fluctuation in heartbeat, blood pressure, and skin surface pressure; but all to no avail if the goal is to know what a lover's kiss really is. This is known only by lovers who kiss—and they (one must acknowledge) only experientially. They throw themselves into the action heartily and learn what they need to know. They may have had wise guidance beforehand and (we hope) carry that successfully into the embrace, but they will not have any help from the science and philosophy professors. (My students in college courses in philosophy of religion always listened raptly to this illustrative example.)

(3) How Do We Learn about God?

The answer is, by 'natural light' and by revelation. I put one of the terms in quotation marks because almost no one uses it any longer. Recent writers like to refer to the knowledge of God gained through the things which He has made—particularly the material creation and the nature of humanity—as general revelation. This sort of information used to be called 'natural light' and sometimes 'the light of reason'. The latter is a good descriptive term since our rational powers, reflecting upon experiential information, are a way of gaining this knowledge of God. Revelation, in this older manner of speaking, refers to the act of God in making Himself known in some supernatural way. In recent times, however—and the result is partial confusion—both methods have been called revelation. The former, as we have observed, then is called general revelation and the latter special revelation. We must of course come to terms with the newer way of speaking. There is less confusion in the older works wherein revelation was usually reserved for what people know of God by His gracious supernatural acts of self-disclosure, and another designation was used for what people know apart from God's special gracious supernatural acts. In a later chapter we discuss the several ways by which God has made Himself known to us.

Anthropomorphism

This word, from Gr. anthrōpos, mankind, a man, and morphē, a form, means literally, man-form-ism and signifies the representation of God in speech, or writing in the form of a human being. Under this general heading three different, but related, features of human efforts to represent deity may be distinguished: (1) When God's activity is expressed in the form of analogy with human activity this might properly be called an-thro-po-poi-ē-sis (man-action). 'All the ways of a man are pure in his own eyes, but the Lord weighs the spirit' (Prov. 16:2) is an example. God's act of distinguishing good and evil in human beings is said to be weighing, as in a pharmacist's scale. (2) When the impassible God, whose Spirit cannot be disturbed by anything, responds to events in a manner comparable to human passion and He is said to be glad, sad, angry, etc., the figure of speech is properly called an-thro-po-path-ism (man-passion). 'And the Lord was sorry that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him to his heart' (Gen. 6:6) is a clear example. (3) When God is represented as having bodily parts like ours—eyes, ears, nostrils, arms, hands—the literary device is called an-thro-po-morph-ism. So in the broad sense anthropomorphism includes anthropopoiesis and anthropopathism as well as anthropomorphism proper.

'Anthropomorphism' has been used to designate a proper, biblical representation of God and also a wholly improper, even corrupt, manner of representing deity. So some further distinctions must carefully be made.

The Proper Employment of Anthropomorphism

There have been (and no doubt are) philosophers and theologians who deny it, but most have agreed that all formulated knowledge about God is analogical. This is to say that when one makes a declarative statement about God's person, essence or nature—such as 'you hate all evildoers' (Ps. 5:5) or 'The Lord is compassionate and merciful' (Jas. 5:11)—these statements are meaningful only because we know something of what hate and mercy are in ourselves and other people. Even when speaking of hate and mercy in other people or in hearing about them, one automatically imputes to the other person, in some degree or another, what we know to be hate and mercy in ourselves. This is to say that all knowledge, thoughts, emotions and character of other persons are analogical. There is no possibility of direct sensation of personality in others. I, for example, hear my secretary laugh, but I have no direct sensation of her joy. Yet, I know how I feel when I want to laugh joyfully and assume analogically that the same sort of thing produces her laughter. It must be acknowledged, however, that analogically perceived knowledge is not perfect. It may, for example, be distorted by distorted self-knowledge. The Psalmists frequently prayed for clearer vision of the self (e.g. Ps. 19:12, 'Who can discern his errors? Declare me innocent from hidden faults'). We all make serious mistakes in judging the motives (character, person, self-hood) which produce what other people do and say. We even misjudge our own motives sometimes. So the existentialist theologians (especially Paul Tillich) are not entirely wrong in their ideas regarding revelation about God; they only carry too far what the Bible itself and all the orthodox theologians have affirmed. We do have knowledge of God which is true; it is possible correctly to formulate it in declarative sentences; it is proper to memorize affirmations such as, ‘God is that infinite and perfect spirit in whom all things have their source, support and end’, or ‘There is but one only living and true God, who is infinite in being and perfection, a most pure spirit, invisible ... almighty; most wise, most holy, most free’.¹¹ Yet we must constantly remind ourselves that all these words have their meaning shaped by our own inner and outer experience and that the gulf between Creator and creature separates us from Him who alone is true God. Except for the dim light of nature, which tells all people that God is mighty, glorious (Ps. 19:1–5; Rom. 1:20) and that we are responsible to Him for what we do of right or wrong (Rom. 2:14, 15), natural men know very little of God. Our proposed analogies lead us astray. We suppose God’s justice is feeble like our own, that God’s love is sentimental like our own.

Thus we understand that the image of God in mankind (Gen. 1:26–27) makes a degree of analogy (anthropomorphism) in our thoughts about God as man-like quite proper. However, until the moral likeness is restored in regeneration, such analogies may lead to grievous error—as in all representation of the invisible God by images to be worshipped. Our understanding will be undistorted fully, only when sanctification and glorification are complete, whereupon we shall enjoy some degree of direct vision, the beatific vision contemplated by the medieval mystics, for ‘we shall see him as he is’ (1 John 3:2).

Meanwhile, in the very broadest sense, all affirmations about God are anthropomorphic.

More specifically, the Bible employs the three figures of speech, previously noted, all falling under the common category of anthropomorphism in speaking of God. Let us enlarge on this matter.

1. Anthropopoiesis

This concerns divine actions analogous to human actions, as in ‘God said, “Let there be light” ’ (Gen. 1:3). That sentence is in Hebrew, a language that came into existence ages after the initial creation on the first day of the creative week. Did the pre-incarnate Logos communicate with the Father in audible speech? If so, how, for God has none of the bodily parts (lips, teeth, tongue, palate, etc. employed in human speech)? This declaration is anthropomorphic. God decreed the existence of light but did not speak the Hebrew words, ye-hi (let there be) ‘or (light). (The Hebrew language in which the first chapter of Genesis was written did not exist at the creation.) ‘God ... breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living creature’ (Gen. 2:7). God, of course, conferred life upon human beings, life of a special sort like His own divine life in some important respect (personal, self-conscious), but God has no lungs, ribcage or nasal passages for breathing. The statement of what God did is anthropopoietic. ‘And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower’ (Gen. 11:5). The omnipresent Creator and imminent Sustainer of the heaven and earth made no intergalactic journey. He did devote, however, some special attention (another anthropomorphic statement) to what was happening on the plains of Shinar (Gen. 11:2). There are many examples of this throughout the Bible.

A special class of events called theophany, by theological writers, must not be placed in the category of anthropomorphism. The divine spirit, usually interpreted as the pre-incarnate Logos (John 1:1–3), sometimes assumed a temporary human form, visible to people, and held converse and social intercourse with them. Examples are the three men who visited Abraham in the plains of Mamre (Gen. 18:1–33) and the ‘man of God’ (Judg. 13:6) who appeared to Manoah and his wife, parents of Samson (Judg. 13:2–25). The record even quotes Samson’s mother as saying, ‘we have seen God’ (v. 22). These theophanies seem all to have been appearances of the Second Person of the Trinity.¹² R. Laird Harris is therefore correct when he affirms: ‘Such anthropomorphisms are to be distinguished from the appearance of God in human form to Abraham as he sat at his tent door in Mamre. The divine appearance in human form is called a theophany and is not a figure of speech.’¹³

2. Anthropopathism

Not all theologians have consented to say God is impassible, i.e. ‘incapable of suffering; inaccessible to harm’ (Webster’s Unabridged Dictionary), but it must surely be affirmed that God’s inner, conscious essence is always undisturbed and unruffled by anything He has created.¹⁴ Yet the Scriptures find in the Godhead that which is called emotion in human beings—love, hate, joy, grief, repentance and the like.

Such [passages] as speak of his repenting and grieving, Gen. 6:6, 7; Jer. 15:6; Ps. 95:10; of his being jealous, Deut. 19:20, etc. represent the truth with respect to God only analogically, and as seen from our point of view ... When he is said to repent, or to be grieved, or to be jealous, it is only meant that he acts toward us as a man would when agitated by such passions [emphasis added]. These metaphors occur principally in the OT, and in highly rhetorical passages of the poetical and prophetic books.¹⁵

Many of these anthropopathisms seemed crude to the translators of the Septuagint (ancient Greek translation from about the fourth to second centuries bc) and were rendered by expressions they thought more elegant. Many modern vernacular Versions likewise remove these ‘crude’ expressions. For example, ‘the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses’ (Exod. 4:14) is in Hebrew, ‘the nostrils of the Lord burned’. A word for heat, poison, fury, rage is used by Moses in Psalm 90:7 of the feelings of God in inflicting death on all the ‘children of man’. The picture conveyed in Hebrew is of virulent, passionate temper out of control. ‘And the Lord was sorry that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him to his heart’ (Gen. 6:6) furnishes two vivid examples of the metaphor, anthropopathism. ‘Was sorry’ (‘repented’ kjv) is naham, frequently used in the sense of being sorry for something one has done and has that meaning here. This cannot be literally true of God, who makes no mistakes, works all things after the counsel of His own will and ‘doeth all things well’. God knew exactly what He was doing when in His eternal counsels He decreed the permission of sin. But the metaphor helps us understand what God did when He brought the Flood. Similarly ‘grieved’ is a word which in simple degree (qal) means to hurt someone or to cause pain, but here, in intensive reflexive degree (hithpael), means to have vexation, as in the case of the sons of Jacob, when they learned that Shechem had seduced or raped their sister, Dinah (Gen. 34:7). Again, God has no inner disturbances of spirit, such as those none-too-innocent brothers experienced, but the metaphor helps us understand God’s action in saving Noah’s clan and destroying all of mankind in the Flood (Gen. 6:6). When God became incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth (the divine nature being joined in indissoluble union with the human nature), affirmations about divine suffering, rejoicing, grieving, hating, etc., all became less metaphorical. Though one of the lesser benefits of the incarnation (Heb. 2:9–18; 4:14–16), it is very comforting to believers as we face the crisis of physical death. Yet let us not forget that Patripassionism, the doctrine that the Father lived, suffered and died in Jesus Christ (Modalistic Monarchianism), was one of the earliest Christian heresies to be condemned by the church.

3. Anthropomorphism Proper

Anthropomorphism proper assigns God the bodily parts and organs of a man in order to convey ideas of His person and action. These are numerous in all parts of the Bible, but like anthropopathism, especially numerous in Old Testament poetry and prophecy. God's power is referred to analogically as His arms or hands, His knowledge as His eyes, His response to prayer as His ear, His pleasure (an anthropopathic term) as His nostrils. This metaphorical manner of speech is prevalent in Hebrew sentences about almost any subject—the power of the patriarch Joseph's tribe in war, for example, is said to be 'the arms of his hands' (Gen. 49:24 kjv). Every reader of the Bible in the Authorized Version of 1611 is familiar with this kind of anthropomorphism, because a large number of figures of all kinds are literally rendered into plain English. God's eyes thus stand for sympathetic acceptance (Gen. 6:8; 34:11), His supportive attention (Deut. 11:12), God's moral judgment (Deut. 32:10), His omniscience and benevolence (2 Chr. 16:9). God's ear as a metaphor for His response to all genuine human prayers is found at least a dozen times in the Psalms (10:17; 17:6; 18:6; etc.). Several very meaningful anthropomorphisms appear in Isaiah's memorable appeal to backslidden Israel: 'Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save, or his ear dull, that it cannot hear; but your iniquities have made a separation between you and your God, and your sins have hidden his face from you' (Isa. 59:1, 2 emphasis added).

It is instructive, to some amusing, that the bodily-parts metaphor sometimes is carried to the point of subhuman creatures. Thus Boaz spoke of Ruth the Moabitess as now trusting under the wings of the Lord God of Israel (Ruth 2:12); and a Psalm naively asserts that God 'will cover thee with his feathers (Ps. 91:4 kjv); and once God, Himself, speaks of bearing the Israelites on 'eagles' wings' (Exod. 19:4). Yet these metaphors must be understood no less purely symbolically than the simile of Deuteronomy 32:11, 12: 'Like an eagle stirs up its nest, that flutters over its young, spreading out its wings, catching them, bearing them on its pinions, the Lord alone guided him [Jacob]'.

4. The Names of God

Scripture uses few generic words for deity. In the Old Testament there are ten names traditionally considered as the chief ones. There are also numerous adjectives, such as 'The Merciful' or The One who does this or that. Upon reflection; every one of these names is an anthropomorphism—God seen man-wise. How else could we mere people talk about Him? This is most obvious in names such as Father, or Rock. Yet as we shall see even 'the most High' and Adonai (Lord) are anthropomorphic.

5. The Attributes of God

Man was made the image and likeness of God. Scripture not only says man is in that image, it says also man is the image of God. The moral attributes scripture ascribes to God are without exception such excellencies as we have, partial and limited as creatures, defaced and spoiled as sinners. This will be discussed again in connection with the names of God and the attributes of God.

The Improper Employment of Anthropomorphisms

Certain modern philosophers have asserted that none of our statements about God as a person or spirit, and as having personal, spiritual attributes is even analogically correct. They claim that such statements do not in any sense conform to objective fact. Hence, when in pantheistic (all is God/God is all) expressions of opinion, all affirmations about God are said to be anthropomorphic, it is meant that, failing even of analogical correctness, they are wholly without validity. Of course, when pagans construct images and other likenesses of God as true representations, they are creating a god in their own image and likenesses and, hence, not only false in message but also blatantly illogical. Paul so reminded the pagan philosophers of Athens (Acts 17:18–31). Such idolatry is also a corrupt practice, as the Old Testament prophets sarcastically asserted (e.g. Elijah, 1 Kings 18:20–40).

A group of ancient Christians who took the anthropomorphic language of scripture literally are known to history as anthropomorphites and were regarded as heretics. This bit of simplistic naivety has been revived in modern times by self-designated Latter Day Saints (Mormons).

¹ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, trans. Robert Schultz, 1966), p. 28.

² Philipp Melancthon, Melancthon on Christian Doctrine, Loci Communes, 1555 (Grand Rapids: Baker Book, 1982, trans. Clyde L. Manschreck), p. xliii.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

³ John Calvin, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, trans. F. L. Battles (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, vol i, 1960), p. 6.

⁴ Robert W. Yarbrough, Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. Walter A. Elwell (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1996), p. 61.

⁵ As evidence, Baker Book House saw fit to follow their Evangelical Dictionary of Theology (1984) with Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology (1996).

⁶ See note 15 in Dr. Yarbrough's article (footnote 4 above).

⁷ Reason and Revelation, trans. Olive Wyon, (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946).

⁸ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of God, vol. I (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1974), p. 19. Note: he is summarizing Offenbarung and Vernunft, pp. 134–161.

⁹ Yarbrough, op. cit., p. 62.

¹⁰ This paragraph is part quotation and part paraphrase of the article on Louis Berkhof by Henry Zwaanstra in Reformed Theology in America: A History of Its Modern Development, ed. David F. Wells (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1997), p. 147.

¹¹ The Westminster Confession of Faith, Chap. II, ‘Of God, and of the Holy Trinity’.

¹² See summary of evidences, A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), pp. 169–172, ¹³ R. Laird Harris in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, vol. i (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975), p. 177.

¹⁴ See A. H. Strong’s discussion in Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), pp. 266–268.

¹⁵ A. A. Hodge, op. cit. p. 132.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (19). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

4

Why People do Believe in God

A few years ago, on a return flight from the Holy Land I sat in an aisle seat, my wife in the seat to my left. Members of our tour group frequently passed questions to me or stepped down the aisle to talk. God’s name was spoken frequently in our conversations. Near the end of our journey (Kennedy Airport) an angry-looking small man across the aisle first made a very disparaging remark about my voice and then sarcastically asked, ‘What gives you the idea that the person [God] you keep referring to even exists?’ I first attempted a courteous acknowledgment of his presence and then replied, ‘I have been explaining just that to about 500 students in a series of thirty lectures. Do you want the whole course or just a summary?’ Obviously already regretting his antagonistic sally he mumbled, ‘Just the summary.’ So I did give him a twenty-minute summary. I led off with the same sentence I had used to students at Campus Crusades summer school: ‘I believe in God because, like most people before they invent reasons for disbelieving, I find it much more reasonable to believe than not to believe.’ The statement answered the man’s question directly and affirms the ancient order—faith in search of understanding.

Authentic Christian apologetics does not pursue the goal of faith-compelling reasons for believing but frankly the aim of removing some obstacles to listening to the Word and of encouraging the perservance of believers. Faith comes by hearing the Word of God, not in response to arguments. To convince atheists, however, that belief in God is supported both by factual evidence and rational arguments might very well humble their pride to the point they will listen to the Word. In this respect ‘Evidences’ may be and frequently have been useful to the Spirit of God in producing repentance and faith.

‘Belief’, ‘believing’ and various synonyms are used in this chapter to mean simple acknowledgment of the existence of something. This is only a small part of the full Christian meaning. This distinction between this simple acknowledgment and the full meaning needs illumination.

In sermons and lectures I have got the distinction across to a group by requesting: ‘Everyone who believes in a personal devil please raise his hand.’ When everyone else (usually) has his or her hand up I said, ‘Please put your hands down’, and add, ‘I do not believe in the devil because I believe in the living God.’ As the effect was sometimes more devastating than is desirable I quit doing this! But the point is that we may accept something as a fact which we may wish were not a fact. Our language permits me to say in such a case, ‘I believe in a personal devil.’

Belief in God Is Universal

In exactly this simple sense people everywhere do believe in God. This is not to say that their ideas about God correspond to biblical teaching about ‘the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ’, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, nor that their ideas about Him are well defined at all. Yet, as we saw in chapter 1, the idea is sufficiently definite that several Scripture writers do refer to the fact that the Gentiles (heathen, nations), people without direct knowledge of the biblical revelation, are aware of God’s existence. In speaking or writing to pagans, Scripture authors refer to God, employing common names for deity, expecting their readers or auditors to recognize whom they mean. There is a limited community of understanding and of agreement.

For example, when Jonah addressed Nineveh with the abrupt warning, ‘Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown’ (Jonah 3:4), the inhabitants knew who had sent the prophet to preach that warning. In whatever language Jonah preached (Babylonian-Assyrian? Aramaic?) and by whatever name for God, ‘the people of Nineveh believed God [’elohim, a name of the Hebrew deity as well as a generic term]. They called for a fast and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them to the least of them (Jonah 3:5). By whatever name or designation they used for God, they identified him with the one God of the Hebrews—however incomplete their knowledge of Him.

Similarly, Genesis tells us how the patriarch Abraham, who had been residing in the South of Canaan, took up an unexpectedly brief residence in nearby Gerar, known (later perhaps) as the Land of the Philistines. In order to avoid possible trouble over his beautiful wife Sarah he foolishly, it turned out, gave out the report that Sarah was his sister. ‘And Abimelech king of Gerar sent and took Sarah. But God (’Elohim) came to Abimelech in a dream by night and said to him, ‘Behold you are a dead man because of the woman you have taken, for she is a man’s wife’ (Gen. 20:3). The rest of the story sustains the point that there was continuity and partial identity of the pagan king’s notion of deity and the Hebrew knowledge of God. Abimelech knew who was addressing him in the dream and that pagan king called God ’Adonai (Lord), just as Abraham did on occasion. The narrative demonstrates that their respective communities identified deity—probably in each case the supreme deity—with Abraham’s God, ’Elohim, even though the Hebrew patriarch had thought there was ‘no fear of God in this place’ (Gen. 20:11). But he was mistaken.

Once Paul spoke of how the Athenians ignorantly worshipped God (Acts 17:22–28). There is a certain irony about this, captured well in this famous sentence: ‘You believe that God is one; you do well. Even the demons believe—and shudder’ (James 2:19).

Not everyone seems to believe in God. This is, in part, because of our ability to put unwelcome knowledge out of our conscious thoughts. Just as some people put their illnesses or serious problems aside as if they did not exist, living in a fool’s paradise, so human beings do not glorify Him as God

(Rom. 1:21) and their Creator is not even in their thinking. As Gerald Bray suggests, their belief in God is about as life-affecting as their belief that the world is round.¹

Some people affirm belief in God but are dissatisfied with Him. They suppose they know more of justice, morality, goodness, beauty and truth than He. They weary the Lord with their words (Mal. 2:17), and sometimes long treatises on philosophical themes.

A few participate in religious forms but in the heart, centre of affection and interest, they live without Him. ‘The fool says in his heart, “There is no God” ’ (Ps. 14:1). This sort of fool is not a dogmatic atheist but a practical one. The fool may be a church elder or the village priest, but he is a hypocrite, for ‘in his heart’ life goes on as though God does not exist.

There are, of course, avowed atheists; yet, as we shall see, they may not truly be atheists but ‘believers’ too, in the simple sense we are employing the word here.

We shall now address three questions: (1) Why do people universally (or nearly so) ‘believe’ in God? (2) Why should people believe in God? That is, what reasons may be cited for belief in God? And, though we shall not provide a special section on the subject, we shall observe in passing some answers to the question. (3) What do people in general know and believe about God?

Why People Do Believe in God

Why do people universally ‘believe’ in God? Many have commented on the fact and some impressive theories have been proposed as to why this consensus gentium prevails. Some have argued that the common belief is a remnant of primitive truth. By this, they mean truth known in the early generations of the human race when God had daily intercourse with us, as Genesis 2 and 3 report. It is thought to have endured in garbled form through all the generations to the present. There may be something to this, but it seems likely that some sections of the human race would have failed to pass the knowledge on. Yet the conviction appears to be well nigh universal. It seems more in harmony with the Bible, which does throughout address mankind as aware of God, to find the source on some deeper level.

Others have suggested that the common belief in God is based on inferences from the observed phenomena of nature. Maybe all of us make this inference—invariably if not necessarily. But if so, there seem to be no parallels. Inductively acquired notions are seldom so uniformly held.

Is then this common belief in God a spontaneous development? George Park Fisher, an American Presbyterian theologian of a century ago, thought so. He said the conviction arises in quite another way:

Belief in God is not ultimately founded on processes of argument. His presence is more immediately disclosed. There is a native [i.e. born-in] and universal belief, emerging spontaneously in connection with the feeling of dependence and the phenomena of conscience, however obscure, inconstant, and perverted that faith may be.²

The ‘feeling of dependence’, in the above quotation, prevailed in the atmosphere of academic theology when Fisher wrote in the early 1880s, in the same way ‘demythologize’, ‘process’, and ‘existential’ have been in recent decades. F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) gave this expression to theology in many writings. He built a whole dogmatic system in his two-volume work, The Christian Faith, 1821, 1831, on the foundation of the 'religious consciousness' which all people have. We each become aware early in childhood that we are not independent but dependent beings. The dependence we feel is of absolute dependence. The essence of this consciousness is not knowledge or action, but a feeling different from all others, being a direct consciousness of 'the absolute', another nineteenth-century philosophical preoccupation. George W. F. Hegel (1770–1831) who wrote more than many scholars ever read in a year, impressed many and convinced more (Karl Marx, for example) of 'process' or 'dialectical movement'. This theme 'runs through everything Hegel wrote' (Will Durant). This movement (process, becoming) is identical with 'the absolute', the supreme Reality. The world process—as in all pantheistic idealism—is its own cause and goal. Somehow Hegel's notion stuck and has not disappeared.

Hence people everywhere believe in God as the Absolute on whom they have 'feeling of dependence' or 'the religious consciousness'. There is something of the ring of truth in this theory.

In other words, God made each person—the first man and all his descendants—with such nature and characteristics that when we come to full conscious awareness of the external world and our inner thoughts and feelings, an awareness of God appears. The awareness is dim and only partly formulated in some, for many of us are neither very reflective nor especially alert to ideas. Additionally, some of us are not very sensitive to other persons. In others the awareness of God is clear and well formed. Among at least a few the voice of conscience speaks 'loud and clear', while in others that pointer toward the moral Governor of this world seems hardly to exist. Pilate's wife might serve as an example of the former (Matt. 27:19), Pilate of the latter (John 18:38).

Is God a first truth? Since very ancient times, at least as early as the Greek philosophers of the fourth century bc, many learned men have said that God is immediately present in people's minds as one of several 'first truths'.

A. H. Strong, author of the most enduring and widely read book of Baptist theology, taking a hint from this, puts this universal awareness of God in the category of 'first truths'. Orthodox Protestant theological writers from Calvin onward have taught, on the basis both of Scripture and 'natural light', that this awareness exists. Not all provide the same list of first truths or explain the awareness of God in this way.

By this pregnant expression writers mean truths existing in the mind previous to thought or reflection. They are truths the mind unconsciously presupposes in order to think about any subject whatsoever. Sometimes they are called (not very aptly, for a false impression is conveyed thereby) innate ideas, that is, ideas we are born with. Such ideas are not thought to be consciously present at birth or even when first used. Yet when experiences through the senses (percepts) furnish data for the mind to reflect upon and shape into concepts, the mind is already furnished with 'categories' into which to arrange and file them, plus techniques for so employing the data. Thus when the distance between A and B is perceived, the idea of space or distance immediately moves from latent existence to patent existence in the mind. A person employs the idea of space without ever being taught it by someone else or by experiencing it through the senses. Similarly, when events transpire within an infant's sphere of observation (a loud noise, movement, change of any sort) the child looks for a cause. Cause is another first truth, innate, not produced by experience, but latently present and becoming patent in first experience. Kant taught a similar doctrine of knowledge. Although there are certain similarities to Plato's thought about the question of how we know things, there is no connection really with his doctrine of pre-existing 'forms'.

Now, says this line of approach, God is one of these first truths. The latent idea springs up into conscious presence in the mind at a certain point in every person's conscious life. It may be at first awareness of wrongdoing, or a first interest in cause-effect relationships, or some other occasion.

Is God discovered by the correspondence of two worlds? One may defend this view of things (Fisher and Strong were only two of many who do) by a slightly different approach. There is an external world (sea and land, clouds and sky, people and things) to be observed. I observe it; you observe it; almost everyone does. We each enter into knowing relationship with it, for we find in our minds mental shelves, bags, hooks, slots and drawers (so to speak) into which, tentatively at least, we arrange these numerous bits of information. Colours go in certain shaped bags, distances on shelves, values in drawers, pleasures in slots, and pains on hooks, so to speak. So my inner mental world, in a general way, corresponds genuinely with the external world. When I talk with you I discover that you have done the same in similar, if not identical, ways. We both know the external world and can actually have discourse about it. How? And Why? Because Someone greater than all reality has put all parts of all the observable reality of our world in these commensurable relationships. I must assume Him in order even to think about me, you or it.

You might say simply that the external world that we see, feel, touch, hear and taste corresponds with our inner world that knows the outer one. Everyone who thinks about it must ask, Why? A power to whom our language gives the name God seems to be the only answer the mind can readily supply.

Is conscience the source of our knowledge of God? As G. P. Fisher's statement quoted earlier suggests, conscience may be a source of the universal notion of God. Conscience, Paul says, either accuses or excuses (blames or praises) us (Rom. 2:15). It must exist in us all because all people do make moral judgments. The human mind has a way of skipping all the steps of logic and apparently, by intuition, coming to a sound conclusion. We have to do this in a split second to stay alive sometimes. Perhaps we all do this in reasoning from conscience to God. Maybe this explains the universal awareness of God. To be the God whom conscience fears, God must be exceedingly great in wisdom and power. He must also be holy and just. Whether He be also gracious or not is a question conscience does not answer, for conscience gives the soul of a person small comfort and ultimately no mercy at all. The sinner receives assurance of forgiveness after he repents and confesses, all right, but even then, he may find conscience hard to mollify. Assurance of forgiveness comes rather from the revealed Word of God which tells him what God has done to remove transgressions, to cover sin and to cancel guilt (see Ps. 32:1-5 and compare 2 Sam. 12:1-13; see also 1 John 1:8, 9).

These reflections on the question of why people everywhere have an awareness of God are of at least provisional value. That is, they will do until some better answer to a persistent question is proposed. At any rate, we have every reason to make the same assumption that the Bible makes: people do not need to be introduced to the idea of God. They already know about Him.

The Bible does assume that people believe in the existence of God. The Bible also assumes that people's ideas about Him are sufficiently correct to make conversation about Him possible. We must accept this if we are going to address people's minds as Paul did at Athens (Acts 17:16–34) or as John Bunyan, for that matter, did in the Bedford Gaol.

Not only so, having accepted this universal awareness as a fact, on the basis of it we have the privilege and duty of initiating Christian witness to anyone on earth.

Is our knowledge of God an intuition from the contingency of all things? Is it obvious that the innumerable things we learn about, beginning with our first day of conscious existence, are necessarily here in the world, not somewhere else. Do you remember the surprise you felt the first time you touched a kitten, a stone, a piece of ice, a fly? Or the first time you heard a meadow lark sing or first heard a symphony orchestra? Later you learned the connections between some or all of these things. You know there is regularity in the relations of all these things—we call the regularity, laws.

About these 'things' and the 'laws' Rudolph Otto asked some questions:

Whence have both these come? Is it a matter of course, is it quite obvious that they should exist at all, and that they should be exactly as they are?... if the world were so constituted that it would be impossible for it not to exist, that the necessity for its existence and the inconceivability of its non-existence were at once explicit and obvious, then there would be no sense in inquiring after a cause. In regard to a 'necessary' thing, if there were such, we cannot ask, 'why, and from what cause does it exist?' If it was necessary, that implies that to think of it as not existing would be ridiculous ... and impossible. Unfortunately there are no 'necessary' things [emphasis added], so that we cannot illustrate the case by examples. But there are at least necessary truths [emphasis added] as distinguished from contingent truths ... For instance, a necessary truth is contained in the sentence, 'Everything is equal to itself', or, 'The shortest distance between two points [on a plane surface] is a straight line.' We cannot even conceive of the contrary.³

'It rained yesterday' is a contingent truth. 'It all depends', we say. Now it seems entirely possible that in an informal manner people of all times and places find it necessary to accept a cause of all contingent things. The cause is axiomatic, not something to be proved. Perhaps for most of us 'proof' in the sense of absolute demonstration is neither desired nor necessary. We look at the 'things' that are made (Rom. 1:20) and unconsciously accept God as the Maker without the slightest effort at a syllogism. We do so in the same unreflective but valid way we cut across the backyard to get to the neighbour's back door rather than taking to the street and walking around the block.

This intuition, formalized, is the rational basis of the causal or cosmological argument, to be treated in the next chapter.

Is Belief in God a Practical Necessity to Meet the Needs of Human Life? It is a generally acknowledged fact that religion is a universal phenomenon. Some authors account for it as arising out of some spontaneous impulse that is as natural as breathing or eating food. Augustine phrased the thought memorably in the language of Christian theism: 'Thou has made us for thyself and our heart is restless till it rest in thee'. Others have described the impulse to worship some unseen 'higher power' as 'felt need'.

Through several generations Boston University has been favored by a succession of brilliant exponents of a theistic world view. Among these, one who after a hundred years is still widely quoted and whose arguments and exposition still speak is Borden P. Bowne. I will call upon the closing chapter of his Theism, Comprising the Deems Lectures for 1902 at New York University. At that time NYU was a Christian institution. He introduces the chapter ‘Theism and Life’ as no proof of God’s existence but to introduce belief in the God of theism as needful for human happiness as follows:

[M]an is not merely nor mainly contemplation; he is also will and action. He must, then, have something to work for, aims to realize, and ideas by which to live. In real life the center of gravity of theistic faith lies in its relation to these aims and ideals. God is seen to be that without which our ideals collapse or are made unattainable, and the springs of action are broken. Hence the existence of God is affirmed not on speculation or theoretical grounds, but because of the needs of practical life.⁴

One Hebrew poet exclaimed, ‘My soul longeth ... my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God’ and another ‘My flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land’ and still another, ‘God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever’ (Psa. 84:2; 63:1; 73:26 kjv).

Bowne concludes on the point: ‘All that can be done ... is to show that theism is a demand of our moral nature, a necessity of practical life. Whether to accept this subjective necessity as the warrant for the objective fact every one must decide for himself ... our human interests can be conserved, and our highest life maintained, only on a theistic basis’.⁵ Universally felt needs for a meaningful happy life may also explain why people of all ages and in every place believe in a god.

Why Should People Believe in God?

It is a fact that sizeable numbers of people have, like the man in my story at the beginning of this chapter, rejected their ‘belief’ in God. They ‘by their unrighteousness suppress the truth ... For although they knew God, they did not honour him as God or give thanks to him, but they became futile in their thinking, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Claiming to be wise, they became fools’ (Rom. 1:18, 21–22). Scripture holds these folk—idolaters all—wickedly responsible for denying and perverting their knowledge. Yet, they are not only to be loved as God loves them (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8) but also to be hated as God hates them (Pss. 97:10; 139:21). Wherever he went, Paul got into trouble because he rebuked idolatries of all kinds and successfully overthrew them.

What shall we do when we meet the wholly secular mind? We, of course, shall declare the gospel. If I understand the ‘presuppositional’ disciples of Cornelius Van Til aright, they hold this to be the only ‘apologetic’, i.e. proof of the truth of ‘the Faith’ available to us. There is, they say, no common ground of agreement we can find to mount a programme of evangelistic or pre-evangelistic encounter with unbelievers. The effect of the fall has rendered their minds incapable of considering the saving truth of the gospel. Arguments are unavailing. We must simply proclaim the truth and leave the rest to the sovereign work of the Holy Spirit.

If, however, secular-minded unbelievers will not consent to hear the gospel, is there anything else one can do? Certainly. If we can at least get their attention (as Jesus did in His interesting parables and as Paul did at Athens) by speaking first of matters not apparently part of a distinctly Christian doctrinal system, we may cause them to listen to some gospel too.

The classical arguments for the existence of God are latently in the Scriptures, sometimes almost explicitly stated. Therefore, to present them is really to speak from logical-spiritual ground that is uncompromised. As the witness speaks, and if his homework has been done well, several good things may happen to the unbeliever also.

In the first place the garden-variety secular listener will likely come to see for the first time in his life that evangelical Christianity is not what he thought it to be—a superstition or a device for gaining social benefits or a spooky bit of a magic for small-minded fanatics. This may come as quite a shock to him, sufficient shock either to anger or humble him. The listener may at least begin to doubt the certainty of his smug atheism and to feel a bit foolish. Carl Sagan might possibly have had a bad night had he encountered John Gerstner (who was an aggressive Christian apologist) in the next seat of a trans-Atlantic flight to Paris. In other words, sound arguments can teach unbelievers a bit of respect, even if they do not initially convince. St Augustine, himself, says his mind was turned toward Christianity by meeting a persuasive argument for the existence of souls, and it did not even come from a Christian source, but from pagan Platonic philosophers.

Unbelievers may have more than one kind of obstacle to belief, susceptible to more than one kind of help from those who sincerely desire to win them over. Some years ago, a practicing Christian psychologist addressed the students and faculty of Wheaton College on the question of whether or not psychology can be used to convert unbelievers to Christ. He said, in sum, no, not as such. However, many people are not fully sane and some are not sane at all. The gospel addresses a person's rational understanding. He will therefore remain lost until some degree of sanity is restored. Otherwise he cannot even discern the gospel when he hears it. If psychological counselling or psychiatric treatment can return him to sanity, then the gospel power can operate in him and he may be saved.

In a similar way, if a 'professing-himself-to-be-wise' person, who has rejected native belief in God, will stand still long enough while I present some arguments for God's existence, good things may happen to him. Firstly, he may open his mind just a little to the idea that God is. The moment he does so, his conscience will again operate to produce shame for his guilty unbelief. In the second place, while the unbeliever listens to my arguments, I shall also be declaring some of my own faith and reporting some of God's Word. Logical arguments need not be separated from scriptural truth and Christian testimony. The listening unbeliever therefore is 'dangerously' close already to being under gospel power. 'Faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ' (Rom. 10:17).

A third thing will occur too. I shall be strengthening my own faith if I have troubled to make myself 'ready' (1 Peter 3:15) to give answer to those who inquire. G. P. Fisher, quoted above, goes on to say: 'The arguments for the being of God do not originate this faith: they justify at the same time that they elucidate and define it. They are so many different points of view from which we contemplate the object of faith. Each one of them tends to show, not simply that God is, but what He is. They complete the conception by pointing out particular predicates brought to light in the manifestation which God has made of himself.'⁶

The arguments we are about to examine are all ancient; as asserted earlier, some even appear in the Bible. Modern theologians are not in full agreement as to their value. This I judge to be because we bring a recent world-view to the problem. As these arguments were developed over the years, say from Anselm (eleventh century) to Calvin (sixteenth century), they were not employed by themselves to convert non-theists to belief in one true God. Rather, everyone in Christendom endorsed the creeds: ‘I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth.’ This sort of ‘pre-evangelism’ was not particularly needed. The arguments were not formulated as demonstrations or proofs for some unprejudiced, critical court of review. Rather, St Thomas and the others held, there was cause for affirming the existence of God quite independently of creed or Bible. God is knowable in the sense of knowing that He is, by virtue of information drawn from the world that God made. The tool for mining the treasure, it was held, is natural reason. Until recently, however, ‘reason’ included much more than what we usually call ‘reason’ today. Our very word logic is an old Greek word meaning word in the first place. In these authors, still read today, reason includes about all the arts of persuasion, including deductive and inductive processes and much more besides. In the kjv New Testament of 400 years ago ‘reason’, ‘reasoning’, and the like, still translate words meaning to discuss, to dispute, to argue, give exposition, build a case, and similar. Neither Anselm nor Thomas supposed that pure logic, as we conceive it today, would convince people indisposed to believe. There were not then or now any faith-compelling syllogisms—not even faith-compelling miracles (John 12:37–41).

The most we can claim for these arguments is, given the kind of beings people ought to be, the evidences of natural light are such that people ought to give assent to the fact that God is. We will assess how much more the arguments tell us about God as we treat them.

The church Fathers took over these proofs from ancient philosophers, and some proceeded to set too much value on them. The age of scholasticism (tenth to fifteenth centuries) similarly made too much of them. The Reformers received this natural theology also, but following the Scriptures, they incorporated it into Christian doctrine, rather than treating it as something merely preliminary to or in addition to scriptural revelation. It is something for Christians to employ as Christians, not merely as fodder for dialogue or debate with unbelievers.

In a well-known passage Calvin says:

The final goal of the blessed life ... rests in the knowledge of God. Lest anyone ... be excluded ... he not only sowed in men’s minds that seed of religion [awareness of God] ... but revealed himself and daily discloses himself in the whole workmanship of the universe. As a consequence, men cannot open their eyes without being compelled to see him. Indeed, his essence is incomprehensible; hence, his divineness far escapes all human perception. But upon his individual works he has engraved unmistakable marks of his glory, so clear and so prominent that even unlettered and stupid folk cannot plead the excuse of ignorance.⁷

Calvin then devotes a page to exposition of Psalm 104, Hebrews 11:3, Psalm 19 and Romans 1:19, 20 and adds:

There are innumerable evidences both in heaven and on earth that declare his wonderful wisdom; not only those more recondite matters for closer observation of which astronomy, medicine, and all natural science are intended, but also those which thrust themselves upon the sight of even the most untutored and ignorant person, so that they cannot open their eyes without being compelled to witness them.⁸

It is clear that while Calvin thought education might help one to see God's message in the natural world, no one is so bereft of 'reason' as to be unable to read the essentials of the message.

For any theologians who may read these lines, I cannot but express the opinion that Calvin would have been both puzzled and angered by the odd reluctance of some Calvinistic presuppositionalists in apologetics to see value in employing natural 'revelation' in evangelism, granting its limitations. After all, every truth as well as the Truth has power. And some truths of 'natural light' are also the Truth of God's revealed Word.

¹ Gerald Bray, The Doctrine of God (Downer's Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1993), p. 14.

² George P. Fisher, Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1888), p. 37.

³ Rudolph Otto, Naturalism and Religion, trans. J. A. Thomson & Margaret R. Thomson (New York: 1913), pp. 61, 62. This sort of truth—necessary truth—is called an axiom. We do not ever prove axioms for we cannot even think without them. They can, however, be suppressed.

⁴ Borden P. Bowne, Theism (New York: American Book Co., 1902), p. 291.

⁵ ibid., p. 292.

⁶ G. P. Fisher, op. cit., p. 37.

⁷ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), I, v, 1.

⁸ ibid., I, v, 2.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (29). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

5

Reasons for Believing in God

We proceed to see how the chief classical theistic arguments have been formulated and to evaluate them.

The Causal Argument. This argues from the present existence of the universe. This argument is also called the Argument from the Idea of First Cause and the Cosmological Argument. It begins with the fact of the universe and asks the question, How did it get here? Then it answers that the universe was created by an Adequate Cause. The name given to Adequate or First Cause is God.

In spite of certain objections, it is properly called an argument from effect to cause (a posteriori, from here back to there). Unless one is willing to affirm, as certain people do, that the universe is self-caused and eternal, one must admit that the ‘heavens and the earth’ is a universe begun at some point. So we state the argument, ‘Everything begun, whether substance or phenomenon, owes its existence to some producing cause. The universe at least so far as its present form is concerned, is a thing begun, and owes its existence to a cause which is equal to its production. This cause must be indefinitely great.’¹ Objections have been raised and weaknesses cited. Someone wants to know if instead of first cause where ‘the buck stops’, perhaps an infinite regress of causes may be just as adequate. According to a Hindu myth, the world rests on the back of a gigantic elephant, the elephant’s feet rest on the back of a gigantic turtle. Sometimes the turtle is said to be swimming in a great sea. Ask the Hindu what contains the great sea and all he can do is shrug his shoulders or change the subject. Is this just as reasonable and believable as the argument for First Cause?

Someone else wonders if we must find the cause of the heavens and the earth outside the universe, both anterior (before it) and exterior. Perhaps the cause is coeval (of the same age) with the universe and interior, i.e. immanent (dwelling in the world) and not transcendent (above the world). If so, then maybe the universe itself is the cause and you have invented pantheism all over again. All that exists is God in various expressions and emanations. This is the philosophy underlying several oriental religions. When idolatrous paganism turns sophisticated or when biblical religion turns to excessive ritual and becomes intellectualized, as in eighteenth-century continental Europe, pantheism is the form religion takes. Several pantheistic sects are currently in vogue in America, among them Rosicrucianism, theosophy, transcendental meditation and several varieties of New Ageism.

Another objection takes the shape of frontal attack. An aged professor challenged my faith in college days by sarcastically asserting: 'I can as justifiably posit an eternally existing, self-sustaining universe as you can an eternal, all wise, all powerful creator-God.' Such a world must run on eternal, immutable laws.

What shall we say? In the first place, an infinite regress of causes is generally unsatisfying to thoughtful people. It is a solution undesirable for almost any problem we can think of. The mind seeks a resting place. Furthermore, there is clear evidence of a master design through all the parts of the universe. There must have been a beginning at some point when the design was made by an intelligent being. We shall say more about this shortly. So the idea of infinite regression is seen to be a very weak explanation. It is really to give up making any explanation. The same objections prevail against both pantheism and the notion of an eternal, uncaused universe.

Furthermore, the evidence of observation, both of causal, unlearned observations and of technical, scientific research, clearly indicate that the universe is neither self-sustained nor eternal. It had a beginning.

Poetically stated we observe to our distress:

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day.

Earth's joys grow dim, its glories fade away.

Change and decay in all around I see.

Everything we see is temporary and dependent on something else. This includes that portion of our own beings that we know to be part of the natural order (our physical bodies). Everyone knows this. Likewise scientists who search the skies with several kinds of instruments and several kinds of research have established that our universe is moving toward infinite dispersion at a regular rate. Analysis of light from the stars with an instrument called a spectroscope, shows that like painted dots on the surface of a toy balloon being blown up, each spot in the universe is moving farther from every other spot. Names given to the observance of this phenomenon are Red Shift, Doppler Effect and 'expanding universe'. The farther the objects in space are from one another the faster they accelerate toward infinite velocity. Though evidence has been sought for a slowing down at the borders of the universe none has yet been established. The universe could not have been operating in such a way from eternity past. It would now be infinitely dispersed. Certain theorists have invented a doctrine of continuous creation of matter. If matter is being created as fast as it disappears, than the cosmos is in a state of equilibrium. It is an interesting idea, but such a dynamic engine for maintenance of our world is without evidence and would need to be explained by some First Cause.

Another fact of common observation, formalized by science, is that the world is running out of available energy. The world is running down. There will be as much matter and energy in aggregate at the end of time as now, but energy will be locked up in ways it cannot be used. When the sun has dissipated all its matter and energy to the extremities of the solar system our world will be at an end. The law of entropy (i.e. of unavailable energy) will have had its say. What if the sun had started giving off its energy an eternity ago? The solar system would have disappeared, along with our earth, long ago.

The Bible, moreover, contains several extended sections on the created heavens and earth as constituting a message about God to His rational creatures everywhere. It was not a philosopher, but a sensitive shepherd boy grown up, who wrote of this in poetry both pleasant to the ear and a pleasure to read:

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the sky above proclaims his handiwork.

Day to day pours out speech, and night to night reveals knowledge.

There is no speech, nor are there words, whose voice is not heard.

Their measuring line goes out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.

In them he has set a tent for the sun, which comes out like a bridegroom leaving his chamber, and, like a strong man, runs its course with joy.

Its rising is from the end of the heavens, and its circuit to the end of them, and there is nothing hidden from its heat.²

Full exposition of these verses would require space at least as long as this chapter, but several matters are clear. God has placed a message about Himself in the created heavens of the sun, moon and stars. There His majesty and power may be seen (v. 1). The message is ‘round the clock’ (v. 2) and it is silent testimony (v. 3), hence peculiarly susceptible of being ignored. The messengers are beautiful and vigorous (v. 5) and they deliver their message everywhere and to all people (vv. 4 and 6). The Bible is squarely behind the argument that God’s existence is manifestly declared in nature.

Romans 1:18–32 is not poetry and it is not pleasant to hear—nor did its author intend it to be reading for relaxation. The passage contains what may be the bitterest, most judgmental sentences in human speech. Here the Bible declares that nature provides such strong testimony to God’s existence, character and attributes that human beings are universally and severally rendered guilty and wrath-deserving, under the righteous judgment of God. The divine treatment of the heathen—both in judgment and grace—is sufficiently grounded on this passage alone. It is the clearest biblical statement of the reason for pagan guilt, thus the justification for Christian missions. It is hard to imagine a higher evaluation of the causal argument than that which Paul has provided in this passage.

Even apart from the other theistic arguments and evidences this evidence ought to make people ask questions about God. It has always had an important place in preparing the hearts of many to believe the gospel, perhaps even to seek to hear it. David assumes the causal argument in poetic logic when he asks, ‘He who planted the ear, does he not hear? He who formed the eye, does he not see? He who disciplines the nations, does he not rebuke? He who teaches man knowledge ... knows the thoughts of mans’ (Ps. 94:9–11).

One of the great names of British science, mathematics and philosophy is Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727). Sir Isaac had a miniature model of the solar system made. A large golden ball representing the sun was at its centre and around it revolved smaller spheres, representing the planets—Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter and the others. They were each kept in an orbit relatively the same as in the real solar system. By means of rods, cogwheels and belts they all moved around the centre gold ball in exact precision. A friend called on the noted man one day while he was studying the model. The friend was not a believer in the biblical doctrine of creation.

Their conversation has been reported as follows: Friend: ‘My Newton, what an exquisite thing! Who made it for you?’ Newton: ‘Nobody.’ Friend: ‘Nobody?’ Newton: ‘That’s right! I said nobody! All of these balls and cogs and belts and gears just happened to come together, and wonder of wonders, by chance they began revolving in their set orbits with perfect timing.’³ Of course the visitor understood the unstated argument that, ‘In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth.’

The two arguments for the existence of God, now to be presented, likewise rest upon the principle that there must be a cause for every effect. The cosmological argument applies the law of cause to the universe as a whole. The two now to follow apply it, firstly, to the evidence of design in the natural order, including the human body (the teleological argument), and secondly, to the mental and moral side of human nature (the anthropological argument, also called the moral argument).

Argument from Design. This is the argument from the presence of order and mutually useful common relationships in nature. This is called the teleological (from Greek telos, end, goal) argument. There is a major premise: when an observed orderly arrangement, coupled with useful common relationship, pervades a system it implies intelligence and purpose in the cause of the system. Both order and useful common relationship can be seen pervading all that we can observe in the universe. There must therefore have been, at the beginning, an intelligence sufficient to design that order and to conceive the purpose. There must also have been power to direct the natural order toward these ends. Though he did not state it just this way, the eminent philosopher Emmanuel Kant (1724–1804) was convinced that this argument, though not ‘apodictic’, is the highest ‘proof’ of a Designer, though not necessarily of a Creator.

The major premise expresses a primitive and universal conviction. When, for example, we find a material object apparently made to be used for some purpose, say a stone axe, we feel certain that some person (intelligence) made it to cut wood (purpose). Both the intelligence and the purpose lie in the maker. We see unmistakable order all about us in nature. We see mutual dependence and relationship in all of it. We know people did not make these features of our world. We know that only a Being with adequate intelligence to plan this system and with power to create it could cause it and did indeed cause it.

The major premise is a conviction shared by all mankind. We cannot conceive of a universe (that is, a world of many things harmonized in working unity) of weather, soil, water, temperature, a world animate and inanimate, evidently unique to our planet, as existing without One who designed it for these ends. We find our innate feelings and primitive convictions that such a power does exist all confirmed. Why not call Him God?

Volumes have been written showing how the immense complexity of all creation, all operating in a system, manifests design, that is, purpose, in the structure of reality. The most famous statement is that of William Paley (1743–1805). He articulated the argument in his Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity Collected from the Appearances of Nature (1802). It may be found in back shelves of college libraries even today. The book’s title speaks for itself. A more recent small book made a whole generation aware of these evidences in a forceful, popular way—Man Does Not Stand Alone by A. Cressy Morrison (Revell, 1944). This book was published in digest form by Reader’s Digest two years later and it is still widely read.

The argument from design has impressed reflective people throughout the generations—‘You cause the grass to grow for the livestock and plants for man to cultivate, that he may bring forth food from the earth and wine to gladden the heart of man, oil to make his face shine and bread to strengthen man’s heart.’ This verse from Psalm 104:14 and 15 is early, but not unique. Plato in the dialogue Philebus drew an analogy that puts it like this: all the elements in the human body are derived from the great mass of elements in the cosmos. Hence the mind of man must be derived from ‘a royal soul and mind in the nature of Zeus’. In fact, Anaxagoras, Socrates, Plato and Aristotle all honored a teleological explanation of the universe. It was a favourite of the scholastic theologians and even impressed Emmanuel Kant as deserving most respect of the usual theistic ‘proofs’, though he rejected them all.

David Hume (1711–1776) wrote a devastating critique of the teleological argument (Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion) twenty-three years before Paley produced his famous work advocating it. Perhaps Paley never read it. In the dialogue, speakers discuss the pros and cons of basing any religious belief on nature (miracles he excluded altogether).

The impression most students derive from Hume’s book is that he believed the existence of ‘God is assured by reason of the amount of order discoverable in the universe, but that the evidence is insufficient to warrant many conclusions about his nature and attributes.’⁴

A number of religious philosophers have incorporated these evidences for God's existence into essentially non-theistic explanations, arguing for an 'elan vital' or 'vitalism' or any one of a number of impersonal powers as cause of design and apparent purpose.

Evolutionary theory substitutes the idea of cause—natural selection, survival of the fittest, and similar—for the idea of purpose. The evolutionary theory was at least 2,200 years old when Darwin was born. Empedocles (494–434 bc) taught that the primal elements came together by chance and produced fragmentary structures (such as arms, necks, horns, sex organs). The fragmentary structures then met casually and those adapted to each other survived while the others disappeared. Simple structures came first and when several structures joined more complex were formed. Thus from spontaneous aggregations of casual aggregates 'which suited one another as if this had been intended [emphasis added] did the organic universe spring ... It is impossible not to see in this theory a crude anticipation of the "survival of the fittest" theory of modern evolutionists.'⁵ Democritus (460–362 bc) had another evolutionary, mechanistic, tychistic (chance) system. To the present moment no one has produced a feasible explanation of how, that is, the mechanism by which intelligent purpose can be replaced by chance. Evolution has no explanation of arrival much less of survival of the fittest.

Someone wants to know if maybe the intelligence implied in design may be within the system of nature—and it is theoretically possible.

It must be acknowledged that formally there is no proof of a personal Creator in the bare appearance of design. True, it formally 'proves' the existence of an Architect or Designer only. Yet when people reflect on the evidence of design in nature their intuitive logic quickly arrives at an intelligent, all-powerful person, rather than impersonal force as the cause of it.

It has been objected that the widespread presence of evil indicates the absence of beneficent design in nature. Can God be the author of a universe where pain and calamity are as prevalent as they are in our universe?

The seriousness of the objection must be acknowledged. Perhaps the most important answer is simply that while the evidence for 'intelligent design' (as a burgeoning current revival of this argument aptly phrases) is clear, the evidences for lack of it are ambiguous. True, we do not know why there are disasters of all kinds, tremendous waste and seeming meaninglessness, but that does not mean there are no purposes being served. We just do not know what they are. We know that in certain cases of moral evil, at least, God had a purpose in allowing each.

The argument from design is often poetically framed in hymns of Christian worship. One of the finest, not frequently sung anymore, is Addison's.

The spacious firmament on high
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim.

The unwearied sun from day to day

Does his creator's power display,

And publishes to every land

The works of an almighty hand.⁶

The Bible declares that evil does indeed have a place in the world of God's providence (see Gen. 50:5–21; Acts 2:22–24). It is not unavoidable by God and undesigned by Him but something designed for human discipline. Evil, especially moral evil, remains a problem of thought, but it is not a barrier to faith. See a later chapter for discussion of the problem of evil.

Argument from Human Nature. The argument from the nature of mankind is also called the moral argument, or the anthropological argument. As soon will become apparent, this, like the teleological argument, is a special form of the argument from cause.

We cannot avoid observing that people of all races, in all places and of every social condition have a sense of right and wrong. They make moral judgments. If someone says it is wrong for people to have a sense of right and wrong, then he has made a judgment of right and wrong and seems inconsistent. If reminded of this he may assert that he has only made an intellectual judgment. If I tell him I think he has made a moral judgment and that it is wrong for him to deny it he ought to say nothing, for if he says (as almost certainly he will) that it is wrong for me to say a non-fact is a fact, he has made a moral judgment. John Gerstner has written of this that 'As intellectual beings we judge that certain things are right or wrong, but with that judgment always comes the notion that what we judge to be right, we ought to judge to be right; and what we judge to be wrong we ought [emphasis added] to judge to be wrong.'⁷ People everywhere agree that it is wrong to oppose a correct judgment of fact and conversely it is right to support it. If we do otherwise we feel an inner sense of wrongdoing. Something within accuses and threatens us.

Though it is now commonly attributed solely to social conditioning, Paul says our conscience accuses and threatens us when we offend our own standards of right and wrong and excuses (approves) us when we please our own sense of right and wrong (Rom. 2:12–16). Conscience does not tell us what is right. Our training, perhaps some innate sense of right and wrong, and perhaps much else, informs us of what is right (correctly or incorrectly). The conscience only judges how well we are doing. It does not furnish the standard.

The 'something' which judges our own and others' actions we call conscience. The word, however, and many of the ideas that go with it are not an original part of divine revelation. The word does not even appear in either Testament of the English Bible until John 8:9—a non-genuine text—and next at Acts 23:1, where the Greek word is suneidēsis, sun (plus), with eidēsis (knowledge): hence, Latin con (with), and science (knowledge). Perhaps Zeno of Citium (founder of Stoics, fourth and third century bc) first postulated a 'human nature' and invented the word, though Bias and Periander, both more ancient, are said to have employed the word 'conscience'.⁸ At any rate, this moral sense of what is right and our duty to do it, though it accuses and excuses, may be weak (1 Cor. 8:12), good (1 Peter 3:16), defiled (1 Cor. 8:7), seared (1 Tim. 4:2), strong or pure (1 Cor. 8:7, 9).

But it is never fully absent.

The only adequate explanation is that the great Moral Being, who created us all, planted the moral sense in us. Training or conditioning (certainly not material nature) can hardly be the cause. They may affect it by influence bad or good but not originate it.

There are many other approaches to the moral argument. It was this ‘practical reason’ as opposed to ordinary or ‘theoretical reason’ that compelled even the sceptical philosopher Emmanuel Kant to postulate the existence of God and immortality of the soul. However stated, it comes closest to rational ‘proof’ of Christian theism of all the theistic arguments. C. S. Lewis has popularized this argument in a convincing way in several of his earlier apologetical works.

When, therefore, this argument is treated with so much respect by Kant and by many others after him that the other proofs are made to recede entirely in the background, this is not due to its logical force, but to the irresistible testimony of man’s moral consciousness. Even though it may be ever so difficult for anyone to detect a moral order in the world round about him, in his conscience every one, whether he wills it or not, feels that he is as much bound to this order as his mind and reason are to the laws of thought ... He will persevere ... and this conviction will ... involuntarily result in recognition of a ... holy God, who exercises sovereign power over all creatures.⁹

Argument from the Idea of Being. The common name for this argument from the idea of being is the Ontological Argument.

In the last previous chapter I have already presented several forms of this argument under the heading, ‘Why People Do Believe in God.’ These forms of the argument are judged sound by many good scholars. The classical form of the Ontological Argument was originated by the Father of medieval scholasticism, Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109), in a skilfully articulated treatise called Monologion (monologue). In it the author thinks reflectively on himself and is convinced he has found God, at least an absolutely irrefutable proof of His existence.

In seeking over the years to explain the Monologion to students I have summarized Anselm’s argument in the following syllogism—major premise, minor premise, conclusion—both fair to Anselm and understandable to students. A syllogism works this way: major premise: ‘All men are liars.’ Minor premise, ‘Harold is a man.’ Conclusion, ‘Harold is a liar.’ So Anselm seems to say: major premise, ‘I have the distinct idea of an infinite, perfect spirit whom I call God.’ Minor premise, ‘A distinct aspect of perfection is existence [a non-existent spirit would hardly be perfect].’ Conclusion, ‘God exists.’

I think there is a serious fallacy here. If we keep the premises and conclusion in the realm of thought, of course, the reasoning is perfect. God exists—in the thinker’s mind. But transfer the subject to apples. I start with two apples in my pocket. They are real in the realm of existent, objective things—whether I think about them or not. For awhile I forget about them and think about two perfect apples in my mind. It is correct to say two apples ‘exist’ as ideas in my mind. But when I go to eating apples, I only have the original two in my pocket. I cannot eat two apples whose existence is solely in my mind. Nor can I add two mental apples to two real ones in my pocket for a sum of four apples in the realm of real, objective things.

So much for this part of Anselm's argument. Early in this chapter we discussed reasons why people do believe in God. Much of this material will be found also in Anselm's argument. In that I judge him to be mainly correct.

All of Anselm's writings have been competently translated into English and published. Read for yourself: Anselm of Canterbury, writings edited and translated by Jasper Hopkins and Herbert Richardson.¹⁰

Argument from Universal Consensus (ex consensu gentium). We have already taken note that there is a universal awareness of God. No section of the human race has been able to shake the notion, 'He is there.' The polytheists of old were convinced of a power above the gods and goddesses of whom they made images and carried in their processions. Some pre-Socratic philosophers spoke of 'God', singular number as in monotheism. From the age of Plato onward Greek literature speaks as easily of ho theos (God) as hoi theoi (gods). Cicero and Seneca assumed a sort of monotheism. Even in the gross animal-worship of Egypt 1,000 years before an henotheism which acknowledged one high god prevailed in court for awhile (thirteenth century bc, Amenhotep IV). In a sense, the very fury of modern atheists (Feuerbach, Lenin, Nietzsche, et al) indicates not so much that there is no God but that many sinful men do not like Him very well.

God as Necessary Postulate (Kant's Argument). A postulate is a necessary assumption demanded by something else that is true. Kant (as do most people if they think about it) held that there is not simply one summum bonum (highest good). Every human being is taught by the moral conscience (1) the fulfilment of duty, and (2) that happiness bonum consummatum (consummate good) is the result of doing the first.

Morality, he agreed, is against human tendency. Morality must often proceed against pleasure. To be honest one must often suffer material loss. Yet my moral sense insists that honesty must be pursued. This requires that a Regulator stand behind the moral sense, one who will make happiness a necessary ultimate concomitant of morality.

Morality is valid for this life. Civilization and personal happiness require it to be so. Therefore, there must be a God who reigns over this state of affairs or else there is no morality in this life. Not that we do good for reward, as such, but we should seek balance between present good and future happiness. No one ever does his duty fully in this life. His impulses and circumstances forbid. Yet he ought to do his duty and for this, besides the existence of God, the moral regulator, two other postulates are necessary; freedom of the human will and immortality.

At this point a digression into the metaphysics, ethics and epistemology of Kant and his post-Kantian successors in the German universities is tempting (Fichte, Schelling, Hegel and Schopenhauer) but unnecessary for present purposes. A consensus prevails among philosophers that Kant redirected philosophy. In some respects he still dominates the field. The late Carl F. H. Henry, for example frequently raised the spectre of Kantian metaphysics and theory of knowledge.

At the age of 57 Emmanuel Kant wrote his first book of world importance, the Critique of Pure Reason in 1781. The Critique of Practical Reason followed in 1788 and the Critique of Judgment in 1790. These volumes are currently available in English translations though few ever aspire to digest their cumbersome content. Their contents however are widely known. My professor of philosophy, the late Allen Miller of Heidelberg College and Edens Seminary devoted considerable class time to Kant's Critiques.

In the first Critique Kant devoted attention to the theistic arguments, which he held to be three, not the usual four, and found them inadequate to prove God's existence. He did express great respect for the argument from design (teleological), for he took notice in the world of signs of order, design and purposiveness. Yet he found these evidences 'insufficient to establish the existence of an infinite Being, i.e. the most real being (ens realissimum).¹¹

In the Critique of Practical Reason, however, Kant thought he established necessity for belief in God on the basis of what he called the categorical imperative. By categorical he meant an unqualified command, morally obligatory upon all whether they obeyed it or not. People everywhere in every age are consciously aware of this imperative. Hence, Kant intended to show that one is justified in postulating God upon the grounds of faith. This 'ideal' is never a part of experienced reality, he asserted, but because the imperative demands our compliance it must be regarded as regulative.

The Critique of Judgment furnishes further reasons to postulate God. Just as the universal feeling of respect for moral law (the Categorical Imperative) so the feeling of respect for beauty, and for the sublime and for design in nature suggest an a priori element in nature. By a priori Kant means present before we mortals experience (see, hear, taste, touch) them. When we do experience (sense) the beauty of an object (though we know not how or why) or stand in awe of the starry sky or reflect on the apparent adaptation of the innumerable parts of nature to some common purpose we are justified in drawing the conclusion (i.e. critique of judgment) that 'my own mind is greater than the universe [within] which it has made in terms of its own perceptual forms.... Likewise the moral law with its postulate of immortality ... suggests I am a being superior to the mechanical world'.¹² Further, 'The beauty and sublimity of nature and the purposiveness of organisms indeed suggest to us that the world may be the production of an infinite Artist, of a genius who has produced it as human artists produce their creations. We may hope that this is true, but we do not know'.¹³

The post-Kantians and philosophers to the present day have worked his system over both with refutation and refinements—but always with respect. His postulate of freedom has taken heavy hits from the materialistic naturalism which has grown in strength since the Enlightenment.¹⁴

Let us close this chapter with an evaluation of the exercises of the mind that we call theistic arguments, or somewhat less accurately, natural theology. Let us acknowledge they are not apodictic, that is, absolute demonstration to every mind as proving 'God is', certainly not 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ'. To reflective minds these evidences provide material for meditation and contemplation, and in the hands of skilful exponents can serve to make the dogmatic atheist appear a bit foolish. So while there is no clear, unambiguous content of saving truth in the theistic arguments, it is proper to exercise the mind in these matters. Orthodox, classical Christian theology says natural theology is profitable in three ways.

(1) The usus paedagogicus, or preparatory value. It is pointed out that these mental exercises help us distinguish God's qualities and attributes. They raise our sense of need for revelation and desire for it. The pagan philosophers unknowingly brought some awareness of need for the God of the Bible and longing for something better than the official religion and the cults provided. (See chapter on preparation for Christ in Part 4: Christology.) Justin Martyr, Origen and Augustine thought so. It is, of course, true that some ancient pagan writers who were touched by Christianity did not see anything they wanted in genuine Christianity (Marcus Aurelius, Julian the Apostate).

(2) The usus didacticus, or teaching use. Good teachers employ thoughts, terms, techniques of non-revelational theology in every age. Even the writers of the New Testament employed (usually with modification and adaptation) ideas and words from philosophical and religious discourse of the world they lived in to teach a revealed theology. Light and darkness, the logos (word) idea, pleroma (fullness) are examples. Even the name kurios (Lord) for Yahweh in the Old Testament and for Jesus in the New Testament is derived from the civil and religious vocabulary of Greek society. The philosophers furnished many categories of thought and logical framework for organizing ideas. Think of Aristotle's formal, efficient and final causes, for example, and such useful tools for analysis as nature, cause, proximate, postulate, axiom, syllogism and the like. Nevertheless, the philosophers could not furnish much valid content, though the framework for organizing thought to which they gave early expression is still with us and every theologian, lay or professional, uses them. In a more special way the Greek philosophers furnished many of the basic canons both of art and music. It has been said, Aristotle cannot be baptized by Christ; i.e. the content of Aristotle's thoughts on metaphysics and ethics cannot be transplanted to Christianity. But insofar as his discoveries in logical methods conformed to reality as God created it, they are useful. In fact those Christian philosophers who reject most of this paragraph use them—knowingly or unknowingly. Barth and Van Til must speak of physis (nature), hypostasis (substance) and ousia (being), terms of natural theology, along with the rest of us.

(3) The usus paedeuticus, or educational value. In a time when preparation for the ministry included education in the Greek and Latin writings of classical antiquity, such authors as Seneca and Marcus Aurelius were read for profit. Even such adherents to the sola scriptura formulas as Luther and Calvin quote them at length. Calvin's first major work was a commentary on Seneca's De Clementia (concerning mercy), published in 1532. The expository method he employed in his pre-conversion days was employed throughout his life in composing the forty-five lengthy books of Commentary which sit on a shelf near my desk. He commented on the De Clementia as a Christian humanist and never repudiated what he said there as far as I know. Though the users may not be aware of it, the commentaries which line the shelves of pastors and professors today perpetuate as well as assimilate both the content and method of Calvin learned from the classical authors—to the immense benefit of the church ever since. Calvin was the first extensive modern commentator on the Bible.

Marcus Aurelius (Meditations)¹⁵ and Seneca (De Clementia) and numerous other classical authors of late antiquity believed in a moral God and insisted on obligation to moral duty. This, while valuable to the soil in which Christian evangelism was planted, could also issue in superstitious thinking and ascetic practices. Apart from the clear light of revelation we may theologize and speak in superstitious patterns and act in a fashion far below revealed patterns of morality. As a religious person I may be a Pharisee, yet even natural theology condemns hypocrisy.

It is evident that, though ‘natural light’ (let us not call it revelation, general or otherwise) has some uses, it is dangerous if pressed to the point of equality with biblical revelation. There is a place in a good housekeeper’s cleaning closet for astringents, powerful soaps and solvents. There is no place for them in the pantry where wholesome foods and seasonings are stored. ‘He that is spiritual’ may use the information and tools supplied by nature (human and otherwise) to explain and organize the truth of the Word of God. Paul, for example, in his famous disquisition on the foolishness of the gospel (1 Cor. 1 and 2) employed the categories of Greek thought furnished by the academy and the stoa to make his points.

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 73.

² Ps. 19:1–6.

³ Reported in The Daily Bread devotional.

⁴ William K. Wright, A History of Modern Philosophy (New York: Macmillan, 1941), p. 211.

⁵ William Wallace, art. ‘Empedocles’, Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed., 1911, vol. 9, p. 345.

⁶ Joseph Addison, 1627–1719, son of an Anglican dean, composer of this hymn, published a series of papers on the subject of this section, entitled ‘Evidences of the Christian Religion’.

⁷ John Gerstner, Reasons for Faith (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1960), p. 39.

⁸ Liddel & Scott, Lexicon.

⁹ Herman Bavinck, The Doctrine of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1951, 1983), pp. 75, 76.

¹⁰ Anselm of Canterbury, four volumes (Toronto and New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1974–1976).

¹¹ W. K. Wright, The History of Modern Philosophy (New York: Macmillan Co., 1941), p. 281.

¹² ibid., p. 291.

¹³ ibid., p. 292.

¹⁴ The most thorough discussion of moral freedom I am aware of is, Moral Freedom vol. iii of his 3 volume Ethics by Nicolai Hartmann (New York: Macmillan Co., 1932, 1962). He holds ‘morality is possible only in a world determined throughout, mentally as well as physically, by the law of cause and effect’.

¹⁵ Marcus Aurelius, Roman Emperor ad 161–180 was one of the few emperors whose writing had permanent value. In his twelve books of Meditations ‘he restated the old doctrines with a new intensity of religious and moral feeling, and in a lapidary style which is all his own; this has made his meditations a breviary for contemplatives throughout the centuries’. ‘Aurelius’, The Oxford Classical Dictionary 2nd ed. edit. N. G. L. Hammon & H. H. Scullard (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1970), pp. 152, 153.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (36). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

How God has Revealed Himself to Mankind

The title of this chapter has to do with the Bible, as such, only in a fractional way. True, God has told us of Himself through the Scriptures and the Scriptures have a unique place in the history of revelation. Yet there were many people who received a saving knowledge of God before there was a syllable of written Holy Scripture (Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abram). Even at the present time there are whole communities of Christian believers wherein only a small minority can read. Yet they have received saving knowledge of God from missionaries and others who have preached the Word to them. Granting that the Bible is now our chief source of knowledge of God, our purpose is to set forth by what variety of means God has made Himself known to people in times past and perhaps presently. To put the matter another way, granting the Bible conveys all the perfect information we have about God, where did the writers learn these things? Further, we are interested in the clarification of the connection of such matters with our belief in God.

Already the language of this chapter has brought us into collision with several theological opinions, for there are many varieties of modern theology which say that even though there must be divine revelation if there is to be salvation, this has nothing at all to do with information about God. The recent books on my shelves specifically treating the problem of the relation of knowledge of or about God to revelation and to the Bible fill several feet of shelf space. I have read most of them and have learned that the majority of these theories assert in one way or another that revelation is an event or ‘constellation’ of events wherein God meets (as event) or speaks directly as Person to person or a group of people. No information is imparted. The Bible is the witness of the people who experienced these ‘revelatory events’. Lectures and books on doctrine from this perspective provide very little information about God, though there are thousands of words. One of the authors says we learn from the Bible mainly in that we must listen carefully as we read Scripture and obey—that is all. Yet he says nothing specific about what one learns therein about God.

The niceties of this argument promise to occupy nimble wits in a rather fruitless debate for another generation, for after more than fifty years of it, the sometimes fierce exchanges seem unabated. This philosophers’ game has given us the ‘God-is-Dead’ movement (of late unlamented memory) and confusing theology in both liberal and conservative churches. As believers in the full trustworthiness of Scripture, should we then take up again where we were before our generation entered this cul-du-sac? I think so.

When I was in college this view was convincingly purveyed to us as krisis theology, also called existential and dialectical theology. In the process of time it was named neo-orthodoxy. It all seemed very reasonable at the time and we learned the key words: eschatological, infinite-qualitative gulf, confrontation, encounter, witness to revelation and at least a dozen more. Then we heard of philosophers named Jaspers and Heidegger and theologians Barth and Brunner, then Tillich, all Europeans. The American teachers who followed them, at least in part, were credible and serious social-theological thinkers—most importantly, Reinhold Niebuhr, a truly original thinker. More recently we have John Macquarrie and many more to read.

These men and their very numerous disciples differ in many and important ways. Several appear to have orthodox views of the Trinity and the Person of Christ, though I have not found one who teaches a doctrine of atonement which regards Christ's work as a propitiation of divine wrath or even centers redemption in the cross as objective reconciliation, much less propitiation of divine law or wrath.

They seem all to agree that there are no objective, factual, revelatory data (propositions) about truth in the Bible ...—even though when it suits their purpose they use the Bible the same way the rest of us do.¹ It has not lost its appeal to many.

About mid-twentieth century John Baillie, Dean of the faculty of Divinity at the University of Edinburgh, admirer of Brunner, authored a survey of recent views of revelation in which he said:

Throughout the greater part of Christian history ... the distinction between revealed and natural or rational knowledge [was commonly made] and an intelligent schoolboy could have told you what the distinction was. He would have explained to you that there are two sharply contrasted ways in which men have gained knowledge of God and things divine—by the unaided exercise of their own powers of thinking, and by direct communication from God Himself. If instead of the schoolboy you had consulted a learned theologian, you would have received very much the same answer.²

After going on to show that even rationalist philosophers took this view of the matter, Baillie pointed out that the Reformers maintained that on account of 'the corruption of human nature ... human reason was now so damaged an instrument as to yield little or no reliable knowledge of things divine'.³

The same distinction held generally (with exceptions) through the nineteenth century.⁴ Presently almost all theologians refer to any knowledge of God among mankind, whether derived from 'natural' sources, and apprehended by innate human powers (natural light), or knowledge of God derived from supernatural sources (revelation) as revelation. The former is designated general revelation and the latter special revelation.⁵ Though one might wish the older, more precise distinction was preserved in present-day theological discourse, the newer is frequently employed in the pages to follow.

To say that God has revealed Himself is not to say that He has exposed Himself. We do not mean that any man, or angel with eyes which transfer impulses from fleshly organs to a fleshy brain, ever has seen that infinite and eternal Spirit whom we call God. '[Y]ou cannot see my face, for man shall not see me and live' (Exod. 33:20) and 'No one has ever seen God' (John 1:18). Granting that certain biblical persons had very special meetings with God (Isaiah, Moses and Paul, among others) and that these disclosures of God are rightly called revelations of a special sort, it is in full keeping with the usage of language and a sound theology to employ reveal and revelation of the making known of truth, fact and information. Revelation in this sense of the word may be a statement of a fact ('In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth') or announcement of abstract truth ('Righteousness exalts a nation'). It may take the form of a command ('Thou shalt not commit adultery'), or of a narrative of past events (the book of Chronicles), or a prediction ('Your God shall come'). Sometimes it is reflection of the human author on spiritual experiences ('The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want').

That God should make Himself known to mankind is antecedently probable. More than one version of the following story illustrates the intrinsic probability of revelation by such a God as the Bible describes. A certain woman from a tribe that had never heard the gospel before listened as the missionary told the grand story. Afterwards she was heard to say: 'I always thought there ought to be a God like that.' The felt need of people everywhere witnesses to the need for a divine revelation.

That there is something in a person which renders revelation not only helpful, appropriate and possible but also necessary, if we are to be fully happy, is illustrated by a story. Helen Keller was blind and deaf and without the sense of smell from the age of two years. In the process of her training she came to the place where she could receive messages and respond with words. After this point in her training (it has been reported) she was told of God, the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. Her immediate response was, 'I always knew He was there but I didn't know His name.' As is generally known, while Miss Keller never became a particularly devout Christian, she was a believer.

According to the Bible, from the time of the fall in Paradise, and ever after, God has sought to make Himself known. The very framework of the Bible, from the story of the dispersion of the human race at Babel, after the Flood, through the story of Abraham and on to the end, is the theme of God's providing both redemption and revelation for mankind. Let us look to the story of the means and modes God employed, together with an estimate in each case of the content, distribution and values of each.

Let us try to think of ourselves as living in a time before a word of the Bible had been written. Let us agree, since God is the kind of Person He is, that it would be entirely in keeping with His character to communicate with the creatures whom He made to be like Himself in some important way. Let us also agree that as sinners we would be utterly hopeless of eternal felicity unless He had provided both knowledge of Himself and redemption. How would God have gone about it?

There is a summary sentence in the New Testament that partially answers this. The passage grandly states that in Old Testament times God spoke through prophets and since then He has spoken by a Son (Heb. 1:1, 2). But how did He speak to the prophets? The text simply says, 'in many ways'. All right then, what were some of these 'many ways'? Also, what sort of information or communication was conveyed? By what means did Cain and Abel learn that God requires sacrifice, or for that matter, requires worship at all? If Enoch walked with God and pleased Him, how did Enoch know what God wanted from him in the first place? If, as Paul says, the heathen suppress certain known truths about God before any missionary even finds them (Rom. 1:18), what is the content of their knowledge of God and how do they apprehend it? There are further questions such as: Are the heathen who never hear the gospel truly lost? How shall we discover a true answer to the question? We shall take the Bible as our guide, as usual in all matters of religious belief, but if so, then the Bible must point beyond itself to certain other sources of information.

1. The Inward Prompting by the Holy Spirit

In the first place, there is strong evidence in the Bible that the Holy Spirit, who does now in a very special way convince people's hearts of sin, has always striven with those hearts. He has used such influences as we can only surmise to prompt members of our fallen race 'that they should seek God, in the hope that they might feel their way toward him and find him' (Acts 17:27, see the context; compare Gen. 6:3). This admirable impulse has not often led to true religion but rather to idolatry and polytheism as well as even baser forms of worship. May it not be said that all the multitude of expressions of worship in false religions in the world has at least this much realized truth at its root?

The papal Roman Church since Vatican II continues to make her exclusive claims as sole sphere of salvation and custodian of divine revelation.⁶ Yet she, consistent with her insistence that human reasoning faculties remain unimpaired by the fall, allows—or at least seems to allow—that without benefit of special revelation human beings can and do know God in a saving way. I quote:

The sacred Synod professes that 'God, the first principle and last end of all things, can be known with certainty from the created world by the natural light of human reason' (cf. Rom. 1:20). It teaches that it is to his Revelation that we must attribute the fact that those things, which in themselves are not beyond the grasp of human reason, can, in the present condition of the human race, be known by all men with ease, with firm certainty, and without the contamination of error.⁷

This is quite in keeping with the latent doctrine of universal salvation prevalent in many Vatican II pronouncements and in the Church Dogmatics of Karl Barth. Several Roman Catholic theologians of world-wide reputation prepared the way for the Vatican II pronouncements and various subsequent official statements.

In any case, if God is, He must not be ignored but worshiped! Jesus spoke of how the Comforter (Holy Spirit) would be sent to convict the world of sin (John 16:7–10), but it is doubtful if Jesus' promise relates to the Spirit's work apart from the preaching of the Word. Aside from that promise, it has been argued from John 1:9 that Christ the eternal Logos (Word) has always been lighting every person 'coming into the world' and that such is the meaning of Micah 5:2, 'one ... whose origin is from old, from ancient days'. Whether or not these texts teach such a doctrine, which is doubtful, the presence of God's Spirit in the world has always been, through what some teachers call God's 'common grace', an influence for good and a restraint on evil. In this way God tells the heathen mother, for example, to care for her helpless infant and not only instructs the civil magistrate to restrain violent men but moves the common man to obey the magistrate, at least most of the time.

J.O. Buswell, a trusted writer, says,

In my opinion the convicting work of the Holy Spirit in the world in general, is a work upon the hearts of all men prior to either faith or regeneration, a work wherein not only is the gospel freely offered to all, but all are brought to a point of enablement to such a degree that, if having been convicted, they reject the Grace of God thus offered to them, but they are subject to the eternal wrath and curse of God because they have not believed

(John 3:18), and because they ‘have not received the knowledge of the truth ... but have taken pleasure in unrighteousness’ (2 Thess. 2:10–12).⁸

Dr Buswell admits that his idea, rather timidly advanced, lacks clear scriptural support.

This teaching seems to carry the matter too far. I find it hard to adjust to the clear teaching of Romans 10:11–17, that preaching of the Word is necessary for people to know anything at all of a saving gospel and, elsewhere, Dr Buswell grants this.

2. God Reveals Himself Through what He has made

God has certainly revealed Himself through the material ‘heavens and earth’ which He has made. As noted earlier, older theologians call this ‘the light of nature’.

The Bible is very clear as to the fact that nature does have something to say to people about their Creator. Some of the affirmations are clothed in the beautiful poetry of the Psalms. Psalm 104 speaks of the clouds as God’s garments (v. 2), and of beams of light shining through them as beams of His chamber (v. 3). The rest of the Psalm declares how, in detail, all aspects of nature are God’s work in creation, preservation and government. They are all, including mankind and human works, God’s works (vv. 24, 31). The Psalmist’s reflections on nature call attention to God’s greatness, His honor and majesty (v. 1; cf. 86:8); God’s manifold wisdom and great riches (v. 24); His eternal glory (v. 31); and God’s joy in His works in nature. Just as a man, made in God’s likeness, rejoices in doing and making things, so the Creator rejoices eternally in His works. The discerning believer, by means of this revelation, understands his dependence on God and the importance of praiseful worship of God while life shall last (v. 33). He also understands the unnaturalness of the presence of sin and of sinners in God’s perfect creation (v. 35a).

Several ancient manuscripts make the anonymous Psalm 104 a continuation of Psalm 103, thus like 104 a Psalm of David. David the shepherd and king, sweet psalmist of Israel, was keenly appreciative of the lineaments of God visible in nature. He lived in primary relation with nature. He fed sheep; he saw stars at night; he planted his feet in the rocky soil whenever he went some place. Few people today live close to nature. Even farmers nowadays are only slightly in this primary relation to nature—many care for no animals, the mercury lamp steals their view of stars at night and protected both from cold and heat in the cab of their farm tractors, they seldom walk very far on their acres. But David considered (Ps. 8:3) the daily and nightly parade of God’s material accomplishments in earth and sky and wrote the nineteenth Psalm:

The heavens declare the glory of God;
and the firmament sheweth his handywork.
Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.
no speech nor language,

their voice is not heard.⁹

The message from and about God is the same as that of Psalm 104, but we learn also that the message goes forth constantly, day and night (v. 2). Significantly, the point is made that since nature's testimony is a silent one (v. 3, see asv, nasb, rsv) people may ignore it and do ignore it, even though God holds them responsible to heed it.

That God holds people thereby responsible for their unbelief and disobedience is the important addition to these truths made by Paul's Epistle to the Romans:

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who by their unrighteousness suppress the truth. For what can be known about God is plain to them, because God has shown it to them. For his invisible attributes, namely, his eternal power and divine nature, have been clearly perceived, ever since the creation of the world, in the things that have been made. So they are without excuse. For although they knew God, they did not honour him as God or give thanks to him, but they became futile in their thinking, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Claiming to be wise, they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles (Rom. 1:18–23).

All the truth about the light of nature pointed out in Psalms 104 and 19 (Ps. 8 and others could be read also) is here in Paul's Epistle. The frightening addition is that human beings, as rational, responsible persons, must bear the full weight of responsibility for responding righteously to the knowledge which God has imparted. However, they do not do so. They, in fact, without exception, have suppressed the truth (v. 18) and in spite of the truth of God's invisible, immortal nature, have practiced idolatry. They are therefore 'without excuse' (v. 20) and 'the wrath of God is revealed' in Scripture and conscience, as we shall see, against them. They have presently been abandoned to follow out their unrighteous decisions: 'God gave them up' (v. 24); 'For this reason God gave them up to dishonourable passions' (v. 26); 'And since they did not see fit to acknowledge God, God gave them up to a debased mind to do what ought not to be done' (v. 28).

What then is the content of nature's message about God? It tells of His greatness, His honour and majesty. It displays the riches of His wisdom, and great glory together with His joy in creating such wonders. Such revelations teach also the utter inappropriateness of sin and of the presence of sinners in God's world. They have no rightful place here. Practically speaking, though a source of great pleasure for redeemed people, nature's message to sinners is, in part, one of damnation—though one shrinks from saying it.

There is a message of God's goodness (benevolence) in nature, as Psalm 104 hinted. It is muted, however, for nature provides earthquakes, tornadoes, pestilences and floods, too. The gifts of sun, wind, rain, fertile soil, fruitful seasons fill people's 'hearts with food and gladness', as Paul says elsewhere (Acts 14:17). The goodness of God ought to bring me to repentance (Rom. 2:4), but sadly it rarely does so (Rom. 2:5).

3. God employs Mankind's Own Personal, Moral and Rational Nature

A further mode God has employed in speaking to the sinful race in all ages is to employ mankind's own personal, moral and rational nature.

Certain philosophers, from ancient times, have sought to begin their search for ultimate truths by searching their own hearts and minds. ‘Know thyself’ and ‘I think, therefore I am’ are famed expressions of this method. John Calvin wrote at the opening of his great work of doctrine,

No one can look upon himself without immediately turning his thoughts to contemplation of God in whom he ‘lives and moves’ [Acts 17:28]. For, quite clearly, the mighty gifts with which we are endowed are hardly from ourselves; indeed, our very being is nothing but subsistence in the one God. Then by these benefits shed like dew from heaven upon us, we are led as by rivulets to the spring itself.¹⁰

Calvin’s logic is correct, but it is regenerate, sanctified logic. Only Scripture and agencies derived from Scripture speak plainly of mankind’s being, specifically of this rational and moral nature, as being a source of common knowledge of God.

We must start with the fact that mankind was created originally in God’s likeness. The likeness is chiefly, though certainly not exclusively, our personal, rational and moral nature. Though marred by the fall and as to holiness and love for God, wholly spoiled, the image remains. It is mankind’s present possession of that likeness which renders murder a heinous crime (Gen. 9:6) and slander or malicious cursing of other people a vicious iniquity (James 3:8–10). People do legitimately reason of God’s nature from their own. Their common mistake has been to impute God-likeness to their corruptible bodies and to make a visible, physical, corrupt God in their own physical image.

Others (we think of some of the best representatives of ancient Greek philosophy) knew God to be a universal, free spirit, and cautiously said so, even though it was dangerous to deny the prevailing idolatry. Socrates, for example, was executed for atheism. Paul was understood when he appealed to the Greeks on the basis of their God-likeness to see the stupidity of their idolatry (Acts 17:22–34, especially verses 28 and 29). Idol worship turns God into the image of mankind and others of God’s creatures.

So we may be sure that Paul was understood also when he wrote: ‘when Gentiles, who do not have the law, by nature do what the law [Moses’ law] requires ... They show that the work of the law is written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness, and their conflicting thoughts accuse or even excuse them on that day when ... God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 2:14–16). Some moral standards are written on people’s hearts. They know that right and wrong exist; they know what some of the standards are and they know they ought to do right. When they act in a manner that their own standards approve they have good conscience—one that is painless, non accusing—and conversely when they violate their own standards they feel accused by painful conscience. They sense the sanctions of a righteous God threatening them on the Judgment Day.

Thus people everywhere can know and we may presume generally do know that God is, like themselves, a moral being; also that, unlike themselves, He is entirely righteous. On other grounds, they know Him to be Creator and hence moral Governor of all people. Therefore, they expect a judgment day when they must face God, even though they are afraid of Him. ‘It is appointed for man to die once, and after that comes judgment', though a biblical quotation has been written in the sub-consciousness, if not the consciousness, of every human being. The whole existence of ancient Egypt's reigning elite, no less, was self-regulated in order to come off well in that judgment. Hence, the national wealth came to be devoted to funeral arrangements and memorials.

It is now time to pause for certain reflections. Nothing we have turned up thus far informs people that God is gracious, that He has redeemed them or that He loves them. The promptings of the Spirit in His works of common grace, whereby He preserves human society from utter corruption and self-destruction, perhaps hint at His love. However, nature frowns about as much as she smiles and no prosecutor or judge can be more unrelentingly antagonistic than 'guilty' conscience. We turn now to some of the modes of information whereby God conveys His message of love, of grace and of redemption.

4. God's Original and Direct Revelation

God made Himself known to all subsequent generations of mankind when He spoke to our first parents through original and direct revelation. This may have continued awhile, for some people still 'walked with God' (Gen. 5:22; 6:9) and conversed with Him (Gen. 3:8–4:15) through the antediluvian epoch. Here is how one orthodox writer presents this information and supports it.

The Bible indicates that God revealed Himself to mankind at the beginning of human history, and that He hath not left Himself [in any age or place] without a witness (Acts 14:16, 17). There is corroborative data in the study of comparative religious and cultural anthropology, indicating that the oldest religious traditions are the nearest to biblical theism. The scriptural teaching on primitive revelation [i.e. original and direct] must be considered.... There is generally among primitive peoples some trace or tradition of knowledge of the true God.^{11}

A century ago there was considerable emphasis on primitive revelation as enduring through time. One of the most cogent and balanced of the era, W. G. T. Shedd (1820–1894), devoted eight pages of his Dogmatic Theology (I, 201–208) to survival of primitive revelation in the universal consciousness of mankind. All sound theology must deal with Paul's clear doctrine of apostasy from primitive revelation (Rom. 1:18–32). A text prescribed for my college course in apologetics by Fr. W. Schmidt of Vienna summarized evidence derived from researches among every known kind of primitive society for existence of the 'highest God' of monotheism in their religious heritage. No society apparently—or at least no known societies—are without it. Monotheism might be a universal inference; it might also be an inheritance from the beginning of the race.^{12} Schmidt's book is a very impressive work, not superseded, as far as I can determine.

Some modern psychological theory makes much of alleged innate memory of race experience. Sometimes this is called primal history, or Urgeschichte. The Bible does not either affirm or deny this but the unity of humankind in being essentially one biological family suggests that certain traditions would be passed down to us all—or nearly all. I cite a striking personal example. There is in the Culver family an interesting tradition at least 1,300 years old, though I discovered it only recently. My father's given name was Cyniard. He never liked the name and always wondered where it came from. He knew only that he was named for a distant relative of his grandfather's generation, but he did not know that he, himself, was of English descent, a tenth generation American of the Culver family, likely through Governor John Winthrop, the elder, and that Culver is an old Saxon name. In 1973, in reading the first volume of Trevelyan's History of England, I found my father's given name, Cyniard, attached to a young king of the Saxon kingdom of Mercia, in Great Britain. The mystery was solved—at least for me. A fragment of culture from our ancestors in continental Saxon Germany still survives, for a grandson and a great-grandson bear my father's first name. We can pass tradition on for thousands of years without knowing we do. Some words of common English speech, for example, can be traced to sources thousands of years removed. All language is populated with verbal fossils of remote antiquity.

Perhaps most of the best ideas people have about God have come to us in this manner. My own teacher of theology thought that 'most of what men believe about God has come to us in this way'. He thought it accounts for the truths in ethnic religions, though garbled, misunderstood and corrupted.

There is no evidence that God communicates with people today in any reportable manner. For good reasons we live under a 'silent heaven', walking wholly by 'faith and not by sight'.¹³

Later we shall study God's providence. Providence is God's general direction of history and there is also His special control, which we call the miraculous.

5. God Reveals Himself in Special Works

Hence we may speak of how God has revealed Himself in special providential and miraculous works. Sometimes we do not know if some extraordinary event falls in the category of God's ordinary working (the 'laws' of nature) or His special working (miracles). The distinction, however, is valid and, in either case, what God does says something about Him. If, as some claim, it was a landslide that cut off the waters of Jordan when the Israelites passed through, or a natural wind which parted the Red Sea, it was God's omniscient, omnipotent working in a special providence. We truly do not know how He works in either creation or providence, as the Almighty overwhelmingly reminded Job (Job 38, 39). We know no more about how God performs miracles.

We do not know whether the first plagues of Egypt came of natural causes or not; their timing certainly did not. God's power operated in either case for special reasons. One of them was to teach Pharaoh and all the nations who heard the report of them. Pharaoh had said, 'Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice' (Exod. 5:2). But the Lord said, 'I will ... multiply my signs and wonders in the land of Egypt ... The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch out my hand against Egypt' (Exod. 7:3–5, see also verse 17). God purposed that Pharaoh and all of his people would learn some things about the Lord God of the Hebrews. Moses said to the Egyptian king during one of the plagues, 'I will stretch out my hands to the Lord. The thunder will cease, and there will be no more hail, so that you may know that the earth is the Lord's' (Exod. 9:29 emphasis added).

Not only so, by those events the people of God of that generation and all later generations were to be taught (as we now are being taught) about God: 'Then the Lord said to Moses, "Go in to Pharaoh, for I have hardened his heart and the heart of his servants, that I may show these signs of mine among them, and that you may tell in the hearing of your son and of your grandson how I have dealt harshly with the Egyptians and what signs [miracles] I have done among them, that you may know that I am the Lord' (Exod. 10:1–2 emphasis added).

Throughout biblical and Christian history God's people have learned many things about their God through the biblical miracles and providences of God. The prophets frequently rebuked Israel of old for forgetting about God's miracles of deliverance or for misinterpreting them.¹⁴

From these texts and others the reader of the Bible will learn or have confirmed several things about God. Israel discovered that their God never fails to keep a promise. They came to understand, as David (quoted by Lincoln with reference to divine providences in the American Civil War): 'the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether' (Ps. 19:9 kjv). We may be sure that God still reigns. By His reign He taught England and Wellington on the one hand and France and Bonaparte on the other by the battle of Waterloo, as later all the nations in the great wars of the twentieth century. God speaks to us also through raindrops and wild flowers, and all the true discoveries of science, as Tennyson wrote in 1869:

Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies,
I hold you here, root in all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.

6. The Message that Comes from God through Scripture

In a special category, because it is a perfect revelation and includes all the others, is the message from God that comes to people through the Holy Scriptures. Extended discussion of this belongs to another locus of doctrine, but several observations about the Bible as a source of truth about God are appropriate here.

The Bible claims to be not one but a series of messages about God, beginning with the earliest prophetic deliverances of the Old Testament through the last of our Lord's apostolic witnesses (Heb. 1:1, 2; 2:1–4). The gospel of Christ was promised in the Old Testament (John 5:39; Rom. 1:1–3), and fulfilled and spelled out plainly in the New Testament (Rom. 1:15–17; cf. Luke 24:25–27, 44–47). The Scriptures are a complete guide to what we must believe as well as all the information we need for service and holy living (2 Tim. 3:16, 17). There is also imponderable, mysterious power in the Scriptures, when read in the vernacular language of any people, and made known by preaching and teaching. That power will convert and reform individuals while also improving and refining their morals, manners, economy and material culture. Such is the power in the Bible, the written Word of God (see Rom. 10:9–17; Heb. 4:12; 1 Peter 1:23–25).

7. God's Unique Revelation in His Son

God has revealed Himself uniquely in His Son, the Second Person of the Godhead, our Lord Jesus Christ: ‘God who in many parts and many manners spake in time past to the fathers by the prophets has at the last spoken to us by a son’ (Heb 1:1, 2 literal translation). The Greek text does not furnish ‘The’ or ‘His’ before huiō, son. The point of emphasis is that though revelation in the old dispensation had been through authentic prophets, in the new dispensation revelation came through one of a superior order, that is a Son of God not a son of man. (It is a subtle point not missed by commentators on the Greek text even though suspect by some not competent in such matters.) His very name, Immanuel, means ‘God with us’ (Isa. 7:14). John wrote: ‘the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we have seen his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father.... No one has ever seen God; the only God [the only begotten Son (kjv)], who is at the Father’s side, he has made him known’ (John 1:14, 18).

This revelation stands apart from all the others, the end of all searching, the consummation of all hope for finding God or of His finding us. Jesus Christ provides a perfect revelation in that it is complete and final. When God had finished speaking through our Lord there was nothing more to say; so the risen, ascended Christ ‘sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high’ (Heb. 1:3; cf. Col. 2:9; John 14:8–19; 16:12–15). His work as revelator was essentially finished.

We shall yet learn more of our Lord when we see Him face to face, for there is more of His ‘grace ready to be revealed’ (1 Peter 1:5 rsv). However, God presently has no new avenues of revelation to open. In a certain way, this is true of the Scriptures. There are no new verses or chapters to be written, but it is possible every time we read the Bible or hear it expounded we may notice a new-to-me fact or gain new insight into truth only dimly perceived before.

As we reflect on the variety of modes of acquiring knowledge of God discussed in this chapter, it becomes apparent that very little of God’s grace and redemption are known to us apart from the three last mentioned: God’s providential and miraculous works, the Scriptures, and the Lord Jesus Christ. The other sorts of revelation, each valid in some circumscribed way, are inadequate, being both partial and obscure. All of them must be tested and judged by Scripture. Each achieves a normative, dependable status only as interpreted by Scripture. The Bible and Christ alone are complete and perfect while only Christ speaks about God (or anything else, for that matter) in a final way.

In an important sense, all revelation is by Jesus Christ, the ‘founder and perfecter of our faith’, for He provided all the others, being the Creator of both universe and mankind (John 1:1–3). He was the Giver of that original revelation, and the experiences of Israel whereby they through providence learned of God (see 1 Cor. 10:1–3). His Spirit also gave us the Holy Scriptures (1 Peter 1:10, 11).

The Bible also obviously occupies a unique place in revelation. Its report of primeval, original revelation, while incomplete, is sufficient for all the information we need to have and the only dependable one we have. The Bible includes some of each of the others. The Bible bears to us all we need for life and godliness (2 Tim. 3:16, 17; cf. 2 Peter 1:3), and it interprets them properly. Christian understanding of the Bible grows in individual lives and through the generations of readers and scholars in the history of the church. Furthermore, the only truly authentic report we have of the person and redeeming work of Christ is found in the Bible. Without the Holy Scriptures we could not know truth about Him unmixed with error. So, even though our faith for salvation is wholly on Christ, we learn of Him in the Bible:

Jesus loves me this I know

For the Bible tells me so!

And, though ‘If anyone hears my voice’, said the risen Christ to John the Revelator, ‘and opens the door, I will come in to him’ (Rev. 3:20), the voice with which he speaks always expresses the truths of the words of Holy Scripture. In addition, amazingly throughout our lives the Bible seems to speak in the language of the particular translation in which we first heard and read the Bible.

¹ This prevalent brand of theology was thoroughly explained to evangelical readers in a book sponsored by The Evangelical Theological Society by Paul King Jewett, Emil Brunner’s Concept of Revelation (London: James Clark & Co., 1954).

² John Baillie, The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought (New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1956, 1958), pp. 3, 4.

³ ibid., p. 8.

⁴ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957, reprint of 1878 ed.), pp. 53–64 and article ‘Natural Theology’ in McClintock & Strong Cyclopaedia, vol. vi (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1968–70), pp. 862–864.

⁵ G. C. H. Berkouwer, General Revelation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1955, 1971) pursues this matter through debates of modern times. Excellent articles are ‘General Revelation’, by B. A. Demarest and ‘Special Revelation’, by Carl F. H. Henry, both in the Evangelical Dictionary of Theology.

⁶ Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, Vatican II, Dei Verbum, 18 November, 1965 (Vatican Collection, Vatican Counsel II, 1975, 1996), vol. ii, chapters I–III.

⁷ See Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, Vat. II, Dei Verbum, 18 November, 1965, VCVI vol i, p. 752.

⁸ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion vol. iii (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), p. 157.

⁹ Psalm 19:1–3 kjv with italicized words of v. 3 removed.

¹⁰ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, Vol. I (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), I, 1.1.

¹¹ J. O. Buswell, op. cit., p. 159.

¹² W. Schmidt, The Origin and Growth of Religion, Facts and Theories, trans. H. F. Rose (New York: Dial Press, 1935), 302 pages.

¹³ The Silence of God is the title of a very influential book, reprinted through most of the twentieth century. ‘God is silent now because He has spoken his last word of mercy and love in Christ’ says the author. Reprint: Sir Robert Anderson, The Silence of God (Grand Rapids: Kregel Publications, n.d.), 215 pages.

¹⁴ Some other Scripture passages that discuss this matter are Deut. 4:33–35; 7:8, 9; Josh. 4:23, 24; Isa. 45:1–6; Ezek. 11:9, 10; and John 10:38.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (44). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

7

The Names of God

We do not read far in the Old Testament until we learn that personal names and many other proper names are important. They are important because they have meaning. Each name has some special meaning obvious to the ancient Hebrews who read the Bible in its original language. For example, the first human name, Adam, is the word for ‘ground’, ‘soil’, ‘earth’, signifying that the human body is taken from natural elements in the soil. Eve (Ava) means ‘life’, signifying she is mother of all the people who ever lived. Cain means ‘smith’ (metal-worker), indicating the origin of metallurgy among his progeny. David means ‘beloved’, Solomon, ‘peace’, and so on. Some names indicate something the one who bestowed it hoped would develop in the character or history of the person designated. Since many of our personal names have their meanings in forgotten stages of our own language, dead languages or foreign languages, we do not know the meaning of the names we bear, though they do designate their bearers. George, for example, designates my friend the Culligan man. But hardly anybody knows that George (every consonant and vowel pronounced) is a Greek word for ‘farmer’, rendered ‘husbandman’ in kjv. A number would do almost as well. Gail and Charis mean ‘Joy’ in Hebrew and ‘Grace’ in Greek. But while my friends Joy and Grace know the meanings of their names, Gail and Charis do not.

When we speak or write about God and when we address Him, we must employ some name or name-like term. God, Elohim and Jehovah have already appeared above. Surely we ought to learn the names by which God prefers to be known and addressed—His own self-designated names. These will be found in each case to indicate some important characteristic of God or information about Him.

Several of God’s names arose out of believers’ experiences with Him. They give insights to God’s ways of dealing with us. All of this class of names are compound, such as Jehovah-Jireh (the Lord will provide) and Jehovah-Tsidkenu (the Lord our righteousness). Theological writers emphasize that these are the ones that most distinctly draw analogies between human beings and the creator-God, i.e. they are most distinctly anthropomorphic. Space does not allow us to treat them here.

The origin of the commonest of God’s names is now lost, for the most part. Where the names came from is less important than what they mean. The meaning of some is a matter of special revelation. Some appear to have been long employed before Abraham and Moses. All of them interest us as preliminary statements of God’s attributes.

St Jerome, following Jewish custom of the time, said there were properly ten biblical names of God.¹ Jerome listed them as El, Elohim, Eloha, Sabaoth, Elyon, Esher Ehye, Adonai, Yah, Yhwh (Jehovah, Yahweh), Shaddai. These are indeed some important Old Testament names. This variety does not carry over to the New Testament except as the writers reflect the Old Testament. Several adjectives, such as almighty, and metaphors, such as shepherd, appear.

There is, however, a poetic chapter of the Bible that, in a beautiful way, uses almost all the most important Old Testament names. In this chapter Moses employs names for God which arose among people who had learned about God as He ‘walks in the midst of your camp’ (Deut. 23:14). These names we may suppose as arising somewhat as nicknames are invented spontaneously by the common people—‘Old Hickory’ (Andrew Jackson), ‘Honest Abe’ (Abraham Lincoln), ‘Slick Willy’. In our high school the principal was a prim lady of near retirement age who was regularly to be seen padding about halls and rooms in soft-soled shoes. Though we called her ‘Mrs Hathaway’ when brought to her presence, her name among all students was ‘Old Pussy Foot’. She never heard it, but from the standpoint of those beneath her authority, it fit exactly.

We shall treat most of the names within the framework of that chapter. Two current, readily accessible treatments, each entitled ‘The Names of God’, are recommended as guides to the subject and relevant literature.²

The Song of Moses—a Mine of Information About God’s Names

Near the end of his life, Moses, the great lawgiver, delivered a series of sermons to his people, the children of Israel. They had conquered Trans-Jordan. They were poised to invade Canaan under fresh leadership. Before taking leave to die and go home to God, Moses composed a song which he recited before the assembled tribes. We have it in Deuteronomy 32:1–43. Most of the common Old Testament names of God appear in the first fifteen verses.

1. YHWH (Deut. 32:3, 6, 9, 12, 19, 27, 30, 36 kjv usually Lord), from the Old Testament point of view, is the only proper name of the national God of Israel. Therefore, it is not surprising it appears most frequently—nearly 7,000 times and almost 1,000 times in Psalms alone. Yah (Jah kjv) is an abbreviated form of this name. The Tetragrammaton (YHWH) is the focal point on which the document-development theory of the authorship of the Pentateuch (Graf-Wellhausen) developed over the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

In abbreviated form (iah, Je, Jeho, jah), this name is very common in theophoric Old Testament names. Ahaziah suffixes the name to Ahaz whereas Jehoahaz prefixes the name. Elijah joins two names for God ('my God is jah').

'For I will proclaim the name of [Jehovah]' (Deut. 32:3). This is the personal, proper name Israel had for their God. Later in the song, Moses says, 'For [Jehovah] ... shall judge his people' (v. 36 kjv), showing again the special character of the name as personal and as of meaning to His people. The word judge here means mainly 'to rule as a magistrate'. See also verses 12 and 19. After the exile this came to be regarded with such a nearly superstitious reverence it was thought to be dangerous even to pronounce it ('for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that takes his name in vain', Exod. 20:7). Therefore, the correct pronunciation of YHWH, God's personal and covenant name, was lost forever. Ancient Hebrew was spelled without vowels. In medieval times Jewish scholars supplied the vowels to the text and for YHWH supplied the vowels of Adonai (Lord), which they read to the present day. When these vowels are read with YHWH an approximation of 'Jehovah' comes out. This word, now for centuries firmly in the idiom, is not likely to be replaced in Bible-related speech. Scholars suppose Yahweh to be nearer the original pronunciation, and is now commonly used in scholarly literature, though this is far from certain. What is called Sephardic (similar to Arabic) pronunciation of Hebrew was followed by most Christian scholars until the influence of Yiddish on modern Israeli Hebrew caused Ashkenazic pronunciation to prevail in scholarly circles. So there are variant pronunciations of the transliterated (supposed) original. While 'Jehovah' is certainly incorrect it does have the advantage of long established use.

When God explained the meaning of the name to Israel He emphasized connection with: (1) God's promises—He has come to fulfill the promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the national patriarch; (2) God's presence—God said He would be with Moses and His people, Israel; (3) God's salvation (deliverance)—the Israelites were to be rescued from the bondage in Egypt; and (4) God's provision for every one of their needs. See Exodus 3:1–22 and 6:1–8.

It is not surprising, then, that when Moses got around to writing the first books of our Bible, the name YHWH was employed most frequently of God when reporting His saving work on behalf of His people. This name is in the Hebrew name 'Joshua' (Jehoshua / Greek, Jesus), which means, 'Jehovah saves' (see Matt. 1:21).³

2. Elohim (Elo-him) (Deut 32:3, 15, 17) is pronounced El-o-heem. In 'Ascribe greatness to our God!' (verse 3 emphasis added) 'God' is Elohim'. From the biblical point of view, 'This name properly represented One only Being, who revealed Himself to man as creator, ruler, and Lord. It was His own peculiar title, and ought to have been confined to Him.⁴ We do not know what language was spoken in Eden, but Elohim, or its equivalent in that language, is represented as the proper designation of the Creator. It is the only one used in the first chapter of Genesis. An older standard work on the name states:

In after ages the worship of the Creator as Elohim began to be corrupted. The Name, indeed was retained, but the nature of Him who bore it was well-nigh forgotten. When men were divided into different nations, and spoke various dialects and languages, they must have carried with them those notions of Elohim which they had inherited from their fathers, but the worship which was due to Him alone was in the lapse of ages transferred to the souls of the departed, to the sun, moon, and stars, and even idols made by men's hands.⁵

Recent researches of critical scholars neither confirm nor dislodge Girdlestone's dictum. Some authorities, however, suggest that Elohim, its singular form Eloah, and the elemental form El, are simply generic words for deity as our English word, 'god'. When used by Christians and in Scripture translation it is capitalized God only when referring to the one true God. It is doubtful if the Northwest Semitic word for deity was employed in Eden. At any rate we learn of 'strange' Elohim (Gen. 35:1–4). When Rachel ran away with her father Laban's images he demanded his Elohim back (Gen. 31:19, 30). Jacob, who did not regard them as genuine deities, nevertheless, for purposes of communication, used Laban's word (v. 32). The case is about the same with the word 'prophet'. There were genuine prophets in Old Testament times, men who spoke for God authentically. Hundreds who were inauthentic claimed to be God's prophets. So even the true prophets, for purposes of communication, called the false prophets by the same name (Hebrew navi) as the genuine (see 1 Kings 18:19; Jer. 28:1–6, 16, 17).

Elohim is God's title, meaning deity. Jehovah is His personal name. In keeping with this, people in the Scriptures say, 'my Elohim', but never 'my Jehovah'. He is 'the Elohim of Israel', but never 'the Jehovah of Israel'.

Later on in Moses' song there are examples of the use of this word Elohim as a 'courtesy title' for heathen deities (non-deities) while in fact reserving the title for the God of heaven and earth whose name is Jehovah:

Then he [Jehovah] will say, 'Where are their gods [Elohim], the rock in which they took refuge ...

Let them rise up and help you;

let them be your protection!

See now that I, even I, am he,

and there is no god [Elohim] beside me;

I kill and I make alive;

I wound and I heal;

and there is none that can deliver out of my hand' (Deut. 32:37–39).

There is a singular form of this name for God, Eloah. It appears for the first time in Scripture in this chapter (v. 15) and about fifty other times in the entire Old Testament, usually in poetry. Elohim occurs hundreds of times, being the commonest word for deity.

3. Hats-tsur, the Rock. Rock is a transparent figure employed as a name of God (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18, 30, 31), as in 'The Rock, his work is perfect' (v. 4). That this is a name for Israel's God and ours ought to be acknowledged. Various translations (kjv, rsv, asv and others) capitalize the first letter, as in all proper nouns. The word means rock, cliff or bedrock, such as is a quarry site (see Isa. 51:1). Throughout this song hats-tsur, the Rock, stands for the great stability of God, His sole reality as God. It is used in apposition with Jehovah, Elohim and El (vv. 3, 4, 17–19, 30, 31). He is the only One who is real and therefore the only sound foundation for the life of a person or a nation. His work is perfect (v. 4).

He is, as the Rock, the source of salvation for sinful people, 'the Rock of his salvation' (v. 15). David prayed to the Rock in Ps. 19:14: 'Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in your sight, O Lord, my rock (tsur) and my redeemer.' The word for 'rock' is exactly the same as in Deuteronomy 32 and the word for redeemer is the same in every way as in Job 19:25, in each case receiving an initial capital letter as a proper noun. It should be the same in Psalm 19:14—'Lord, my rock and my redeemer' (emphasis added).

This name is specially connected with our Lord in His pre-incarnate capacity as the Jehovah, the God of Israel. Referring to the wilderness journeys of Israel, Paul says: 'our fathers ... all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank from the spiritual Rock that followed them, and the Rock was Christ' (1 Cor. 10:1, 3, 4). Moses spoke to one earthly rock and struck another in frustrated anger. In each case water came out. But neither was a 'Rock that followed them'. That Rock was the Rock, Jehovah-Jesus, of Deuteronomy 32! Paul is affirming not the typical presence of Christ, but the real presence of Christ with Old Testament believers as He is today with us. There ever has been only one Mediator of salvation: 'For no one can lay a foundation other than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. 3:11). In the words of William O. Cushing's hymn,

Oh safe to the Rock that is higher than I,

My soul in its conflicts and sorrows would fly;

So sinful, so weary, Thine, Thine would I be;

Thou blest Rock of Ages, I'm hiding in Thee.

'Rock' as a name for God is the most prominent of several inanimate objects of God's creation, which, by analogy, are employed as name or name-like designations for Him. They are all metaphors. Some of them are the sun (Ps. 84:11), a light (Ps. 27:1), a lamp (Rev. 21:23), a fire (Heb. 12:29), a tower (Prov. 18:10), a shadow (Ps. 91:1; 121:5). There are many more.

4. El, the Mighty One. This name (with or without the definite article), and found in Deuteronomy 32:4, 18, 21, usually designates the true God, as in verse 4: ‘A God [’El] of faithfulness and without iniquity, just and upright is he.’ Sometimes as in verse 12, ‘no foreign god [’El] was with him’, the word is used of the non-gods of the heathen. This word is likely derived from a verb meaning to be strong, to be in front of, hence ‘the mighty One’.

Unlike the similar word, Elohim, this name is often joined with a separate word, Elyon, another name of God. So we read of ‘God Most High’ (Gen. 14:18, and frequently elsewhere), ‘God Almighty’ (El Shaddai, Gen. 17:1), ‘the God of Bethel’ (El Beth El, Gen. 31:13), ‘the God of your father’ (El-Abikha, Gen. 49:25).

In Exodus 34:6, 7 El is used with a whole constellation of names for God and name-like adjectives: ‘The Lord, a God [’El, a Mighty One] merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, but who will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers on the children and the children’s children, to the third and fourth generation.’ This statement is without parallel in Scripture.

5. Father. ‘[I]s not he thy father that hath bought thee’ (Deut 32:6 kjv)? Only nasb of standard English Versions capitalizes ‘father’ here. Keil’s translation in his commentary does so also. Moses is referring to the fact that their God, like a father who begets a child, had brought them into existence as a people, thus calling to remembrance all their past history from Abraham onward. The conservative scholars who gave us nasb have no objection to a doctrine of divine fatherhood as early as Moses. Isaiah 63:16 twice calls God Father—one more loyal than Father Abraham—and Redeemer. Even rsv is willing to have ‘Father’ be a name for God by Isaiah’s time, but strangely not neb. See also Isaiah 64:8 and Malachi 2:10. God is Father in the thinking and affection of Christians because we learn from the example of Jesus (Luke 23:34; John 17:1, 5), His instruction for prayer (Matt. 6:6, 8, 9) and His regular references to God in this way. The opening verses of nineteen of the Epistles of the New Testament refer trustingly to God in this way.

Some of the latest generations of scholars and their students have difficulty accepting the ‘fatherhood of God’, regarding it as a sexist anthropomorphism. Earlier Modernists promoted the idea as the very crowning contribution of Christianity. A brief comment on the subject at this point is appropriate, where the idea is put by scholars in its clearest and most favourable light. Obviously God is not a literal father. He does not literally impregnate females as human males do. Yet the word ‘father’ conveys knowledge of God to us sinners which, though partial and inadequate as such, is nevertheless true, dependable, useful, sufficient for our present state and satisfying to our hearts.

Anything which God has made has pertinence to Him. Anthropomorphisms and other metaphors employ that truth. Scripture never attributes a body, as such, to God but just about every human bodily member or part is applied in figure of speech to God. Yet God is pure spirit (John 4:24). Some of the physical features of human constitution applied to Him are face, eyes, eyelids, ears, mouth, tongue, lips and bosom. So also are human emotions such as grief, regret, anger, fear, compassion, mercy, grace, jealousy, hatred, love and wrath. All imply change and some even misery in the Godhead, yet we know that God does not change (James 1:17) and that He is always perfectly blessed (Rom. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:15).

Furthermore, in the pictorial language of scripture, God acts like a human being: speaking, resting, working, smelling, visiting, coming down, passing by etc. He wipes away tears like a tender mother and is even compared to animals such as an eagle, a lion, a hen and a lamb. God has wings in one striking passage. Jesus is a lamb throughout the Apocalypse.

Considering all this, attractive as it is to find ‘Father’ as a name for God in Deuteronomy 32, it probably lacks the naming function of denoting or designating in a particular way. After all, in the Bible, God is also a physician, a shepherd, a farmer, a carpenter, an architect and a soldier. Yet we do not say ‘Farmer’ (kjv husbandman) is a name for God. We do sometimes see ‘Shepherd’ capitalized as a proper name for God in popular literature.

Though all biblical names for God are to a degree metaphorical, Scripture does not treat all the metaphors as names. Neither should we. ‘Father’ and ‘Rock’ partake of the metaphorical more than the other names in this treatment.

6. Elyon, The Most High.

When the Most High gave to the nations their inheritance, when he divided mankind, he fixed the borders of the peoples

according to the number of the sons of God (Deut 32:8).⁶

This verse means that God as ‘Most High’ has apportioned each nation, throughout history, its lands, just as He did Israel. When one considers how much of that took place by conquest it seems a truly remarkable statement, and places wars within God’s rule over the affairs of nations (Dan. 3:26; 4:17, 24, 25, 32, 34; 5:18, 21; 7:25) and in the expressions of divine worship in the Psalms (examples are Pss. 7:17; 91:1, 9)—eighteen times in all. The New Testament equivalent corresponds with the Psalms usage (examples, Luke 1:32, 35, 76; 2:14).

The name Elyon is a verbal adjective, formed from Alah, to ascend. The ascended, the highest (being), is the self-evident meaning. This concept of God is one that peoples who have not yet heard of the true God of Scripture readily accept. When one has thought above and beyond all created beings and things, there is still ‘something more beyond’. After that ne plus ultra: nothing more beyond. This is close to the God-idea which Paul assumed his hearers at Athens already had before they heard the gospel. It is the assumption likewise of all the many Old Testament prophecies addressed to the nations. Examples are Isaiah 13–24; Jeremiah 46–51; Ezekiel 24–32 and Amos 1:3; 2:3; Obadiah; Nahum; and parts of the book of Jonah, chapter 2. Each of these prophetic messages calls heathen peoples to account before a God—Elyon, the Highest, whom they already know about.

There are two other important names of God found in the Bible that do not appear in Deuteronomy 32. They are Shaddai and Adonai.

7. Shaddai, Almighty. ‘I am God Almighty; walk before me, and be blameless’ (Gen. 17:1 emphasis added). The word is plural in form, usually held to be a plural of majesty.

This title indicates the fullness and richness of God's grace. It reminded the Hebrew reader in a graphic way that every good gift comes from God, and that we have not because we ask not. We shall confine the examples cited to Genesis and begin with the last example in the book (Genesis 49:25). This one shows how graphic a term it is. There is a Hebrew word for a mother's breasts, shad, usually (and understandably) dual, a pair (see Song of Solomon 8:1; Hos. 2:4; 9:14). This word seems to be the source of Shaddai, hence the meaning is close to our word 'exuberance'. This connection seems explicit in the last appearance of the word in Genesis. Jacob is blessing Joseph and says, 'From the IEI of thy father, there shall be help to thee and with Shaddai, there shall be blessings to thee, blessings of heaven above ... blessings of the breasts [shadayim, the two breasts], and blessings of the womb' (Gen. 49:25, my rendering).

An examination of the other occurrences in Genesis shows that each one has to do with God's conferral of the blessing of fruitful life (Gen. 17:1–8; 35:11; and 43:14).

8. IAdonai, Lord. This is a special plural form of the normal word of respectful address to another male, especially a superior—Master, Lord, Sir. It receives all these translations (Gen. 43:20; 1 Kings 16:24; Gen. 18:12; Gen 24:9). As used of God it means the same thing except that being, like Shaddai, a plural, the aspect of respect is heightened.

This term of respectful address reminds us that God is a great King. We may come boldly to His throne of grace (Heb. 4:16). Yet we must at the same time 'offer to God acceptable worship, with reverence and awe, for our God is a consuming fire' (Heb. 12:28, 29).

Theological Significance of Names

Biblical names have far more theological significance than our supposedly rational epoch usually allows.⁷ Notwithstanding modern reluctance about philology and history of usage, the Bible, in innumerable cases, compels the reader to pause to learn the etymology of a name or the historical reason why such and such a place or person has the name it bears or used to bear. Some explanations are given twice, as with Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:31; 26:33). The naming of Jacob's thirteen children illustrates the importance Bible people put on the meaning of human names (see Gen. 29:32–35; 30:6, 8, 11, 13, 20–24; 35:18). Each name expresses a hope, a prayer, a circumstance in the heart of the parent, usually the mother. The prophetic blessings on these offspring by the dying Jacob (Gen. 49) is related to the meaning of their names, again illustrating the principle. Even the name conferred on Jesus (Matt. 1:21) is specifically related to its meaning in Hebrew, a language little used by Jesus or His parents.

We may be sure the biblical names of the supreme Being are meaningful to the doctrine of God. They tell us much about who He is, what He is like and what He has done, as well as what He now does and shall yet do. 'Taking the Books as they stand, the important point to notice is that the various names are used by the sacred writers advisedly, so as to bring out the various aspects of His character and dealings.'⁸ God the Creator is therefore Elohim in Genesis 1, but in chapter 2, where Elohim communes with mankind, He is called Jehovah-Elohim. The serpent (chapter 3) avoids the name Jehovah, but 'In the fourth chapter the offerings of Cain and Abel are made to Jehovah, and this is the case with the whole sacrificial system [of God in covenant with man] of later Old Testament story.'⁹

These things give color and power to the many promises and warnings involving God's name or names. 'The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous man runs into it and is safe' (Prov. 18:10)—a saying of the wise. 'And those who know your name put their trust in you' (Ps. 9:10). The more we know of the meanings of His name(s) the greater our information about God will be and the stronger our faith will be.

Isaiah, after, as we have seen, calling His God Father, Jehovah and Redeemer, adds 'from everlasting is thy name'. God's name is Eternal. He is endlessly the same.

The Practical Necessity of Names and Metaphors of God

The Bible brings every sphere of nature to make its contribution to its description of God. There are few limits (with the exception of evil things). Names, comparisons and figures are drawn from human, organic and inorganic spheres. Augustine put it like this: though God is without name as to His essential nature, in His revelation (Scripture) He possesses many names. Everything positive can be said of Him, but nothing said is fully worthy of Him. He goes on—Why are so many names, anthropomorphisms, comparisons and symbols necessary for us? God does not need them. Why do we need them? Augustine compares soul needs with bodily needs. The body needs a place to dwell, clothing to wear, food to eat, water to drink, air, light and the like. The natural world fills the needs.

The soul's needs are just as various, but instead of a world providing the supply, God Himself supplies them all. You go to a fountain when you need water; but to find the fountain you need light, and other things. One must go to a thousand places to meet natural needs. All the soul's needs are met in God Himself, and nowhere else, hence He is bread of life, water of life, Lord, Most High, Rock and Shepherd. Bread cannot meet your Shepherd need nor water your Master needs, and so on. Spiritually, however, God meets every need.

Thomas Aquinas looked at the same facts in a slightly different way. If believers wish to glorify God and if they wish to come to full knowledge of Him, they must think of Him in terms of His creatures and they must use anthropomorphic names and adjectives, metaphors and similes drawn from the Creator's creation. Otherwise they know nothing of Him and cannot speak a single word about Him.¹⁰ John Calvin, who certainly was fully aware of the limitations of natural revelation and the danger of confusing the creature with the creator, nevertheless wrote most eloquently of the importance, necessity and propriety of seeing the lineaments of God in creation. An entire chapter of Calvin's Institutes is devoted to the subject.¹¹ This, he goes on to say, is a secure basis for the way God in Scripture 'babbles' to us in our own creaturely realm in creaturely terms—anthropomorphic names, metaphors, similes and the like.

How infinite God accommodates His manner of 'speaking' to finite people like ourselves is a frequent theme in the Institutes. Two of Calvin's sentences summarize his thought on the subject:

[W]ho even of slight intelligence does not understand that as nurses commonly do with infants, God is wont in a measure to 'lisp' in speaking to us? Thus such forms of speaking do not so much express what God is like as accommodate the knowledge of him to our slight capacity. To do this he must descend far beneath his loftiness.¹²

An Important Practical Value

Only man is the image of God among God's creatures. Yet since like all of nature he is a creature he has a place in nature that he cannot fully escape. He alone among earthbound creatures is the 'offspring' of God (Acts 17:28). God, however, so created the natural realm, as we have seen, that His marks are everywhere in it. He is immanent in it as Sustainer and providential Ruler (see Ps. 104). In this sense, apart from God there is nothing at all, even though He created it ad extra, not out from Him, but de novo, as the uniquely fresh, new.

Many ancient and modern philosophies and heresies have represented nature as something independent and hostile, even prior, to God (Gnosticism, Neoplatonism and Manichaeism of early Christian centuries and 'Christian science', various ascetical and mystical moods and movements of today). Nineteenth-century idealism, still with us in mutated forms today, is another.

God, however, will not be excluded from anything He has made—our bodies and our lands, our houses and other possessions. Nor will He be excluded from our scientific projects either. He demands Lordship in them and will ultimately secure it.

Unless we accept the propriety of God's presence in the world of nature our work in the world will always be thought of as 'dirty business'. Though of a different sort, it is as much God's business as the mission agency and the theological college. The Bible has a message for every worldly department of private and public life. The Christian revelation will not be restricted to the private, religious sphere.

An important Dutch theologian speaks eloquently of the consequences of effort to exclude God and revelation from worldly life:

In this way the realm of nature with its forces and energies, man in his social and political life, and also science and art, are given a sphere outside the sphere of God's revelation. They become neutral spheres, and are viewed as existing apart from God. Of course, a proper appreciation of the OT and of a large part of the NT is impossible on this basis. Nature is deprived of its message for the believer. The revelation of God loses all its influence on outward life. Religion, altogether confined to the inner chamber ... forfeits every claim to respect. Dogmatics [Systematic Theology], and in particular the 'doctrine of God' is reduced to a minimum; and theology is no longer able to maintain its proper and important position; it is no longer able to speak about God, because it no longer recognizes him as its source and goal. It has no names for God. He becomes the Great Unknowable; and the universe becomes first a sphere without God, later on 'an antigod.'¹³

How comforting to faith! How inspiring to worship!

Come, thou Almighty King,

Help us Thy name to sing,

Help us to praise;

Father, all glorious,

O'er all victorious,

Come and reign over us,

Ancient of Days.

¹ 'Epistle to Marcellus' as cited by Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., vol. i, 1950), pp. 432, 433.

² Thomas McComiskey, Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, Walter Elwell, ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1984). Elmer Martens, Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, Walter Elwell, ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1996).

³ This name is treated further in connection with God's attributes.

⁴ Robert B. Girdlestone, Synonyms of the Old Testament, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, n.d.), p. 19.

⁵ ibid., p. 20.

⁶ This very ancient reading, also followed by rsv, has 'according to the number of the sons of God', that is, the angels.

⁷ The names of God appear thousands of times in the Old Testament and have therefore both attracted and challenged critics and commentators over the centuries. Journal articles on one or more of all the names appear frequently. I recommend J. Barton Payne's brief chapter, 'The Names of God' (The Theology of the Old Testament, Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1962, pp. 144–150) and the articles in Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament on all the names as well as the Old Testament Theologies of W. Eichrodt, G. Oehler and especially Hermann Schultz, trans. of the German ed. by J. A. Patterson, vol. ii, Edinburgh, 1892, pp. 116–146. He provides details I have found in no other source.

⁸ ibid., p. 38.

⁹ ibid., p. 38.

¹⁰ See Aquinas Summa Theologica, First Part, Question 12, articles 3 & 4.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹¹ John Calvin, Institutes I, i, 1.

¹² ibid., I, xiii.i.

¹³ Herman Bavinck, The Doctrine of God, Tran. Wm. Hendrickson (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1951, 1983), p. 90.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (53). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

8

The Attributes of God

We shall introduce this important subject by a simple mental exercise. Let us go back to Junior High School science class for a few moments. The teacher brings a beaker three-fourths full of an unknown substance to the desk. He holds it up so that all in the room can see. It is seen to be a liquid, a clear liquid. Is it methyl alcohol? No, for it has no odour at room temperature. So now we know it is an odourless, clear liquid. Does it taste like any known clear liquid? No, it is tasteless as well as odourless. Further testing over the Bunsen burner shows that it boils at +212°F, and it is said, by the teacher, to turn to solid state at +32°F. The teacher also tells the class that it has been shown to be composed, by weight, of 11.188 per cent hydrogen and 88.812 per cent oxygen and nothing more. By now, every child in the class knows for sure what the substance is: water. How is water defined? By its attributes (characteristics).

Something like this simple mental exercise is now necessary to this study. We have now reached a point where it is appropriate to discuss God's characteristics, or as theology now calls them, His attributes.

Some of the medieval scholastics call them 'properties', as Anselm in The Monologion does. Science likes this word to describe distinctive features about the way a thing appears or acts, e.g. bitterness is a property of chokecherry fruit; vapourizing at 212°F is a property of water. Attributes is a better term in theology to indicate what an object of thought is as well as what it does or what its effects are.

The Bible says in a thousand ways that God is gracious, angry, true, faithful, merciful, righteous and so on. At first, the reader does not think of classifying and organizing these statements. Yet, as we read the Bible through, if we were to make a list of them, without arranging the statements in some systematic way, it would be impossible meaningfully to report the information to another person, or to understand it as we understand all organized knowledge.

Theology must put these important facts about God in some sort of system. We must consider how earlier saints and scholars organized this data and we must relate the same to current thinking.

Certain initial questions must be addressed.

1. Can God Be Defined?

Is it possible to define God at all, and if so, how should one proceed? Good theology has always been cautious about attempting to define God. Recently, exponents of dialectical-existential theology have been insisting it is impious even to try. God can only confront us in personal encounter. When we define or state propositions about these essentially unreportable confrontations, they say, we compose a God to suit ourselves. Some cold statement that God is ‘the ground of being’ may be allowed.

Christian theology had been aware of this difficulty from the very beginning. The first extensive and successful efforts at systematic statement of a theology about the God of Christianity were by Gregory Nazianzen (c.325–c.389) called ‘the Theologian’ and ‘The Great’. He opposed those in his time who thought they knew everything about God. As he began his own more modest effort to ‘define God’ he wrote:

[W]e must begin thus. It is difficult to conceive God but to define Him in words is an impossibility ... to comprehend the whole of so great a subject as this is quite impossible and impractical, not merely to the utterly careless and ignorant, but even to those who are highly exalted, and who love God.¹

He adds:

For it is one thing to be persuaded of the existence of a thing, and quite another to know what it is.²

C. A. Hodge sensibly anticipated the current endless verbosity on this subject by pointing out that though a definition may not tell what a thing is in itself, it can do it no harm or despite. For ‘to define is ... simply to ... distinguish; so that the thing defined may be discriminated from all other things. This may be done (1) by stating its characteristics. (2) By stating its genus and its specific difference. (3) By analyzing the idea as it lies in our minds. (4) By explanation of the term or name by which it is denoted.’³ We must define God by some sort of descriptive statements about Him if we are to discuss theology at all. Even the dialectical and existential theologians do. Neither they nor we can avoid it. The Bible not only reports ‘the mighty acts of God’ allowed by the neo-orthodox and other objectors to propositional statements, but also makes factual statements about God on about every page. We must affirm some statement that begins ‘God is ...’ to have orderly discourse about Him.

Perhaps the most respected definition in Protestant Christian history is the Westminster Confession’s definition. It begins, ‘There is but one only living and true God, who is infinite in being’ and goes on to mention about twenty-five characteristics (attributes) with scriptural ‘proofs’ for each one—thus committing several ‘sins’ against current liberal theological thinking. Among such offences to liberal theology are proof-texting and factual statements about divine things and speaking without reservations in both respects. This respected creed is similar, in its forthright statements about God, to several old, respected catechisms, each of which has instructed many generations of Christian children. Each is composed of crisp statements about God, mankind and things, each with Scripture ‘proof’. This contrasts sharply with the ponderous and extensive volumes of existential-dialectical theology (cf. Barth’s thirteen volumes) and claims to make no such statements (though they do). God cannot even state facts about Himself in the neo-orthodox Bible.

2. Can God’s Essence be made known?

Can the essence, or being, of God be made known to us at all? As already discussed in earlier chapters, God, of course, is not knowable in His essence except as He has seen fit to reveal Himself in various ways. Kant and his disciples would have every essence, or thing in itself (der Ding an sich), forever out of reach of human knowledge, as would Hume, Feuerbach and others who would restrict all valid knowledge to that derived from sensory experience. In a measure, they are correct, especially of other intelligences or persons—but only in the sense of direct sensory (empirical) information. A man may live with his wife for fifty years and never have direct sensory experience of her inner spiritual being. Yet he gains immense knowledge-by-acquaintance with her inner spiritual being through her manifest attributes (characteristics). These attributes all come to his attention and awareness in bits and pieces in one way or another, through sensory experience of what she says and does. By means of his rational faculties, he will inevitably—consciously or unconsciously—make generalizations about his wife’s inner character. She may also deliberately speak to him about her inner self. Knowledge of God comes in a similar manner. It is twofold.

(1) We know God’s attributes through His creation. People do have such awareness—however it be accounted for. There is general awareness that God is great, good, wise—otherwise why the fear of meeting Him in the Judgment? This awareness takes different forms of expression in different cultures. Creation did not emerge out of God by emanation. Yet He made it and left marks of His character throughout—even though not without some ambiguity, owing to sin presently in us and sin’s curse on creation.

(2) We also know God’s attributes as they are stated and described in Scripture. This knowledge is not complete, but it is sufficient for orderly human life on this earth if not perverted or denied. The attributes of God, as explained and fulfilled in creation and redemption, are all we need to know of His essence. ‘And we know that the Son of God has come and has given us understanding, so that we may know him who is true; and we are in him who is true, in his Son Jesus Christ. He is the true [alēthinos, genuine, real] God and eternal life’ (1 John 5:20; cf. John 17:3).

The attributes are not parts of the essence, of which this latter is composed. The whole essence is in each attribute and the attribute in the essence. We must not conceive of the essence as existing by itself, and prior to the attributes, and of the attributes as an addition to it. God is not essence and attributes, but in attributes.⁴

3. How Are God’s Attributes Related to Him?

Another problem, frequently discussed from earliest Christian times, has been, how are the attributes related to God? They are not related to God’s essence as major genus and differentia, as every other entity is, for God is the sole member of His genus or class. ‘Besides me there is no other.’ A chair may be said to be a piece of furniture (major genus) composed of a seat, back, four legs and designed for sitting (differentia from other kinds of furniture). But God may not be described in such a way. Furthermore, the attributes of God cannot be regarded as symbolical representations, as say crown and scepter for a king, or a fish for the church. In these cases, the symbols have no necessary similarity to or identity with a king or the church; they are, in fact, dissimilar. They only represent a king or a church, both of which are wholly other than the symbol. In contrast, the attributes of God are like Him. In fact, they are more than like Him because they are identical with His being. They do not conceal what and who He is but rather reveal Him. The attributes are what God is, in some meaningful way. They are identical with God's essence, and are not hypostases (personifications), as in polytheism and medieval Jewish speculation. Nor are they independent archetypes of love, beauty and the like, as in Platonic philosophy. Nor are they emanations out of God (eons), as in Gnosticism and other pantheistic systems ancient and modern. When the Bible says God is righteous, it means that righteousness is an aspect of God's being, God seen from a certain perspective—all of God in that aspect or perspective—and so on for every biblical statement about God. When the Bible says that God is righteous it means all of God—God in every respect—is righteous. Every positive attribute of God inheres in all of them.

4. Do Words Applied to God Mean the Same as when Applied to Human Beings?

Do words such as love, mercy, good, gracious, Lord and the like mean the same when applied to God as when applied to mankind? They do only to a degree. When a wife says, My husband is kind, or addresses her neighbour's husband as 'Sir' (in older usage, 'Lord') she does not mean exactly the same as Scripture does when it employs the same terms in speaking to or about God.

Dispute over this problem in ancient times set the terms of the discussion and we still must employ them today. There are three possible views with respect to possible equivalence between the meaning of these terms as used for human beings and things on the one hand and as applied to God on the other. Every Sunday School teacher or serious Bible student must decide. It is not an unimportant matter.

One view affirms that these words mean the same whether used of God or mankind: the sound is the same; spelling is the same; meaning is the same. The sense is said to be univocal (=Latin, 'one voice'). When we say that God is good we mean the same as when we say that Margaret is good.

A second possible view says, No. The sound is the same; spelling is the same; but the meaning is different. The Latin word is equivocal (=Latin, 'equal voice'), that is, though the sound is the same the meaning is different. Hence, to equivocate means to speak ambiguously or to lie. When a person only seems to say what we think he says, he equivocates.

A third possible view is that when the Bible applies to God words commonly used of human beings there is a partial correspondence, a correspondence which, though partial and even fragmentary (1 Cor. 13:9), nevertheless conveys true and reliable information. This sense is called analogical. Analogy affirms correspondence or similarity, in some important respect, but not strict identity. In this case God possesses the matter in a primary, perfect and absolute way; people have it only in a secondary or derived manner.

5. How Do the Attributes of God Relate to Each Other?

How are the attributes related to one another, holiness to love and mercy, omnipotence to infinity in time and place, and so on? Is one attribute more important to sound theology, that is, to a correct understanding of God and His ways, than another? There is considerable variance of views. It can scarcely be doubted that some attributes receive more emphasis in Scripture than others do. No one can read Leviticus and Isaiah (or Ezekiel) without observing emphasis on holiness. Let us leave this question open at this stage.

6. What Is the Meaning of the Simplicity of God's Being?

Orthodox theologians generally affirm that the being or substance of God is simple. Then they try to explain and offer cautions. By simple or simplicity, we mean without parts. 'Every attribute is identical with God's being by reason of the fact that everyone of God's virtues is absolutely perfect in God' (Bavinck, p. 168). There is no variance in any one or all the attributes, for they are steadily the same, as we shall consider later in connection with God's immutability (changelessness) and impassibility. Any who doubt these affirmations (and in view of present mutterings of some writers on the fringe of orthodoxy there may be readers who do doubt) should be made aware of the uniform conviction of divine immutability among the ancient Fathers—notably Augustine—medieval school men, both Reformers and Roman Catholics, and on to present orthodox writers. In a later chapter, we shall consider the simplicity of the divine nature as it relates to the blessedness or impassibility of God.

Father, Son and Holy Spirit are not three parts of God. They are three 'modes of subsistence', to use one of the phrases of the older Protestant dogmaticians. There is one mode of subsistence called Father, another called Son and another Holy Spirit. However, there is one simple undivided substance. The word 'mode' is employed not only by the post-Reformation Protestant scholastic theologians in this way but it is to be found in authors such as C. A. Hodge, Shedd, Strong and Pieper as well as the ancient Christian orthodox writers. Barth uses the word 'mode' in this same connection. In connection with God's perfection, Karl Barth writes: 'It should be noted that in this matter we have an exact parallel to the concern of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. In this doctrine the one God in his three modes of being corresponds to the Lord of glory, etc.'⁵ He goes on to say these modes are internal and prior to external modes, amongst other things. He seems to reject Sabellian heresy of modalism. The point I make here is that three Persons of the one, simple essence of God do not 'divide the substance'.

This nature is common to the three Persons in God, but not communicated from one to the other; they each of them partake of it, and possess it as one undivided nature ... 'as all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ', so in the Holy Spirit; and of the Father, there will be no doubt.⁶

The attributes, of course, are each the whole, undivided divine essence viewed in a particular way or in relation to different objects.

7. Why Classify the Divine Attributes?

'On few subjects have greater thought and labor been expended than this.'⁷ The goal of classification is to make the total number clearly comprehensible.

Among the 'bipolar' classifications that are proposed are: negative and positive attributes, quiescent and operative; internal and external, absolute and relative; immanent and transcendent; metaphysical and moral; primitive and derived.⁸

The Reformers were disgusted with the fruitless efforts of late medieval scholastics to explain essence and attributes, and sterile controversies about them. Hence, Calvin has a single chapter on the Trinity,⁹ three on God's unity and spirituality,¹⁰ but there is nothing like any effort to organize the biblical references to attributes. Melancthon's Loci Communes, the first Lutheran handbook of doctrines, discusses the trinity and unity of the Godhead but has nothing specifically on attributes. Gordon Clark seems excessively harsh in calling later efforts at definition and classification 'rubbish' that has 'been dug up'.¹¹

Karl Barth, who liked to think of himself as an authentic successor to the Reformers, has an extensive discussion of what he terms 'God's being'¹² and 'God's perfections.'¹³ In this treatment, he has a section of criticism of the various systems of defining and arranging the attributes of God and comes to this interesting summary, in which I concur.

In this matter the chaos of opinion is not so great as perhaps at first sight appears, and it should be clear that in accordance with the presuppositions [his] we have no need to look around for a radically new solution. Indeed, we have absolutely no other choice but to adopt basically—reserving the right of more detailed elucidation and purification—this fourth and, as we may call it, classical approach.¹⁴

One searches almost in vain for a satisfactory history of classifications. An adequate history is very competently supplied by Herman Bavinck's thirty pages in his The Doctrine of God. Bavinck, in common with most orthodox authors, places the aseity (Latin, 'out-of-self', or self-existence) of God's being as primary. Though he calls aseity (absolute- or self-existence) an attribute, he means to say that it is in a class by itself, prior to the other attributes. I give assent to Bavinck's summary:

[I]t is only because these attributes pertain to God in an absolute, altogether unique sense, that they are divine attributes. Hence, in that respect aseity (absolute essence) may be called the primary attribute of God's being.¹⁵

Bavinck adds: 'We must, therefore affirm God's aseity: that there is nothing above him; hence, wisdom, grace, love, etc. are identical with his being.'¹⁶ Bavinck is saying attributes are attributes of something. In this case, the something is absolute essence (being), God's being. Obviously, attributes inhere in God's being.

Theologians—Reformed, Lutheran and Roman Catholic—have followed an essentially identical method with near identical results. About the only variety is that some writers siphon off attributes of the being of God and call them aspects of the essence. H. C. Thiessen lists spirituality, self-existence, immensity and eternity as 'not attributes at all but different aspects of the divine substance.'¹⁷ It is the judgment of most theologians that all the attributes are 'different aspects of the divine substance'. Thiessen and H. B. Smith, whom he follows, are reviving the views of medieval realists. This opinion was condemned by the Council of Reims (1148).¹⁸

In these studies, the attributes will be presented mainly as derived from Scripture. We must acknowledge, however, that several traditional modes of deriving our ideas about God have their place. They are three converging lines which theology has employed for centuries in elaborating what the Scriptures have to say about God's attributes.

Wolfhart Pannenberg summarizes:

Pseudo-Dionysius ... worked out the three-fold method of knowing God that achieved such fame and was normative until well into the 19th century, the via negationis (aphaireseos), the via eminentiae (hyperoches) and the via causatitatis (aitias) [these are the Latin and Greek equivalents].¹⁹

(1) The Way of Affirmation (Positive)

We see perfections (excellencies) in nature and in ourselves—intelligence, for example. Hence, we infer intelligence in the Creator. We cannot conceive of God otherwise and if there were not a single, specific Bible verse affirming ‘God is intelligent’, we would affirm it as Christians. As a teacher of theology I sometimes sense some futility in citing ‘proof texts’ on points like this—as though trying to clarify the perfectly obvious.

(2) The Way of Negation (Negative)

We concentrate our minds on God’s greatness and His oceanic abundance of perfections. We reflect on the finiteness and imperfections of all creation. Hence we infer immensity (Latin in-, ‘not’, plus mensus, ‘measure’), infinity (no limit), immutability (no change) and the like. These verbal negatives may rightly be viewed as positives, affirming—by contrast—the absolute fullness of God’s being and perfections. The negative form of statement, however, is accurate and impressive. Most Christians have at least some inchoate awareness of these attributes of God and bring them to the Scriptures, even as they refine their convictions by the Scripture ‘proofs’.

The Bible sets a standard for negative statements about God, such as those that relate to attributes and essence, for example: ‘with whom there is no variation or shadow due to change’ (God’s immutability, James 1:17); a negative statement of truthfulness (‘it is impossible for God to lie’, Heb. 6:18; and deathlessness (‘who alone has immortality’, 1 Tim. 6:16).

(3) The Way of Eminence (Supreme Degree)

Those perfections we see about us, especially in human beings, we infer to be subsisting in infinite degree in God. We infer this as in God’s image and as His creatures. We see power about us, we know something of love, mercy and the like in ourselves, and quite easily assign the same to God in infinite degree. We also bring these ideas with us to the reading of biblical statements about God’s attributes.

Calvin, after asserting that ‘in his essence God is incomprehensible’, went on to say: ‘But upon his individual works, he has engraved unmistakable marks of his glory ... Therefore the prophet very aptly exclaims that he is “clad with light as with a garment”.’ He cites a catena of passages of Scripture, chiefly from Psalm 104.²⁰

Thomas Aquinas put the matter thus: ‘God is the supreme good simply, and not as existing in any genus or order of things ... Therefore as good is in God as in the first ... cause of all things, it must be in Him in a most excellent way; and therefore He is called the supreme good.’²¹

As stated earlier, the attributes of God have been classified as (1) positive and negative, (2) communicable and incommunicable (what God is in and of Himself), (3) quiescent (static) and active, (4) relative (to creation) and absolute, (5) transitive and intransitive, and (6) metaphysical and moral. Though God has always been known to be both great and good, no one, as far as I know, thought of classifying the attributes in this a seventh way, great and good, until Alva J. McClain did so about 1930. Following McClain, who taught me this classification, which is appealing as well as accurate and simple, I have employed it through several decades of lectures and I now find it in recent widely published textbooks, though whence derived it is hard to say.

By whatever terms they are designated, all of the attributes of God fall into these two classes of great and good in theological writing, whether the theological writer be Roman Catholic, Reformed, Lutheran or other orthodox writer. This arrangement seems to be a kind of ecumenical consensus, fruit of 1,500 years of thinking about the subject by Christian scholars.

Some employ this basic scheme but introduce a pedagogical principle—introducing the pervasive biblical emphasis on the spirituality of the God of Scripture first, then the unity (sole existence) of the Godhead as a parallel whole-Bible emphasis, then the usual twofold divisions, closing with the most difficult, the doctrine of the Trinity. My own approach will be like this.

For the sake of interest and simplicity, I gather the subject of the attributes under five biblical captions or affirmations. There is the added advantage of making biblical authority more apparent. It is, of course, perfectly obvious that to understand these difficult ideas every aid that can be borrowed from any legitimate source whatsoever is brought to the exposition. Systematic theology can never be simple proof-texting, however important biblical documentation of beliefs in religion must always be for Christians.

These affirmations and phrases are: firstly, ‘God is spirit’ (John 4:24); secondly, ‘the Lord is God in heaven above and on the earth beneath; there is no other’ (Deut. 4:39); thirdly, ‘our God is greater than all gods’ (2 Chr. 2:5); fourthly, ‘Oh give thanks to the Lord, for he is good’ (Ps. 107:1); fifthly, ‘the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit’ (Matt. 28:19).

Each of these scriptural captions is used as a heading for each of the chapters immediately to follow.²²

¹ Gregory Nazianzen, Oration XXVIII, iv, NPNF, pp. 289–290.

² ibid., v, p. 290.

³ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 366.

⁴ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969), p. 134.

⁵ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics I, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975), p. 327.

⁶ John Gill, Body of Divinity I (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), p. 44.

⁷ C. A. Hodge, op. cit., p. 327.

⁸ Karl Barth, Christian Dogmatics II, Part I (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1975), chapter VI, pp. 340, 341.

⁹ Calvin, Institutes I, 13.

¹⁰ ibid., x–xii.

¹¹ Gordon Clark, ‘The Divine Attributes’ in Baker’s Dictionary of Theology, ed. by E. F. Harrison (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1960), p. 78.

¹² Barth, op. cit., pp. 257–321.

¹³ Barth, op. cit., pp. 322–350.

¹⁴ Barth, op. cit., p. 341.

¹⁵ Herman Bavinck, The Doctrine of God, trans. Wm. Hendriksen (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1951, 1983), pp. 113–142.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 170.

¹⁷ H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949, 1966), pp. 119–123.

¹⁸ The Catholic Encyclopedia II (New York: Catholic Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), pp. 63–65.

¹⁹ Wolfhart Pannenburg, Systematic Theology, vol. ii, pp. 343, 344.

²⁰ Calvin, op. cit., v. 1.

²¹ Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, First Part, Question 6, art. 2.

²² I acknowledge my debt to the esteemed late President of Grace Theological Seminary for the essentials of this arrangement which he taught in his course called ‘God and Revelation’.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (60). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

The Spirituality of the Godhead

‘God is spirit’ (John 4:24)

‘God is spirit’, a saying of Jesus (John 4:24), was spoken for practical reasons. Jesus was introducing an age wherein the geographical location and physical implements of worship are no longer of great importance. Whatever temporary value the Old Testament ritual actions and materials may have had, they are worthless now. They may teach us but we dare not perpetuate them. God is Spirit and they that worship Him must worship in spirit and in truth (John 4:24). It is all in the spiritual realm, however much mankind’s unity of body and spirit and residence in a material world require such things as buildings, music, hymn books, Bibles, pews and central heating as well as convenient location and accessible premises. Ceremonies, religious buildings and objects are now secondary to the purely spiritual. (It has not yet been demonstrated that electronic implementation of sounds, and projection machinery as ‘aids to worship’, are very helpful.) We are free from an elaborate ceremonial system which would be ‘a yoke on the neck of the disciples that neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear’ (Acts 15:10). We put ourselves on notice that so-called ‘holism’ in worship, if not severely restrained, may lead to overt idolatry of sensible leaders, forms, objects, sounds and rituals.

No one has ever framed a definition of spirit that fully satisfies everyone. Commitments about reality in general are involved. For those who believe matter and the chemistry of it to be only part of reality, holding that there is non-material reality, incommensurable with all measurements of length, breadth, height, weight and similar, the following definition may suffice. Spirit is a non-material, personal, reality. Why not say that spirit is a non-material, personal substance?

Is the Divine Spirit a Substance?

There is a certain reluctance to speak of the divine Spirit as a substance. This is because our minds can scarcely conceive of a substance without the quality of materiality. Yet we know God is not a mere idea (unless we adopt the unbiblical philosophy of metaphysical idealism). God is not a thing, however, but the most real object or subject. The truth is, God is a spiritual substance. Our souls or spirits are spiritual substances too. We can think of deceased parents or children as spirits without material bodies and we can think of God in a similar manner, even granted there is a certain awkwardness about it.

Augustine relates in the Confessions his intellectual journey from materialism (where nothing is real but matter) to the biblical view of God and of reality as a problem of conceiving of a spiritual substance. At first ‘the more defiled by vain things as I grew in years, who could not imagine say substance but such as is wont to be seen with these eyes ... Whatsoever was not extended over certain spaces, nor diffused, nor condensed, nor swelled out, or did not receive some of these dimensions, I thought to be altogether nothing’ (VII). ‘Could I have conceived of a spiritual substance, all their strongholds [Manichaeism] had been ... cast utterly out of my mind; but I could not.’¹ Augustine’s ability to think of God as spiritual substance, in whom all the biblical divine attributes inhere, resulted from the prayers of believers, the preaching of Ambrose and especially his reading of Paul’s Epistles, but philosophy had something to do with it also.

Augustine possibly might never have considered the Epistles of Paul seriously except through the reading of certain ‘Platonist’ philosophers—now called Neoplatonists. It was their service, in God’s providence, to enable ‘Augustine to bridge the gap between Manichaean materialism and the Christian understanding of a purely immaterial substance’.² Augustine puts it this way: ‘And thus gradually, [I progressed] from bodies to the soul which senses through the body, and thence to that internal power, to which the bodily senses bring information about external things'. He goes on to say that seeing his judgments are changeable his 'soul' turned to his soul's intelligence to find what the light was which irradiated his soul. From this, he reasoned to invisible reality wherein is 'the unchangeable', whereupon his reason 'arrived in the flash of an anxious glance, at that which is. Then ... I saw intellectually Thy [God's] invisible things through those things which are made.'³ He had employed some of the logic of Romans 1:19, 20 without yet being aware of the scriptural guarantee of the validity of his now Spirit-enlightened logical processes. Augustine only gradually fully accepted this new way of thinking.

God, as pure spirit, is as substantial as are our own spirits, though His spirit is not spatially enclosed in a body as ours are. God's self-conscious spirit cannot be a mere 'stream of consciousness', as in positivist psychology (Watson, Skinner), any more than ours are:

We cannot conceive of the soul as only a series of exercises. There must be an agent in order to agency; a substantial being in order to exercises. To ask us to think away the substance of the soul, and then to conceive of its exercises is like asking us to think away the earth around a hole, and then to conceive of the hole.⁴

The Bible presents God as self-conscious personal spirit. He is the living God, active and intelligent. He is not only a God who acts freely (self-determination) but also with sovereign purpose. We must think of this group of ideas in connection with the statement: God is spirit.

We are not to completely isolate these elements, even for purposes of discussion. It is impossible. Some of the ideas group themselves together more closely than others. The first group includes personality, self-consciousness and freedom, or self-determination.

1. Personality

A person is a subject who thinks. A person is also an object of thought. By this, we mean that there is a kind of relationship of persons to persons that is unique to persons. I address thee (to employ the old second person singular form). I am thou to thee and thou art thou to me. This again is unique to persons. Anything other than a person with whom I relate myself as a person is an 'it'. Of course, when I discourse about thee with another thou, then thou art a he or she, for purposes of discourse. In a definite manner, we have just now seen practical demonstration of how personality works rather than of what 'it' is. We know ourselves to be persons. From the way the Bible speaks of God and from the way God speaks therein, always an 'I' addressing a 'thee' or 'ye' (plural) and referring to 'him', 'her' or 'them,' we know God to be a person.

Most readers will need to trace these matters through only a fragment of the biblical evidence to be convinced. God is never a distant impersonal spook that sounds itself impersonally through some occultist medium, nor is He an eternal force impersonally regulating the fall of dice from some priest's hands. He is always a great person. The personal character of God is as plain in His conversations with Adam and Eve in Genesis 3:9–23 as it is with Abraham and his wife Sarah later in Genesis. The meeting of Moses with God at the burning bush (Exod. 3:3–6) is no mere meditation of some pious sheep-herder (as some say) upon the magnificence of a storm or a sunrise or sunset over Mount Horeb, but a sustained, sometimes fierce, conversation (Exod. 3:1–4:17) between persons. The events at Sinai, when the voice of God spoke persuasively to a whole nation, came in personal modes (Exod. 19:9–19; Deut. 4:8–13; cf. 18:16). Those were not, as misbelief and unbelief sometimes make them out, some sort of natural phenomenon such as a volcanic eruption. Nor were they the creation of subsequent myth-making.

We must remind ourselves, however, that in declaring God a ‘person’ we are doing something Scripture never does. We must think of Him only as our excellent, but limited, human powers allow. We are merely the humble beings whom God created ‘male and female’ and ‘named them Man when they were created’ (Gen. 5:1, 2), not gods. ‘Person’ is really a quite modern word in the sense we now use it. Personhood in God is much more than personhood in mankind. How much more, we shall never know, for the ‘true God ... is infinite in being and perfection, a most pure spirit ...’⁵

When we say that God is a person we mean, before all else, that He is the God of Holy Scripture, One who addresses us in Scripture and sermon, One who sometimes during the epochs of revelation spoke in audible verbal modes to other persons such as apostles and prophets. He is One to whom people respond—Adam and Eve, Abraham, Moses, Samuel, Isaiah, and many others. In a less distinct, but equally important manner, we respond in love, obedience, devotion, worship, prayer and service. He is One with whom men of old had conversation (see Gen. 18:33). One of them, in fact, became so intimate with God that the man’s name became ‘the Friend of God’.

Once in Scripture God, Himself, calls Abraham ‘my friend’ (Isa. 41:8). King Jehoshaphat, in addressing God, refers to Abraham as ‘your friend’ (2 Chr. 20:7) and James states that Abraham was called ‘a friend of God’ (Jas. 2:23). To this day, the Muslim Arabs frequently refer to that patriarch as ‘el Khalil’—the friend.

This relationship between God and Abraham grew as all friendships—between persons who shared their interests. God was on His way to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah. En route, He stopped by Abraham’s tent to talk business, urgent business, with him. There was food (Gen. 18:18) and conversation as is quite usual when friends are entertained (Gen. 18:9–18) during which the present business was cared for. There was chiefly a final announcement of fulfillment of the promise of birth of a child by Sarah, through whom blessing would come to the whole world (Gen. 12:1 ff.). Isaac would be born within a year.

After business matters had been cared for, before ‘the men’ (i.e. the angels of the Lord, addressed by Abraham as ‘my Lord’), went on to destroy the cities of the plain, ‘The Lord said, “Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do” ’ (Gen. 18:17). God went on to affirm His abiding confidence in Abraham and then bared His heart of what was now uppermost in His mind. God was treating Abraham as an intimate friend. The rest of the chapter narrates their conversation, very significantly closing: ‘And the Lord went his way, when he had finished speaking to Abraham, and Abraham returned to his place’ (Gen. 18:33). These conversations are as real as a conversation between Jacob and Rachel or David and Jonathan or of Jesus with the woman at the well of Sychar. The God of the Bible is a person, so much a person that one man of history became His confidant—Abraham, the friend of God.⁶

A first caution should be observed in saying God is a person, or God is a personal spirit. The meaning is not exactly the same as when the three members of the triune God are called persons. The three ‘Persons’ are three ‘properties’ of the one God. Person (Lat. persona, mask used by a dramatic actor) indicates the sense in which God is three. But there is only one God. Peter, James and John are three separate persons, yet share a generic unity of nature—humanity. Humanity exists separately from them in billions of other people also. Contrariwise, Father, Son and Holy Ghost are three ‘persons’ each of whom possesses numerically and totally all the divine nature (Godhead, divinity) there is. There are not three gods, each of whom shares in a generic something called divinity, ‘Godness’ or Godhead. Where the Father is, there also are the Son and the Spirit.

A second caution also should be observed. Our personal nature is analogical to God’s nature (essence, being) in some important ways. Yet God is an infinite and self-existent person while we are limited and dependent wholly on Him. Christian theology took centuries to decide to use ‘person’ of the Godhead and we need to be cautious how we understand it. The analogy is not complete. There is a regrettable but significant incubus of tri-theism in much popular Christian devotion.

2. Self-consciousness

Self-consciousness is part of what it means to be a person. Sometimes, by a freak-of-language figure of speech, we refer to animals as though they were persons. We may even address them as persons and fondly imagine that they so respond. However, in a fully lucid moment no one believes an animal to be reflectively self-conscious. Our pets and domestic beasts are conscious, of course. They go to sleep and awaken. They receive stimuli, have sensations and respond to them. But only human beings among God’s earthly creatures have the ability to think of themselves objectively, engaging in introspection as we do. We are aware of our own actions and states of mind and we can rationally distinguish the self which is the subject of those states of mind and which initiates the actions. Brutes cannot accomplish these feats of personal beings. ‘In consciousness the object is another substance than the subject; but in self-consciousness the object is the same substance as the subject.’⁷

This patent truth is one aspect of the famous declaration of God to Moses as he responded to Moses’ question, ‘What is his name?’ ‘I AM WHO I AM ... Say this to the people of Israel, “I AM has sent me to you” ’ (Exod. 3:14). This is self-conscious person in ultimate verbal self-disclosure.

God’s self-consciousness, like all other features of His being, is His in perfection. In this respect, our Creator is both like and unlike the most excellent crown of His creative art. There are innumerable crannies of my personality of which I am unconscious. Some I do not wish to acknowledge even when others who see them clearly point them out to me. ‘Who can discern his errors?’ David wanted to know. ‘Declare me innocent from hidden [i.e. hidden from myself] faults’, was his prayer (Ps. 19:12) and more at length, ‘Search me, O God, and know my heart! Try me and know my thoughts!’ (Ps. 139:23). God knows Himself completely. He is never surprised at what He says or does. So it was with our Savior in the days of His flesh (John 6:6). Because this is so, we may ask our God to help us discover ourselves, and some of the deep things of God Himself. We need His Spirit to give meaningful effect to the very words about Him on this page. So, though no merely natural eye can see nor ear hear the ‘things’ of redemption which God has done for us, His Spirit can help us. He knows the deep things (1 Cor. 2:9, 10). ‘So also no one comprehends the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God. Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God, that we might understand the things freely given us by God' (1 Cor. 2:11, 12).

3. Freedom, or Self-determination

This idea, though somewhat self-explanatory, needs some limitation, if not clarification. All things we can think of are determined in some way, certainly by the characteristics of their own natures. The forces that shaped them to be what they are put these characteristics into them. Material elements are so determined by their inherent nature that science can discover what they will invariably do under controlled conditions. To an almost equal degree the same is true of brutes. All animal training is based on this. To a limited degree human beings are thus determined and much of our societal behaviour (eating requirements, recreation and the like) is to a degree predictable. In so far as politicians, social planners, technocrats and similar, can manipulate us individually and collectively we are beings determined by what we collectively are. However, people's responses can neither be wholly conditioned nor directed by external management. We are truly, within limits, self-determined. To date, every totalitarian political regime has run aground on people's unwillingness to yield determination of their behaviour to someone else for a very long time, except within the legitimate parameters of limited government. The bad side of this is recurrent lawlessness. But on the good side, it is precisely their God-likeness as free persons which makes people this way. At best, however, our self-determination is limited and at worst, dreadfully misused. We are, after all, a sinful race.

Mankind's self-determination is under Almighty God. Humanity has faculties (or if you prefer, functions) for self-determination. They were great before man fell and thereby ceased to operate wholly in God's moral will. God only is fully self-determined. No one tells Him what to do. Yet even He takes counsel with Himself (Gen. 1:26).

The first chapter of Isaiah's famous 'Book of Consolation' (Isa. 40–66) is heavily laden with this doctrine of divine self-determination. First, the prophet promises his downtrodden people, 'Behold, the Lord GOD ['Adhonai-Jehovah] comes' as deliverer (Isa. 40:10). God's utterly independent self-determination is then set forth in several questions: 'Who [else] has measured the waters in the hollow of his hand and marked off the heavens with a span, enclosed the dust of the earth in a measure and weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance? Who [else] has measured the Spirit of the Lord, or what man shows him his counsel? Whom did he consult, and who made him understand? Who ... showed him the way of understanding?' (Isa. 40:12–14). In each case the answer is, no one but God—'Adhonai-Jehovah.

Later we shall discuss life and activity as aspects of God's personality. They are prerequisites of self-consciousness and self-determination. In this respect, the Christian God is wholly different from the gods of the great oriental religions, i.e. Hinduism, Buddhism, Parseeism and others. There is no personal, self-conscious, self-determining, active, self-moving, living centre in these gods. The centre of reality is impersonal, unconscious, unmoving and certainly not alive. These religions are pantheistic at heart, God—in so far as it is correct to speak of the central fact of their religion as God—is personal only in mankind or other spirits. Although the notion is not entirely consistent with Hindu doctrines about escape from the wheel of finite existence, all (=God) is under the control of eternal, immutable laws. There is no rightful place for personality, freedom and consciousness in God Himself, for there is no Self. These attributes are held to be a defective condition wherever they appear.

These aspects of the God of the Bible have imparted a certain vibrant, joyous tone to biblical religion wherever and whenever it appears. It enables us to rejoice in our humanity and has inspired us to improve ourselves as redeemed in Christ. Awareness of these personal attributes in our God engenders a certain godly pride in being human and numbered among the people of such a God.

Excursus on the Will of God

The Bible speaks frequently of the will of God in such a way as to show that just as there is a ‘human will’ as a person so there is a ‘will of God’ as a person. Classical theologians of great repute (Augustine, Aquinas, Turretin, Strong, et al) warn us against carrying the parallel too far. Calvin makes the point at the very beginning of the Institutes, that to know one’s genuine human self-will is to know something of the Creator in whose image we are made.⁸ He immediately follows with warnings against carrying the simile too far, because of the sin in our hearts which distorts the image and leads to warped opinion, ignorance and even malice.⁹

It is apparent that freedom, or self-determination, in all wise, all holy, omniscient God has none of the strictures we must ascribe to ourselves, His finite creatures. Louis Berkhof discusses the will of God, as does this brief excursus, primarily ‘in relation to the faculty of self determination’. Though the will of God necessarily exhibits His nature (being, essence), His will is the free expression of the person who ‘is Who He is’. As others put it:

We must hold that the will of God is the cause of all things; and that He acts by the will, and not, as some have supposed, by a necessity of His nature.¹⁰

I say that God wills himself necessarily ... by an absolute necessity. He is the ultimate and the highest good. He is the ultimate end and highest good which cannot but will and love ... for he cannot nil his own glory or deny himself. But other things he wills freely because, since no created thing is necessary with respect to God but contingent (as he could do without them), so he wills all things ... (i.e. by the liberty not only of spontaneity, but also of indifference).¹¹

The will of God is the ultimate cause of all things. To join God’s will of this or that to His nature, without notice that God is a spirit who performs free acts of personal expression, leads to pantheism, not to the biblical God. Freedom is part of the law of His being.

The many biblical terms employed for God’s will presuppose God’s permanent character (nature), yet represent a variety of meanings, rendering it necessary to distinguish a range of meanings to ‘the will of God’. The three commonest of these words are employed in Ephesians 1:5, 9 and 11. Verse 5, in kjv, speaks of ‘the good pleasure [eudokia] of his will’ (thelēma); verse 9 repeats these words; while verse 11 has ‘the counsel [boulē] of his own will’ (thelēma). Though there is some overlapping of meaning in general use, the core thought of each suggests an important distinction. The third, boulē (pronounced boo-lay), lays emphasis on God’s will as purpose, plan, especially the decision of a divine consultation within the Godhead. The second, thelēma, is the more general term for what one wishes to happen. The first signifies what gives pleasure. So these terms distinguish God’s will as sometimes (1) what He has planned (decrees, predestination, election, the course of history, including the permission of sin and evil); (2) what God wishes or prefers (righteousness, obedience, that none shall perish); and (3) what gives God pleasure (fulfillment of His moral government, the repentance of sinners). Since, however, the New Testament does not strictly observe these apparent distinctions, further refinement is called for.

Classical theology has proposed the following. God's will in all its aspects is rightfully said to be both necessary and free. It is necessary in regard to Himself; that is, what He wills is true to who and what God is in Himself. However, 'God's will is free with respect to creation. He did not have to make the world ... Creation, preservation and salvation are free acts of God.'¹² Some distinguish between the decretive and preceptive will of God. The former refers to God's decrees or plan, by which from eternity He has determined all that shall come to pass, and the latter to rules for the life of moral beings. 'The former is always accomplished while the latter is often disobeyed.'¹³ This is to explain God's general call (invitation) to all people everywhere to repent and believe (which many reject), and the special call which, by Word and Spirit, brings some people to Christ.

God's desire for 'all people to be saved' may not be accompanied by His will to extend special influences to save them. These desires are meant by the phrase 'revealed will' in the old theologians: His purposes to bestow special grace by the phrase, 'secret will'.¹⁴

The secret will may also be said to refer to God's decrees, which are known only as He chooses to make them known to us. 'The secret things belong to the Lord our God, but the things that are revealed belong to us and to our children forever' (Deut. 29:29). This is the commonest and most important distinction. Everything God has not yet made known to us of the destiny of mankind and of things—His unrevealed counsels (Ps. 115:3; Dan. 4:17, 25, 32, 35; Rom. 8:18, 19; 11:33, 34; Eph. 1:5, 9, 11)—constitutes His secret will and is not accessible to us. However, the revealed will of God, that is His own word, 'is very near you. It is in your mouth and in your heart, so that you can do it' (Deut. 30:14 cf. Rom. 10:5–10). It is mainly the same as the above preceptive will of God.

The second group of attributes involved in the spiritual nature of God are life, activity and intelligence including purpose.

4. Life

Our God is the living God. The Bible is very explicit on this point. Perhaps the reader has noticed the rather frequent recurrence in Scripture of the phrase, 'the living God'. A few moments with a concordance will locate it in every section of the Bible from the Pentateuch—where Israel is reported to have 'heard the voice of the living God' speaking from Mount Horeb (Deut. 5:26)—to the book of Revelation, wherein a flying angel has 'the seal of the living God', and God is said to be 'him who is seated on the throne, who lives forever and ever' (Rev. 4:9).

As one examines the texts, it becomes apparent that 'the living God' is associated with all of God's attributes and works. These acquire new lustre from the association, while they in turn reflect light upon the meaning of the phrase, 'The Living God'.¹⁵ One of these many texts (Jer. 10:10, 11) explains why: 'But the Lord is the true God; he is the living God and the everlasting King. At his wrath the earth quakes, and the nations cannot endure his indignation. Thus shall you say to them:

“The gods who did not make the heavens and the earth shall perish from the earth and from under the heavens.” God is angry with the nations because they have given worship to idols, idols supposedly indwelt by deities who, the prophecy goes on to say, are empty and vain, non-existent (vv. 14, 15). ‘[T]here is no breath in them’ (v. 14). God the Creator, on the other hand (v. 12), continues to show Himself to be the living God by preserving the world that He created and by controlling it (His providence, v. 13).

Scripture indicates clearly how important it is that Jehovah is ‘the living God’ and why.

(1) God is greatly to be feared, because except for the elect people of God, who were prepared for the event at Sinai, no other can even hear God’s audible voice and live (Deut. 5:26). ‘It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God’ (Heb. 10:31). This, again, is in contrast to the idols of the heathen for whom the biblical believer should have nothing but contempt (Jer. 10:1–15 above). This must surely have been in Paul’s mind when he wrote to the Thessalonians of how they ‘turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God’ (1 Thess. 1:9). As the living God, He will show Himself powerful on behalf of His people, if they obey Him.

(2) Since He is the living God, His people may safely go on the offensive in pursuit of the goals of His kingdom: ‘the living God is among you and ... he will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites ...’ (Josh. 3:10; cf. 11–17). The living God also rescues His own from physical threats to their lives when His purpose and will are served thereby. To his great surprise, Nebuchadnezzar discovered this (Dan. 6, esp. vv. 25–27). The intrepid missionary preacher may safely pass by various promising exercises leading to fame and wealth, in favour of missionary life full of privations (1 Thess. 4:8) ‘because we have our hope set on the living God’ who has given ‘promise for the present life and also for the life to come’ (1 Tim. 4:8, 10).

(3) God’s eternal life is the ground of assurance of our future ‘resurrection of life’ (John 5:29), eternal life for His people. Jesus is the Mediator of that life of God to us, being Himself made after ‘the power of an indestructible life’ (Heb. 7:16) ‘As the living Father sent me’ (John 6:57). Moreover, having life in Himself (John 14:6), He said, ‘Because I live, you also will live’ (John 14:19). In heaven, where vision of His beatitude is plain, the ‘living creatures give glory and honour and thanks to him who is seated on the throne, who lives forever and ever’ (Rev 4:9).

5. Activity

This idea is scarcely separable from the idea of life. It is nevertheless a distinct feature of the biblical God, who can act. The prophets of the Old Testament pour scorn on the gods of the heathen (idols) which never move unless their devotees move them. Elaborate ceremonies—dressing, going to dinner, retiring for the night and similar—were conducted for the gods and goddesses of Mesopotamia. Their priests actually clothed, unclothed, fed and gave them such care. A recent lead article in The Biblical Archaeologist (now with a new name) describing in detail these fruitless processes would be hilariously funny if not so tragically unreal—utterly offensive to the God of Abraham, Issac and Jacob.

People intuitively discern action or possible action as an integral aspect of life, even though much that moves (acts) is not alive. It is self-movement which is a sign of life. The flicker of an eyelid restores hope of life for an unconscious person not known to be dead or alive, even though the movement (falling) of a long-dead tree is precisely a sign of death. There are passages of Scripture which employ 'dead' in the sense of absence of moving spirit (Jas. 2:26) and idols are said to be dead because they do nothing (Isa. 44:9–20; Jer. 10:1–11; see also Isa. 8:19).

These passages lay emphasis on the divine efficacy—not just activity. God acts effectually. As we shall see, when He acts, He does so omnipotently. The infinitely great, eternal Spirit, whom Christians worship as the one, true and living God, is willing and able to work. He who planned the heavens and earth and created them now sustains and rules them. As He wills, He may step into the orderly process of nature with mighty miracles as He did when He raised up Christ from the dead.

It is such a God as this whom the healthy heart seeks out in prayer and in other forms of worship declares: 'How lovely is your dwelling place, O Lord of hosts! My soul longs, yes, faints for the courts of the Lord; my heart and flesh sing for joy to the living God' (Ps. 84:1, 2).

God always has been an active being. Unitarianism, by depriving God of inner Trinitarian communion, would give Him nothing to do before creation and deism, by withdrawing God from His world, nothing since. In Christianity God is eternally the God who 'has something to do'. The triune God stood in no need of creating in order to have something to love. Before the world was there was in the Godhead no less to contemplate than after creation. Creation, providence and redemption were not dictated by necessity. The Trinity is the most rational of all doctrines, because only by it can God's eternal independence, as the living God who acts, be maintained. The alternative of a Unitarian doctrine of God proposes a desolate God who comes to limited blessedness only in creation of finite conscious life. In current 'process theology' God has not even yet discovered what He is going to be. He is growing with the world and apparently limited to that.

There are further practical benefits. I suggest two. (1) We are delivered from the hopelessness of human life in a world with only natural laws in control. The Maker of the laws of nature and of destiny is a person. People cannot in any absolute manner override or direct nature's caprices and their own destiny; but for His mercy's sake God can and did (at Calvary) and does so every day in response to prayers. (2) Moral living has sufficient motive. We are not just getting in harmony with 'nature's laws' but we 'serve the living and true God' (1 Thess. 1:9) who 'will bring every deed into judgment, with every secret thing, whether good or evil' (Eccles. 12:14). Also, one can revel in Jesus' comforting assurance that 'whoever gives you a cup of water to drink because you belong to Christ will by no means lose his reward' (Mark 9:41).

6. Intelligence

This word means true perception of facts as they are (knowledge), genuine awareness of the meaning of those facts (understanding) and ability to put all those facts in proper relation (wisdom). This aspect of the divine Spirit whom Christians call God must be noted and explained to protect ourselves against ideas fatal to biblical faith. These ideas are mainly of two kinds. On the one hand there is the doctrine that the world has no personal centre, creator or control, called God, only a certain substance, an 'it', in which inhere eternal 'principles' or 'laws'. In secularized Western lands, where Christianity has long held nominal allegiance of the majority, this doctrine usually appears in supposedly harmless guise. 'It' is called 'Nature', 'Mother Nature' or 'Mother Earth'. In German idealistic philosophy of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, God was homogenized with nature as ‘the Absolute’.

On the other hand, in pantheistic (all-is-God) religion, distinct knowledge of particular things is disparaged completely. Personal being is esteemed to be retrogression from the utter non-particularity of ultimate reality. Inasmuch as particular knowledge is denial of this ultimate, it is affirmed (in Hinduism, Buddhism, Theosophy, Rosacrucianism) that a God who knows is closer to the Christian idea of Satan than of our Lord Jesus’ holy Father. No pantheist can find the comfort of David’s assuring words, ‘As a father shows compassion to his children, so the Lord shows compassion to those who fear him. For he knows our frame; he remembers that we are dust’ (Ps. 103:13, 14). A Hindu can find some comfort from the ‘lesser’ spirits and gods of his religion. In this respect Hinduism is polytheistic.

The same is true of the cosmic evolutionism of Pierre Teilhard de Chardin. He would transform the Christian doctrine of the personal, living, acting triune God into a cosmic mechanism wherein every life is organically hooked to every other living thing—all in motion toward an omega point, the consummation of the cosmic evolutionary process. This point he calls Christ. Life runs according to an anatomy of fixed laws.

There is something similar in the panentheism of process theology. Its god is growing with the cosmos, scarcely distinguishable from it. One of the leading advocates in America, John B. Cobb, Jr, identifies Christ with the process of universal change. Though he claims to have constructed a synthesis of traditional orthodoxy and Modernism, he has conformed this theology to a congeries of current and discarded pantheisms. As Teilhard, Cobb has joined his pantheism to evolutionism.

C. S. Lewis has deftly removed the mask of modernity and of scholarship from the ancient delusion of pantheism and limns that contrast well:

Pantheism certainly is ... congenial to the modern mind; but the fact that a shoe slips on easily does not prove that it is a new shoe—much less that it will keep your feet dry ... it is almost as old as we are. It may even be the most primitive of all religions ... It is immemorial in India. The Greeks rose above it only at their peak, in the thought of Plato and Aristotle; their successors relapsed into the great Pantheistic system of the Stoics. Modern Europe escaped it only while she remained predominantly Christian ... Pantheism is in fact the permanent natural bent of the human mind ... Pantheism ... has only one really formidable opponent—namely Christianity ... Yet, by a strange irony, each new relapse into this immemorial ‘religion’ is hailed as the last word in novelty and emancipation.¹⁶

The human mind has an apparent universal impulse toward pantheism.

‘Nature knows’, or ‘Mother Nature’ teaches the birds where to make their nests, are forms of statements utterly out of place in a Christian setting. For Christians, the personal Creator remains in personal support and government of the whole order of nature. Psalm 104 is instructive in this regard. The clouds, with shafts of light beaming through, are like garments and chambers for Him, since He makes them (vv. 1–3). The winds and lightnings are His messengers (vv. 3, 4). He holds earth steady

(v. 5) and God covered the oceanic mountains with water (v. 6). The thunder is His voice (v. 7). Streams, springs, wild animals, plants and the like, are directly dependent on Him. Our daily cycle of life is God's order for us. Many of God's works are involved in this justly famous literary display of the personal Creator's personal involvement in all of material nature—for our benefit and ultimately for God's own glory.

The present reason for citing these matters is that it is God's personal knowledge that insures nature's practicality, its success, its magnificent rhythms and cycles. This point is made by the anonymous Psalmist, himself: 'O Lord, how manifold are your works', he says (Ps. 104:24a), and we think of 'the living God' and of His activity noted earlier. Then the Psalm continues, 'In wisdom have you made them all' (v. 24b).

All the wisdom of the creatures of nature in their manifold life-processes, all operating to preserve the order of nature in what we have come to call 'ecological balance', has been planted there by God. Nature 'knows' nothing in the sense of rational knowledge.

The tilled acres of the farm where Mrs Culver and I live has recently been turned into three pasture fields where thirteen of a distant neighbour's cows and their calves grow fat. Four days ago they escaped into the surrounding forest through a gate thoughtlessly left open by a turkey hunter and disappeared for two days. Then yesterday they reappeared in a nearer neighbour's 'new seeding' of alfalfa a mile from where they left the open gate. The owner of the animals and his son-in-law came and as savvy operators gently started the anxious mothers moving back toward the forest and the distant gate. They 'remembered' each twist and turn through the gulches and ridges, even an abrupt 120 degree hillside turn, re-entering the pasture through the open gate that had enabled their wandering adventures two days before. There was no intellectual content in this bovine 'knowledge' of 'the way home', only some genetically derived instinct implanted not by impersonal nature but by the living God. In this way animals sometimes 'know' what people ought to know, but do not: 'The ox knows its owner, and the donkey its master's crib, but Israel does not know, my people do not understand' (Isa. 1:3). This is one of the 'facts of nature' placed in contrast to the ignorance of Job and his friends by the Lord in the argument of the book of Job (Job 38–41).

We often speak of birds or fish as if they were knowing subjects, as when we say the migratory salmon know how to return to the place of their hatching in order to lay and fertilize their own eggs. But this is anthropomorphism—transferring of human characteristics to subhuman. 'The Lord by wisdom founded the earth; by understanding he established the heavens; by his knowledge the deeps broke open, and the clouds drop down the dew' (Prov. 3:19, 20).

God is characterized in Scripture as 'a God of knowledge' (1 Sam. 1:3); His Spirit is 'the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel ... the Spirit of knowledge' (Isa. 11:2). A person, when he impudently speaks of God's character and ways, without consulting what God has said about the subject first, is one who 'darkens counsel by words without knowledge' (Job 38:2). God challenges: 'Shall a faultfinder contend with the Almighty?' (Job 40:2). The end of Job's debate came when the free, living, acting, personal, knowing God simply overwhelmed him by His knowledge of nature and mankind's ignorance of it (Job 38–41). The only proper response was the one Job made—he repented in dust and ashes (Job 42:6). So it should be with today's scientists (Latin for 'knowledgeists') who challenge God's rightful place in nature, beneath nature and above it. 'Shall ...

the thing made ... say of its maker, "He did not make me"; or the thing formed say of him who formed it, "He has no understanding"?" (Isa. 29:16).

It is not in nature, however, that God's wisdom shall be most fully revealed. The church of Christ, the household of belief in the one true living God, is yet to be the scene of the manifestation of that wisdom, in spite of all her failures here below and in spite of all her detractors (Eph. 3:10, 11).

Earlier comments in this chapter on the will of God spoke of God's purpose and purposes as later chapters will speak of His plan (decree) for all creation. That the living God, who is a person, should have purpose in being alive is not a mere anthropomorphism. Yet as human beings we cannot think of God apart from His having plans deep in the center of His being. Living is not a mere anthropomorphism. Yet as human beings we cannot think of God apart from His having plans deep in the center of His being. We know in ourselves that life without purpose is life without meaning, even if we do not reflect on our goals or if we do not clearly formulate them. We have already taken notice of passages relating to God's eternal purposes. Isaiah speaks of God's 'purpose that is purposed concerning the whole earth' and adds, 'For the Lord of hosts has purposed, and who will annul it?' (Isa. 14:26, 27). Paul's most exalted prose reflects on God's attribute of purposiveness.

Let us close this consideration of features of the spiritual nature of God with Paul's ecstatic exclamation: 'God ... created all things, so that through the church the manifold wisdom of God might now be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places. This was according to the eternal purpose that he has realized in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Eph. 3:9b-11).

¹ St. Augustine, Confessions VII. (Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1973), p. 104 ff.

² V. J. Bourke, Augustine's Quest of Wisdom (Milwaukee: Bruce Publ., 1945), p. 57.

³ Augustine, op. cit., pp. 17, 23.

⁴ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969), p. 166.

⁵ Westminster Confession, Chapter II, par. 1.

⁶ The Muslim Arabs refer to the great building over the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (Gen. 23) as el Kahlil, the Friend, in reverence for Abraham's connection with the place.

⁷ Shedd, op. cit., p. 179.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

⁸ Calvin, Institutes I, 1–3.

⁹ ibid., iv.

¹⁰ Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, Part One, Q 19, art. 5.

¹¹ Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology 3rd Topic, 14th Question, paragraph 5.

¹² M. E. Osterhaven, ‘Will of God’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1984, 1991), p. 1172.

¹³ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1941, 1979), p. 11.

¹⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 791.

¹⁵ A. H. Strong, Philosophy and Religion (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1888), pp. 180–188.

¹⁶ C. S. Lewis, Miracles (New York: Macmillan, 1945), pp. 84, 85.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (66). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

10

The Unity of the Godhead

‘[T]he Lord is God in heaven above and on the earth beneath; there is no other’ (Deut. 4:39)

One might suppose the trinity of the Godhead to be more difficult to explain than God’s unity. Moreover, it is correct to say that the Trinity, like the two natures of Christ, posed a severe problem for the early Christians to formulate in a manner true to Scripture and at least amenable to reason even if not fully explicable. Yet such is not entirely correct. Wolfhart Pannenberg, for one, has delineated how the New Testament clearly represents God, the forever invisible, dwelling in inaccessible light (1 Tim. 6:16), made known by the Son who is visible in the flesh (Matt. 11:27), citing Luther’s famous formulae, God is both deus revelatus (God revealed) and deus absconditus (God concealed, unknown). Even in Christ (says Luther) God is revealed as still concealed. In other words, God ‘whom no one has ever seen or can see’ (1 Tim. 6:16) is still true God even though revealed in the life, words and work of Jesus. After all, Paul wrote these words long after the incarnation had occurred. Our problem is how are we to affirm God’s essence as one possessed fully by each ‘person’—Father, Son and Holy Spirit?¹

Christians have had difficulty explaining the oneness of their Trinitarian God to adamantly monotheistic Jews from the beginning, and forever afterward to Muslims. Pannenberg comments:

The theology of the early church realized that the incomprehensibility of God applies to the essence and qualities of the living God and not merely to the statements of the doctrine of the Trinity.²

Christians then, as now, needed to affirm to themselves that their God is one, identical with the Jehovah of the Old Testament, even though in that divine essence there are three who possess the infinite essence entire without division.

Interestingly, Eastern scholars—the three Cappadocians, Basil, and the two Gregories of Nyssa and Nazianzus—went to work seriously on the problem of the one and the three only after the First Ecumenical Council (ad 325) had spelled out the full deity of the Second Person. Though orthodox Trinitarians contended with unitarian Arianism for a long time, these three Fathers sought with acknowledged success to state the unity and the Trinity in a way true both to sound reason and the Scriptures. They were pressed to do so not only to clarify their orthodoxy to themselves but also to defend it from the Arians. Further, others were mounting seriously flawed explanations that they felt required to resist. The writings of one, Eunomius, Arian bishop of Cyzicus (d. 394), were the trigger for some of the most definitive works of the Cappadocians.³

First, there was the lesser task of repudiating ‘the superstition of polytheism’.⁴

[T]he God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was one God; and the God of the [more advanced] philosophers [of the day], rightly understood was one God. But was the God confessed as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit by Christians, both orthodox and heretical, still one God, and one in the same sense? It was the fundamental argument of the Cappadocian case for Nicene trinitarianism that authentic monotheism was the rejection of the many [of polytheism] for the sake of the One. The ground of that argument was formulated by Basil: ‘The terms ‘one’ and ‘only’ are predicated of God not to mark a distinction from the Son and the unreal gods falsely so called.’⁵

As to the Trinity of Persons, the Cappadocians were the first to explain and defend at length that every attribute properly assigned by Scripture or sanctified reason to God was fully shared qualitatively and infinitely by the Son and the Spirit no less than the Father. This is an emphasis of their doctrine and ours today as believing, orthodox Christians, when we affirm the unity of God. I know of no historical resource more complete, learned and faithful to history, Scripture and orthodox theology than Pelikan’s entire work Christianity and Classical Culture cited above.

The scientific study of religions practised around the world has produced a large number of special terms helpful in any study of the subject. These terms are often employed in such a manner as to indicate stages in a supposed evolutionary development of religion. Such, however, is not necessarily the case, any more than a classification of forms of life, past and present, on this earth necessarily implies organic evolution. Any classification inevitably moves from simplicity to complexity or the reverse. Single-celled animals (or plants) may be at the lower end of the scale of classification and vertebrate mammals at the other, but no organic development from one level of the scale to another is necessarily inherent in the scheme. Evolution may be in some scientists’ scheme of classification, but not necessarily in the specimens classified. So it is with a scientific classification of religions. The informed Christian student of his own faith will be well advised to get acquainted with some of the special terms of formal discussion of religions and of ideas about God.

Special Vocabulary of Study of Religions

Several terms are employed to describe what is usually thought to be the lowest forms of religion.

There are people who wear charms, amulets—objects to bring good luck to the bearer and to ward off bad luck. The belief prompting the practice is known as dynamism (from Greek dynamis, power). Some sort of non-material (spiritual is hardly the word), but impersonal, power is thought to pervade everything, but especially the material object worn. This form of belief may be held in common with other ideas about religion.

Fetishism is a refinement of dynamism: a particular, powerful spirit is thought to inhabit some material object. Perhaps some beneficial incident seemed to take place in connection with a man-made object or some portable natural object. Afterward a man or his tribe adopts the object and venerates it, even carrying it along in migration or warfare.

Animism is a belief in nature spirits—many of them. They are thought to inhabit streams, springs, trees, waterfalls, mountains and so on. The phenomena of nature are thought to be caused by them.

Totemism is a system wherein a family, clan or tribe is grouped according to totems. Totems are usually animals to which the family, clan or tribe considers itself related by blood and which affect affairs of life, death and the hereafter. Totemism, as a form of worship, is very common among primitive peoples living close to nature.

Taboo is a group prohibition placed on certain people, places and things, rendering them untouchable and sometimes even unmentionable, not even to be looked at. It is an accompaniment of dynamism.

All of these beliefs exist, sometimes coexist, in very low levels of culture.

Ancestor-worship is a self-explanatory feature of worship even among some cultivated peoples, eminently the Chinese.

On a more ‘advanced’ level of culture and presumably, therefore, one in which people are more reflective, there is a tendency ‘to universalize various types of phenomena and identify each with a particular deity such as a god of storms, another of harvest and another of procreation’.⁶ We are familiar with this in the classical polytheism of Greeks and Romans and in the less-publicized, pre-literate worship of the nations of western and northern Europe. This form of worship of ‘many gods’ is memorialized in several of the days of our week—Thor in Thursday, Wotan in Wednesday and in June (for Juno), January (for Janus), March (for Mars), and so on, among the months of the year. The Old Testament preserves fragments of ancient Near-Eastern polytheism in the names of several gods and goddesses (Baal, Hadad, Moloch, Ashtoreth, etc.). Scholars disagree as to whether these deities represent a breaking up of the functions of nature from some more unified way of looking at things or the personification of the multifarious powers of nature.

An invariable accompaniment of polytheism is idolatry, wherein an image of the god, thought to be the actual local seat of the god’s person (these gods are human beings writ large), is worshiped. The idol and the god are identified in the worshiper's thought, however stupid that might appear to a man of Elijah's, Jeremiah's, Isaiah's or Paul's insights.

The association between idol and its distinct god or goddess is thought to be permanent. No informed Israelite, on the contrary, supposed that the Philistines had captured Jehovah when the Philistines took away the ark of testimony, but when the idol Dagon fell off his pedestal in the presence of the ark, the Philistines 'took Dagon and put him back in his place' (see 1 Sam. 5:1-3).

There are examples of monolatry wherein one of the many gods is chosen for a special place and afterward worshiped as sole practising deity. On a somewhat more sophisticated level there have been cases wherein a king would designate a certain single god as the only one worthy of worship, meanwhile regarding the other deities of the nation and its neighbours as real. The worship of the sun-god at Thebes at a certain stage of Egypt's history (fourteenth century bc) was this sort of henotheism (worship of only one god among many acknowledged to exist).

Dualism regards matter and spirit (or mind) as each an eternally real principle and orders life in relation to these two principles. In such a case, matter is held to be evil, spirit good. Parseism, the modern form of ancient Zoroastrianism, is a contemporary, overtly dualistic religion.

Pantheism regards all that exists as manifestation of a single impersonal substance or principle. Hinduism, Buddhism and several cults of oriental origin—theosophy, Rosicrucianism and transcendental meditation—are pantheistic. Deism affirms the sole existence of one creator-God, wholly transcendent, having no present relation with creation. It is often a phenomenon of advanced civilizations. There have been, however, few fully consistent deists.

Monotheism is the worship of one Supreme Being, personal and ethical, transcendent above the world as creator, yet immanent in the world as its preserver and ruler. Judaism and Islam are, besides Christianity, the only historic monotheistic faiths. Theism is a form of monotheism. As understood by Christian writers, theism includes the idea that God is self-revealing as in miracles and prophecy and (in the case of Christian theism) in Jesus Christ our Lord. Usually, whether stated or not, Christian theism is the view of deity which the author employing the term 'theism' thinks it means.

Scholars inclined toward naturalistic interpretations of all faiths like to find examples of all these forms of religion in the growth of Israel's religion. They draw no distinction, for example, between Rachel's evident reverence for the portable family idols and Israel's use of the portable Ark of the Covenant, or between Nebuchadnezzar's evident henotheism and Abram's worship of the Most High God. Whatever may be said for the low level of perception of true worship among the Hebrews when God first delivered them from the pagan atmosphere of Ur and Haran (see Josh. 24:2), the revealed faith, that worship which the Bible from beginning to end inculcates, is monotheism and theism. It must be acknowledged, that far from manifesting any 'genius for religion', as some Jewish writers like to say, the Hebrews certainly were tardy in understanding their own religion. The history and prophecy of their Scriptures painfully relate this sad story. It was consummated at the rejection of their Messiah.

It remains to be added that outside of Christianity and Judaism, and to a lesser degree Islam, peoples of the world have generally been aware of no inconsistency in holding several religious views at the same time. Polytheists, for example, may also be animists and fetish-worshippers in addition to their idolatry, the twin of polytheism everywhere. Polytheism, idolatry and animism flourish in Hindu pantheism.

Why Believe in One God?

In chapter 2, some of the reasons why people do believe in God were introduced, but little was said about why we should believe in only one God, even though monotheism was the assumption upon which we proceeded. It must be admitted, however, that approaching the subject from a rational standpoint, more must be said before those evidences point unmistakably toward the monotheistic ideal of all Christians.

1. It is interesting that antiquity provides many examples of monotheistic conceptions, if not of monotheistic faith. One of the pharaohs of Egypt led his people temporarily as far as henotheism when he proclaimed and enforced the worship of the sun-god alone. Theos, the commonest abstract Greek word for God, appears often in the singular number among the later Greek writers. Several philosophers expressed theoretical (hardly religious) ideas close to monotheism: Xenophanes, Heraclitus, Anaxagoras, in addition to Socrates, Plato and Aristotle. After Alexander (fourth century bc) the Greek civilizing influence grew strong everywhere and the Roman Empire brought stability. The upper classes of literate people were particularly exposed to the new conditions. Among them, faith in the polytheistic deities declined. Many people pondered the possibility of one single, personal, creator-God. All the rational proofs available to us were available to them also. The Greeks and Romans pondered them. It is true that, 'In the historic development of religion there is a tendency for thought to move in the direction of monotheism ... It is no accident that as a religious people increase in knowledge, in powers of discipline, in systematic thought and depth of cultural experience they tend to move toward monotheism.'⁷ Is not this fact in itself strong evidence for the sole existence of one creator-God, Lord of history? Consider the unlikelihood of the contrary development of history. The growth of civilization, education and mental culture toward a climax in polytheism or animism is very unlikely and, as far as I know, without historical precedent.

2. The coherence of the material universe into a single system of cause and effect suggests rather forcefully that there is a single all-wise, all-powerful, everywhere-present, personal power behind it. The more science probes the minute and infinitesimally small, the more it appears that all matter and energy are aspects of a cosmic system. The same system of causes and effects seems to prevail in the farthest reaches of space. We, then, live truly in a universe not a 'pluriverse' or 'multiverse'. People can rationally formulate laws of cause and effect which are valid everywhere. This makes it more reasonable to believe in one 'prime mover' or 'first cause' rather than several.

3. The coherence of all authentic abstract truths in a single system is further evidence that the God of creation is one. These abstract data exist quite apart from the people who discover them. In the small business houses of all China, people figure the bills of customers on a frame of parallel spokes on which wooden rings are moved, called an abacus. The nearby grocery has replaced the mechanical cash register with a computerized machine. Our paint merchant uses a hand-held electric calculator. My mother uses pencilled figures on paper to add up her bills. (I let my wife figure them out!) The data and results of all mathematics, however, (4 multiplied by 3; 10 plus 2; 20 minus 8; 72 divided by 6: all yield the number 12) are invariable and universal.

The same is true of formal logic as taught in the schools of philosophy, whether the classical system of Aristotle's or modern symbolic logic. These are true laws of reality. They can be discovered and formulated but never invented. Deduction and induction are nothing but aspects of one all-inclusive system of abstract truth. Abstract truth underlying or accompanying all other truths is a universal network, existing in perfection. This system sets bounds and binds us all. There is no rational existence as mankind without submitting to it. We call people crazy who do not. If this system of universal abstract truth is attributable to the mind(s) that created us, not to the rational discoverers of it, is it not rational, within the system of rational truth, to attribute it to One rather than to many?

4. Another argument is an extension of the anthropological or moral argument for the existence of God: there is a system of ethical ideals, adherence to which is necessary for any sort of order in any community, from a simple partnership to a civilized world order. Loyalty to ideals and to legitimate human leaders is necessary to civil order; honesty, to the flow of trade; truthfulness, equally necessary to science or business; discipline of children, to family, school, civil commonwealth. The Old Testament Decalogue, though given by God at Sinai, is a kind of moral consensus, necessary to 'the greatest happiness for the greatest number'. Generally speaking, except perhaps for the prohibition of images in worship, the Ten Commandments are praised around the whole world. There is, indeed, beneath the multiplicity of rules concerning social life (sumptuary laws) and rules of custom (consuetudinary laws) a single system of moral law. These ideal norms are objective and real, even though stated in different ways. The 'Golden Rule' of Jesus, for example, can also be found in the teachings of several moral philosophers (Confucius, Socrates, Buddha, Santayana) of widely separated epochs and places. Does not this single, universal, accepted standard of human behavior argue forcefully for a single moral Mind, rather than several, for its cause?

5. There is also a certain logic from the nature of religious devotion which impels toward the conviction that God is one. We are told in the Bible, of course, that we must love the Lord our God with the whole of our being. The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob allows no competitors. He is a 'jealous God'. Let us turn this fact upside-down. Thoughtful, cultivated worshipers of deity, in any religion, are apt to assume that their god desires single-minded, whole-souled worship. They tend to become devotees of a single deity, even while appeasing competing deities. Schleiermacher (1768–1834), a most influential theologian, insisted that religious experience has an inner logic which, when developed, impels toward faith in a single divine Being. In this respect, he seems to have been right. There is, in this way, an argument from the very nature of religious devotion for a single object of worship.

The teaching of Scripture is on a totally different level. The sole existence of one, authentic, creator-God is assumed from the opening statement, 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth' to the claim of the last chapter, 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end.' Let us see how the biblical evidence stands, what it means, and what the consequences for our thinking and action are.

Evolution Toward Monotheism in the Bible?

Someone, however, wants to know if there is not to be discerned in the Bible a beginning in low forms of religion and a subsequent evolution toward monotheism, triumphant at last. Is there not even evidence that some of the heroes and heroines of the early narratives, such as Abraham and Sarah,

Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel, Moses and his family, and others, practiced lower forms of religion such as animism and fetishism? Did they not really slowly move from acknowledgment of the existence of lesser gods, that is, polytheism, through henotheism to the true monotheism of the great prophets of Israel?

An affirmative answer to this question, it is said, is found in many features of the Old Testament. Abraham's attraction to the oaks of Mamre as a place to live implies belief that favourable spirits dwelt in those trees (animism), we are told. Isaac's well-known interest in certain springs and wells is evidence of the same. When Jacob returned to the environs of Bethel where his grandfather had spent some time, and rested his head on a stone for a pillow, he demonstrated an animism or even fetishism which believes in the good influence of the spirits in portable objects. The story of angels descending and ascending, though told in good monotheistic framework, is said to rest upon the animism and fetishism of Jacob's time.

When 'the Lord ... sought to put him [Moses] to death' at an inn in the desert (Exod. 4:24–26) on account of the neglect of circumcision of his son, Jehovah, Himself, is said to behave like a demon of the wilderness, showing the superstition of the time and low views of God. The Ark of the Covenant—just a gold-cased wooden box—is evidence of fetish-like beliefs. In addition, the many references to the object of Abraham's worship, as well as of his later progeny, as 'the Most High God', imply acknowledgment of lesser deities. The language of the historical sections of the Old Testament, we are assured, in no wise denies the existence of the gods of fertility and of weather (Baal, Moloch, Hadad and the like) of Israel's neighbours. It only marks their rejection by Israel's best leaders as proper objects of Israel's devotion, we are told. Much of what goes for Old Testament theology and the history of Israel in current liberal literature follows this line of thinking—of which a leading example is Gerhard von Rad's Old Testament Theology.

In response, several things can be said to relieve the Bible-reader from acceptance of any such inferences as these. First of all, the claims rest on no straightforward declarations of the Bible. That is to say, the Bible teaches none of these things. They are all inferences drawn from a so-called history of Israel reconstructed upon evolutionary principles and literary analysis of the nineteenth-century type. Both the historical reconstruction and the literary analysis are now somewhat out of style and have been rendered doubtful by twentieth-century findings of archaeology. Yet recent 'liberal' scholars seem to have dropped few of the types of pejorative estimates of Old Testament religion just cited. A representative 'modernist' writer speaks of the 'intermittent monotheism' of the earlier writers while insisting on a final triumph of monotheism.⁸

That many of the Israelites were more henotheistic than monotheistic may readily be granted. We know that some of Abram's ancestral family practised polytheism, as did many of the children of Israel during their sojourn in Egypt (Josh. 24:3). We cannot explore Abram's mind, but God's self-revelation as Almighty God (Gen. 17:2) and Abram's assurance that his God was 'Judge of all the earth' (Gen. 18:25) are quite inconsistent with henotheism. Furthermore, 'the Most High God' of Melchizedek and of Abram (Gen. 14:18, 19) was 'Possessor of heaven and earth'. Thus, the alleged henotheism turns out on examination of the actual text of scripture to be full-blown ethical theism, or monotheism.

The inferences about Abram's trees, Jacob's stone pillow, the ark of Testimony and such like are not necessary inferences, but tendentious assertions resting on the slender evidence of higher-critical orthodoxy, not sound history and literary study. This orthodoxy shoots its bullet into the barn door, then draws circles around the hole made by their projectile and proclaims: 'Bull's Eye'!

It may be freely acknowledged that many of the good people of Old Testament times partially misunderstood their own religion. Apostasy to idols and polytheism, as is plain to be read, was a constant threat. Certain elements of the Israelite population were drawn to occult practices and raw heathenism (2 Kings 17:6–23; cf. Deut. 18:9–14). It was for their backslidings that the two Israelite nations came to an end. Nevertheless, in no case does the Scripture for a moment even hint that the God of its pages is less than personal Creator, Sustainer, Governor and moral Judge of all the earth and heaven.

Direct Biblical Affirmations of Monotheism

The statements of this doctrine, as with most Bible truths, are generally in connection with some command or duty, the doctrine furnishing the motive power for obedience.

Never mind that some of the strongest statements of all, from Deuteronomy, are said by the reigning liberal orthodoxy to come from the late kingdom epoch rather than the Mosaic. There is no doubt that on the Bible's own ground the first testimonies in the literary order of the Bible are also the earliest. Only by rejecting the Bible's own testimony to Moses' monotheism can an Amos have been the inventor of Old Testament monotheism, or, as some say, if not Amos, an anonymous prophet in the time of the Babylonian exile, author of Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–66). Observe that these early statements from Deuteronomy constitute a full, vigorous, uncompromising affirmation of the substantial unity of the Godhead. They have never been superseded.

In Deuteronomy Moses reminded Israel that God showed to them the miracles of deliverance from Egypt and the theophany at Sinai, 'that you might know that the Lord is God; there is no other besides him' (Deut. 4:35). These words were spoken in the context of Moses' dying exhortation to unswerving loyalty to Jehovah and to His revealed faith. Moses went on to say: 'Hear [Hebrew shema ' , hence, the Shema '], O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your might' (Deut. 6:4, 5). There is only one God, hence all worshipful love anywhere by anyone is due Him.

The theology of the poetical books of the Old Testament is profoundly and exclusively an ethical monotheism. Occasional reference to other deities (as for example, 'Who is like thee among the gods?') must be interpreted in view of the uniform monotheism. We should understand them as referring to alleged gods, as did Elijah, who, while ridiculing the non-god Baal, spoke of him in taunting the Baalish prophets as though existent (1 Kings 18:17–29, esp. v. 27).

The prophets of the Old Testament, Isaiah in particular, had a striking way of asserting the sole existence of the God of Israel. With their assertions, they provided proofs derived from His knowledge of the future and power to communicate it to His servants, the prophets. Let us note some powerful examples.

‘Thus says the Lord, the King of Israel and his Redeemer, the Lord of hosts: “I am the first and I am the last; besides me there is no god. Who is like me? Let him proclaim it.” (Isa. 44:6, 7). Verse 6 makes fulfillment of prophetic predictions a solid proof of God’s sole existence as Lord of time. Is He not ‘the Father of Eternity’ (Isa. 9:6 asv marg.)? The passage continues this theme through 45:1–6. In it, the coming of the Persian King Cyrus, 150 years later, in fulfillment of Isaiah’s predictions of him, is said to prove ‘I am the Lord, and there is no other, besides me there is no God; I equip you [Cyrus], though you do not know me, that people [on earth] may know, from the rising of the sun and from the west, that there is none besides me; I am the Lord, and there is no other’ (Isa. 45:5, 6). The ethical teaching (i.e. duty) is to believe God’s prophetic messengers and their message of Jehovah’s sole existence as God.

Mark 12:28–34 tells how Jesus employed the Shema ‘ (Deut. 6:4) to instruct a somewhat hypocritical, but inquiring, scribe in the duty of undivided love for God. In John 5:44, Jesus refers to deity as ‘the only God’ and in His high priestly prayer as ‘the only true God’ (John 17:3). In the former case, Jesus is teaching the importance of seeking God’s approval rather than man’s and in the latter Jesus asserts the high privilege of true Christian worship.

Four citations from Paul display much of the religious and moral meaning of the sole existence of one God. Since God is ‘one God’, there is only one way of salvation for all classes of people (Rom. 3:19, 30). Since there is only one God, the idols of the heathen are bogus deities (1 Cor. 8:4, 5). In an oft-recited benediction Paul invokes ‘the only God’ (1 Tim. 1:17) as the only source of human happiness and as the end of all praise and honour. He employs the same doctrine to appeal for steadfastness in Christian duties (1 Tim. 6:16).

James cites the ‘one God’ as worthy of faith (James 2:19) and Jude 4 speaks of denial of the same as most reprehensible.

These are only a few selected texts that speak specifically to the point. The whole Bible breathes the atmosphere of worship and love for that ‘blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality, who dwells in unapproachable light, whom no one has ever seen or can see. To him be honour and eternal dominion. Amen’ (1 Tim. 6:15, 16).

Let us guard against several common misunderstandings of the biblical statements.

(1) God is one, not in the sense of a generic name, as equus for all horses or homo for all members of the human race.

(2) Nor do the biblical declarations of the essential unity of God mean that there is merely a moral or intellectual agreement of entities in one.

(3) Nor does the affirmation mean unity in the sense of union. Certain Trinitarian expositors of the Shema ‘ have seemed to err in this direction. The affirmation univocally designates singularity. There is numerically one indivisible, undistributed, living God. It is God’s inherent nature to be one.

(4) The doctrine of biblical monotheism (as previously suggested) does not exclude the possibility that certain other objects of human discourse, real or supposed, may be ‘called gods’. Idols worshipped as gods are called gods in the Bible and the supposed, but unreal, unseen deities of polytheism are also called gods (see 1 Cor. 8:4, 5). If we understand Paul correctly, even though the supposed divine objects of the Greek-Roman Pantheon have never existed, there are certain divinely created, but fallen, corrupt, evil, unseen spirits, called demons, who sometimes appropriate the service offered to idols by corrupt worship. In chapter 8 of 1 Corinthians Paul specifically brands the gods and lords of heathenism as being quite as unreal as their idol effigies. Yet, he enlarges on the subject in chapter 10 by saying, ‘Consider the people of Israel: are not those who eat the sacrifices participants in the altar? What do I imply then? That food offered to idols is anything, or that an idol is anything? No, I imply that what pagans sacrifice they offer to demons and not to God. I do not want you to be participants with demons. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons’ (1 Cor. 10:18–21). In this text the apostle clearly distinguishes between malevolent spirits, i.e. daimonioi (demons) and theoi (gods). The pagan thinks he worships gods but they really are not in that class where only One exists. Created evil spirits do exist and may be associated with the pagan idols.

(5) The doctrine of monotheism does not forbid the possibility of more than one person in the Godhead, for Jesus Himself affirmed, ‘I and the Father are one’ (John 10:30). How this can be true will be treated more at length in the chapter, ‘The Trinity of the Godhead’.

Biblical Proofs of Monotheism

The Bible has its own methods of proof of this teaching. As we have seen, certain events were employed at the time of the Exodus to establish Israel in monotheism and to insure their perseverance in worship of only one God throughout the future.

First, there were the mighty works of God, properly called miracles, associated with Israel’s deliverance from Egypt. Moses was to identify himself and also to verify (certify) himself as a true messenger of the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob by three remarkable signs (miracles). These are mentioned specifically in Exodus 4:1–9: the changing of his inert rod into a serpent; the changing of Moses’ normal hand to a white leprous one, at his will, and the reversal of the same back to normal again; and the taking of water from the Nile which, as Moses poured it on the dry ground, became blood. Verses 28–31 tell how Moses, ably seconded by his brother Aaron, performed the miracles, with the result that ‘the people believed’. Later a series of even greater miracles, which we call the ten plagues, convinced Israel even more deeply and made a similar impression even on the magicians of Egypt (see Exod. 8:19). The stubbornness of Pharaoh was God’s way of rendering necessary all the miracles and in doing so strengthened conviction among the Israelites (Exod. 14:30, 31). This unique method was God’s way of certifying the messengers who announced the truth of the sole existence of the God of Israel. In this case, God authenticated Himself as sole God by the inauthenticity of all the gods of Egypt.

Moses and Aaron also relied on prediction and its fulfillment to authenticate themselves and their message. We have already noted this in connection with biblical testimony to monotheism in an earlier chapter. Each of the miracles called the ten plagues involved prediction and fulfillment in the near future. Even the Son of God, Second Person of the triune God, employed these proofs.⁹

Religious Values of Monotheism

There are many religious values derived specifically out of monotheism. Believers are delivered from the frustration of not knowing whom to try to please, as in all non-monotheist systems. As the clear biblical truth is blurred or perverted in Christendom, the confusion returns. We now notice this confusion in current efforts to placate the demi gods of occultism. An over emphasis on the personality and alleged powers of Satan and his minions has produced superstitious fears even among some uninformed orthodox Christians. They come to fear the strange, the dimly lighted and the weird as though the only omnipotent God were not in control of mankind and nature. ‘They sacrificed to demons that were no gods, to gods they had never known, to new gods that had come recently, whom your fathers had never dreaded. You were unmindful of the Rock that bore you, and you forgot the God who gave you birth’ (Deut. 32:17, 18). The worship-like veneration that multitudes of modern, secularized, de-Christianized people pay to science, government, ‘the environment’ and even to education is a servitude to new gods. Some, having abandoned belief in their fathers’ God, pay their offerings in taxes to support the bloated budgets of contemporary civil government on its several levels.

The Bible assures us that there is a single God for the entire human race. Therefore, even though there may be a ‘chosen people’, God’s ultimate goal is a blessing of ‘all the nations’ (Gen. 12:1–4). The sinner in Russia or Albania is quite as loved by God as the sinner in Britain, the Netherlands or Canada. The doctrine of racial equality before God rests in part on this ethical monotheism no less than on the image of the one, true God that every child of Adam bears.

The principle of the uniformity of nature, which makes true science possible, rests upon the same truth. It is no accident that the age of science (not to neglect scientific achievements elsewhere) had its origin and greatest development in Christian lands. Though theoretical scientists, as a group, do not seem especially prone to devotion, and lamentably have their share of aggressive, self-proclaimed atheists, denial of the existence of the one God of Christian theism is by no means universal among competent scientists.

¹ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology vol. i (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991), chapter. 6, ‘The Unity and Attributes of God’. I have paraphrased Pannenberg.

² ibid., p. 342.

³ Somewhat later Augustine was working out the Christian repudiation of polytheism in his The Kingdom of God.

⁴ Gregory of Nyssa, Against Eunomius 3.2.94, cited by Pelikan (see footnote 5).

⁵ Jaroslav Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1993). p. 232.

⁶ L. Harold DeWolf, A Theology of the Living Church (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953), p. 89.

⁷ ibid., pp. 89, 91.

⁸ ibid. n 94

²Note His response to John's questions about 'he that should come', Matt. 11:2–5; cf. Isa 35:5, 6; 61:1. See further Peter's reliance on these proofs, in Jesus' case, Acts 2:22–40 and the Mosaic basis of this method of certification (Deut. 13:1 to end; 18:9–22 and compare 1 Kings 18:36–39).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (75). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

The Greatness of the Godhead

'Great is our God above all gods' (2 Chr. 2:5 kjv)

The Swedish hymn, 'How Great Thou Art', translated by Stuart K. Kline and popularized by George Beverly Shea, finds an answering chord in most Christian believers. However, God is great in ways that far outstrip worlds, stars, thunder and power 'throughout the universe displayed' of which the hymn speaks.

The historic creeds have distilled the Scripture statements and in timeless words have captured the greatness of God that even the hymns do not match. One of them speaks of God as 'a Spirit infinite, eternal and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth'.¹ These are cool, abstract words of logical analysis. That is something we must all develop some appreciation for, if our understanding of God's greatness is to go as deep as in our better moments we wish.

Nothing is of greater importance to sound faith and life than understanding of several of God's attributes of greatness. It is not enough to have a feeling for God or even a love for Him. We need an intellectual apprehension of His characteristics—attributes as they are usually called. Israel of old was impressed by God's power. They trembled at God's thundering, trumpet-like voice and His fire at Sinai. But after a few months of camping on the spot, in a mass act of apostasy hard for us to understand after generations of inherited Trinitarian monotheism, they made an image of God which looked like a calf; then they worshiped it. The problem was they simply did not understand who God is or what He is like.

God's greatness stretches the thinking both of gifted poets (Ps. 8) and of learned theologians (Anselm's Proslogion). As we come to know more of what God is like we will be able to serve Him better.²

We shall only touch the hem of the outskirts of His garment in this short chapter: God's self-existence (aseity), His eternity, immensity, omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence and His incomprehensibility.

Self-existence of God (or Aseity)

God is the ground of His own existence. His only necessity is the necessity of His own being. It is God's nature to be. Nothing else we can observe or rationally conceive of exists apart from some chain of causes. The more we learn of mankind, the crowning excellency on earth of God's creative art, the more we are made aware of the frailty of our dependent being. All beings, heavenly and earthly, except God Himself, both the first and the final cause, are dependent beings. An endless succession of causes for the world is unacceptable to the human mind. Like the Psalmist, our heart and flesh cry out for the living God.

Scripture Statements

In the statements 'I AM WHO I AM' (Exod. 3:14) and 'my name the Lord' (Exod. 6:3) YHWH, or Jehovah, the name which Jews will not speak, is God's self-affirmation. The Hebrew word—in what scholars presume to have been an early form—for 'I am' is Ēhweh. Changed to third person singular masculine, the same word (in an assumed archaic form of Hebrew) becomes Yahweh: 'he is' or 'he will be'. Ancient Hebrew writing was spelled without vowels. Hence, modern scholars sometimes refer to this name simply as the 'quadriliteral' (four letters, YHWH). The word translated 'I am' is not meant merely to connect the two parts of a nominal sentence (as in, 'Mary is a girl'), but is a statement about existence. In his book on this subject (The Trinity I.1, 2), Augustine said that God alone is the one of whom it can be unequivocally and unconditionally said, 'He is'. '[T]he Father has life in himself' (John 5:26). He is 'the fountain of living waters' (Jer. 2:13), 'the fountain of life; in your light do we see light' (Ps. 36:9).

The Practical Benefits

Believers are assured that they truly have an eternal life. '[W]hoever hears my word', we read, 'and believes him who sent me has eternal life. He does not come into judgment, but has passed from death [our condition by nature] to life [our condition in Christ] ... For as the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son also to have life in himself' (John 5:24, 26). God's being is the ground of our being. His power to create and sustain being ensures the stability of the world. It is His will to preserve it: 'While the earth remains, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease' (Gen. 8:22). The garish threats of extinction proposed in the pages of the Sunday newspapers may safely be ignored, as also some of the less rational predictions of the environmentalists.

Eternity of God

To speak of eternity necessarily involves the concept of time, a concept no one in the history either of philosophy or theology has defined in a manner fully satisfactory even to himself. Even Augustine almost gave up on the task, writing: 'What, then, is time? If no one asks me, I know; if I wish to explain to one who asks, I do not know. Nevertheless, I confidently affirm that I know that if nothing passed away, there would not be past time; and if nothing were coming, there would not be a future time; and if nothing were, there would not be present time.'³ For purposes of present discussion, our minds can settle for the idea of duration. There is a certain arbitrariness about this approach, for the past no longer exists, as such, and the present strictly is only a 'line' through which duration passes to become the future, which as yet does not exist.

Since God deals with the world He has relation with time, yet He cannot be measured by time, since He has no beginning or ending and is Himself the cause of other existent things which have duration. Thus it can be said that time is real because it is in God. Another way of speaking of God's relation to time is, that He is above time. It does not seem quite correct to say He lives in an eternal now, as we do occasionally read, for the past and future are present in God's mind as truly as the present. As just noted above, there is a sense in which 'now' is never anything more than a point or line which the future passes in becoming past time. Hence God lives in eternity, not in a line separating past from future. There is logical succession in God's thoughts, but no chronological succession; since, however, creation does now exist in succession of events, God sees them and knows them. Time is therefore as real for God as it is for us.

To illustrate: when the neighbouring village deploys the annual Pioneer Day's parade, the various vehicles, clowns, horsemen, floats and so on may extend for a mile among the streets and highways below Magelson's Bluff. From a stand at the centre of town (the only traffic signal), when half the train of parade has passed by, I may see the horsemen before me and a bit more coming on and a bit more already passed by. In a manner of speaking I see 'the present' part of the parade. If, however, someone else, say, the town safety commissioner, were to take his stand on the water tower high on the bluff overlooking the town, he could see the whole parade from before the beginning, the whole length of it, and beyond the end, the last passing vehicle. God's relation to time may be said to be like the view from the height.

Human beings may live above time, in a measure. By reflecting on remembered things, we are able to 'live in the past' and by projecting present tendencies, causes, movements and the like, we can 'live in the future'. 'Believers' are by the very definition of that word 'past oriented' as regards redemption and 'future oriented' as regards the consummation. Our religion as evangelical Christian believers, therefore, will be attacked by some, as being hopelessly detached from present problems into delusions about the future life, and by others as too conservative, mindlessly mired in the past. They are right to say of themselves they are anchored safely in present reality because of being adequately related both to the past and the future and therefore free to engage the present vigorously.

Scripture Statements

'Before ... ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God' (Ps. 90:2 kjv). The Lord describes Himself as 'the One who is high and lifted up [transcendent], who inhabits eternity' (Isa. 57:15). Christ is the one by whom God 'made the ages' (Heb. 1:2, Greek) and God is 'the King of ages' (1 Tim. 1:17).⁴

Practical Benefits

God is as youthful and strong today as when Abel was born. '[Y]our years will have no end'. '[Y]ou are the same'. There is a place of quiet rest, near to the heart of God precisely because 'The eternal God is your dwelling place, and underneath are the everlasting arms' (Deut. 33:27; see also Ps. 102:1-13; Heb. 1:5-12).

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day,

Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away;

Change and decay in all around I see—

O thou who changest not, abide with me.

Skeptical poets have sought to deal with their anxiety in a world without an eternal God in charge. Long ago this freshman's heart trembled, even though attracted, by Percy Bysshe Shelley's pensive short poem:

Unfathomable Sea! whose waves are years,
Ocean of Time, whose waters of deep woe
Are brackish with the salt of human tears!
Thou shoreless flood, which in thine ebb and flow
Claspest the limits of mortality,
And sick of prey, yet howling on for more,
Vomits thy wrecks on its inhospitable shore;
Traucherous in calm, terrible in storm
Who shall put forth on thee, Unfathomable sea?⁵

Immensity of God

God's nature is not extended in space; He is without spatial dimension and yet in Him all things consist, being Himself the Creator of space. It will readily be seen that as 'eternity' designates God's infinity in relation to time, 'immensity' is God's infinity in relation to space (this is how it is treated here, at least). This agrees with the dictum of the Roman Catholic theology of Ludwig Ott, 'Immensity or spacelessness connotes the negation of spatial limitation; omnipresence expresses the relation of God to real space. Immeasurability [emphasis added] is a negative attribute; omnipresence is a positive and relative one.'⁶ Further, as in the case of time, God having created space has relation to it.

Scripture Statements

Solomon prays, 'But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain you; how much less this house that I have built!' (1 Kings 8:27). Was Solomon thinking of Genesis 1:1? We do not know, but it is clear that Paul put 'things present' and 'things to come' (aspects of time) along with 'height' and 'depth' (aspects of space) among the creatures of God (Rom. 8:38, 39).

Omnipresence, omnipotence and omniscience are aspects of God's immensity too, even though the outline here presents them co-ordinately with it. No division of the attributes can fully separate them one from another logically, and certainly not metaphysically or substantially.

Omnipresence of God

‘God’, a famous Baptist theologian once wrote, ‘in the totality of his essence, without diffusion or expansion, multiplication or diffusion, penetrates the universe in all its parts’.⁷ We have already met this idea, less critically defined, under the immanence of God. The idea is hard to grasp because the mind finds difficulty in conceiving of ideas without images, either material (God looks like my grandfather) or represented by an imagined figure (like lined structural designs on drafting paper). Even though God is pure spirit, children and naive adults almost necessarily think of God in corporeal images. When as a small child I first read in the Bible, ‘God created man in his own image’ (Gen. 1:27 kjv), it never occurred to me to doubt that God looks something like my father. ‘It must be said ... that it is better for children and the unlearned to think of God corporeally rather than to think of Him as unreal. Yet it is remarkable with what steadfastness the main stream of Christian thought has kept within the bounds of spiritual conceptions’ (DeWolf, Theology of the Living Church, p. 98). Bodies are bound to locality in space. We do not know if spirits are transpatial or not, i.e. whether or not they have spatial relations. Primitive belief has always thought so. ‘How many angels can stand on the head of a pin?’ the famous scholastic inquiry, was not really frivolous. Angels evidently are not trans-spatial (Dan. 10:12, 13). But God’s Spirit is not so bound.

Theologians have always found God’s omnipresence, though widely witnessed to in the Bible, hard to formulate as a doctrine. They tend to both affirm and correct one another’s statements on the subject. Some refinements supplied by writers old and new follow, first Wolfhart Pannenberg:

[W]here as God’s eternity means that all things are always present to him, the stress in his omnipresence is that he is present to all things at the place of their existence. God’s presence fills heaven and earth (Jer. 23:24) ... The presence of God that fills all things does not mean that we are to think of the divine essence as extended across the whole world ... if God had had extension he would necessarily exist as a body ... He is present to his creatures by his eternal power and deity, and his presence, unlike that of a body does not exclude the simultaneous presence of other things in the same place.⁸

Karl Barth, not atypically, thinks everyone else has it wrong and that omnipresence does not belong to God’s infinity but to the attribute of love and freedom. He promises to give God’s ‘unity and omnipresence’ a more biblical and therefore Christian basis than it had in the early church, the Middle Ages and Protestant orthodoxy.⁹ He ends fifty pages later having discussed God’s simplicity, faithfulness, and so on, but leaving omnipresence more mysterious—to this reader at least—than before.¹⁰

In Lutheran-Calvinist polemics, the topic of divine omnipresence becomes lodged in the manner of the presence of the body and blood of Christ ‘in’ and ‘with’ the ‘sacrament’ and has never yet been dislodged.

John T. McNeill observes ‘a systematically presented list of divine attributes ... characteristic of both medieval theologians and Reformed orthodoxy, is notably absent from Calvin.’¹¹

Ludwig Ott states: ‘The first monograph on the substantial presence of God in the whole world and in all the parts thereof and on the indwelling of God in the just, was written by St. Augustine in his,

Scripture Statements

‘Where shall I go from your Spirit?’ inquired the Psalmist, ‘Or where shall I flee from your presence? If I ascend to heaven, you are there!... If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there your hand shall lead me, and your right hand shall hold me’ (Ps. 139:7–10). This is the divine omnipresence from the viewpoint of a godly believer endowed with a delightfully vigorous poetic imagination. Another passage presents the mysterious doctrine from the divine point of view: ‘Am I a God at hand, declares the Lord, and not a God afar off? Can a man hide himself in secret places so that I cannot see him? declares the Lord’ (Jer. 23:23, 24). This is the immensity of God stated in relation to the created, material universe—God fills it.

Christians must be on guard not to think of God’s omnipresence in any material, tangible sense whatsoever. A youthful ‘hippie’ known to me, converted to Christ at a charismatic retreat, thought the rising mists of early morning must be ‘the presence of the Holy Spirit’. The young woman later learned better. As to His essential being, it is false and fatal to any true religious spirituality to think of God as materially sensible in any manner whatsoever. All sorts of crass forms of mysticism grow in the soil of material conceptions of God’s omnipresence. A college chapel speaker, later a well-known novelist (the late Eugenia Price), even spoke of feeling God in her bath water! Another mystical enthusiast knew the Spirit was in a meeting because, he said, he felt the pressure of His power under his fifth rib! Right? Left? Counting from the top? Bottom?¹³

Practical Benefits

The presence of God is beneficial for devotion—we can never be in any place where God is not present to hear our prayer and ready to receive our worship (Ps. 139:7–10). It is also beneficial for assurance—we can never be physically or geographically beyond God’s help, for He is present whether in a prison (as with Joseph, Gen. 39, 40), in a den of lions (as with Daniel, Dan. 6) or in the emperor’s presence (as with Nehemiah, Neh. 1). According to Psalm 107, God is present to help when lost in the desert (4–9), when in prison (10–16), when on a sickbed (17–22) and when in storms at sea (24–30). The presence of God is also beneficial as warning against disobedience to God and attempted flight from Him, both to the believer (the book of Jonah, esp. 1:1–3) and to the unbeliever (Amos 9:1–4).

A Problem

How can an omnipresent God be said to dwell in heaven (Matt. 6:9; 1 Kings 8:30) and to come (travel?) to earth from heaven (Gen. 11:5)? The Bible writers saw no contradiction. Compare 1 Kings 8:30 with 8:27. The particular notion in most of such texts is God’s manifestation, not the spatial location of His Spirit. He is permanently manifest in a special way in heaven, hence is said to dwell there. He also, as He chooses, specially manifests Himself on earth at various times and places, hence he is said to come to those places. Even the Tabernacle in the wilderness and the first temple (built by King Solomon) are said to be God’s mishkan, dwelling (house). His shekinah, dwelling (presence) was there also. His actions in providence and miracles are represented to human minds in this manner.

Omniscience of God

This term designates God's cognitive awareness. He has perfect, immediate, knowledge of all events and things, whether actual or conditional upon the acts of 'free' beings; whether the events or things are only possible or actual; and whether they are past, present or future.

Inasmuch as the scriptural statements are overwhelming in detail, let us give them full opportunity to speak. God has perfect knowledge: 'no creature is hidden from his sight, but all are naked and exposed [laid bare, rsv] to the eyes of him to whom we must give account' (Heb. 4:13). Also, 'the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to give strong support to those whose heart is blameless toward him' (2 Chron. 16:9). God's knowledge is immediate awareness, not based on experience, deductions or inductions of fact or truth. His knowledge is not acquired knowledge, for God's knowledge of all things is eternal, present always in His mind.¹⁴

God has knowledge of all time: past and future (Isa. 46:9–11). Does God know therefore conditional events of the future, even events dependent on the future acts of 'free beings'? Modern liberal writers of theology quite uniformly deny this, e.g.

The knowledge of God ... must be limited by His own nature and purpose ... if He has put a check on His power to give man freedom of will, then He must have limited somewhat His knowledge of the future ... If God knows now every choice any man will ever make, then every choice is already determined and freedom is a delusion ... if men have any margin of free will whatever, then God's foreknowledge of some of their choices must be a knowledge of probabilities, not of certainties.¹⁵

This author is saying that God purposely limited His knowledge of the future by creating agents who have 'freedom of the will': that complete knowledge of the future by God would destroy freedom of the will.

But this seems contrary to the view which the same author takes of 'the super-temporal eternity of God' (p. 102) and it is certainly contrary to the plain truth of the Scriptures. Old Testament prophecy of the career of Christ specified many details utterly conditional upon the future acts of yet unborn people. All predictive prophecy, of any meaningful sort, depends upon God's detailed foreknowledge. Precisely for this reason, modernist or 'liberal' theologians quite uniformly deny the possibility of detailed prediction of the future in the Bible. The result has been a revolution against historical, orthodox faith in the trustworthiness of the testimony of the Bible itself as to the date and authorship of every portion which predicts identifiable events such as the destruction of Jerusalem (586 bc) or the desecration of the temple (165 bc). Therefore, there is now for such scholars a Second Isaiah (chaps. 40–66), composed after and during the exile, and a second century bc date for Daniel. However, Peter says that Christ was 'delivered up [crucified] according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23) and Jesus was able to show His disciples His whole career predicted in the Old Testament (Luke 24:25–27, 44–47).

There is a story in 1 Samuel of how God made known the ideal, contingent future, e.g. He answered a 'what if' question about an event that never really occurred (see 1 Sam. 23:12 and context). Even events which people attribute to chance are said to be known because they are under God's control (Prov. 16:33, rsv). Such knowledge is 'wonderful' (Ps. 139:6), deep and incomprehensible (Rom. 11:33) to the truly devout. It is eminently wise as well (Ps. 104:24; Eph. 3:10). Denial that God has certain knowledge of the contingent future is too much of a concession to make to a prejudice against predestination.

Free will and predestination present a great mystery, but true Christian piety should not deny anything God reveals about either of them.

It seems every so many generations of scholars must go over the well-canvassed objections to God's prescience of events of the future conditional upon the choices and acts of free personal beings. At present, under the rather ambiguous guise of 'the openness of God', (openness to what?) it is being fiercely debated in several theological journals and promises to go on for some time.

Over the generations, the argument of those who deny God's foreknowledge of events conditional upon the future acts of free beings goes about as follows. It is agreed God foreknows all things which are objects of knowledge. Excluded from the number of such objects are those events that depend on the 'unpredictable' choices and acts of free beings such as men and angels. It is contended that God limited His sovereign control of the course of the future in the act of creating the human race and angels. Hence, He can be surprised by developments. I shall not here attempt to record the present on-going debate. It bears some relation to the debate between Arminian-Wesleyan theology and Calvinist theology, but Wesleyan theologians usually do not demur on the assertion that God knows the future in detail, although they do not relate the divine foreknowledge to divine decrees in the same way Calvinists do.

Jesuit theologians of the Roman Church (notably Luis DeMolina, 1535–1600) developed a doctrine of 'middle knowledge'—an area of divine knowledge dependent upon His foreknowledge of the acts and decisions of free creatures rather than upon His decree. The purpose of the Jesuits was to defend the Semi-Pelagian teaching (later Socinian, and Wesleyan) that election is based on foreseen faith. Middle knowledge was rejected by theologians of the Dominican order, notably refuted by Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), and Jansenist successors to the controversy.

In Scripture God has no 'middle knowledge'. There is no created thing hidden 'from the sight' of Him with whom we have to do, 'but all [things past or future] are naked and exposed to the eyes of him to whom we must give account' (Heb. 4:13). Francis Turretin furnishes a discussion of the middle knowledge theory.¹⁶

Theologians as diverse as A. H. Strong (Baptist) and Ludwig Ott (Roman Catholic) remain convinced that God knows the future, and that the divine decree precedes the knowledge, but regard the mode or medium as unexplained and inexplicable.¹⁷

Let us be reminded that although the 'faculty of volition'—the power to choose—is present in us all, our freedom in the exercise of it in loving obedience to the will of God has now been greatly damaged by the fact that we are all now sinners; we are 'children of disobedience', and that without exception. Furthermore, the biblical doctrine of divine decrees (i.e. God's sovereignty over all history) has important bearing on this subject.¹⁸

Two related groups of theologians have attacked the doctrine of divine omniscience in the recent past. The earlier calls itself process theology. These theologians have been influenced not only by the liberalism that has devalued orthodox doctrines and scriptural authority but also by a vigorous philosophy known as panentheism. Panentheism maintains that God exists but not previous to or apart from the universe. He is not its Creator but exists contemporarily as a ‘pole’ exterior to it and also within all the universe, which is God’s other ‘pole’. Though God is ubiquitous in the universe, He is neither omnipotent nor omniscient, for, like the world, God Himself is evolving, in process, hence the name, ‘process theology’. As advocates acknowledge, those without ‘academic preparation’—i.e. without twentieth century, non-biblically rooted ‘philosophical theology’—will ‘find it demanding’ to understand what these theologians mean.¹⁹ Though these theologians employ many Christian categories of thought (e.g. incarnation,²⁰ body of Christ²¹) and the language traditional to Christian discourse, they claim as much affinity with atheistic existentialism²² and even pagan religion²³ as with orthodox Christian theology. Philosophically, the ancient roots of this system lie in the pre-Socratic Greek philosophers whose world, including their gods, was evolving forever in the void with no superintending wise and powerful supervision. This theology builds mainly on the work of Alfred N. Whitehead (1861–1947), a mathematician turned logician and philosopher, and to a lesser extent the thought of Bertrand Russell (1872–1970). Whitehead, incorporating relativity theory, postulated that the stuff that we experience in our sensorium consists of point-events in space-time. These occur and exist independently of our perceiving them. The occurrences he calls occasions. Over and above them, there exists a world of essences or eternal objects—not unlike the ‘pole’ outside the universe which the process theologians call God. These eternal objects collide (intersect) with one another in any given occasion or actual event and thus produce this rather than that or those. From this matrix of reality proceeds all that is. Process theologians buy into as much of this as suits their scheme of a somewhat Christian-sounding scheme of religious philosophy.

I have presented this perhaps over-simple summary of process theology and its roots to suggest strongly it is quite inconsistent with the unmistakable biblical doctrine of divine omniscience. Process theology has no personal centre such as the triune God who might know, much less predestinate or plan anything. Yet from within evangelical circles have emerged several academicians who borrow as much ‘process theology’ as they think can be brought ‘into sync’ with an orthodox doctrine of God. But this god of process theology is a greatly diminished Lord, a diminutive shadow of the Lord God Omnipotent, ‘pavilioned in splendour and girded with praise’ of true Christian worship and biblical story. The God of the Bible declares the end from the beginning, both because He planned it that way and because He has power to bring it to conclusion just as He planned it: and therefore knows all about it, down to the minutest detail.

John Wesley and his authentic interpreters have had great reservations about the doctrine of individual personal election to salvation, but this has not impaired or diminished their proclamation of an orthodox doctrine of divine omniscience. Richard Watson, first and still major interpreter of Wesley, in my judgment, supported God’s knowledge of the future (prescience) as included in His omniscience. In fact, in responding to the detractors of God’s perfect foreknowledge of the day (1823), Watson anticipated the current detractors (process theology, and ‘openness of God’ advocates). After presenting the plain biblical ‘proofs’ of omniscience from Scripture, he says it has ‘unquestionably the authority of the Holy Scriptures’.²⁴ He proceeds at length (about 8,500 words) to meet the objections, especially objections to God’s perfect foreknowledge of future events conditional upon uncoerced choices made by ‘free’ beings.

Omnipotence of God

The word omnipotent means, having all power. A sonorous biblical synonym is ‘Almighty’ (Greek, pantokrator), appearing nine times in the New Testament, usually in an eschatological context of the final Judgment (eight of the nine occurrences are in Revelation). In the Old Testament (kjv) it is a translation of Shaddai, a name of God appearing often in the earliest parts of the Old Testament (see Exod. 6:3; cf. Gen. 17:1; 35:11; 48:3). The theological doctrine is simply that God is able to do all things that are objects of power and that He is able to do so without diminution of His infinite strength. In a later part of this book not only God’s power but also His wisdom in His decrees and works of creation, preservation and providence come in for treatment.

We say that God is able to do all things that are ‘objects of power’, inasmuch as such things as the multiplication table, the law of non-contradiction and such other abstractions are not objects amenable to or commensurate with power. Power has nothing to do with them. Legislators and kings neither originated them nor control them. God created the world in harmony with His own reasonable nature. A world where there were several contradictory multiplication tables would not be ‘heaven and earth’ but hell—not universe, but chaos. A theologian’s professional joke runs: ‘If ever you should meet an angel who tells you $3 + 4 = 8$, he will certainly have soot on his wings!’ Per contra, in my files is a pastor’s Christmas letter in which he asserts that the Trinity is an example of God’s ability to break mathematical laws, because He is both one and three!

A better theology affirms that God is not three in the same respect He is one. Further, God exercises His power according to His own will. He never acts in power apart from wisdom. God is not the servant of His own unlimited energy. A scriptural way of saying this is, ‘he cannot deny himself’ (2 Tim. 2:13). Therefore God ‘cannot be tempted with evil’ (James 1:13) and He ‘cannot lie’ (Titus 1:2, kjv).

Scripture Statements

Jesus said, ‘with God all things are possible’ (Matt. 19:26, see the context and note the contrast in meaning with the similar saying, ‘Anything can happen’). Texts are numerous which trace everything, both specifically and in general, to God’s creative, sustaining and governing power (Gen. 17:1; 18:14; Jer. 32:17; Job 42:1, 2; Isa. 40:28; Eph. 1:11; Rev. 19:6). (Other texts speak more specifically, among them are Gen. 1:1–3; Isa. 44:22; Heb. 1:3; 2 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 1:19; 3:20; Matt. 3:9; Rom. 4:17.)

Practical Benefits

If God hears prayers, He is able to answer, ‘our God whom we serve is able ... and he will’ (Dan. 3:17). If we are sent to be evangelists, there is power available to secure results, as God pleases, ‘Who then can be saved?... With God all things are possible’ (Matt. 19:25, 26). Should the course of the world seem perverse and threatening, God has power to change it if He wills; He has power to judge and replace it with a better one, as He certainly will! Things will be looking up in due time (Rev. 11:17–18; 19:6). This doctrine is a deep well from which to draw abundance of comfort.

Some theological teachers introduce the perfection of God as an attribute, at some stage in the treatment of His greatness. There is something commendable about this, for perfection, in the sense of completeness (where nothing is lacking which ought to be), pertains to all His attributes of greatness. It seems better therefore to some other writers to consider perfection simply as a feature of all the attributes of greatness. It is true that the Father is said by Jesus to be perfect (Matt. 5:48). God's gifts (James 1:17), His work (Deut. 3:24), His ways (Ps. 18:30), His law (Ps. 19:7), His will (Rom. 12:2), His knowledge (Job 37:16) and similar, are said in Scripture to be perfect. We shall follow the lead of the writers who prefer to discuss God's perfection later, as a feature of God's moral nature and in connection with attributes of goodness such as love, holiness and truth.

Incomprehensibility of God

This somewhat misleading term indicates simply that no one except the triune God fully comprehends God. People should not find this difficult to accept, for we do not quite understand ourselves or our fellows. '[T]he heart of kings is unsearchable' (Prov. 25:3). This, however, is not because either kings or lesser people are impossible to comprehend. Rather we do not fully understand because we lack opportunity completely to observe. We cannot fully comprehend God because we are finite, whether in the sinlessness of Eden or in the presence of angels in heaven. Hence, we cannot now, and never shall, fully understand all that an infinite God is and does.

Scriptural Statements

Perhaps nothing will impress the student more than to place David's poetic statement that follows along with that magnificent expression of St Paul which David's statement inspired. Psalm 36:5–6 states, 'Your steadfast love, O Lord, extends to the heavens, your faithfulness to the clouds. Your righteousness is like the mountains of God; your judgments are like the great deep.' Paul says: 'Oh, the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and how inscrutable his ways' (Rom. 11:33, cf. 34–35). God's mercy, faithfulness, righteousness and His judgments, David says in the foregoing imaginative language, exceed human comprehension. Paul, in the above quotation, adds God's wisdom, knowledge and ways. Every aspect (attribute) of the nature of our infinite God exceeds our limited comprehension as even Job's 'comforters' understood: 'who does great things and unsearchable, marvellous things without number' (Eliphaz, Job 5:9); 'Can you find out the deep things of God? Can you find out the limit of the Almighty' (Zophar, Job 11:7).

Practical Benefits

Each of the texts quoted above represents saintly folk's worshipful wonder at the surpassing greatness of God. These things do not inspire long speeches, rather stumbling words of repentance and silence, as illustrated by Job's excellent example (Job 38–40). They also lend great support to two admirable human impulses and enterprises—artistic expression and the pursuit of knowledge. No painter will ever exhaust the beauty of God's own workmanship; nor will any oratorio attain the heights and depths of the Lord God Omnipotent whom the composer seeks to praise. As for learning—the researches of the academic disciplines—as one of Job's 'friends' declared, we will never know more than the outskirts of His ways. There will always be immensely more to challenge the researcher.

An Additional Glossary

Precise, special terms help us understand truths of great depth. The student of God's truth who masters some of the terms of the doctrine of God greatly benefits. Whether we try to present God's greatness in the simplest way or try for comprehensive depth, we cannot seem to dispense with some abstract terms such as eternal, absolute, transcendent, immanent, timeless, above time and time-space. We seem unable to speak exactly about God's greatness without them, even though none of them appears in the Bible and almost none in the great theological confessions. For that matter, very few of the names that theologians necessarily give to the characteristics (attributes) of God's greatness appear in Scripture. Yet it would be hard to get along without them, because they help us formulate answers to our own and others' questions.

1. The Absolute Being of God

The word absolute in common speech seems to mean 'without qualification', and usually is part of a vigorous affirmation or denial. In pantheistic idealism the absolute is the all: the substratum of the universe of which all things particular are emanations. Sometimes 'absolute' seems to designate ultimate authority, or court of final appeal, as when used of dictators, headmasters and supreme courts. As used of God, Christian theologians mean to say that God has independent existence, being utterly without need, without external sustenance or support or stimulation either to exist or to be happy. We know, for example, that God did not create the world in order to supply some need of His. God has always been the 'blessed and only Sovereign' (1 Tim. 6:15) and 'blessed forever' (Rom. 1:25).

2. The Infinity of God

This does not mean no known bounds (which would only be indefiniteness), but no bounds at all. His being is not limited by any other being or by what He has created. The idea is positive even though 'infinite' (lit., no end) seems like a negative expression. This does not mean God can make a weight so heavy it cannot be lifted or create a world wherein $3 + 4$ could equal 9 or 11. These and various other nonsense suggestions need not detain us. God, of course, may limit Himself, but that is a function of His boundless will. None of the attributes of God, being grounded in His infinite person, is willed by God, for they are aspects of who and what He is, not of what He does or where He is. They therefore are infinite also. Infinite does not mean quite the same as 'without qualification'. To say, for example, that God's mercy is limitless does not mean that it is not qualified in some way. God's mercy will end for those sinners who never repent.

3. Transcendence and Immanence of God

These words have to do with God's relation to the whole of His creation. In all ages, among both Christians and others, some thinkers have stressed the distance that separates the world and mankind, as creatures, from the Creator. This distance is what is meant by transcendence, and it is clearly taught in Scripture. The distance is both physical and metaphysical (i.e. on a different level of being) as well as moral. This distance, however, can be stressed to such extremes, and with such persuasive force, that in the recent but now past heyday of Barth and Brunner (neo-orthodoxy) an 'infinite qualitative gulf' was widely accepted. In deism this becomes dogmatic assertion (God made the world, set it going and has withdrawn from it). In Christendom, this view is seldom thoroughly consistent. The so-called deists among the 'founding Fathers' of eighteenth-century America believed in prayer and otherwise showed their theistic convictions. Moreover, God 'crashes the barrier' once in a while even in neo-orthodox doctrine.

Others have stressed immanence, the presence of God in the creation, i.e. His in-man-ence, from Latin words meaning to dwell in. This is also biblical truth. The tendency of many people to rely greatly on feelings in religious matters strengthens acceptance of the immanence of God, as much private devotion and public worship show. Harriet Beecher Stowe wrote:

Still, still with Thee ...

Alone with Thee amid the mystic shadows—

The solemn hush of nature newly born;

Alone with Thee in breathless adoration, in the calm dew and freshness of the morn!

In the excesses of Christian mysticism, and in all pantheistic religions (Hinduism, Buddhism, Parseeism) and in several sects now growing (theosophy, Rosicrucianism, several varieties of ‘New-Ageism’) this aspect of the immensity of the Godhead becomes exclusive of His transcendence and thereby fatally erroneous. The popular ‘prophet’, Khalil Gibran, passes pantheistic mysticism to credulous public readers. Pantheism, discussed in an earlier chapter, affirms God’s immanence but denies His transcendence. Deism does the reverse.

4. Time and Space, Space-Time, and God

We think of time as duration, succession of events, in some measurable way: of space as extension within the created universe. There are texts of Scripture (e.g. Ps. 90:1, 2; 1 Cor. 2:7) which tell us that God is greater than time. Does this mean that He has no temporal relations at all? Similarly, God is without extension in space. However, both ‘height and depth’ are His creatures (Rom. 8:39), not His dimensions or extensions, and heaven cannot contain Him (1 Kings 8:27).

Does this mean that space is without meaning for God? Space and time are related together in recent scientific theory. Science also uses time as a fourth dimension analagous to the three dimensions of space. Does this do away with the validity of these dimensions? Of course not. Science has found the abstractions—space-time and time as fourth dimension—useful for formulating the behaviour of the universe into laws. These abstractions help solve problems of mechanics, as any one who ever tried to describe what it would be like to trace the ‘absolute’ trajectory of a tossed coin on a rising elevator knows, but they cannot be employed to deny the testimony of our senses. Our senses tell us that both space and time are quite real. Space-time and fourth dimension are useful abstractions. They are ludicrously false in the world of living people. To say, therefore, that God is eternal and that He is omnipresent in all creation are meaningful statements. Now that God has created a world of clocks and yardsticks, time and space are both meaningful. God even enters into relationships with them.

- ¹ Westminster, The Shorter Catechism, Q. 4, ‘What is God?’
- ² At the end of this chapter there is a discussion of some additional terms and ideas which help us talk about His greatness.
- ³ Herman Bavinck, The Doctrine of God, trans. Wm. Hendriksen (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1977), p. 154.
- ⁴ See also Gen. 21:33; Deut. 33:27; Ps. 102:12; Isa. 41:4; Rom. 1:20; 1 Cor. 2:7; Rev. 1:8; 4:10.
- ⁵ Percy Bysshe Shelley, 1821; 1824.
- ⁶ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, L. trans. P. Lynch (Rockford, IL: TAN Books and Publ., 1974), p. 37.
- ⁷ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 279.
- ⁸ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. i, pp. 410, 411.
- ⁹ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics II, Part I (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1936) p. 466.
- ¹⁰ ibid., p. 490.
- ¹¹ Calvin, Institutes, Westminster Ed. of 1960, note #1, I, 120.
- ¹² Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, p. 38.
- ¹³ See also Acts 17:27, 28; Isa. 57:15.
- ¹⁴ In detail: of material creation (see Ps. 147:4; Job 28:24; Ps. 139:15); animate creatures (Matt. 10:29); men and their deeds (Ps. 33:13–15); human thoughts (Acts 15:8; even before we think them, Ps. 139:2); small details of our lives (Jer. 1:15; Ps. 139:1–4; and many more).
- ¹⁵ L. Harold DeWolf, A Theology of the Living Church (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953), p. 109.
- ¹⁶ Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology vol i, trans. G. M. Geger (Phillipsburg, NJ: PR Publishing, reprint 1992), pp. 212–218. See also articles on ‘Luis DeMolina’ and ‘Jansenius and Jansenism’ in the Catholic Encyclopedia.
- ¹⁷ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 284–286. Ott, op. cit., pp. 40–43.

¹⁸ See chapter 16, ‘God’s Eternal Plan for The Heavens and The Earth’.

¹⁹ John B. Cobb, Jr, and David Ray Griffin, Process Theology (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1976), p. 10.

²⁰ ibid., p. 22.

²¹ ibid., p. 107.

²² ibid., pp. 89, 80–82.

²³ ibid., p. 62.

²⁴ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes, vol. i, ed. J. McClintock (New York: Nelson & Phillips, 1850), p. 375.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (83). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

The Goodness of the Godhead

‘Oh give thanks to the Lord, for he is good’ (Ps. 107:1) ‘No one is good except God alone’ (Mark 10:18)

‘Moral’ is a neutral word. Both sin and its opposite, righteousness, are moral concepts. Good and goodness also are moral concepts. ‘Good’, however, has a much narrower field of reference than does ‘moral’ and it is this narrow sense, later to be explained, which is the subject of the present chapter. This is not to deny that we shall be considering what are sometimes called ‘the moral attributes’ of God. Yet it is the focused idea of goodness rather than morality, as such, that is under consideration.

What is ‘the good’—how shall we define it? Ethics is the division of philosophy that for 2,500 years has sought to define ‘the good’. For Socrates the good is the useful. For his disciple, Plato, the good is whatever on earth conforms to the eternal transcendent form (idea) of what ought to be. Aristotle, whose ethical thought seems to have been revived today, thought the actual, what is, is good. Augustine came close to welding Plato and Aristotle together by regarding good and being in God (the transcendent) as fundamentally identical. The mood of our times is to do away with the whole idea of good in favour of consensus or social utility, and such like, including eudemonism (or happiness), the greatest happiness to the greater number. James J. Fox was undoubtedly correct in saying: ‘Good is one of those primary ideas which cannot be defined.’¹

Let us then employ an approach not to the Scriptures but from the Scriptures and with a common-sense understanding of the good.

The book of Job opens by telling the reader that Job was a good man. Then it goes on to say that he had a family of ten children, and immense wealth in livestock, and adds that ‘this man was the greatest of all the people of the east’ (Job 1:3). Ownership of 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 1,000 oxen, 500 ass-mares and employment of hundreds of servants made him great in people’s eyes. What made him good? The fact that he ‘was blameless and upright, one who feared God and turned away from evil’. This made him good in God’s eyes (Job 1:1; cf. v. 8). There are other people who are great in wealth or intellectual power or fame but who are small in goodness, that is, in character and wisdom. In addition, some are little in fame, in ‘good’ and physical power and also very bad people.

Sometimes, good means about the same as perfection of character. So, when we say of a person that he is a good man, we intend to say that he has those traits of character that constitute what a man ought to be. In this sense, the Bible says that God is holy, ‘of purer eyes than to see evil’ (Hab. 1:13).

On the other hand, we may be thinking of God’s good treatment of His creatures, that is, benevolent and beneficent, when we refer to God’s goodness: ‘God is good to Israel’ (Ps. 73:1); and, ‘Oh, taste and see that the Lord is good!’ (Ps. 34:8).

We are now interested in the goodness of God in both of these senses: (1) what He is as to inward goodness of character (immanent goodness), namely, holiness, truth and love; (2) what He is in manifestation of that good character (emanative, or transitive goodness), namely, righteous, faithful and merciful.

This analysis and other similar ones are not very pleasing to most ‘modern’ theologians. The headings and divisions are said to ‘lack religious value, and are contrary to the findings of modern psychology and religious experience’. This judgment need not surprise us, for ‘modern theology is in disagreement with the theological method of the old theologians who describe the divine attributes on the basis of, and according to, Scripture’ according to Pieper.² We hope now to show that this way of teaching people about the good character of God and its manifestation among His creatures, however lacking in absolute precision and completeness, is according to the Bible.

No classification or list of the divine attributes is fully satisfactory, for overlapping and repetition cannot be avoided. In so far as the terms are psychological in flavour, they have the same lack of precision characteristic of all human language which attempts psychological analysis. Yet the mind calls for ‘rhyme and reason’ in the relationship of things. So, if we are going to discuss the features of good character at all, God’s or any others’, analysis is both helpful and necessary. The fact that the Bible makes numerous analytical statements about God’s moral character would justify theological analysis.

1. Holiness: God is Holy

God’s character is holy. Biblical testimony to His holiness is very extensive and is mainly in the Old Testament. In a unique sense, holiness is basic to every aspect of God’s goodness. Therefore, we might expect it to be highlighted in the early portions of the Bible.

At this point we interrupt development of the theme to take note of modern critical treatment of the ‘development of Israel’s religion’.

W. Robertson Smith crystallized a century of Enlightenment thought about how ethical monotheism and its high view of the holiness of God and of His people, Israel, came to be. Smith did not find a place for a high concept of ethical holiness in Israel's history until the time of the writing prophets. After a quite correct statement of biblical holiness, he writes: 'This conception of holiness goes back to the Hebrew prophets, especially to Isaiah.'³

A generation later many of Smith's ideas as to what constitutes 'The Idea of The Holy' were modified in a book of that title by Rudolph Otto. Both of these quite original works supplied useful information and Otto furnished a vocabulary (numinous, fascinans, tremendum, etc.) which now all writers of every school find useful. The notion that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Joseph and his brethren had no concept of holiness; that Moses, Miriam and Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, and David knew nothing of a high ethical holiness in connection with Jehovah and Israel has not even held the field among later critics. The idea is said to have been known from the Exodus onward in some recent critical discussion, though the pentateuchal legislation regarding holiness (the so-called Holiness Code, Lev. 17–26) is said likely to have been composed after the book of Ezekiel. R. H. Pfeiffer of Harvard spoke for Graf-Wellhausen criticism before his time, giving what is still the prevailing critical opinion: 'While it seems certain to most critics that the compiler of H [Holiness Code in the Pentateuch] and Ezekiel wrote in the sixth century, they do not agree which one of the two is earlier.'⁴ A year 2000 paper, Holy Fathers?: Holiness in the Era of the Patriarchs, read by William D. Barrick at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, reported recent critical opinions. Barrick cites several. '[T]he notion of holiness, which from the Exodus onward is a basic characteristic of God and a major requirement for Israel, is entirely lacking in the patriarchal traditions.'⁵ '[T]raits peculiar to patriarchal religion' include 'the lack of the concepts of sin and judgment'.⁶ Barrick acknowledges: 'Prior to the book of Exodus ... the ... qdsh word group [holy, holiness, etc] is found only once in the early narratives. Indeed it is found only in the primeval history at Genesis 2:3. Then God blessed the seventh day and declared it holy.'

It will be sufficient here to remark, first, these critical opinions are simple extensions of two secularist procedural opinions: (1) ethical concepts in early peoples developed in an evolutionary manner, and (2) Israel's religion developed in a manner parallel to the religion of other ancient peoples in their area. Taking Genesis at its face value as a genuinely Mosaic, truthful document, I remark, secondly, that though the words 'holy' and 'holiness' and synonyms do not appear often in Genesis, the idea of ethical holiness and its practical expression in righteousness saturate the book. Examples abound. Sin crouches at Cain's door and his sentence is punishment for guilt incurred (Gen. 4:7, 13). Stories of the Flood, destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, are wholly about the righteousness of people that is demanded by an ethically pure (holy) God. Holiness underlies Abraham's world-view in his questions: 'Will you [God] indeed sweep away the righteous with the wicked?' (Gen. 18:23), and 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do what is just?' (Gen. 18:25). Third, many New Testament references to godly people of the patriarchal age impute holiness to them. The aged Zacharias spoke of the 'holy covenant' with Abraham (Luke 1:72, 73), as Psalm 105:42 does of 'his holy promise', and Sarah is introduced as a 'holy woman' (1 Pet. 3:5). Hence, we may assert that the New Testament assumes the patriarchs 'understood the concept of holiness' (Barrick, p. 2).

No one should dispute that in 'the progress of dogma',⁷ there is rising clarity of vision of the idea of holiness in the Bible. Unless we wish to abandon or confuse the Bible's own evidence, we must begin study of the subject on the first page.

The gods and other objects worshipped by the ancients were not holy in an ethical sense. We must agree with Rudolph Otto, who said of the worship of ‘spirits, magic, fairy tales’ and the like: ‘Different as these things are, [they are] haunted by a common—and that a numinous element.’⁸ The numinous, or supernatural, approximates one aspect of holiness, as we shall see. Though properly to be treated with respect, the gods of the ethnic pantheons behaved much as their human counterparts did. However, the same as people, they were rewarded or punished for breaking an implicitly assumed moral code. There was an awareness in their human worshipers of an ethical Power to which ‘the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh’ (Dan. 2:11) were as responsible as the flesh-and-blood people on earth. It seems apparent in the story of Abraham, Sarah and Abimelech, king of Gerar, that even the pagan king (who probably worshiped the god Dagon) was aware of a one Elohim before whom all three of them—Abram, Sarah and Abimelech—would appear in righteous judgment at a future time. So, though the supposed gods of ancient heathenism were as immoral as their worshipers, the idea of moral purity was understood, even though it was hardly the precise equivalent of biblical holiness. We forego to introduce the mountain of controversial critical literature created over the past two centuries relating to this subject. The articles by O. Procksh⁹ and William Ury¹⁰ are reliable introductions.

To resume treatment of the holiness of God’s character, we can state: in a unique sense, holiness is basic to everything about God, not merely one among many moral attributes of goodness. Not without reason did A. H. Strong frame and persuasively defend the proposition, Holiness is the fundamental attribute of God. We might well expect it to have been highlighted in the initial encounter of the great legislator and revelator Moses with God on the occasion of his call and commission to lay the groundwork of biblical revelation and revealed religion at the first appropriate occasion (Exod. 3:1–5). The same unrelieved glare of manifest holiness accompanies every subsequent, direct, personal encounter of divine and human in the Bible.

Some of the pervasiveness of this truth is made plain by perusing the following.

- God’s person is holy: ‘for the Lord our God is holy!’ (Ps. 99:9; see also 1–8).
- God’s spirit is holy: ‘take not your Holy Spirit from me’ (Ps. 51:11).
- God’s name is holy: ‘thus says the One who is high and lifted up, who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy’ (Isa. 57:15).
- God’s word of promise is holy: ‘For he remembered his holy promise’ (Ps. 105:42).
- God’s oath is holy: ‘Once for all I have sworn by my holiness’ (Ps. 89:35).
- God’s dwelling is holy: God’s habitation in heaven (Deut. 26:15) and the heavenly throne from which He reigns (Ps. 47:8), as well as His temple at Jerusalem (Hab. 2:20) and objects there devoted to Him (Lev. 27:28; see also Zech. 14:20, 21), are holy.

Texts could be multiplied indefinitely.

The Meaning of 'Holy' and 'Holiness'

What is the meaning of holy and holiness? As these are common words of religious conversation among common people in the Bible, the meaning should not be obscure (even though some careful distinctions should be noticed) and it is not obscure. Our English word is related in origin and meaning to hale and whole, that is, in one piece, sound, healthy. The common meanings are (1) belonging to or coming from God; (2) untainted by evil or sin; and (3) deserving of reverence.¹¹

This group of ideas is essentially what one finds in the Bible. If we refine our definition with more extensive consideration of biblical use, the following emerges: (1) whatever people set apart for any special purpose is 'holy', about the same as dedicated. This is essentially a non-religious notion. In English we would not use 'holy' of a plot of ground 'dedicated' to be used as a 'Farmers' Market' because that word is uniformly a religious term and there is nothing distinctly religious about a marketplace. (2) That which is set apart from common use and devoted entirely to God is holy, whether persons, places or things. (3) Moral purity, i.e. apartness from evil of any sort: this last, absence of evil (always spoiling and harmful to its subject) is why holy, meaning hale, whole, sound, was used by early translators of the Bible into English, for this most often mentioned feature of God's character. To be less than holy is not only to be unsound (unhealthy, less than whole), but also unclean, defiled, corrupt.

God is said to be holy in that He exists on a level of being entirely apart from all that is creaturely, earthly or human: 'The Lord reigns; let the peoples tremble! He sits enthroned upon the cherubim; let the earth quake! The Lord is great in Zion; he is exalted over all the peoples. Let them praise your great and awesome name! Holy is he!... worship at his footstool! Holy is he!' (Ps. 99:1-3, 5b). He is 'the One who is high and lifted up, who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy: "I dwell in the high and holy place"' (Isa. 57:15).

If God is the high, exalted One, above all people, as these Scripture texts say, He is also far removed from all that is sinful.¹² In Old Testament religion, especially the prophets, holiness, as ethical purity, becomes the most prevalent and important affirmation God has to make about Himself. In the New Testament God's ethical purity is almost the exclusive sense of His holiness.

Modern theologians sometimes refer to God's holiness, in the sense of separateness or transcendence, as the 'movement of withdrawal'.¹³ There is an opposite 'movement of inclusion'. In this sense, anything especially close to God, or that to which He lays exclusive claim for His own service, is holy. So Scripture extends 'holy' and 'holiness' to many of His creatures: holy ground, holy place (sanctuary), holy Sabbath, holy nation, holy oil, holy water, holy garments (priests' vestments)—and holy jubilee, house, city, bread, altar, first-born. A page-full could be added of holy persons and things supported by innumerable citations of Old Testament Scripture. In the coming kingdom of God even the bells of the horses will be 'Holy to the Lord' (Zec. 14:20).

All the holiness that exists, therefore, is God's. He alone is the fount of holiness and He alone confers it on others. The holiness of the nation of Israel, for example, was not something the people attained by choice or self-improvement. God made them his own (holiness) by sovereign choice and redemption. They were to sanctify themselves only because God had already sanctified them for Himself. This sanctification of self may initially have been little understood. The ceremonial washings and ritual offerings involved, together with their awareness of being a ‘chosen people’, may well have been the upper limit of the perception of many. However, before long there were apparent implications of moral purity and of righteousness in the thought-life, in relations with other people—specified in a thousand ways from Exodus on to the close of the Old Testament. In the whole of the life of God’s people, transitive holiness in righteous action is required by the Old Testament as well as the New—personal, domestic, political, civil and religious as well as the ritual of religious observance.

Both ideas—God’s transcendence as Creator and His purity as moral-ethical Governor—appear together (in this order) frequently. Psalm 99:1–5, cited above, speaks of His loftiness but the remaining verses (6–9) relate to His purity. In the ecstasy of beatific vision, Isaiah first saw the Lord, ‘high and lifted up ... Holy, holy, holy’ (Isa. 6:1–4). However, the vision immediately made the prophet aware not so much of his ‘creatureliness’ as of his sinfulness (vv. 5–7). Therefore, later, Isaiah reports God’s hatred of all that is morally impure (Isa. 57:15–17). In the language of worship, the same joining of ideas (God’s distance from us as Creator and His moral purity) occurs: ‘Who shall ascend the hill of the Lord? And who shall stand in his holy place? He who has clean hands and a pure heart, who does not lift up his soul to what is false and does not swear deceitfully’ (Ps. 24:3, 4).

Such passages as Isaiah 6:1–3 and Isaiah 57:15 seem clearly to treat holiness as something fundamental to God’s character, whether the transcendence of His being, or the purity of His character, or both, it is hard to say.

God’s laws, including the punishment of death for sin—any sin at all¹⁴—are an extension of His holiness. It would be tedious to quote the innumerable times every distinct feature of Old Testament worship is related specifically to God’s holiness. It is everywhere in the ‘worship manuals’, that is, Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers, so also Psalms, Isaiah and Ezekiel.

This biblical emphasis has consequences. We may, for example, therefore be certain that however much wickedness may seem to prosper more than righteousness, it is better to do right; we ought to do right simply because it is right. ‘Children, obey your parents ... for this is right’ (Eph. 6:1). Paul could cite no greater sanction.

The holy God our Creator is our Governor He ‘will judge the world in righteousness by a man whom he has appointed’ (Acts 17:31). Our conscience assures us of God’s holiness, though it tells us nothing at all of God’s love and mercy. As James Russell Lowell puts it:

Careless seems the great Avenger;

history’s pages but record

One death—grapple in the darkness

’twixt old systems and the Word;

Truth forever on the scaffold,

The practical importance of God's holiness extends to everything about Christian character, action and hope for the future. As we have noted above, God's holiness exposes our sins and need for cleansing as well as forgiveness (Isa. 6:1, 5). His holiness assures us that God will not go back on anything He has said, either of warning or of promise. 'I will not violate my covenant ... I have sworn by my holiness; I will not lie' (Ps. 89:34, 35). The sphere of salvation will always be one of orderly morality, for His 'holy arm' brings it to pass (Ps. 98:1) and with righteousness He reigns (vv. 2–9). His invisible kingdom now and His manifest kingdom of the future are holy, too (Ps. 47 esp. vv. 7 and 8; Isa. 11). Finally, God's holiness both demands and moves the practical holiness of His people: 'For I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy' (Lev. 11:44 kjv; compare 1 Peter 1:15, 16; Heb. 12:10).

Further Theology of Divine Holiness

The Israelites and the Canaanites of old employed essentially the same language. In the religion of Canaan, the holy was simply that which was dedicated to the gods. Therefore, the vile male and female prostitutes of their shrines could be called holy. 'Sodomite' is how the Hebrew word for 'holy' comes out in the King James Version, when used of the male homosexual prostitute of a Baal shrine, and 'harlot' of female temple prostitutes. There was no ethical sense at all.

In biblical religion and most of biblical literature, however, holiness as ethical and moral purity is the most prevalent and important affirmation God has to make about Himself. In the New Testament, when used of God, moral purity is almost the exclusive sense of holiness.

Theologians have struggled to define the holiness of God and many consequently have neglected to say much about it. We attempt a brief summary of important discussions. The medieval theologians, Peter Lombard (The Sentences) and Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologica, 5,750 columns of dense print in English translation), do not discuss it; nor does Philipp Melancthon's Loci Communes (the first Lutheran systematic theology). Calvin, though it is clear that he thinks holiness undergirds God's law and our sanctification, says little that is specifically on God's holiness.¹⁶ Luther's profound awareness of God's holiness does not provide in all his writings any systematic treatment of what constitutes God's holiness, as far as I can determine. John Gill (Baptist, eighteenth century) gives God's holiness due attention but no definition, except to say holiness 'gives a lustre to all [God's] perfections, and is the glory of them'.¹⁷

For many modern existential and dialectical theologians holiness is a phenomenon of human experience only, not something that belongs to God in and of Himself. For Paul Tillich, religious feeling of 'the numinous'—the sphere of the gods in contrast with the secular—is sufficient explanation.¹⁸

For Barth and Brunner, however, emphasis on divine transcendence leads them to a somewhat better view. They see God's holiness as His transcendence, the 'wholly other'—a term met endlessly in their writings. The truly path-breaking work, The Idea of the Holy by Rudolph Otto, informs them, as us all, at least as to terminology for discussing holiness. There is validity, but nothing distinctively biblical or Christian, to Otto's analysis, yet Brunner's summary is worthy of attention:

Modern students of religion have come to the unanimous conclusion that the fundamental act of all religion is the worship of the Holy. ‘The Holy’ as Rudolf Otto’s beautiful book has shown us in an impressive and beautiful manner, is that to which the religious act is directed. Holiness is the very nature of the Numinous, of that which is divine, thus of that of which characterizes ‘the Deity’, ‘the gods’, or the mysterium tremendum [also in Otto, mysterium, tremendum, fascinans], towards which man, as a religious being, turns. Just as from subjective standpoint the chief word in all religion is reverence or the fear of God, so from the objective point of view, the Holy is the chief word in all religion, the word which alone describes the dimension in which all that is religious is found. In the Biblical revelation, however, we are concerned not with ‘the Holy’ (as an abstract conception), but with the Holy One (as personal).¹⁹

In the sense that awe is inspired by the presence of the numinous (mysterium, tremendum, fascinans) of sacred sites and settings even MacQuarrie’s existential theology allows primacy to holiness among God’s attributes. There have been sincere but misdirected efforts to resolve holiness simply into the perfection of all the divine attributes or into another name for divine love—both love of Himself and benevolence toward His creatures. I have read nothing that faces these issues as adequately as the writings of A. H. Strong. Strong devoted careful (and passionate) attention to refuting these erroneous views because of the persuasive advocacy of ‘moral influence’ theories of the atonement (Horace Bushnell) and ‘the social gospel’ (Walter Rauschenbusch) in his time and in his own denomination (Baptist).

God’s holiness cannot be dissolved into God’s self-love, even though as generally orthodox a theologian as Jonathan Edwards in his Essay on the Trinity affirmed the holiness of God consists in infinite love to Himself. If he had said self-affirmation or regard for His own integrity, Edwards would have been closer to the truth. ‘Enlightenment’ and ‘modernist’ or ‘liberal’ theology almost uniformly puts love ahead of God’s holiness in the divine attributes or mixes the two in such a manner as to deny both. I quote A. H. Strong once more and somewhat at length regarding the importance of seeing that holiness controls divine love rather than the other way around or some form of co-ordinate standing.

Our conclusion at this point in our theology will ... determine what our future system will be. The principle that holiness is a manifestation of love, or a form of benevolence, leads to the conclusions that happiness is the only good, and the only end; that law is a mere expedient for securing of happiness; that penalty is simply deterrent or reformatory in its aim; that no atonement needs to be offered to God for human sin; that eternal retribution cannot be vindicated, since there is no hope of reform. This view ignores the testimony of conscience and of Scripture that sin is intrinsically ill-deserving, and must be punished on that account, not because punishment will work good to the universe,—indeed, it could not work good to the universe unless it were just and right in itself. It [holiness, defined as a manifestation of love] ignores the fact that mercy is optional with God, while holiness is invariable; that punishment is many times traced to God’s holiness, but never to God’s love; that God is not simply love but light—moral light—and therefore is ‘a consuming fire’ (Heb. 12:29) to all iniquity. Love chastens ... but only holiness punishes.²⁰

His holiness accounts for God's absolute intolerance of any competing object of worship, especially idolatry. He is a 'jealous God' and a 'consuming fire' toward those who commit lese majesty against Him. Holiness explains why divine law is on every occasion an expression of what God is: 'Be ye holy for I am holy.' Consequently, God's glory is the only proper end of creaturely action and the 'fear of God' is the normal response to Him.

Scripture not only teaches these attitudes toward God and His demands, but conscience accuses us and threatens us for non-compliance. God's absolute holiness is the standard of enlightened conscience also. Rationalistic liberal religion replaces holiness with the amorphous notion of 'unconditional love'. Of a truth, God does not love any sinner unconditionally any more than He also 'hates all evildoers' unconditionally (Ps. 5:5) and precisely because of His holiness. That is, for the sake of His own integrity He will require the uttermost farthing in the judgment for every unrepented and unrequited sin. Sin's dimension of magnitude is measured by divine holiness, and that is without limit. It was divine holiness, not love, which was basic to the requirement of death when the God-man became sin for us at Calvary.

2. Righteousness: God Is Righteous

Since God is holy in character, all manifestation of that character will be righteous. The Bible therefore speaks frequently of the righteousness of God.

The divine attribute of righteousness may be thought of in a twofold way. Firstly, God always acts in harmony with His own holy nature. He loves righteousness (Ps. 11:7) therefore He cannot lie (Titus 1:2); He will never deny Himself (2 Tim. 2:13) or fail to keep one of His covenant promises. If He saves a sinner, it will be in a manner consistent with His own holy nature. If He announces a moral law it will be righteous precisely because it will be an expression of His holy will.²¹

Because God is sovereign, He does not therefore have to answer the question, Why? Moreover, we have no right to ask it. Nevertheless, for Himself, His laws are right because they express His holiness. God's laws are expressions of a holy will that in turn is expression of a holy character. The righteousness by which God orders His world is neither something created, external to Himself, nor something other than God Himself in any manner whatsoever. His righteous acts are His character in action; God is law unto Himself.

Secondly, God deals with His creatures in justice (righteous treatment). The classical theologians call this rectoral justice when viewed as administration of His universal government. 'Righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne' (Ps. 89:14). It is called distributive justice in regard to His extending to each of His rational creatures his due reward or punishment. It is worth noting that distributive justice is not to be confused with equality of treatment of people by God or equal status in the world. This is because God creates both the blind and the seeing, both rich and poor, both wise and the foolish: some to be born in a clean bed to be reared in piety and plenty, some in filth to be raised in a morally polluted atmosphere, and so on. Distributive justice is not properly a code name for 'equal opportunity', as nowadays in social history, or for equality of goods and wealth as in socialistic economics. When viewed as giving each of His creatures his due reward or punishment, Scripture says: 'Righteous are you, O Lord, and right are your rules' (Ps. 119:137). God's justice is punitive or vindictory (not vindictive) justice in connection with punishing of all sin, because of sin's intrinsic ill desert, for the sceptre of God's kingdom is a sceptre of equity (see Ps. 45:3–7).

There is a further very important sense in which we must think of God's righteousness. It is the imputed righteousness of God, first mentioned at Genesis 15:6 in connection with Abraham's faith. This is the righteousness or acquittal called justification. Christ's righteousness becomes vicariously ours, imputed to us by God when we believe on His Son. This amazing doctrine is taught throughout the Scriptures (see Rom. 3:21) but treated at length especially by Paul (see Rom. 3:21–5:21, especially 3:21–28; Gal. 1–4). Imputed righteousness is not one of God's attributes, even though the fact that God declares ungodly sinners, who are not righteous, to be righteous, must be squared with God's truthfulness and justice. God is both 'just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus' (Rom. 3:26).

God's righteousness will be manifest at last on the Judgment Day (see Rev. 16:4–7) just as long ago it was manifest when 'it was the will of the Lord to crush' His Son at Calvary, once He took our place as sinners (Rom. 3:25). If we are wise we will see God as righteous in His treatment of us as believers, not only in forgiving our sins (1 John 1:9) but also in chastening us His people (Dan. 9:14) and making the demand of a righteous life (see Jer. 7:8–11). If at times we have difficulty in seeing the justice of God in the way He temporarily allows evil to prosper, we may nevertheless trust His justice to triumph at last (Ps. 73; Hab. 2; Jer. 12:1–4).

Though the cause of Evil prosper, yet 'tis Truth alone is strong,
And, albeit, she wander outcast now.
I see around her throng
Troops of beautiful, tall angels, to enshield her from all wrong.²²

3. Truth: God is True

It will help us to quote several leading statements of Scripture in order to understand this attribute of the Godhead before a definition is attempted. Jesus prayed to His Father as 'the only true God' (John 17:3) and Paul spoke of Christian conversion as a turning 'to God from idols to serve the living and true God' (1 Thess. 1:9). In these passages, 'true' means genuine, the real and the valid. In contrast to idols, demon spirits and all false objects of veneration or worship, God is authentic God. Paul says 'we know that "an idol has no real existence", and that "there is no God but one" ... although there may be so-called gods' (1 Cor. 8:4, 5; cf. 1–6). Of all the alleged objects of discourse called 'god', the God of the Bible is the only true God. He is veritable (to use the old ecclesiastical term) God. God's attributes and ways of doing are true in this same sense of being genuine. God's peace, for example, is true peace (Jer. 33:6), likewise His kindness is true kindness (2 Sam. 2:6), His goodness, authentic goodness (Exod. 34:6), and His grace, genuine grace (John 1:17), whereas 'the mercy of the wicked is cruel' (Prov. 12:10).

In a different but related sense, He is also the veracious, truth-speaking, truth-communicating God: ‘Let God be [found] true though every one were a liar’ (Rom. 3:4); ‘I ... give thanks to your name for your steadfast love and your faithfulness, for you have exalted above all things your name and your word’ (Ps. 138:2; see also John 3:33; Rom. 1:25; John 14:17; 1 John 5:7).

Since the veritable (true) and veracious (truthful) God is the Creator and Governor of heaven and earth, a third sense appears: He is the ground of all truth. Scripture thus addresses Him as ‘Lord God of truth’ (Ps. 31:5 kjv). This is asserted directly in passages such as Psalm 111, which discuss God’s works. The works of God are first said to be great, honourable and wonderful. Then ‘The works of his hands are faithful and just; all his precepts are trustworthy; they are established forever and ever, to be performed with faithfulness and uprightness’ (Ps. 111:7, 8).

A diversion into recent theories of language analysis and of hermeneutics at this point would show how scepticism, denial that anything anyone speaks or writes is true in any important sense, has imported Pilate’s skeptical question wholesale to the academy. Recently these theories have invaded all university departments except the hard sciences. The public has been made aware of this disastrous development as ‘deconstructionism’.

Deconstruction uses figures, tropes, neologisms, irony and philosophy to sever any connection between an author’s true self and what he has written. The motives of these literary dogmatists apparently are chiefly to create an elite of critics who have their own club. The strength of this syndrome is an informal connection of ambitious professors and their admirers, supported by tenure rules that deliver the star performers from necessity of constructive labour.

Though still present, more subtle but equally destructive of trust of a neighbour’s words, written or spoken, are other newly minted theories—all the more subtle because there is a germ of truth to ensnare new students in each one of them. The inquirer will see how this is related to biblical interpretation and theology by examining the book Introduction to Biblical Interpretation by Klein, Craig and Hubbard.²³

Christians therefore should never be either cynics or skeptics. The cynical temper, doubting everything and everybody, challenging every statement as if there were no true statements, has only the appearance of the love of truth. The ‘adversarial spirit’ in theological schools and faculties, debating all doctrine, challenging every tradition, has harmfully contributed to the cynical spirit so prevalent in church life of recent times. We know that God is truthful, that He made our organs of sense and powers of reason not to mock us but to bring us in valid, cognitive touch with a created universe that is genuine. Skeptics and cynics are out of touch with God’s world.

Christians, as lovers of God, are not only lovers of truth considered abstractly, but of every truth individually, because we know Him who is true (John 8:13, 14, 16, 18, 28). Our God is the author of truth. His children, therefore, should not be obscurantists afraid to embrace any truth newly presented. They will be lovers of true chemistry and geology, astronomy, farming and industry, as well as true love, true Christian doctrine and true Bible interpretation.

4. Faithfulness: God is Faithful

Since God is true He will not change His character. He will be true to Himself. To us, His creatures, He will remain the same as He has always been.

A number of important texts declare this to be a fact, but Deuteronomy 7:9–11 is outstanding:

Know therefore that the Lord your God is God, the faithful God who keeps covenant and steadfast love with those who love him and keep his commandments, to a thousand generations, and repays to their face those who hate him, by destroying them. He will not be slack with one who hates him. He will repay him to his face. You shall therefore be careful to do the commandment and the statutes and the rules that I command you today.

In keeping with this trait of character He is called a Rock (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18; Ps. 19:14), a Fortress (Jer. 16:19), a Defence (Ps. 89:18); His word is said to be sure (Ps. 19:7) and steadfast forever (Dan. 6:26). As Frederick M. Lehman writes:

When hoary time shall pass away, and earthly thrones and kingdoms fall;
When men who here refuse to pray,
On rocks and hills and mountains call;
God's love, so sure, shall still endure,
All measureless and strong;
Redeeming grace to Adam's race—
The saints' and angels' song.

Because God is steadfast, the world of nature, the sphere of His creation, preservation and providence will remain steadfast. 'While the earth remains, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease' (Gen. 8:22). The farmer may plant his crops knowing that within the variety of climate and rainfall he can count on a crop if he tends his fields. The scientist may rely on what he calls the uniformity of nature. Gravity, the rates of expansion of gases, the velocities of electrons and light waves, and the like, will, under constant conditions, be everywhere the same. Natural events can be explained by natural causes. Superstitions, 'old wives fables', astrology and similar, may be ignored, as far as practical action is concerned. God's faithfulness is thus the solid foundation of reality, of a life of intelligent action.

In the spiritual realm, God's promises may be counted upon: His covenants are unbreakable. Ethan the Ezrahite sings of this in Psalm 89: 'with my mouth I will make known your faithfulness to all generations ... in the heavens you will establish your faithfulness' (vv. 1–2). He says the heavens shall praise God's faithfulness, as well as the congregation of believers on earth (v. 5), and shall proclaim it to be unique (v. 8). God is faithful in His rule of nature (vv. 9–13). God's faithfulness is associated with His justice and judgment, mercy and truth (v. 14). Faithfulness has been singularly prominent in God's dealing with the house of David, defending the anointed sons when they kept covenant, faithfully chastening them for their own good when they did not faithfully follow his laws and ordinances (vv. 20–32). David’s seed (v. 36) ‘shall endure forever’, a promise having connection with the endless resurrection life of our Lord Jesus Christ, ‘Like ... a faithful witness in the skies’ (v. 37).

The truth has an obverse side too. If God will fulfill His promises faithfully, so will He carry through on His threats. This is concomitant with being Himself, for He ‘cannot deny himself’ (2 Tim. 2:13). Furthermore, ‘Do not be deceived: God is not mocked, for whatever one sows, that will he also reap’ (Gal. 6:7).

Great is Thy faithfulness, O God my Father,

There is no shadow of turning with thee;

Thou changest not, Thy compassions they fail not;

As thou hast been Thou forever wilt be (Thomas O. Chisholm).

5. Love: God is Love

Another of God’s attributes of goodness is love. We shall here make a distinction between love and mercy. Mercy is a manifestation of God’s love just as faithfulness is a manifestation of His truth, and His righteousness of His holiness.

Love is exceedingly difficult to mention, in times like ours, without danger of misinterpretation. The physical passion of the mutual attraction of the sexes seems to be such an absorbing interest of our times that this universally experienced and fascinating form of love tends to exclude all other forms of love whenever the word is spoken.

The distinctive element in the love of God is self-communication. This is different from either holiness or truth and we must not think of it as including them. If these three are confused in any way whatsoever, serious harmful theological errors are bound to follow. The Bible neither identifies one with another nor confounds them. If holiness and love are equated, then sin may be overlooked, for then holiness poses no barrier to acceptance of sin. Justice is made maudlin. Final judgment and punishment are thereby rendered unnecessary. If love and truth are equated, then untruth may be tolerated. True, ‘God is love’ (John 4:8), but that must be understood as meaning that God is a loving being, just as He is also a holy being and true being. Writers sometimes assert that holiness is not a distinct attribute but the perfection of all of them. Others assert that holiness is a form of love, i.e. self-love. As we have tried to demonstrate earlier in this chapter, both of these assertions are incorrect, misleading and dangerous. It is indeed correct to say that God’s holiness is self-affirming, but love as a communication of the self is hardly the same as maintenance of the self.

As any one who has read the stories of God’s chastening of the Israelites (Exodus to Malachi) ought to know, God’s love for them was at every point directed and bounded by His holiness. There is nothing maudlin about the love of God. ‘You hate all evildoers.’

God ‘did not spare his own Son’,²⁴ therefore, when His son ‘became sin for us’ at Calvary;²⁵ God caused Him to be ‘wounded for our transgressions ... it was the will of the Lord to crush him’.²⁶ Thus, we see in what poignant ways holiness and love meet, ‘For God so loved the world, that he gave his only Son’.²⁷ In this verse ‘so’ does not mean ‘so much’ but ‘thus’ or ‘in this manner’.

A well-known hymn says of God that His ‘Love found a way to redeem my soul! Love found a way that could make me whole.’ And, indeed, God’s love did. Not, however, at the expense of His truth and holiness. The ‘expense’ was the life of God’s only begotten Son, not at the expense of God’s holiness, justice and truth.

Neither is God’s love a mere ‘positive attitude’ toward all created beings. Quite to the contrary, He hates not only ‘wickedness’ (Ps. 45:7), but also ‘all evildoers’ (Ps. 5:5; cf. 11:5). If we who are forgiven sinners want a formula for our attitude toward sinners that shares God’s attitude, then we must put something together better than ‘Hate the sin but love the sinner’. It sounds right but does not quite match what we know of God and His ways. The Almighty Creator of this now fallen world has no love for it, nor should we, except with the ethical goal of bringing people to conformity with His holiness.

God’s love is holy. As a holy being, His love is directed knowledgeably and voluntarily in ways harmonious with truth. He will not propagate a lie or perpetuate one. Paul prays that our Christian ‘love may abound more and more, with knowledge and all discernment’ (Phil. 1:9). It is incorrect to say that God’s love is unconditional, for it is conditioned by His holiness of being and His love of Himself—i.e. by truth. He did not need a world to have a sufficient object of love. God loves the world of mankind because we bear His image. His love is holy, designed fully to restore that image but also true, in that our sinfulness is taken into account.

God’s love is of course an attribute of God cherished much by all systems of theology. In soundly biblical theology, God’s love is never at the sacrifice of His holiness. Perhaps the most complete and convincing statement of this fact is by A. H. Strong, whose exposition explores the relation of divine love to other attributes, especially His holiness.²⁸ G. C. H. Berkouwer summarizes the failure of the neo-orthodoxy of Karl Barth in this regard:

In Barth’s doctrine of the divine attributes, the love of God dominates over His righteousness, His grace over His wrath. It would seem that he thus allows the gospel of grace, the Scriptural message of the love of God unto the salvation of the world, to come to its full expression. But the manner in which Barth speaks of God’s yes and no reveals a concept of grace different from that of the Biblical message. Barth conceives of a new order of grace, established in redemption and in the election in Christ, in which all now share [universal salvation]. Unbelief is nothing but the nonsense of rejecting this irrefutable fact: the universal love of God.²⁹

If God was to love us sinners, then there was a cost to Him—as inharmonious with His perfect blessedness of being as that seems. Atonement through the passion and death of the Son of God was the fruit of that love, for Christ is ‘the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world’ (Rev. 13:8, kjv; cf. 1 Peter 1:19, 20). Therefore, the permission of sin in God’s eternal counsels was at great cost to Him. Early in the scriptural record, it is said of sin that ‘it grieved him to his heart’ (Gen. 6:6). Ephesians 4:30 speaks of grieving the Holy Spirit. He is said to share in the afflictions of His people

(Isa. 63:9). Abraham's grief over his 'not withheld' son (Gen. 22:16) is a picture of the grief of God when 'He ... did not spare his own Son' (Rom. 8:32).³⁰

The Bible makes God's love not only the ground of proper human love (1 John 4:11) but also the effective cause of it, for 'We love because he first loved us' (1 John 4:19). Our love for God and other people is both evidence and fruit of God's indwelling presence in us and is the means God uses to reveal His holiness and love to the world, for 'No one has ever seen God; if we love one another, God abides in us and his love is perfected in us' (1 John 4:12).

6. Mercy: God is Merciful

The attribute of mercy is often called 'transitive love', and such it is. It is love in action for those who do not deserve the blessed provisions of God's love but do desperately need His love. The word 'mercy' (almost always God's mercy) occurs much more frequently in the King James Version than the word 'love'. The Revised Standard Version, and the English Standard Version, change many of these to 'steadfast love' and New International Version to 'love'. The Hebrew and Greek words involved show some variety. The emphasis in the King James Version, however, lays legitimate emphasis on the action of God's love.

Eddie Arnold (a retired ikon of country music) sings a song about a lover who reflects sadly that the great love of his life, one who married another, never knew he loved her because he never told her! This is not true of God's love, for His mercies on the undeserving have been showered upon them. He has shown it in His care for all His creatures (Ps. 145:15, 16), and in His allowing His enemies and blasphemers to live, while helping all undeserving in one way or another (Neh. 9:17–21, 27–32). A Psalm exclaims, 'The earth, O Lord, is full of your steadfast love' (Ps. 119:64). Another Psalm exclaims, 'Oh give thanks to the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever!' (Ps. 106:1 kjv). Psalm 136:11 (kjv) repeats the very same words and adds, 'for his mercy endureth forever' twenty-five times. Certainly, God's mercy is an emphasized aspect of God's goodness in the Bible.

The goodness (benevolence) of God toward all His creatures, especially sinful men, is a special feature of God's mercy. Paul declares that it is a witness to God even among the heathen (Acts 14:17). In another text he joins God's holiness, truth, love and mercy, appealing to sinful men in a special way (Rom. 2:1–5), focusing on God's goodness (i.e. benevolence or mercy): 'Or do you presume on the riches of his kindness and forbearance and patience, not knowing that God's kindness is meant to lead you to repentance?' (Rom. 2:4).

These three pairs of attributes of God's goodness—holiness manifest in righteousness; truth in faithfulness; and love in mercy—do not exhaust the number of such attributes mentioned in Scripture. There is no prescribed list. Yet I think a little reflection on others—compassion, loving kindness, pity, tender mercies and the like—will show they are subsumed by, or are refinements of, these six.

¹ James J. Fox, 'Good' in The Catholic Encyclopedia, vi, p. 636.

² Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, i, (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 435.

³ Worship and Prayer in the Christian Church, (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 100.

- ² W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (Edinburgh: 1889; 3rd ed. New York: Ktav Publ., 1969), p. 132.
- ⁴ Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (New York: Harper & Bros., 1941), p. 242.
- ⁵ R. W. L. Moberly, The Old Testament of the Old Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992), p. 99.
- ⁶ Barrick cites Augustine Pagolu, The Religion of the Patriarchs, JSOTSS 277 (Sheffield, England: Sheffield Academic Press, n.d.), p. 23.
- ⁷ To borrow James Orr's felicitous title, The Progress of Dogma, 1901.
- ⁸ Rudolph Otto, The Idea of the Holy, trans. J. W. Harvey (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1958), p. 117. See all of Chapter. XV, pp. 115–131.
- ⁹ O. Procksh, TDNT I:88–110.
- ¹⁰ M. William Ury, 'Holy, Holiness' Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. Walter A. Elwell (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1996), pp. 341–344.
- ¹¹ Webster's New World Dictionary of the American Language.

- ¹² The word qadosh, meaning holy, was a Canaanite word before it became a Hebrew word. In Canaanite religion it had no special ethical sense—priests and priestesses were called qadosh in the sense of being devoted to the god or goddess, but not in the sense of ethical purity. They were impure, in fact, as were the deities. Sacred prostitution was part of their religious exercises.
- ¹³ H. Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of God, Dogmatics, vol i (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1950, 1974), p. 162.
- ¹⁴ Gen. 2:17; Rom. 6:23; Ezek. 18:4, 20.
- ¹⁵ James Russell Lowell, The Present Crisis.
- ¹⁶ John Calvin, Institutes V, iii–v.
- ¹⁷ John Gill, Body of Divinity I (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), p. 149.
- ¹⁸ Paul Tillich, Systematic Theology I (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1951), pp. 215–218.
- ¹⁹ Brunner, op. cit., p. 157.
- ²⁰ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 272 and pp. 268–275; see also Strong, 'The Holiness of God' in Philosophy and Religion, pp. 188–200.
- ²¹ This does not mean that God's will is arbitrary, ignoring the 'fitness of things'. The scholastic followers of Duns Scotus exaggerated the dependence of divine righteousness on divine will.
- ²² From James Russell Lowell, 'The Present Criss'.
- ²³ Wm. W. Klein, C. L. Craig, R. L. Hubbard, Jr., 'Modern Approaches to Interpretation,' Introduction to Biblical Interpretation (Dallas: Word Publishing, 1993) pp. 427–457.
- ²⁴ Rom. 8:32.
- ²⁵ 2 Cor. 5:21, kjv
- ²⁶ Isa. 53:5, 10.
- ²⁷ John 3:16.
- ²⁸ Strong, op. cit., pp. 269–275.
- ²⁹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, The Providence of God, trans. L. B. Smedes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 264, 265.
- ³⁰ How Scripture may properly portray God as 'blessed forever', and 'with whom there is no variation or shadow due to change' (according to immemorial theological tradition, 'impassible'), will be the subject of chapter 23 of this section.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (93). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

13

The Triunity of the Godhead in Biblical and Christian History

'the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit' (Matt. 28:19)

The Trinity in Ancient Formal Statements

Three hundred and seventy-five pastors, or bishops, of churches throughout Christendom (the Roman world) assembled at Nicea, not far eastward from Constantinople in what is now Asiatic Turkey, in ad 325. The purpose of this conference (First Ecumenical Council), called together by the Constantine I, Emperor of the Roman Empire, was to formulate a clear, summary statement of what the Scriptures teach about the relation of the Son of God to God the Father. The Holy Spirit was not yet a focus of intense and prolonged study or of controversy. A modern author has rightly commented, '[It is] readily apparent that the Nicene Creed is an expansion of the Apostles' Creed and a defense of [it] from misuse by reinterpretation.'¹

Let us emphasize that both the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed, which follows it and enlarges it, are essentially statements about events in history. They do not, like the creeds of most other religions, make claims about ultimate reality or seek to sort out ideas of mind and matter, space and time, and the like. These two creeds read much more like Peter's simple recital of the faith, as history, to spiritually anxious seekers of the household of Cornelius (Acts 10:34–43) than any ancient Hellenist or Gnostic statement of how the world operates. In this, they are much more like the Bible itself than books of theology—so much for charges of spoiling the plain Bible message with infusions of pagan philosophical vocabulary and patterns of thought. What Christians now call the Holy Trinity doctrine is latent in the New Testament beginnings and had been taught from the earliest Christian times. The Council of Nicea was the first, focused, common effort to define the doctrine against the errors of several divisive teachers and sects that were undercutting the very heart of Christian truth. The Nicene Fathers' effort was never conceived as one to dissolve the essential mystery of the Godhead, for they recognized such could not be done. Their intention, successfully achieved, was precisely to preserve the mystery. Nor was theirs an effort to frame a 'metaphysical' definition of God. Rather it was to state intelligibly that God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are three without denying in any fashion that God is one Lord.

The result was a brief statement of belief affirming that the oneness of the Godhead is in respect to being (Latin substantia, substance; Greek ousia). The Son is homoousios (same substance) with the Father. The Spirit is to be worshiped together with Father and Son. Those who, like the present author, believe that civilizations are but the expressions of beliefs about ultimate matters (that is, religious beliefs) will agree with Philip Schaff:

The Council of Nicea is the most important event of the fourth century, and its bloodless intellectual victory over a dangerous error [Arianism] is of far greater consequence to the progress of true civilization than all the bloody victories of Constantine and his successors.²

About 125 years later, an ecumenical council at a place not far from Nicea, called Chalcedon (ad 451), the Latin word persona (person) and the Greek word hypostasis, though previously often translated in Latin as substantia (English, substance), came to be adopted as the accepted term for the sense in which the members of the Trinity are three. There was no effort to phrase the biblical revelation in the thought-patterns of Greek philosophy, as antagonists of orthodoxy frequently assert today. The contrary was the case. The simple doctrines of Scripture—the Father is God; the Son is God; the Holy Spirit is God; there is only one God—were retained in resistance to the efforts of errorists of the time to dissolve the palpable paradox, or mystery, in some philosophic formula. The full humanity of the Son and His full deity, two natures in one ‘person and subsistence’, is spelled out plainly. The great creed of Nicea (as given final form at the Second Ecumenical Council, Constantinople, ad 381) and the Definition of Chalcedon are with us still as standards precisely because they leave the mysteries of Scripture intact.³

The reader may wonder if all this precision (‘getting technical’) is necessary. Yes, it is, if one is going to meet the challenges to the deity of our Lord mounting higher in our time, as they did in that of the Nicean Council. Arius advocated the very same reasonable-sounding, fatal denials that we hear both from learned ‘modernists’ and the unlearned cultists today. Arius and his partisans proposed to worship Christ as a great angel, of similar substance (Greek, homoi-ousios), with the Father, while Athanasius and those in agreement insisted, on scriptural grounds, Christ the Son is no created being, but like the Father, He is an eternal being, consubstantial (same substance, Greek, homoousios) with the Father. There is only an iota (Gr. i) of difference, but the difference involves the very heartbeat of our faith.⁴

There is some merit to Hendrikus Berkhof’s cautions against supposing any pronouncements, dogmatical or speculative, have succeeded in explaining the mystery of the triunity of God. Of ‘traditional’ and ‘speculative theology’ he wrote:

[W]e must not forget that we (Protestants) have no ‘dogma of the Trinity’ inherited from the ancient church, only some pronouncements of Councils about the divine character of Christ and the Spirit. The formula ‘one being, three persons’ from the very first moment left open several interpretations; even today it veils the problems; instead of solving them.⁵

The Reformation and the Trinity

Nearly 500 years ago Arianism (Socinianism, Unitarianism) again challenged the orthodox faith. The Protestant Reformation responded valiantly and successfully. Luther accepted the orthodox doctrine because he knew it was scriptural. He placed equal emphasis on both the oneness and the Dreifaltigkeit (threefoldness). Luther taught, ‘One God in three persons—every person is the entire deity and yet no person exists as the deity for itself without the other two.’⁶ I am aware of no record of any extended treatment of the Trinity by Luther, but he discussed it in his Bible expositions, theses and debates and especially in Advent sermons. He thought, as did all the leading Reformers, that the medieval schoolmen had erred greatly in supposing they could derive the Trinity from the nature of God and render the doctrine fully amenable to reason. He said, ‘The scholastic teachers have attempted to make this understandable with very great subtleties.’ A Luther scholar explains, ‘Instead of this, one should stick to the simple, clear, powerful words of Scripture.’⁷ Luther held no brief for the traditional Trinitarian vocabulary (nature, essence, ousia, hypostasis, and the like). One uses the vocabulary as convenient, though inadequate to express the mystery. One is free to use other language, but at the peril of misrepresenting the biblical revelation.

At first, Calvin seemed to avoid traditional formulations of the Trinity doctrine. This brought on criticism by a jealous colleague. Later on, without mentioning the colleagues or the names of the contemporary sixteenth-century Arians, Calvin refuted their views and stated well why Christian people of all ages must get this matter straight in their thinking, and in doing so must also learn a few new words. This Reformer, whose own language was studiedly direct and simple, points out that for ages past learned Christians (Hilary, Jerome, Augustine) had protested the use of the technical words for the distinctions, but had nevertheless been compelled to employ them. Then he wisely adds, ‘And this modesty of saintly men ought to warn us against forthwith . . . taking to task those who do not wish to swear by the words conceived by us.’ Thus he sympathizes with the simple man’s impatience. Nevertheless, he goes on to say why the simple man also must have some patience, to learn a few useful new words.

Without these terms, we cannot clarify issues and distinguish a teacher who is a willful, dangerous heretic from one who is mildly erroneous or entirely orthodox. Calvin observes:

Arius, says that Christ is God, but mutters that he was made and had a beginning. He says that Christ is one with the Father, but secretly whispers in the ears of his own partisans that He is united to the Father like other believers, although by a singular privilege. Say ‘consubstantial’ and you will tear off the mask of this turncoat, and yet you add nothing to Scripture.⁸

Every stream of orthodox Christianity derived from the sixteenth-century Reformation preserved the heritage of the ancient church in regard to the trinity of the Godhead.

The late Kenneth S. Kantzer of Trinity Evangelical Divinity School has said that though ‘the major doctrines were worked out in the very ancient church,’ Evangelicals look back with deep gratitude to their Reformation heritage. To Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, and their associates they acknowledge an immeasurable debt—particularly for their insights into justification by faith alone as the very heart of the gospel and for their loyal defense of the final authority of the Bible as the inerrant written Word of God. Less clearly recognized is the Reformation contribution to the doctrine of the Trinity.⁹

Kantzer goes on to explain how ‘the Genevan reformer, following guidelines laid down by Augustine, worked out the details of the doctrine more fully than any of the other reformers’.

Why Christians believe in the Trinity of the Godhead

Why do Christians always everywhere uniformly insist on this doctrine? No text of Scripture says specifically that God eternally exists as one being (ousia, substance) in three persons, each of whom fully and perfectly possesses that substance. The orthodox doctrine is that each of the persons is God in a quantitative sense—all the God-ness there is—not in any mere generic sense, as when we say all men are human, as a class or category of being. Christians insist that it is necessary to believe this. Again. Why?

The answer has to do with history; not church history, but biblical history. The Old Testament tells of how God called a man named Abram out of a culture where many gods were worshipped (Josh. 24:2) in order to make known to him the one, true God. Abram came to see that Yahweh-’Elohim is ‘the Judge of all the earth’ (Gen. 18:25). He would use Abram to create a people through whom that message would be conveyed to other families of earth. God enforced the truth of monotheism to the Israelite descendants of Abram at the time of Moses. The historical books tell of the frequent apostasies of the Israelites from this truth and of their permanent acceptance of it through the sufferings of the Babylonian exile. Israel’s apostasies from monotheism were never again repeated on a general scale.

The first disciples of Jesus were Jews (Israelites). As time passed these incurable monotheists recognized that Jesus of Nazareth was God, the same God as He whom their Fathers had worshipped under the Mosaic economy. They said so in their sermons and writings¹⁰

Jesus told them shortly before his crucifixion (John 14–16) and afterward that the Father would send to them another Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, ‘to be with you forever’. He was to be another (allos) of the same, not a different (heteros) kind. When He, the Holy Spirit, came in the special way described in the second chapter of Acts, the disciples immediately recognized the Holy Spirit also as God. They formed no doctrinal statement about the Holy Spirit for several centuries but, following apostolic usage, joined His name with the Father and/or the Son in proclamation, prayers, benedictions and blessings. Moreover, while steadfastly acknowledging that there is only one God (as all Jews affirmed), they also affirmed that the Father is God, the Son is God and Spirit is God.

With new insights provided by fulfillment of ‘the promise of the Father’ which (they) heard from Christ Himself (Acts 1:4, 5; cf. 2:33; 11:16; and Matt. 3:11), the apostles were able to identify the Holy Spirit with the Spirit of God in the Old Testament. Beginning with the New Testament record itself, they quoted and cited Old Testament references to God’s Spirit as identical with the Holy Spirit.

Their example bids us to make (with attention to controls) the same equation. They attributed everything the Old Testament said about the Spirit of God to the now arrived, personal, Holy Spirit. He was ‘another of the same kind’ as Christ Himself (see John 14:10). In such case, asserts B. B. Warfield:

It was their own Holy Ghost who was Israel’s guide ... whom Israel rejected when they resisted the leading of God (Acts 7:51) ... In him ... Christ ... preached to the antediluvians (1 Peter 3:18) ... He ... was the author of faith of old as well as now (2 Cor. 4:13) ... He ... gave Israel its ritual service. It was He who spoke in and through David and Isaiah and all the prophets (Matt. 22:43; Mark 12:36; Acts 1:16; 28:25; Heb.

Peter's oft-quoted declaration about the prophetic origin of Old Testament Scriptures (2 Peter 1:21) maintains that it was the Spirit of Christ who moved the writing prophets—as Zechariah (7:12) and Nehemiah (9:20) were aware. Again, Peter claimed the prophecies of Christ written by such men as Daniel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the other Twelve were taught what to say by the 'Spirit of Christ' (1 Peter 1:11). The promised Spirit of God of Joel (2:27, 28) is the same Holy Spirit who descended at Pentecost (Acts 2:16). Isaiah's predictions of the special presence of the Spirit of the Lord with and on the righteous Servant (Son, Messiah)¹² were fulfilled, says the New Testament writers, in Christ.¹³

It is instinct with vital Christians, when they read the Bible, to understand Old Testament references to the Spirit of God along with the Holy Spirit revealed in the New Testament. No rigid hermeneutics, which in every case severely limits the reference of an Old Testament text to the intellectual and historical horizon of the original writer or of the first readers, is likely to talk the present Christian heirs of sixty generations of Christian Bible readers out of this conviction. Not only so, New Testament believers prayed in the Spirit to the Father in the name of the Son. In their benedictions they pronounced the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Spirit upon their departing assemblies (2 Cor. 13:14). Baptism, by the Lord's command, was in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost (Matt. 28:19).

Every element mentioned in the previous paragraph is thoroughly imbedded in the fabric of the New Testament. The putting of all these elements together in a formal statement was bound to come. Significantly, the very oldest surviving post-New Testament Christian creed is essentially a confession of faith in 'God the Father Almighty ... and in Jesus Christ, His only son ... and in the Holy Ghost.'¹⁴

When in later times, church councils (i.e. as we now say, conferences) hammered out formal statements of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, they were doing in a co-operative capacity what every biblical pastor does when he prepares his Sunday morning sermon and delivers it to his people. They were doing what they had to do in the face of problems and divisions. These threats to unity of the faith were brought on by attacks from sophisticated, learned, aggressive errorists within the professing church. The church today is by no means bound unquestioningly to follow ancient traditions. Yet we may rightly thank God for what previous generations of devout Christian scholars and teachers have done to formulate the Christian doctrine of the triune God and other doctrines. This is the true apostolic succession, spoken of as guarding a deposit, or committing to a rising generation of believers what has been passed down (the true Christian meaning of tradition) by earlier generations of believers (2 Tim. 2:1, 2).

Edward Bickersteth (1786–1850), lawyer, Anglican clergyman, promoter of missionary evangelism, evangelist and one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance, summarizes our answer to the question, 'Why do Christians believe in the triune Godhead?' Because, he says,

He reveals himself by his names, his attributes, and his acts. And, therefore, if, combined with assertions that God is one, we find three revealed in Scripture to whom the same names, attributes, and acts are ascribed, the same so far as a personal distinction allows;

if we look vainly for any fourth Divine one, or any intimation of more than three; if we connect with this the intimate and necessary union affirmed to exist betwixt the Father, and the Son, and the Spirit, as when the Lord Jesus says, ‘I and my Father are one,’ and when Paul says, ‘The Spirit searches the depths of God’; if, then, we find that every Christian is baptized into one Name,—the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,—we are led swiftly and irresistibly up to the doctrine (call it by what name you will) of the Trinity in Unity.¹⁵

A summary follows of Bickersteth’s summary-propositions and Scripture proof texts. This is useful in showing that the Father is God, the Son is God, the Spirit is God; and yet there is only one God.

- (1) The Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost are eternal (Rom. 16:26; Rev. 1:17; Mic. 5:2; Heb. 9:14; Deut. 33:27).
- (2) The Father, the Son and the Spirit created all things (1 Cor. 8:6; Ps. 100:3; Col. 1:16; Job 33:4; 1 Peter 4:9).
- (3) The Three are each omnipresent (Jer. 23:24; Matt. 28:20; Ps. 139:7; Acts 17:28, 29).
- (4) The Three are each omniscient (Matt. 11:27; Acts 15:18; John 21:17; Isa. 40:13; 1 Cor. 2:10; Heb. 4:13).
- (5) The Three are each true and good (John 7:28; 17:17, 25; Ps. 34:8; John 10:11; 14:6; Acts 3:14; 1 John 5:6; John 14:26; Ps. 143:10; Rev. 15:4).
- (6) They each have a self-regulating will (Eph. 1:11; Matt. 11:27; John 17:24; 1 Cor 12:11; Acts 21:14).
- (7) They are each the fountain of life (Ps. 36:9; Eph. 2:4, 5; John 5:21; John 3:8; Deut. 30:20).
- (8) They each sanctify us (Ps. 138:3; Isa. 66:13; Jude 1; Phil. 4:13; 1 Cor. 1:2; Eph. 3:16; John 14:26; Rom. 15:6).
- (9) Each fills our souls with divine love (1 John 5:1; 2:15; 2 Cor. 5:14; 1 Cor. 16:22; Rom. 15:30; Col. 1:8; Deut. 6:5).
- (10) Each gives divine law (Ps. 19:7; Isa. 11:8; Ezek. 2:4; Gal. 6:2; Col. 3:16; Rev. 2:18; Rom. 8:2; 2 Peter 1:21; Acts 13:2; James 4:12).
- (11) Each dwells in believers’ hearts (1 Cor. 14:25; John 1:3; Eph. 3:17; Col. 1:27; 1 John 1:3; John 14:17; 2 Cor. 13:14; Isa. 57:15).
- (12) The Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are, each by Himself, the supreme Jehovah and God:
(a) ‘I am Jehovah thy God’ (Exod. 20:2); (b) ‘Jehovah our God’ (Isa. 4:3; cf. Matt. 3:3) and ‘the Highest’ (Luke 1:76; and Matt. 10:11); (c) ‘Jehovah God’ (Ezek. 8:1, 3) and ‘the Highest’ (Luke 1:35). Yet God is one (Deut. 6:4).

To summarize Bickersteth: each Person, has the same attributes. The persons concur in mind, will and heart, personally distinct yet harmonious, and performing the same works. They have some of the same names. They are to be worshiped equally.

Explicit Trinitarian Belief, Confession and Proclamation before Nicea ad 325

There is, of course, no formal theological dogma of the Trinity in the New Testament. As we have already seen, however, the history recorded there of Jesus' words, promises and fulfillments about the Holy Spirit, and His own names, words, works and claims about and for Himself, created the atmosphere in which the primitive Christian teachers thought. In this climate of reflection, Father, Son and Holy Spirit were regarded—in the very texts of the Gospels and Epistles—as together constituting the one God. Did the Christians who lived in the second and third centuries, however, see these connections and believe, confess and proclaim a triune God—either implicitly or explicitly?

The writers immediately after the apostles, and for several generations, were so pressed by other concerns that they did not engage in doctrinal speculations about the Trinitarian formula of baptism and Trinitarian benediction in the New Testament. Neve says:

[T]hey used the Trinitarian formula; but this formula did not provoke them to discussion of the relation of the three to each other. Concerning Christ's relation to the Father we can only say that they regarded Christ as the Son of God, and ascribed to Him those attributes which can be predicated of God alone. And with Father and Son, the Holy Spirit is mentioned in so many cases.¹⁶

He adds: 'It must be admitted that the language of the Post-Apostolic Fathers was frequently binitarian [i.e. Father and Son are God]. The Spirit was taken as the Spirit of Christ as in 2 Corinthians 3:17. But with this they did not mean an actual identification of the Spirit with the Son. It was simply an abbreviation in expression. There was the natural difficulty of speaking of the Holy Spirit in hypostatic [personal] terms' (heightened by the fact that pneuma, spirit in Greek, is a neuter noun).¹⁷

Neve is correct in saying that, within the Godhead, the presence of the Son is more easily found than the Holy Spirit in Christian literature coming from those centuries; there is an explicit 'binitarianism' and an implicit 'trinitarianism'. The equality of the Spirit with the Son and the Father is present but not advertized, so to speak.

The earliest: post-New Testament Christian writing, the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians (about ad 95), closes with a benediction similar to Paul's, and like some of Paul's, omits the Holy Spirit: 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you and with all men who have been called by God', and so on.¹⁸

Justo L. Gonzalez, in his justly acclaimed History of Christian Thought, says: 'Clement's doctrine of God is clearly Trinitarian, in the sense that several Trinitarian formulas appear in the Epistle.'¹⁹

Shortly thereafter Polycarp of Smyrna,²⁰ just before his execution by fire, prayed: 'I glorify thee, through the eternal and heavenly high priest, Jesus Christ, thy beloved Servant, through whom be glory to thee through him and the Holy Spirit both now and unto the ages to come.'²¹

Perhaps the most explicitly Trinitarian statement from the Fathers of the earliest epoch is that of Athenagoras. He was an Athenian philosopher who had embraced Christianity and wrote A Plea For The Christians which was presented to the Emperors Aurelius and Commodus about ad 177. He is competently judged ‘one of the ablest of the early Christian Apologists’. The editor of the Plea for the Christians, in the second volume of Ante-Nicene Fathers, heads the tenth chapter, ‘The Christians Worship the Father, Son and Holy Ghost’. In this chapter of less than 300 words, Athenagoras confesses and teaches both a biblically informed and sophisticated monotheism and doctrine of a triune God approaching the quality of the fourth and fifth century creeds. I quote the short chapter in full, as both interesting and instructive, and decisive on the question raised in this part of the present chapter.

That we are not atheists, therefore, seeing that we acknowledge one God, uncreated, eternal, invisible, impassible, incomprehensible, illimitable, who is apprehended by the understanding only and the reason, who is encompassed by light, and beauty, and spirit, and power ineffable, by whom the universe has been created through His Logos, and set in order, and is kept in being—I have sufficiently demonstrated. [I say ‘His Logos’], for we acknowledge also a Son of God. Nor let any one think it ridiculous that God should have a Son. For though the poets, in their fictions, represent the gods as no better than men, our mode of thinking is not the same as theirs, concerning either God the Father or the Son. But the Son of God is the Logos of the Father, in idea and in operation; for after the pattern of Him and by Him were all things made, the Father and the Son being one. And, the Son being in the Father and the Father in the Son, in oneness and power of spirit, the understanding and reason [nous kai logos] of the Father is the Son of God. But if, in your surpassing intelligence, it occurs to you to inquire what is meant by the Son, I will state briefly that He is the first product of the Father, not as having been brought into existence (for from the beginning, God, who is the eternal mind [nous], had the Logos in Himself, being from eternity instinct with Logos [logikos]; but inasmuch as He came forth to be the idea and energizing power of all material things, which lay like a nature without attributes, and an inactive earth, the grosser particles being mixed up with the lighter. The prophetic Spirit also agrees with our statements. ‘The Lord,’ it says, ‘made me, the beginning of His ways to His works.’ The Holy Spirit Himself also which operates in the prophets, we assert to be an effluence of God, flowing from Him, and returning back again like a beam of the sun. Who, then, would not be astonished to hear men who speak of God the Father, and of God the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, and who declare both their power in union and their distinction in order, called atheists? Nor is our teaching in what relates to the divine nature confined to these points; but we recognise also a multitude of angels and ministers, whom God the Maker and Framers of the world distributed and pointed to their several posts by His Logos, to occupy themselves about the elements, and the heavens, and the world, and the things in it, and the goodly ordering of them all.²²

There should be no doubt, therefore, that, from the very first, Christianity has affirmed the ‘essential’ unity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit on the level of ‘being’ (to use an English word) though also in some mysterious sense also three. As good a brief guide to early patristic thought on the subject as I know of is fourteen pages on ‘The Three and the One’ by Jaroslav Pelikan.²³

Old Testament Preparation for Revelation of ‘God in Three Persons, Blessed Trinity’

The Old Testament prepared for revelation of the triunity of the Godhead by dropping hints, raising questions and posing problems, which suggest or point up the need for the New Testament revelation. The commonest name for God' ('elohim), appearing in the first sentence in the Bible, is a plural form. The sense, however, is almost always singular, when used of the God of the Bible. Once (Gen. 35:7), however, the Hebrew would normally be translated, apart from the context, 'the gods were revealed to him', even though the one true God is meant. Also, several times God refers to Himself as 'us' (Gen. 1:26; 3:22; 11:7; Isa. 6:8) and there are contexts wherein God, in a puzzling manner, seems to be more than one person (see Gen. 18:2, 16; 19:2; Isa. 44:6). Psalm 110:1 is a special case, because Jesus commented on the verse to prove that it is not improper for people to call Him the Son of God (Matt. 22:41–46). None of these passages explicitly teaches a plurality of persons in the Godhead, but it is not far-fetched (as Jesus' use of Psalm 110:1 shows) to challenge teachers, who reject the Trinity, to provide a better explanation of the verses.

A startling, impressive passage, (Isa. 63:7–10), brings the Lord (Jehovah), 'the angel of his presence' and 'his Holy Spirit' together. And in another passage, we read, ' "I have been there". And now the Lord GOD has sent me, and his Spirit' (Isa. 48:16). If the One who refers to Himself as 'I' and 'me' is the Servant of Isaiah (52:12–53:12), this text does indeed have a Trinitarian ring.

Modern 'scientific' exegesis, whether liberal or conservative, has a hard time following apostolic practice in interpreting many Old Testament references to 'the spirit' or 'the spirit of God' as designating the Holy Spirit, Third Person of the Godhead. The apostles do not hesitate in bringing New Testament history and revelation to Old Testament interpretation of this particular doctrine. They do not 'read the New Testament into the Old', but they do bring light shed by that history when 'the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son' (Gal. 4:4) to be 'the Savior of the world', (John 4:42; 1 John 4:14) and the Son promised the coming of 'the Spirit' who would proceed from the Father and the Son. By this means, the Old Testament is held to say much about the Holy Spirit.

None of these Old Testament literary phenomena is sufficient ground for a doctrine of three persons in the Godhead. No Jew was looking for the God-man at Bethlehem, as far as we know, on the basis of any of these and similar passages. Yet the revelation of the Trinity furnishes a basis for a better understanding of these texts of the Old Testament than was possible before the incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity and the special sending of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. [Necessary limitation of the size of this book prevents incorporating lectures delivered in a seminary course in the Doctrine of the Holy Spirit at this point.]

The New Testament Doctrine

The Pole Star of all biblical teaching is the unity of God. Our Lord commented favourably on the Mosaic formula, 'The Lord our God, the Lord is one' (Deut. 6:4; cf. Mark 12:28, 29), and His disciples, reared in the Mosaic Torah, never doubted it. They would never have followed a Messiah who announced a doctrine of tritheism (three gods) and neither they nor Jesus ever entertained such a repugnant pagan thought.

As we have seen, recognition of three members of one Godhead was pressed upon the consciousness of the first Christians by events of salvation history. The New Testament, we should observe, was written some time after the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ and of 'another Helper' had been thoroughly accepted. Thus numerous expressions occur on its pages which should be interpreted as referring to ‘persons’ recognized by the early believers as God. These three ‘persons’ are ‘God the Father’, ‘Christ who is God over all’ and ‘the Holy Spirit ... God’ (see John 6:27; Rom. 9:5; Acts 5:3, 4). Of these ‘persons’ there are three, no more, no less.²⁴

The distinction between the three members, each clearly regarded as God, can be demonstrated in several lengthy passages, Ephesians 1:3–14, for example. The most important of these lengthy passages is John 14, where the distinction between the three Persons is particularly apparent.

Jesus, Himself, in speaking to the twelve apostles, after Judas’ departure from the Upper Room, said, ‘I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Helper’ (John 14:16, Comforter kjv). Then, after discussing the Spirit’s coming and future relationship to believers, Jesus added, ‘the Helper, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name’ (v. 26). The unity of the Godhead is also there, for the coming of the Spirit is a spiritual coming of Christ (v. 18). Yet no discerning Bible reader will ever confuse the Persons of the Godhead on the ground of John 14:18, however difficult of explication the doctrine of the spiritual presence of Christ may be.²⁵

There is one occasion, the baptism of Jesus, which provides all the most penetrating Unitarian critic could demand, by way of clear distinction between the three Persons (Luke 3:21, 22; John 1:32–34; Matt. 3:16, 17; Mark 1:9–11). The incident must have importance to the Providence that inspired the Bible, for all four Gospels report it. We do not know how many people were present, but John the Baptizer was there and reported what he did, what he saw and what he heard (John 1:32–34). The two men entered the water and John baptized Jesus. (The mode of applying water to the subject is not relevant to the present discussion.) Then John saw the Spirit descending in the form of a dove and the voice of the Father was heard saying, ‘This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased’ (Matt. 3:17).

The essential, substantial unity of the Godhead is preserved in the New Testament, as well. There is only one God, not three gods. John 14:23, for example, states that when believers love Christ and keep His words, the Son and the Father come in the Spirit. In the same context, the coming of the Spirit is a coming of Christ (v. 18). Certain statements affirm the unity in even more specific language. The indwelling of ‘the Spirit of God’ is the indwelling of ‘the Spirit of Christ’ (Rom. 8:9). The argument of 1 Corinthians 3:16 draws a parallel between the indwelling of the Spirit in the church and the indwelling of the Old Testament temple by the God of the Old Testament, i.e. Jehovah. In John 10:30 Jesus says, ‘I and the Father are one’. Therefore, the unity of the Godhead, presented in the New Testament, is something far deeper than emotion, sentiment, policy or opinion as when we speak of unity of feeling, thinking, plans, action or purpose among people. It is a unity in respect of being. The Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are not mere sharers of a category of being, as when we say each of three brothers is a man. They are one in being.

There is no regular order employed in association of the names of the three. Because of our familiarity with the three names in the baptismal formula at Matthew 28:19 we do naturally think of the three as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, in that order. However, in the familiar benediction of 2 Corinthians 13:14 the order is Christ, God (Father), Spirit. In Ephesians 4:4–6 the order is Spirit, Lord (Christ), Father.²⁶

Nor do the relationships indicated by ‘Son of’ and ‘Spirit of’ indicate inferiority of being. The Son has the same power that the Father has, ‘For as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, so also the Son gives life to whom he will’ (John 5:21). He also deserves the same honor: ‘that all may honour the Son, just as they honour the Father’ (John 5:23).

It is greatly to be regretted that some famous and influential theologians of our time apparently affirm the triune God but explain their doctrine in ways that deny the distinctness of the three Persons. They may endorse ancient creeds, but their ‘recitals’ are doxological—a mode of religious confession made without actually intending exactly what one says. They bear no clear witness to the doctrine of ‘one substance but three persons’, appearing to favour one substance, one person, three modes of working or some kind of ‘adoptionism’. One of my best college professors thought he was orthodox, but confessed to me personally that the Father adopted the Son at His baptism.

We must not be so cautious, however, that, while affirming the sameness of the three persons we fail to distinguish the differences of who they are and what they do within the Holy Trinity as persons. Many passages affirm that the Father sent or gave the Son (John 3:16; 1 John 4:10 for examples). No text says the Son sent the Father. Jesus said the Father would send the Spirit (John 14:26) yet Jesus also said that He Himself would send the Spirit from the Father (John 16:7). Since ad 876 initially, and permanently since ad 1054, Christendom has been divided into East and West over ‘filioque’ (and the Son), which the Westerners, in harmony with John 14:26, added to the ancient Nicene Creed.²⁷

Certain texts of the New Testament seem to provide a formula for at least a glimpse into the relations, both functional and immanent, of the three Persons. In explaining the meaningless vanity of idols Paul wrote, ‘yet to us there is one God, the Father, of [ek, out of] whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him’ (1 Cor. 8:6 asv). The passage has the ring of a familiar formula of some kind. In this affirmation of monotheistic faith, there is no mention of the Holy Spirit. Paul completes the idea when he elsewhere writes, ‘through him [Christ] we ... have our access in one Spirit unto [pros, to, toward] the Father’ (Eph. 2:18 asv). This suggests that the Father is the source in creation and redemption, the planner; the Son is channel or means, the mediator; the Spirit is agent, the applier.

An examination of the doctrine of the triune God in Ephesians 1 yields similar results as regards the work of the Trinity in redemption. Here the Father, as source, is said to have chosen us, He being the One who planned redemption (Eph. 1:3–6); Christ the Son provides our redemption (vv. 7–13a); and the Spirit is the seal and earnest of fully applied redemption (vv. 13b and 14). The correspondence with 1 Corinthians 8:6 and Ephesians 2:18 is not exact, but nearly so.

These distinctions in the work of the Trinity are not absolute. John 3:16, for example, says God gave His Son, while Titus 2:14 says the Son gave Himself.

We are also taught by New Testament examples to pray to the Father, in the Spirit, in the name of Jesus, the Son. This shows that, in our approach to the Godhead in worship and prayer, the distinct relationships of the three members should be acknowledged.

At this point, our sketch of the New Testament teaching of a triunity, one God (one essence) and three Persons might have continued with a survey of proposals set forth by orthodox theologians to explain it. Some have been alluded to and more will yet appear in this study, but with no attempt on my part to do so. Instead, I submit the opinion of several learned, orthodox scholars as to why the effort is largely unfruitful. First, after a rather complete survey of such efforts ancient and modern, George Christian Knapp (1770–1825) asserted:

The conclusion is obvious that, while we are taught by the Scriptures to believe in three equal subjects in the Godhead, who are described as persons, we are still unable to determine in what manner or in what sense these three have the divine nature so in common that there is only one God.²⁸

A. H. Strong, perhaps the most influential Baptist theologian, devoted eight final pages of his lengthy treatment to develop the theme: ‘Inscrutable, yet not self-contradictory, this Doctrine furnishes the key to all other doctrines.’²⁹ Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), in a celebrated essay on the Trinity, wrote:

When we tell a child a little concerning God he has not an hundredth part so many mysteries in view on the nature and attributes of God and His works of creation and Providence as one that is told much concerning God in a divinity school; and yet he knows much more about God and has a much clearer understanding of Divinity and is able more clearly to explicate some things that were very dark and very unintelligible to him.³⁰

Gregory Nazianzen (cited earlier), in one of his orations, declared that simple Christian believers were orthodox, even though not fully informed, often more so than speculative thinkers.³¹ Augustine did not write his fifteen books on the Trinity to explain it rationally. On the one hand, he wrote them to show scoffing rationalists that it is not an irrational teaching, incapable of acceptance by ‘scientific’ minds. On the other, he wrote to lead believers part way only to understand what they were being taught by the church, and further to follow the apostle Paul in his method of humble submission to Christ (he cites Col. 2:3; 1 Cor. 2:2, 3; 1 Cor. 3:1, 2).

Jeremy Taylor (1613–1667), a noted English scholar in his day, wrote:

He [who] goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words and names of man’s invention, talking of essence and existence, hypostases and personalities, priority in coequality, and unity in pluralities, may amuse himself and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something—he knows not what; but the renewed man, that feels the power of the Father, to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is shed abroad—this man, though he understand nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone truly understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.³²

¹ R. J. Rushdoony, The Foundation of Social Order (Philadelphia: Presby. & Reformed Publ., 1968), p. 16.

² Philip Schaff, History of the Christian Church, vol. iii (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960, based on ed. publ. in 1910), p. 631. See ‘The Nicene Creed’ at end of this chapter.

³ C. S. Lewis, The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas (London: Duckworth, 1953), p. 110.

² See ‘The Definition of Chalcedon’ (Chap. 14, p. 118).

⁴ The idiom, ‘not an iota of difference’ originates in the homo-homoi disjunction.

⁵ Hendrikus Berkhof, The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit, Chap. VI ‘The Spirit & The Triune God’ (Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1977), pp. 109, 110.

⁶ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 199.

⁷ ibid., p. 200.

⁸ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), I, 15. 5.

⁹ Kenneth S. Kantzer, ‘John Calvin & the Mystery of the Trinity,’ Voices, a publication of Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, n.d., p. 10.

¹⁰ It should not be necessary at this point to demonstrate that the New Testament teaches the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ, nor that the disciples believed it. Peter’s confession and Thomas’ exclamation are enough for now. A later section of systematic theology, ‘Part 4: Christology: Person and Work of Christ’.

¹¹ B. B. Warfield, ‘The Spirit of God in the Old Testament’ ed. Samuel Craig, Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), pp. 129, 130.

¹² Isa. 11:1 ff.; 42:1; 61:1.

¹³ John 1:29–34; Matt. 3:13–17; Mark 1:1–12; Luke 3:15–17; 4:16–21.

¹⁴ Henry S. Bettenson, ‘The Old Roman Creed’ Documents of the Christian Church (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 33.

¹⁵ Edward Bickersteth, The Trinity (Grand Rapids: Kregel Publ., 3rd Printing, 1965), pp. 150.

¹⁶ J. L. Neve, A History of Christian Thought, vol. i (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg Press, 1946), p. 106ff.

¹⁷ ibid., p. 107.

¹⁸ Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, from The Apostle Fathers by J. B. Lightfoot, 1898, p. 85.

¹⁹ Justo L. Gonzalez, A History of Christian Thought I (Nashville: Abington Press, 1970), p. 64.

²⁰ Died ad 155 in very old age.

²¹ From The Martyrdom of Polycarp, as cited by Thomas Oden, The Living God, Systematic Theology I (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 210.

²² Athenagoras, A Plea for the Christians, ANF vol. ii, pp. 133, 134.

²³ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Emergence of the Christian Tradition vol. i (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971), pp. 211–225.

²⁴ I put ‘persons’ in quote marks because that particular designation did not arise for several generations thereafter.

²⁵ See also John 15:26 and compare Luke 1:35.

²⁶ See also 1 Cor. 12:4–6; Jude 20, 21; Eph. 5:18–20; 2 Thess. 2:13, 14.

²⁷ Henry Bettenson, op. cit., note #3, pp. 36, 37.

²⁸ George Christian Knapp, McClintock & Strong Cyclopedia vol. x (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1970), p. 555.

²⁹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 344–352.

³⁰ As cited by Strong, ibid., pp. 344–352,

³¹ Jaroslav Pelikan, Christianity & Classical Culture (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1993), p. 175.

³² Cited by A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 352, as the closing of his lengthy section on the Trinity.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (104). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

14

The Triunity of the Godhead: Questions, Traditional Expressions, Illustrations, Values, Refinements, Cautions

Questions

How shall we interpret certain puzzling statements in the Bible about the Persons of the triune God?

1. Why, if the Second Person is equal and co-eternal with the Father, is He very frequently called the ‘Son of God’?

To many Christian people, especially new believers and the young, this seems to indicate that the Son had a beginning in time. It seems to them to say the Son is derived somehow from the Father. On the contrary, in Hebrew usage, ‘son of’, is used metaphorically, as often as not, to indicate something about the position, condition or nature of an object of discussion rather than its origin.

Hebrew and Arabic are related Semitic languages and express similar outlooks. In Arabic abu (father) and bin (son) and um (mother) are almost identical with Hebrew for father, son and mother. In modern Arabic these words are used daily for relationships which may have nothing to do with derivation, physical or otherwise, but describe a whole range of relationships. The Hebraic use of the Bible is similar.

Thus a literal rendering of the Hebrew of Genesis 7:6 says, 'Noah was a son of six hundred years', i.e. 600 years old. Similarly, James and John were 'Sons of Thunder', i.e. forceful in speech (though perhaps Jesus meant this facetiously), and so on. The people of Jesus' time understood Son of God to mean a divine person, not the offspring of God. So when Jesus accepted the accolade the Jew took up stones to stone Him for blasphemy (John 5:18), since they understood His claim but rejected it. 'Son of God' in such a context means simply, divine person, a person who is God. Of course, when Luke, in a different context of discourse, says 'Adam, the son of God' (Luke 3:38) or the book of Job that Satan came among the 'sons of God' (Job 1:6), something quite different is indicated.

2. What does monogenēs ('only begotten' in older Versions) mean when used of Christ's relation to the Father (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18 kjv; 1 John 4:9 kjv)?

'Only begotten' is a favourite expression of John, and only John with reference to Jesus. In English, 'begotten' appears to be related to the word 'beget', the function of a male parent in the conception of a child. The Greek word 'begotten' also is similar in form to the word 'beget'. A majority of recent scholars regard it as firmly established, however, that the Greek word mono-gen-es ('only begotten') is not directly related to the word gennao, 'to beget', but to gen-ēs, family, kind or class. Monogenēs, the word translated in older Versions 'only begotten', means only-one-of-its-kind. So at John 3:16 and the other texts cited above, 'only', or 'unique', is the true sense, nasb margin renders, 'unique, only one of His kind'; niv has 'one and only'; and esv, rsv and neb 'only Son'. This is how I was taught to believe by professors strongly under the influence of B. F. Wescott.¹

The teaching that the Son is eternally being begotten, that is, in some sense drawing his divine being from the Father's divine being, is therefore not necessarily correct, say advocates of the modern view, though many notable orthodox writers have affirmed it.

There has been a steady and, it seems, growing group of scholars who contend the old understanding of monogenēs as only begotten in the straightforward sense of the word is correct.² Buechsel shows the classical sense meant of sole descent, i.e. without brothers or sisters, and this is apparently how early Greek-speaking Christians interpreted the word, hence 'only begotten Son'. Buechsel affirms 'the word can also be used more generally without reference to derivation in the sense of "unique", "unparalleled", "incomparable"'.³ In the New Testament, he says, 'it means "only begotten"' (no brothers or sisters) even in Hebrew 11:17, Luke 7:12 and Luke 8:42. Buechsel's evidences and arguments are quite convincing. David J. MacLeod⁴ devotes twelve pages to comparing the views, leading one to think that the ancient Fathers, who surely understood their own language as well as nineteenth- and twentieth-century scholars with their grammar books and concordances, were probably correct—that Jesus is eternally the monogenēs (only begotten) Son of the Father, and that a distinction between filiation (see below) and paternity in the Godhead is justified.

3. In what sense is Christ the 'Firstborn' or 'first begotten' in Romans 8:29 and Hebrews 1:6?⁵

Again, Jewish custom and word-usage supply adequate answer. The first male child of a married couple was normally the heir. He had pre-eminent position and rights of primo-geniture in the family. So Christ is, of all God's creation, the one having pre-eminence. The term has nothing to say about the time of His origin. Note that 'This day have I begotten thee' (Acts 13:32, 33; cf. Ps. 2:7 kjv) is usually understood as referring to the resurrection of Christ, and as demonstrating, or publicly declaring, His Sonship to the Father. Another interpretation of Acts 13:32, 33 applies 'raised up' (kjv) to bringing the Messiah 'up', i.e. birth, life and the like.

Some Traditional Expressions

Several expressions have been traditionally employed to designate certain inner relations between the Father and the Son, and the Father and Son with the Spirit. These expressions are the eternal generation of the Son by the Father and the eternal spiration (or procession) of the Spirit from the Father and the Son. They began to be employed about the time of the Council of Nicea (ad 325). They expressed in scriptural language the idea that the Son and the Spirit were eternally with the Godhead. John 1:14 (kjv) refers to our Lord as the 'only begotten' of the Father. John 14:16, 26 and 15:26 speak of the Spirit as proceeding from the Father and the Son; likewise He is called the Spirit of the Father (Matt. 10:20) as well.

According to the noted theologian of the Lutheran Church (Missouri Synod), Francis Pieper, these internal actions:

are not common to all three Persons ... but are ascribed only to one or two Persons. The generation of the Son is ascribed only to the Father, the spiration of the Holy Ghost only to the Father and the Son, and thereby the Father is revealed as a person distinct from the Son and the Holy Spirit as distinct from the Father and the Son.... This terminology is not meaningless jargon, but necessary theological apparatus. Of course, Christians might wish that the Church would never have been troubled by Unitarians and therefore would have had no occasion to formulate this terminology [He mentions several very technical Latin terms]. Christians say with St. Paul: 'I would they were even cut off which trouble you' (Gal. 5:12). But ... this terminology became necessary on account of the errors and the treachery of the heretics.⁶

Erroneous Views and Denials of the Trinity

Since the second century, the usual way of introducing error into the church, in regard to the Trinity, has been openly to confess the Father, Son and Holy Spirit but to explain the confession in such a way as virtually to deny the orthodox doctrine. This most frequently has been done by affirming that the Three are manifestations in time of one Person who alone is God. God as united to and working through Jesus of Nazareth is Son; God as united to and working in the church is Spirit; in creating the heavens and earth He is Father. This was the 'modalism' or 'economic trinity' of Sabellius (fl. ad 250). Somewhat earlier a simpler modalism was called monarchianism (i.e. only one ruler or God) because it held that the one God-Father suffered in Christ in human form. This was also known as patripassionism.

Modalism, as discussed earlier, is still with us today. The notion that when God is creating He is called Father, when redeeming, Son, when comforting, Spirit, sounds so obviously correct that active-minded, intelligent people may even think of it without prompting—if they do not read all Scripture says about God, and forget what they learned in catechism or pastor’s instruction class. This doctrine is patently unscriptural, rendering Jesus’ many prayers to the Father ridiculous soliloquies and such scenes as the baptism of Jesus, with the descent of the dove and voice from heaven, impossible.

The more forthright error is that of Arius of Alexandria, condemned at the Council of Nicea ad 325. He held that both the Son and the Spirit were themselves created by the Father, who only is an eternal being. Revived in Reformation times, the Socinians of that period, like Arius, held that Christ should be worshiped. Servitus, an anti-Trinitarian of the epoch, was unfortunate enough to be burned at the stake for his views, even though he died with words of worship for Jesus on his lips. Unitarians of recent times have honoured Jesus but neither worship Him nor pray to or through Him. The so-called ‘Jehovah’s Witnesses’ of our time aggressively distribute less-learned forms of Arianism to the doorsteps of millions around the world.

The intransigence of orthodox people on this teaching may seem strange in our extremely accommodating and compromising, undogmatic times. It may seem excessive, and the language of the creeds and confessions may seem unnecessarily harsh in condemnation. If so, the words of Galatians 5:12, quoted above, may be recalled in defence of the intransigence and the severity, likewise the following. ‘No one who denies the Son has the Father’ (1 John 2:23). ‘[E]very spirit that does not confess Jesus is not from God. This is the spirit of the antichrist’ (1 John 4:3). ‘If anyone has no love for the Lord, let him be accursed’ (1 Cor. 16:22). Twice Paul pronounces the anathema on any who preach either a perverted or a contrary message as ‘gospel’ (Gal. 1:8, 9). These scriptural pronouncements are at least as severe as the creed of Nicea, which closes: ‘And those that say “There was when he was not,” and, “Before he was begotten he was not,” and that, “He came into being from what-is-not,” or those that allege, that the Son is “of another substance or essence” or “created”, or “changeable” or “alterable”, these the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes.’⁷

We have a Christian duty to shun professed Christians who reject the human incarnation of true God in our Lord Jesus Christ. Second John 1:7–11 teaches this. Verses 10 and 11 are particularly demanding of us: ‘If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not receive him into your house or give him any greeting, for whoever greets him takes part in his wicked works.’

Illustrations and Analogies of the Trinity

Illustrations of the Trinity, however helpful, are inevitably dangerous, for if carried beyond some very narrow area of the subject, they introduce denials of what must necessarily always remain a mystery. God cannot, of course, be one and three in the same sense. This is not the hard part. How can each person possess the whole being-essence-substance without dividing it or confusing themselves with one another? A friend of mine, and fellow Wheaton College professor, examined St Augustine’s illustrations in de Trinitate (on the Trinity) and thought he found thirteen of them, all psychological and resting on the fact of mankind’s bearing the image of God, which Augustine limited mainly to man’s rational nature. His best one is the power of the soul to dialogue with itself.⁸ ‘I’ ponder ‘me’ when I inwardly reflect on any question, then objectively in a kind of third capacity—the neutral spectator—I render a decision. This is a ‘safe’ illustration but the yield of understanding is small.

Augustine was forty-six years old when he began to write De Trinitate, fifteen books⁹, and he worked on it sporadically for sixteen years—some of his best mature years. Before his time many had addressed the subject and he read everything he could lay his hands on in Latin. Early in the treatise he offered a clear summary of the Catholic (everywhere, always, by all) doctrine of the Trinity. It is compact and so well expressed that it deserves quoting in full. This translation is not that in NPNF but by Vernon J. Bourke, a Roman Catholic scholar.

All those Catholic interpreters of the Holy Scriptures, Old and New, whom I have been able to read, and who have written before me about the Trinity, Who is God, have agreed in the following teaching which is in accord with the Scriptures. The Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, of one and the same substance, in an inseparable equality, constitute (insinuent) a divine unity. Therefore they are not three Gods, but one God; although the Father has generated the Son, and so He, Who is the Father, is not the Son. And the Son is generated by the Father, and so He, Who is the Son, is not the Father. And the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the Spirit of the Father and the Son, yet Himself co-equal with the Father and Son and belonging to the unity of the Trinity. Not that this same Trinity was born of the Virgin Mary, and was crucified and buried, under Pontius Pilate, rose again on the third day, and ascended into Heaven—but only the Son. Nor did this same Trinity descend in the form of a dove, upon Jesus when He was baptized (Matt. 3:16); or, on Pentecost, after the ascension of the Lord, when there came a sound from Heaven, as of a violent wind coming, and they were each of them settled upon with parted tongues as of fire—this was solely the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:2–4). Nor did this same Trinity say from the Heavens, ‘Thou art my Son,’ either when He was baptized by John, or when the three disciples were with Him on the Mount (Matt. 17:5), or, when the voice sounded, saying, ‘I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it again’ (John 12:28); but that was only the voice of the Father, spoken to the Son; although the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, just as They exist inseparably, work inseparably. This is my faith, too, because this is the Catholic faith.¹⁰

This statement does not reflect cogitation of a philosopher but of a philosophically minded theologian,¹¹ one who proceeded to write seven ‘books’ on the scriptural basis for the Trinity doctrine before eight ‘books’ of speculative reflection. He spoke from the ground of Scripture to correct merely speculative, reason-based theology. In his opening sentence, Augustine says:

The following dissertation concerning the Trinity, as the reader ought to be informed, has been written in order to guard against the sophistries of those who disdain to begin with faith, and are deceived by a crude and perverse love of reason.¹²

A favourite illustration (or analogy) of the Trinity since the Middle Ages is water (one substance), present somewhere on earth in purity but in three forms at all times; that is to say, it exists in three modes, liquid, solid (ice) and gas (vapour). This illustration, which seems to clarify everything, quickly leads to denial of any Trinity at all in favour of Sabellian modalism.

The favourite source for analysis as to the Trinity has been the nature of mankind. As frequently noted before in this chapter, Calvin began his Institutes with analogies between mankind and God, though mainly with reference to the single being of God not His threefoldness (Dreifaltigkeit, as the German ponderously expresses it). However, from Augustine onward to Edwards (who wrote an essay from the same outlook), man himself, in his non-physical side usually, but sometimes including his body, has seemed to some the probable key to understanding the mystery. Even the gifted English playwright and author of detective stories, Dorothy L. Sayers, tried her hand at this approach (The Mind of the Maker). Perhaps there is something to taunt the curious here in the rebellious youth both of Sayers and Augustine. At any rate Sayers's effort prompted one of her youthful neighbours, after he became an Anglican prelate, to carry her argument into scholarly parlance with a bit of verve.¹³

Nature pretty well fails to provide an illustration of the Trinity that does not also lead to error if followed seriously. Two diagrams have been widely accepted. The equilateral triangle, each side equal (Father, Son, Holy Spirit), each 'containing' the triangle (God), is as good as any common figure. But do the sides each contain the whole? The 'Shield of the Trinity' is the best diagram so far proposed. The ancient form of it, in which the writing, all in Latin, is here translated. It merits study.

The Shield of the Trinity.

There are many other illustrations. The inadequacies and dangers in them all underscore the essential, necessary, ineluctable mystery of the Trinity. It is a revelation. Like all revelations of God, Himself and His miraculous works—His eternity, omniscience, omnipotence, the creation of the world, future resurrection and judgment of all humanity—we know they are true, because God has told us about them. We carry rational understanding as far as our powers of thought and limitations of information take us, but ultimately we must stop in the presence of inscrutable mystery.

Values of the Doctrine

1. The triunity of God suggests an answer to the ancient question, ‘What was God doing before He created the world?’ He was not preparing hell, as one facetious wag in Augustine’s time suggested, for the over-curious, but engaged in loving, interpersonal intercourse within the Godhead. This may carry anthropopathism too far. It is a suggestion, not dogma.
2. ‘It would be impossible’, writes Buswell, ‘for our minds to grasp all of these facts centering in the atoning work of Christ, except in terms of the Triune Godhead. “For God [the Father] so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son ... that whosoever believeth in him [through the conviction and enabling of the Holy Spirit] should not perish” ’, etc. (John 3:16).

3. In an age of social emphasis in all realms of learning and action, a triad of persons rather than a monad gives greater appeal to the Christian faith.

The value really cannot be overestimated. Christianity is in every way a Trinitarian faith.

Definitions

The Nicene Creed

Many readers of this book do not attend churches where formal, explicit creeds are employed in instruction and worship. The Nicene Creed, as enlarged at Constantinople (381) and approved at Chalcedon (451) and as it is usually employed in Protestant churches, is therefore supplied as follows:

I believe in one God the Father Almighty; Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made; who, for us men and for our salvation, came down from heaven and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man; and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate; he suffered and was buried; and the third day he rose again, according to the Scriptures; and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father; and he shall come again, with glory, to judge both the quick and the dead; whose kingdom shall have no end.

And I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life; who proceedeth from the Father and the Son; who with the Father and the Son together is worshiped and glorified, who spoke by the prophets. And I believe in one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church. I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins; and I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen.

The Definition of Chalcedon

The Definition of Chalcedon, in recent translation, as it appears in Documents of the Christian Church, Henry Bettenson now follows:

Therefore, following the holy Fathers [of ad 381 and 325], we all with one accord teach men to acknowledge one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, at once complete in Godhead and complete in manhood, truly God and truly man, consisting also of a reasonable soul and body; of one substance [homoousios] with the Father as regards his Godhead, and at the same time of one substance with us as regards his manhood; like us in all respects, apart from sin; as regards his Godhead, begotten of the Father before the ages, yet as regards his manhood begotten, for us men and for our salvation, of Mary the Virgin, the God-bearer [theotokos]; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, recognized in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation; the distinction of natures being in no way annulled by the union, but rather the characteristics of each nature being preserved and coming together to form one person and subsistence [hypostasis], not as parted or separated into two persons, but one and the same Son and Only-begotten God the Word, Lord Jesus Christ; even as the prophets from earliest times spoke of him, and our Lord Jesus Christ himself taught us, and the creed of the Fathers has handed down to us.¹⁴

An important and influential book by R. J. Rushdoony,¹⁵ shows how this definition of the Trinity is the philosophical-theological-practical foundation of Western civilization.

Inner Ontic Relations of the Triune God

We understand that God is eternal, existing always before He created the universe, now and ever into the future. Time exists in Him, not the other way around. Furthermore, God is ‘blessed forever’, ‘blessed and only Potentate’ with or without a creation, being under no necessity to do anything external to Himself—ever the only living and loving, active and knowing God, subsisting in three modes known in Scripture as Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Thoughtful Christians must ask, ‘What was God doing eternally? What is the inner relation of Father, Son and Holy Spirit?’

I fear that popular thinking about this question runs somewhat to the notion of a happy family, father, mother and offspring, as an answer. In post-Reformation times Jacob Boehme, Count Zinzendorf and Emmanuel Swedenborg put it just that way. The error is not quite innocent, but a harmful distortion, leading easily to merely sentimental, maudlin expressions of devotion and worship. The church seems always supplied with simple-minded, over-helpful, self-appointed teachers who furnish easily understood, cozy formulas to replace necessarily severe, distinct definitions. Some of these people organize themselves into translation committees that produce paraphrases masquerading as faithful translations. Thus, the doctrine of election has been expunged from one so-called Version.

After all, not quite everything in theology and the Bible can be made perfectly simple; the Trinity of God is a great biblical mystery, utterly incommensurable with the created social setting whereby God chose for the human race to live together in small family units, to be fruitful, multiply and nourish itself. Late patristic theology employed the Latin word circumcessio, Greek, perichorēsis, meaning mutual interpenetration, for mutual relations of the Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. The main idea in this construction is that each ‘person’, while retaining its own special identity, is mutually ‘penetrated’ (for want of a better term) by the other two. Several Roman Catholic theologians argue from these notions that the Trinity is a model for good family life and other social and political relationships. I have already expressed disapproval of all such efforts as pressing analogies and likenesses too far. In truth, all the terms perechorēsis and circumcessio provide is names for our ignorance (hardly biblical mystery) in an exalted area of reality too high for us likely ever to learn anything about.

Heroes of Trinitarian Theology

The churches of the East (Greek-speaking) and of the West (Latin-speaking) after Nicea (ad 325), and for several, generations, refined a set of terms and understanding of them that defined orthodox belief regarding the internal, eternal relations of the triune God. This, as we have noted in earlier pages, passed on through medieval times, was accepted by the Reformers, both Lutheran and Reformed, as well as by Roman Catholic scholars of the time. That same orthodoxy was passed on to the Protestant denominations of America and is standard for all today. The Trinity is still (with the incarnation) the central mystery of Christianity. Though we do not end statements of doctrines with, ‘Let him be anathema’, any longer, it is true that no one has a right to claim the name Christian who varies in any serious way from these definitions. This is true because they are firstly, biblical; secondly, they spell out in necessary rational ways how the Bible ought to be understood; and thirdly, they represent what the church through the ages has believed, taught, confessed and expressed in hymn and liturgy. The theology of orthodoxy is the doctrine of the churches’ hymnbooks, lectionaries, printed liturgies, sermons and manuals for instruction.

We ought to honour the saintly, thoughtful and courageous men of God who pounded out those expositions which led to the Athanasian (so-called) and Chalcedonian reformulations of Nicea. Precedence of honour should go to Athanasius (died ad 373), whose chequered career at Alexandria was a life of sharp conflict with errors. ‘Athanasius against the world’ is a proverbial expression. Athanasius was a fervent and consistent advocate of the Nicene theology during the critical first forty years when there was great opposition—even among some dissembling clergy who had voted for it in ad 325. We have already devoted some attention to Augustine of Hippo, whose long life ended in ad 430, shortly before the Council of Chalcedon. He benefited from predecessors whose work he consciously summarized and perfected for the Western church all that preceded in his great work, De Trinitate (concerning the Trinity), composed in the years 400–418/19.

Special honour goes to three contemporary clergymen of Cappadocia. They are Gregory of Nazianzus (died ad 389), Basil the Great, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia (died ad 389), and Basil’s brother Gregory, bishop of Nyssa (died 395). Recent studies point out how the latter two were influenced and instructed by their oldest sister, Macrina.

To the three Cappadocians should be added as ‘the Fourth Cappadocian’, Macrina (the younger) ... named for their grandmother.... Not only was she, according to Gregory’s accounts, a Christian model for both of them by her profound and ascetic spirituality, but at the death of their parents she became the educator of the entire family, and that in both Christianity and Classical culture. Through her philosophy and theology, Macrina was even the teacher of both of her brothers, who were bishops and theologians, ‘sister and teacher at the same time’ [he adelphe kai didaskalos], as Gregory calls her.... Adolph von Harnack once characterized The Life of Macrina by Gregory of Nyssa as ‘perhaps the dearest and purest expression of the spirituality of the Greek Church’.¹⁶

The three Cappadocians are remembered particularly for defining the relation of the Holy Spirit to the Godhead. They are commonly regarded as being among the chief artisans of terms and architects of the final form of the doctrine of the Trinity, especially as regards the relations of the three ‘subsistences’ to one another within the one ‘essence’ of God as well as external relations. It is customary to call the former the immanent or ontological relations of the Trinity and the latter external, emanent or economic relations.

Jaroslav Pelikan pays special honour to Bernard of Clairvaux in defining the mysteries of the incarnation and the Holy Trinity.¹⁷ For Bernard, says Pelikan, ‘The Trinitarian confession was fundamental not only to Christian faith, but also to Christian life, for each person of the Trinity has a special relation to the disciple of Christ’.¹⁸ Further, for Bernard, ‘The doctrine of the Trinity was not a speculative construct, or an exercise in dialectical subtlety, but a soteriological necessity’.¹⁹

Final Words of Caution About the Vocabulary of Trinitarian Theology

The distinctive ‘personal’ features of each of the three are best not called attributes, but properties. The three ‘persons’ are said to be ‘three modes of subsistence’ or ‘of existence’ of the Godhead. The word mode here has no reference to the false notion that Father, Son and Holy Spirit are three modes by which a ‘unitarian’ God makes Himself known or acts in creation and redemption. Mode in the sense approved here has continuous precedents going clear back to the immediate post-Nicene period.

Latin terms employed for the sense in which God is one, anglicized or translated, are essence, substance, nature and our word being. In the East, the Greeks preferred the word ousia that means being and physis, which is translated nature. Each of these words is necessary in precise discussion of the doctrine of God to the present day. Otherwise, we have no clear language to answer the current heresies such as denial of the Trinity in ‘Jehovah’s Witnesses’ and perversion of it in Mormonism—to say nothing of liberalism.

Terms for the sense in which the Godhead is three were, in the West, mainly persona or person and subsistence. Though the word came to mean role or part played in a drama, persona is literally the Latin word for a mask representing an individual played by an actor. Later subsistence was used in the same sense as person or even ‘mode of subsistence’ by orthodox authors.

On ‘Person’ in Trinitarian Definition

It is to stand history of language on its head, however, to begin our understanding of the three divine ‘persons’ with contemporary understanding of what a person or personality is. In veritable fact the word entered the English language from the ancient Christian use of the Latin word persona, meaning the mask which actors (always male) in Roman dramatic plays put over their faces to represent the individual man or woman or other being portrayed by the actor. persona in Latin translates Greek prosopon (face), the idea being that the face or similitude of a priest, a farmer, a beautiful maiden, or a dog or donkey indicated the part being played by the actor who played it.

The idea that certain ‘attributes of personality’ (emotion, intellect, will or whatever) or ‘centre of consciousness’ as we think of today as constituting a person or personality did not belong to the word originally at all.

So the creedal formula ‘one nature, or substance; three persons or hypostases’ does not, in first instance, mean three centres of individual consciousness such as father, mother and child in a family of three.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary person was ‘in earliest use, the human being acting in some capacity, personal agent or actor, person concerned’ (Compact Ed., p. 2140). The first occurrence cited by the Oxford English Dictionary dates to ad 1225 in which it indicated ‘an individual human being, a man, woman or child’, as distinguished from a thing or animal: that is, a man or woman of distinction. Apparently the latter is about the sense of James (with respect of persons, en prosopolempsiais, James 2:21 kjv) and Peter (1 Peter 1:17) ‘without respect of persons’. The Greek elements mean, ‘to receive the face (prosopon) of someone’, and so in the Old Testament, where often the word ‘person’ translates the Hebrew word for face (Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17; Ps. 82:2).

The Oxford English Dictionary also, very briefly, defines person ‘in general philosophical sense; a self-conscious or rational being’ and the only quotations are from Christian theological discourse, specifically creeds and dogma.

So, let us heartily sympathize with Augustine in his dilemma. One of the finest American authors of the history of doctrine said:

Respecting the Trinity, Augustine insists on the divine unity. His mode of presenting this doctrine is in contrast with that of Gregory of Nyssa and the later Nicaeans, and is akin to that adopted by Athanasius. The distinction of persons is limited to their relation to one another. There is but one substance or essence, and when we speak of ‘three persons’, it is only because we lack words to express the distinction between the Father and the Son, and between the Holy Ghost and the Father and the Son. ‘Certainly there are Three’ ... Yet when it is asked, what Three, human language labors from great poverty of speech. We say ‘three persons’, not that it may be so said, but that we may not keep silence.²⁰

‘Person’ had none of the psychological overtones it now has—a cause of considerable misunderstanding among uninstructed Christians who want to think of the Godhead as three members of a cozy family. In the Greek East the word was hypostasis. Unhappily that word would normally be rendered substance (what stands under), the Latin word for the one nature of the one God. It is no wonder it took half a century to clear up communication between East and West after Nicea.

The distinctive personal property (not attribute) of the Father is said to be, of course, paternity. This has reference negatively to the fact that He has ‘unbegottenness,’ (Gr. agenēsia, not to be confused with agenēsia, which means without beginning, possessed by each member of the Trinity). Therefore, there was confusion over that too. It was held that His relation to the Son is eternally that of Father. The Son has been eternally begotten by the Father—no reference to the incarnation. Moreover, begotten does not mean ‘created’, for the Son has the same eternal nature as the Father.

The distinctive property of the Son is said to be filiation, from Latin filius, son, hence being a Son. This indicates a precedence of the Father to the Son in their eternal relation.²¹ The Father-Son relation (1) is an act of divine spirit; (2) implies the Father and the Son are of the same essence; and (3) is an eternal generation.

Since the Holy Spirit is said in Scripture to proceed from the Father (John 15:26) and the Son (John 14:26), His distinct property is eternal procession. Sometimes the word spiration is used. Procession from the Father and the Son is His distinctive property, though there is not unbroken assent to the Spirit’s procession from ‘the Son’.

These terms will not appeal to everyone. We do not live in a very reflective age. Even the ancient Christian scholars who first employed them in theology had difficulty at first in explaining them fully to one another and in keeping them straight. The special vocabulary was nevertheless necessary to keep the church from returning to polytheism, pantheism, dualism and Judaism in its doctrines, even while using scriptural words and phrases in sermons, hymns and prayers. They are no less necessary in our age of impatience.

¹ The Gospel According to St. John and The Epistles of St. John.

² TWNT, iv, 738.

- ³ ibid.
- ⁴ Art., ‘The Trinity and Scripture’ in The Emmaus Journal, 11, 2, Winter 2002, pp. 127–129.
- ⁵ Luke 2:7; Col. 1:5 and Rev. 1:5 present no problem.
- ⁶ Francis Pieper, Church Dogmatics, i (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 416, 417.
- ⁷ Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 36.
- ⁸ James Orr, The Christian View of God and the World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1947), pp. 217, 272.
- ⁹ 424 columns in NPNF 3.
- ¹⁰ Vernon J. Bourke, Augustine’s Quest of Wisdom (Milwaukee: Bruce Publ., 1947), p. 204.
- ¹¹ ibid., p. 203.
- ¹² Augustine, On the Trinity i. 1.1, NPNF 3.17.
- Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes
- ¹³ John Thurmer, Chancellor of Exeter Cathedral, A Detection of the Trinity (Exeter: The Paternoster Press, 1984), 93 pages.
- ¹⁴ Bettenson, op. cit., p. 73.
- ¹⁵ R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order, (P and R Publ. Co., 1968.)
- ¹⁶ Jaroslav Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1993), p. 8.
- ¹⁷ The Growth of Medieval Theology 600–1300, vol. ii of The Christian Tradition, pp. 144–151.
- ¹⁸ ibid., p. 145.
- ¹⁹ ibid., p. 146.
- Oxford English Dictionary The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary
- ²⁰ George Park Fisher, History of Christian Doctrine, 2nd ed. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1896, 1927), p. 178. The quote from Augustine in De Trin V. i. 9.
- ²¹ ‘A Defence of the Doctrine of the Eternal Subordination of the Son’, by Stephen D. Dovach and Peter R. Schemm, Jr, Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, vol. 42, no. 3, pp. 461–476, traces the rather steady support of this variety of ‘subordinationism’ in the imminent Trinity—as opposed to the economic Trinity—from earliest times to the present. Feminist theologians dislike it because they think it supports the principle of subordination of authority of wives to husbands. Millard Erickson and J. O. Buswell are recent theologians who quite exceptionally reject any precedence of the Father to the Son.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (117). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

15

Predestination or the Decrees of God: God’s Eternal Plan for the Heavens and the Earth (I)

Introduction

Let us begin this most difficult section where W. G. T. Shedd, one of the most skilled and devout exponents of Augustinian theology, ended: with a caution against exposure to the doctrine of predestination, or the decrees of God.¹ As every theologian ought to know, after Jesus Himself Paul made the strongest statements on the subject of predestination in the New Testament. Hence, we understand Peter’s remarks:

Our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom given him, wrote to you think here of [Romans 9–11], as also in all his letters, speaking in them of these things, in which are some things hard to understand, which the untaught and unstable distort, as they do also the rest of the Scriptures, to their own destruction (2 Peter 3:15, 16 nasb).

Nothing among the ‘things hard to understand’ of Paul’s letters presents more difficulty to the ‘untaught and unstable’ than his remarks about God’s sovereign government of people, plans and things in Romans 9–11 and Ephesians 1–3. The same spiritually untutored folk of rural Palestine had similar difficulties with Jesus’ parables (Matt. 13:14, 15), as he explained: ‘To you it has been given to know the secrets of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it has not been given’ (Matt. 13:11).

Nothing in the scheme of Christian doctrine is so offensive to the secular spirit or so preposterous to the unbelieving mind as to propose that God has a plan for the whole universe down to such minute details as the hairs on one’s head or the death of a sparrow (Matt. 10:29, 30) and is unfailingly executing the same.

Yet the fact that God ‘worketh all things according to the counsel of his will’ is an important article of ‘the whole counsel of God’ and of great consolation and satisfaction ... to believers ... properly understood ... Hence we think that this doctrine should be neither suppressed from a preposterous modesty nor curiously pried into by rash presumption.’² It was Albrecht Bengel, no less, who cautioned, ‘Man must not attempt to look at God behind the scenes.’³

As this study develops it will become clear that God’s government of the world is controlled by a plan. God’s government of His creation is what theologians call providence and the plan that providence executes is called predestination, or the doctrine of the decrees of God.

These doctrines are the first and last elements of ‘the Christian View of God and the World’, to borrow the title of an important book.⁴ Simply put: (1) God planned the world, (2) God created the world, (3) God sustains the world and (4) God governs the world. These four propositions constitute the primary elements of the biblical world-view, or Weltanschauung of German academic idiom.

Theologians have long wished they could dispense with the words ‘decrees’ and ‘predestination’ in connection with the divine plan because of their offence to the post-enlightenment outlook that thinks the world runs (whether well or badly) quite without God. As for origin (or first cause) in an intelligent design, though obvious to many, is quite unacceptable to the academic elite of today; it is certainly very controversial. However, controversy seems forever to have been the seedbed of progress in Christian thought and no generation where Christian zeal flourishes has ever been without it.⁵ Controversy need not be vituperative. Among believing scholars it can be both genial and vigorous.

Further, as we shall see, nothing is more assuring for believers, in a dangerous world where earthly hope is sure to run out, than certainty God’s determinate will is being done. In the natural order ‘seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night’ will not be interrupted ‘While the earth remains’ (Gen. 8:22). ‘You [God] rule the raging of the sea’ (Ps. 89:9). God ‘shut in the sea ... and said, “ ‘Thus far shall you come, and no farther’ ” (Job 38:8–11). As for ‘the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune’—Hamlet spoke as a suicidal weakling, not with the calm assurance of Moses ‘the man of God’ (Josh. 14:6). ‘The eternal God is your dwelling place, and underneath are the everlasting arms’ (Deut. 33:27).

The biblical-theological basis of the Weltanschauung (world-view) we are introducing has been neglected, hence not fully understood by the mass of believers in our time. People in the grip of the Zeitgeist (spirit of the age, to employ another useful term of German academics) do not know about the doctrine and would reject it if they did. How can the moguls of the media, the wiseacres of the university chairs and the denizens of our courts, get this matter straight if we ourselves do not know of ‘the decrees of God’, meaning ‘that eternal plan by which God has rendered certain all the events of the universe, past, present and future’?⁶ Every person on this planet should know about God’s purpose and plan.

Refinements and Limitations

Still preliminary to development of God’s decrees, creation, preservation and providence, several refinements and limitations of relevance must enter the record.

1. ‘The sovereignty of God’ may be said to include both decrees and providence, for it is ‘the biblical teaching that God is king, supreme ruler, and lawgiver of the entire universe’.⁷ ‘The Lord has established his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom rules over all’ (Ps. 103:19). Some of God’s names considered earlier express that sovereign rule—God Almighty, Lord God Almighty, et al.

2. Several of God’s attributes of immensity, viz., omnipotence, omnipresence, and, especially, omniscience, imply that God planned the heavens and earth which He then created and now sustains and will guide to their predestined goal. As omniscient, God is fully aware of all that goes on, precisely because He is present everywhere in creation (omnipresence) and has potency (omnipotence) to direct it all to the consummation.

3. Though the decrees of God are matters internal to the Godhead, they have reference to things external to God, in no wise emerging or emanating from His essence (being). Internally, as we have already seen, theologians say the Father is distinct in the sense of paternity; the Son in the sense of filiation (being a son); the Spirit in the sense of spiration. These terms are names theology has used for mysteries no one really understands. The ideas of the Son as being begotten (eternally), and the Spirit as proceeding (eternally) from the Father and the Son, have the benefit of scriptural phraseology, but probably apply not to inner (immanent), Trinitarian relations but to economic (i.e. ad extra, outside the being of God) relations to the world of creation and redemption. The creedal phrase ‘very God of [ek, out of] very God’, was employed by the Fathers of Nicea and Constantinople (ad 325, 381) to mean an eternal begetting of the Son by the Father; it was to stem the challenge of Sabellianism—that the Trinity is only three modes of acting by the one divine person.⁸

4. After reading again many treatments of the subject in revising the manuscript for this chapter, it became apparent that theologians of Arminian persuasion speak approvingly of providence, God’s control and government of the world, but refer to His plan only obliquely. Thomas Oden, a Methodist scholar, plainly believes God planned the world He created, though he furnishes no category such as predestination or decrees. He is aware of the vast body of Old Testament Scripture that grounds ‘the Reformed Doctrine of Predestination’ (the title of L. Boettner’s book). Yet Oden writes extensively of Providence as executing such a plan. I furnish some quotations from his book, The Living God. Throughout this whole historical process is God’s own guiding directing activity. Each of billions of events has its own telos, or ‘purpose’, at any given moment. Seen in the light of the scriptural revelation of God’s providential activity [emphasis added], all of this is moving toward a plausible, trustable end: the fulfilment of God’s purpose in creation’.⁹

The great value of Oden’s work is the introduction he lavishly provides to theology of the past. He aims, however, at a ‘consensus’ theology, which perhaps explains why the best supporting writings for a detailed divine plan for the universe (decrees) never appear.

On those particular points on which otherwise highly respected patristic writers tend to diverge from the more central ancient ecumenical consensus (e.g. Origenist views that the power of God is limited or that the stars have souls, or Novatian’s view of the exclusion of the lapsed, or Gregory of Nyssa’s universalism, or some of Augustine’s views of election and reprobation), I will be less prone to quote them, but I will quote freely from their writings that have been widely received.¹⁰

As one reads Oden at length it is clear that he believes God has a detailed plan, much as Calvin explained it, but cannot bring himself to say so plainly, preferring rather for the reader to infer it from the doctrine of providence. In elaborating the truth that God as Creator ‘remains the one source and end of time’ he comes close to articulating a doctrine of ‘the decrees of God’ worthy of any Calvinist. Oden goes on:

One might say that something ‘occurred’ in the mind of God before creation—namely,

God chose to love the world and decreed that a world should be [emphasis added]. God had eternity in which many different creations would have been conceived.¹¹

Richard Watson, first systematic theological interpreter of Wesley's form of Arminian theology, published his massive Theological Institutes 'neither Calvinistic on the one hand, nor Pelagian on the other' (from the 'Advertisement to the London Edition' of 1823). A sympathetic assessment would describe Watson's position as semi-Augustinian rather than (as unfortunately some say) 'semi-Pelagian'. While specifically rejecting the doctrine of decrees and the reigning Calvinistic scheme of his day, Watson made a strong affirmation of 'total inability' but also held that God had graciously, through Christ's universally effective atonement, restored to every human being both the ability and the obligation to believe unto salvation.¹² Watson does not seem to distinguish between the doctrine of decrees and the doctrine of election, which is a soteriological doctrine not to be confused with God's decrees concerning the whole creation.

5. Discussion of predestination usually tends quickly to the topic of divine election, a subject related to the redeemed alone. For reasons that shall appear later, let us not mix soteriology (the topic of salvation) with the doctrine of God, theology proper. At present, our focus is on God, not mankind. Election deals with mankind as fallen, not as created (Sublapsarian not Supralapsarian). In the decrees, our thoughts are directed to God's created, sustained and governed universe wherein nothing is strange to God's eternal plan and purpose. A. H. Strong is almost alone among American theologians in seeing the pedagogical importance of the order of treatment.¹³

As predestination relates to salvation of individuals the problems discussed have ever been the same. In periods when the arguments are discussed controversially by genuine evangelicals they usually have led through the following steps.

All agree that in the fall of Adam human nature had lost its normal spiritual powers and could regain them only by grace. To Augustinians it seems incongruous therefore 'at one and the same time to assert that grace was necessary because of original sin and yet to reject the corollary doctrine of predestination'—i.e. that we have no power to choose Christ until imparted sufficient spiritual power to do so (1 Cor. 2:14).¹⁴ The evangelical opponents of Augustinian thought, while acknowledging inability, might propose a sufficient remnant of ability to co-operate or at least not resist, or sufficient power of reason and will remaining to turn to God. Others posit, as a matter of divine justice, a universal restoration of power to believe if one wills to do so. Arminius did that. Wesley and his followers derive from Arminius the doctrine of universal restoration of power to repent and believe, but say it is by God's grace (not as with Arminius a matter of justice) effected by Christ's atonement, He being 'the true light ... coming into the world ... which enlightens everyone'.¹⁵

6. No personality of Scripture narrative and authorship is more decisively articulate on the subject than Paul. I think we may assign two causes as to why. The first is the manner of his conversion. He had execrated the very name of Jesus while vigorously persecuting, even murdering, those who dared to believe on His name. However, God stopped him abruptly in his tracks, instantly changing the hardened heart of the grand inquisitor to the suppliant believer. This his friend Luke faithfully, and in detail, reported. The initiative to save Paul's soul and make an apostle of him did not originate in Saul of Tarsus. If ever there was a clear case of pre-destination, divine choosing, it was his, and Paul never tired of testifying to that fact and applying the principle of predestination onward from the personal to everything else under the highest heaven.

The second reason was vividly set forth by Francis Davidson, a Scottish professor in a lecture to the InterVarsity Fellowship:

The doctrine of predestination is Pauline only in the sense that it fell to the lot of the great apostle to the Gentiles to develop it to its height. It is a mistake to think that Paul originated the doctrine, or wandered into a bypath of revelation as he matured its truth. The Rabbi of Tarsus inherited the very spirit of the doctrine from the teaching of his race. The Old Testament Scriptures are infused with the breath of the sovereignty of almighty God, who is so exalted as first cause in his own universe, that second causes are of immaterial account. God is in intimate contact with all events, and nothing lies outside His holy and wise control. Every happening is the expression of the divine will. The voice of the Lord is heard on land and sea and in the sky, ‘the Lord sitteth king forever’ (Ps. 29). The prophet, like the psalmist, is equally God-conscious and even dares to postulate the emergence of evil to the all-embracing and absolute will of God. ‘Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it’? (Amos 3:6). It is so in the warp and woof of the Old Testament writings, all of which were in the heritage of the apostle Paul.¹⁶

When this study takes up election as an aspect of soteriology (the doctrine of salvation) we shall devote further attention to Paul’s theology of predestination.

7. Our procedure at this point might trace the notion of divine predestination through the two Testaments and conclude with summaries in the inductive manner of some ‘biblical theology’. In order, however, to be as brief as possible within bounds of adequacy of treatment, I shall bring the fruits of inductive biblical studies to a structural form of statement. The subject of predestination had already been widely discussed by Christian teachers before Augustine gave the subject extended statement—both as positive doctrine and in polemical writings against Pelagius and his disciples.

8. As handled by skilful advocates, providence is the companion of predestination. It is addressed first to believers as supreme comfort in and among the unavoidable difficulties of life and, secondly to others, simply as a wonderful fact of existence. John Flavel, a Puritan preacher who survived the Stuart ‘Restoration’ of 1660, published The Mystery of Providence in 1678 as a sort of manual of Christian discipline in holiness and comfort in tribulation. He lived on until ‘the Glorious Revolution’ of 1688 bestowed the crown on William and Mary, February 13, 1688 (in time to have a college in Virginia named for them). Preaching at the national celebration of this victory over the papal forces of Europe and Britain, John Flavel (one of the few surviving Puritan preachers) observed what he called, ‘a remarkable coincidence’.

He said that in 1588 England had experienced a signal deliverance from Roman Catholicism.

The mighty armada of Spain, sent to dethrone the Protestant Elizabeth and restore her people to the ‘old faith’, had been blasted by the winds and waves. A hundred years had passed, Flavel reminded his hearers, ‘Yet behold another Eighty-eight [1688] crowned and enriched with mercies, no less admirable and glorious than the former.’ Another attempt to subjugate England to the yoke of Rome had been thwarted by the Providence of God.¹⁷

It is important to note that decrees and providence must be present in any thinking about ultimate questions by orthodox theologians. As noted earlier, Thomas Oden, a Methodist theologian, makes no formal place for ‘decrees’ or ‘predestination’ in his construal of ‘the Works of God’.¹⁸ Yet he felt compelled several times almost subliminally to introduce the subject of decrees. I quote the first.

If theology is to speak of the God of history, there must be a stage on which history is played out. There is redemptive intent from the beginning in creation, so there is a subtle sense in which God’s redemptive purpose is prior to God’s creative purpose [emphasis added] (1 Cor. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:9; Titus 1:2; Rev. 13:8; John 1:1–20; Eph. 1:5–11; Barth, CD 2/2). But there is a less subtle sense in which creation is prior to redemption, for how could one have something to redeem if something does not exist.¹⁹

Though as a presumed Wesleyan he carefully avoids the traditional terms ‘predestination’ and ‘decrees’, he employs the terms intent and purpose, thus introducing the ideas of predestination and decrees and even the question of the order of the decrees—whether Supralapsarian or Infralapsarian. Further he makes reference to Barth’s volume (Church Dogmatics 2/2) wherein ‘Barth emphasizes the freedom, mystery and righteousness of God’s predestinating will’, etc.—showing that Dr Oden is fully aware of the subtlety.²⁰

The Biblical Doctrine of Predestination

In this and the next chapter, let us try to subsume the biblical teaching of divine decrees, or predestination, under a series of propositions.

The Bible Teaches that God Planned the World

The word ‘plan’ presents a better face to the reader because the singular number (decree, not decrees) excludes the implication of possible alternate courses for the world in God’s mind and it neither suggests nor implies arbitrariness or hesitancy on God’s part. God was and is in charge and knows exactly what course the cosmos He made should and will take. Let us observe several realities.

The Bible Employs Many Direct Statements about God’s Plan

The Bible furnishes many direct statements that in context as well as form of statement teach that God has a fixed plan for all creation. The notion that assumes ‘the serious intentions of God may in some cases be defeated, and that man, who is not only a creature but a sinful creature, can exercise veto power over the plans of Almighty God’ contrasts starkly with all these texts, which I shall now enter as they appeared in the first book I ever read on the subject of systematic theology.²¹

[H]e does according to his will among the host of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand or say to him, ‘What have you done?’ (Dan. 4:35).

Ah, Lord GOD! It is you who has made the heavens and the earth by your great power and by your outstretched arm! Nothing is too hard for you (Jer. 32:17).

All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me [Christ] (Matt. 28:18).

And he put all things under his feet and gave him as head over all things to the church (Eph. 1:22).

In him we have obtained an inheritance, having been predestined according to the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will (Eph. 1:11).

The Lord of hosts has sworn: saying, 'As I have planned, so shall it be ...' For the Lord of hosts has purposed, and who will annul it? His hand is stretched out, and who will turn it back? (Isa. 14:24, 27).

Remember the former things of old; for I am God, and there is no other; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things not yet done, saying, 'My counsel shall stand, and I will accomplish all my purpose' ... I have spoken, and I will bring it to pass; I have purposed, and I will do it (Isa. 46:9, 10, 11).

Is anything too hard for the Lord? (Gen. 18:14).

I know that you can do all things, and that no purpose of yours can be thwarted (Job 42:2).

God is in the heavens; he does all that he pleases (Ps. 115:3).

Whatever the Lord pleases, he does, in heaven and on earth, in the seas and all deeps (Ps. 135:6).

So shall my word be that goes out from my mouth; it shall not return to me empty, but shall accomplish that which I purpose, and shall succeed in the thing for which I sent it (Isa. 55:11).

But who are you, O man, to answer back to God? Will what is moulded say to its moulder, 'Why have you made me like this?' Has the potter no right over the clay, to make out of the same lump one vessel for honoured use and another for dishonourable use? (Rom. 9:20, 21).

Many further plain texts and narrative incidents will be added to these uncontestable biblical declarations that there is indeed an 'eternal plan by which God has rendered certain all the events of the universe, past, present, and future'.²²

The universe is the largest conceivable project. It seems preposterous to suppose a project including the galaxies in their motion and orbits, as well as the life processes of a microbe; including objects as complicated as the solar system and as mysterious as light and human consciousness; including processes as closely harmonized as the electrical hook-up between the human brain and hands playing a violin could simply have occurred without an intelligent design formed by an intelligent designer. The larger the enterprise the more important is the plan. If the Sears Tower of Chicago or the Metro system of Paris required detailed blueprints before construction could begin how much more the cosmos of which even man himself is a very complicated part? Darwinism of the sort that excludes intelligent design from its dogma has recently been challenged by some of its own evolutionary thinkers. How much less can a strong doctrine of divine planning, or predestination, be expunged from a sound theology of the Christian religion.

The Bible uses a Variety of Terms to teach Predestination

The Bible employs a vocabulary of semi-technical terms to teach the doctrine of predestination. We shall enter some of the Hebrew and Greek terms in due time but the terms employed in standard translation are clear enough. As, historically, the discussion has been framed in the idiom of the Authorized Version (kjv) we shall employ the same and quote here from that Version. Let us see some of these words in contexts that both illustrate the doctrine and give a sense of the meaning of these English words. Some are groups of related words.

1. Know in various verbal tenses and knowledge. ‘Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee’ (Jer. 1:5) ‘You only have I known of all the families of the earth’ (Amos 3:2). ‘[S]eeing I know not a man’ (Luke 1:34). ‘And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived’ (Gen. 4:1). ‘[B]eing delivered by the ... foreknowledge of God’ (Acts 2:23; 1 Peter 1:2). ‘[W]hom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate’ (Rom. 8:29 [emphasis added]).

These words in context show that God, in the case of two men (Jeremiah and Paul, cf. also David, Ps. 139) were ‘known’ by God in a special way before they were even conceived and had their lives planned out for them. In each case to know designates a relationship with God, with the individual person and, in the case of Amos 3:2, with a whole nation. These words usually apply to ‘God’s elect’ in some specific sense.

2. Choose, chosen. ‘The Lord did not ... choose you, because ye were more in number than any people’, etc. (Deut. 7:7). ‘I know whom I have chosen’ (John 13:18; cf. 15:16, 19).

These words are very frequently used in connection with sovereign divine choice of persons or nations for reasons God is not obligated to give; nor does He give reasons. ‘Jacob have I loved, Esau have I hated’ before either had been born (Rom. 11:10–13). In a theological sense, the Bible uses these words usually only of God’s relation to ‘the elect’.

3. Elect, elected, election. These words are never used in the Bible except in relation to Christ (Isa. 42:1), good angels (1 Tim. 5:21), God’s chosen people (Isa. 65:9, 22) and those whom divine grace has brought from death to life, from the power of sin into the liberty of full salvation. They appear twenty-seven times, sixteen of them in New Testament Epistles. The terms are never used of the unsaved as such.

4. Other expressions such as refer to God’s counsel, determinate counsel and will are used in Scripture to express not only God’s control of the universe He created but also that it exists as He planned it.

Already questions and problems arise in the reader’s mind. While these ought to be recognized in such a treatment as this. C. A. Hodge cautions:

It must be remembered that theology is not philosophy. It does not assume to discover truth, or to reconcile what it teaches as true with all other truths. Its province is simply to state what God has revealed in his Word, and to vindicate those statements as far as possible from misconceptions and objections.²³

Hence, when we write about the eternal counsels and purposes of the Almighty we must stand in awe and speak with reserve for ‘no one comprehends [knows kjv] the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God’ (1 Cor. 2:11) and that which the Spirit has made known in the Scriptures. That which Scripture says, we must state as clearly as we can, without reserve, and leave it to the reader to ponder and receive if he will.

The Place of Predictive Prophecy

There is still another way in which the Creator of the world has made known that he created it according to a plan and is directing it toward a certain consummation—by predictive prophecy. The reader should not form an opinion of biblical prediction based on some distortions advertized in sensational preaching and imaginative movies and books of fiction. Rather let the Lord God speak for Himself.

Beginning at Isaiah 40:25 and on through 42:9 the prophet presents ‘God’, ‘the Lord’, ‘the Spirit of the Lord’, ‘the Holy One’ (Isa. 40:13, 18, 25, 27) in verbal discourse with His contrite people and idolaters, they who challenge the existence of the invisible ‘Spirit in whom all things have their source, support and end’ (Strong). It is partly in the form of challenge to debate. After representing God as the incomparable Planner, Creator, Sustainer and Governor of the world (40:12–24), the Incomparable (40:18, 22) Himself enters a challenge: ‘To whom then will you compare me, that I should be like him?’ (40:25). Onward through the seven remaining verses of chapter 40 and 41:1–20, God, the Lord, displays His creative omnipotence, sovereignty and grace, finally issuing a challenge to any detractors from His creative power and sovereign control of history as it unfolds:

Set forth your case, says the Lord;
bring your proofs, says the King of Jacob.

Let them bring them, and tell us what is to happen.

Tell us the former things, what they are,

that we may consider them,

that we may know their outcome;

or declare to us the things to come.

Tell us what is to come hereafter, that we may know that you are gods;

do good, or do harm,

that we may be dismayed and terrified.

Behold, you are nothing, and your work is less than nothing;

an abomination is he who chooses you.²⁴

So much for the impotence of heathen gods to control ongoing history. God goes on to speak of the far-future rise of one known already to God and revealed to Isaiah in the eighth century bc and his God as ‘his anointed ... Cyrus’ (Isa. 45:1) who did not appear on the plane of history until the sixth century bc, as follows:

I stirred up one from the north, and he has come, from the rising of the sun, and he shall call upon my name;

he shall trample on rulers as on mortar, as the potter treads clay.

Who declared it from the beginning, that we might know, and beforehand, that we might say, ‘He is right’? (Isa. 41:25, 26. See on to v. 29.)

Soon God, the Lord, sums up his argument based on His planned knowledge of the future and control of it:

I am the Lord; that is my name;

my glory will I give to no other,

nor my praise to carved idols.

Behold, the former things have come to pass, and new things I now declare;

before they spring forth

I tell you of them. (Isa. 42:8, 9).

The strongest statement, in the book of Isaiah, by God Himself of His power to predict the future, to tell it to His prophets, and to guarantee the future by His own ‘counsel’ and ‘pleasure’, has just been quoted. However, Isaiah’s prophecy goes on to say the future will unfold as determined by God. Everything in God’s world proceeds according to plan—no emergencies, no surprises. Hear Isaiah again [all emphasis added]:

[R]emember the former things of old;

for I am God, and there is no other;

I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things not yet done, saying, ‘My counsel shall stand,
and I will accomplish all my purpose, calling a bird of prey from the east,
the man of my counsel [Cyrus] from a far country.
I have spoken, and I will bring it to pass;
I have purposed, and I will do it.²⁵

Perhaps the single greatest scriptural witness to divine predestination is in the widespread predictive prophecies of the Bible. Christ and the apostles certainly thought fulfilled prophecy to be the greatest scriptural witness to their own authenticity as divine spokesmen. The prophets told of coming events in Jewish history long before they came to pass. One, for example, was that the Jews would be made servants to the king of Babylon and after seventy years would be made free to return to their native land from the place where that king had transported them. Part of this is in Jeremiah’s prophecy: ‘behold, I will send for all the tribes of the north, declares the Lord, and for Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and I will bring them against this land.... This whole land shall become a ruin and a waste, and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years. Then after seventy years are completed, I will punish the king of Babylon ...’ (Jer. 25:9, 11, 12).

About seventy years later (Jeremiah spoke at the beginning of the seventy years) another prophet, in Babylon, read Jeremiah and waited expectantly to see what the older prophet had announced come to pass. And it did.²⁶

Now some might suppose God merely noted what ‘natural laws’ or some such thing would bring to pass and by this ‘foreknowledge’ told Isaiah, Jeremiah and Daniel about it. However, the Governor of the world is no such second guesser as that. Rather, after a lengthy oracle on the future of two ancient kingdoms, Babylon and Assyria, Isaiah writes:

The Lord of hosts has sworn:

‘As I have planned,

so shall it be,

and as I have purposed,

so shall it stand,

that I will break the Assyrian in my land ...'²⁷

This is the purpose that is purposed concerning the whole earth, and this is the hand that is stretched out over all the nations.

For the Lord of hosts has purposed, and who will annul it?

His hand is stretched out, and who will turn it back?²⁸

Consider also Isaiah 46:9, 10: 'I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things not yet done, saying, '“My counsel shall stand, and I will accomplish all my purpose”' .

People 'whose God is not in their thinking' usually do not realize they are carrying out God's plan. As they do their wicked deeds they think like W. E. Henley, in his well-known poem, Invictus: I am the master of my fate;/I am the captain of my soul!

The wicked Assyrian king, furious against the kingdom of Israel, had no awareness that he was a simple instrument of God's fury—'Ah, Assyria, the rod of my anger.... I send him ... against the people of my wrath.... But he does not so intend, and his heart does not so think; but it is in his heart to destroy ...' (Isa. 10:5–7).

These passages are only a fraction of the biblical evidence that there is an 'eternal plan by which God has rendered certain all the events of the universe, past, present, and future'.²⁹ Some of the specific aspects of this plan will be noticed in the next paragraphs, but still with regard to the general proposition that there is such an all-inclusive plan, attention is called to the following: 'Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world' (Acts 15:18 kjv, note the context of world evangelism); 'having been predestined according to the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will' (Eph. 1:11).

The previous chapter introduced the biblical teaching that God made a plan for the world before He created it. This feature of divine sovereignty includes everything that should come to pass. The first proposition was 'The Bible Teaches that God Planned the World.' We proceed with a second.

¹ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Zonderdan, 1969), pp. 459–461.

² Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology I, trans. G. M. Geger (Phillipsburg, NJ: PR Publ., reprint 1992), p. 329.

- ³ Cited by Shedd, op. cit., p. 461.
- ⁴ James Orr, The Christian View of God and the World.
- ⁵ See the article ‘Controversy’ in Baker’s Dictionary of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1960).
- ⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), p. 353.
- ⁷ ‘Sovereignty of God’ Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. Walter Elwell (Grand Rapids: Baker books, 1984), p. 1038.
- ⁸ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thos. Nelson, 1998), pp. 321–341.
- ⁹ Thomas Oden, The Living God (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 287.
- ¹⁰ ibid., p. xii.
- ¹¹ ibid., pp. 261, 262.
- ¹² Richard Watson, Theological Institutes vol. ii (New York: G. Lane & P. B. Sanford, 1843) pp. 381–448.
- ¹³ A. H. Strong, op. cit., pp. 355, 779–790.
- ¹⁴ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, i (Chicago: Univ. Of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 319 also pp. 297, 298, 302, 303, 215–218, 327–330.
- ¹⁵ This matter will be given fuller treatment in ‘Part 5: Soteriology: Salvation Applied’.
- ¹⁶ Francis Davidson, Pauline Predestination (London: The Tyndale Press, 1946, 1964), p. 3.
- ¹⁷ Michael Boland in ‘Publisher’s Introduction’ to John Flavel’s, The Mystery of Providence (London: Banner of Truth Trust, republished 1963), p. 7.
- ¹⁸ Oden, op. cit., pp. 223–315.
- Barth Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics, 13 volumes
- ¹⁹ Oden, op. cit., p. 229.
- ²⁰ Oden, op. cit., p. vii.
- ²¹ Lorraine Boettner, The Reformed Doctrine of Predestination (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1932 and continuously through many printings), pp. 33, 34; pp. 26–29 quotes and cites dozens of other specifically relevant passages.

²² A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 353.

²³ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology, Vol. I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 535.

²⁴ Isa. 41:21–24.

²⁵ Isa 46:9–11, emphasis added. Those who believe not only what the Bible says, but what the Bible claims to be—in this case Isaiah 40–66, a composition by a prophet who wrote near the hinge between the 700s and the 600s bc and prophesied of Cyrus, whose career as king of Medes and Persians was in the middle third of the 500s—will defend the genuineness of this part of Isaiah. Otherwise the claims of God to control the future and thereby to know it and predict it through His servants the prophets are false.

²⁶ See Dan. 9:1–3; Isa. 44:21–45; 2 Chron. 36:19–23; and Ezra, chapter 1.

²⁷ See Isaiah 36 and 37 for the fulfilment.

²⁸ Isa. 14:24–27.

²⁹ A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 353.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (122). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

16

Predestination or the Decrees of God: God’s Eternal Plan for the Heavens and the Earth (II)

The Bible Teaches that all of God’s Purposes and Decrees for the World are Parts of a Comprehensive Single Plan

Paul referred to the plan in this way, speaking of God’s ‘eternal purpose’ (Eph. 3:11) and ‘the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will’ (Eph. 1:11). Notice the singular number of purpose, counsel and will in these texts. The same is true of Romans 8:28, which begins with ‘all things’ but ends with ‘according to his purpose’.

Among the many attempts to explain ‘the one and the many’ in simple language, A. A. Hodge may have produced the best:

The cause of one event is the effect of another and every event in the universe is more immediately or remotely the condition of every other so that an eternal purpose on the part of God must be one all-comprehensive act.¹

Later he says:

All the speculative errors ... on this subject [either toward fatalism and determinism on the one hand or to tychism, i.e. chance, luck, absolute free-will of mankind on the other], spring from the tendency of the human mind to confine attention to one fragment of God, eternal purpose, and to regard it as isolated from the rest.²

He goes on to say that though we must separate the many works of God in thought, they are all connected just as all of nature is connected. Innumerable inseparable parts of a great painting are in the mind of a major painter before he applies brush and paint to a surface. In the artist's mind, the work is totally present at once even though all of it may come to conscious awareness and visibility only as he paints one tiny detail after another. Alternatively, consider a great sculptural piece like the Pieta at the Vatican, all contained at once in the great sculptor's mind as he attacks the great chunk of marble, hammer and chisel in his hands. He, however, focuses on one chip at a time as the work comes forth and finally dazzles its viewers by its perfection while redounding to the reputation of its creator.

The Christian thinker must be careful at this point lest he himself fall into a serious error, the error that denies to us the freedom (albeit not absolute) which the Bible and our own consciousness tell us we have. He must also be prepared to refute the learned deterministic errors proposed by modern philosophy without assimilating them.

G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831) is in a class by himself. His metaphysics has affected about everything written in philosophy since his times. He thought 'we must conceive of all facts as necessary. Given all the possibilities, the fact must emerge. What is, must be, because the conditions which enable it to exist could not produce any other fact' (emphasis added).³ The academic spectrum furnishes (or has until recently) many leaders in every field who assume some sort of cause-effect determinism derived from the interconnectedness of all things.

Bible Names for God's Plan

God's plan goes by several biblical names and designations. Each of the technical and semi-technical terms emphasizes some aspect of the doctrine and is therefore helpful in understanding it. The industrious reader will do well to read from the Bible itself the context of each of the passages about to be quoted here and to ponder the words emphasized. Each passage presents a different, but obvious, designation of God's plan for His creation: 'My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure' (Isa. 46:10 kjv); those he has 'called according to his purpose' (Rom. 8:28); He 'works all things according to the counsel of his will' (Eph. 1:11; cf. Dan. 4:35); God 'having determined allotted periods' (Acts 17:26); Christ was 'foreordained' (1 Peter 1:20 kjv); we 'having been predestined' (Eph. 1:11; cf. Rom. 8:30) (emphasis added)).

A Single, Comprehensive Plan

There are about three varieties of determinism advocated in the world. This is to say, those who think we have no freedom at all, propose one or all of three causes for this lack of freedom. One is a sort of impersonal, materialistic fate thought to be built into the very fabric of the universe. This is the moira, aisa or fatum (fate or the fates) of Greek and Roman antiquity. The gods were 'born' into a world already existing, a world sometimes thought of as directed by fate, rather naively considered. As the ancients became scientific, a second form of determinism—cause-effect in an eternal chain—arose and is still with us as ‘scientific or naturalistic determinism’, either environmental or hereditary or both. Astrology, which assumes the stars of the sky determine destiny (‘your lucky stars’) arose very early in human history. It was drawn upon to support the first form of determinism, that is, fate. Both have had revivals in modern times and together reign on most university campuses today. A third form is religious determinism, a major feature of Islam, a non-Trinitarian monotheism. Any strongly held monotheism that has no Savior-God, no wise, loving, holy Father, quickly becomes a hard fatalism, as in the whole Muslim world. The same views develop in forms of Christianity where awareness of God’s sovereignty is not matched with awareness of His love, mercy and holiness and does not give sufficient emphasis to that freedom under God that all human beings have as being, by creation, God’s image.

God’s Plan Is Eternal and Therefore Changeless

The Bible teaches this single, comprehensive plan of God is an eternal plan and therefore unchangeable. This declaration rests on many plain statements of simple, but profound, facts.

God’s Purposes Are Formed in Eternity

Paul grandly proclaims his duty to ‘bring to light for everyone what is the plan of the mystery hidden for ages in God who created all things’ and that ‘This was according to the eternal purpose’, etc. (Eph. 3:9–11 (emphasis added)). In context, God’s plan for the church is the centre of interest, but Paul—in declaring divine purpose in unmatched, exalted language—informs the church that it is part of an eternal purpose, along with ‘all things’ He has ‘created’. As Peter says, Christ the Lamb of God ‘was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times’, etc. (1 Peter 1:20 kjv).

The divine decree is formed in eternity, but executed in time. There are sequences in the execution, but not in the formation of God’s purpose ... There were thirty-three years between the actual incarnation and the crucifixion, but not between the decree that the Logos should be incarnate and the decree that he should be crucified ... ‘The Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world’ (Rev. 14:8).⁴

God Is Changeless

God is immutable; there are no sequences or changes in him. As the Psalmist declares, though all else change, ‘you are the same’ (Ps. 102:27), and the prophet, ‘I the Lord do not change’ (Mal. 3:6), and the Lord’s brother, about ‘the Father of lights with whom there is no variation or shadow due to change’ (James 1:17). He can neither decrease nor increase (as ‘process theology’ asserts), improve nor deteriorate, nor does He change plans in case of emergencies—because there are no unforeseen emergencies for Him who not only forecast the end from the beginning but decreed it so.

Recent advocates of a theory self-designated as ‘the openness of God’ argue that God cannot know contingent future events and think they find support in certain passages of Scripture, especially those which speak of God as repenting. Orthodox theology replies as follows.

1. Some passages (such as Abraham's wheedling God to make concessions in His plans to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah) illustrate only how God deals with us creatures, meeting us where we are, taking events where He plans for them to go by stages of experience and of discipline. Parents do the same with their children.

2. Some passages are 'anthropomorphic representations of the revelation of God's unchanging attributes in the changing circumstances and varying moral conditions of creatures'.⁵ We should interpret Genesis 6:6 in the light of Numbers 23:19 ('the Lord was sorry that he had made man', 'God is not man, that he should lie, or a son of man, that he should change his mind') and 1 Samuel 15:11 with verse 29 ('I regret that I have made Saul king', 'the Glory of Israel will not lie or have regret, for he is not a man, that he should have regret'). If we do so we can understand that from a human standpoint God seems to change His mind about people and things, but really He is represented to us that way. His treatment of us was and is always the same—a holy response to our good or evil actions and intent. Divine predictions Jonah made of Nineveh's destruction were conditional upon the city's response to the threats (of resistance or repentance). The mass and composition of a column of mercury in a thermometer remains exactly the same twenty-four hours of the day yet rises every time temperatures outside rise and falls every time temperatures fall.

The Decrees of the Unchanging God Determine Actions Set in Time

Though there is no change in God or even temporal succession His decrees made in eternity terminate on works set in time. The Scriptures report His past immediate work of creation (now finished), His present works of preservation and providence mainly through second causes, and immediate works such as miracles and regeneration of sinners and acts such as justifying believers by faith. 'My Father is working until now, and I am working' (John 5:17). Immutability is not immobility in God any more than God's impassibility, or perfect blessedness, is to be confused with impassivity. God does not suffer (impassibility) though, in His human nature, the Theanthropos [Gr. for God-man] did both suffer and die. Nevertheless, God is as immutable and impassible as He is also immortal ('who alone has immortality'). Some immense mystery is present in these truths. Immutability (in God) is fully consistent with unrelenting activity (even 'work') and perfect freedom, for 'he does according to his will among the host of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth' (Dan. 4:35).

God's Decrees Are Certain of Fulfillment

Predestination is certain of fulfillment. Human programmes, schedules and budgets are prone to failure in execution, but not God's decrees made in eternity.

If Christ is the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world, the creation of mankind, mankind's fall and need for the atoning blood were in the plan too. There were no glitches in execution of the parts of the plan. The first church prayerfully responding to the jailing of their pastor acknowledged that all Herod, Pilate, the soldiers and 'the people of Israel' (Acts. 2:27 kjv) had conspired to do was only 'whatever your hand and your plan had predestined to take place' (Acts 4:28). Peter's rescue from jail by an angel (Acts 12:7, 8) and Paul's deliverance from shipwreck were not improvised 'in the nick of time'—ad hoc or as an expedient. God's manoeuvres sometimes surprise us, but He is never surprised by anything. His eternal plan, according to several passages, is one which cannot be changed (eg. Eph. 3:11; James 1:17). True, 'The Lord brings the counsel of the nations to nothing; he frustrates the plans of the peoples', but not so His own plan, for 'The counsel of the Lord stands forever, the plans of his heart to all generations' (Ps. 33:10, 11; cf. 89:1). And what a marvellous thing it is to be one of the Lord's people, knowing about His purpose: 'Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, the people whom he has chosen as his heritage!' (Ps. 33:10–13).

This single, eternal, all-inclusive plan becomes precious and meaningful to believers as they consider the detail with which it is described in Scripture. Most of these details accompany some message of duty, of comfort or of further enlightenment.

God's plan is never presented in the Bible in such a way as to relieve believers either of hope or responsibility, or to discourage effort, in the slightest way. We should not be dismayed by objections and questions. Some people will say, 'I don't see how you can believe this doctrine and still believe that moral effort will get you anywhere.' Others will ask, 'If God has everything planned out how can He hold us responsible for either good or evil actions?' These questions arise out of incomplete understanding, that is, seeing only part of the Scripture teaching on the subject. Sometimes some detail of revelation, which seems to present a problem, keeps one from believing the whole of what the Scriptures plainly say. In addition, sometimes people reject the teaching because they do not like it. This teaching is either comfort or warning, depending on which one needs.

Details of God's Single Plan

Some of the many details of the plan the Bible associates together in His 'eternal purpose' follow.

1. God's Plan includes the Permanence and Stability of the Material Universe

God's plan includes the permanence and stability of the material universe, what scientists call the uniformity of nature. 'Your faithfulness endures to all generations; you have established the earth, and it stands fast. By your appointment they stand this day, for all things are your servants' (Ps. 119:90, 91).

It is this guaranteed uniformity of nature—the same in every corner of the world—that caused science to arise first in Christian lands and to surpass all peoples outside Christendom in material culture. There could be no scientific research if nature were not uniform everywhere.

About ad 72, Pliny the Elder compiled his Historia Naturalis (Natural History) from some 327 Greek and 146 Latin authors. Though popular until the rise of modern science, Pliny's uncritical and credulous outlook prevents anyone today from finding any important information about the origins of metallurgy, chemistry, weather-forecasting and the like in his work. Reflection on the origins of science have come relatively late but many have sought to explain how and when science arose. There is a tradition among some writers opposing Christianity to the origin and progress of science. One famous book calls it a 'warfare'.⁶

R. Hooykaas' book, Religion and the Rise of Modern Science, has shown how in late Renaissance and Reformation times it was Christian thinkers with their roots in biblical revelation who gave science its theoretical support.⁷

Perhaps the person who has done the most to give the Christian doctrine of God and His providence its fair place in the rise of science is the realist philosopher and Roman Catholic priest, Stanley L. Jaki. Bernard Ramm's book, The Christian View of Science and Scripture came to my aid when I was teaching about this subject at Wheaton College (in Apologetics)⁸ but Jaki has covered the field of science and Christianity in a whole series of books, most specifically on the modern origins of science in The Origin of Science and the Science of Origins. An excerpt explains why science never took hold in any civilization except Christendom.

That in all those cultures—Chinese, Hindu, Maya, Egyptian, Babylonian, to mention only the most significant ones—science suffered a still birth, can be traced to that mesmerizing impact which the notion of eternal returns exercised on them. It was a mesmerism fomented by the lack of a firm foothold, which in turn could only be provided by the perspective of absolute origin, an origin inconceivable without belief in creation out of nothing, implying a Creator.⁹

Jaki shows how the linear view of history found in the Christian doctrine of redemption also supported the rise of science. He goes on to say:

[I]t was the Gospel that turned into a widely shared conviction, the belief in the Father, maker of all things visible and invisible who ... disposed everything in measure, number and weight, that is, with rigorous consistency and rationality.¹⁰

This is to say God created the world and set it operating according to regular laws which He Himself sustains and is governing it to attain the goals He set (His decrees) before the beginning.

In agreement with this is Jaroslav Pelikan, who says the early Christian apologists were compelled to attack the Greek interpretation of history as 'recurring cycles'. He adds: 'In declaring loyalty of the Christians to the [Roman] empire [and emperor] while repudiating the deification of the emperor, apologetic theologians were compelled to clarify their reasons for differing from [Greek-Roman] theories of history.'¹¹

God's certain and settled decree is such a sure matter that the Bible compares the certainty of God's promises to His people to the certain regularity and permanence of God's ways in nature. God's invisible gracious plan in redemption is parallel with His inescapably apparent works in nature. The two paradigms are graphically displayed in Jeremiah 31:35–37: 'Thus says the Lord, who gives the sun for a light by day and the fixed order of the moon and the stars for light by night, who stirs up the sea so that its waves roar—the Lord of hosts is his name: "If this fixed order departs from before me, declares the Lord, then shall the offspring of Israel cease from being a nation before me for ever." Thus says the Lord: "If the heavens above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth below can be explored, then I will cast off all the offspring of Israel for all that they have done, declares the Lord." ' In this case it should be noticed that human failures and sins do not obstruct the certain fulfillment of divine plans and purpose. A current comprehensive and convincing development of this theme is found in H. L. Poe and I. H. Davis, Science and Faith: An Evangelical Dialogue, Nashville, TN, 2000, 259 pages.

2. The Plan of God Specifically Relates to the Nations of Earth

The plan of God also specifically relates to the nations of earth—their boundaries, governments, resources, history and condition. We accept this rather easily of Israel, well known to have been an object of special divine attention. However, according to Scripture, God gives every nation its territory. The Horites and the Edomites (‘children of Esau’) were given their land as God gave Israel theirs (Deut. 2:12). Furthermore, ‘When the Most High gave to the nations their inheritance, when he divided mankind [cf. Gen 10:32], he fixed the borders of the peoples’ (Deut. 32:8). Paul is direct to the point, saying to a Gentile audience, ‘The God who made the world ... made from one man every nation of mankind to live on all the face of the earth, having determined allotted periods and the boundaries of their dwelling place’ (Acts 17:24, 26). Therefore, though both Kaiser Wilhelm and Adolph Hitler thought the German people needed more Lebensraum (room to live), God saw to it that, for a time at least, they were not to get it. These passages invite further study of the decrees of God regarding the history of nations.

3. God has no Known Preference for Any Particular Kind of Government or Sovereignty

It may come as a shock to learn that God has no known preference for any particular kind of government or ‘theory’ of sovereignty for rulers. Scripture favours no particular doctrine of the human authority by which magistrates rule—whether dictatorship, empire, monarchy, aristocracy, plutocracy, military, pure democracy, party dictatorship or republic. The Bible is equally for and against them all. ‘The sentence is by the decree of the watchers, the decision by the word of the holy ones, to the end that the living may know that the Most High rules the kingdom of men and gives it to whom he will and sets over it the lowliest of men’ (Dan. 4:17). ‘[T]here is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been instituted by God’ (Rom. 13:1). On every occasion the Bible raises the subject it emphatically declares that God reigns over the nations, that events express His sovereign decree. If the reader has any doubt of this, do read Psalms 93–99. A summary of sorts is Psalm 96:10, ‘Say among the nations, “The Lord reigns! Yes, the world is established; it shall never be moved; he will judge the peoples with equity.”’ This is not to say that some systems of government are not more friendly to the Christian ideals of society than others. I have dealt at length with the subject of this paragraph in Civil Government, A Biblical View.¹²

4. God’s Plan includes the Precise Length of Each Person’s Life

Also included in God’s plan is the precise length of each person’s life. This is not a philosophy of ‘when your number is up’—far from it. Rather it is a truth designed to inculcate an attitude of peaceful confidence among God’s children, delivering them from bondage to fear of death all their lifetime (see Heb. 2:15). Job was aware of this, declaring a person’s ‘days are determined, and the number of his months is with you [God], and you have appointed his limits that he cannot pass’ (Job 14:5). This implies certain responsibilities at the opposite pole from what is popularly called fatalism. Moses said that since God has numbered our days in His wisdom (Ps. 90:3–12) we also should ‘number’ them. ‘So teach us’, he prays, ‘to number our days that we may get a heart of wisdom’ (Ps. 90:12).

I once heard a Free Methodist evangelist say in a sermon, ‘Every man is immortal until his work is done’, and he was undoubtedly correct. This, in part, accounts for the cheerful, good hope of the apostle Paul throughout the New Testament reports of his ministry, even when in prison, for alleged capital crimes (Philippians). It accounts also for his quiet resignation to the rigours of imprisonment and the end of life, soon to come, knowing he had finished his divinely charted course and kept the faith (2 Tim. 4:6–8). This outlook lies behind the many scriptural spurs to effective effort in accomplishing goals of life in a systematic and timely manner. Of the ‘blessed man’ Scripture says: ‘He is like a tree planted by streams of water that yields its fruit in its season, and its leaf does not wither. All he does, he brings to completion’ (Ps. 1:3, words in italics my translation of the last clause; compare also Jesus’ own dying exclamation, ‘It is finished!’).

5. God’s Plan includes the Circumstances Under Which We Live

God’s sovereign plan includes the circumstances under which we live—poverty or riches, labor or leisure, sickness or health, bad times or good, and the circumstances in which we die. So it is right for believers to learn to say, from the heart, ‘If the Lord wills’ about all plans for their future (see James 4:13–15). As great a man as the apostle Paul found it right to submit his missionary plans to God, even when he might have planned otherwise (Rom. 1:10–13).

Modern people with their ideas about equality are frequently out of patience with any God who sanctions social and economic classes. Other generations have not felt this way. John Calvin, for example, already in middle age when he accepted his counsellors’ advice to take a wife, disapproved of their first candidate, owing to her higher social standing than his. In any case no aspect of this subject is sketched more sharply than that God designs some to be rich and others poor, some to lead and others to follow, some to command and others to obey, some to be prominent celebrities, others to live out energetic constructive, but plain lives in obscurity (Ps. 73). It is also apparent that if one’s efforts to break out of such categories do fail, God is not to be charged with cruelty or unfairness (Rom. 9:19–21).

It is also hard for us to accept either ill health or poverty as the will of God for anybody. Let those who think this way read what Paul had to say about slaves (1 Cor. 7:20–24), unmarried people (vv. 25–26), the married who might wish not to be (v. 27), the divorced (v. 27, see also verses 28–31). Even certain preachers can be heard to say that it is not God’s will for any one to be sick. If you think this way read Paul’s words about sickness as sometimes God’s will (2 Tim. 4:20; 2 Cor. 12:7–10). Poverty can be God’s will for us too. Other generations have understood this also better than ours. The young prophet, Jeremiah, for example, though he found it painful, accepted the Lord’s command not to take a wife, establish a home and beget children owing to the rigours of his office in a time when genuine prophets were unwelcome in court and out of favour with the Jewish population. The young prophet bewailed his limitation in this regard but like Job ‘in all this’ he ‘did not sin or charge God with wrong’ (see Jer. 16:1–9). This was in order to carry out God’s plans for Jeremiah’s life work as a rejected prophet, to be crowned with a martyr’s death; and his part to play in the last, steeply declining days of his country’s slide to doom and judgment.

There are several specific examples of how God had predetermined how and when certain men, at least, would die (Abraham, Gen. 15:15; Jesus, John 2:19). We cannot doubt that the same is true of us all. One Psalm says, apparently of all, both beasts and people, ‘These all look to you... When you give it to them, they gather it up ... When you hide your face, they are dismayed; when you take away their breath, they die and return to their dust’ (Ps. 104:27–29). This is the theology, both theoretical and practical, of the ‘Prayer of Moses, the Man of God’ (Ps. 90).

6. God’s Plan includes People’s Evil Acts as well as Good Ones

God's plan includes evil acts of people as well as their good ones. The Bible specifically says of the wicked deeds of Joseph's brothers, in selling Joseph to travelling merchants (Gen. 37:23–28), that though they did intend evil 'God meant it for good' (Gen. 50:20; cf. Ps. 105:17; and Gen. 45:4–8). Similar interpretations are given by the Bible to the hardening of Pharaoh's heart and even to the betrayal and shameful execution of Jesus. As the Apostle Peter explained under the difficult circumstances of his second Christian sermon: 'And now, brothers [the crowd who demanded Jesus be crucified], I know that you acted in ignorance, as did also your rulers. But what God foretold by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ would suffer, he thus fulfilled' (Acts 3:17, 18). Judas had a part in God's plan (see Jesus' comments, John 17:12; Mark 14:18–21). Christ's suffering was even prophesied in the Old Testament.

The jealous Jewish leaders, who were responsible, played a part in God's plan too. Peter told them this plainly: 'Men of Israel ... Jesus of Nazareth, a man attested to you by God ... delivered up according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God, you crucified and killed by the hands of lawless men' (Acts 2:22, 23). The fact that the wicked deeds of these parties to crime were all in God's plan, some even predicted in Scripture, in no wise relieved the men who did those things from guilt and punishment for them. This is plain in each case, especially Judas—'It would have been better for that man if he had never been born' (Mark 14:21). We saw in connection with God's omniscience that He even foresees events which are conditional upon future acts of free beings (we cited 1 Sam. 23:11–14). If He foreknows such things, it is because He has predestined them as well.

7. Both the Judgment of the Impenitent and the Salvation of the Believing are in the Plan of God

We must understand then that, though the decrees are different, some causative and gracious, others permissive and just, both the judgment of the impenitent and the salvation of the believing are in the plan of God. '[F]or those who do not believe, "The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone", and "A stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." They stumble because they disobey the word, as they were destined to do' (1 Peter 2:7, 8).

Questions and Problems

Now, granting that the biblical teaching has been fairly presented, some questions and problems arise which should, if possible, be answered. This does not mean that merely because a question can be asked, it ought to be asked. Mere men cannot answer all the possible questions that the mind can raise. God's ways are not our ways or His thoughts ours. Our part is to believe what God says to be true is true. Only after that do we attack the problems.

The most serious question relates to freedom. How can there be freedom of choice if God has decreed all that shall happen, from the fall of raindrops and sparrows to the rise of stars and empires? The following comments may be helpful to honestly perplexed readers. The problems are not insuperable.

1. The Bible speakers and writers are usually conscious of no difficulty. Although Jesus, in speaking of Judas to the Father, called him 'son of perdition', it was only after Jesus had made the most touching appeal imaginable that He not go through with his appalling plot with the Sanhedrin

(John 13:21–30). A few days later, Peter and assembled believers, in prayer to the same Father, and knowing that Judas’ defection had been prophesied in the Old Testament, observed that Judas by his own transgression fell ‘that he might go to his own place’ (Acts 1:25 kjv). A person can be as free as the Bible says he is (not an absolute freedom by any means), and yet acting out God’s decree, without introducing a conflict in the mind of a Jesus or a Peter. Who is he who supposes himself more rational or insightful or just than they?

2. Making a distinction between the decrees and their execution alleviates the seeming conflict with freedom. God made the decrees and in no wise externally compels anybody to do either right or wrong. In the cases being questioned, responsible people carry out the decrees, yet without coercion by God. They do so wholly voluntarily. If they are slaves to sin, as Jesus said, that is hardly God’s fault. One thinks of the sons of Eli—‘worthless men. They did not know the Lord’ (1 Sam. 2:12). They were rebuked by their father for their gross sins. But, says the Scripture, most significantly, ‘But they would not listen to the voice of their father, for it was the will of the Lord to put them to death’ (1 Sam. 2:25). Thus the doctrine is confirmed and it is clear that without any compulsion from God or men (quite to the contrary, the whole nation was opposed to what the two young men were doing) they freely chose to do the evil which destroyed them (see 1 Sam. 4:17).

3. The idea of freedom must be clarified. Though ‘freedom’, ‘freedom of choice’ and ‘freedom of the will’ appear often in discussion of this subject there is considerable difference of opinion as to what ‘freedom’ is. There are different kinds and degrees of freedom. As we shall see later in the doctrines of grace and of sin, there is no absolute freedom. Discussion of predestination and how it relates to freedom did not originate in jam sessions at a theological seminary students’ dormitory. Argument over the subject is recognized in Romans 9:11–29. In the early church, division arose to a peak in fifth-century controversy. Pelagius, a British monk, sought to deny divine sovereignty and predestination and, along with that, the biblical teaching of original sin and of depravity. Augustine defended predestination and the corollaries—depravity and atonement. Gottschalk, a learned Benedictine monk (died ad 867), read Augustine, was convinced, and got in trouble with his bishop, who imprisoned him for speaking against the prevailing crypto-Pelagianism. Deprived of last rites and Christian burial, he died in his Augustinian evangelical faith, 30 October 867, disgraced but admired and defended by many supportive clergymen. Over 600 years later, the same set of doctrines revived the church in what we now call the Protestant Reformation.

Party Strife Over Freedom

Discussions of this subject have been fruitful, though not all of the party strife. I am indebted to Our Daily Bread, published by Radio Bible Class, for a very helpful tale in this regard.

The story is told about the members of a congregation who got into a squabble one day over the issue of predestination and free will. While the controversy raged, the people separated, going to opposite sides of the auditorium. One man, not knowing which group to join, slipped into the predestination crowd. But he didn’t stay long. Someone asked him, ‘Who sent you here?’ He replied, ‘No one, I came of my own free will.’ This brought the angry response, ‘What? You can’t be one of us and talk that way.’ Quickly he was shoved across the aisle. But now he was questioned about his reasons for joining the free-will group. When he said, ‘I was forced over here,’ they indignantly shouted, ‘Get out! You can't join us unless you choose to do so.' This poor believer was shut out from his brothers and sisters because they were fighting over a problem that's beyond the full grasp of man's puny little mind.

Contradictions, Disputes: Decrees and Foreknowledge

The reader interested in further discussion of the alleged contradictions and problems is referred to the classical theological works. Lutheran, Reformed, Baptist and many other theologians, including Thomas Aquinas, generally define and defend the teaching as set forth here. Some orthodox Methodist, Episcopalian and other writers, including dispensationalist H. C. Thiessen, while not rejecting the teaching of the decrees in the Bible, seek to modify the doctrine by asserting that God decreed only what His omniscience (knowledge of future events) informed Him would happen anyway. H. C. Thiessen asserts' God foreknew what men would be in response to common grace; and He elected those whom He foresaw would respond positively.¹³

This really is not to modify the biblical doctrine (decrees, counsel, plan of God, predestination) but to subvert it. It seems like common sense, the same as works-righteousness does. Yet it is denial of clear biblical truth, in my judgment.

That God's foreknowledge in the sense of foresight may have a place in our understanding of the decrees cannot be doubted. Yet if foresight is made dependent on God's knowledge of the forces prevailing among 'men and things' (as it sometimes is thought to be) let us remember that God made the laws, thus insuring the results. Moreover, there is something else very important to understanding God's 'foreknowledge'. 'Foreknew' and 'foreknow' appear only once each in the kjv (Rom. 8:28 and 11:2), Gr. proginoskō in the second aorist tense each time; in each case the people of God is the object of God's foreknowledge. The meaning in each case, in context, and indicated even by the Lexicon of Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, is to 'Choose beforehand ... someone'. 'Foreknowledge' in kjv appears only twice. In the former case, Peter addressing the Pentecost crowd said Jesus was 'delivered by the determined purpose and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23 nkjv). Foreknowledge here is the Greek word prognosis, the noun corresponding to proginoskō. Peter is saying that God delivered Jesus over to judicial execution. It was something God determined in His own counsel and foreknowledge. In such case foreknowledge is not mere previous information of what would happen but actual direction (if not implementation) of the future event. The certainty of the future event was decreed by God, and in this case not by any entirely secret counsel, for Psalm 22 and Isaiah 52:13–53:12 predicted the event and attending circumstances in detail. Further, knowledge in Scripture frequently has reference to establishment of a relationship rather than information possessed, as in 'Now Adam knew Eve his wife, and she conceived' (Gen. 4:1 nkjv). Here 'to know' is to establish the most intimate of all human relationships. So when Peter used the word again (1 Peter 1:1, 2) he was thinking not that some certain people in time to come would be saved, but that they had always been 'elect ... according to the foreknowledge', i.e. according to an eternally established relationship.

Is God the Author of Sin and of Evil?

Someone wants to know if this understanding of predestination does not make God the author of sin. By no means. Sinners are the authors of sin. They are not coerced to sin, but do so voluntarily. God even preserves them in life while they commit their sins of disposition, thought and deed. They follow self-chosen paths. God overrules evil for good, as we have seen. It is also true that He holds the evil-doers guilty. A distinction may be made between efficient decrees of God and permissive ones. If this be allowed, then the divine decree of sin is not efficient; it is only permissive. Though some Supralapsarians and other followers of scholastic hyper Calvinism reject these distinctions, some of the best theologians, Roman Catholic, Calvinist and Arminian find them both biblical and helpful. Why God permitted Satan to tempt Eve, why He allowed evil at all is, of course, never explained in the Bible, though the plain fact is that God not only did not prevent it, He put it in His plan. To allow sin now is only an extension of the decree to allow sin in the first place. With all its mystery, the biblical narrative still provides the best answer ever propounded.¹⁴

W. G. T. Shedd wrestled the problem to the ground as well as any modern writer. I cite some of his lines on the ‘principal practical value of the doctrine that God decreed [planned in] sin’.

It establishes the Divine sovereignty over the entire universe. By reason of his permissive decrees, God has absolute control over moral evil, while yet he is not the author of it, and forbids it. Unless he permitted sin, it could not come to pass. Let the reader think of the situation in [Gen. 2.]... Sin is preventable by almighty God, and therefore he is sovereign over sin and hell as well as over holiness and heaven. This is the truth he taught to Cyrus, to contradict the Persian dualism [God and evil are equally powerful and real]: ‘I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace and create evil. [Let the reader ponder!] I, the Lord, do all these things,’ Isa. 45:7. Compare Amos 3:6, ‘Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?’ Gen. 20:6, ‘I withheld thee [Abimelech] from sinning against me.’ To deny this truth, logically leads to the doctrine of the independence of evil and the doctrine of independence of evil is dualism, and irreconcilable with monotheism.¹⁵

Shedd goes on to say, God purposes ultimately to overrule evil for good and cites Psalm 76:10 and other texts I have cited in this chapter.

Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109), the first ‘great’ of the medieval scholastics, illustrated the truth of God’s providential control of sin this way:

If those things which are encircled by the heavens wished not to continue to exist beneath the heavens, or wished to get away from the heavens, they would nonetheless be able to exist only beneath the heavens and able to go away from the heavens only by coming toward them. For no matter from what place or to what place they would go they will still be circumscribed by the heavens. And the farther they would get from any one part of the heavens, the closer they would get to the opposite part. Similarly, even though men and evil angels do not want to submit to the divine will and ordinance, they are unable to escape from it. For if they want to get out from under God’s directive will, they run beneath His punitive will. And—if you ask about the route they will traverse—they make their way only under His permissive will. And that which they perversely will or do is redirected by Supreme Wisdom towards the order and beauty of the aforementioned universe.¹⁶

Alternatives to the biblical doctrine are manifestly unacceptable, all without exception leading to theological errors. Of these the chief are denial of original sin and the consequent universally corrupt human nature (depravity) on the one hand and the doctrine of a limited God on the other.

Practical Reconciliation of Views

Most orthodox Christian authors who support a ‘free will’ outlook readily—as opposed to ‘depraved will’—acknowledge that God knows all future events before they happen, even those events contingent on decisions and acts of free beings. Hence, a practical reconciliation between parties in the strife over predestination has been possible. There has been sufficient agreement to secure mutual effort in evangelism, at a minimum.

Values

This doctrine, rightly expounded, has had great influence for good in Christian communities which accept it.

1. As observed at the beginning of this chapter, the teaching of providence promotes a solemn but joyful confidence that with the future in God’s hands, the story of the human race will indeed ‘come out right’ in the end. Romans 8:28 is truth, not just overheated enthusiasm. People who deeply believe this tend to be steady, productive citizens of the community. They know that ‘in the Lord your labour is not in vain’.

2. Awareness of God’s comprehensive plan inculcates humility in the face of God’s complete sovereignty over the past, the present and future.

3. It should cause the unbelieving and impenitent to be aware that their sins too are in God’s calculations. They will never ‘get away with’ a thing. He will bring every deed to judgment and thereby,

4. Through this awareness of judgment the sinner is pointed to the means of God’s grace that he might learn of Him, believe and be among those whom God counts as His people—the redeemed of all the ages.

If God has decreed the course of our lives He will take charge of them too—call it ‘providence’. A lovely parody of Henley’s Invictus, entitled My Captain, by Dorothea Day, celebrates God’s decrees and providence.

Out of the light that dazzles me,
Bright as the sun from pole to pole,
I thank the God I know to be
For Christ the conqueror of my soul.
Since His the sway of circumstance
I would not wince nor cry aloud.

Under the rule which men call chance
My head with joy is humbly bowed.
Beyond this place of sin and tears—
That life with Him! and His the aid,
That spite the menace of the years,
Keeps, and shall keep, me unafraid.
I shall not fear, though straight the gate;
He cleared from punishments the scroll.
Christ is the Master of my fate;
Christ is the Captain of my soul.

¹ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 204.

² ibid., p. 204.

³ B. A. G. Fuller, History of Philosophy, II, rev. ed. (New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1945), p. 315.

⁴ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969), p. 394.

⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 258.

⁶ A. D. White, A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology In Christendom (London: 1896).

⁷ R. Hooykaas, Religion and the Rise of Modern Science (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972). See especially his chapter ‘Science and the Reformation’, pp. 98–144, about one-third of his book.

⁸ Bernard L. Ramm, The Christian View of Science and Scripture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1954).

⁹ Stanley L. Jaki, The Origin of Science and the Science of Origins (South Bend, IN: Regnery Gateway by arrangement with Scottish Academic Press, 1979), p. 93.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 93.

¹¹ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition I, ‘The Emergence of the Christian Tradition’ (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 37.

¹² Robert Culver Civil Government A Biblical View (Edmonton Alberta: Canadian Institute for Robert Carter, Civil Government, A Practical View (London, 1807). Cambridge Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 1999), 308 pages.

¹³ H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1949, 1966), p. 157.

Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

¹⁴ See my essay, Robert D. Culver, ‘The Nature and Origin of Evil’ in Vital Apologetical Issues, ed. Roy B. Zuck (Grand Rapids: Kregel Publ., 1995), pp. 10–18.

¹⁵ W.G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (New York: Chas. Scribners Sons, 1888; Zondervan reprint 1953 and more recently, 1969), pp. 405–412.

¹⁶ Anselm, Cur Deus Homo i, 15. in Anselm of Canterbury vol. III, ed. & trans. by J. Hopkins & H. Richardson (Toronto & New York: The Edwin Mullen Press, 1976), p. 73.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (131). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

17

God’s Work of Creation (I)

Sources for a Theology of Origins

‘In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth.’ There were no human observers about when God created the world. Our only source of authentic, first-hand information, then, is the creator-God, Himself. If He does not tell us about creation we shall never know about it—tenuous inferences derived from geology, astronomy, physics and biology notwithstanding. Inferences based on ‘science’, as to how and when the ‘universe’ came to be, have always changed with the times and the changing theories of science. Revelation, however, has not changed since God last spoke ‘through a Son’. Christian interpretation of enscriptured revelation has made few changes as regards the main features of the doctrine of creation since earliest times. From the standpoint of eternity (sub specie aeternitatis) the changes have not been very important. Christians have believed from the beginning that in the early chapters of Genesis they have a God-given and therefore truthful account of the creation of the world. Such affirmations as ‘All Scripture is breathed out by God’ (2 Tim. 3:16) was Paul’s conviction. Jesus said, ‘Scripture cannot be broken’ (John 10:35).

That Jesus meant to include the Genesis creation account is evident. At every point in His ministry He plainly employed Scripture as God’s Word—factual and true. At several critical junctures of His ministry, He quoted Scripture in support of His own perseverance in the task God gave Him. This is seen especially at the temptation.¹ He also made several comprehensive statements about the Old Testament Scriptures.²

Our Lord never argued that the Bible, including the creation story, is true. Nor do we find such words as inerrant and synonyms in His estimate of Scripture. He did say that ‘Scriptures cannot be broken’. He simply used the Scriptures as God’s true Word. Two basic human institutions are marriage and the Sabbath. He traced the origin of both back to the Genesis creation story.³ Followers of Jesus will therefore follow the Lord in trusting the Genesis account of creation as true. This, of course, is not to deny the same breadth of interpretation in the first chapters of the Bible which all claim for the last chapters of the Bible. No one I have heard or read has declared his group’s understanding (whether literal or figurative) of Revelation 21, 22 as the only possible orthodox, believing view possible. At present, however, we are afflicted by some writers and promoters who seem to think their view of the Creative week (of twenty-four hour days) and the Flood (that it created geological history) is the only view consistent with orthodoxy and possible to an honest reading of the text of the first nine chapters of Genesis.

The creation itself witnesses to its creation by God. Francis Pieper affirms: ‘All creatures bear the divine stamp.... But our knowledge of the particular circumstances of the creation ... is derived solely from God’s revelation in Scripture. Men who presume to correct God’s record of the creation through conclusions drawn from the present condition of the world are playing the role of scientific wiseacres, a procedure unworthy of Christians.’⁴ It is not wrong, however, for geologists, physicists, astronomers and other scientists reverently to seek better to understand the biblical revelation and to increase their knowledge of creation by their researches, provided always they do not put nature in a class with Scripture as revelation.

As noted elsewhere in this book, strictly speaking, nature gives information but is not revelation, even though for some time writers have been speaking of nature as a part of ‘general revelation’. We are not quite ready to classify scientific orthodoxy and the geologic table with the first chapter of Genesis in degree of authority on earthly origins, even though some recent writers seem inclined to do so. Moreover, interpreting the fossil record is not quite parallel to interpreting the Bible as regards creation. The Bible is designed primarily as a message from God, while the earth was designed as a habitation for mankind, not a guide to the subject of its own origin. [Current writers on ‘intelligent design’ discuss this principle in nature as the ‘anthropic principle’.]

All parties to the present debate over creation—theories of ‘young earth’, ‘creation science’ and ‘progressive creation’—should acknowledge this. The Bible is a book intended to be an interpretation of our world from the standpoint of the divine mind for religious purposes, while the earth is a creation, designed by the same mind as a habitation for mankind. Information about origins is scanty and obscure in the creation. It is apparently not spiritually necessary for us to know anything at all about the physics and chemistry of creation. It is mixing things that are essentially different to speak of Scripture and earth as both revelations of God requiring interpretation. There is just enough truth in the statement to make it dangerous in the hands of some people.

References to God’s acts in creation are made in many parts of the Bible, often with interpretation of the spiritual meaning thereof. In addition to Genesis 1 and 2, mention should be made of Psalms 8, 33 and 148; Job 38; Proverbs 8 and John 1:1–5. The texts outside of Genesis that interpret Genesis take on an importance for doctrine as great as the Genesis creation accounts and will be quoted and cited throughout the discussion now to follow.

The World's Beginning

There was a time when there was no world. It did not exist. The Psalm of Moses puts it this way, 'Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever you had formed the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting you are God' (Ps. 90:2). Passages speak of time 'before the world existed' (John 17:5) and 'before the foundation of the world' (John 17:24).

That the world had a beginning is assumed in all the Scriptures teach concerning such doctrines as decrees (predestination) and preservation. It is a patent fact so obvious in the biblical world-and-life view that Bible-reading-and-loving people can scarcely think in any other way about the world. They know the world is not without beginning and not self-generated.

Simple observation teaches us that though the processes of regeneration and restoration are at work in nature, they do not quite restore nature. Most of the mountains are a little lower each year. The energy given off by the sun is never returned to it. The more sophisticated observations of science report that the universe is spreading out and running down. This, too, points to a beginning in finite time.

Wiseacres of our secularist age have nothing to say as to what the cause of beginning was. A few, contrary to the material evidences, speak vaguely of an eternally existing, uncaused world.

Followers of existentialist theology are told that God is Being, not another being, and that 'How did the world begin?' and 'Who made it?' are improper questions.⁵ We must rather look at mankind 'in order to learn what the Creator-creature relationship is'.⁶ God does not create, He only 'lets be' in this theology.

In Process Theology it is unimportant to ask how the world began. Rather we must seek to understand how God who is in the world (pantheism) is growing with it and we along with Him. There is no affirmation of God's omnipotence or omniscience in a traditional sense in either of these approaches to theology.

There have always been religious people who opposed the idea of a beginning of the world. This opposition has usually taken one of two forms. One is emanation. The world is identical in substance with God. It has been produced by successive emanations out of Him. The things we see are little pieces of God. Folk who identify God with what they see in nature, rather than seeing nature as His work, are taking this view of things whether they know it or not. There are many anti-biblical affirmations and implications involved. The doctrine of emanation virtually denies God's transcendence; it compromises God's holiness by making all that is evil a part of Him. Ancient Gnosticism, a system which sought to interpret Christianity in the forms of Eastern theosophy (such as Hinduism), taught emanationism. Emanationism has always been a temptation to the mystically inclined, that is, to people who seek direct routes to God through meditation and ascetic practices apart from the historical Christ and a written revelation. Contemplate almost anything about yourself and you have a bit of God. Follow it back through prescribed exercises and you may get a clear vision or feeling of God. This is a simplified description of the mystical approach.

Another form of denial of a beginning (and of creation) is dualism. Dualism teaches that God (thought of as idea) and matter, though distinct from one another, have always existed and always shall. It is essentially an effort to explain the presence of evil by attaching it to material things.

Absolute Beginning

The world was brought into existence by the one, true, eternal God out of no materials at all. There was an absolute beginning of things.

‘In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth’ (Gen. 1:1). These words must be understood as taking the reader back to the time when, in the presence of nothing outside the Godhead, God brought the heaven and earth into existence. ‘By faith we understand that the universe was created by the word of God, so that what is seen was not made out of things that are visible’ (Heb. 11:3).

Sometimes this act or series of acts has been further defined as creation ‘out of nothing’ (ex nihilo). This is correct as long as a certain error is avoided. ‘Nothing’ must not be regarded as a ‘something’. It is not a designation for primeval chaos. This error is found in classical Greek philosophy, frequently as formlessness, a source of evil, and in modern existentialism as the principle opposing authenticity. It might be better to say God created into nothing, that is, where nothing (non-existence) was, God created something. This involves ambiguities also, owing to the fact that we cannot conceive of nothingness apart from a mental image of a ‘nothing’, thereby confusing the idea. We are apt to end up being dualists.

Genesis 1:1 does not say that God used no materials in the creative work of that verse. But if it is absolute beginning to which Moses refers, then the situation requires it. The nature of the idea and its context must decide for us.

Very early, Christian theologians had to deal with the views of the origin of the world held by pagan authors and schools as well as heretical views among Christian teachers who were affected by the pagans. The Greek ‘Apologists’ of the second century and other early writers felt particularly obliged to clarify and to defend the absolute beginning of the world by an uncreated eternal divine being who brought the world into being by speaking it into existence. Of these Christian scholars (Marcianus, Aristides, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus), and others shortly after them (Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian), Jaroslav Pelikan says:

Apologists ... recognized that the coeternity of God and matter was inconsistent with the sovereignty and freedom of God. In spite of the difficulties raised by the doctrine of creation ex nihilo for any attempt to cope with the problem of evil, the alternatives to this doctrine appeared to be a pantheism ... or a dualism.⁷

Theophilus of Antioch found explicit Christian creationism in direct conflict with six philosophical theories among the Greeks.⁸

These theories Thomas Oden has parsed out as: (1) there is no God; (2) God cares for none but himself; (3) the world is uncreated and nature is eternal; (4) God exists only in each person’s conscience; (5) God is a spirit which pervades all things; and (6) both God and matter are uncreated, i.e. coeval. Oden’s grasp of both theology and modern philosophy led to this comment:

All these views were late to appear and grow into major challenges to the Christian teaching of Creation and remain as modern challenges in the voices of 1) Nietzsche, 2) Freud, 3) Hume, 4) Kant, Schleiermacher, Feuerbach, 5) Wieman and 6) Schelling.⁹

Further Statements of Method and Scope of Treatment

1. Though seldom first in any general treatment of Christian doctrine, and even found in a special development of the doctrine of God, ‘God the creator of heaven and earth’ is fundamental and primary to all Christian teaching and a Christian world-view. E. P. Siegfried, a Roman Catholic scholar, rightly said:

[B]elief ‘in God the Creator of heaven and earth’ is the theoretical basis of all religious and theological truth, the real foundation underlying all other truths concerning God, and the objective principle whence all other truths proceed.¹⁰

2. The topic of this chapter is God as the originating cause of all that exists except God Himself. It is apparent that this title, the text (Gen. 1:1) and the opening sentences commit this study to classical, Christian theism, to a biblical theology of existence, and to a particular tradition of translation of the opening verse of the Bible, as shall appear as the discussion develops.

3. In previous chapters our discussion has not at every point related directly to science and philosophy. If, however, we claim that all that human perception experiences, or can imagine as existing in the universe of which we occupy a part, was brought into existence by the God of the Old and New Testaments, then we are already in territory claimed by every branch of science and philosophy. The treatment will necessarily respond to that fact.

4. The treatment to follow presupposes the God of Christian theism of the previous chapters, for whom ‘the maker of heaven and earth’ of the Creed is an appropriate title. Many have followed this route before and done so admirably well. Alternate explanations, both religious and philosophical, of the origin of the world in which we live were proposed at least as early as the Genesis account. In recent times science has been heard from in this regard also. Within limits of a chapter or two—not a whole book—I shall respond to these proposals. The creationist paradigm has undergone very serious attacks from many quarters. Problems, especially the presence of evil in a world created by an almighty, benevolent God, must be recognized and responded to.

5. What St Paul called ‘the whole creation’ or ‘all things’ (Gr. ta panta), Genesis 1:1¹¹ designates simply as ‘the heavens and the earth’, and the Prayer of Moses portrays as ‘the earth and the world’ (Ps. 90:2) teach no form of cosmology. Neither the Ptolemaic geocentric universe is propounded, nor the Copernican solar-centric systems, nor any other. ‘[T]he heavens and earth’ to Moses and his first readers meant simply everything above our heads and everything beneath our feet as far as they extend in any direction. The world they meant was the one they saw, felt, heard, smelled and tasted, however constituted. But the modern term, universe, ‘the world of existing things as constituting a systematic whole’ (Oxford English Dictionary) is an interpretive term implying both variety and unity in a system—though not any particular sort of system. The one thing all these expressions share is reference to all created existences—whether a system or chaos. Whether God be the Creator or exists in some other relation to ‘the world of existing things’ is a major consideration of this chapter.

Our discussion will be arranged under a series of propositions to be understood as what ‘The Bible teaches’. It might please lovers of the inductive method to cite all the supporting passages, in context, first, and then generalize in some conclusions, but that is inversion of the declarative, didactic approach the present task calls for.

I. The World, including Heaven and Earth, all that exists, was Created by God

Says Langdon Gilkey.

Were one to ask ‘What is the first thing Christians say when they begin to state their beliefs?’, he might reasonably conclude this primary role was filled by the idea of creation. For when he opened the Scriptures, he would find the first line stating this belief: ‘In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.’ And if he listened to the most universally repeated Christian creed, he would hear the opening words: ‘I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth.’¹²

The Bible states this unequivocally from beginning to end, usually in support of or accompanying some related truth, derived benefit or duty. The first reference is connected with the privilege and duty of a weekly Sabbath rest (Gen. 1:1; 2:1–3 cf. Exod. 20:9–11) while among the last is the correlate duty and privilege of worship: ‘Worthy are you, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honour and power, for you created all things, and by your will they existed and were created’ (Rev. 4:11). In between, other biblical passages connect God the Creator with renewal of strength for those who wait on Him (Isa. 40:28–31; 43:1–13), and with assurance of the restoration of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah (Isa. 44:24–26). In the Psalms there is frequent conjunction of God’s redemption, salvation, mercy and government with His being the universal ‘Maker’.¹³ In the New Testament, the Word made flesh is also the eternal ‘God,’ the ‘life’ and ‘light of men’ (John 1:1–12).

Indeed the fact that God created a world planned by Him, preserved and governed by Him, is the most fundamental affirmation of a Christian world-view, distinguishing biblical religion from all others as false. It separates biblical religion from every form of polytheistic worship, because ‘the Lord is the true God; he is the living God ... “The gods who did not make the heavens and the earth shall perish from the earth’ (Jer. 10:10, 11, cf. whole context). The identity of the Maker of heaven and earth with ‘God manifest in the flesh’ distinguishes the New Testament faith from every other faith (see Rom. 11:25–36 and Eph. 3:9).

II. The World had Absolute Beginning when God created the Heavens and the Earth

The world had absolute beginning when God created the heavens and the earth, at which moment (or epoch) both time and space came into existence. These are matters which have puzzled both philosophers and theologians as well as scientists since antiquity. Perhaps more than one complementary perspective appears in Scripture about time and space, but I think there are definitive statements and necessary inferences.

1. The world had a beginning. It has not always existed. There is a ‘before the world began’ (2 Tim. 1:9; Titus 1:2 kjv) ‘before time began’ (nkjv). Jesus spoke to His Father about ‘the glory that I had [was having; eichon, first person imperfect] with you before the world existed’ (John 17:5) and that ‘you [the Father] loved me before the foundation of the world [kosmos]’ (John 17:24). Before the world 'to be' or its 'foundation' the Son was loved by the Father and He had a glory with the Father. Paul says that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ 'chose us in him before the foundation of the world' (Eph. 1:4) and Moses in praise to God rhapsodizes that 'you are God ... Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever you had formed the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting' (Ps. 90:2).

2. It is noteworthy that in these passages no mention is made of a 'time' as such before creation; nor does any other passage, unless it be Romans 16:25. (There are similar statements at 2 Timothy 1:9 and Titus 1:2.) Paul speaks of a mystery kept silent chronois aiōniois, in or through times eternal. Chronos signifies the durative not the seasonal aspect of time. Commentators are divided as to whether reference is to ages before or after creation, probably because of opinions brought to interpretation. Whether there was time before creation or not, however, there are two reasons for the judgment that the chronoi (times) are post-creation. The first is scriptural, the second rational. (1) The author of this statement (Rom. 16:25) put time in this ktisis hetera (any other created thing) a few columns earlier in the same autograph (Rom. 8:39). The times are 'enestōta ... mellontai' (things present or things to come). Scholastic theology may rightly speak of God's 'uncreated glory' but not of His 'uncreated time'. (2) Both time and space have to do with things, objects. Before creation there were no 'things', God alone is self-existent and all things outside of Him are neither contemporaneous with His 'origin' (if we may so speak), nor with Him when He creates them. He has no reference to them nor He to them. It is customary and correct to say that time existed 'in God' from eternity, and so existed before creation. But that existence is not concrete, objective existence any more than are Plato's eternal forms or the monads of German philosophers or whatever is reckoned to be in the Absolute. My right hand and the Japanese mechanical pencil I hold in it existed in God's eternal counsels before the world began also, but not as real existence in a created world.

Commenting on eternity as an attribute of God, A. H. Strong observes:

'We must not make Kronos (time) and Ouranos (space) earlier divinities before God'. They are among the 'all things' that were 'made by him' (John 1:3) [quoting I. A. Dorner]. Yet time and space are not substances; neither are they attributes (qualities of substance); they are rather relations of finite existence ... With finite existence they come into being; they are not mere regulative conceptions of our minds; they exist objectively, whether we perceive them or not.... 'They furnish the conditions of our knowledge.... Space and time are mental forms, but not only that. There is an extramental something in the case of space and time as in the case of sound' [quoting G. T. Ladd].¹⁴

This topic is among listings of about every encyclopedia.¹⁵

3. This biblical concept of time as created, linear durative has had a determinative influence on Christendom, where it has been nourished.

Carl F. H. Henry, in two dictionary articles, starts his development of time in history, theology, philosophy and the Bible with this fine statement, speaking of one of the most vexing problems of philosophy. The Bible presents a distinctive conception of time ... Instead of viewing time abstractly as a problem, it regards time as a created sphere [emphasis added] in which God's redemptive plan is actualized.¹⁶

The importance of regarding time as a creature of God, not a condition within which He exists and works, has been seen clearly by most theologians—as opposed to the idealistic philosophers of the nineteenth-century (Hegel and disciples) who placed time and history in the Absolute, their God. Neo-orthodox writers credit the Hebrew people (not Old Testament Scripture as such) with correcting among the ancients the cyclical view of history. Early Christian theologians saw the cultural importance of doctrine long ago.¹⁷ In a comprehensive treatment of the doctrine of divine creation Langdon Gilkey has this to say:

One of the most significant and dramatic points in the development of Western culture was the victory over [the] deadly view of circular time achieved by the biblical understanding of history. As important culturally as the destruction of the pagan gods was the overthrowing of the endless cycles: for on nothing does the modern sense of life depend so directly as on the Christian view of time. The contrast between these two conceptions of time was absolute; and only a faith as virile and certain as that of early Christianity could have uprooted the ingrained sense of temporal meaninglessness that permeated and deadened the ancient world.¹⁸

Gilkey goes on to warn the Western world once transformed by the biblical view of time but now operating on a theory of evolutionary ‘progress’ (and, I would add, of ‘cultural diversity’):

Having dispensed ... with its religious foundation on the rock of the divine eternity, the divine creation, and the divine providence, this edifice [belief in progress as norm] has proved too shaky. Based now solely on the sand of historical observation instead of the rock of faith, it has no deeper foundation on which to stand the recent storms of history, and threatens to collapse.¹⁹

Unfortunately Gilkey, who came to write theology after a short career in literature, accepted the disjunction between a factual revelation and a myth-but-true revelation of the then prevalent neo-orthodoxy. He has no assurance that the absolute beginning taught in Scripture and understood by numberless generations of Jews and Christians is factually true. Thus the unstable tension between ‘religion’ and ‘science’ as he understood it is given the status of a learned form of enlightened ‘orthodoxy’. Though he and others of similar persuasion keep the ‘religious value’ of absolute creation, they tie it to the idea of a continuation of divine creation in the evolutionary process. Hence, to borrow Browning’s line, Gilkey’s idea of creation ‘That began best’ did ‘end worst’, and what was ‘once blessed’ has indeed ‘proved accurst’.²⁰

III. Genesis 1:1–3 and the Doctrine of Creation

The discussion of God’s work of creation to this point has established that the Bible teaches (1) the world, including heaven and earth, all that exists, was created by God and (2) the world had a beginning when God created the heavens and the earth, at which moment (or epoch) both time and space came into existence.

Before proceeding to discuss the methods, means and purposes of the triune God in creation some problems and questions related to our discussion this far call for at least brief attention. They are as follows. First, is Genesis 1:1 a distinct, independent sentence or is it a subordinate clause qualifying the second verse? Second, is Genesis 1:1 a summary of the passage on to the end of the creation narrative or a statement of absolute origin of the matter and energy of the universe with the rest of the narrative relating what happened following? Third, how should the seven days of creation and of Sabbath rest be interpreted? The first two questions just proposed, as necessary preliminaries to further consideration of the doctrine of creation, will be answered together.

The first 'official' translation of Genesis 1:1–3 is the Greek Septuagint of about 280 bc. It was made by Jewish scholars familiar with Hebrew as a second (perhaps first) language and probably used at home as well as synagogue. At any rate they were familiar with Hebrew syntax, grammar and idiom. They translated verse 1 as an independent statement of which verse 2 is an enlargement about the same as kjv, rv, rsv and, recently, esv. Juxtaposed below are the rsv of 1952, the nrsv of 1989 and Spieser's translation in Genesis of The Anchor Bible of 1964. rsv retains the independence of verse 1 and represents the obvious, simple syntax of the Hebrew text and of previous versions. The other two introduce principles of modification that scarcely fit any category except adaptation to modern evolutionary, materialistic understanding of reality. That principle is evolutionary theory applied to translation and interpretation. Hold in mind that though some recent evangelical, orthodox scholars might accept one or the other of the 'new syntax' versions, it originated in liberal (if not post-modern) interpretation of the history of ideas.

rsv of 1952 '1. In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. 2. ['and' omitted] The earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the Spirit of God was moving upon the face of the waters. 3. And God said, "Let there be light", and there was light', nrsv of 1989 '1. In the beginning when God created the heavens and the earth, 2. the earth was a formless void and darkness covered the face of the deep, while a wind from God swept over the face of the waters. 3. Then God said, "Let there be light"; and there was light.'

The Anchor Bible: Genesis of 1964 '1. When God set about to create heaven and earth—2. the world being then a formless waste, with darkness over the seas and only an awesome wind sweeping over the water—3. God said, 'Let there be light'. And there was light'.

Except for the omission of 'and' as the first word of verse 2 the rsv of 1952 has essentially the same sense as all translations from the Greek Septuagint of about 280 bc to Luther's Bible of four centuries ago and on to the asv of 1901.

Thoroughly to report, discuss and document the reasons for the obvious changes in Speiser's translation in the Anchor Bible and the nrsv, now standard in liberal churches and used in some conservative evangelical ones, cannot be undertaken here. Having myself, over an initial period of ten years of teaching seminary courses, taken students painstakingly through the first twelve or fifteen chapters of Genesis annually, it is tempting to wade in more deeply than is prudent here.

Let us make one general observation and several specific ones. I shall try to avoid use of technical grammatical-syntactical jargon.

1. There is ongoing controversy over how much of the translator's interpretation of the text should be incorporated into translation from original languages of the Bible to current languages. The degree varies within the first known one, the Septuagint, but generally speaking the translators who issued the Authorized Version of 1611 held as close to literal rendering as possible for conveying meaning in language of minimally educated people. Yet they rendered the text as elegantly as possible. If slang existed then they did not use it but made few concessions to prissy sensibilities (as, for example, David's oath).²¹ However, several of the new Versions, sometimes with reserve, sometimes blatantly, adjust the translation, against the long tradition of meaning and against the natural reading, to fit their opinions of what the ancient Hebrews really thought and said. This is clearly the case in these late twentieth-century translations.

2. Both nrsv and Anchor Bible say that when God 'created' heaven and earth 'the earth' (nrsv) or 'the world' (ab) was already in existence. The translators are assuming, in spite of the simple and plainest sense of this passage, that the cosmology and cosmogony (order and origin of the world) prevalent among ancient heathen nations of the Levant and Mesopotamia was shared by the author(s) of Genesis 1:1–3. It is true that the myths of the priests of Mesopotamia and Canaan presuppose the existence of formless matter previous even to the birth of their gods. So their 'creation' myths have the gods creating the heavens and earth (and underworld too) of pre-existing materials. About the standard Mesopotamian form of the myth, the Enuma Elish epic, Jack Finegan, in one of his many standard volumes says:

The account begins with the time when only the two divine principles, the mythical personalities Apsu and Tiamat, were in existence. These two represented the living, uncreated world-matter, Apsu being the primeval sweet-water ocean and Tiamat the primeval salt-water ocean ... Tiamat is explicitly called a woman in the myth ... and she and Apsu become the mother and father of the gods.²²

After awhile, in one of the myths, Marduk, one of the created gods, created the earth. Later on, one of the pantheon named Kingu 'was slain and when his arteries were cut open the gods fashioned mankind with his blood.'²³ Speiser points out (correctly) that in ancient Mesopotamia (whence Hebrew ancestors came) 'science often blended into religion' and claims 'that on the subject of creation, biblical tradition aligned itself with the traditional tenets of Babylonian "science"'.²⁴ He thinks (as about all who follow this line of thought) that the Hebrew account (Gen. 1) is the myths, purified by ethical monotheism.

Speiser marshalls his arguments from grammar-syntax for the new view on one and one-third pages.²⁵ They are not definitive, however, as even the scholars of nrsv acknowledge in their first footnote, which says: 'The traditional translation as an independent sentence, following the Greek Bible (Septuagint) of the 3rd century bc, is defensible', etc. In their notes nrsv proposes three defensible translations, of which the traditional is one. In any case they know the evidences are not compelling.

Franz Delitzsch (not in the Keil and Delitzsch series) brought his immense mastery of Hebrew and related studies to these three verses. He commits himself to the traditional translation, in the way he introduces comments on Genesis 1:1—'The Fact of creation in a universal statement: In the beginning Elohim created the heavens and the earth.' Yet he gave full range to contrary views and proposed contrary evidence, making this statement:

Ancient translators all regard verse I as an independent proposition. Rashi [celebrated

Jewish Scholar, 1040–1105], however, and among moderns Ewald, Bunson, Schraeder, Budde construe: In the beginning, when Elohim created heaven and earth—and the earth was waste and desert, etc.—then God said; otherwise Abenezra [1092–1167, one of the most distinguished Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages] and Grotius [Dutch savant]: In the beginning, when Elohim created the heaven and the earth, the earth was waste and desert.²⁶

So the current departures from the traditional rendering of Genesis 1:1 have these precedents. Delitzsch, however, in a display of technical finesse hard either to report or to match, I think, demolished the notion of this supposed biblical ground for a world of chaotic mass of material in existence before God first moved to create the present world order. H. C. Leupold, in his justly praised work, declares:

The phrase, ‘In the beginning (bereshith) refers to the absolute beginning of created things ... This fact is supported by the following arguments in the face of many and strong claims to the contrary.’²⁷

Leupold is an arch conservative, but Gerhard Von Rad, a celebrated recent Form-Critical Old Testament scholar, and convinced advocate of the documentary theory of pentateuchal origins, regards the view we are resisting here as impossible for theological reasons, precisely because the late priestly (post-exilic) author could not have assigned any truth at all to the Babylonians. This he emphatically renounces, holding as plain sense the demand for full rejection of the myths.²⁸ I must agree when he states, ‘These sentences [Gen. 1:1–2, 4a] cannot be easily overinterpreted theologically’ (p. 46)! I must quote somewhat at length. After his strong language in support of the ancient and traditional translation of Genesis 1:1–3, one reads:

Syntactically perhaps both translations are possible, but not theologically. One must not deprive the declaration in v. 1 of the character of a theological principle. If one considers vs. 1–2 or 1–3 as the syntactical unit, then the word about chaos would stand logically and temporally before the word about creation. To be sure, the notion of a created chaos is itself a contradiction; nevertheless, one must remember that the text touches on things which in any case lie beyond human imagination. That does not mean, however, that one must renounce establishing quite definite and unrelinquishable theologumena. The first is that God, in the freedom of his will, creatively established for ‘heaven and earth,’ i.e. for absolutely everything, a beginning of its subsequent existence. The second is expressed in v. 2, for unless one speaks of chaos, creation cannot be sufficiently considered at all. To express divine creation, the Hebrew language already had a verb, which, as the Phoenician shows, could designate the artistic creation. But the Old Testament usage rejects even this comparison. The verb was retained exclusively to designate the divine creative activity. This effective theological constraint which extends even into the language is significant (cf. salah, ‘to forgive,’ alluding only to divine forgiving). It means a creative activity, which on principle is without analogy. It is correct to say that the verb bara, ‘create’, contains the idea both of complete effortlessness and creatio ex nihilo, since it is never connected with any statement of the material. The hidden pathos of this statement is that God is the Lord of the world. But not only in the sense that he subjected a pre-existing chaos to his ordering will! It is amazing to see how sharply little Israel demarcated herself from an apparently over-powering environment of cosmological and theogonic myths. Here the subject is not a primeval mystery of procreation from which the divinity arose, nor of a ‘creative’ struggle of mythically personified powers from which the cosmos arose, but rather the one who is neither warrior nor procreator, who alone is worthy of the predicate, Creator.²⁹

Robert L. Reymond provides a valuable advocacy of the syntactical independence of Genesis 1:1, including the excellent contributions of Edward J. Young.³⁰

I summarize reasons for continuing to treat Genesis 1:1 as an independent sentence, opening the Bible with the profound declaration of absolute origin of the world by God’s act of creation ‘in the beginning’.

1. Bereshith (in the beginning) as accented by the Massorites (standard in all Hebrew Bibles)³¹ tends to support the independence of the sentence.

2. Though contested, as noted above, the Massoretic pointing (vowels) and accentuation, standard now for over 1,000 years, supports (if it does not demand) the independence of verse 1 from verses 2 and 3.³²

In other words, the technical features in no wise require a change from the traditional rendering. This is convincingly supported by Delitzsch and Edward J. Young among many others. See also G. J. Spurrell.³³

3. The proposal to unite verses 1–3 into one complex sentence ‘is opposed ... to the simplicity of style which pervades the whole chapter, and to which so involved a sentence would be intolerable, apart altogether from the fact that this construction is invented for the simple purpose of getting rid of the doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, which is so repulsive to modern pantheism.’³⁴ Though I cite the authority of Keil, thousands of readers of Genesis in the standard versions before the nrsv of 1989 would share Keil’s opinion as well as the thousands of seminarians who have learned to read the verses in Hebrew. Speiser does not document his statement: ‘the majority of medieval Hebrew commentators and grammarians ... could see no objection to viewing Genesis 1:1 as a dependent clause.’³⁵ Are Rashi (1041–1105) and Aben Ezra (1092–1167) a ‘majority’ of Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages?

4. Liberal modern scholarship is opposed to the idea of revelation to divinely accredited messengers (Moses, apostles, prophets). This predisposes most of them to assume the author(s) of Genesis 1–3 shared the view of the ancient Near East that chaotic matter, not a self-existent Creator, was already present ‘in the beginning’. Dr Reymond enlarges on this important point.³⁶ This explains why—although most of them acknowledge that verse one may properly be an independent sentence—they prefer to regard it as subordinate to verse 2. This supports their views of the evolutionary origin of cultural ideas.

5. John’s Gospel, in obvious and usually uncontested reference to and dependence on Genesis 1:1, says: ‘In the beginning was the Word.... All things were made through him’. This depends entirely on understanding Genesis 1:1 as an independent sentence.

6. The Septuagint of Genesis 1:1, the most ancient extant translation, reads en archē epoiēsen ho theos, etc. (and there is no proof of modification of the text of this verse). This translates the Hebrew as an independent sentence. It is also the obvious source of the opening of John 1:1. In each case the phrase refers to absolute beginning.

7. The Jews in ancient times, when Hebrew was still a living language for some, and widely comprehended by others, understood Genesis 1:1 as teaching the absolute origin of all things in acts of God. This too is acknowledged by some of the scholars who think that a mistake. We have already noted the Septuagint rendering of about 280 bc.

8. Creation out of ‘things that were not’ was the common faith of ancient Jews throughout their history. This is apparent in the many references to creation in the Old Testament. Also, in the inter-testamental period we have the confession of the martyr mother of the seven martyr brothers who admonished her son: ‘I beseech thee, my son, look upon the heaven and the earth, and all that is therein, and consider that God made them of things that were not’ (2 Maccabees 7:28). A faithful regard for the Bible’s own claim for the Mosaic antiquity of the first chapter of Genesis would insist, it seems to me, that these ancient people derived their view of creation from the first chapter of the Torah, not by inference from some experiences in the eighth to fifth centuries bc (as Von Rad supposes).

9. What has been said in the previous paragraph applies to statements of the New Testament, such as Hebrews 11:3—‘the universe was created by the word of God, so that what is seen was not made out of things that are visible’—and Romans 4:17, which speaks of ‘God in whom he [Abraham] believed, who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist’, and much more.

A Final Comment

Von Rad, as many who share his opinion, acknowledges that ancient Jews interpreted Genesis 1:1 as an independent sentence affirming ‘creation out of nothing’ by God, yet holds they were mistaken.

Arguments as to the grammar and syntax of Genesis 1–3, pro and con, have been vigorously pursued for about two centuries now in the scholarly literature. The reader should be aware that this is contemporary with the rise of evolutionary theories of development of all religions, including the religion of Israel. The same is true of most critical theories of the origin and growth of the literature of Israel which we call the Old Testament. This led negative critical scholarship away from any notion of supernatural (special) revelation. Hence the appearance of a strictly monotheistic religion and a doctrine of fiat ‘by the word of God’ creation in the fifteenth or fourteenth century bc and a prophet like Moses is unthinkable. So if feasible such critics will take fiat (ex nihilo) out of Genesis 1:1–3. They prefer a primeval, pre-existing chaos to be expressed in Genesis 1:1–3, such as was the view of second millennium bc Babylonians, Assyrians and Canaanites. Interestingly, however, Von Rad sees the logic of a late Priestly origin (P of the JEDP theory) for Genesis chapter 1 would require the doctrine of creation ex nihilo, then admittedly present in Jewish minds. He advocates the same documentary theory of origin held by those represented by Speiser but a better logic and, hence, a better syntax!

Appendix to Chapter 17

No one brings better technical credentials to interpreting Hebrew texts than were brought by Umberto Cassuto, a Jewish scholar. In his commentary, he states the opposing view that in Genesis 1, verses 1 and 2 (or perhaps the first three verses) are parts of one sentence, then says:

[A] decisive objection can be raised on the basis of the syntactical construction of verse 2. If the first rendering [‘at the beginning of the creation of the heavens and the earth, when the earth was without form and void’] were correct, the predicate in the second verse would precede the subject, viz. wattehi ha ʾarets [‘and was the earth’], or hayetha ha ʾarets [‘was the earth’]; cf. Jer. 26:1, ‘In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakin ... CAME THIS WORD, etc.’; so too Jer. 27:1; 28:1 and Hos. 1:2: ‘when the Lord first spoke to Hosea, SAID THE Lord to Hosea’. Had the second translation [verses 1–3 a single sentence, ‘at the beginning ... when the earth was ... God said’, etc.], been correct, the wording would have been: weha ʾaretz tohu wabhohu [‘and the earth without form and void’] omitting hayetha [‘was’].

Here Cassuto illustrates from the Hebrew text of 1 Samuel 3:2–4 and concludes: ‘It follows, therefore, that the first verse is an independent sentence that constitutes a formal introduction to the entire section, and expresses at the outset, with majestic brevity, the main thought of the section: that in the beginning, that is at the commencement of time, in the remotest past, that the human mind can conceive, God created the heavens and the earth.’³⁷

¹ See Matt. 4:4, 7, 10; cf. Deut. 8:3; 6:13, 16; and 10:20.

² See Matt. 5:17, 19; John 10:35; Luke 24:25–27, 44–47 for example.

³ See Matt. 19:3–6 and compare Gen. 1:27 and 2:24; also see Mark 2:27 and compare Gen. 2:1–4.

⁴ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics I (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950, 1957), p. 467.

⁵ John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1966), p. 212.

⁶ ibid., p. 213, citing Rahner.

⁷ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Emergence of the Christian Tradition vol. I of The Christian Tradition (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 36.

⁸ To Antolycus, 4, ANF. 15 (London: publisher not provided).

⁹ Thomas Oden. The Living God (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 251.

¹⁰ E. P. Siegfried, art. ‘Creation’. In The Catholic Encyclopedia iv (New York: 1908), p. 475.

¹¹ Also 2:1; 14:19, 22 et al.

Oxford English The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary

¹² Langdon Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth: The Christian Doctrine of Creation in the Light of Modern Knowledge (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1965), p. 1.

¹³ Ps. 89:11–15; 90:1, 2; 146:5, 6; and all of Pss. 90, 104, 136, 139, 147, 148.

¹⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 275.

¹⁵ A contrary view is set forth by R. A. Killen. R. A. Killen, ‘Time’. In Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia vol. II, ed, Pfeiffer, Vos & Rea (Chicago: Moody Press, 1975), p. 1708.

¹⁶ Carl F. H. Henry, article ‘Time’ appears in both Evangelical Dictionary of Theology and the earlier Baker Dictionary of Theology.

¹⁷ See Augustine, The City of God, Book 12, chapters 13 and 14.

¹⁸ Gilkey, op. cit., p. 301.

¹⁹ Gilkey, op. cit., pp. 309, 310.

²⁰ Robert Browning, Apparent Failure, lines 62 and 63.

²¹ 1 Sam, 25:22, 34; cf. 1 Kings 14:10; 16:11 et al.

²² Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past: The Archeological Background of Judaism and Christianity (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1969), p. 63.

²³ ibid., pp. 64, 65.

²⁴ E. A. Speiser, The Anchor Bible: Genesis (Garden City: Doubleday, 1964), p. 11.

²⁵ ibid., pp. 12, 13.

²⁶ Franz Delitzsch, New Commentary on Genesis (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1888), pp. 74, 75.

²⁷ H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Genesis (Columbus, OH: Wartburg Press, 1942), p. 39.

²⁸ Gerhard Von Rad, Genesis, A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1961), pp. 45, 46.

²⁹ ibid., pp. 46, 47.

³⁰ Robert L. Revmond. A New Svstematic Theologv of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998), pp. 384–391.

³¹ See Delitzsch, pp. 74–78, also Young, as cited by Reymond.

³² See Appendix to this chapter, p. 151.

³³ G. J. Spurrell, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Genesis (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1887), pp. 1–3.

³⁴ C. F. Keil, Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament, vol. i, Keil & Delitzsch (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, n.d.), p. 46.

³⁵ Speiser, op. cit., p. 12.

³⁶ Reymond, op. cit., pp. 387–389.

³⁷ Umberto Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Genesis, Part One, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, 1944, 1978), pp. 19, 20.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (141). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

18

God's Work of Creation (II)

IV. The Divine Work of creating the Heavens and Earth was Completed

The divine work of creating the heavens and earth and all that is in them had not only a time of beginning but a definite time of completion. This proposition must be qualified to point out that there is a 'heaven of heavens' above the material universe where angels 'behold the face' of Jesus' 'Father who is in heaven'. These angels were present when God 'laid the foundation of the earth ... when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy' (Job 38:4, 7). We do not know what worlds there may be besides the cosmos, of which is our galaxy, near the eye of which our solar system revolves, about whose center our earth, scene of important transactions, occupies a portion. This world, however, is no longer coming into existence. God began to create 'in the beginning' and completed the great work in six successive creative [not necessarily solar] days. After that 'on the seventh day God finished his work that he had done, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work that he had done' (Gen. 2:2).

Was there any continuing work of creation? Moses seems to answer with an emphatic No. 'Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And ... God finished his work' (Gen 2:1, 2a).

The Bible occasionally describes some subsequent works of God as creating, making, forming, and the like. In each case there is no suggestion that God is adding materials to what He did in the biblical creative beginning. This world which God created and where redemption is in process is, as far as divine revelation is concerned, no smaller or larger than when on the seventh day ‘he rested ... from all his work that he had done’. There are continuing divine works in this world. Jesus said so, as we shall shortly attend to, but they involve preservation and providence, upkeep and governance, to employ non-theological language.

As we shall demonstrate shortly, the primary meaning of the Hebrew word bara / create, is to bring into existence something new, having no inherent reference at all to whether pre-existing materials are used. It is the context of the statement, the syntax of the sentence and numerous later statements of Scripture that definitively show that ‘the heavens and the earth’ (our universe) had absolute beginning in God’s creative act, and such is what the opening statement of the entire Bible means. When God says, ‘behold, I create new heavens and a new earth’ (Isa. 65:17) it is re-newal, as the next verse, in parallel use of bara / shows. There God says ‘behold I create Jerusalem to be a joy’—clearly a renewal, not something ex nihilo.¹ God is said to create the changes in the world of nature (Ps. 104:30) but that is equated with renewing ‘the face of the ground’ in parallel statement. To sum up, in the many texts of Scripture which speak of God’s creating something, never is any addition to the material creation intended. Procreation—as in the birth of babies and animals—is quite the same. In no case is new material brought into being, as in the sense of Genesis 1:1 and subsequent references to it.

To cite an admirer of Augustine who was also well acquainted with Aquinas, Calvin comments on Psalm 104:30:

He [the Psalmist] again declares, that the world is daily renewed, because God sendeth forth his spirit. In the propagation of living creatures, we doubtless see continually a new creation of the world (emphasis added).²

Calvin plainly interprets the propagation of life, in what we now call nature, as renewal not fiat (or de novo or ex nihilo creation).

Jonathan Edwards and several New England theologians who followed, while not rejecting an original divine creation, asserted continuous moment-by-moment creation. Descartes, before Edwards, taught that preservation means ongoing creation at each moment.³ Edwards’ is more a theory of metaphysics than of theology and is of interest chiefly because it was famously advocated by a learned and godly man of historical importance. The central idea is that the same sort of divine action which began the world and all its parts is necessary continually to maintain it, else it would retreat to nothingness. A. H. Strong devotes about a page to the advocates and their arguments and two to his objections⁴ and likewise C. A. Hodge.⁵

The doctrine of continued creation is rather conspicuously proposed by some recent authors. Thomas Oden—in a quite satisfactory discussion of the origin of time and space concurrently with creation of the cosmos—proposes this somewhat puzzling sentence:

The very idea of creation implies this paradoxical conjunction: as divine activity, creation is eternally occurring, transcending all specific times and places; as temporal effect, creation has a beginning and end, however remote.⁶

Oden goes on to refer to Augustine (Confessions XI. 10–13). But I think Oden has misread Augustine, for in the section cited the bishop of Hippo said: ‘If we mean by the whole of creation when we speak of heaven and earth, I unreservedly say that before he made heaven and earth, God made nothing’ (Confessions XI. 12). He additionally makes clear that ideas in the mind of God have no concrete existence in the world of heaven and earth. Oden also cites Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologica I.45.1). But in that article Aquinas says nothing remotely like Oden’s opinion that ‘creation is eternally occurring’ in God’s mind or anywhere or any other time than in the one creative epoch.

Dr Oden’s enigmatic statement does not really endorse the notion the world we live in is either continuously being created or that in it God is occasionally creating new materials for the world He made ‘in the beginning’.

What Thomas Oden seems merely to hint, perhaps as reflection of some unstated metaphysical speculation, Wolfhart Pannenberg states—not without reservations and concessions to what he acknowledges to be the contrary sense of ‘the Old Testament stories’, but plainly. Pannenberg is a learned writer, as much metaphysician as theologian. He brings the weight of the history of philosophical speculation to bear, and an apparent acceptance of the ancient creeds, but only as much authority of Scripture as passes the bar of the critical judgment of modern criticism. Let Pannenberg speak for himself:

A trinitarian exposition of the concept of creation makes it possible, then, to relate what is said about creation to the totality of the world from the standpoint of its duration in time. It does not concern merely the world’s beginning. To limit it [creation] to the beginning, as the Old Testament stories seem to do in accordance with Near Eastern myths of a primal era, is one sided. Yet what the two Genesis accounts are really seeking to describe is the normative and abiding basis of creaturely reality in the form of depiction of the initial event.

Thus preservation goes with creation. Nor are we to view preservation simply as an unchanging conservation of the forms of creaturely existence laid down at the first. It is a living occurrence, continued creation [emphasis added], a constantly new creative fashioning that goes beyond what was given existence originally. Creation, preservation, and overruling [providence] thus form a unity whose structural relation has yet to be defined more closely.⁷

Thus while quite traditionally recognizing the three distinct divine works of God toward the cosmos (creation, preservation and providence), he also blurs their distinctions and affirms ‘continued creation’. He promises to define the ‘relations’ ‘more closely’ later. Which indeed he does through the following 128 pages. It includes a systematic survey of views of the cosmos; the nature of reality in philosophy from the pre-socratic Greek metaphysicians through Whitehead, Bergson and Bertrand Russell; the theologians, Jewish, Christian and Islamic, from Philo to Teilhard de Chardin and Karl Barth; and the scientists from feeble beginnings to the amazing discoverers and discoveries, Planck, Einstein, Heisenberg and the rest. Along the way several of Pannenberg’s ideas regarding the doctrine of creation are clarified and supported.

1. Pannenberg's understanding of divine creation of the natural order by evolution requires that creation and preservation be one ongoing process. He appeals to scriptural statements about 'the creative nature of God's acts in history' and acknowledges 'this approach has its roots in the atomic theory of Democritus'. He asserts that 'the element of chance [as Democritus featured it] ... is important for theological interpretation of the ongoing creative action of God'.⁸

2. Creation, preservation and providence must be united with the consummation.⁹ This consummation is being progressively realized in an evolutionary process. He has fully absorbed evolutionary process as developed by Darwin and clarified by leaders of thought in recent times. The universe is expanding indefinitely and gives added space for onward development.¹⁰

3. The resistance to evolutionary explanation of the world by Christians has been mistaken and futile.

In the 19th and early 20th centuries Christian churches and theologians were painfully slow to recognize this opportunity that evolution had given theology relative to natural science. The fight against Darwinism was a momentous mistake in the relations between science and theology ... We say this in spite of the hypothetical character of the theory of evolution.¹¹

4. The Holy Spirit (whom he firmly sees as the ruach, spirit, not wind in Gen. 1:2) is the agent of creation in the evolutionary world process (76–115). He finds connection between the 'field of force' theories of recent physicists and the energy of the Spirit of God effecting the 'sequence of forms' and all else moving to the perfection and consummation (108–110 et al). In a manner he does not make clear, the Spirit of God is 'the dynamic of natural occurrence, which is in effect the evolution of earth and its living inhabitants'. He says: '[I]n the history of earth ... the development of organized life ... changed the face of the earth. Vegetables ... molluscs ... reptiles ... mammals ... and then humans.' He sees in this 'higher structuring ... from atoms and stars to humans, and especially the development of life ... a kind of countertrend to the increase of entropy in natural processes ... The evolution of life [is] ... an upward movement toward increasingly higher and more complex forms of organization.'¹²

5. As far as the narrative account of creation and the flood is concerned, though there are good insights, it is based on an antiquated view of the world, hence not to be regarded as authoritative. He calls it 'time bound'. He writes:

The story carries features of a view of nature that was widespread in the Near East in the first millennium [not second, Moses' time] ... a particular example of a time bound insight that we have now.¹³

6. Though the authors of Genesis 1 had an utterly mistaken word picture (weltbild) ('The story of the flood tells us what happens when leaks in the vault [firmament] occur and are not stopped') they were only 'bearing impressive testimony to the science of antiquity'. We should not follow their cosmology, but 'should follow where the biblical witness leads by claiming current knowledge of the world for a description of the divine work of creation ... theologically appropriating contemporary knowledge'.¹⁴

I shall not repeat my reasons for rejecting the idea of continual creation complementing or completing at the beginning a cosmos, including all its living creatures. Whatever place there may be in real history for development in the variety of the earth's features—inert, chemical, topographical, geological and biological—there is no place in plain statements of theological fact in the Bible to support emergent evolution or equating a so-called elan vital with the Second and Third Persons of the Godhead in a continued creation.

V. God and Man in the Present Created Order

I have in mind features of the world created in part by God, presently sustained and governed by Him, which are built into that cosmos. Cosmos is the Greek term (kosmos) usually behind 'world' in the English New Testament. We are thinking of the world, the creation, into which we, the descendants of Adam, the first man, are born and from which we view 'the heavens and the earth'. Let us look closely, briefly and naively, without bringing speculative, philosophical theories along with us.

1. God has left traces of Himself in the created material world. By means of these 'traces', as I have called them, people are able to draw inferences about their Creator. Just as the electric light tells us something (though only a little) about the genius of Thomas Edison, its inventor, and my sister-in-law's beautiful handmade quilts about Marie their maker, so 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the sky above proclaims his handiwork' (Ps. 19:1). This is Hebrew idiom for majesty and power. Paul says that though God's attributes as such are 'invisible', 'since the creation of the world' (cosmos), God's 'power and divine nature' are 'clearly perceived' by the mind, by way of necessary inference (Rom. 1:20). Scripture also says the wisdom of God is manifest in His works, especially in the subtlety and variety of the creatures: 'In wisdom have you made them all' (Ps. 104:24). See Calvin's comments on Psalm 119:15.¹⁵ Calvin said the knowledge of God shines forth in the fashioning of the universe and the continuing government of it, beginning his chapter on the subject with these eminently quotable sentences:

The final goal of the blessed life ... rests in the knowledge of God. Lest anyone then, be excluded from access to happiness, he not only sowed in men's minds that seed of religion of which we have spoken but revealed himself and daily discloses himself in the whole workmanship of the universe. As a consequence, men cannot open their eyes without being compelled to see him. Indeed, his essence is incomprehensible, hence, his divineness far escapes all human perception. But upon his individual works he has engraved unmistakable marks of his glory, so clear and so prominent that even unlettered and stupid folk cannot plead ignorance.¹⁶

Calvin, like good Bible expositors and theologians before and since, brought numerous texts of Scripture as unmistakable evidence, among them Psalm 19:1–4, Hebrews 11:1–3 and Romans 1:19, 20.

Recent developments in Christian evidence (factual apologetics, some call it) have developed what used to be called 'the teleological argument' or 'argument from design' and 'intelligent design in nature'—the latter both by evolutionary and non-evolutionary theists. Except for technical features of recent science in these discussions all is anticipated in Calvin's treatment. From Butler's Analogy onward the teleological argument has varied only in the amount of supporting data supplied, the linguistic force of the argument and the way the conclusions are drawn.

As of this writing two recent books in particular have argued convincingly for the presence of ‘intelligent design’ in the natural order. Michael Behe, a Roman Catholic author who writes from his professional standpoint as a professor and researcher in one of the life sciences, suggests that perhaps organic evolution does prevail in the natural order and is thereby ‘intelligent design’—hence a Creator-Designer. Evidences drawn for intelligent design seem decisive.¹⁷

Phillip E. Johnson, a lawyer, argues somewhat less technically to a conclusion of intelligent design.¹⁸ A stream of new literature, videos, and similar, supporting this approach, is developing.¹⁹

Not only primal unfallen mankind but sinners such as we are do see these unmistakable evidences. It is only a mark of our depravity, according to Scripture (Rom. 1:19 ff.), that people refuse to retain God in their knowledge and are therefore ‘without excuse’.

2. God has left far more than traces of Himself in the created constitution of human beings. That mankind is ‘the image and likeness of God’ says this in a general way. Mankind’s nature, what and who we are, mirrors God’s nature in some particulars—certainly not completely. Further, by creation and subsequent procreation, every child of Adam has the voice of God in his heart (conscience) telling everyone of us we ought to do right and ‘accusing’ or ‘excusing’ our thoughts, which says much more. This is taught specifically in Romans 1:19, where Paul says ‘For what can be known about God is plain to them’ (emphasis added), later expounded in Romans 2:14–15. Even the heathen have ‘the work of the law ... written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness, and their conflicting thoughts accuse or even excuse them’ (Rom. 2:15). This expresses knowledge of God as lawmaker and judge is written in mankind’s consciousness, suppressable but not expungeable.

Moreover, by looking carefully at other members of our race and by serious introspection—as being the image and likeness of God (Gen. 1:26, 27) and ‘the image and glory of God’ (1 Cor. 11:7)—we find not only our sinful self, but in our creaturely excellencies a ‘clear mirror of God’s works’ (Calvin, Institutes I, 1.3). Calvin again here has an excellent paragraph (Institutes I, 5.3). I take the matter up more fully in treatment of the doctrine of mankind (see Part 2: Anthropology: Man as Created).

There is considerable difference of opinion as to whether so-called ‘general revelation’ in God’s creatures, nature and human beings, is sufficient basis for a ‘natural theology’ parallel to ‘revealed theology’ or as preliminary to revealed theology. Neo-orthodox theologians Barth and Brunner debated this in terms no longer of much interest today. I shall here forebear entering that not very fruitful debate. It does seem to me that based only upon the limited content of natural (general) revelation there are important theological affirmations to be made: that God is; that God is an almighty, glorious person, creator of me and all I see, hear, feel, touch, taste; and that, if so, He must be worshiped. Further, though spoiled by sin and rendered spiritually dead thereby, people nevertheless have value to God because of our likeness to God and, hence, even in estrangement salvagable.

The literature of this subject was already very large in Martin Luther’s time. In his paradoxical manner of teaching salvation wholly by grace through faith on the ground of Christ’s work of redemption he characterized theology derived from creation (Rom. 1:20) as false theology when employed by the worldly wise, citing 1 Corinthians 1:21–25. Adam before the fall might have constructed a ‘natural theology’, but now it only makes those who construct a natural theology fools. What is available to us now is not God’s invisible nature but only as much as was made visible in Christ’s suffering on our behalf. Luther in this way was repudiating the speculations of medieval scholasticism. One wonders what he might have said of some of the speculations and refinements of the age of Protestant theological scholasticism which immediately followed.²⁰

3. Certain creaturely privileges and duties of mankind as crown and climax of God’s creative art are set forth in the creation narrative of Genesis. Among these are duties to propagate the race, to exercise dominion (i.e. rule and conservation) over the created environment which supports His existence, to observe a weekly Sabbath, to work as keeper of the garden of Paradise and subsequently elsewhere. These matters I reserve for extended treatment later in the doctrine of mankind.

VI. Social Order for Primal Mankind in a Created Order

The subject of human society in the created order of things is a topic not always treated in connection with the doctrine of creation but which, in view of current social interests and radical differences of current thought, calls at least for brief attention. Whether viewed as a second creation account or as a fuller account of the sixth day of the creative week, Genesis 2 after verse 4 relates entirely to the creation of ‘Man’ (Gen. 5:2 esv): male called Adam (earth) and female Eve, or more correctly Ava (life). The theological implications and consequences of the unity of the race in the first male, as related to the fall of chapter 3, belong in theological anthropology and I treat them there (in Part 2 of this book) at some length. There are enormous social implications and consequences of the fall as well. I have written a book on that subject.²¹ Coercive civil government was not a part of the created human social order. Rather it is a late, post-diluvian development, an aspect of divine preservation and providence. Coercive rule of the mass of mankind by other men was devised by God to control the devastating social effects of the fall.²² Each of us comes to full flower in society with other people but not necessarily in the state.

There is validity to the contention of some (as noted earlier in the chapter) that God is essentially ‘creative’ in the sense that in ordering of the world, in His power, wisdom and love, God produces ‘new things’—but as an aspect of preservation and providence. The heavens and the earth, however, were finished from the standpoint of the creation narrative, at the end of the sixth day and, on the seventh day, evidently even terminated. As regards creation, God is now resting.

The earth was created in anticipation of mankind’s residence there. This is a necessary inference from the Genesis record—mankind is the crown of creation, last created, only then is everything ‘very good’ (Gen. 1:31)—and it is specifically stated in Psalm 115:16: ‘The heavens are the Lord’s heavens, but the earth he has given to the children of man.’ Karl Barth makes this fact the basis, in part, of the doctrine of angels—those messengers between heaven (the ‘above’) and earth (the ‘beneath’)—in Church Dogmatics III.²³

The various spheres of human expression are rooted in created human nature and cannot be made to derive from any source other than what it is to be human. In other words, both personal expression of individuals and of society flow out from human nature. The state or some agency created by the state cannot successfully produce results foreign to the created nature of mankind.

The most obvious of these ‘orders’ or ‘spheres’ is marriage and family as the organ for propagation of the race and the primary sphere of social happiness. The philosophers of the French Revolution thought they could abolish it; the Soviets and Maoists and more recently the biological technocrats who wish to give us clone babies have tinkered with abolishing or modifying the family. Yet the formula of monogamous marriage initiated at creation (Gen. 2:21–25) may be corrupted by sinful people, attacked by ambitious technocrats, but hardly abolished. It will always be true that the Lord ‘makes ... families like flocks’ (Ps. 107:41) and where social and civil shalom prevails God sets all the solitary ‘in families’ (Ps. 68:6). Even the numerous social engineers of the secular establishments are now beginning to acknowledge that good families are the only sound foundation of a sound social order.

Other spheres of human expression derive from the created order of things. Among them are the following.

1. The necessity of labour by the human male to support his wife and family. It was Adam not Eve of whom it is said ‘The Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to work [“tend” kjv] it and keep it’ (Gen. 2:15). ‘Tend’ translates Hebrew ʾavadh, meaning to do work, and in certain forms meaning servant and slave. Hard work is not absent from the meaning here. This is previous to the fall, hence in this prototype of the normal adult, he is to work vigorously at something as an engine of supply for family needs. The fall only rendered this ‘natural’ state of affairs more rigorous: ‘in pain you shall eat ... all the days of your life ... By the sweat of your face you shall eat bread’ (Gen. 3:17, 19). Like all the duties inherent in mankind by virtue of creation, this duty is also at its best both privilege and sphere of joyful personal fulfillment as well as the means whereby civilization is created.

2. Art, science, education, religion, music, medicine—indeed every form of social expression (of which no complete list has ever been attempted)—are not inventions created by human beings but modes of expression of what they already are. In such a case each such expression has duty and privilege to do and be what it is. They exist together in society and complement one another but are not controlled by one another. The same person may be interested and creative in both art and education, or science and religion, or even in all four and more besides (say architecture and farming). However, he does not learn how to worship God from art any more than he demands that as a builder (architecture) he consult the local pastor (religion) as to how to construct the court house. As Christians it is our duty to bring each of these spheres to the judgment and direction of God, the Creator, who has given freedom to each, conditioned by respect of every one of the other spheres.

A creation subjected to the vanity of sin both in mankind and all we survey is inevitably destined for conflict. Which of God’s gifts have not we corrupted in some way? Nevertheless the church is not the ‘guardian’ either of art or science, like minor children en route to maturity, even though in our own time we have seen the world which lies in the wicked one take them over. Further, it is right that each of us engage our abilities and gifts in any of these areas of life which a kindly Providence opens up for us. Nor should the devout believer scorn the developments of the arts, sciences and the like among unbelievers, however cautious in embracing them. I cite a famous passage of John Calvin’s commentary on Genesis 4:21, 22, which reports that art and science arose first among the descendants of Cain, the rebel, not of Seth whose sons called on the name of the Lord (Gen. 4:26).

[T]he liberal arts and sciences have descended to us from the heathen [ancient Greeks and Romans]. We are, indeed, compelled to acknowledge that we have received astronomy, and the other parts of philosophy, medicine, and the order of civil government from them. Nor is it to be doubted, that God has thus liberally enriched them with excellent favours that their impiety might have the less excuse. We admire the riches of his favour.

Calvin goes on to say:

[A]lthough the invention of the harp [by Cain's family], and of similar instruments of music, may minister to our pleasure, rather than to our necessity, still it is to be thought not altogether superfluous; much less does it deserve in itself to be condemned, unless it be combined with the fear of God, and with the common benefit of society. But such is the nature of music, that it can be adapted to the offices [service] of religion, and made profitable to men ... Finally, Moses, in my opinion, intends to teach that the race flourished in various and pre-eminent endowments, which would both render it inexcusable, and would prove most evident testimonies of the divine goodness [in created endowments].²⁴

As civilization has developed and channels of the expression of human creative ability have multiplied mankind has usually claimed credit for it. For 200 years random evolution by some material law of progress (or logic, as in the case of science) has been given credit for these advances. Deductivists, empiricists, behaviorists, idealists and similar have explained it all by their favorite theories, and after doing so have usually in recent times sought to make each a department of government. They have no better way to explain and to exploit the behavior of people in society.

To the contrary, Scripture traces these developments into the created nature of mankind and their environment. The Reformers and later Christian biblical theologians taught that God placed before man in the Genesis revelation and in his nature 'ordinances for practical societal institutions, such as the church as an institution, the state, the school, university and industry ... there is no one social institution such as the state of which the others are merely parts'.²⁵

This is close to Luther's teaching that all human activity 'is both established and limited by God's creative [emphasis added] will ... [It is] nothing else than a form of readiness to receive God's gifts'.²⁶ Luther wrote:

Man must and ought to work, ascribing his sustenance and the fulness of his house, however, not to his own labor but solely to the goodness and blessing of God ... God wants the glory as the one who alone gives the growth ... And so we find that all our labor is nothing more than the finding and collecting of God's gifts; it [our labour] is quite unable to create or preserve anything.²⁷

I cited Calvin's comments on the independent authority of musicians to make music unfettered by rules supplied by science or 'religion', and the like, as exemplary, first, of his outlook on liberal arts (which he mentions) and, second, of his outlook on all human gifts, powers, 'talents' as we say today.

All, however, was to be subject to all divinely revealed truth. He held that civil government should protect the church and (in a Christian commonwealth such as Geneva) should support it.²⁸

Spiritually discerning Christians will be on guard not to follow the world's enticement into doubtful and unrighteous channels in these quite proper areas of human activity, especially as currently organized, sometimes under government sponsorship. I cite Abraham Kuyper's telling remarks about the membership in the social organizations (labor, political, etc.) which modern society creates to support their agenda.

In mixing socially danger always lurks for Christians. One so easily allows the law to be laid down by society and its worldly forms. What society can get away with Christians too can so easily permit. One floats on a stream to which one can offer no resistance. And consciously one exchanges the principle of the Christian life for the unpurified principle of worldly society.²⁹

Kuyper's concluding remarks stand as a stark rebuke to conducting any lawful enterprise according to corrupt worldly standards and against drifting with the currents in the worldly organizations we may be inclined to join.

The spirit at work in such principally unbelieving social organizations is so alluring and contagious that almost none of us, once he enters into such company, can offer resistance to it. One absorbs this godless spirit without suspecting it. Especially so because one is a part of such organizations, one sees one's Christian principles doomed to silence.³⁰

The Method of God in Creation

We live in an age that likes to think of itself as scientific. Science is interested in methods, so people want to know how God created the world. Did He do it all at once? Once He created matter and energy did the rest develop by laws He created with the matter and energy? By virtue of the nature of the case these questions cannot be answered for certain.

Firstly, creation out of nothing was a supernatural event. Since there was as yet no order of nature it might be better to say, a non-natural event. Once all the 'natural' causes for an event are explained it ceases to be a supernatural event and loses its force as one.

Secondly, try as the astronomers, geologists and physicists may, they can never know how God created. There are several competing 'scientific' models of creation. However one decides to interpret the six days of the Genesis creation-narrative, it is very clear that God ended the work of creating things when the epoch was over. According to Genesis 2:1-3, God rested (ceased) from the now finished work of creation.

VII. What Revelation says about Method and Means, Purposes and Agencies in Creating Preservation continues, but God's methods are probably different in this present work. Hence, though the scientist may learn much about present-day natural processes, he can never be quite sure they prevailed in creation—whether it took a moment, six twenty-four-hour days, or several billion years. The processes he observes now relate to God's works of preservation and of providence, not of creation. By revelation we do know several things about the methods God used in creating our world, but even what revelation tells us relates more to things modern people are not particularly curious about, even though they ought to be. These constitute the matters Christian teachers ought to enforce in our churches, rather than (I judge) theories of how or how long. Here are several of them.

1. God employed His wisdom in creating. In Proverbs 8, Wisdom (represented as a female) stands forth (vv. 3, 4) and cries, ‘The Lord possessed me at the beginning of his work, the first of his acts of old’ (v. 22). Then Wisdom claims to have been present at the various stages of creation, assisting at each juncture (vv. 27–31). Elsewhere Scripture states, ‘he ... established the world by his wisdom ... by his understanding’ (Jer. 10:12b); ‘O Lord, how manifold are your works! [creation and preservation] In wisdom have you made [creation] them all’ (Ps. 104:24). These texts are telling us the functional efficiency of the creation, including that the starry heavens testify to God the Creator’s intelligence.

2. God employed His power in creating. This seems so evident, even apart from texts which say it, that it scarcely can be doubted. David was impressed with the creative power of God, saying, ‘the sky above [i.e. the expanse of space] proclaims his handiwork’ (Ps. 19:1).

As a young pastor I personally built most of a church house with my own hands. The walls were of twelve-inch concrete blocks, each weighing in excess of sixty pounds. The size of the building was fifty-two feet by sixty-four feet. How my muscles hurt during those fourteen months! To the present day I never pass large masonry construction without silently calculating the power necessary to put the stones in place. The first time I saw the gigantic, dressed Herodian stones at Hebron—several feet in each dimension—I had to ponder them quietly for several minutes to estimate their weight. What power it took to emplace them! But God effortlessly put the lights in the expanse of heaven—the greater to rule the day, the lesser to rule the night. He made the stars also (Gen. 1:14–18) and has been, by preservation, keeping them in place ever since. ‘He ... hangs the earth on nothing’ (Job 26:7). ‘It is he who made the earth by his power’ (Jer. 10:12).

3. God employed His will in creating. The four and twenty elders of John’s vision say to God: ‘for you created all things, and by your will they existed and were created’ (Rev. 4:11). This means that the various aspects of creation are God’s execution of His own eternal decree. Will is the nearest thing that we have to creative power, as God’s only rational earth-creatures. We can create ideas in the mind without apparent reduction of energy. These ideas are, in the case of some of the more artistic of our number, the finest work we do, for the ideas are parent to works like Rembrandt’s paintings or Gutzon Borglum’s statuary or the Grand Coulee Dam.

4. God employed His word in creating. Many times the formula, ‘And God said, “Let there be” ... and there was’, appears in the familiar narrative. The Bible reader naturally connects this with Hebrews 11:3 (kjv), ‘the worlds were framed by the word of God’. Several other passages bear on the subject: ‘By the word of the Lord the heavens were made, and by the breath of his mouth all their host.... For he spoke, and it came to be; he commanded, and it stood firm’ (Ps. 33:6, 9); ‘For he commanded and they were created’ (Ps. 148:5). The word of God may be written (the Scriptures), spoken (as at Jesus’ baptism), personal (as the Son of God in John 1). There may be other senses. All derive from the familiar phenomenon of human language whereby ideas, commands, wishes and the like are communicated.

5. All three members of the Godhead co-operated in the work of creation. Some attention has already been given to the fact that the distinctions between the Three Persons of the Godhead are in part with reference to functions outside the Trinity (ad extra is the Latin phrase) rather than immanent relations within the Godhead. We know that all three of the Persons participated in the creation of the heavens and the earth, just as also in the work of redemption. Sometimes Scripture speaks simply of God as the Creator. Sometimes this way of putting things draws redemption into the sphere of what the one true God has done, with the result that both creation and redemption appear together. One such text is 2 Corinthians 4:6. Paul has been speaking of the devil, ‘the god of this world’, and of how he ‘has blinded the minds of the unbelievers’ (v. 4). Then he shows how Christ is God’s light and follows with a striking sentence joining creation and redemption to the individual persons: ‘For God, who said, “Let light shine out of darkness”, has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ’ (2 Cor. 4:6).

The Scriptures, therefore, in creation as in redemption, preserve the formula ‘of the Father’, ‘through the Son’, ‘by the Spirit’. The Father as Planner originates: ‘there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things’ (1 Cor. 8:6). The Son as Mediator effects the plan, ‘For by him [the Son] all things were created ... all things were created through him’ (Col. 1:16³¹). The Spirit of God (in the Old Testament not always clearly the Third Person) completes and operates day to day (see Gen. 1:2; Job 26:13).

6. The Bible declares that God had certain purposes in creating the world. Why did God create the world? Secularist writers of today do not concern themselves with purposes. If, as they suppose, there is no reality outside the material world, locked up in cause-effect sequences, there is no goal of the world except just to be whatever it is. An important text of Scripture speaks to the contrary: ‘The Lord has made everything for its purpose’ (Prov. 16:4). The purpose in view in this verse may be an immediate functional one, as for example, the sun to shine, eyes to see, ears to hear, fins for swimming, legs for walking. But each immediate purpose was intended to serve one ultimate, divinely intended purpose for the whole of creation. That purpose may be summed up in three short statements, each scripturally derived.

i. The ‘chief end’ of creation is God Himself, ‘For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be glory for ever. Amen’ (Rom. 11:36). God’s design is, as Paul puts it, ‘that God may be all in all’ (1 Cor. 15:28; cf. Isa. 48:11). From what we know of creativity in ourselves, we should suppose that the Maker’s own satisfaction is a primary goal in creativity, not that it is the only one.

ii. The goal of God for Himself, in creation, is the manifestation of His perfections. This is spoken of as His will, or His pleasure. James Orr pointed out that the creation of mankind had a distinct place in God’s scheme for displaying His own perfections:

Till a mind of this kind appeared, capable of surveying the scene of its existence, of understanding the wisdom and beauty displayed in its [creation’s] formations, and of utilizing for rational purposes the vast resources laid up in its treasures, the very existence of such a world as this remained an inexplicable riddle: an adequate final cause ... was not to be found in it.³²

Orr goes on to say, ‘There is a delight which creative wisdom has in its own productions, which is an end in itself. God saw the works that he had made, and behold they were good; though not until man appeared on the scene were they declared “very good” [Gen. 1:31].’³³

iii. The above paragraph must be joined to another thought for proof and development—God created the world for His own glory. All of God’s works are for this purpose. In the achievement of this goal all other goals are attained. That to achieve His own glory was God’s goal in creation is the plain truth of Scripture and is demonstrable by reason as well.

In the first place, when God purposed to create He did so before any creature existed. It must be, therefore, that the reason lay in God Himself, not in the non-existing creature. The absolute cannot be subordinate to the finite.

Secondly, God is a more worthy being than the sum of all creation. His own excellence on display is therefore more worthy than the excellence or happiness of all or some of creation. Thirdly, even among ourselves as people, the excellency of our makings and doings—be it building a better mousetrap or running a faster mile—is rightly attributed to the maker and doer. The same is surely true of God, the master Maker and Doer, and His creation.

Finally, the securing of the Creator’s glory as the ‘chief end’ not only of mankind but of all creatures, secures also their own highest good, happiness and excellence. A. H. Strong has written:

His own glory is an end which comprehends and secures, as a subordinate end, every interest of the universe. The interests of the universe are bound up in the interests of God. There is no holiness or happiness for creatures except as God is absolute sovereign, and is recognized as such. It is therefore not selfishness, but benevolence, for God to make His own glory the supreme object of creation. Glory is not vain-glory, and in expressing this ideal, that is, in expressing Himself, in His creation, he communicates to His creatures the utmost possible good.³⁴

A survey of selected Scripture passages shows that the chief end of God, not only in creation but also in His eternal decrees and government of the world, is His glory. As regards God’s ends in creation, see Colossians 1:16, Revelation 4:11 and Romans 11:36. Compare Isaiah 43:7, Isaiah 60:21 and 61:3. As regards God’s end in decrees (predestination) see Ephesians 1:5, 6, 12 and as to God’s ends in providence (government) and gracious arrangements for His creatures, see Romans 9:17, 22, 23 and Ephesians 3:10.

It is the duty of mankind and angels to adopt God’s goal as their own: ‘So, whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God’ (1 Cor. 10:31; cf. 1 Peter 4:11).

VIII. Mediate or Immediate Creation and Science

This leads to a current debate. Some very serious Christians think that when expressions like these concerning divine goals and actions are used, immediate application of divine power is always designated; secondary (as opposed to primary), mediate causes are thought to be eliminated. So the creation of the world had to be a succession of instantaneous divine ‘fiats’—literal spoken commands which without passage of time, and without employment of means of any sort, material or otherwise, effected creation. There are several recent books employing considerable display of scholarship to prove that in the texts which speak of creation by God's word (mouth, breath, command), the Bible specifically means immediate (without means), instantaneous creation and nothing else. All this must have happened not very long ago, perhaps 10,000 or 15,000 years.

It should be pointed out, however, that such has not been the view of some first rank conservative scholars from early to recent times. Many of them have thought the opposite (use of means and extended time), if not specifically indicated, is at least allowed.

Insistence that the six days of creation in Genesis 1 must be interpreted as six literal, twenty-four-hour days as we know days and nights, evenings and mornings, has not by any means been characteristic of all the great teachers or of the church of the past. It seems rather to be the child of modern controversy. Says one respected and saintly modern writer:

Respecting the length of the six creative days, speaking generally, for there was some difference of views, the patristic [church Fathers] and mediaeval exegesis makes them to be long periods of time, not days of twenty-four hours. The latter interpretation has prevailed only in the modern church [emphasis added]. Augustine teaches that the length of the six days is not to be determined by the length of our week-days. Our seven days, he says, resemble the seven days of the account in Genesis, in being in a series, and in having the vicissitudes of morning and evening... He calls attention to the fact that the 'six or seven days may be, and are called six days, God-divided days,' in distinction from 'sun-divided days.' Anselm remarks that there was a difference of opinion in his time.³⁵

Shedd adds that there is merit in the suggestion that 'the seven days of the human week are copies of the Divine week. Thus "sun-divided days" are images of "God-divided days".'³⁶

Let me try to convince the reluctant reader that God's word of creation does not necessarily mean immediate, instantaneous creation. One of the most important texts is 2 Timothy 3:16 which says all Scripture is theopneustos, literally, God-breathed. Conservative scholars everywhere accept the evidence adduced and summarized by B. B. Warfield, that the breath of God and similar expressions (command, mouth) refer simply to His creative acts. Warfield cites all the passages I have cited above and more. He also affirms that either mediate or immediate creation may be meant.³⁷

In the case of Holy Scripture we know God took about 1,500 years and must therefore have used both time and human means in addition to writing materials. At least several dozen human authors produced the sixty-six books. God's breath, command, word, mouth and similar in such contexts indicate God's creative power in action, by whatever means effected and taking as long a time as needed. The Bible really says little specifically about the means employed. On the other hand, neither does the so-called geological or astronomical record. Theories about the means and time employed will always remain just that—theories. We do not have sufficient revelation as to the means of creation and the time of it to construct a dogma about the week. It was a God-divided week, whether a sun-divided week or not is not ours to say until God says so.³⁸

It is presently the style to demonstrate this or that alleged truth by 'scientific' evidence. A system of thought called 'Creation Science' has been proposed. So efforts to prove how and when creation took place take the form of books, articles and debates on a scientific outlook on creation. But it has been futile as far as proof of how and when God did what He did. Thomas Aquinas' comment is apropos:

The will of God cannot be investigated ... But the divine will can be manifested by revelation, on which faith rests. Hence that the world began to be is an object of faith, not of demonstration or of science. And it is useful to consider this, lest anyone, presuming to demonstrate what is of faith, should bring forth reasons that are not cogent, so as to give occasion to unbelievers to laugh, thinking that on such grounds we believe things that are of faith.³⁹

Questions About Creation

There are several questions which almost must occur to those who become acquainted with the biblical view of creation. One is a philosophical question, the others a problem of Bible interpretation.

1. How can there be evil in a world which the holy God has made? The presence of sin in the world is never explained in the Bible. The serpent is there at a very early stage. We know how the human race fell into sin. It came through a wrong exercise of God-given freedom by our common father, Adam. '[S]in came into the world through one man... For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners' (Rom. 5:12, 19). Sin therefore is present and prevalent in the race through an original sinner's sin. It is therefore here by God's permission. God placed the man in the situation of trial by moral decision. But Genesis does not say a thing as to the ultimate source of sin, for though the serpent—or Satan the tempter (Rev. 12:9)—was there, he is left unexplained throughout the Bible. God himself only is uncreated. Satan exists. Therefore Satan is a created being. God's Creation is good, therefore Satan was not originally evil. Moral evil originates in a wrong exercise of freedom on the part of a moral being. So Satan is a fallen moral being. A comparison of Romans 8:20–22 with Genesis 3:16–19 shows that the physical evils of our world are related to the entrance of moral evil and both will be eradicated at the consummation. The present imperfect state is temporary.

2. How should certain details of the Genesis account be interpreted? Large volumes have been written in response to some of these questions. Some are piously speculative questions; some have to do with the literary form or forms of the several sections: Genesis 1:1, 2:4a; Genesis 2:4b–25; Genesis 3. Others, related in part to the above, are concerned with interpretation of specific words, phrases, sentences and sections. These are some of these questions: Are the days of creation literal twenty-four-hour, earthly days? And if so, why this or that (e.g. why is vegetation, which requires sunlight, a day ahead of sun and sunlight)?

3. Is there unbroken continuity in the narrative, or is the creation of heaven and earth (Gen. 1:1) a separate event from the rest of chapter 1? An unmentioned judgment has been postulated as falling between verses 1 and 2. The rest of the chapter has then been interpreted as orderly restoration of a primeval condition.

4. Might the days be days wherein God revealed the creation to Moses according to topics: light and darkness, day and night, day one, and so on, to animals and mankind, day six?

5. Might the days be ‘geological ages’ or some other taxonomic arrangement?

6. Might the days be a ‘revelatory device’, something like a series of six slide-frames whereby God makes known what He has done and showing by arrangement mankind’s importance as last, lord of earth under God and crown of God’s creation?

7. How much is literal and how much figurative? Is it historical with symbolical elements? Is it symbolical with historical elements?

These are only a few of the questions. Each generation of readers and interpreters brings its own ‘science’ and philosophy to the questions and phrases them differently. Yet the doctrine of the Genesis account of creation remains essentially the same throughout Christian history. These questions and many more like them are beyond the scope of this chapter. Suggested answers will be found in later sections of this volume. Several old and new books of theology, as well as numerous controversial monographs, essays and journal articles, argue for this or that interpretation. Meanwhile we must keep right on employing the plain scriptural data for theology. We cannot wait for the inscrutable to be scrutinized, for the imponderable to be pondered. Revelation is a miracle and so is creation. Miracles cannot be fully explained. The revelation regarding creation in the Bible is addressed to our faith by way of our minds, but it is not addressed to curiosity.

Many an earnest tour de force is presently being mounted to win our minds to ‘early earth’, ‘young earth’, ‘creation science’ and other causes by people who wish to do good. Meanwhile, important truths of revelation regarding creation are not being taught our youth in church and school, truths such as that God is Creator of all except God, Himself. All other existences began not in Him but were created ad extra by Him. God created in His wisdom, by His power, by His will, by His word. The triune God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, was active in bringing the world to existence. God created the world for Himself, to manifest His perfections for His own glory. These are some of the chief matters Scripture is concerned about. They are deeply religious truths and must be disseminated. These are the real alternatives to evolutionism, to scientism, pantheism, and indeed to humanism and secularism. These truths represent the proper arena of discussion if we are to win people’s minds to God, revealed truth and morality.

Readers are well advised to commit themselves without reserve only to the clear theological truths of Scripture revelation, likewise to the truthfulness of the chapters of Genesis and other scriptural passages on creation. Beyond that they will be wise to listen to the voices of moderation. Those who insist that we simply must agree with them or else be somewhat sub-Christian or of questionable loyalty to biblical revelation are shouting too loudly to be obeyed. It will be wise to commit ourselves irrevocably to none of the theories. Creation was supernaturally brought to pass. As such it is a divine mystery. We can never penetrate it, though we may trust all that God has said about it.⁴⁰

¹ I sought to demonstrate that the eschatological ‘new earth’ of 2 Peter 3:10–13 and the last chapters of Revelation is re-pristination of the old one in a dissertation published as Daniel and the Latter Days and later in The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People. Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1954, 1977), pp. 177–190. The Earthly Reign of Our Lord

With His People (20508 County 26, Houston, MN 55943: Vinegar Hill Press, 1999), pp. 188–200.

² John Calvin, Commentary on the Psalms vol. IV, trans. James Anderson (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1847), p. 168.

³ Descartes, Meditations III, 36 cited by Pannenberg in Systematic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), p. 49.

⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 415–419.

⁵ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology I, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), pp. 577–581.

⁶ Thomas Oden, The Living God, Systematic Theology I (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1992), p. 242.

⁷ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology II, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), p. 34.

⁸ I have already stated biblical reasons for rejecting the continued-acts of creation theory, which I shall not repeat. Pannenberg brings modern developmental theories of evolutionary development not only to his doctrine of creation but by way of the documentary-development theory of the composition of the Old Testament and to the formation and history of Israel's religion of faith in one God, the rituals, sacrificial and festival system, and the ethics of the Pentateuch and prophetic section of the Old Testament.

⁹ ibid., pp. 136–140.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 127.

¹¹ ibid., p. 119 and note 310, p. 119.

¹² ibid., p. 113.

¹³ ibid., pp. 116, 117.

¹⁴ ibid., pp. 116, 117.

¹⁵ John Calvin, Institutes III, 25.7 and I, 15.3.

¹⁶ Calvin, Institutes I, 5.1.

¹⁷ Michael Behe, Darwin's Black Box: The Biological Challenge to Evolution (New York: Free Press, 1996).

¹⁸ Phillip E. Johnson, Darwin on Trial (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2nd Ed., 1993).

¹⁹ Stanley Grenz, Renewing the Center (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 2000), p. 155.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

²⁰ See Paul Althaus' treatment of Luther's 'Theology of the Cross'. Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), pp. 23–34.

²¹ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government: A Biblical View (Edmonton, Canada: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 1975, 2000) 308 pages.

²² ibid., pp. 64–80.

²³ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics III, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975), pp. 369–531.

²⁴ John Calvin, Commentary Upon the Book of Genesis, trans. John King (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1847), pp. 218, 219.

²⁵ E. L. Hebden Taylor, Reformation or Revolution (Chatley, NJ: Craig Press, 1970), p. 320.

²⁶ Althaus, op. cit., p. 106.

²⁷ Althaus, op. cit., p. 320.

²⁸ The theology of 'sphere sovereignty' and endorsement of full participation in the created orders of human society introduced here with cautious approval is no new thought, not presently widely discussed in evangelical theological circles. The seed of these ideas is to be found in both Calvin and Luther. In slightly different language it was proposed by Helmut Thieleke and Werner Elert, both German Lutherans, and by Emil Brunner. It received fullest expression in the writings of Abraham Kuyper and Herman Dooyeweerd and has been taken up by R. J. Rushdoony and other 'Christian Reconstruction' theologians in America. Its most balanced and persuasive proponent has been E. L. Hebden Taylor.

²⁹ Abraham Kuyper, Pro Rege, Vol III, pp. 189–191 as cited by E. L. Hebden Taylor in The Christian Philosophy of Law, Politics and the State (Nutley, NJ: Craig Press, 1966), p. 603.

³⁰ op. cit., p. 191.

³¹ See also John 1:3, 10; Heb. 1:2, 10.

³² James Orr, The Christian View of God and the World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1947), p. 135.

³³ ibid., p. 135.

³⁴ A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 400.

³⁵ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969), p. 475, 476.

³⁶ ibid., p. 477.

³⁷ B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1958), pp. 243–296.

³⁸ See the section, 'Questions About Creation', below.

³⁹ Summa Theologica, 46.2.1.

⁴⁰ Since writing the above I have carefully read and added to a long shelf of my reading on this subject a very insightful book by Harry L. Poe, an evangelical theologian, and Jimmy H. Davis, an evangelical chemistry professor, Science and Faith: An Evangelical Dialogue (Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman Publishers, 2000). Apparently quite independent of anything I have said or written about creation, the creative week and present processes of nature, they have reached conclusions similar to mine and have carried them further. Their relating the same to quantum theories, chaos theory, etc. is instructive. I disagree with their somewhat hesitant theory of continuous creation.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (152). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

19

The World of Unseen Spirits: Their Place in Creation

'[B]y him all things were created ... visible and invisible' (Col. 1:16)

Interest in Angels and Demons

In the recent past I made a special effort to gather a select, working library of worthwhile books on the subject of this chapter. I am still puzzled by something I found out rather quickly: the publishing lists are well supplied with books on demons, witches, Satan, and other real, or imagined personnel of the dark side of the unseen world, but only a very few currently on the subject of God's messengers, the angels. Yet the Bible mentions angels well over 250 times, over half in the New Testament.

Angels have not attracted much interest among many recent writers. For example, Lewis and Demarest in a sound work and generally thorough treatment¹ make only passing remarks about angels. Neither angels nor Satan appear in the index of A. E. McGrath's Christian Theology,² and R. L. Reymond's *A New Systematic Theology*³ has only three or four paragraphs on Satan and no discussion of demons or angels at all. A few generations back it was thought necessary to devote a considerable amount of scripturally related discussion to this subject in an adequate textbook of theology. A. H. Strong devoted twenty-four densely packed pages⁴ and H. C. Thiessen's lectures⁵ have a fine discussion.

Peter L. Berger wrote at a time when general scholarly interest in the supernatural was nil and a fad prevailed among leftist theologians proclaiming 'God is Dead' (I shall not cite their dead books). Writing as a sociologist⁶ he felt his intent might be misunderstood by readers, so he wrote a sequel of sorts: A Rumor of Angels: Modern Society and the Rediscovery of the Supernatural. He maintained that only through belief in the supernatural (including angels, perhaps) can mankind grasp 'the true proportions of his experience'. Berger is a sensitive and wise man—to a point. But his book did not presage a recovery of Christianity quite so much as of occultism. When I finished reading the book about 1968, I wrote on the dust cover: 'In this God equals transcendence: signals of transcendence [hence "rumor of angels"] replaces revelation; man discovers replaces God reveals. Worship is only a gesture of hope toward transcendence. The historical Jesus is not the Christ in any unique sense, and the author puts his own amateur judgment far above either Scripture or theology. Even so his book is an excellent argument for the supernatural (including angels). Mortimer Adler would approve. It is an important book.'

Dialectical and existential theologians are an exception to the general neglect of angels and demons in theology. They do not, however, develop a theology of this subject from the Bible. John Macquarrie believes in a hierarchy of spiritual beings superior to mankind but the angels of traditional theology 'belong to the mythology and poetry of religion rather than theology'.⁷ Karl Barth, for whom 'the reality of nothingness' explains demons and evil angels, strongly affirms the biblical idea of angels must be restricted simply to the 'existence' of messengers or ambassadors, plenipotentiaries of God. But we know no more about the subject than this. He does not hesitate to say 'myth' and 'saga' account for some Bible stories of angels. Whatever we do, we must not construct a dogma or theology of angels by synthesizing and organizing the data of Scripture about angels, as he acknowledges orthodoxy before him has always done.⁸ In process of his negative dogmatics, however, Barth has produced valuable information on the history of the subject. Emil Brunner—as usual plain and to the point—assigns the biblical stories of angels to 'the outskirts of Biblical truth, e.g. in apocalyptic passages or in those which are evidently legendary in character'.⁹ Like Barth,

Brunner thinks there are good spiritual beings beyond our sight that mediate God's will and work on earth and affect human beings in unseen ways—and also evil powers, perhaps yet to be discovered by depth psychology. But as for a theology of angels derived from literal understanding of Scripture: '[W]e must be ready to admit that even the Biblical writers were children of their own day and that the world from which they derived their ideas has no authority for our faith.'¹⁰ Per contra, here is a better respect for our predecessors' claims, in the language of A. H. Strong, a theologian at least as informed as Brunner:

There is certainly the possibility that the ascending scale of created beings does not reach the highest point in man. As the distance between man and the lowest forms of life is filled with numberless gradations of being, so it is possible that between man and God there exist creatures of higher than human intelligence. The possibility is turned to certainty by the express declarations of Scripture.¹¹

A fine fairly recent book on angels by Mortimer Adler, a famous scholar, has not sold very well though one by Billy Graham, a famous evangelist, is fairly widely read. On the other hand a rather sober book on Satan by a popular Christian writer¹² has been eagerly bought by many, I am told. Perhaps good news is less interesting than bad news. Similarly, a somewhat irresponsible and vagrant uncle will often be more colourful and hence more interesting to his nephews than his more upright and conventional brother. 'Demonology' has, however, been a vastly overworked and overwrought subject in a rash of popular books recently. More about this later.

The Importance of Angels in Scripture

Though we live in a world of things seen and heard, there is about us another world of unseen spirits. When Elisha's fearful servant said, 'Alas, my master! What shall we do?' Elisha prayed, '“O Lord, please open his eyes that he may see.”' So the Lord opened the eyes of the young man ... and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire all round Elisha' (2 Kings 6:15, 16). Unseen to us are all these benign forces. Perhaps it would be better to say that in our world we are not able to observe all the many invisible personal beings who affect our lives. In several very exalted Pauline rhetorical flights in the New Testament, the world of malign, unseen, created spirits is squarely before the thoughtful Bible reader. One of these urges: 'Put on the whole armour of God, that you may be able to stand against the schemes of the devil. For we do not wrestle against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the cosmic powers over this present darkness, against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places' (Eph. 6:11, 12).

Evidently to help his readers avoid any worship of these spirits, Paul wrote of Christ's victory at the cross as a triumph over certain of these spirits. He says Christ at Calvary not only rendered legalistic rules obsolete but 'He disarmed the rulers and authorities and put them to open shame, by triumphing over them in him' (Col. 2:15). Near the end of his great eighth chapter of Romans Paul mentions angels, principalities and powers as possible opponents (Rom. 8:38). They are not of the natural order (flesh and blood); they are spiritual and wicked; they rule the dark world; they are in high places; they are princes (principalities) and have great power. They have been conquered by Christ, but are nevertheless to be conquered by us only when we employ the whole panoply of spiritual armour—truth, righteousness, the gospel of peace, faith, salvation, the Spirit, the Word and prayer (Eph. 6:13–18). As for the holy angels—Jesus informed some of His disciples there are ‘legions’ of them.

The Pauline summaries all relate to evil spirit-beings. Paul’s Epistles furnish no similar summaries regarding good unseen spirits, who aid rather than oppose the Christian. From Genesis to Revelation almost always they are incidental to the Bible narrative and doctrine. Perhaps Paul was relying on the prevalence of angels in the biblical narrative to inform his readers.

A Preliminary View

All of these beings are represented as personal spirits. They frequently appear as men, apparently dressed according to the styles of the times. Apart from this, all visual representations of them in imagination, art and statuary are without foundation (except possibly the seraphs and cherubs). Though uniformly referred to in Scripture by pronouns in masculine gender, they are specifically said to be without sexual feature or function. The wings almost always appearing in pictures of angels are without scriptural foundation, except for a certain class of beings called seraphs (Isa. 6:1 ff.) who may or may not be angels. So it is wise to start with the Bible and engage in no discourse or speculation about angels until it has been pretty well canvassed.

Beliefs about Angels in Late Pre-Christian Judaism

Raphael Patai, an eminent contemporary Jewish authority on the beliefs of ancient Jews has written:

From the first century B.C.E. [bc] the Messiah was the central figure in the Jewish myth of the future. The Jewish messianic mythographers know and expound in minute detail the acts of all the protagonists of the great drama that will unfold in the End of the Days. And more than that; they present verbatim transcripts of the dialogues and discussions that will take place between and among God, the two Messiahs, the prophet Elijah, the people of Israel, the pious and the wicked, the nations of the world, God and Magog, the satanic Arimilus, the archangels Michael and Gabriel, the ministering angels, Samael the Satan, and even the earth, the mountains and the waters ... They recount, not unlike the all-informed modern novelist, what the actors in the cosmic drama of the future will feel ... all are presented in elaborate and often astounding detail.¹³

The first Book of Enoch, though known to the church Fathers, was lost to the world until restored to circulation in the nineteenth century. It is quoted in the New Testament (Jude 14). This was evidently current literature in the first century bc and not only contributed to unhealthy interest in unseen spirits but also contributed to fantastic elaboration of their activities among our Lord’s immediate ancestors. In the history told by Emil Schürer we learn additional names of several angels: Raphael, Phanuel, Uriel and how with the aid of angels Enoch was transported throughout all time and through the whole universe.¹⁴

This unhealthy preoccupation with an occult doctrine of angels is not reflected in the New Testament, but rather corrected—as is fantastic interpretation of prophecy by Jewish non-biblical apocalypse.¹⁵

Angelology in Patristic and Medieval Times

Already in New Testament times, for good reason, Paul warned both Jewish and Gentile readers against ‘worship of angels’ (Col. 2:18). Unlearned Jewish Christians no doubt brought with them some of the fantastic superstitions of low-grade Judaism of the time and converts from heathenism came with the baggage of superstition about unseen spirits, good and bad. That in the fourth century, worship of angels was practised by ignorant Christians is witnessed by a canon of a synod of Laodicea (sometime between 343 and 381) forbidding such as idolatrous, and that this persisted into the fifth century is revealed by a canon of the Fourth Ecumenical Council (Chalcedon 451) which ‘declared ecumenical’ the canons of Laodicea. I am indebted to Henry Alford¹⁶ for the exact wording: ‘It is not fitting that Christians should ... call on angels, and make celebrations to them in unlawful ways. If therefore anyone be found employed in this covert idolatry, let him be accursed, insasmuch as he is a denier of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and a pervert to idolatry.’ The movement was not stifled for worship of angels and ‘saints’ was a corruption remaining to be corrected by the Reformation of the sixteenth century and has not even yet been fully removed from Roman Catholic popular religion. Even the Catechism of 1984 (paragraph 2502) preserves an official form of angel-worship (called ‘adoration’) in the following and other words about ‘Sacred art’, ‘This spiritual beauty of God is reflected in the most holy Virgin Mother of God, the angels, and saints. Genuine sacred art draws man to adoration.’

As children of their times, some of the early Fathers blundered into some unbiblical angelology. With the best of intentions, for example Justin—martyr and apologist—thought he was silencing the pagan charges of ‘atheism’ by this atrocious statement: ‘But both Him [Father God], and the Son (who came forth from Him ... and the host of the other good angels) ... and the prophetic Spirit, we worship and adore ... as we have been taught’ (Apology I, 6, ANF I, 164). On the other hand there was the clear condemnation of worship of angels by the local synod of Laodicea and the Ecumenical Council of Chalcedon.

This ambivalent attitude was nurtured by a spurious document known as The Celestial Hierarchy falsely attributed by its author to one of Paul’s converts, Dionysius the Areopagite (Acts 17:34), about ad 500. This fraudulent work was not exposed until the Renaissance, and though despised as disgusting by the Reformers, was not acknowledged as fraudulent by the Roman Church for another century. At one time this ‘Pseudo-Dionysius’ was in the Roman calendar of saints.¹⁷ This work both created and supported notions of a world of angelic hierarchy (nine orders of them), their powers and influences, though utterly without foundation, to be reflected in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the Roman Church. What was really going on was a successful effort to incorporate certain features of Neoplatonism into Christianity, as was set forth in Dionysius’ second book, The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy.¹⁸

The Scriptural Doctrine

Angels are designated only part of the time by Hebrew malakh, and Greek angelos renders angel but meaning ‘messenger’—whether of God or of other men. They are also called ‘men’ for they had the appearance of men (Gen. 18:12ff.); ‘watchers’ (Dan. 4:13), evidently because they observe human behaviour; ‘holy ones’ (Dan. 4:13; Jude 14), because of their ordinary presence near God (see Matt. 18:10); ‘sons of God’ (Job 38:7), perhaps because they are each God’s immediate creation (not a race of beings genetically related) or because they are part of God’s celestial retinue.¹⁹ Delitzsch combines these explanations.²⁰

Angels seem to be called ‘sons of gods’ (bene Ælim) in Psalm 89:6. The passage is obscure. Verses 6 and 7 are saying that God is revered in His heavenly court. Calvin says that the title is ‘given to angels because neither have their origin from earth, nor are clothed with a corruptible body ... a greater majesty shines forth in the angels than in other creatures’ (Commentary on Ps. 89:6). ‘[A]ngels of God’ are called ‘God’s camp’ or ‘army’ in Genesis 32:1, 2—a conception common to many passages of Scripture. In many other texts, the host (or army, in modern English) of Israel is the Lord’s host (see Josh. 5:13–15, where a ‘man’ is a manifestation of Jehovah Himself).

Angels are once only said to be ‘ministering spirits’ for the heirs of salvation (Heb. 1:14) and because of the high position of some, called ‘princes’ (Dan. 10:13), and for a similar reason, some (apparently evil angelic spirits) are ‘principalities and powers’.²¹

Only two angels of the Bible have ‘personal’ names—Michael (Dan. 10:13; Rev. 12:7, who is like God?) and Gabriel (Dan. 8:16; 9:21; Luke 1:19, man of God). This does not prove each angel has a name. The king over the apocalyptic ‘locusts’ from the abyss is said to be named ‘Perdition’—to translate abaddon and apollyon—which seems to be an allegorical kind of name, not necessarily personal.

It should be noted that much of the above is extracted from apocalyptic passages where truth is prevalently conveyed by symbols. One is cautioned against extracting overmuch strict doctrinal theology from these names and other designations.

The Bible also mentions cherubim (plural of ‘cherub’) and seraphim (plural of ‘seraph’), as well as demons, evil spirits and Satan (= the devil).

There is no clear information whether the single and most common generic name, angel (Heb. mal’akh, Gr. angelos), meaning ‘messenger’, applies to all of them or not. Several respected modern authorities treat all as angels (Strong, A. Hodge, C. Hodge, Pieper, Mueller). In fact, this is the general rule.

The Origin of Angels

We are not left to general inferences as to the origin of these beings, for we read in Scriptures, ‘by him [Christ, the Son of God] all things were created, in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or rulers or authorities—all things were created through him and for him’ (Col. 1:16; cf. 1 Peter 3:22). At least one other text is just as plain, ‘Praise him, all his angels.... For he commanded and they were created’ (Ps. 148:2, 5). They were created previous to the creation of the universe, for they ‘shouted for joy’ when that happened (Job 38:7). Outside of areas where Christianity has long been prevalent, it is news to people that there is only one eternal, immortal Spirit (1 Tim. 3:16) and that all others have been created by Him and are under His control. It is for this reason that angels, demons and Satan usually appear under the rubric, ‘the works of God: creation’, in theological literature. Calvin’s quaint comment on Psalm 34:7 (‘The angel of the Lord encamps around those who fear him, and delivers them’) is both relevant and comforting: ‘However great the number of our enemies and the dangers by which we are surrounded may be, yet the angels of God, armed with invincible power, constantly watch over us, and array themselves on every side to aid and deliver us from all evil.’²² While the Scriptures give no definite figures as to how many angels God created we are informed there were very many of them.²³

The Nature of Angels

It is equally certain that these beings (specifically angels) are intelligent, voluntary agents. They function as persons in the modern sense of that word. The angel who appeared to Peter (Acts 12:7–10) functioned in every way as a human person would, tapping him awake, raising him up, speaking instructions, leading him out of a building into a street. They are said to have wisdom (2 Sam. 14:20) and they have moral character, being either holy (Mark 8:28) or sinful (2 Peter 2:4). This does not mean they are a superior order of human beings, even though like us they are rational spirits. The Epistle to Hebrews, in describing the classes of residents of the heavenly Jerusalem, specifies ‘innumerable angels ... gathering’ distinct from ‘the spirits of the righteous [just men kjv] made perfect’ (Heb. 12:22, 23).

There is disagreement as to whether or not angels are corporeal beings. They are called ‘spirits’, a word used sometimes to designate the souls of people after death (1 Peter 3:19). We also know that angels have no sexual parts or functions, for Jesus made this known in some comments about eunuchs and celibacy (Luke 20:34–36; Mark 12:25). They are therefore not a race propagated from a single original pair as the human race. They must have been created separately. They are also said to be deathless (Luke 20:36) even though God ‘alone has immortality’ in the highest sense (1 Tim. 6:16). They are not ‘flesh and blood’ (Eph. 6:12). When they appear in Scripture narrative they sometimes look like men and sometimes eat food, lodge and speak as men do, being mistaken for them (Gen. 18:8; 19:3).²⁴ Occasionally an angel appears as a man with frightening, glorious appearance (Dan. 10:5, 6; Judg. 13:3, 6, 10, 11) and performs in some amazing way (Judg. 13:19). Sometimes they come in ‘swift flight’ (Dan. 9:21)—by what means we do not know—and sometimes angels are tardy (Dan. 10:13).

It seems clear that angels belong in a realm (call it spiritual, supernatural, eschatological) where body and form exist (witness Christ’s glorified body) and truly exist, but not in the same mode as that in which we flesh-and-blood people do. In His resurrected body Jesus could masticate food (Luke 24:41, 42) and He had ‘flesh and bones’ (Luke 24:39). Yet it was a ‘spiritual body’ in which he ascended to heaven and will come again. Some of the finest theologians suggest that angels have bodies similar to the risen body of Jesus, others that they are pure spirits who assume bodies for specific reasons. The question arises later in this chapter in connection with ‘the sons of God’ of Genesis 6. The question should be left open.

The Relative Position of Angelic Beings

As a class of intelligent, spirit-beings angels are different from either God or mankind. They are ‘all ministering spirits’ (Heb. 1:14; cf. v. 7; and Ps. 104:4). People are spiritual beings too, but angel spirits are inferior to mankind in order of being in some respects, since they have been designated by God for the service of the heirs of salvation, as Hebrews 1:14, cited above, goes on to say.

On the other hand they are in some other respect superior to mankind. Peter compares them with human beings—certain false teachers—and says, ‘angels, though greater in might and power, do not pronounce a blasphemous judgment against them’ (2 Peter 2:11; cf. v. 1). Evidently it is in knowledge and power that they are superior to us. Jesus spoke of them as having great knowledge—‘concerning that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven’ (Matt. 24:36)—and Peter in a message just cited, speaks of their ‘might and power’.

They are, however, of limited knowledge and power. They are not divine beings. In another place Peter speaks of them as seekers after information (1 Peter 1:12). Two passages inform us that they do not know as much as God knows (Matt. 24:36; Mark 13:32). These facts—that they are more powerful and of greater knowledge than mankind yet strictly limited in knowledge and power, incomparably inferior to God—explain both why some people have been tempted to worship them (see Col. 2:18) and why it is wrong to do so. This is enforced by still another revealed fact; people shall be their judges at some future time. Paul says, in a passage designed to convince believers of their competence to ‘judge’ matters of congregational controversy, ‘Do you not know that we are to judge angels? How much more, then, matters pertaining to this life!’ (1 Cor. 6:3).

Ranks, Organization and Dignity Among Angels

While on the subject of their rank in relation to God and mankind it is appropriate to raise the question of ranks among themselves. Are there ranks and orders of angels?²⁵ The Reformers vociferously repudiated any elaborate hierarchy of angels (Calvin, Institutes I, 1.4 and 8). In the democratic atmosphere of modern Western countries, wherein one president in recent history was an ‘Ike’ and another a ‘Jimmy’, and where manners, dress and language tell us very little about social position, this question may not occur without prompting. Yet democracy as it exists in America is almost without precedent and is of recent development there. As to angels—we read of an archangel (1 Thess. 4:16; Jude 9), and of thrones, dominions, principalities, powers and such like (Eph. 1:21; Col. 2:15). One of them is a chief prince (Dan. 9:21; Luke 1:19, 26; 1 Thess. 4:16). Some are said to stand in the presence of God (Luke 1:19). So, though we do not know exactly what their lines of authority and positions of honor are, we know there are such. We also know that angels pay respect to these positions of honor (see Jude 9).

We should add to this picture of rank (1) that however the notion of equality be interpreted (‘self-evident that all men are created equal’) it does not mean that all people are equal in authority in relation to one another. Society could not operate in such a case. (2) Neither should any elaborate structure of authority among a ‘celestial hierarchy’ be accepted except as directly derived from Scripture. Calvin, with some sarcasm, contrasted the garrulous nonsense of Dionysius ‘whoever he was’ with ‘Paul, who had been caught up beyond the third heaven [2 Cor. 12:2], not only said nothing about it, but also testified that it is unlawful for any man to speak of the secret things he has seen [2 Cor 12:4]. Therefore, bidding farewell to that foolish wisdom, let us examine in the simple teaching of Scripture what the Lord would have us know of angels’ (Institutes I, 14.4).

Activities of Angels and Their work

We may be sure that in any God-ordered society (see 1 Cor. 11:2, 34; 14:33, 40) position and rank will serve useful purposes—the doing of work being one of them. What do angels do? (At this point we are thinking only of good angels.) A search of the Scriptures on this matter turns up a truly amazing mass of information. Angels are mentioned in about 275 passages of Scripture in at least seventeen Old Testament books and in seventeen of the New. One of my theology professors, the late Alva J. McClain, organized this material and found no less than thirty-four specific kinds of work in three special and several general categories.

Though long lists of Bible verses do not appeal to readers—it slows us down to look up the verses—the nature of this subject requires some such lists and I therefore submit some here, hoping that readers will not be daunted by them and will inform themselves by searching them out. In the texts we are about to cite the word ‘angels’ does not always appear, for these beings go by a number of names, descriptions, epithets and the like. Even ‘angel’ is not always the name of a class of beings, for, as we saw, the word simply means ‘messenger’ and is used of both ‘men and things’ (Mal. 3:1; Luke 7:24; 2 Cor. 12:7) as well as the beings we call angels. Other designations appear to be sons of God (Job 1:6; 38:1–7), men (Gen. 18:2), watcher and holy ones (Dan. 4:13, 17, 23; cf. Jude 14), God’s host, or army (Josh. 5:14, 15), sons of the mighty (Ps. 89:6). They are also called spirits and ministers of God (Heb. 1:7; see Ps. 104:4 and Heb. 1:14). Also, they are designated by the ranks they hold—principalities, powers and such.

Regular Services of Angels

We discover that in a general way angels occupy their time (Is there time in heaven?) in at least six kinds of service to God on a regular basis, perhaps constantly.

(1) Angels praise God (Ps. 148:1, 2).

(2) They worship Him (Ps. 29:1, 2; see p. 00).

Moreover, (3) they rejoice in His work (Job 38:6, 7).

Regrettably, these activities will neither please nor inspire many modern people accustomed to advertising ‘hype’ for various novel ways to be entertained. Yet all the great saints whose lives we know in detail, gloried in these activities. These three related activities are mentioned in various ways. John writes of seven spirits before God’s throne (Rev. 1:4). Though these may symbolize the Third Person of the Godhead, we do know that certain angels do stand in God’s presence (Luke 1:19). If the seraphs of Isaiah 6:1 ff. are considered angels, worship is clearly involved. Other passages are specific (Ps. 148:1, 2; Ps. 29:1, 2; Job 38:6, 7). The Job passage indicates that angels (‘sons of God’) were created long before mankind was and therefore were present to praise God and rejoice in God’s creative activity.

(4) Psalm 103:19–22 says that God has a universal kingdom and broadly suggests that in this kingdom His messengers (the Hebrew word used is the standard one rendered ‘angels’) do His bidding as ministers of state, so to speak, executing God’s commandments: ‘ministers, who do his will ... in all places of his dominion’ (Ps. 103:20–22). All governments, both good and bad, require services of this kind.

(5) Paul once suggests that angels are spectators of earthly affairs, especially apostolic work (1 Cor. 4:9) and of human government, as the name ‘watcher’ (Dan. 4:13, 17, 23) clearly implies.

(6) Angels compose a heavenly court or council—sometimes portrayed also as a retinue. Scripture must not be bent to teach that the invisible things of God’s immediate presence in the heaven of His special, permanent manifestation, is literally portrayed just as it actually appears in the several passages of Scripture which say such things. We do not know to what extent scriptural revelation accommodated heavenly things to the ideas of the proper structure of a monarchial court and government prevalent among Israel and their ancient neighbours.

John’s vision of God’s court in heaven is of a throne on which One sits on a magnificent throne, immediately surrounded by seven spirits and four cherub-like ‘living creatures’ and, more remotely, by many angels around the throne and, still more remotely, by ‘every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth and in the sea’ (Rev. 4 and 5), which seems to represent the whole universe in worshipful attendance. Throughout the rest of the book all the dramatic action flows from that scene. It is not parable, allegory or even prophecy as ordinarily considered, but apocalypse—a way of representing literal truths but not every feature of which is literally intended.

The same may be true of other representations of an angelic heavenly ‘host’ or ‘council’ or ‘entourage’.

How God’s ‘court’ of angels fits in with a ‘periodic’ assembly of ‘the sons of God’ including at least one evil ‘son of God’, Satan—Job’s adversary and ours—is hard to say. We will have to await better information.

Angels in Service of Christ

Though Christ as God and Creator of angels (John 1:1–3) is above angels (Heb. 1) in His incarnation, He is ‘for a little while’ lower than angels. Angels are prominently mentioned in connection with the coming and career of Christ as assisting and attending Him. An angel predicted His birth (Matt. 1:20; Luke 1:26–38) as well as the birth of the forerunner, John (Luke 1:11–20). Later, angels announced Jesus’ birth (Luke 2:8–14). Not long afterward an angel warned Jesus’ parents of the evil intent of King Herod (Matt. 2:13).

Angels attended Christ to aid Him at the beginning of His ministry in order to minister to Him (Matt. 4:11) and again near the end (Luke 22:43) to strengthen Him. It may be significant that though He could have called upon ‘legions of angels’ to help at any time (Matt. 26:53), there is no mention in the Gospels of their giving Him aid during the period of public ministry, except at the end of the temptations by the devil and during the agony of Gethsemane. In the latter case it may have been to assist Him physically to survive until the trials and crucifixion could take place. Angels likewise had services to perform at the time of the resurrection (Matt. 28:2, 5, 6) and possibly at His ascension to heaven, for the ‘cloud’ which ‘took him out of their sight’ may have been a ‘crowd’ of angels. So contend some sober scholars. Angels are presently devoted to the praise and worship of our Lord (Rev. 5:11, 12). He will come again ‘in the clouds,’ attended by angels ‘in the same way’ as the apostles saw Him go (Matt. 25:31; 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; Acts 1:9–11; Jude 14).

His Second Advent will be accompanied by much angelic activity. In addition to the aforementioned attendance at His coming parousia (arrival), the establishment of His kingdom will be effected, in part, by angelic work. Specifically, angels shall, in a police-like action, gather unclean things and unclean, unqualified persons out of the world. In interpreting His own parable of the tares, Jesus stated, 'The Son of Man will send his angels, and they will gather out of his kingdom all causes of sin and all law-breakers, and throw them into the fiery furnace. In that place there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth' (Matt. 13:41, 42).

Angels in Executing Providence

Angels have some kind of special place in God's providential rule over the nations. God has an interest in national fortunes. He has decreed the bounds of national habitation, the rise and fall of the rulers of nations and the course of their histories (Ps. 24:1; Isa. 40:15; Rom. 13:1). God uses angels in the execution of His will for them.

The great A. B. Davidson, one of the editors of the Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, wrote: 'The Old Testament assumes the existence of Jehovah's retinue. The God of Israel is above all things a living God, who influences the affairs of the world and men and rules them. If He uses agents they are supplied by the "ministers" that surround Him.'²⁶ He goes on to trace the 'heavenly host' or court through the whole Old Testament.²⁷ The book of Daniel is especially interesting in this regard. In a frightening dream Nebuchadnezzar (according to his own report) learned that God's watchers, or holy ones, decreed his (Nebuchadnezzar's) rise and fall and restoration (Dan. 4, esp. v. 17). In Daniel's vision, received during the third year of Cyrus the Great of Persia (Dan. 10:1), Daniel learned that there was an angelic prince designated for the kingdom of Persia (10:13), another for Greece (10:20) and still another for Israel (10:21; cf. 11:1). Some of these angels seem to be satanically assigned.

An age like ours vacillates between a strictly naturalistic, cause-effect, laws-of-nature outlook and a strange predilection for astrology, magic and the occult. These insights from Daniel, therefore, both repel and attract. In any case, Christians must accept them into their world-view, as did Elisha and his servant during the siege of Samaria. '[T]he servant said, "Alas, my master! What shall we do?" He [Elisha] said, "Do not be afraid, for those who are with us are more than those who are with them." Then Elisha prayed and said, "O Lord, please open his eyes" ... So the Lord opened the eyes of the young man ... and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire all round Elisha' (2 Kings 6:15–17). God always has to 'babble' to us, as Calvin says; that is, He adapts His revelation to our level of understanding and perceptual modes of understanding. The supernatural protectors of Elisha were neither ancient war chariots nor twentieth-century artillery pieces. They were and are real, however, more real than any objects of natural sensation. We know God's angels are there. They are for us. Let us therefore 'look not to the things that are seen but to the things that are unseen'.

The first book of the Bible and the last represent angels as God's messengers and instruments of both providential judgments now and final judgment hereafter. Angels announced the destruction of Sodom both to Abraham (Gen. 18) and to Lot (Gen. 19). They shall pour out the bowls of God's judgment on mankind in the coming 'wrath of God ... on the earth' (Rev. 16:1–12). They shall bind the devil and incarcerate him at the beginning of the millennium (Rev. 20:1–3).

The Ministry of Angels to God's People

It is a matter of great importance to Christians to know that angels have a special function in God's care of believers. We have already noted how an angel rescued Peter from prison. ‘Are they not all ministering spirits sent out to serve for the sake of those who are to inherit salvation?’ (Heb. 1:14).

Whether each Christian has an angel assigned to him, or to each child, or to each church, as has been inferred from certain texts (Matt. 18:3, 10; Heb. 1:14; Rev. 1:20), is doubtful. Calvin devoted an interesting and instructive paragraph on the subject of guardian angels which set a standard for about all said since (Institutes I, 14.7). But we do know that all of God’s angels are working for us.

They are interested in our efforts in missionary evangelism and aid in securing the physical safety of the messengers (Acts 5:19; 12:7–10). Calvin drew from the Old Testament a startling case wherein an angel defended a whole city to deliver its inhabitants from annihilation by the excellent military power of antiquity, saying: ‘Thus to fulfill the task of protecting us the angels fight against the devil and all our enemies, and carry out God’s vengeance against those who harm us. As we read, the angel of God, to lift the siege of Jerusalem, slew 185,000 in the camp of the king of Assyria in a single night [2 Kings 19:35; Isa. 37:36]’ (Institutes I, 14.6).

Angels are present in some mysterious way, to help at the time of death, as may be inferred from the fact Michael would not let the devil disturb the grave of Moses, whom God Himself had buried (Deut. 34:6; Jude 9), and the soul of the godly beggar Lazarus was carried by angels to Abraham’s bosom (Luke 16:22). The ‘rich man’ simply died, was buried and went to ‘Hades’ (‘hell’ kjv).

These remarks by no means exhaust the teachings of Scripture about the place of angels in the divine scheme of things. Is it possible that in our modernity we have escaped something here which ought to capture us again? There should be no place in the believer’s view of reality for superstition of any kind. The steady course of nature may be trusted. Angels, good or evil, will not overturn the slightest aspect of that. But human minds are not strictly within the natural, cause-effect sequence of things (as the positivists, behaviorists, and other, modern-minded scientists seem to be telling us). God has said, ‘The angel of the Lord encamps round those who fear him, and delivers them’ (Ps. 34:7).

In the year 1943 a fine evangelist-pastor by the name of Bernard N. Schneider, now with the Lord, held a series of meetings in the church of which I was pastor. While there he told a story which he included in his book, The World of Unseen Spirits. I close this portion of the chapter with his striking story.

During the years of World War II we lived in Washington, D. C. ... On a Monday afternoon in the spring of 1941 we took a drive toward the city of Baltimore.... My wife and five-year-old daughter went along for the ride. There were no freeways and interstate roads in those days, and we drove out Blandensburg Road and old U. S. Highway 1, which was then the main road between Washington and Baltimore. When we arrived in the suburbs of Baltimore, we agreed we had gone far enough and decided to turn around. So I turned into a side street to my right at an intersection with a traffic light, turned around in the next block and came back to the intersection. The traffic light turned green for us just before we got to it, and I proceeded to make the left turn to get back on the highway toward home. Just at that moment a peculiar sensation gripped me which urged me to stop. I did not hear a voice audibly, but there was an inner voice which I can best describe as a compelling urge which said: ‘Stop.’ I did stop right in front of the green light which said: ‘Go.’ And just then a large truck came through the red light from our left at a very high rate of speed. Had I not stopped at the green light, we would likely have been three dead people in our car. What made me stop when the light said go? I do not remember of ever doing that deliberately, except on that day. I believe it was an angel from the Lord looking after us.²⁸

Mr Schneider, whom I knew very well, was a highly intelligent man, not the least prompted by silly sentiments of any kind, as far as I know.

Epochs of Manifest Angelic Activity

A bit of reflection by a reader fully conversant with all parts of the Bible will conclude that miracles were completely absent from most periods of Bible history. Leave out the story of the Exodus from Egypt, of the prophets Elijah and Elisha, and the period of our Lord’s ministry, and not many manifestly, belief-compelling supernatural events, public or private, occurred. God is always acting above, within and in spite of what people call ‘natural laws’, but in such a way that unbelief cannot or will not acknowledge it to be so. Events yet future, at the consummation of the age, will include many miraculous events. At present, however, ‘we walk by faith, not by sight’, though no believer doubts God is at work in, above and in spite of ‘nature’, whether in answer to prayer or in other ways we know not what. We endure ‘as seeing him that is invisible’, though having ‘not seen him, [we] love him’ and we acknowledge that ‘faith is ... the conviction of things not seen’.

The same is true of the manifest activity of angels. They sang at creation (Job 38:7), they appeared from time to time to the patriarchs Abraham and Jacob, and made very rare appearances at critical junctures of Israel’s history. They were active at Christ’s birth and through His passion and the early period of apostolic ministry. At the Second Advent they will be in manifest activity again.

Meanwhile, we may be sure that ‘out of sight’ they are busy today as God’s messengers and agents throughout the universe, particularly on behalf of God’s people, for ‘The angel of the Lord encamps round those who fear him, and delivers them’ (Ps. 34:7).

Satan and Evil Angels

We have postponed until this point any specific discussion of evil angels.²⁹ The Bible never makes a point of it, but the record is clear that the issues of freedom and moral responsibility were worked out in this universe long before the present order of the cosmos began. Someone (or many) tested out the law of God about obedience on the one hand and confirmed depravity on the other, long before Eve and Adam did. The existence of that other world is here, like the cosmic dust of some long exploded and vanished star. Precisely where the Bible narrative of moral life begins, there is the first presence of moral evil in the Bible.

The serpent, later clearly identified as being (perhaps symbolizing or acting for) Satan (Rev. 12:9), was there (Gen. 3:1–15). His evil moral influence was brought to bear and he won his first encounter. Through five books of the Old Testament (Genesis, 1 Chronicles, Job, Psalms and Zechariah, perhaps also Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28) and nineteen books of the New Testament (including every writer) the doctrine of Satan is taught in the narrative fashion characteristic of the Bible. Twenty-five of the references to him in the Gospels are from the mouth of Jesus Himself.

Co-ordinate with this teaching, the Bible refers to other beings, evil angels; sometimes they appear to be associated with Satan as their leader. In other words there are not only the holy, elect angels (Mark 8:38; 1 Tim. 5:21) but ‘angels [that] ... sinned’ (2 Peter 2:4). Michael and his angels are at war with ‘the dragon and his angels’ (Rev. 12:7).

There is an inference to be drawn. If Satan has an army of angels, presumably they were gathered to him as a rebellious host in some primeval event unreported in Scripture. Christians have always drawn this inference from the data, an inference exploited in classic beauty in Milton’s Paradise Lost. These evil angels were still Satan’s to muster, deploy and use in New Testament times.

Who can doubt they still are? Peter did not hesitate to find the power of one of them (Satan) to fill the heart of two early believers to ‘lie to the Holy Spirit’ (Acts 5:3) and later to say that the same ‘adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour’ (1 Peter 5:8). Paul is apparently including wicked angels among ‘the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places’ (Eph. 6:12) against whom we must ‘take up the whole armour [Gr. panoply] of God’ in order successfully to ‘withstand in the evil day’ (Eph. 6:13). They are arrayed in strength in support of their leader, Satan, in war against ‘Michael and his angels’ (Rev. 12:7ff.; cf. Dan. 10:13).

The range of these evil beings is inexplicable to this Bible interpreter. They are presumably among the ‘rulers and authorities in the heavenly places’ openly shamed by Christ at the cross (Eph. 3:10; Col. 2:15). The ‘heavenly places’ of these passages is surely not the heaven called God’s ‘dwelling place’ (2 Chr. 6:30, 33). Perhaps it is the ‘heaven’ of ‘the prince of the power of the air’ (Eph. 2:2). At least ‘four’ of these ‘angels’ are ‘bound at the great river Euphrates’ (Rev. 9:14, 15) and Satan has free range on earth for now. Yet some have been ‘cast ... into hell’ (Greek, Tartarus, 2 Peter 2:4) being ‘kept until the judgment’ and one other angel (presumably evil) is a ‘king’, ‘the angel of the bottomless pit [abyss]’ (Rev. 9:11).

I accept all these statements as I do flashes of light from distant sources and from the rim of solar eclipses, but feel no competence to put it all together. Further, I distrust the seemingly all-wise interpreters, numerous long ago when I was first learning about these things, from preachers on prophecy and their books and charts. I cite the ‘faithful saying’ of the first Protestant master of theology:

Let us not indulge in curiosity or in the investigation of unprofitable things ... The theologian’s task is not to divert the ears with chatter, but to strengthen consciences by teaching things true, sure and profitable (Calvin’s Institutes I. 14.4, emphasis added).

But there are others, referred to in 2 Peter 2:4 and Jude 6, who apparently sinned at some specific time other than when Satan and his hosts fell, and were henceforth imprisoned by God, to be kept in custody until the Judgment Day. The two texts cited above are both very specific about this. Some interpreters regard these incarcerated beings as the same as ‘the sons of God’ of Genesis 6:4 who ‘came in to the daughters of man’. Was there an incursion of super-terrestrial persons into human affairs at that time? Most interpreters at present think not. Our culturally derived predilections are all against it. The minds of most educated people today recoil against such apparent ‘superstition’. Yet the same is true of all the teachings of Scripture about angels and other important subjects—miracles, new birth, incarnation and Second Advent. Such an incursion cannot on principle be ruled out as preposterous. Some of the most sober writers in the history of biblical interpretation have thought Genesis 6:1–4 does describe such an incursion and that it was one of the causes of the judgment of the Flood. Josephus and the most ancient of the Christian Fathers supported it, among them Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Cyprian and Lactantius. Augustine mentions the view, but with most later Fathers, rejected it. Many liberal, rationalistic modern writers adopt it, for it is no concern of theirs to protect Scripture interpretation against ‘mythology’. Perhaps the best known modern writers in favor of this view are Franz Delitzsch³⁰ and Henry Alford.³¹ Most recent evangelical commentaries and theologies are against the ‘fallen angel’ view. But whatever view one takes, the fact remains that because of some special sin, some fallen angels are imprisoned while others are not. Second Peter and Jude are specific and plain.

Evil angels, in general, are not a major biblical theme, but the one called Satan, Devil, Serpent, Dragon, Tempter, Beelzebub, the god of this world and several other designations, is a major theme. The biblical names employed divulge his malevolent character.

The literature of the subject is vast. The reader is advised to be cautious in selecting doctrinal sources for reading. They tend to be either sceptical on the one hand or superstitious on the other. Among contemporary evangelical authors the subject is treated with considerable verve by those who regard Isaiah, chapter 14 (a prophecy about the king of Babylon) and Ezekiel chapter 28 (a prophecy about an ancient king of Tyre) as being in some important sense prophecies also about Satan, his primeval fall, his present state and activity, and future judgment. The standard theology books generally are much more reserved and tend to have little to say about Satan’s origin. I shall be content here³² to quote briefly a passage from A. A. Hodge, one of the old Standards.

Satan, like other finite beings can only be in one place at a time; yet all that is done by his agents being attributed to him, he appears to be practically ubiquitous.

It is certain that at times at least they [Satan’s agents] have exercised an inexplicable influence over the bodies of men, yet that influence is entirely subject to God’s control (Job 2:7; Luke 13:16; Acts 10:38). They have caused and aggravated diseases, and excited appetites and passions (1 Cor. 5:5). Satan, in some [restricted, undefined] sense, has the power of death (Heb. 2:14).

With respect to the souls of men, Satan and his angels are utterly destitute of any power either to change the heart or to coerce the will, their influence being simply moral, and exercised in the way of deception, suggestion, and persuasion. The descriptive phrases applied by the Scriptures to their working are such as the deceivableness of unrighteousness, ‘power, signs, lying wonders’ (2 Thess. 2:9, 10); he ‘transforms himself into an angel of light’ (2 Cor. 11:14). If he can deceive or persuade he uses ‘wiles’ (Eph. 6:11); ‘snares’ (1 Tim. 3:7); ‘depths’ (Rev. 2:24); he ‘blinds the mind’ (2 Cor. 4:4); ‘leads captive the will’ (2 Tim. 2:26); and so ‘deceives the whole world’ (Rev. 12:9). If he cannot persuade he uses ‘fiery darts’ (Eph. 6:16) and ‘buffetings’ (2 Cor. 12:7).³³

There are certain unclean spirits called demons (kjb devils) mentioned in several parts of the Bible. They are particularly prominent in the Gospels in connection with the public ministry of Jesus. Outside of the Gospels these are, as we noted in the chapter on the unity of God, usually represented as appropriating the worship offered to idols. The word demon (from Gr. daimon) simply means a spirit. The Greeks thought of some demons as good, some as evil. They had a special word for each kind and gave respectful veneration to all of them. In his famous speech to the Athenians, Paul put this matter before them in a skilful manner. A literal translation might read, ‘I see you all are very-much-demon-worshippers’ (Acts 17:22). The four underlined and hyphenated words are all one long word in author Luke’s Greek, deisidaimonesterous. The rsv and esv rendering, ‘very religious’, represents how the Greeks felt about it and ‘too superstitious’, the kjv rendering, how Paul and any Christians or Jews present felt. One of the historical Psalms says that the apostate, idolatrous worship of the children of Israel in Canaan was sacrifice to demons (Ps. 106:37). Moses said the same of the Israelite apostasy of his time (Deut. 32:17) and Paul of the heathen worship of Corinth (1 Cor. 10:20, 21).

It is likely that everything said earlier herein about wicked angels should be applied likewise to these demon-spirits. No one in Scripture is ever said to be possessed by an evil angel as such, but considering the essential ‘messenger’ nature of all angels, it is not difficult to identify demons with fallen angels, though specific proof is wanting.

The New Testament distinctly regards what is called ‘demon possession’ as reality. It is not the same as mental disease, though apparently some symptoms are similar. Jesus addressed the demons as distinct from the human persons possessed and the persons as distinct from the demons. There are reputable conservative theologians who think Jesus accommodated Himself to the then current opinion that insanity, epilepsy and the like are caused by demons. In such a case His words cannot be used for a theology about ‘demonism’. It is notable that the New Testament provides no certified list of symptoms whereby to identify demon-caused mental disease. Let us be grateful for this silence. The various other ailments which Jesus healed, however, are not said to be caused by evil spirits—there is no ‘evil spirit’ theory of disease in the Gospels.

Demon possession is not the same as demonic influence. Demons use their influence through false teachers (1 John 4:1–3). Through the susceptibility of us all to mental suggestion, demons certainly have an open field for action, as the case of Peter’s foolish acceptance of a satanic suggestion shows (Mark 8:33). Ananias, who allowed Satan to fill his heart with a bad motive, is another example of demon influence on the mind (Acts 5:2). Satanic (demonic) influence is all about us; we can and do resist it. But in demon possession the person is ‘possessed’ by the evil spirit and is apparently powerless against the demon.

No person on earth really has authority to pronounce a given case of irrational or malevolent behaviour as demon possession, though we may be sure it exists. As previously noted, there is no approved list of symptoms for certain diagnoses of cases. Exorcism is not a biblically authorized procedure for cure of demon possession or demon oppression (whatever that may be), though prayer in Jesus’ name is. Perhaps the rationalistic teachers and preachers who deny the true deity and Lordship of Jesus Christ are the demon-possessed of our time. If Satan is as cunning as represented, and if he has numerous invisible agents at his service, then in our age, surely his tactics will not deploy them primarily in physically and mentally tormenting folk, as in the Gospel narratives. How much more strategic to place them in university chairs, prominent pulpits, government bureaus, editorial offices, social service agencies and courts of law. Perhaps something like this is behind the progressive corruption and paganizing of the news-gathering and disseminating media and the entertainment industry. Could it explain the acceptance of Nazism and the so-called holocaust? The drift of the general population toward acceptance of homosexuality as a normal 'lifestyle' and of 'same-sex marriage' comes to mind. Many very respectable articles and books, not all by any means by orthodox Christian authors, written since World War II, have suggested as much.

¹ Lewis and Demarest, Integrative Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1990).

² A. E. McGrath, Christian Theology 2nd Ed. (Oxford: Blackwell, 1997).

³ R. L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology (Nashville: Nelson, 1998).

⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 443–464.

⁵ H. C. Thiessen, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1949).

⁶ The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1967).

⁷ John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1966), p. 234.

⁸ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics III, trans. Bromiley (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1975), pp. 369–531.

⁹ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1952), p. 133.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 147.

¹¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 444.

¹² Hal Lindsey, Satan is Alive and well on Planet Earth.

¹³ Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts (Detroit: Wayne State Univ. Press, 1979) XXVII, XXVIII.

¹⁴ Emil Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ Vol. III (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1973), pp. 56–59.

¹⁵ Accurate, readable information regarding the beliefs about angels among Jews of Jesus' time will be found in Alfred Edersheim's old standard, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah. (Vol. II, Appendix XII, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962, pp. 748–766.) For readers of German an authoritative source is Herman Strack and Paul Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testamentum aus Talmud und Niedrasch, comments on Matthew 18:10 (Vol. I, 781–783); Matthew 25:31 (I, 973–975); Luke 16:22 (II, 223–225); and Ercursus 21, The Ancient Jewish Demonology. Edersheim points out how fully Jesus was free of the dogmas and superstitions of His contemporary Jewish ‘angelologists’ and ‘demonologists’ Jesus really was.

¹⁶ New Testament for English Readers, p. 1300.

ANF The Ante-Nicene Fathers, 10 volumes

¹⁷ See the lengthy article in McClintock and Strong Encyclopedia ii, 808–810.

¹⁸ See Calvin’s justly sarcastic remarks in Institutes I, iv. 4.

¹⁹ Pope in Anchor Bible xii, p. 242.

²⁰ F. Delitzsch, on Job 38:8 and referring to Job 1:1 and 2:1.

²¹ Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12. See also Jude 6.

²² John Calvin, Commentary on the Psalms vol. I, trans. James Anderson (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1845), p. 563.

²³ Dan. 7:10; Matt. 26:53; 2 Kings 6:17; Heb. 12:22.

²⁴ But see the discussion of these passages and their context earlier. If, as seems likely, theophany is being described then the ‘men’ are not angels.

²⁵ Medieval theology, stimulated by The Celestial Hierarchy of the pseudo-Dionysius, was greatly interested in this question. See Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica Part One, Quest. 106–114; Summa Contra Gentiles; also Calvin, Institutes.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

²⁶ A. B. Davidson, ‘Angel’ in Dictionary of the Bible, vol. i (popularly Hastings Dictionary of the Bible), (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1908).

²⁷ He cites Gen. 28, 37; Josh. 5, 12; Isa. 6; 1 Kings 22:19; Ps. 148:2; Job 1:6; 2:1; 33:23; 5:1; 4:18; Ps. 103:20; Joel 3:11; Zec. 14:5; Ps. 68:17; 2 Kings 6:16, 17; Isa. 66:15; Deut. 33:2; Dan. 7:16; Judg. 5:20; Isa. 14:12; 24:10; 40:26; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3; Jer. 19:13; Zeph. 1:3 and on to Matt. 25:31.

²⁸ Bernard N. Schneider, The World of Unseen Spirits (Winona Lake, IN: Brethren Missionary Herald Books, 1975), p. 40.

²⁹ The ‘evil spirit’ (1 Sam. 16:14, 16) said to be from the Lord or a ‘lying spirit’ sent by God (see 1 Kings 22:22, 23; 2 Chr. 18:21, 22) should not be thought of as one of the devil’s angels or a demon, but as one of God's holy messengers sent to perform a disagreeable task. Paul said, 'The Lord shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie' (2 Thess. 2:11).

³⁰ New Commentary on Genesis, vol. i, pp. 222–233.

³¹ New Testament for English Readers, Introduction to Jude.

³² I have published about Satan and his activity, 'The Nations of Earth and Their Governments as Part of a Satanic Kingdom,' and have an unpublished written theology lecture on the subject. See Robert D. Culver, Civil Government: A Biblical View (Alberta, AB, Canada: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology, and Public Policy, 2000), pp. 49–60.

³³ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956), pp. 255, 256.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (164). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

20

Satan and Demons: Fallen Created Spirits

I. The Doctrine of Satan

1. For sufficient reasons the evil being called Satan is to be regarded as a fallen angel. Hence everything in the previous chapter relates to him. Michael, an archangel, and his holy angels are paired with their opposite 'the dragon and his angels' (Rev. 12:7). Hence also it is commonly and probably correctly thought that he began his career as an archangel.

2. The evil being introduced in Genesis 3 as the 'serpent' is the same as 'the dragon', 'the devil' and 'Satan' according to Revelation 12:7–9. So little is said of Satan in the Old Testament that it would be difficult certainly to identify the serpent with the one named 'Satan' and 'the devil' apart from Revelation 12:9.

In addition to these two names he is characterized twice as 'the tempter' (Matt. 4:3 and 1 Thess. 3:5) and 'the accuser of our brothers' (Rev. 12:10). Presumably when the Pharisees referred to 'Beelzebub, the prince of demons' (Matt. 12:24) they were thinking of Satan, though the name means 'Lord of flies', a Philistine god (see 2 Kgs. 1:2, 6). It is likely Jesus understood them as referring to 'Satan' (Matt. 12:26). Jesus called him also 'the ruler of this world' (John 12:31) and Paul 'the god of this world' (2 Cor. 4:4), 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph. 2:2) and 'the spirit of the world' (1 Cor. 2:12).

The Existence of Satan and of Demons in Scripture

More than is the case with good angels, many leading theologians outside evangelical circles have departed from a straightforward acceptance of the biblical witness about them. As for the biblical witness, however, 'It would be a waste of time to prove that, in various degrees of clearness, the personal existence of a Spirit of Evil is revealed again and again in Scripture ... It is obvious that the fact of his existence is of spiritual importance'.¹ We mentioned the less radical Barth and Brunner in the preceding chapter. Rudolf Bultmann set in motion a 'program of demythologization' which eliminates everything unverifiable by accepted scientific methods, so devil, demons and angels all must be regarded as unreal. In the widely influential—but hardly clear—language of Paul Tillich, demon and demonic have no reference to unseen evil spirits. Tillich would have us limit 'demonic' to 'the claim of something finite to infinity or to divine greatness'.² Himself a victim of and observer of Nazi persecution close up, Tillich labeled Naziism 'demonic'. But Tillich's ideas seem to have strengthened occult movement while casting reproach on biblical teaching regarding the demonic and encouraging, if not prime cause of the widely advertized apostasy of Bishop Pike.³

So much superstition has been passed down from earlier times on the subject of demons that one is tempted to pass by the truly massive, sober literature by competent Christian scholars, and some hard-nosed secular scholars, to confirm the existence of evil spirits which, employing an old Greek word, are called demons. Two works by Merril F. Unger Biblical Demonology (Scripture Press) and Demons in the World Today (Tyndale House), an older work by John L. Nevius, Demon Possession and Allied Themes (Revell, 1894 and many reprints) find as much evidence in Scripture for the existence, nature and activities of demons as for good angels, and, for that matter, for good and bad kings. Nevius, an Anglican missionary to China, researched demon 'possession' as it was thought to exist by Chinese folk and found numerous examples of what the Bible describes, parallel to the cases in the Gospels.

Demon (Gr. daimonion or daimon) in pre-biblical, classical Greek designates supernatural personal spirits, not necessarily evil. They are sometimes the gods (theoi) themselves and sometimes their messengers or other spirits, good and bad. Although these notions and the names for them originated in the milieu of primitive Greek animism, by the time the authors of the Septuagint and the New Testament used the word, daimonion designated an evil, personal spirit, usually associated with idol worship, the equivalent of unclean spirit (pneuma akatharton).

Werner Foerster, in a thorough canvas of all New Testament passages referring to demons, observes that in the New Testament they are seldom referred to except in cases of demon possession, and they are never ghosts of the dead. Missionaries did not fear them as perils to travel, which is quite a contrast to some Jewish beliefs.

Foerster summarizes:

[T]he fact that demons are mentioned only with relative infrequency in the New Testament does not mean that their existence and operation are contested or doubted. For Paul witchcraft is meddling with demons. But there can also be intercourse with demons in the normal [ordinary?] heathen culture [rituals, ceremonies, etc.] (1 Cor. 10:20 f.). While idols are nothing, and the Christian enjoys freedom, demons stand behind paganism... In Revelation too, we read of the worship of demons along side that of blind and deaf [idols] (9:20). In the last time both Paul and Revelation expect a particular activity of demonic powers [he quotes 1 Tim. 4:1 and Rev. 16:13 ff.].... The ascent of locusts from the abyss [Rev. 9:1ff.] denotes an activity of demonic powers under the leadership of a single power [the angel of the abyss].⁴

So much for the existence of demons as far as the Bible itself is concerned, however unlikely to many moderns. Even as devout an evangelical writer as David Smith,⁵ pressed by the humanistic optimism of the time, felt the affirmation of demons by Jesus was by way of accommodation to popular beliefs.

Though Satan appears by name in only four Old Testament passages he appears by many titles, adjectives and aliases on numerous occasions in the New Testament. Unless one wishes to reinterpret these references in the manner of Rudolf Bultmann, and some of his equally radical followers, his reality as far as the Bible is concerned may not be doubted. 'It would be a waste of time to prove that, in various degrees of clearness, the personal existence of a Spirit of evil is revealed again and again in Scripture'.⁶ Yet the Old Testament says very little about Satan. It is reasonable to suppose the reason for this reserve was to be found in the inveterate tendency of the Israelites to idolatry. They already had an unhealthy regard for evil spirits associated with Canaanite religion and witchcraft. The desire of survivors of the Babylonian destruction of the country by Nebuchadnezzar's armies for worship of a better god than Jehovah, one able to save the idolater in his sin, would readily have found an object for worship in a Hebrew Satan (see Jer. 43).

The Origin and Fall of Satan and Demons

It is a plain matter of fact that the Bible never plainly declares when, where or how these created beings came into existence or how they became evil. Down through the ages Jewish and Christian traditions have relied upon the prophecy of Isaiah 14, regarding the king of Babylon, and Ezekiel 28, regarding the king of Tyre, as telling us Satan began as an 'anointed guardian cherub' stationed highly in God's host of heaven near the throne of the Almighty. If these passages refer to Satan it must be assumed the two kings—of Tyre and of Babylon—are types or shadows of that familiar but unseen wicked spirit described as hassatan, 'the Adversary'. It is of course true these kings claimed superhuman origin and status. Hence one should not reject that view out of hand, knowing that great minds have endorsed it and the text itself hints of a kind of double-entendre. This interpretation is supported by suggestion in Paul's list of requirements for elders: 'he may become puffed up with conceit and fall into the condemnation of the devil' (1 Tim. 3:6). It is 'commonly understood to mean the condemnation which the devil incurs for the same sin.'⁷ But as frequently as Satan is mentioned in Scripture, it is strange that no allusion whatsoever to a primeval fall ever appears, such as is thought to be described by Isaiah and Ezekiel. Persuasive Christian preaching and writing have been constructed on this interpretation by Donald G. Barnhouse,⁸ Richard W. DeHaan,⁹ and many others. Standard theology books have been generally much more reserved in this regard, grounding the doctrine in the plethora of materials elsewhere in Scripture. I shall follow that example, with some reluctance.

Truly, Satan scarcely figures at all in the Old Testament except as one of the 'sons of God' in Job, the adversary of the restoration priest Joshua (Zech. 3:1, 2), a single doubtful reference at Psalm 109:6 and as the serpent in Genesis 3. James Kallas, in a valuable small book, sums up:

The whole of the Old Testament doctrine of Satan can be summed up in two words—insignificant and a servant. Mentioned only three times, only once at length, and in that one lengthy passage a loyal [in the Book of Job?] servant. That is all the Old Testament has to say about Satan! Anymore than that is untrue to the Old Testament.¹⁰

It is not improper to infer from what the New Testament says about ‘the devil and his angels’ that Satan deployed his servants, fallen angels, to resist Michael, as Daniel reports. Nor is it certain that however puzzling the presence of Satan (adversary) was in God’s company (Job 1, 2) Satan was a ‘loyal’ servant. He just might have been present coercively.

We must assume that, however Satan became evil, it was through a fall from an original created state of moral good. This state included the power of free will and without external temptation by anything evil in itself, he aspired to be and to have what was not rightly his. He thereby fell and has not paused in descent. This, it must be acknowledged, is precisely the picture drawn by those who take the Satan interpretation of Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28.

The Character of Satan

The Scriptures are explicit. The Hebrew name, ‘Satan’, means adversary. He is against all that is godly and good. The more common ‘devil’ (Gr. diabolos), ‘accuser’ or ‘slanderer’, amount to about the same. In fact the Septuagint frequently translates the Hebrew ‘Satan’ (whether of the great adversary or some other) by diabolos (Job 1:6; 2:1; Zech. 3:1 et al). He slandered God to Eve on his first appearance and mankind to God in the case of Job. He is a murderer (John 8:44), a liar (John 8:44), a thief (Matt. 13:19), and evil (Matt. 13:18). These evil traits derive from ‘his own nature’ and ‘there is no truth in him’ (as the rsv renders John 8:44). The believer is wise to take note that he is ‘the god of this world’ (2 Cor. 4:4), ‘the spirit of the world’ (1 Cor. 2:12), ‘the deceiver of the whole world’ (Rev. 12:9) and that ‘the whole world lies in the power of the evil one’ (1 John 5:19). It follows that the world—as cosmos, arranged in a certain way—will reflect the devil’s policies and is therefore a very dangerous place in which to dwell (spiritually, morally, physically), especially to rear our children! (Should we expect their schooling under worldly government aegis to reflect godly principles?) The character of the devil and his powers explains the warnings against his ‘schemes’ (Gr. ‘methods’, Eph. 6:11), his ‘designs’ (2 Cor. 2:11) and the ‘snare of the devil’ (1 Tim. 3:7).

Nearly thirty years passed by between the publication of the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament article Diabolos by Werner Foerster (Vol. II) and his article Satan (Vol. VII). In the interval the Dead Sea Scrolls brought many New Testament data into sharper focus, illuminating Jewish ideas about evil in the period shortly before Christ. Foerster points out that at Qumran there is little or no reference to Satan, usually called Belial, as a fallen creature, but rather as created angel of darkness, who has the world in his sway. Against Belial and his people God also employs the created angel of light. The two forces will be in contest till a last violent battle when Belial, his angels and his people will be judged and God will create something new, ‘the return of Paradise and a life of men with angels’. ‘The men of Qumran were concerned to solve the problem of evil by tracing back to God even that which he hates and rejects.’¹¹ He goes on to say, ‘In the history of later Judaism this battle between light and darkness is the theme of world history.... Thus a whole series of statements from the Old Testament and other sources is set aside. Nothing is said about Satan as the accuser before God, about the fall of Adam or his seduction by the serpent or Satan, about the fall of angels ... or about Lucifer.’¹² There is no doctrine of original sin in Judaism. If Foerster is correct in assessment of the Qumran sect their view of sin and Satan is similar to Parseeism’s doctrine of two eternal, uncreated principles of evil—Ormazd and Ahriman, a metaphysical-ethical dualism.

Manichaeism—founded by a third century Persian prophet—made a religion of dualism and though it helped the youthful Augustine escape materialistic philosophy it also challenged the faith of Christians of the time.

Satan's Career and Destiny

Whether or not one thinks Satan is the one of Ezekiel 28:14 who was 'on the holy mountain of God' or who in the language of Isaiah 14:13 sought to 'ascend to heaven above the stars of God', he began his career as a created mighty angel (one of the 'sons of God', Job 1:6, 7, 8, 12; 2:1–6), with access to God in the heavenly council. Though at present 'prince of the power of the air' (Eph. 6:11, 12; 2:2), it is doubtful he 'sees God's face' as holy angels do in the 'heavenly places' which are now his realm in the unseen world. He has some sort of access to God, perhaps. One hesitates to generalize from the picture drawn by the first two chapters of Job.

Jesus spoke of a fall of Satan when 'The seventy-two returned with joy, saying, "Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name!"' after which He declared, 'I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven' (Luke 10:17, 18). This has affinity of language with Revelation 12:7–12. Michael and his angels are fighting against the dragon (Satan) and his angels. Both 'the deceiver of the whole world' and his angels are cast down to the earth. A loud voice from heaven proclaims the arrival of the kingdom of God and with it the overthrow of 'the accuser of our brothers ... who accuses them day and night before our God. And they have conquered him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, for they loved not their lives even unto death' (Rev. 12:7–12).

Surely these passages have more than mere verbal connection with Paul's doctrine that at the cross 'He [Christ] disarmed the rulers and authorities [the devil and all his host] and put them to open shame, by triumphing over them in him' (Col. 2:15).

What shall we make of these passages? Paul at Ephesians 2:2; 6:11, 12; Jesus speaking at Luke 10:17, 18; John at Revelation 12:7–12, each of which finds Satan in a heavenly place but cast out, whereupon (in Rev. 12:13) he persecutes 'the woman' (=God's people, perhaps Israel, perhaps the church).

I have great sympathy for the opinion of H. B. Swete: 'It is vain to attempt to grasp the nature of the spiritual fact which these visions symbolize, so far as it belongs to the celestial order.'¹³ Over a period of a long life I have earnestly read dozens of serious books and articles by competent, devout scholars on these verses in Revelation chapter 12. After I had read the first commentary (Joseph Seiss, The Apocalypse) very long ago, I thought I knew—the Revelation passage applied strictly to an event after the rapture of the church in the closing months of the present age. I still share a general futurist interpretation of Revelation, but I have come to see that even so, I must merge all into what we see as the foreshortened view of the future of John who wrote, and the people who first read, his 'breaking news' from Patmos (Rev. 1:4). For them the document was 'The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him to show to his servants the things that must soon take place' (Rev. 1:1), with a 'fall like lightning from heaven' (Luke 10:17, 18), and in the Roman persecutions the martyrs saw their picture in Revelation 12:11—overcoming by the precious blood and the 'word of their testimony' sealed with their own blood. Yet, the 'short time' (Rev. 12:12) of Satan's remaining freedom to do his worst during the final period of 'the great tribulation' (Rev. 7:14) surely applies.

This deliberate merging of near and far—prediction of a kind of events without full and limited specification of a particular event—is familiar to all believing interpreters of Old Testament prophetic books, including apocalypses.

So as to his power to accuse ‘our brothers’ (as in Job and Rev. 12:10), Satan was destroyed at Calvary. In this sense Satan fell from heaven as lightning—whatever real access he may or may not have had to the heaven of God’s special manifestation (see 2 Chr. 6:18). This is what Paul is referring to in the Ephesians and Colossian passages (and other New Testament references to the same). The Revelation passage certainly includes this reference (after all, the martyrs of Revelation 12 overcome Satan by the blood of the Lamb) but there is also an eschatological reference. In that final conflict at the brink of the end of the age Satan will be removed from every realm except the earthly. The battle of Revelation 12 ‘is the cosmic prelude to the consummation. It explains the intense hostility to be poured out upon the church in the days of final tribulation... Satan and his forces are defeated in battle and must forfeit their place in heaven ... and his angels are defeated in battle and cast down to earth. It is the beginning of the end.’¹⁴

Granting a lack of clear biblical revelation about the precise time and place of Satan’s beginnings we can summarize the periods of Satan’s career and his destiny as follows: (i) high position (Jude 8, 9; cf. Ezek. 28:14) among the heavenly host before the creation of the heavens and the earth (Job 38:7; cf. Ezek. 28:14); (ii) ‘in heavenly places’ after a primeval fall (1 Tim. 3:6; Eph. 5:11, 12) but present on earth as god of the present evil world (most references throughout the New Testament); (iii) cast down to earth, where he has a little time to do his worst (Rev. 12:7–12) near the end of the present age; (iv) incarcerated in the abyss (‘the bottomless pit’) ‘for a thousand years’ (Rev. 20:1–3); (v) ‘for a little while’ back on earth again; and (vi) finally consigned to the ‘lake of fire’. In all these matters the best informed theologians know no more than the least sophisticated, but informed Bible reader. Neither can penetrate beyond the present veil between the present order where we walk by faith and not by sight. Efforts to gain present access to that other world end only with spiritual and moral disaster (Isa. 8:19; Deut. 18:9–14; 1 Sam. 28:7–25).

Satan’s Present Activities and Devices

There is no place where a theology thorough in assessing what the biblical record displays meets us ‘sinners by choice and aliens by birth’ more fully than the devil’s devices. Moreover, we need not be ‘ignorant of his designs’ (2 Cor. 2:11) or unable ‘to stand against the schemes of the devil’ (Eph. 6:11).

He begins his slithering course through the Bible by slandering God to Eve (Gen. 3:4, 5) and is next seen as adversary to God’s high priest Joshua¹⁵ (Zec. 3:1 ff.) and later to God’s Messiah (Matt. 4:1–10). He counterfeits God’s word and work (2 Cor. 11:14, 15; cf. Rev. 16:13) and in final opposition to God energizes the man of sin, the final Antichrist (Rev. 16:13 ff.; cf. 2 Thess. 2:7–12).

As to the present age (eon, aiōn) and world (cosmos, kosmos) Satan is its god (2 Cor. 4:4); he dictates its principles and strategies (Eph. 2:1, 2), and it lies in his embrace (1 John 5:19), for he is ‘deceiver of the whole world’ (Rev. 12:9). Within this organized world he deceives the nations. At the time of Jesus, Satan led them in the attacks which led to undeserved execution of the Savior. This is the gist of perennial Christian interpretation of the prayer of the first Christian assembly (Acts 4:23–31) and the plain sense of Revelation 12:1–4, 13. Satan’s actions to destroy Jesus began with Herod and ended with the closing events of the ‘last week’. The great red dragon will in the closing period of this age gather the nations to a last anti-Christian, anti-God convulsion at a place ‘that in Hebrew is called Armageddon’ (Rev. 16:12–16).

Among the unbelieving people of the world ‘the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ’ (2 Cor. 4:4); he ‘takes away the word from their hearts, so that they may not believe and be saved’ (Luke 8:12). He moves some of them both subtly and confrontationally to hinder success to God’s witnesses in missionary work (as with Elymas the magician, Acts 13:4–12). He incites them to persecute, even to slay good people, from Cain’s brother (1 John 3:12) to the last Christian martyr (Rev. 6:9–11; cf. Rev. 12:11). He promotes lies, deceit, treachery, disease and every evil, whether beautiful or ugly, and the final tragedy, death, for he is not only a liar and the father of lies but of death (John 8:44). ‘Whoever desires to love life and see good days, let him keep his tongue from evil and his lips from speaking deceit’ (1 Peter 3:10). ‘Resist the devil, and he will flee from you’ (James 4:7). ‘Flee youthful passions’ (2 Tim. 2:22). ‘[F]lee from sexual immorality’ (1 Cor. 6:18).

As for believing children of God, their external ‘enemy’ is ‘the devil’ (Matt. 13:39) who promotes discord and distress in ‘the field [which] is the world’ (Matt. 13:38) by sowing weeds (‘sons of the evil one’) among the ‘good seed’, who are ‘the children of the kingdom’ (Matt. 13:38; cf. 18–23; and 36–41). He hinders missionary evangelists in their work, as when in the case of Paul and his party, he reported, ‘Satan hindered us.’ The devil stirs up persecution of believers—as predictive of the suffering church of Smyrna, ‘the devil is about to throw some of you into prison’ (Rev. 2:10). He is also the ‘enemy’ within, suggesting all the evil thoughts and all the wrong answers to the mind as he did to Peter in the famous episode at Caesarea Philippi (Matt. 16:21–23). This power of suggestion is especially operative in placing us in situations friendly more to immodest and immoral behaviour than to right conduct (see 1 Cor. 7:5 and context).

Against these attacks the apostolic exhortation is to ‘Put on the whole armour [Gk. Panoplia, panoply] of God’ (Eph. 6:11 ff.).

Reflections on the Devil and All His Works

Ancient Christians at baptism (and later at confirmation) were required publicly to ‘renounce the devil and all his works’. Sometimes a rather particular list of his ‘works’ was furnished for renunciation. Preaching has often, sometimes for good reason, sometimes not, followed a similar route. The Bible does not tell everything about Satan’s aspirations, but it is clear that he intends to subvert God’s rule, to make the ‘kingdom[s] of this world’ of mankind his rather than ‘of our Lord and of his Christ’ (Rev. 11:15). The theatre of contest is the human race—from Genesis 3 to Revelation 20. We err if we suppose his goals are simply to promote crimes, civil disorder and immorality. Rather, Satan would have human beings—whether crude and primitive, or refined and sophisticated—worship any creature rather than the Creator, to follow their own wills to death and hell rather than God’s will to life everlasting. To this end Satan is less the ruffian than an ‘angel of light’, as much at work in dignified courts of law, legislature, universities and schools of art—even theological seminaries and church conferences—as in bars, brothels and opium dens (2 Cor. 11:14 ff.)!

Encouragements and Cautions

Scripture puts believers on notice that the devil is dangerous and the world he ranges about in is a perilous environment, as we have seen. Moreover, though Christian influence and acceptance has spread from Jerusalem to the ends of the earth, it has also died out in geographical areas where the salt had lost its savour and hence ‘thrown out’ as fit only to be ‘trampled under people’s feet’ (Matt. 5:13). Satan has an ally in the sinful heart of every ‘man born of woman’, without exception. Yet as believers indwelt by the Spirit of God ‘he who is in you is greater than he who is in the world’ (1 John 4:4). So we best join Michael (Jude 8, 9) in respecting the devil, never speaking contemptuously to or of him, yet not estimating the devil and his minions too highly or thinking or talking of him overmuch. Throughout the book of Job, Job fights the devil through all those speeches without knowing about the contest in heaven of which he was centre or ever once referring to Satan in his speech. The action was all in Job’s soul. We do know about Satan’s part in Job’s contest. Yet we need not live in superstitious fright of the Evil or his host. Observe the following.

1. Satan has already been judged and defeated at the cross. When he approached Christ at the beginning of His ministry he lost the contest (Matt. 4:1–11), and in the very shadow of the cross Jesus declared that Satan has been ‘judged’ (John 16:11). Paul explained that God through Christ at the cross ‘disarmed the rulers and authorities [Satan and his host] and put them to open shame, by [with his resurrection] triumphing over them in him’ (Col. 2:8, 14, 15). As Luther’s great hymn has it, Satan’s ‘doom is sure’ even though now free on temporary release, ‘by exercise staying healthy for execution’!

2. We are assured of our Lord’s intercessory prayers for us. As He prayed for Peter’s victory over Satan’s ‘sifting’ (Luke 22:31, 32) so He prays for us today (cf. John 17:15–26; Heb. 7:25).

3. In the midst of fiercest opposition we have been promised stress relief. ‘But the Lord is faithful. He will establish you and guard you against the evil one. And we have confidence in the Lord ...’ (2 Thess. 3:3, 4).

4. Satan is a fellow creature after all, not omnipotent by any standard. We have the duty to resist him as we should any other evil creature (James 4:7; Eph. 4:27), putting on ‘the whole armour of God’ for defence and taking the offensive against him as well (Eph. 6:11–18). As we conquer his territory by the Word of God (which is a sword of the Spirit) he may be defeated (Rev. 12:11).

5. It was not without reason that through the ages of the church when the majority of Christians were illiterate, unable to read the Scriptures, and pastors not much more learned, among the first duties of children and new believers was to learn ‘the Lord’s Prayer’ (Matt. 6:9–13). The prayer has been variously expounded. (a) It has been seen as eschatological in perspective, in which case ‘deliver us from evil’ means from ‘the Evil One’, hence Paul’s ‘frequent warnings of heightened intensity of the Kingdom’s inauguration’.¹⁶ (b) The prayer relates to life in the present age, however long that may be, and the request ‘deliver us from evil’ means from evils in general. (c) As in (b), but deliverance from the Evil One is the petition. ‘The whole weight of New Testament language is in favor of the latter meaning’.¹⁷ In such a case, we are specifically taught by Jesus and catechizers of the church for ages (‘Give us this day’) to pray for deliverance from the devil. Prayer, with employment of the means of grace, will furnish daily victory over ‘the world, the flesh, and the devil’.

II. The Doctrine of Demons

The word demon (from Gr. daimon and daimonion) simply means a spirit. The Greeks thought of some demons as good, some as evil. They had a special word for each kind and gave respectful veneration to all of them. In his famous speech to the Athenians, Paul put this matter before them in a skillful manner. A literal translation might read, ‘I see you all are very-much-demon-worshippers’ (Acts 17:22). The four italicized and hyphenated words are all one long word in author Luke’s Greek, deisidaimonesterous. The rsv and esv rendering, ‘very religious’, represents how the Greeks felt about it and ‘too superstitious’, the kjv rendering, how Paul and any Christians or Jews present felt. One of the historical Psalms says that the apostate, idolatrous worship of the children of Israel in Canaan was sacrifice to demons (Ps. 106:37). Moses said the same of the Israelite apostasy of his time (Deut. 32:17) and Paul of the heathen worship of Corinth (1 Cor. 10:20, 21).

It is likely that everything said earlier herein about wicked angels should be applied likewise to these demon-spirits. No one in Scripture is ever said to be possessed by an evil angel as such, but considering the essential ‘messenger’ nature of all angels, it is not difficult to identify demons with fallen angels, though specific proof is wanting.

A distinction should be made between demonology (or demonolatry) and the biblical doctrines of demons (1 Tim. 4:1). Articles in general encyclopedias entitled ‘Demonology’ relate to spirits thought by primitive folk to inhabit objects of nature such as trees, rocks, wells and similar (animism) and roving spirits of deceased people, sprites, elves, fairies and the like (superstition).¹⁸ The Bible, however, neither endorses superstitious beliefs nor advocates the ‘demonology’ of some low periods of Jewish and Christian beliefs. With the rise of evolutionary (developmental, Hegelian) theories of the origin of religion and of Scripture there has been much written, as well, to interpret the Old Testament as containing animist and even polytheistic elements.¹⁹ Robert Pfeiffer thought that in Moses’ experience of acute illness (Exod. 4:24–26) Jehovah is nothing more than ‘a malignant demon of the wilderness’.²⁰ The foundations for such views were laid by several nineteenth-century biblical scholars—prominently Lenormant in *The Beginnings of History*²¹ and W. Robertson Smith.²² W. R. Smith’s point is that the prevalent superstitions of all Semites—including Arabs—were present among all the Hebrews. He does not sufficiently point out how, if so, Scripture corrects those superstitions.²³ The article in the Hastings Dictionary of the Bible reflects this outlook. The article itself—Old Testament and New Testament—does not rise above animistic and totemistic beliefs, e.g. the serpent of Genesis 3 is a totem and even ‘St. Paul ... shared the conception of his contemporaries respecting devils.’²⁴ Any one who believes the Old Testament is as Jesus described it (John 10:35) and Paul declared (2 Tim. 3:16) will be assured that however much superstitious belief may have survived in the minds of biblical people, those beliefs are not endorsed by the Bible, but rather corrected by it. R. K. Harrison addresses this matter at length from this outlook.²⁵ He reminds the reader that most of the references to the demons are in poetry and exalted prose, are employed metaphorically, and do not imply endorsement.

Granted, there are no specific declarations in Scripture from which to derive a ‘doctrine of demons’ and the mere opinions of biblical personages do not have doctrinal authority (after all, Peter at one time believed in ghosts, Luke 24:37). There is, however, sufficient information of a descriptive sort to derive some settled facts, some tentative judgments and some practical guidance on the matter.

I. The Real Existence of Demons

As to the real existence of demons, Calvin's rather wry statement should suffice: 'It would be using quite improper forms of speech to say that the judgment of God will come upon the devils [Matt. 8:29], that the eternal fire is prepared for them [Matt. 25:11], that they are already in prison awaiting their last sentence [2 Peter 2:4], and that Jesus Christ tormented them at his coming [Matt. 8:29], if there are no devils at all' (Institutes I, 14.19). Luther, most would agree, may have been over-convinced about the reality of devils (demons) in his Commentary on Galatians.²⁶

Satan, demons and 'possession' have been an embarrassment to liberal biblical scholars. S. Vernon McCasland had this to say, 'In my own book, By the Finger of God (1951) I have interpreted demon possession as mental illness [hardly original] ... and in The Pioneer of Our Faith (1964) I have presented the view that Satan as the Tempter should be interpreted as man's innate tendency to sin.'²⁷ Many liberal authors argue that though we must not take Satan and demons literally, the New Testament authors intended us to take them in this way. James Kallas developed the thesis that Jesus Himself was convinced of the reality of these invisible evil spirits and that all His teachings presuppose this belief. Kallas does not think Jesus was necessarily correct in His thinking, however.²⁸ For Wolfhart Pannenberg, angels and demons are more like 'a field of forces' than personal spirits, if I understand him correctly. He exclaims:

To the astonishment of many observers ... experience ... [has] produced in 20th century theology a revival of the doctrine of angels and demons. Paul Tillich likened them to the archetypes of depth psychology and to a new awareness of the superhuman power of demonic in literature [Mein Kampf by Hitler!]. Gerhard Ebeling related them to the experience that forces are at work in our relation to God and the world that are hidden from us but nonetheless active. Paul Althaus said that the reality of angels [bad and good] was a matter not merely of faith but also of experience. Hans-George Fritzsche used the term 'field of force' in this connection ... a field of force that embraces the ego, which is where angels and demons belong.²⁹

These statements are suggesting invisible 'fields of force'—invisible like radio and sound waves and mass attraction—which impinge directly on the minds of people without employing physical means. A pastor-evangelist of my youth taught this doctrine about demons, basing his remarks on Revelation 16:13, 14: 'And I saw, coming out of the mouth of the dragon and out of the mouth of the beast and out of the mouth of the false prophet, three unclean spirits like frogs. For they are demonic spirits ... who go abroad to the kings of the whole world ...' The author found possible reference to demonic origins of socialism, communism and fascism in these 'three unclean spirits ... of demons'.³⁰ Nazism was not yet prominently on the scene or Dr Bauman might have replaced socialism with Hitler's mantra. After World War II was over and until the present many philosophically inclined have wondered if the successive illusions sweeping the world since 1945 have not been demon-inspired and propagated (see 2 Thess. 2:11 and the context; cf. 1 Kings 22:22, 23).

Knowing how little all this tells us about the obscure and difficult subject of demons (also called ‘devils’ in English Bibles), evil spirits, familiar spirits and unclean spirits—perhaps also called (evil) angels—let us disclaim any of the exaggerated and morbid notions of witchcraft and medieval speculations and of recent hysterical popular literature.

II. What Are Demons and What Is Their Origin?

Whether or not ‘fallen angels’ are to be thought of as demons we cannot know for certain. They may be. We do know that they certainly are not, as some folks believe, the spirits of dead people. (I found this belief alive and well among Chinese theology students in Hong Kong in 1971.) The spirits of the deceased do not tarry near graveyards nor in haunted houses, for, according to Scripture, the spirits of the saved ‘depart and be with Christ’ (Phil. 1:23) while the lost go to a place of torment (Luke 16:22, 23). Moreover, a ‘great chasm has been fixed’ (Luke 16:26) between the two places, and from scenes of earth as well.

Unless Scripture is misleading us, demons are personal spirits which at present have no bodies of their own but seek to inhabit and control human bodies (see Mark 5:6–8; Matt. 12:43). As to personhood, they speak (Matt. 8:31), they have knowledge (Mark 1:24), they ‘believe—and shudder’ (James 2:19), and they seek ‘rest’ (Matt. 12:43)—all marks of intelligence and personhood. Though now without bodies of their own, it is thought that, in some remote past time, they may have become disembodied.

The Bible offers no direct clues as to their origin. One theory proposes they are disembodied spirits of sentient pre-Adamites, corporeal beings who inhabited the earth before the creative week of Genesis 1:3 and following. They sinned, were killed by a catastrophe like the Flood of Genesis and were condemned to permanent disembodiment. Another theory suggests that they are angels who followed Satan in a primeval rebellion against God and were cast out of heaven with him. They are thought to be the angels that ‘sinned’ (2 Peter 2:4) and ‘the angels who did not stay within their own position of authority’ (Jude 6). This view is at least as old as Origen, who set it forth in De Principiis II.9.6. It was favoured by Augustine and Peter Lombard. Thomas Aquinas argued at length for this view. He equates fallen angels with demons. He cites Augustine at length in support as well as John of Damascus, Origen, Gregory the Great and connects the usually cited texts from Isaiah 14, Ezekiel 28, John 8:44 and Revelation 12:4. His treatment is a fair index to patristic support of this view as well as of the scriptural support.³¹

Against this is the fact that these angels are presently confined ‘in eternal chains’ (Jude 6), awaiting judgment, where demons are ‘wandering’ spirits. It has been proposed that they are offspring of angelic ‘sons of God’ and the ‘daughters of man’ (Gen. 6:1–4). There are many obstacles to this view. This view is as old as the Apocrypha book, 1 Enoch 10:11–14, and found favour among some church Fathers. Ancient rabbis had many different views. We can state with absolute certainty only that they are fallen spirit beings who have committed themselves to Satan (i.e. the adversary) and that they hate God and seek to harm His people. ‘No clear distinction can be made between fallen angels and demons, for they are all evil spirits ... far too great and powerful for us to defeat in our own strength.’³²

The Evil Character of Demons

Every expression in the New Testament of the point of view of the authors regards demons as wholly evil. True, the pagan Greeks imagined there were both good and bad demons (the words daimon and daimonion have a very interesting history in the classical language). Even learned Pharisees of Paul's time had accepted superstitious ideas about 'good demons' (see Acts 23:9). But their opinions are not presented as New Testament teaching. Satan is a murderer and a liar, but also may act like an angel of light. These beings seem to be uniformly malignant. They are usually, in the Gospels, specifically designated as unclean spirits, evil spirits, elsewhere in the New Testament as seducing spirits (1 Tim. 4:1), and in Revelation as horrible, monstrous creatures (Rev. 9). Some, however, are worse than others (Mark 9:17, 18), and some more powerful (Mark 9:17, 18). They find fulfillment in tormenting anybody or destroying anything. Satan is their leader and they are agents of his kingdom (Matt. 12:24–27).

The Powers and Acts of Demons

In Old Testament Times

It will be convenient here to observe that the Old Testament furnishes few references to demons. Some references say God sent 'an evil spirit' to do this or that (Judg. 9:23, 24; 1 Sam. 16:14–16; 18:10, 11; 19:9, 10). R. K. Harrison suggests these are called 'evil' only as producing evil effects—as a storm, or a disease, or a bad mood, etc.³³ It seems likely they are to be regarded as good messengers (angels) to produce certain distressing results (1 Kings 22:19–23; 2 Chr. 18:18–22). There are also angels of evil character from Satan's organization (Dan. 10:13). Questionable Old Testament references to demons are Leviticus 17:7; 2 Chronicles 11:15; Isaiah 13:21; 34:14.

In the Career of the Messiah

The most pronounced demonstrations of demon power and activity are during the life of Jesus after His official entrance, on His career as Messiah. Satan mounted his first attack on Jesus with the goal of killing Him as an infant, and seems to have withdrawn until Jesus opened His career at the baptism. The Spirit led Jesus 'into the wilderness' but while there forty days He was intensely tested by the devil, unsuccessfully. After that Jesus carried the battle into the devil's territory, emerging victorious (to Satan's discomfort) through death, burial, resurrection, ascension and enthronement at God's right hand. As He and His apostles battled for the hearts of the people of Israel (Matt. 10:5, 6) Jesus said, 'as you go ... Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse lepers, cast out demons' (Matt. 10:7, 8). This both He and they did from the first encounter on that Sabbath at the synagogue of Capernaum (Mark 1:21–28) on till late in His public ministry He sent out 'The seventy-two' (Luke 10:1–24). The record says, 'The seventy-two returned ... saying, "Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name!"' (Luke 10:17)—which evoked Jesus' response: 'I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven' (Luke 10:18). Did our Lord see in the spectacular defeats of demons by the kingdom message (Luke 10:19) conveyed by seventy-two common 'Christians' the effective defeat of Satan at Golgotha a few weeks later (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11)? It is in this campaign of attack against the province of Satan and his demons that some of the powers and activities of demons are demonstrated. There were about eight or nine specific reported encounters between Jesus and the demons, though some of the seemingly parallel accounts may really be of separate incidents. We cannot be sure of the order of the incidents. Furthermore, we do not know in each case what the symptoms were of demon afflictions—or why the afflicted sufferer, his family and friends, thought he was afflicted by demons.

The devil no doubt had his greatest success in leading those Jews of Judea, Samaria, Galilee, the Decapolis and Perea into unbelief and sin. Their leaders were thoroughly apostate and the people were like them: ‘like people, like priest’ as in Hosea’s time (Hos. 4:9; see Jer. 6). In such a case the evidence of the victory of demonic powers is simply sins of every kind and spiritual apathy. The powers of darkness have ‘blinded the minds of the unbelievers’ to the ‘gospel’ (2 Cor. 4:4).

The narratives of Jesus’ ministry report that demons had caused various ailments, most of them related to mental and nervous disorders—muteness (Matt. 9:32, 33; Mark 9:17; Luke 11:14), blindness (Matt. 12:22), screaming (Mark 1:26; 5:7; 9:26), crying (Mark 5:4), convulsions (Mark 1:26), apparent epilepsy (Mark 9:18–21), self-infliction of wounds (Mark 5:5; 9:22) accompanied by incessant active wakefulness (Mark 5:5), and demonstrations of unusual physical strength (Mark 5:4) and insanity (Mark 5:1–5, 15).

Demons in Acts, the Epistles, the Revelation

There is the story of a certain ‘slave girl who had a spirit of divination’ and followed Paul’s party about announcing, ‘These men are servants of the Most High God, who proclaim to you the way of salvation’ (Acts 16:16–18). After some days Paul exorcised the ‘spirit’ (or demon), which brought the wrath of the girl’s owners on him and resulted in his being driven out of town. In this case the demon prompted harassment of God’s evangelists by clever endorsement by the wrong people and in a wrong way. There was a similar incident at Ephesus some time later (Acts 19:13–17). Demons also instigate moral and spiritual disorder among believers, including to ‘be false to the truth’ (James 3:14). Considering the frequency of this sort of trouble in churches this may be a preoccupation of demons.

In demonic attacks against the Lord’s people, the enemy has employed tactics different from those in the cases of exorcisms by Jesus and His disciples. They now attack the truth of the Christian gospel, deceiving some (2 Cor. 11:12–15); blinding others to truth (2 Cor. 4:3, 4); and misleading from truth (2 Tim. 3:13; 1 John 2:26; 3:7), and toward sensual pleasures (Eph. 5:6; Col. 2:8; 2 Thess. 2:3). They also propose appealing falsehoods (1 Tim. 4:1; 1 John 4:1–4).

We do not know exactly how ‘Satan hindered’ in the case of Paul’s desire to visit the believers at Thessalonica (1 Thess. 2:18) nor the nature of Paul’s ‘thorn ... in the flesh ... a messenger of Satan to harass me’ (2 Cor. 12:7). The following context rather indicates a physical defect or illness. No doubt from one point of view it was also God’s ‘messenger’ (2 Cor. 12:8–10), as was the case with Job’s well-known afflictions.

Evaluations and Conclusions

Our limited survey does not include reference to the perennial claims of mediums, fortune-tellers, astrologers, witches, seers, ESP, to be in contact with spirits, either of dead people or of other spirits, evil or good. It is of course impossible for the living to communicate with the dead. Their spirits are far away and ‘they shall not return’. Job’s complaint is true: ‘he who goes down to Sheol [the grave kjv] does not come up; he returns no more to his house, nor does his place know him any more’ (Job 7:9, 10). Job had hope yet to ‘see God’ and that as a friend, but not here and now (see 19:25, 26 and context). The same hope is shared by all Christians on well-known scriptural grounds.

But the efforts of the living to communicate with the dead or vice versa are condemned in many parts of the Bible, and for good reason. The single case of Saul and the witch of Endor and the encounter with Samuel (probably a case of a miracle, quite as surprising to the witch as devastating to Saul) does not change the general teaching of the whole Bible: the dead do not communicate with the living.

That there may be real contact with evil spirits (demons) in some forms of spiritualism, parapsychology, psychic prophecy and other occult practices may not be denied. It is also certain that much, if not most, is quackery, deceiving people by trickery—in either case to be strictly avoided.³⁴

In my opinion demon possession is not the best designation of the demon phenomena of the New Testament. ‘Possessed’ in ‘the demon-possessed man’ (Luke 8:36) renders daimonistheis, an aorist participle of daimonidzō (demonize), which indicates more infestation, affliction and being harrassed by demons than being possessed (or owned) by them. In the only other New Testament use of ‘possessed’ with reference to demons (in the kjv, Acts 16:16) a girl is said to be ‘possessed with a spirit of divination’, which translates echousan pneuma puthona, literally ‘having a spirit of python’—python refers to the ability to prophesy, according to common belief in Greek civilization; the verb is a present active feminine participle of echō. In this case the girl possesses the spirit, not the other way around. She seems to be a willing partner in the practice of ‘divination’. The sense seems not to be negative, as in ‘Susan has chicken pox’. It is significant that when the scribes said of Jesus, ‘He is possessed by Beelzebub,’ and ‘by the prince of demons he casts out the demons’ (Mark 3:22) this same Greek verb echō, present active sense as in Acts 16:16, is employed (‘he has Beelzebub’).³⁵ Jesus performed (they said) His exorcisms by Satan’s power. They seem to say that Jesus was the manipulator, using the devil (= chief demon) to work His miracles of exorcism. Is Luke then saying the slave girl used the demon to tell fortunes and by the demon’s power she recognized the true identity of the missionaries, amongst other things? I think so. In such a case it might be quite as correct to say the girl possessed the demon as that the demon possessed the girl. We do not know if the girl desired to be rid of the demon and we do not know what happened to her after she was no longer useful to her owners as a prophetess (Gr. python). Similarly, the beast of Revelation is willing host of the dragon (Satan), who gives him his supernatural powers (Rev. 13:2).

There is no question that Satan and his demons do in a real sense ‘possess’ the world and its inhabitants, except those who have been saved out of it. I have developed that proposition somewhat at length in three chapters of another book, Civil Government: A Biblical View.³⁶ That does not mean that everyone who manifest the pathological behaviour of the demoniac of Gadara or of the lad of Luke 9:37–42 is ‘demonized’. Rather, for causes we do not know, some people of Jesus’ time were so demonized.

No trustworthy list of verifiable symptoms of demon ‘possession’ is provided by Scripture. The opinion of unqualified observers is not to be relied upon. Hence I know of no way to verify abnormal conduct such as we find in the Gospels as a case of being demonized. We may be sure no one, including believers, is immune from demonic attack, if not ‘possession’. Satan attacks us largely through weakening our faith in God and His truth (see 1 Tim 4:1; 1 John 4:1–4). Demons shall some day employ pseudo-miracles (‘lying wonders’) to deceive (2 Thess. 2:7–11; Rev. 16:14). A. Scott Molteau says:

Demons do not own or possess any Christians, who are God’s sole possession (as are the demons themselves).... This does not mean that they cannot be demonized or temporarily controlled by demons or have demons temporarily indwell them.... Evidence in favor of the demonization of believers includes the statement of our need to know Satan's schemes (2 Cor. 2:11) so that he will not gain a foothold on us (Eph. 4:26–27).³⁷

Paul's remarks about a 'thorn in the flesh ... the messenger of Satan to buffet me' (2 Cor. 12:7 kjv) directs our attention to the possibility of demon activity, whether as ordinary or sometimes causal agent in disease.

Recent and Current Interest in Demons

Flurries of interest in demons and popular level publishing about demons have occurred through the last 150 years. David F. Strauss (1808–1874), a disciple both of Hegel and Schleiermacher, published Leben Jesu (Life of Jesus) in 1835. It was an immediate sensation and created a new epoch in treatment of the rise of Christianity. His 'mythical theory' of Christian and New Testament origins held that most of the history of Christ, including Jesus' miracles of healing and casting out of demons, was the result of unconscious exaggeration by devoted, immediate disciples that the credulous authors of the Gospels put into writing some generations later. Demon possession is therefore to be regarded by enlightened moderns as a vivid symbol of evil in the world and the 'miracles' of casting out demons as an equally vivid symbol of the conquest of evil by Christ's example and teaching. This became the prevailing opinion of modernism—liberalism in Christian theology. Though the debate launched by Strauss' book has not quite ebbed even today, a survey of the literature would be both daunting and of little profit.

There has also been sober study of the Scriptures by scholarly evangelicals. I close this section by extracting the views of several of them as to the relation of demon possession to disease—then (New Testament times) and now.

1. Demon 'possession' was a popular fallacy to which Jesus accommodated himself without endorsing it. He healed by restoring health to souls.

One could cite almost every liberal-Christian scholar of the nineteenth and twentieth century as supporting this view, including also many neo-orthodox writers. What may be surprising to most readers is that David Smith, thoroughly evangelical author of a magnificent book on The Earthly Life of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, took this view.³⁸ This book of amazing breadth of scholarly detail, fully abreast of all relevant literature of the day in both ancient and modern European languages, interprets demon possession of the Gospel records as 'a fantastic notion of a dark age unskilled in natural science' and opined that 'it was nothing strange that the people of the New Testament believed it'.³⁹ He finds no evidence of general belief in demonic causes of sicknesses and manic disorders in Old Testament times. Rather 'the idea of demoniacal possession originated in Persia, and by the time of our Lord it had rooted itself not only in popular belief but in science and philosophy, despite the protests of certain physicians who assigned diseases to natural causes'.⁴⁰ Smith points to 'Jesus' singular detachment from current theories. He never entangled his teaching with contemporary ideas'.⁴¹ Jesus utterly rejected both the methods and doctrines of the exorcists of His time. 'Jesus dealt with the demoniacs after the manner of a wise physician. He did not seek to dispel their hallucination.' Once He had their trust, then He could deal with their problem by dealing with their real problem. ‘Where faith was lacking he could perform no mighty work.’⁴² He argues that Jesus never did endorse the idea of demonic causes of the various physical and mental torments presented to Him for help. The demonism lies wholly in the opinion of the populace, including the authors of the Gospels.

Smith is convincing until one checks to notice, first, that Jesus thought demon ‘possession’ a real enough phenomenon to produce a short discourse on the subject (Luke 11:17–26). Second, over and over the narrative record distinguishes between diseases and affliction by demons. Third, this distinction appears in Jesus’ own words in the commission of the apostles in their first mission: ‘as you go ... Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse lepers, cast out demons’ (Matt. 10:7, 8).

2. According to a more prevalent view demon-caused psychological distresses and physical ailments cured by Jesus and His disciples were hardly more than acute cases of the same influences Satan and his minions inflict on the entire race of sinful people.

The ailments, in most if not all cases, might be described accurately in ‘clinical’ terms by modern physical specialists in neurology and other medical specialities as to etiology and symptoms. I do not think R. K. Harrison is entirely clear in his wide-ranging article, ‘Demon, Demoniac, Demonology’ but this seems to be his conclusion.⁴³ He never quite states such a conclusion. I cite important lines leading me to state his conclusion in this way.

Indeed, in so far as specific clinical conditions can be identified as emotogenic, the same consideration could apply to a significantly wider range of human afflictions. Because modern psychosomatic medical research has shown that attestable clinical disease can result from such metaphysical [by which Harrison seems to mean non-material, i.e. demonic] entities as suggestion, emotional conflicts, fear, and the like, it is no longer possible to dismiss as implausible the noxious effects which the various forms of evil, working through the personality of fallen man, can have upon individual and mental well-being. Indeed, Jesus viewed all disease in these general terms ... He frequently saw the incidence of disease as the result of evil producing an imbalance within the personality.⁴⁴

He goes on to say:

The soundest approach to the situation is ultimately a theological one, which recognizes that because of depravity of human nature the mind is peculiarly liable to the influence of evil. In imbalance this constitutes a form of possession, however mild, since the personality is then at the disposal of darkness to some extent.⁴⁵

A similar outlook was tentatively set forth by J. H. A. Eberhard in the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.⁴⁶

3. Passages such as the healing of the demoniac of Gadara (Luke 8:26–39) and the epileptic boy harassed by a demon (Luke 9:37–42) should be treated with ‘ordinary and literal interpretation’.

[T]hese are evil spirits, subjects of the Evil one, who in the days of the Lord himself and his apostles, especially, were permitted by God to exercise a direct influence over the souls and bodies of certain [people]. This influence is to be distinguished sharply from the ordinary power of corruption and temptation wielded by Satan.⁴⁷

Such ‘possession’ is not a part of God’s general providence, but special supernatural manifestations of Satanic power. It might be said that the healings were divine miracles overcoming satanic miracles. Advocates of this approach usually affirm the following.

(a) Neither all deranged minds and erratic conduct nor diseases of the types reported as being corrected by deliverance from demons are caused by demons. Neither in the Gospels nor elsewhere in Scripture is demonizing distinguished from sickness from natural causes.

(b) It may be that the demon infestations of Palestine of Jesus’ time were peculiar to that time and place. Just as Satan himself attacks Jesus Himself in a special way several times in His career (at the temptation, at Caesarea Philippi, at Gethsemane) so his minions were deployed in a more open and direct hostility in periods of Jesus’ ministry, knowing that their time was short (John 12:27–33).

(c) Far from sanctioning the superstitious belief of either ancient Jews or Gentiles⁴⁸ Scripture only acknowledges such things by condemning them (Lev. 19:31; 1 Sam. 28:7; 2 Kings 21:6; 23:24).

(d) The devil uses every form of mental defect or derangement of God’s people in particular and everyone in general to defeat God’s purpose, which is that they, under the conditions of the fall, be like the ‘blessed man’ of Psalm 1:3:

He is like a tree planted by streams of water that yields its fruit in its season, and its leaf does not wither.

In all that he does, he prospers.

I can claim no special competence in dealing with perils from demons. I have never felt directly attacked by them and am convinced that they have no supernatural physical powers. I do not have a clue as to how some people of Jesus’ time—when demons were conspicuously active—became ‘demonized’, producing the symptoms described in the Gospels, nor do I know how anyone’s physical or mental disorders were recognized as demonic directly in origin. Nor do I have any information as to how ‘familiar spirits’ come to be used by mediums (witches, and similar) or possibly the other way around. Nor is it certain that in every place in the Gospels where the word demon, devil, familiar spirit and the like is mentioned this is a genuine case of supernatural, demonic activity. I wonder, for example, if Mark’s account of the healing of the Syrophenician woman’s daughter is not to be interpreted by Matthew’s comments on the incident. Mark says, ‘whose little daughter was possessed by an unclean spirit’. Matthew says that the woman said, ‘my daughter is severely oppressed by a demon’ (Matt. 15:22). Later Matthew reports simply, ‘her daughter was healed instantly’ (Matt. 15:28). Why did the woman think her daughter was afflicted by an unclean spirit (or ‘demon’)? How could she know? Jesus does not say, ‘your diagnosis is correct’. What was her competence to diagnose her daughter's condition? She was witty, but not a skilled diagnostician. And who can say what the infallible signs of the presence of demons are?

In the case of the demoniac(s) of Gerasa (Gadara), unclean spirits inhabited the bodies of the victims. There are three accounts, each affirming the afflicted person(s) was 'demon-possessed' or 'with an unclean spirit' or 'had demons'. Further the rest of the story makes clear that the distress of the afflicted was caused by infestation by many wicked personal spirits (demons) whom Jesus addressed as such and who responded as such. The same is true of the demoniac boy (Mark 9:14–29; Matt. 17:14–20; Luke 9:37–43).

So today credence is not to be given to every supposed case of 'demon possession'. There are many credulous people whose claims to 'spiritual discernment' in such matters lacks authentication and some of them quite honorable folk. I observe that sober, competent, evangelical authors show great reserve in commenting on the signs or symptoms of 'demon possession' today.

(1) I propose that we do not need to know. It is enough to be informed that all our 'wrestling' is against 'spiritual forces of evil', as Paul says, and to be assured our defence is to harness ourselves with the panoply (full armour) of God, all the parts being effective and universally available to believers (Eph. 6:12–19).

(2) I find no specific instruction for believers at the present time to engage in formal exorcisms of demons. I have seen such exorcisms tried by sincere Christian 'practitioners' who apparently claim the same insights and powers granted the Twelve (Matt. 10:8), the seventy-two (Luke 10:17) and which we see rarely (Acts 16:18 for example) granted to others. The exorcisms of demons by Jesus and His authorized messengers around the Palestinian countryside were specific proof that 'the kingdom of God has come upon you' (Matt. 12:28; and cf. 11:1–6). They were a specific sign to that people (Israel) and that generation.

(3) If one should be presented with a situation where one feels 'demonizing' (oppression, possession, affliction) is present, the resource of prayer in the name of Jesus surely will be as effective as a command (exorcism) addressed to the 'resident' demon. One of the most biblically informed and spiritually discerning ministers I have ever known reports his efforts at an 'exorcism' with apparent success at first but with equally apparent failure ultimately.⁴⁹ There is a spectacular incident reported in Acts of how presumptuous attempts at exorcism in Jesus' name by unqualified persons backfired with harmful results to the would-be exorcists (Acts 19:13–16). We read in the story that Paul, an apostle, performed genuine miracles of demon-cleansing (Acts 19:11, 12). We read of no exorcisms by Paul's assistants or converts.

(4) We are told to 'resist the devil, and he will flee from you' even if he does roar and threaten. Try on the theology of Luther's hymn, 'A Mighty Fortress'. We are apprized of dangers to our souls via the temptation of the world, the flesh and the devil, but nowhere in the New Testament are we told to wander through life in fear of demons. It is to revert to heathenism and foolish superstition to live in such fear. The agents of Beelzebub were opposed to the apostles on mission, but Jesus twice told the Twelve: 'have no fear of them' (Matt. 10:26, 28) and 'we can confidently say, "The Lord is my helper; I will not fear; what can man [or demon] do to me?"' (Heb. 13:6).

(5) On the other hand there is terrible liability to both spiritual and moral as well as physical danger in dabbling in any form of occult practice. If there is ‘demonizing’ today similar to that reported in the Gospels it lies in this quarter. The law of Moses strictly forbids consulting any person who claims powers supernatural or occult—‘alleged mystic arts, such as magic, alchemy, astrology, etc.’ (Webster’s New World Dictionary). ‘[W]hoever does these things is an abomination to the Lord’ (Deut. 18:12).⁵⁰ Most of these supposed occultists are imposters, really practicing deception by some of the same tricks magicians use and by the techniques of hypnotism.

(6) There is no special information about the present, much less the future, available to these practitioners of the occult. Said Isaiah: ‘And when they say unto you, “Enquire of the mediums and the necromancers who chirp and mutter,” should not a people enquire of their God? Should they enquire of the dead on behalf of the living? To the teaching and to the testimony! If they will not speak according to this word, it is because they have no dawn’ (Isa. 8:19, 20). Isaiah presents the Lord as repeatedly challenging the ability of so-called diviners (mediums, ‘futurists’ and similar) and denouncing them as both failures and wicked (Isa. 41:21–24), concluding: ‘Behold, you are nothing, and your work is less than nothing; an abomination is he who chooses you’ (Isa. 41:24).

As footnotes to this chapter, first, I suggest even though I have not referred to Alfred Edersheim’s work in the body of this chapter, his evaluation of the materials on demon activities in the Gospels is excellent and I find myself in agreement. His comments regarding angels, Satan, demons and magical practices occur in his expositions of outstanding examples in the Gospels.⁵¹ Second, the state of informed, evangelical study and practice in regard to demonism as well as introduction to the literature, was sketched by seventeen pages in Christianity Today magazine in 2001.⁵²

¹ McClintock & Strong, Cyclopedia, vol. ix, p. 361, right column.

² Paul Tillich, Systematic Theology III (Chicago: U. of Chicago Press, 1963), p. 102.

³ I struggled through many lean years to finish a four-year college degree, completing my work while a mission pastor supporting a family. Without the sympathetic help of the kindly dean of the church-related college who also taught my course in English literature I might not have succeeded. That dear man, product of the liberal Protestantism of the time, was not so much repelled as amazed that I was the only student in his class who seemed to love the subject and catch the nuances of Spenser and Milton who also believed there really are angels, demons and a Satan. Satan has not been alive and well in the estimation of liberal religion for several centuries.

⁴ Werner Foerster, TDNT II, daimon, daimonion, p. 17.

⁵ David Smith, The Days of His Flesh: The Earthly Life of Our Lord, 8th ed. (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1910).

⁶ Alfred Barry, Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, Hackett Edition IV, ‘Satan’ p. 2846.

⁷ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 643.

⁸ D. ...

- ⁸ Donald G. Barnhouse, The Invisible War (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1965), pp. 28–51.
- ⁹ Richard W. DeHaan, Satanism and Witchcraft (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1972), pp. 9–20.
- ¹⁰ James Kallas, The Real Satan (Minneapolis: Augsburg Publ., 1975), p. 25.
- ¹¹ Werner Foerster, ‘Satan’, TDNT, vol. vii, p. 153.
- ¹² ibid., p. 156.
- ¹³ H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of John. The Greek Text with Notes and Indices (New York: Macmillan, 1907), p. 154.
- ¹⁴ Robert H. Mounce, The New International Commentary on the New Testament, The Book of Revelation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977), pp. 240, 241.
- ¹⁵ Joshua = Jesus.
- ¹⁶ W. F. Albright & C. S. Mann, Matthew, The Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981), p. 77.
- ¹⁷ Ellicott. See Matt. 13:19, 38; John 17:15; Eph. 6:16; 2 Thess. 3:3; 1 John 2:13, 14; 3:12; 5:18, 19.
- ¹⁸ ‘Demonology’, Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed., vol. viii, pp. 5–8.
- ¹⁹ E.g., ‘Remnants of Animism in Hebrew Religion: Sacred Stones, Rocks, and Mountains’, W. O. E. Oesterley & T. H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion, Its Origin and Development (Chap. IV, 1937 and on to the present).
- ²⁰ Robert Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (New York: Harper, 1941), I have lost the page reference.
- ²¹ Francois Lenormant, The Beginnings of History according to the Bible and the tradition of Oriental People (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1891).
- ²² W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (Edinburgh: Adam & Slack, 1889 and New York: Ktav Publ., 1969, 3rd ed).
- ²³ ibid., pp. 422–427.
- ²⁴ Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, vol. i (New York: Scribners, 1898), p. 594.
- ²⁵ R. K. Harrison, ‘Demon, Demoniac, Demonology,’ ZPEB, vol. ii, pp. 92–101.
- Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

- ²⁶ See Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966), pp. 208–211.
- ²⁷ S. Vernon McCasland, Journal Biblical Liturature. 1987, Part iv, 479.
- ²⁸ James Kallas, Jesus and the Power of Satan (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968).
- ²⁹ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology II, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), pp. 105, 106.
- ³⁰ Louis S. Bauman, Three Unclean Spirits Like Frogs (Long Beach: self-published, 1936).
- ³¹ Summa Theologica, Question 63, arts. 1–9.
- ³² Richard W. DeHaan, op. cit., p. 25.
- ³³ R. K. Harrison, ‘Demons, Demoniac, Demonology’, op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 92–101.
- ³⁴ See Richard DeHaan, op. cit.; Walker I. Knight, Weird World of the Occult (Wheaton, IL: Tyndale, 1972); Victor H. Ernest, I Talked with Spirits (Wheaton, IL: Tyndale, 1972—a tale told by a convert from lifelong ‘spiritualism’ to evangelical faith).
- ³⁵ The article ‘Echo’ by Hanse in TDNT II, ‘Demonic Possession’ pp. 821, 822 is helpful at this point.
- ³⁶ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government: A Biblical View (Edmonton, AB, Canada: 1974, 2000), pp. 30–57.
- ³⁷ A. Scott Molteau, ‘Demons’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1996), p. 165.
- ³⁸ David Smith, The Days of His Flesh: The Earthly Life of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, 8th ed. (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1910) pp. 105–109.
- ³⁹ ibid., p. 105.
- ⁴⁰ ibid., p. 105.
- ⁴¹ ibid., p. 106.
- ⁴² ibid., p. 108.
- ⁴³ R. K. Harrison, ‘Demon, Demoniac, Demonology’ in ZDEB II, pp. 92–101.
- ⁴⁴ ibid., p. 100.

⁴⁵ ibid., p. 100.

⁴⁶ J. H. A. Eberhard, Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, vol. I, pp. 624, 625.

⁴⁷ ‘Demonic’ McClintock-Strong Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, vol. ii, p. 642.

⁴⁸ Tobit 8:1–3, Josephus, Antiquities viii. 2, 5; Acts 19:13.

⁴⁹ Bernard Schneider, The World of Unseen Spirits (Winona Lake, IN: BMH Books, 1975), pp. 120–122.

⁵⁰ See Deut. 18:9–14; Isa. 47:12–14; Acts 19:19, 20.

⁵¹ Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962), vol. i, pp. 479–485, 607–612; vol. ii, pp. 748–763, 770–776.

⁵² Christianity Today, 45.1, September 3, 2001, pp. 46–62, ‘Possessed or Obsessed?’ by Agnieszka Tennant and ‘Exorcism 101’ by Clinton E. Arnold.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (176). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

21

God’s Work of Preservation and Providence

‘My Father is working until now, and I am working’ (John 5:17)

How God keeps the World Operating and Governs it

Ours must surely be one of the most anxious generations in the entire history of Western civilization. The community in the rural south-east corner of Minnesota where I live exposes to the eye few signs of severe poverty. There are sufficient hospital rooms at the county seat for two counties; Mayo Clinic is an hour away. Everything is here to make its well-fed citizens happy, including some of the most graceful hills, interesting river bluffs, valleys, forests and farms one would ever care to see. Yet, the mood in the places where people meet—small cafes, bars, bank vestibules and church foyers, even farm auctions and sale barns—though it ranges from grief to joyous laughter, seems to be characteristically a sigh.

The national anxieties have been institutionalized and professionalized in many medical and quasi-medical centers. There are several related professions which minister to our fractured psyches. Anxiety is the engine for human behavior in the most accepted post World War II philosophy, existentialism. Have you heard of ‘metaphysical angst’, ‘the concept of dread’, ‘the threat of nothingness’? A segment of our youth of decades past must have heard about all this, judging from their sad, pouting faces, though the fad passed away before the sad but spectacular decease of Elvis Presley and several other of their well-paid, popular models.

Contrast with this the ideal of Christian joy in the book of Philippians, ‘Rejoice in the Lord always; again I will say, Rejoice’ (Phil. 4:4); ‘The Lord is at hand; do not be anxious about anything’ (Phil. 4:5, 6). Jesus’ own prevailing good humour sets the pace expressed in His famous advice against anxiety (Matt. 6:25–34), concluding, ‘Therefore do not be anxious about tomorrow, for tomorrow will be anxious for itself. Sufficient for the day is its own trouble’ (Matt. 6:34).

The support for this cheerful optimism is the biblical world-and-life view. Specifically, we understand firstly, that God made the world ‘good ... very good’, (Gen. 1:10, 31) ‘He has made everything beautiful in its time’ (Eccles. 3:11) (Creation); secondly, that this was according to a plan which he formed in eternity (Decrees, or Predestination) so that no emergencies would ever arise requiring patchwork maintenance; thirdly, that when He finished creating the world He immediately set about maintaining it in good order (Preservation); and fourthly, that He is governing it in such a way as to accomplish His good goals (Providence). These four aspects of God’s permanent relation to the world are clearly taught in the Bible. They have been almost unconsciously absorbed by people exposed to the whole Bible over any lengthy period of time. Together, these few profound truths are the prescription for human happiness (joy) in spite of pain, illness, disappointment, decrepitude, and, ultimately, death. We have already considered the first two, now let us attend to the third.

The Doctrine of Preservation

As we have seen (under creation above, chapters 16, 17), God ceased from creating the natural order and mankind and has not resumed that kind of creative work (Gen. 2:2). That sabbath of rest still endures, but God is still working. Not so evident in English as in Hebrew, a servant is one who works (obhedh); so the incarnate Second Person of the Trinity, ‘the Servant of the Lord’, said of the Father and of His incarnate self: ‘My Father is working until now, and I am working’ (John 5:17). This was the high point of an argument about working on the weekly Sabbath. Jesus is saying in effect that not every kind of work is unlawful on Sabbath; God has a permanent sabbath from creating the world but He is nevertheless working still at other projects.

That project of working still, at least as regards the created universe, is maintenance, or preservation. It is important that theology recognize this logically and scripturally necessary work and to distinguish it from both creation and providence. The distinction is clearly made in Ezra’s ascription of praise to God, showing how Ezra, the paramount theologian of late biblical Judaism, interpreted the Mosaic revelation, and Ezra said: ‘You are the Lord, you alone. You have made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth and all that is on it, the seas and all that is in them [what God did in the distant past]; and you preserve all of them’ (what God is doing now) (Neh. 9:6). One of David’s temple hymns proclaims, ‘O Lord, You preserve [save esv] man and beast’ (Ps. 36:6 nkjv)—preserve renders the Hebrew root yasha, hence Jeshua /or Jesus). Job, a Gentile saint, addressed God as ‘thou preserver [notser, one who guards or looks after another] of men’ (Job 7:20 kjv).

So plainly it is fully scriptural to say that both with regard to the whole and to its individual atoms, the Creator is, in the present, actively, immediately, and continually preserving and maintaining creation, and that this is to be distinguished from a forever finished work of creating this particular heaven and earth. Providence is not so distinct from preservation, for it also is a continuing work of the triune God. Some theologians speak of sustaining providence (preservation) and governing providence. There appears to be no serious error in thinking this way, but to make preservation a species of creation is false and misleading, as we shall note in the case of Jonathan Edwards, theologian, and René Descartes, philosopher.

As in most aspects of divine activity each person of the triune God participates, yet as with creation (John 1:2) preservation is the peculiar work of the Son as well. There are two plain statements, both relating the work of preservation to the Son: ‘And he is before all things, and in him all things hold together’ (Col. 1:17); ‘He is the radiance of the glory of God ... and he upholds the universe by the word of his power’ (Heb. 1:3). Paul told a pagan audience that the God ‘unknown’ but worshipped in ignorance by them, not only gave all their life and breath to every nation of earth but is also the one in whom ‘we [all mankind] live and move and have our being’ (Acts 17:23, 28).

Preservation, therefore, implies the immanent presence of God in the remotest star as well as the nearest object, in the functions of mass attraction as well as the movement of my pen and in the largest galaxy as well as in the smallest subatomic particle. Nothing would operate except by what theologians call divine concurrence in all operations of matter and mind—in every movement as well as all properties, powers and processes. Though we as personal beings have permanent existence and God’s immediate power is not a force of which we are immediately aware, it is nevertheless true that apart from divine concurrence we would cease to exist—and that will be forever true whether in hell or heaven. In direct support of such a statement, in addition to passages already cited, Job said rightly that in the ‘hand of the Lord ... is the life of every living thing and the breath of all mankind’ (Job 12:9, 10). Daniel reminded the cowering Belshazzar, ‘God’ is the One ‘in whose hand is your breath’ (Dan. 5:23)—as many other passages state or imply. Psalm 104 ought to be read to show how this upholding maintenance (concurrence) by renewal extends to all the natural order—the heavens, weather, soil, plants and mankind—in politically correct language, to the environment.

Hollywood has not yet found a way to produce the illusion of a realistic decapitation. If they do the viewer will see a gush of blood spouting several feet. The heart never rests except between beats and all the blood in the body passes through it hundreds of times every day, pumping plus or minus 2,500 pounds every hour. It beats about seventy-two times a minute. Yet I am scarcely aware of this amazing organ except after vigorous physical exertion, illness or when I lie awake with my ear on a pillow. Yet it has been serving me without interruption for three-quarters of a century with scarcely a flutter. It will continue to do so with God’s concurring operation, called preservation by well-taught believers and by good theologians. Whether one knows a name for this concurrence or not it is understood by every Bible reader who has absorbed the sense of the whole Bible. Let us continue with more detail.

The Integrity of Creation Preserved by God

The doctrine of preservation teaches that God maintains the integrity of things, both simple (the periodic table of elements, the key of ‘C’) and complex (H₂O, the solar system, laws of musical harmony). One author speaks of the ‘existence of the whole created universe’ and its ‘laws, properties, powers and processes’. Another asserts that preservation is that continued exercise of divine energy whereby the Creator upholds all his creatures in being, and in the possession of all those inherent properties and qualities with which he endowed them at their creation. That is, both the being, the attributes of every species, and the form and faculties of every individual are constantly preserved in being by God.

It is easy to see how science, and industry dependent on the discoveries science makes, could develop in a civilization committed to this sort of world-view. And it is precisely in such a place, Christian Europe, where it did marvellously emerge in the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation.

Amazing Detail

The scriptural detail is truly amazing. Let us start with the sky above: ‘Lift up your eyes on high and see: who created [past tense] these? He who brings out [present tense] their host by number ... by the greatness of his might, and because he is strong in power not one is missing’ (Isa. 40:26). Job and his friends understood, ‘In his [God’s] hand is the life of every living thing’ (Job 12:10).

Psalm 104 starts off with a present-tense, pictorial representation of God as presiding over the weather (vv. 1–4). Then after a past tense ‘frame’ about the creation (its terms suggest geological history, vv. 8–9), the Psalm continues with a presentation of God’s gracious care for all His earthly creatures. He provides water for all beasts (vv. 10–13), then provides for the growth of animals and plants (wind, oil, bread and trees for birds). He causes mountains and crags to rise up for exotics like wild goats and badgers (vv. 14–18). The heavenly bodies mark the seasons: night is for wild beasts to stalk prey; day for their sleep and for mankind’s work (vv. 19–23). Birth and death are within God’s power as well as the sequence of day and night and of the seasons.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene

The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear;

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen

And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

These lines from Gray’s Elegy are not strictly true, however sadly evident they seem, because God has a place for all good things and employs them to support that plan wherever and whenever they are. Furthermore, even if no human being sees a pearl hidden in an oceanic crevice and most wild flowers grow where no human eye observes, the heavenly Father does see and for His pleasure ‘they are and were created’.

A Continuous Work

The divine work of preservation is never represented in Scripture as simply the running down of a clock-like cosmos, wound up at creation and now unwinding. Some theological writers assert that it is unreasonable to suppose that God could or would or should be personally concerned with the innumerable details of millions of human lives, to say nothing of all existing things. It is, however, precisely God’s present sustaining of us, His people, which imparts much of the ‘religious’ value to the Christian idea of God. ‘I can do all things through him who strengthens me’ (Phil. 4:13); ‘The eternal God is your dwelling place, and underneath are the everlasting arms’ (Deut. 33:27).

Jesus taught His disciples to rely on this truth. ‘[D]o not be anxious about your life, what you will eat or what you will drink, nor about your body, what you will put on... Look at the birds of the air: they neither sow nor reap nor gather into barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not of more value than they?’ (Matt. 6:25, 26) and ‘Are not two sparrows sold for a penny? And not one of them will fall to the ground apart from your Father... Fear not, therefore; you are of more value than many sparrows’ (Matt. 10:29, 31). Comforting, quotable, reliable, psychic medicine such as these passages is not available in any religion wherein God is Creator only. He must act concurrently with us as well.

We know that God sustains evil people in their ways too—not because they are evil, but because they are His creatures. ‘God concurs with the evil acts of his creatures only as they are natural acts, not as they are evil.’ The sense of this statement by A. H. Strong, appears frequently in orthodox theologies of every denominational persuasion.¹

A Gracious Work

The gracious work of God in preservation may be regarded as an aspect of His faithfulness, love and mercy for all, for the human race in particular. The sun, moon and stars go through their motions at the right times. Spring ever returns after winter. ‘While the earth remains’ (Gen. 8:22) lovers marry, families are born, science and industry operate, indeed life goes on, because God is faithful to maintain His creation. David summed it up: ‘Your steadfast love, O Lord, extends to the heavens, your faithfulness to the clouds. Your righteousness is like the mountains of God; your judgments are like the great deep; man and beast you save, O Lord. How precious is your steadfast love, O God! The children of mankind take refuge in the shadow of your wings’ (Ps. 36:5–7).

The Doctrine of Providence

Providence is the theological term for the continuous going forth of God’s power whereby He causes all features of the created universe to fulfil the design for which He created them.

Creation explains how there happens to be a world at all; preservation explains why it still exists in good order; and providence explains how it will develop toward God’s eternally planned goal. It is the consummation in time of the plan of God made in eternity.

‘General’ and ‘special’ providence are terms without a fixed meaning used by theologians. For some, e.g. Louis Berkhof, the former denotes ‘God’s control of the universe as a whole’ and the latter ‘his care for each part of it in relation to the whole’.² Calvin reserves ‘providence’ as a term for the ‘especial care over each of his works’. ‘Yet’, says he, ‘I do not wholly repudiate what is said concerning universal providence’, though he regards it as ‘some kind of blind and ambiguous notion’.³

There are also theologians who restrict ‘special’ or ‘particular’ providence to ‘such particular exhibitions of [God’s] wisdom and power in emergencies ... to awaken conviction of his interest in and guardianship over his creatures’.⁴ These instances are usually restricted to miracles, fulfillment of prophecy, special acts of God in redemption and answers to prayer.

As applied to any specific event, the Bible seems to suggest that providence originates with God's foreknowledge. In the Bible, foreknowledge is not mere information in the sense of God's mind knowing what He prefers to do. Foreknowledge is God's act of informing His will. Although there is no temporal 'process' in God's mind, we may think of a logical order in God's mind and action. So in this manner of speaking we may think of God in the 'process' of planning (decreeing) to do what He knows His will is; then through creation, next preservation and finally providence, events come to pass.

Examples of Providence

Let a biblical, historical incident furnish an example of providence (2 Sam. 15–18). We know from many texts that God planned to rule Israel through David for a while and, more importantly, to bring Christ into the world through David. There was a plot by a rebellious son, Absalom, to destroy David. Ahithophel and Hushai were King David's counsellors. When David fled Jerusalem both advisors stayed behind: Ahithophel voluntarily, for he joined Absalom's rebellion; Hushai at David's request. Not long afterward Ahithophel gave Absalom good advice, if Absalom was to destroy his father; while at about the same time Hushai gave him bad advice, knowing it was bad and hoping thereby to destroy Absalom and to save David. Absalom followed the bad advice of Hushai, lost the battle, lost his kingdom, lost his life, while Ahithophel went to his home city, put his business affairs in order and hanged himself.

Now God was not far away in heaven simply letting history unwind in the grip of immutable laws of men and things. No person's freedom was limited by God. Many individuals—Joab, Ahithophel, Hushai, the elders and the men of Absalom's partisans—each did what he voluntarily decided to do. Yet, says the Scripture, 'And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, "The counsel of Hushai the Archite is better than the counsel of Ahithophel." For the Lord had ordained to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, so that the Lord might bring harm [a disastrous defeat] upon Absalom' (2 Sam. 17:14). If biblical narrative is authority for doctrine, and it is, this narrative teaches a strong doctrine of particular providence. I do not think any Christian is at liberty to disbelieve it.

The Bible itself employs the story of Joseph and his brothers as an illustrative example of divine providence. The force is of such magnitude to warrant including all the texts. I assume the reader knows the story (Gen. 37–45). At the denouement when Joseph, last seen by his family as a boy, and now middle-aged, is unveiled to their eyes as their betrayed brother Joseph, he reassured them with these words:

And now do not be distressed or angry with yourselves because you sold me here, for God sent me before you to preserve life [in Egypt as well as in Jacob's family].... God sent me before you to preserve for you a remnant on earth, and to keep alive for you many survivors. So it was not you who sent me here, but God (Gen. 45:5, 7, 8).

Much later Joseph reassured the brothers, when after their father's death they feared Joseph might take vengeance on them, with this affirmation of providence:

Joseph said to them, 'Do not fear, for am I in the place of God? As for you, you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive, as they are today' (Gen. 50:19, 20).

The thought of Psalm 105 is wholly occupied with divine preservation and providence and takes up the story of Joseph and his brothers as an example of the same (Ps. 105:16–23). In the recital, amongst other things, God ‘summoned a famine’ and ‘he sent a man ahead of them, Joseph, who was sold as a slave ... until what he had said came to pass ... to bind his princes at his pleasure’.

Finally, Stephen in his address to the mob who killed him recited the same story as part of his narrative of God’s providential and preserving care of the Hebrew people from Abraham onward (Acts 7:9–16).

Regular Methods and Means of Providence

The Bible informs us of at least three ways through which God regularly executes His work of providential control.

(1) The most obvious is through supernatural miracles and ‘special’ uses of natural forces. God saved Jerusalem during Hezekiah’s reign through a supernatural plague (Isa. 37:36–38); He got the Israelites out of Egypt through a succession of eleven wonders (ten plagues and the parting of the Red Sea); He secured their entrance into Canaan by stopping the waters of Jordan, then by shaking down the walls of Jericho and causing the sun to ‘stand still’ for several hours. That some of these wonders were accomplished by uses of natural forces is certain—an east wind, for example, helped at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:21). Yet each was specially God’s act in an extraordinary way.

It is hard to find absolute, unlimited human free will in these cases. On closer look it cannot be denied that some people’s wills were indeed manipulated by circumstances controlled by God. The Egyptians were made willing to give abundance of goods, silver, precious stones and costly textiles by the ten divinely inflicted plagues. We cannot imagine love or generous feelings promoting such generosity for a despised lower class. Pharaoh and his army, for another example, were deliberately baited to follow the Israelites, yet as soon as they got into the trap of the seabed, God sent the waters back to destroy them.

These stories of divine providence in action are not shaded by the writers of Scripture to let God off from being in charge even of the uncoerced actions of free people. Mankind’s power of voluntary choice is unimpeded by God in each case. Yet on closer examination it is also plain enough that God directed (if ‘manipulated’ be too strong a term for the reader’s taste) people’s choices by His control of the circumstances. Paul dealt with objectors who complained, ‘Who can resist his will?’ by a sort of ‘so what’ response: ‘But who are you, O man, to answer back to God? Will what is moulded say to its moulder, “Why have you made me like this?”’ If anyone can think of a better response to objections to a God who is in charge, let us hear it!

The miracles of the virgin birth of Jesus and His resurrection, like His death in our place, were planned in eternity and executed in time. If, however, Augustus had not decreed his census (Luke 2:1–5) and if Herod had not sought the young child’s life, Jesus would never have fulfilled the prophecies involving both Bethlehem and Egypt (Matt. 2:19–23). We may be sure that neither Augustus nor Herod was coerced in any way to do what he did. Herod was no poor king—certainly no victim or object of sympathy. He was a monster who did exactly what his inclination, already bond-slave to sin, inclined his will to decide. Similarly, if Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2) was to be the scene of the Savior’s birth, then God sent Naomi and Ruth back home to Bethlehem, and Jesse did business there. Fulfillment of prophecy requires divine governance in detail of everything that exists.

It is important to observe that in no case did God coerce anyone's will. Providence operated effectively and people acted without coercion. I am not quite sure we should say they acted 'freely' for they were 'slaves' to sin, as Jesus affirmed (John 8:34). The usual disjunction between the 'free will' of mankind and the sovereignty of God is incorrect. Mankind does have the unimpeded power of voluntary choice and we are not coerced by God. But we are slaves to sin and so not entirely free. Jesus, as cited above, says everyone who sins (and there are no exceptions) is a slave of sin. The disjunction is between the free will of mankind and the sovereignty of God only if by free will one understands uncoerced will. The power to choose is there, but not apart from predisposition to choose in a certain way. It helps in thinking about this problem to propose that every man or woman is a self-determined free agent (as all parties do agree) whose choices (will) are determined by what the person already is—a natural-born sinner.

Calvin, who canvassed the dimensions of the problem, liked to compare a healthy free will to a person with good legs but the will of a sinner to a person with two complete legs, both broken. The sinner has the right equipment for walking but it is out of order.⁵

(2) A second area of providence is the regular processes of nature. Psalm 148:8 speaks of fire and hail, snow, vapor, and stormy winds fulfilling God's word. Again people find little to offend them in this—unless they think deeply. It is easy to say that God sent a snow flurry to Waterloo in Belgium, two centuries ago, to defeat Napoleon, or to say that God kept the English Channel calm for several days to allow the defeated British army at the Dunkirk beachhead to escape Hitler's forces in the early days of World War II. Yet, few approve the suggestion that a Chicago fire may have been caused by God, especially when the cow of a careless Irish housewife can be blamed. What about the San Francisco earthquake, and floods and quakes in China? A few years ago the television news showed a Turkish woman renouncing Allah because her grandchild had been killed in a terrible earthquake a few hours before. People find it easier to say Hitler unnecessarily destroyed the heart of Britain's cities than that God rained bombs on them as He did fire on Sodom. Is it that Sodom deserved judgment while London did not? Or is it that the fires that rained down on Sodom may have been natural and volcanic while the bombs which fell on London were manufactured in Munich or Stuttgart? Let us defer answering to the next few paragraphs.

(3) A third area of providence is the acts of moral beings, both angels and people, both good and bad. In the course of recent chapters we have cited certain examples of how God accomplishes His will through the acts of 'free' beings. Joseph and his coming to Egypt through the evil deeds of his brothers has been cited, as also the rejection of Jesus by the leaders of the Jews, which rejection brought Jesus to Calvary (Acts 2:23). Judas' treachery is another example often cited—he fulfilled a prophecy. Paul cites the rejection of Jesus by the nation of Israel in a similar way (Rom. 11). Shortly we shall try to provide further suggestions to alleviate any distress from our natural sense of justice or from our intuitions of 'freedom'.

God's Providence is All-inclusive

The Bible is clear that nothing at all in this entire universe is outside the Creator's providential control. The evidence is varied. The teaching is in all parts of the Bible and it is overwhelming. The article on providence in the McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia, after an extensive citation of passages, adds, ‘The teaching of the more than five hundred passages might be confirmed, were it necessary, by nearly as many thousands more, showing with what emphasis the Scriptures proclaim the doctrine of divine providence.’⁶ So comprehensive is this that it is said, ‘his kingdom rules over all’ (Ps. 103:19); He ‘does according to his will among the host of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth’ (Dan. 4:35); and He ‘works all things according to the counsel of his will’ (Eph. 1:11).

It will be impressive to examine a few of the more comprehensive categories of things wherein divine providence works. We will cite only a few passages, though in most cases there are dozens of other passages which might also be cited. God’s providence rules over the following.

(1) The physical world. ‘Whatever the Lord pleases, he does, in heaven and on earth, in the seas and all deeps. He it is who makes the clouds rise at the end of the earth, who makes lightnings for the rain and brings forth the wind from his storehouses’ (Ps. 135:6, 7).⁷

(2) Plant life. ‘The trees of the Lord are watered abundantly, the cedars of Lebanon that he planted’ (Ps. 104:16). Psalm 104:21, 28 says that the lions are fed by God, Matthew 6:26 that He feeds the birds, and Jesus said of the sparrows, ‘not one of them will fall to the ground apart from your Father’ (Matt. 10:29). God ‘appointed’ the great fish which featured in Jonah’s experiences (Jonah 1:17), as also the worm (Jonah 4:7).

(3) People’s social position. God rules over people’s birth, and place in life. David (Ps. 139:16), Jeremiah (Jer. 1:5) and Paul (Gal. 1:15, 16) were aware of this. There were many fine families in Israel but the one to provide the new king was prepared by God (1 Sam. 16:1).

(4) People’s successes and failures are brought to pass by God, ‘For not from the east or from the west and not from the wilderness comes lifting up, but it is God who executes judgment, putting down one and lifting up another’ (Ps. 75:6, 7). Furthermore, ‘he has brought down the mighty from their thrones and exalted those of humble estate’ (Luke 1:52).

(5) The time and circumstances of a person’s death are under God’s government. Such was the case with Moses (Deut. 32:48–50), as well as all the adult Israelites who came out of Egypt (Num. 14:29). But the same was true of Peter (John 21:18, 19). And Job was not mistaken when he said, ‘In his hand is the life of every living thing and the breath of all mankind’ (Job 12:10; cf. Ps. 104:29).

(6) Guidance and spiritual needs. God supplies the material needs of His people (Matt. 5:45; 6:8, 11, 26; Phil. 4:19) and their spiritual guidance. Paul knew when ‘Satan hindered us’ (1 Thess. 2:18) and when he was ‘forbidden by the Holy Spirit’ (Acts 16:6). While we do not have quite the same insights as a prophet or an apostle, we have assurance of His superintendence over our lives.

(7) His people. God’s care for His people is so complete that seeming calamities are blessings in disguise (Phil. 1:12–14; cf. Eph. 3:1).

(8) Apparent calamities. These may even be the very means of God’s grace to others (Phil. 1:12–14; Philem. 15).

(9) Temptations, trials, persecutions. Deliverance from temptations, trials, persecutions have all been provided for (1 Cor. 10:13; cf. Dan. 3:17, 18). The Christian outlook thus permits me to see national events of great moment as developing out of seeming trivial, chance events—a sleepless night (Esther 6:1) or a sad countenance (Neh. 2:1, 2). These seeming trivialities are often more decisive than the decisions of judicial and legislative assemblies or executive decisions of national leaders.

There is no doctrine about God more resoundingly proclaimed throughout the Bible than that of providence. In addition to the selections already cited here, there are dozens of texts which assert God's direct control over nature, birth, disease, death, afflictions, adversity, prosperity, rewards, punishments, deliverances, disasters, bad laws and good ones. 'The teaching of more than five hundred passages [cited in the article] might be confirmed, were it necessary, by as many thousands more, showing with what emphasis the Scriptures proclaim the doctrine of divine Providence.'⁸

Providence and Chance

Does God's providence extend to chance—to what is sometimes called statistical probability? The answer is affirmative, with qualification. 'The lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the Lord' (Prov. 16:33). This bit of proverbial wisdom assumes that God is in charge even of card games and roulette wheels. No Christian can accept chance as an 'undesigned cause' of reality in general. The regularity and uniformity of the sequences of nature are not assigned to chance in the Bible, even though some scientists base their logic for the theory of evolution on chance and explain origins that way. The Bible traces the origin and present integrity of every existing thing to God, the Creator.

Chance had a name among the ancient Greeks, Tyche. She became an important goddess, in Latin Fortuna (hence our words, fortune and fortunate). She was not above control by some other deities—the fates, hence our words fate and fatal. As Douglas Spanner writes:

[Man] cannot help being a religious animal; so what does he do? He makes his own gods, of a sort which won't impose unacceptable demands on him and which he can manipulate. The mysterious and unknown, of course, must enter into their constitution, or they could hardly be gods. So he looks around for suitable material, and Chance [luck] suggests itself as an eligible candidate. It accordingly becomes deified, an active agency in its own right.⁹

Tyche, chance, fortune, fate are all of the 'nothing' variety of whom Paul wrote (1 Cor. 8:1–4). Chance turns out to be a name of what God knows but we do not (Ps. 139:1–5; Isa. 40:27, 28; Jer. 23:24; Luke 12:6, 7). Because God controls even the casting of lots it could be said¹⁰ both that it was by lot and that it was proportioned to the size and need of each tribe and according to divine plan.

There is a class of Scripture passages which assert God's government of what people call chance and accident. Among the 'statutes' accompanying the decalogue, for example, is this: 'Whoever strikes a man so that he dies shall be put to death. But if he did not lie in wait for him, but God let him fall into his hand, then I will appoint for you a place to which he may flee', and similar (Exod. 21:12, 13; cf. Deut. 19:4–5). Elijah predicted, 'In the place where dogs licked up the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick your [Ahab's] own blood' (1 Kings 21:19). Later in the battle of the allied kings (Ahab and Jehoshaphat) against the Syrians, 'a certain man drew his bow at random and struck the king of Israel between the scale armour and the breastplate.... So the king died.' They brought the king's body back to Samaria in his blood-soaked chariot, which they washed by 'the pool of Samaria, and the [prophesied] dogs licked up his blood ... according to the word of the Lord that he had spoken' (1 Kings 22:34–38).

Occasionally the Scriptures call an event 'chance'. These are events unpurposed by human beings. Even Jesus spoke of chance in this way (Luke 10:31). The Hebrew word for 'chance' or 'hap' (literally, a meeting) is used of Ruth's undesigned (as far as she was concerned) gleaning in the field of Boaz (Ruth 2:3). It is therefore correct to think of unpurposed human events as occurring by chance. But God has a purpose in every event. Chance is simply our name for certain things, not God's. He merely deigns occasionally to use our term instead of His.

A paragraph from A. H. Strong gives sensible advice:

Not all chances are of equal importance. The casual meeting of a stranger in the street need not bring God's providence before me, although I know that God arranges it. Yet I can conceive of that meeting as leading to religious conversation and to the stranger's conversion. When we are prepared for them, we shall see many opportunities which are now as unmeaning to us as the gold in the river beds was to the early Indians in California.¹¹

Paul calls such occasions 'Redeeming the time', i.e. making use of every opportunity (Eph. 5:16 kjv).

Chance therefore is a valid notion in the context of human ignorance of what God's plans and actions are. It has a place in the science of physics and statistics, and the like. Whether the idea is sound of chance mutation as sufficient mechanism for evolution in the history of organic life is a thought for another occasion.

Providence and the Evil Acts of 'Free' People

Everything said earlier about divine concursus in all acts of people and freedom of the will as non-coercion of people's wills and acts is relevant to evil acts as well as good ones. In addition, it has seemed that when God's government of His world includes evil acts of His creatures, providence may be explained as of four kinds: (1) permissive, (2) preventive, (3) directive and (4) limiting. The terms have been supplied by generations of theologians but the ideas are biblical, even though some Supralapsarian 'super' Calvinists are rather scornful of these distinctions. It seems such an analysis of the scriptural evidence is valid, as can be seen.

1. Permissive providence. Though God might have restrained them, Paul declared 'In past generations he allowed all the nations to walk in their own ways' (Acts 14:16), and regarding the heathen, 'God gave them up in the lusts of their hearts.... God gave them up to dishonourable passions' (Rom. 1:24, 26). Paul explains that, previous to the propitiation wrought by Christ, 'in his divine forbearance he had passed over former sins' (Rom. 3:25). God simply withheld impediments to their wickedness.¹²

2. Preventive providence. In Abimelech's dream God explained, 'It was I who kept you from sinning against me. Therefore I did not let you touch her [Sarah]' (Gen. 20:6). This is one of many similar passages. Hosea's immoral wife could not be restrained as far as her husband's power went, but Israel could be restrained. Therefore God addressed a poignant appeal to the nation, in the midst of which he said, 'I will hedge up her way with thorns, and I will build a wall against her, so that she cannot find her [wicked] paths' (Hos. 2:6). Thus God prevents sins which might otherwise be committed. The 'hedge' and 'thorns' may be age, disease, enlivened conscience, memory of neglected lessons and so on. There are many such scriptural texts and illustrative passages.

3. Directive (or redirective) providence. Here we recall the earlier example in the life of Joseph (Gen. 45:7, 8; 50:20, 21). Similarly, the Assyrians served God's good purpose though they intended evil. Assyria was 'the rod' of God's anger in judging many wicked nations. 'But he does not so intend, and his heart does not so think' (Isa. 10:5, 7). '[Y]ou meant evil ... but God meant it for good'.

4. Limiting or determinative providence. In a sense this is an aspect of common grace whereby God keeps evil movements in society, evil people in our company and evil impulses in individuals from full development. Otherwise life on this planet would cease. There are many passages in which God places severe restraints on intended evils in order to spare His people (Ps. 124:2; Job 1:12; 2:6). He thus shields each saint from overmuch trials (1 Cor. 10:3). Finally, God will put such immediate restraints on 'that ancient serpent' (Rev. 20:2, 3). Except for this extension of God's gracious providence, the race would have come to oblivion long ago.

Providence and 'Hypothetical Contingency'

What will Mr X do if he discovers Mrs X is lying about where she spends her Saturdays? If Grandfather gets well by Christmas will he really take me skiing? Can God predict and control such things? Actually, God's knowledge is specifically involved in such cases more directly than His government. There is a passage where just such a hypothetical situation is proposed. Would the citizens of a certain town betray David if they had opportunity? David inquired of God and got the answer, Yes they would. So David acted accordingly and left town (see 1 Sam. 23:1–2). A little reflection will convince one that if we accept the other areas of God's providence, then hypothetical contingency is as much an area of His government as any other.

The relation of predestination and providence is closely related to the topic of divine omniscience. The 'openness of God' sect of theology and 'process theology' deny God's omniscience and with it His complete control (providence, government) of the world He created and sustains.¹³

Providence and Prayer

Does God's plan and its certain fulfillment leave room for prayer by believers and answer by God? We are told by Jesus (Luke 18:1) that we ought always to pray and by the great Apostle to pray without ceasing (1 Thess. 5:17). Paul, who wrote more about God's decrees and providence than any other writer of Scripture, not only commanded Christians to pray but showed great confidence that God does answer prayer. Thus, the answer to our question is 'Yes'. Providence not only leaves room for prayer—it requires prayer.

We do not answer, ‘Yes’, but mean only that prayer has reflex action on the one who prays. This would be merely a religious athletical exercise. Subjective effects from prayer may or may not be good. Daniel was exhausted by his prayers and would not have engaged in prayer except that he expected objective results from God (Dan. 7:28; 8:27). Nor do we mean that prayer is a precondition to spiritual blessing, though that is true in some cases.

The Christian God is the God of all creation. He has known all along about our prayers. ‘Before they call I will answer; while they are yet speaking I will hear’ (Isa. 65:24); ‘Then you shall call, and the Lord will answer; you shall cry, and he will say, “Here I am” ’ (Isa. 58:9). God’s plans included the prayers. God not only recommends prayer, He commands prayer and moves our hearts to seek Him out in prayer. This should be kept in mind in reading how that ‘The eyes of the Lord are towards the righteous and his ears towards their cry’ (Ps. 34:15).

Let us boldly assert that God’s plans are all-important in prayer. Three times in one terrible night Jesus asked God to let the cup of Calvary’s suffering pass from Him, yet added, ‘Nevertheless, not my will, but yours, be done.’ He acknowledged that His death for sinners was planned from eternity and that Scripture predicted it (see John 1:29, 36; Rev. 13:8). Christ was and is the ‘lamb ... foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times’ (1 Peter 1:19, 20 kjv).

We may be sure that the will of God ought to condition all our requests in prayer. We cannot command God, nor is strong faith always necessary; Jesus responded favourably to hesitant faith more than once.

At first glance James 1:6–8 seems to demand very vigorous faith as prerequisite for prevailing prayer—‘the one who doubts ... will [not] receive anything from the Lord’. In view, however, of what Jesus said about faith being ‘like a grain of mustard seed’ (Luke 13:19) and instances of amazing answers to hesitant prayers the wavering of James is not hesitancy between strong faith and weak faith but between unbelief and genuine belief. Tennyson’s lines come to mind: ‘There’s more faith, I tell you, in honest doubt, than in half the [recitals of] creeds.’

If, in prayer, we ‘ask anything according to his will’ (1 John 5:14), we ought to devote ourselves to diligent Bible study and reflection on Scripture, consulting also with Christians wiser than we are. These are part of genuine faith. Let us seek to learn what God wants and wish for the same, even if personal loss, suffering or even death are necessary to bring it to pass. It is not wrong to pray for one’s self. The Psalmists did and so did our Lord. But effective prayer will certainly focus on God and His plans. Our plans will be adjusted to His.

There can be no physical demonstration that God answers prayers. There are moral preconditions which forbid a scientifically controlled situation. God’s will is not subject to scientific analysis and His sovereign power cannot be brought to the laboratory. ‘You shall not put the Lord your God to the test.’ Faith-compelling answers even to saintly prayers are rare. God answered Elijah’s prayer for such a demonstration for good reasons, and we know what they were (see 1 Kings 18:36–39). But when the Pharisees said to Jesus, ‘Master, we would see a sign from thee’, Jesus responded, ‘An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and no sign there shall be given to it’ (Matt. 12:38, 39 kjv).

Providence and Christian Effort

Does belief in providence hinder Christian effort? Hardly! Some of the most active evangelists and pastors, philanthropists and missionaries have had great confidence in God's providence. Again Paul may be cited¹⁴ and he is typical.

Quietism counsels self-abnegation, abandonment of effort, quiet yielding. Extremists of this persuasion advocate the giving up even of will and reason as demanded by the will and wisdom of God. Contrariwise, naturalistic or sceptical advice leaves no place to trust anything but self-help and human effort. But both trust and effort are parts of God's will for us. We know that God uses means for almost everything He does. We are His means to accomplish many things.

You are the only Bible

The careless world will read.

You are the sinner's Gospel,

You are the scoffer's creed.

Prayer without employment of God's means is an insult to Him. If the house catches on fire, call on God to put it out but also call the fire department and get busy with a water bucket. 'When God gets ready to save the heathen He will save them', all right, but don't be surprised, if you are interested in when He does it, that He tells you to help in the project now!

Providence and the Will of God

George Mueller of Bristol, one of the most active Christians who ever lived, had some fine things to say on this subject.

I seek at the beginning to get my heart into such a state that it has no will of its own in regard to a given matter. Nine-tenths of the difficulties are overcome when our hearts are ready to do the Lord's will, whatever it may be. Having done this, I do not leave the result to feeling or simple impression. If I do so, I make myself liable to a great delusion. I seek the will of the Spirit of God through, or in connection with, the Word of God. The Spirit and the Word must be combined. If I look to the Spirit alone, without the Word, I lay myself open to great delusions also. If the Holy Spirit guides us at all, He will do it according to the Scriptures, and never contrary to them. Next I take into account providential circumstances. These often plainly indicate God's will in connection with His Word and His Spirit. I ask God in prayer to reveal to me His will aright. Thus through prayer to God, the study of His Word, and reflection, I come to a deliberate judgment according to the best of my knowledge and ability, and if my mind is thus at peace, I proceed accordingly.

Thus the great founder of Christian orphanages brought prayer, God's will (decrees) and His providence to focus in a marvellously useful life.

'Application of the Doctrine of Providence'

I have borrowed the heading from John Flavel, whose book, The Mystery of Providence, first saw the light of day in print in 1687, over 300 years ago. The last forty-one pages of his 221-page book are devoted to practical application of providence to Christian life.

I select a few lines:

If God performs all things for us, then it is our great interest and concern in all things to study to please him upon whom we depend for all things.... Fear nothing but sin. Study nothing so much as how to please God. Do not turn from your own integrity under temptation. Trust God in the way of your duty. These are sure rules to secure yourselves and your interests in all the vicissitudes of life.¹⁵

The whole book is a treasure very productive of ‘righteousness and peace and joy, in the Holy Ghost’.¹⁶

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 418.

² Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1941), p. 168.

³ John Calvin, Institutes I, 16.4.

⁴ S. H. Platt, ‘Providence’ in McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia VIII, pp. 710, 711.

⁵ Calvin, Institutes II, chapters. 2–5.

McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

⁶ McClintock & Strong Cyclopedia, viii, p. 708.

⁷ See also Job 37:5, 10; Matt. 5:45; Matt. 6:30.

⁸ S. H. Platt, op. cit., viii p. 708.

⁹ Douglas Spanner, Biblical Creation and the Theory of Evolution (Exeter: Paternoster Press, 1987), pp. 47, 48.

¹⁰ See Josh. 18:10; Ps. 47:4; Acts 1:24–26.

¹¹ A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 428.

¹² See also 2 Chr. 32:21; Deut. 8:2; Ps. 81:12, 13; Hos. 4:17.

¹³ See the earlier section on God’s attribute of omniscience, and discussion of ‘middle knowledge’ (Chapter 11, The Greatness of the Godhead).

¹⁴ See Deut. 8:2; Ps. 138:10; 1 Cor. 13:12

— See Rom. 9:1–3, 13–18; 10:1–3, 12–15.

¹⁵ John Flavel, The Mystery of Providence (London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1963) from last paragraph of chapter 11.

¹⁶ Available from Banner of Truth Trust.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (191). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

22

Appendices on God's Preservation and Providence (Chapter 21)

Appendix I

Creation, Preservation, Providence, and the Rise of Experimental and Applied Science

As long ago as the late third century bc, Aristarchus of Samosa, a Greek astronomer, was convinced by his observations and calculus that in spite of appearances the sun is larger than the earth, hence not likely to be revolving around the earth as it seems, but the other way around. He even anticipated the modern methods of employing trigonometry to calculate the distances of sun and moon from our earth.¹ But the time was not ripe, so in want of indisputable evidence, these ideas gained no general acceptance until the age of discovery (1400s ad) and the development shortly thereafter of an experimental, then fully inductive, study of nature.

Why did it take so long? The wisdom of the Greek philosophers never seriously engaged the material world. They had 'little sympathy for a disinterested science of nature'.² Greek 'intellectuals (Plato and Aristotle, for example) held manual labor in low esteem'. The philosopher considered it beneath his dignity to engage in manual work or to use working methods of mechanics to solve his scientific problems. The age of science had to wait until there was social acceptance for putting head and hands together.

There is a catch, however, as anyone knows who has read of Adam's duty to dress and guard his garden and to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, or of Jesus' dictum, 'My Father is working until now, and I am working', or Paul's stern sentence, 'If anyone is not willing to work, let him not eat'—the Bible from beginning to end sets a high social value on work. Why then did not an intellectual and social climate conducive to manual work, and material experimentation essential to applied science (industry), develop in the lands of Christendom? I think R. Hooykaas has the right answer. He asserts:

For the building materials of Science (logic, mathematics, the beginning of a rational interpretation of the world) we have to look to the Greeks; but the vitamins indispensable for a healthy growth came from the biblical concept of creation [also preservation and providence, guaranteeing the uniformity of nature]. The fact that the victory of Christianity did not bring an immediate liberation from the bonds of Greek metaphysics [where either fate and chance rule over falling atoms of air, earth, fire and water falling in a void] in no way disproves this statement. The compromise of Christian religion, first with Platonism, then with Aristotelianism, strongly influenced not only secular learning but also theology. Even the positive biblical appreciation of the crafts hardly overcame the traditional attitudes of Graeco-Roman (and perhaps also autochthonous [indigenous]) social conception, especially after the first force of love had spent itself and Christianity had become a firmly established world religion.³

In the changing atmosphere of the Renaissance, the Reformation reintroduced the biblical view of nature in a time when religious convictions of the general culture had to be accommodated by the movers and shakers of society.

Augustine may have come close. He certainly had a strong doctrine of providence. He interpreted history in terms of providence but focused on the spiritual side as a long ‘drama of sin and redemption [which] philosophy dominated the Middle Ages’.⁴ Some of the scholastics of a nominalist trend may have come close to escaping the closed system of medieval thinking. God’s world was still full of superstitious fears of the unknown (causes of disease, spooks, demons out of control), and in Roman theology, at the local level, miracles occupied the minds of priests and laymen much more than a benign providence.

The Reformation changed that wherever its thought-patterns prevailed. All the Reformers deprecated the popular beliefs in the power of relics, amulets, priestly blessings, apparitions of saints and similar to interfere with the normal ‘order of nature’, as Calvin called it. After citing several passages of Scripture he summarizes: ‘From this we gather that his general providence not only flourishes among creatures so as to continue the order of nature [emphasis added] but is by his wonderful plan adapted to a definite end.’⁵ Rejecting confused ancient semi-patheistic or vitalistic notions of God’s presence in nature, which made ‘a shadow deity to drive away the true God, whom we should fear and adore’, he goes on to say:

I confess ... that it can be said reverently, provided it proceeds from a reverent mind, that nature is God; but because it is a harsh and improper saying, since nature is rather the order prescribed by God [emphasis added], it is harmful in such weighty matters, in which special devotion is due, to involve God confusedly in the inferior course of his works.⁶

It is the same Calvin who a few pages later affirmed of the special ‘nature’ of things:

[T]he depravity and malice both of man and the devil or the sins that arise therefrom, do not spring from nature, but rather from the corruption of nature. And from the beginning nothing at all has existed in which God has not put forth an example both of his wisdom and of his righteousness.⁷

In this way this Reformer soundly rejected the false basis of asceticism—that there is something evil in the fleshly-material side of ourselves and the world about us—opening up for investigation and practical use the vast world which experimenters and synthesizers have explored since that time.

Calvin found this new outlook in the biblical teachings of creation and providence. In this world, speaking strictly, ‘God’s providence, as it is taught in Scripture, is opposed to fortune and fortuitous happenings ... And concerning inanimate objects we ought to hold that, although each one has by nature been endowed with its own property, yet it is directed by God’s ever present hand.... Nothing is more natural than for spring to follow winter; summer, spring; and fall, summer—each in turn. Yet in this series one sees such great and uneven diversity that it readily appears each year, month, and day is governed by a new, a special, providence of God.’⁸

In another Appendix we shall see that for this Reformer the steady maintenance and control of nature by God condemns the flourishing of the miracle business rampant in the medieval church, resulting in further corruption of an ignorant population of Christendom.

Luther did not develop a systematic doctrine of providence. Rather, throughout his reforming career he wrote and spoke of God’s power and will by which He energizes and controls everything which exists. Among hundreds of possible quotations I cite one. Luther does not distinguish sharply between God’s creating, preserving and providential works.

It is God who created, effects, and preserves all things through his almighty power and right hand, as our Creed confesses. For he dispatches no officials or angels when he creates or preserves something, but all this is the work of his divine powers itself. If he is to create or preserve it, however, he must be present and must make and preserve his creation both in its innermost and outermost aspects. Therefore, indeed, he himself must be present in every single creature in its innermost and outermost being, on all sides, through and through, below and above, before and behind, so that nothing can be more truly present and within all creatures than God himself with his power.⁹

Luther thought of this work as an aspect of sovereign divine omnipotence and carried that outlook into the doctrine of justification as a matter of divine creativity.¹⁰

It was Melancthon who sorted out Luther’s teachings in this regard and gave them ‘scientific’ statement in the Loci Communes (common topics of theology) of 1555, citing the same texts of Scripture I have employed in demonstration of creation, preservation and providence. The fourth of his five main affirmations in connection with this article says:

Human blindness thinks that God is like a carpenter who, having built a ship, departs and abandons it to water and weather, and has nothing further to do with it. Men imagine that after creating this earth and mankind, God departed, and now has nothing to do with this realm of created things. We must root these false thoughts out of our hearts with God’s work, and we must learn the solace of true doctrine and believe that God is truly present in all places, that he sustains the being of all things, and that everything that has being or life [Wesen or Leben], so long as it remains in being or life, is sustained by God. So the heavens, the sun, and moon remain in being and have their ordered courses; the earth annually yields fruit; angels, men, and animals live; and all this happens through the concurring activity [Mitwirkung] of God.¹¹

Of course some Roman Church theologians understood the biblical teaching of creation, preservation and providence. There are passages in Thomas Aquinas similar to these quotes. They did not, however, disseminate, much less convince, the priests and laymen of Europe. The Roman Catholic parts of Europe lagged far behind the Protestant parts for generations in developing the experimental and applied science which broke out rather quickly in the Netherlands and Britain. Many streams of change were in the air in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, slowly overcoming the stagnation of medieval ages. The most effective impulse toward what we now call science, reflecting a correct biblical view of the world of nature, came from Francis Bacon (1561–1626) who had studied the matter deeply. In his Novum Organum and other works he explained the sad situation of ‘the sciences’, where the best effort of the best minds was expended on fruitless ‘wars of words’ (logomachies). This inevitably led, Bacon said, to separation of the best thought from nature and experience to ‘superstition and blind religious zeal’, excessive reverence for antiquity (the error of the new humanism), reliance on abstract theories and traditional prejudices. In other words Christendom had neglected the world-view of the Bible. When in Europe, particularly the Netherlands and Britain where the Calvinists’ form of the Reformation prevailed, science flowered, slowly at first. I shall leave to others the development of the story. I refer the reader to Hooykaas’ two chapters, ‘The Rise of Experimental Science’ and ‘Science and the Reformation’¹² and his extensive bibliography.

‘It is interesting to note’, says Garret Vanderkooi, ‘that natural science developed and flourished in the Western Hemisphere (sic) during a time when belief in a supreme creator God was widespread. No comparable development took place in Eastern animistic or Hindu cultures where natural events are often given magical explanations.’¹³

A. D. White contended that liberal ‘religion’ fostered science but orthodox theology smothered it.¹⁴ As late as 1965 Bruce Mazlish, in the introduction to an abridged edition, expressed the opinion that White had established his thesis. But say D. C. Lindberg and R. L. Numbers:

Such judgments ... overlook mounting evidence that White read the past through battle-scarred glasses. A number of scholars, including Alfred North Whitehead and Michael B. Forster, had begun to downplay the conflict between science and Christianity as early as the 1920s and 1930s. Indeed, Whitehead and Forster became convinced that Christianity, rather than impeding science, had actually encouraged it by establishing that nature behaves in a regular and orderly fashion—a basic promise of modern science.¹⁵

In an earlier chapter I cited Stanley Jaki and R. Hooykaas in support of this theme. Lindberg and Numbers are citing Whitehead and Forster to the same effect.¹⁶

Appendix II

Providence and Miracles

As we have seen, there is basis for the regularity of nature including systematic sequences of seasons, chemical reactions, verifiable causes and effects, and the like, in the divine government by God’s law and will. Without this there would be chaos rather than cosmos. Life could not continue. In such case, how do miracles, both biblically reported and others, which seem to violate this regularity, fit into the scheme of things?

The Bible of course reports many unusual occurrences, such as Jesus turning water into wine and the feeding of the 5,000, the parting of the waters of the Jordan by Joshua, and Elijah’s calling down fire to consume water-soaked sacrifice on Mount Carmel. Some of these ‘miracles’ might seem like circus stunts to some but others are of acknowledged timeless significance, as for example the crossing of the Red Sea on dry ground at Moses’ word. It is celebrated throughout the rest of Scripture as an important work of God of timeless significance. Let us consider as briefly as possible how this variation from the ordinary laws and course of nature, secured by divine providence, should be regarded.

1. Let us observe first off that in Scripture everything that occurs on earth or in heaven is within God’s plan, is sustained and ruled by Him. In biblical thought, the explosion of a distant star is no less the work of God than the raising of Lazarus, the emergence of a duckling from an egg no more or less than the healing of the demoniacs of Gadara. God is immanent in all creation as well as transcendent above it. He made it and though God uses ‘second causes’ such as mass attraction, Boyle’s Law and Charles’ Law for expansion and contraction of gasses, these forces and ‘laws’ have been aptly characterized as God’s habits of operation. They are under His control and, like the world picture of Psalm 104, ordinarily can be counted on by mankind for ‘service ... food ... wine ... oil ... and bread’ (Ps. 104:14, 15 kjv), though not without interruption. The weather may not be quite as regular as mass attraction, yet the laws that control the weather are as regular as mass attraction.

The immediate power of God can operate either in nature or in mankind, as in the case of that special calling or prevenient enlightenment (some call it regeneration) which God effects in every person who comes to Christ in faith.

2. From this point of view some theologians have aptly placed miracles within providence. The ordinary habits of God in the world are general providence, while the unusual works of God that seem to interrupt the ordinary course of nature are a species of special providence. In special providences God concerns Himself with particular events of history (say the calling of Isaiah to be a prophet) or with answers to prayer and particular needs of His people. To coin a term, miracles might be termed extra-special or extraordinary providences.¹⁷

3. In coming to an exact definition of a miracle (as opposed simply to the supernatural) the special vocabulary of Scripture will help us. These special events of divine activity which we sometimes call miracles have several semi-technical designations in the Bible.

In the Old Testament the chief term is ʾoth. ‘Most of the eighty occurrences ... refer to miraculous signs: all the plagues on the Egyptians are called “signs”. In these contexts the complementary word mopeth meaning “wonders” often occur.’¹⁸ Throughout the Old Testament the special, distinct character of a miracle is not so much in its departing from the ordinary course of nature, as the divinely intended meaning usually supplied by a prophet. They are both signs (of meaning) and wonders.

In the New Testament four Greek words designate these extraordinary events of God’s providential government of the heavens and earth He created. Of these one is sēmeion, ‘a sign consisting of a wonder or miracle, an event that is contrary to the usual course of nature’,¹⁹ which answers precisely to the Hebrew ʾoth, both translated in the plural ‘signs’.

A second Greek word teras, usually plural, meaning ‘a prodigy, portent, omen, wonder’,²⁰ is usually coupled in plural form with sēmeion (‘signs and wonders’). This word has more reference to the effect on observers. A verb of similar meaning (thaumadzō, to marvel or wonder) describes this effect. This is what modern secularist people really mean by the overworked term, ‘miraculous’ or ‘a miracle’—simply something to impress as exceptional, amazing, marvellous. The effect on viewers of such events depends much on what they bring to it—as seen in the case of Jesus’ miracle of healing on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:9–45).

A third word is dunamis, rendered as might, power, authority. In Acts 2:22 it is parallel with signs and wonders ‘that God did’, referring to the miracles which Jesus performed publicly among the Jews of His time. This word points to God’s special activity in ‘miracles’. This word is occasionally rendered ‘miracle’ in kjv and does particularly indicate the divine power which God employed in performing signs and wonders.

A fourth word is ergon, which simply means a work, in this case a work of God. It designates the fact—healing a leper, a pot of oil that never runs empty, a Lazarus coming forth, fire called down from heaven.

4. These original words of the Scripture language provide a guide to defining what miracles are, their effects on observers and others who learn of them, their function as significant events of special meaning and their cause in God. Biblical miracles are extraordinary events (ergon) which capture public notice, producing amazement (mopeth, teras, thaumadzō) and which have meaning (ἔργον, sēmeion). This meaning is the special presence of God in some special way usually declared by a prophet (Aaron, Elijah, Moses, Jeremiah). Finally a biblical miracle is dunamis, the product of and evidence of divine power and authority, not only in the event itself but of delegated power in the divinely authorized person at whose word the miracle took place.

5. As ‘wonders’, the miracles of the Bible are publicly observed events connected with revelation and redemption. By the ten plagues of Egypt, and the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea, Israel was redeemed from Egypt and by them God made His love, wisdom, judgment, power and glory known. By these same miracles Moses was certified and magnified before Israel as leader, revelator and governor. Without the miracles Moses would have been no more convincing or effective as liberator than he was to the Hebrew who saw him kill an Egyptian taskmaster. Jesus of Nazareth became ‘a Man attested by God to you [Jews] by miracles [dunameis], wonders [terasi] and signs [sēmeiois], which God did through Him in your midst’ (Acts 2:22 nkjv). And He was ‘declared to be the Son of God in power’ before all by ‘his resurrection from the dead’ (Rom. 1:4).

Jesus held the Jews of His time to be hardened sinners precisely because His person and message had been accompanied by authenticating ‘works’, saying: ‘If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not have been guilty of sin, but now they have no excuse for their sin ... If I had not done among them the works that no one else did, they would not be guilty of sin [that of rejecting Jesus], but now they have seen and hated both me and my Father ... “They hated me without a cause” ’ (John 15:22–25; cf. John 10:25, 37, 38). The same method of accrediting divine messengers identified and magnified the prophets before Israel, and the apostles before the church (Heb. 2:1–4). Predictive prophecy is a special form of miracle, of the same effect in revelation and redemption. Revelation and redemption are truly aspects of divine providence. Extraordinary works, signs, wonders and powers (miracles) were employed by God in effecting revelation. Where the extraordinary is useful to revelation and redemption, God is free to use it. He is not bound to the ordinary.

In Scripture, miracles and successful predictive prophecy, as proof of the authenticity of divine spokesmen, loom large. These spectacular accomplishments did not however per se authenticate prophets and apostles. Two passages of Deuteronomy set the standards—chapters 13 and 18. The prophet must also be of the nation of Israel (cf. Rom. 3:1), he must speak in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and his message must conform to the Mosaic revelation, including moral and spiritual elements. The tests on Mt Carmel (Elijah and prophets of Baal, 1 Kings 18), and Jeremiah against Hananiah (Jer. 28), are illustrative examples. The Eleven against Judas (Acts 1) is another example. Careful perusal of the above extended texts will amply demonstrate these assertions.

The amount of literature on miracles as attesting divine revelation and its revelators, produced in the past three centuries, is baffling to the mind of anyone who attempts to list it, much less to master it. I excerpt a few related remarks from the superb article in McClintock and Strong.

The Universal instincts of men prove the necessity of the existence of religion.... [A] revealed religion [as opposed to natural religions] can be proved only by that which involves the supernatural. What our Lord says to the Jews, that ‘they would not have sinned in rejecting him but for his works’ (John 15:24), commends itself at once to our reason.... In order to its being revealed, God must be the giver of it. And how are we to know it is he who speaks? Its strength, its value, its authority, all depend on its being the voice of God.... We must have direct evidence—something pledging God himself—before we can accept religion as revealed.²¹

There really isn’t much to say on the subject of miracles not covered directly or indirectly in the forty densely printed columns in the volume, under ‘Miracles’ and ‘Ecclesiastical Miracles’.

Jesus said once, ‘no one who does a mighty work in my name will be able soon afterward to speak evil of me’ (Mark 9:39), but on another occasion remarked, ‘On that day many will say to me, “Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name, and do many mighty works in your name?” And then will I declare to them, “I never knew you; depart from me, you workers of lawlessness” ’ (Matt. 7:22, 23). Luther used Balaam (Num. 24) as an example of one who fits the seeming contradiction. All his motives were false even though his miracle was authentic. Absent was the moral characteristic of love—Luther cited 1 Corinthians 13:2, ‘And if I have prophetic powers, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing.’ Luther often discussed this verse in controversy with the Roman Church. His latest thought on it was that the statement was ‘aimed at people who called themselves Christians and who did great things with their faith but had no love’.²²

6. We have no way of knowing how many times each day in answers to prayers or for other reasons, Providence directs second causes in a ‘supernatural’ way. The conversion of every sinner is a supernatural event in that the Spirit of the Father in concert with the Word of God plants spiritual life in a soul in a way that is contrary to the workings of ‘nature’—human or otherwise. But such events are short of public demonstration of the significant, amazing working of divine power. Secular scientists will explain such conversion experiences as wholly resulting from natural causes, including The Will to Believe (William James' famous thesis, 1897). Public miracles, openly demonstrating the presence of supernatural power, are quite rare in the Bible.

Note for one thing that miracles occurred almost exclusively in brief epochs: the time of the Exodus from Egypt and entering Canaan, the crisis of apostasy among the northern tribes in the time of Elijah and Elisha, the birth of Jesus, again during His ministry and of course His resurrection, and the early period of the book of Acts and the ministry of Paul (Rom. 15:18, 19).

Note also that a comparison of Deuteronomy 18:9–22, with Deuteronomy 13, shows that miracles served to authenticate Moses as God's appointed teacher, legislator and revelator—the burning bush of Exodus 3, the miracles of the rod, the leprous hand and turning water to blood (Exod. 4:1–9). Just so many, if not all, succeeding prophets to Israel, and God's authentic mouthpieces and writers of Scripture, whether prophets or apostles, were similarly authenticated.²³

7. Evidence is far from certain that supernatural signs, that is miracles, continued in any general sense after the apostolic age. Like the 400 plus silent years in Egypt (Exod. 12:40, 41) and the 400 plus years after the prophet Malachi—when prophecy was silent and miracles ceased—the present age is a similar time. There is to be a time of renewed miracles at the Second Advent. Even during times of prophets and apostles miracles were not daily affairs. General providence held sway, when laws of nature's cycles, of morals and economics, sowing and reaping, were not repealed or superseded by a wholesale relaxation of the order of nature.

Even in apostolic times, after the apostles and prophets who founded the church and produced revelation had been thoroughly accredited by 'signs and wonders', the supernatural sign gifts fade from the New Testament record. Norman Geisler points out that in the period of the book of Acts (ad 30–60) 'tongues', healings, exorcisms, even raising from the dead occurred, but in the later period—the period say ad 60 onward—tongues are never mentioned, nor healings, exorcisms or raising the dead. Geisler (as many good writers before him) points out:

[A]s soon as we arrive at the time of Paul's imprisonments (around ad 60–70) there is not only a complete absence of reference to any of these special apostolic gifts ... there is strong evidence that they no longer possessed these abilities. For example, the same apostle who could heal everyone on an island (Acts 28:9) could no longer even heal his coworkers in the ministry. The apostles could heal a person born lame (Acts 3), but Paul could not give Timothy relief from a simple stomach ailment and had to recommend that he take medicine for it (1 Tim. 5:23). The same apostle who exorcised a demon on command (Acts 15) could only hope for repentance that Hymenaeus and Philetus would 'escape from the snare of the devil' (2 Tim. 2:26). And the same apostle who once had the power to raise the dead (Acts 20) now cannot even raise his needed friend Trophimus from a sick bed (2 Tim. 4:20). And when we reach Hebrews (ad 68–69) the sign gifts are referred to as a past event (Heb. 2:3–4). The writer says that what Jesus announced 'was confirmed to us by those who heard him [apostles]. God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles'.²⁴

Geisler goes on to say: 'the sign gifts have ceased, just as Paul predicted they would (1 Cor. 13:8).

Although Paul does not specify when these gifts would cease, he does say they will. Furthermore, he hints that this would occur as the church progressed toward “maturity” (1 Cor. 13:10; cf. Eph. 4:12) although this will not be complete till the Second Coming (v. 12), he does not say that all the gifts will last until then. Indeed, it is obvious from the contrasts above that the miraculous gifts petered out as the early church matured.’²⁵

8. From two sides evangelical Protestant religion has had to defend itself from a demand that the movement produce miracles. The first was from the side of the Roman Church in early Reformation times. The credulous, illiterate populace of Christian Europe had developed an appetite for miracles—of which the ‘miracle of the altar’, transubstantiation, was only a tame sample. Superstitious expectations increased and have not ceased in many Roman Catholic countries even today. (In Reformation times Belarmine, official Roman apologist, sought to prove ‘the continuity of the miraculous power of the Church of Rome [and] the Protestant Church lacking this [power] is manifestly not of God.’²⁶ In an endeavour to embarrass the evangelical leaders of Geneva and win back the Reformed community there, Bishop Sadolet of that jurisdiction had written a letter to the Genevans charging among other things that the ‘new’ religion lacked the ‘miracles’ which were still being produced in the mother church. To this Calvin replied, in his Prefatory address to King Francis I:

In demanding miracles of us, they act dishonestly. For we are not forging some new gospel, but are retaining that very gospel whose truth all the miracles that Jesus Christ and his disciples ever wrought serve to confirm. But, compared with us, they have a strange [i.e. inauthentic] power; even to this day they can confirm their faith by continual miracles! [So they say.] Instead they allege miracles which can disturb a mind otherwise at rest—they are so foolish and ridiculous, so vain and false.... God’s name ought to be always and everywhere hallowed, whether by miracles or the natural order of things.²⁷

Calvin goes on to show how the apostles were authenticated by signs and wonders (citing Acts 14:3; Heb. 2:4) but miracles were not sufficient ‘to confirm falsehoods’. One must ‘examine that doctrine which the Evangelist says is superior to miracles’ (John 7:17, 18) and see if it tends to God’s glory (John 8:50; Deut. 13:2 ff.). Calvin goes on to warn against the tricks of magicians (Pharaoh’s magicians) and of Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:9, 10).

There are still elements in the Roman Church which would derive authentication—say of eligibility for beatification—from miracles. This is presently an embarrassment, hence Vatican II said,

Let us teach the faithful, therefore, that the authentic cult of the saints does not consist so much in a multiplicity of external acts [miracles], but rather in a more intense practice of our love, whereby, for our own greater good and that of the Church, we seek from the saints [i.e. the officially beatified] example in their way of life, fellowship in their communion, and the help of their intercession [as deceased, now in heaven with direct access to Jesus, etc.]²⁸

From another quarter, time to time throughout church history, from the Montanists onward through ‘enthusiasts’ of Reformation times and ‘pentecostalists’ of recent decades, groups of folk have arisen within the church demanding the church produce all the supernatural gifts present in the apostolic church, including the performance of miracles—duplicating all the miracles of Jesus, the Twelve and the Seventy. I am of the opinion the vast majority of Protestant theologians (and denominations) still hold, as Dr Charles Hodge wrote:

[W]hile there is nothing in the New Testament inconsistent with the occurrence of miracles in the post-apostolic age of the church ... when the apostles had finished their work, the necessity of miracles, so far as the great end they were intended to accomplish was concerned ceased. This, however, does not preclude the possibility of their occurrence, on suitable occasions, in after ages. It is a mere question of fact to be decided on historical evidence.²⁹

The above statement by Dr Hodge states the matter precisely. From long, often unpleasant experience, including pastoral survival through the waves of television healing (Kathryn Kuhlman, Oral Roberts and similar) and before them neo-Pentecostalist invasions of post-Depression congregations of anxious people I have learned that good people of this persuasion must be left to discover what someone has called ‘the unerring verdict of history’.³⁰ A current scholarly opinion by C.L. Blomberg somewhat generous toward assertions of need for contemporary miracles will conclude this discussion:

Throughout the Bible, miracles consistently serve to point people to the one true God, ultimately revealed in Jesus Christ. Their primary purpose is not to meet human need [Jesus did not heal all the sick in Palestine], although that is an important spin off blessing. But they are first of all theocentric and Christocentric, demonstrating the God of Israel and of Jesus to be supreme over all rivals. Contemporary experience suggests that this pattern continue; miracles today seem most frequent in regions where Satan has long held sway and where people require ‘power evangelism’ to be converted. But God’s sovereignty warns against trying to predict when they may occur and refutes the ‘name it and claim it’ heresy that tries to force God to work miracles upon demand, if one exercises adequate faith.³¹

Per contra, veteran China missionary Doris Ekblad writes me that her father, a pioneer missionary to north central China about sixty-five years ago, had a standard formula for people who came from distances to have him deliver someone from demon ‘possession’. She says, ‘My father would cleanse them both spiritually by prayer and physically—with a big spoon of castor oil. I expect they never came back!’

Appendix III

The Problem of Evil, Theodicy, Protest Atheism and the Structure of Barthian Theology

The Problem of Evil

It is true that when seemingly random tragedy strikes the ‘undeserving’, reflective people wonder if a wise, just and omnipotent good God is really in charge, governing the whole creation. Likewise when monstrous catastrophes strike large numbers of people, violently carrying away thousands at once, waves of doubt of God’s goodness or of His power distress many of the faithful and give strength to avowed sceptics. This was true when the world heard the news of the terrible earthquake which struck the great city of Lisbon, the port from which the Spanish Armada sailed to attack Britain in 1688. On the first of November, 1755, the city was reduced almost in an instant to a heap of ruins. At the same time a tidal wave broke over the docks and warehouses followed by fires. About 40,000 people lost their lives. Good and bad, young and old, believers and unbelievers died together.

This was during the ‘age of reason’ among Europe’s intelligencia and, though more severe catastrophes have occurred since, the professional sceptics of that time (David Hume in particular) found in Lisbon the proof of the non-existence of the good God of Christianity. In the twentieth century what is called ‘protest atheism’ took over their arguments and added more.

From ancient times philosophers have sought to define ‘the good’ along with ‘the beautiful and the true’ without ever coming to a settled opinion. But to judge whether or not the presence of physical evils in the world such as pain and ‘premature death’ (as it is now said) are irrational, purposeless evils or not, there must be a standard of the good by which to judge. Several recent Christian philosophers have challenged sceptics and atheists at this point to present a universal standard of the good which is a manifest improvement on the will and love of God.

As observed previously in the chapter on providence, the Bible represents evil, whether moral or physical, as a real problem in the world. It does not trace its origin or cause to the basic structure of the universe, nor to any element of nature or mankind, nor to God as its Creator. Evil is here by God’s permission. Why God has permitted evil, we have not been told. The Bible nowhere directly addresses the question, even though both David and Habakkuk directly asked the question (Ps. 73; Hab. 1:1–11).

Extensive treatment of theories proposed by philosophers as to the nature and origin of evil would divert us into something far different from a biblically based theology. Several hours reviewing my files, scanning long-shelved books on ethics, meta-ethics, philosophy of religion and the like, have reawakened my awareness of at least a dozen indecisive philosophical kinds of ethical systems defining good and explaining the nature and origin of evil. It will be pertinent here only to take note of some of the theories which have taken root on Christian soil and which have had important bearing on secular attitudes and theologies of our own time. Alvin Plantinga has addressed the problem of evil in several works.³² His first burden is to show that the certain existence of evil is no proof of the non-existence of God. John E. Hare evaluates Plantinga’s contribution at length.

I think Plantinga is largely successful in what I shall call the negative project. This is the project of showing that there is no demonstrative or conclusive proof from the existence of evil to the non-existence of God. This leaves, however, the most important positive project untouched. Plantinga is himself completely pessimistic about the success of any positive project. Numerous discussions of this problem have appeared since the 1970s, though probably little new can be said.³³

Probably no one has contributed a more comprehensive, readable and convincing report of the unsuccessful philosophical literary effort to explain the presence of evil in society while maintaining mankind as essentially the good victim than Reinhold Niebuhr. His brilliant summary, to which I am indebted, is chapter 4, ‘The Easy Conscience of Modern Man’.³⁴ P. H. T. Holbach (1723–1789) of the German *Aufklärung*³⁵ and C. A. Helvetius (1715–1771), a Frenchman of the so-called Enlightenment, in common with many literati of their age, felt entrenched religious and political conservatism of their own and previous times was the cause of social evil.³⁶ A return to a state of nature would cure it. This was the naturalism of Epicurus brought up to date. In such a case, these ‘enlightened’ philosophers seemed quite unaware that if mankind are bond slaves of history they are hardly capable of writing books on politics and philosophy.

Only a little earlier Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) held a nearly reverse view (The Leviathan 1:13–14 and 2:1–20): regarding evil as a primeval peril from nature. Two centuries later this theory merged with Darwinian evolutionary doctrine, teaching that moral evil is a hangover from mankind’s brute ancestors and a stage toward good—in some writers en route to attainment of Christian character.³⁷ Hobbes thought civil government, preferably absolute monarchy, the best restraint of evil.

John Locke (1632–1704) was another who supposed moral evil rises out of mankind’s condition in a state of nature, though he retained what he believed was biblical orthodoxy. He thought that a social contract establishing democratic government, wherein ‘freedom’ could be exercised, would be a sounder basis of (social) deliverance from the state of nature.

David Hume (1711–1776), if I understand his remarks correctly, thought that the presence of evil was everywhere, and so, acknowledged and experienced by everyone, might be the very spring from which the idea of God arises in all people.³⁸

A lineal descendant of such thinking was the laissez-faire economic-philosophical-ethical philosophy of Adam Smith (1723–1790), Scottish economist. Though Smith had much to say which harmonizes with the biblical doctrines of mankind and sin, yet he taught that there is a pre-established harmony in ‘nature’ which if interfered with will produce economic injustice. When Smith’s ‘let nature take its course’ in economics was joined to Darwinian evolutionary theory the result was social Darwinism and some of the economic-social disorders of the late nineteenth century.

All these physiocrats and democrats, and similar, in finding the causal source of moral and physical evil in social institutions of one sort or another were equally in error. For if moral evil (and physical evils to an important degree, according to the biblical narrative and interpretation thereof) lies anywhere in mankind, it is in their perilous, but God-given, moral capacity, involving voluntary use of uncoerced freedom of choice.

I defer to the plentiful literature of Karl Marx (1818–83) and Friedrich Engels (1820–95) and their theory of evil and good (dialectical materialism), similarly the ‘positive’ theories of the founder of sociology, Auguste Comte (1798–1857). With Comte’s Marx-like views of mankind and nature both sin and crime are thought of as ‘anti-social conduct’. This term has passed into modern language along with many other terms and ideas more subversive, in my opinion, of the moral realm of Scripture and authentic ethical-social analysis than is commonly recognized even in centres of evangelical learning.

Theodicy

The Bible never mounts an effort at theodicy, an effort to save the character of God from harmful inferences derived from the presence of evil. Evil is allowed in the world for reasons God has never seen fit fully to disclose and which no human wisdom, Christian or otherwise, has been able fully to discover or to explain. As we have seen, evil is not beyond His control. This has prompted such biblical sayings as, ‘Surely the wrath of man shall praise you’ (Ps. 76:10). It also has resulted in reports of how God raised up wicked tyrants ‘that my name may be proclaimed in all the earth, (Exod. 9:16; cf. Rom. 9:17) and in prophetic declarations wherein God called an oppressive and destructive emperor ‘my servant’ (Jer. 25:9).

This does not mean that it is wrong to wonder if God was obligated to create the ‘best possible of all worlds’ or if the best possible is one where there would have been no freedom to sin, or if there really is something rightly called ‘free will’ without qualifications. These and other musings have been canvassed enough. There has been great difference of opinion among theologians on these questions. Gordon Clark’s chapter ‘God and Evil’ treats the problem of theodicy in a manner deserving respect.³⁹ Anyone interested might start his research by examining the articles by John Feinberg on ‘Theodicy’, ‘Problem of Sin’ and ‘Pain’ in his 2001 volume on the doctrine of God, No One Like Him and pursue the bibliographical suggestions. These topics are of more legitimate interest in the philosophical disciplines of ethics and its recent twin axiology (values), and the theological disciplines of philosophy of religion and apologetics. [Dr Feinberg has also published a book in which he addresses the problem of evil.]

Before we move on let us note that both the musings and the severest rational reflections of theists—whether devoutly orthodox Christians or not—have usually come to the conclusion that God willed that moral evil (sin) should enter the world, but did so not antecedently but consequentially. This means that He planned for good ultimately (beyond the detailed history of creation) as fruit of history, that the presence of temptation to moral evil was necessary to the good of fixed moral character, that sin came to be as a consequence. This helps with the narrative of Genesis 3 but does not explain how the serpent (= Satan) came to be morally evil. Who tempted him? Was the temptation simply God’s exalted position and glory? If created wholly good, what inner movement of will caused him to envy God and desire to be his own god, to seek other than God’s proper glory as Creator?

As to physical evil, why do we have plagues, tornadoes and earthquakes which are purely natural, and why does God allow humanly caused harm to others: whether small, such as the proverbial family starving because the father spends his earnings on alcoholic drink, or large, such as the attempted extinction of Jews by Hitler and the killing of 100,000,000 people in the twentieth century by the communisms of Russia, China, Cambodia, Yugoslavia and others. Again, theistic efforts at theodicy in one way or another suppose that natural perils to life and health on small or large scale are necessary parts of reality, aspects not subject to ‘power’, whether limited or unlimited.

F. R. Tennant, Anglican clergyman and Cambridge Professor, put it well:

That painful events occur in the causal chain is a fact, but, that there could be a determinate ... world of unalloyed comfort, yet adapted by its law-abidingness to the development of rationality and morality, is a proposition the burden of proving which must be allotted to the opponent of theism. One can only add that, so far as experience in this world enables us to judge, such proof seems impossible. To illustrate what is here meant: if water is to have the various properties in virtue of which it plays its beneficial part in the economy of the physical world and the life of mankind, it cannot at the same time lack its obnoxious capacity to drown us.... There cannot be assigned to any substance an arbitrarily selected group of qualities from which all that ever may prove unfortunate to any sentient organism can be eliminated, especially if one organism's meat is to be another's poison.⁴⁰

Tennant goes on to observe that the order of nature, the regularity of nature as part of the divine world plan, insures the conditions of life.

Thus physical ills follow with the same necessity as physical goods from the determinate 'world plan' which secures that the world be a suitable stage for intelligent and ethical life.⁴¹

Like every attempt at a Christian theodicy ever proposed—from Irenaeus and Augustine onward—Tennant's essay is not unchallengeable. Already pagan ethical philosophers of late antiquity such as Seneca and Cicero attempted to justify the god of their incipient monotheism. But it probably is as good as any proposed. All are musings, reflections in effort to satisfy the demand of human minds for rational consistency. President Lincoln tried to think through to God's honour and righteousness in bringing the United States to a great Civil War, but like us all had simply to acknowledge without empirical proof, that (citing Psalm 19:9 kjv) David was right when he confessed, 'the judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether.'

Protest Atheism and Barth's Theology

As, however, Paul reminds us, 'yet for us there is one God ... from whom are all things.... However, not all possess this knowledge' (1 Cor. 8:6, 7). Paul was speaking of the lack of knowledge of only one God in an age of prevalent polytheism. The same lack of knowledge (or rejection of the same) in Enlightenment and now post-Enlightenment times takes the form of atheism (no-god-ism), the extreme opposite of polytheism (many-gods-ism).

The term atheism is not without ambiguities. Its meaning varies (1) according to how the one who uses it defines 'god', (2) whether deliberately adopted by someone as a name for his own theological view, or (3) as applied by opponents for some other view. In our case it is the second—how certain writers describe their own religious outlook. It is worth remembering that Socrates, a monotheist of sorts, was called an atheist by Athenians because his god was not one of their family of deities who lived up on Mt Olympus. The Christians among the heathen populace of Rome were called atheists for similar reasons.

Further, since Enlightenment times, in some religious writing there is dogmatic rejection of the 'theistic arguments' for the existence of God (i.e. in this narrow sense of theism). Some of these opponents of 'theism' are designated critical atheists. If there is a god, they say, you theists have not proved it so, these critical atheists say. These same thinkers and others from another epistemological slant simply distrust or deny the capacity of finite minds to say anything at all about an infinite God, if He exists, hence are distinguished as sceptical atheists or perhaps agnostics. Finally there are the dogmatic atheists who outrightly deny the existence of any being answering to the biblical Jewish or Christian God.

In the eighteenth century several widely influential writers in the several languages of Europe were sceptical or dogmatic atheists in the sense that the God of the Bible does not exist. They lived in a time when inherited belief in God was shared by nearly 100 per cent of the population of Europe and America. David Hume (1711–76), for example, was the ultimate empiricist, insisting that all knowledge is based on sense experience. He was consistent therefore in asserting that given the universal absence of sensory experience of a god, and therefore also the incapacity of reason to inform us about a god, there can be no proof of God's existence. Miracles cannot certify any message or messenger of God because miracles never occur. In his best-known essay he summarized:

There must, therefore, be a uniform experience against every miraculous act, otherwise the event would not merit that appellation. And as a uniform experience amounts to a proof, there is here a direct and full proof, from the nature of the fact, against the existence of any miracle.⁴²

Hume concluded his Essay with this challenge:

If we take in our hand any volume of divinity or school metaphysics let us ask, Does it contain any abstract reasoning or number? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact or existence? No. Commit it then to the flames for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion.⁴³

Hume relates to the subject of this Appendix primarily in that he consistently insisted that the presence of evil in the world absolutely forbids that theism could prove the existence of the same God more fully described in 'revealed religion'. He sought to demonstrate that, in want of sense experience of God, 'reason is impotent either to establish or falsify religious beliefs'. In The Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion he has one of his debaters say sarcastically: 'This world for aught (any man) knows, is very faulty and imperfect compared to a superior standard; and was only the first rude essay of some infant deity, who afterward abandoned it, ashamed of its lame performance.'⁴⁴

In Hume's world there is no guiding Providence bringing history to happy consummation, much less working all things together for good for any particular lover of God. Also, sad to say, to venture however briefly into Hume's thought where empiricism reigns (all we know is via sensory experience) is to feel a profound sense of uneasiness. John Stuart Mill and Ludwig Feuerbach drew out some consequences less considerate of the tender feelings of theists in general and Christians in particular but hardly moved beyond Hume.

Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–77) 'saw himself as giving birth to a new religion of man'. He saw the Christian God as nothing more than 'projection of finite human attributes to an imagined transcendent being called God'. He rejected the speculative idealism of Hegel, his teacher. Reality is not the subjective idea in my head but is received through the organs of sense, especially sight. Reality is in the material objects of sense.

N. Waite Willis, Jr. relates this central fact of Feuerbach's philosophy of knowledge to our present purpose well.

If objectivity of thought and truth are to be achieved, the objects of our thoughts must be primary, must control our knowledge of them. Sensual experience must take precedence

[emphasis added]: thinking must follow sensation of the concrete object. ‘In sensation,’ Feuerbach declares, ‘I am determined by objects. In thought I determine the object’ [Feuerbach, Preliminary Theses Concerning the Reform of Philosophy, as cited by Willis, p. 29]. Therefore according to Feuerbach to arrive at truth ... thought must give up control of its objects and allow to objects [of sensation only] their proper autonomy as independent subjects [Feuerbach, Principles of the Philosophy of the Future, Trans. Manfred Vogel, Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1966, p. 54 as cited by Willis].⁴⁵

In another lecture Feuerbach laid out the principle which later Barth took up as the structural ‘omega point’ of his Dogmatics:

In thought, I am absolute subject.... I am intolerant. In the activity of the senses, on the other hand I am liberal; I let the object be what I myself am—a subject, a real and self-actualizing being. Only sense and perception give me something as subject.⁴⁶

On such principles Feuerbach determined that Christian theism, since it starts with thought, not sensible objects, is nothing more than projection of what the theologian sees in himself and other people.

If Barth is important to recent theology, Feuerbach, the idealists (Hegel and disciples) against whom he reacted, and the empiricists (Locke, Berkeley and especially Hume), whom he duplicated, are important for understanding Barth. Barth wrote the essay which serves as introduction to my thumb-worn (by my students) copy of the English translation of Feuerbach’s The Essence of Christianity.

Barth’s efforts to withdraw from the ‘modernism’ of his day seemed to be supported by Feuerbach’s essay. He too rejected the god of the ‘theism’ of the nineteenth century, that of idealistic philosophers and their theological counterparts. He felt that by accepting the empirical epistemology of Feuerbach he could start theological construction with the concrete Jesus of Nazareth as God in the flesh. Jesus as God-man gave God concrete visibility. This in turn gave the New Testament reports of Jesus’ life, death and resurrection great importance. All the literary production of Barth seems to be built on this approach to a system of theology. So the visible Jesus, and with Him as also Son of God and Second Person of the one triune God, become for the multi-volume Church Dogmatics the organizing structure and, by variegated lines of reasoning, the substance of all else.

The three Persons of the Godhead have served a few theologians as rubrics for arranging the topics of a theological system. Melchior Leydecker, professor of theology at Utrecht (b. 1679) and an ardent champion of the Reformed system and Hans L. Martensen, professor of theology at Copenhagen (1808–1884) and a somewhat mystical theologian, employed this arrangement. Barth not only makes a ‘big deal’ of putting the Trinity first in his order of treatment but as such carries his own construction of Trinitarian Christology throughout his system.

This God-as-Trinity meets individuals in an ‘I-Thou confrontation’ (also a Feuerbach notion) and these confrontations are revelation, personal events, from which theology is built. The Bible may be read as a somewhat factual report (if guided by sound critical procedures) of these confrontational revelatory events, hence of use for systematic theology.

But more: Feuerbach asserted that the presence of evil in the world, especially the extreme suffering of human beings, renders ridiculous the belief in a benevolent God of either theism or Scripture. Barth has deemed Feuerbach correct in this except that all three Persons of the immanent Trinity actually took human sufferings into themselves. Thus Barth thinks he captures Feuerbach's empiricism for Christian theology.

Twentieth-century Atheistic Pessimism

At this point the reader should know that throughout the early and middle years of the twentieth century—especially after World War I—several forms of utterly pessimistic, atheistic philosophy gained great notice in intellectual circles. These entered university classrooms and the liberal seminaries as feasible outlooks on life. The 'beat generation' and the 'hippies' and other sad-faced subcultures of young people were only a few of the outrageous later outcomes.

The evils of the first half of the twentieth century seemed to highlight the perennial challenge pain and death make to the very existence of God on the one hand and to His benevolence and power on the other. A 'creation which includes such conditions is incomprehensible, but that there is a just God who would allow them to persist is a contradiction. For the sake of the human feeling for God, God must be rejected.'⁴⁷ This is the 'protest atheism' of F.W. Nietzsche (1844–1900) risen again in the writings of Ernst Bloch, Albert Camus and Max Horkheimer; of Karl Jaspers and Jean-Paul Sartre and the schools of existentialism they founded.

The niceties of thought in these authors and the volume of literature they generated among themselves and inspired in others is unimportant here. It is important to know that Barth's Christological and Trinitarian theology was developed in the atmosphere of the challenges of 'protest atheism' and that he thought he provided an adequate 'dialectical' (which means a 'yes' and a 'no') answer in his doctrine of Christ, Trinity, covenant and incarnation.

Karl Barth closed his treatment of the incarnation and what is usually called the Work of Christ in 1955,⁴⁸ thirty-five years after he wrote his essay on Feuerbach. He is still concerned there with failures of the God of theism and the enigma of sin and suffering in God's world. He acknowledges still that 'we have been speaking in riddles' and though 'Paradox cannot be our final word in relation to Jesus Christ' he must retain, to the glory of God, this obscurity because he thinks the New Testament does so.⁴⁹ The whole Trinity is in the man Jesus, 'the elect' man in whom also is the entire human race, elect in Him in what appears to this reader a 'covenant of salvation' (Barth does not claim to speak perspicuously). He comes as near to clarity as anywhere in a passage in this section where he explains to his own satisfaction that the ancient Patristians just might have had it right.⁵⁰

For what is represented and reflected in the humiliation of God is the mercy of the Father in which He too is not merely exalted but lowly with His Son, allowing Himself to be so affected by the misery of the creature, of man, that to save it, endow it with eternal life, He does not count it too high a cost to give and send His Son, to elect Him to take our place as the Rejected, and therefore to abase Him. It is not at all the case that God has no part in the suffering of Jesus Christ even in His mode of being [Barth prefers this expression to hypostasis, or person] as Father. No, there is a particula veri [a particle of truth] in the teaching of the early Patristians. This is that primarily it is God the Father who suffers in the offering and sending of His Son, in His abasement. The suffering is not His own, but the alien suffering of the creature, of man, which He takes to Himself in Him. But He does suffer it in the humiliation of His Son with a depth with which it never was or will be suffered by any man—apart from the One who is His Son. And He does it so in order that, having been born by Him in the offering and sending of His Son, it should not have to be suffered in this way by man. This fatherly fellow-suffering of God is the mystery, the basis, of the humiliation of His Son; the truth of that which takes place historically is His crucifixion.⁵¹

In this way the Father of neo-orthodoxy and the most dominant figure of left-of-centre Protestant theology of the twentieth century worked around simple acceptance of plain biblical facts. God planned a world in which He determined to permit the presence of moral evils and consequent physical evils. His reasons God has not seen fit to reveal. Faith is assured that God's reasons are sufficient and wise and good. Most Christian theologians have not thought it necessary to write twelve enormous volumes of theological literature to justify God in His decision, nor to torture Scripture as Barth does in the process of creating his system. Several recent theologians, Protestant and Roman Catholic, have modified or rejected classical theism in the direction of divine participation in all the suffering, affecting the origins and form of the theology of the very influential Karl Barth, whose twelve volumes of Church Dogmatics still seem to demand attention.⁵²

¹ The Harper Encyclopedia of Science, vol. i, p. 88.

² R. Hooykaas, Religion and the Rise of Science (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 78, 79.

³ ibid., p. 85.

⁴ Dagobert D. Runes, Twentieth Century Philosophy (New York: Philosophical Library, 1943), p. 97.

⁵ Calvin, Institutes I, 16.7.

⁶ ibid., 5.5.

⁷ ibid., 14.3.

⁸ ibid., 16.2.

⁹ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 106.

¹⁰ ibid., pp. 118–129.

¹¹ Philipp Melancthon, Loci Communes, trans. C. L. Manschreck (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1982), p. 41.

¹² R. Hooykaas, op cit, pp. 75–144. Professor Hooykaas' book is based on The Gunning Lectures delivered by him under the auspices of the University of Edinburgh in February, 1969.

¹³ Garret Vanderkooi, 'A Theistic Approach to Science' in John Warwick Montgomery's book, Evidence for Faith (Dallas: Word Publ., 1991) p. 45. Since writing the above, the year 2000 recent work of H. L. Poe and J. H. Davis (Science and Faith: An Evangelical Dialogue) likewise sets the matter straight and encourages Christians to claim their intellectual inheritance in the confluence and mutual support of a sound science and a sound interpretation of Scripture.

¹⁴ A. D. White, A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom, two volumes, (NY: Appleton & Co., 1876).

¹⁵ D. C. Lindberg and R. L. Numbers, God and Nature: Historical Essays on the Encounter Between Christianity and Science (Berkeley, CA: Univ. of Calif. Press, 1986) pp. 2–4.

¹⁶ Alfred N. Whitehead, Science and the Modern World (New York: Macmillan, 1925) and Forster, 'The Christian Doctrine of Creation and the Rise of Modern Science' in Mind magazine, 43, 1934), pp. 446–468; also 'Christian Theology and the Modern Science of Nature' in Mind magazine, 44, 1935), pp. 439–466 and Mind 45, 1936), pp. 1–27. More recently M. Klaren, Religious Origins of Modern Science, Belief in Creation in Seventeenth Century Thought (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977).

¹⁷ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology pp. 168, 169.

¹⁸ Robert L. Alden, Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament, i (Chicago: Moody Press, 1980), p. 18.

¹⁹ Bauer, Arndt & Gingrich, Lexicon, p. 755.

²⁰ ibid., p. 820.

McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

²¹ McClintock & Strong, sentences from 'Miracles' in Cyclopedia of Biblical Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1876, reprinted Grand Rapids: Baker Books, VI, 1969), p. 309.

²² Paul Althaus, op. cit., p. 436.

²³ See for example 1 Kings 18:36–39 and Jer. 28; Heb. 2:1–4; 2 Cor. 12:12.

²⁴ Norman Geisler, Signs and Wonders (Wheaton, IL: Tyndale House, 1988), p. 137.

²⁵ ibid., p. 137.

- ²⁶ McClintock & Strong, op. cit., pp. 320–326.
- ²⁷ Calvin, Institutes, vi, Prefatory Address to King Francis, Westminster Ed., vol. i, p. 16.
- ²⁸ Vatican Council II, vol. i, The Conciliar and Postconciliar Documents, New Revised Ed., 1996, p. 412.
- ²⁹ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology, iii (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 452.
- ³⁰ For any earnest and ambitious enough to seek guidance I suggest two old reliable sources: the lengthy article ‘Miracles’ and ‘Ecclesiastical Miracles’ in McClintock and Strong’s Cyclopedia and Hodge’s chapter on ‘The Ninth Commandment’ (appropriately entitled ‘Thou Shalt Not Bear False Witness’), pages 437–463 in the work cited above. After these sources The Silence of God by Sir Robert Anderson and perhaps Miracles by B. B. Warfield and Signs and Wonders by Norman Geisler brings the matter up to date.
- ³¹ C. L. Blomberg, art. ‘Miracles’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1984), p. 534.
- ³² Alvin Plantinga, The Nature of Necessity (Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1974), chapter 9; God, Freedom and Evil (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1974), and journal articles.
- ³³ John E. Hare, ‘The Problem of Evil’ in Evidence of Faith, ed. J. W. Montgomery (Dallas: Word Publ., 1991).
- ³⁴ Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation, vol. i, Human Nature (New York: Scribners, 1943).
- ³⁵ ibid., p. 197.
- ³⁶ ibid.; also McClintock & Strong, Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature (1969 ed.), 4:179, 180.
- ³⁷ John Fiske, Through Nature to God, (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1899), a book dedicated to T. H. Huxley.
- ³⁸ David Hume, Remarks of Demea in Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, Part X, reprinted in God and Evil, ed. Nelson Pike (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1964), p. 17.
- ³⁹ Gordon Clark, Reason, Religion and Revelation (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1961, republished by Trinity Foundation in 1995), pp. 194–242.
- ⁴⁰ F. R. Tennant, Philosophical Theology II (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1930), pp. 197–205, as reprinted by G. L. Abernathy and T. A. Langford, Philosophy of Religion (New York: Macmillan, 1962), p. 441.

⁴¹ ibid.

⁴² David Hume, An Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding (New York: C. H. Hendel, 1955), p. 120 as cited by J. C. Livingston, Modern Christian Thought (New York: Macmillan, 1971), p. 54.

⁴³ ibid., p. 173.

⁴⁴ G. L. Abernathy & T. A. Langford, Philosophy of Religion: A Book of Readings (New York: Macmillan, 1962), p. 141 note.

⁴⁵ W. Waite Willis, Jr., Theism, Atheism and The Doctrine of the Trinity (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1987), p. 29.

⁴⁶ ibid., p. 29.

⁴⁷ ibid., p. 80.

⁴⁸ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics, iv, ed. G. W. Bromiley & T. F. Torrance (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936), 2, p. xiii.

⁴⁹ ibid., p. 348.

⁵⁰ In context Barth seeks to demonstrate the Holy Spirit also was involved in suffering.

⁵¹ ibid., /2, p. 357.

⁵² Thirty years ago I wrote an essay on the problem of evil which appeared in Bibliotheca Sacra ('The Nature and Origin of Evil') and later under the same title in Vital Apologetic Issues, ed., Roy Zuck (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 1995), pp. 10–18. Much of that essay is incorporated into this chapter.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (202). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

23

God's Blessedness, or Impassibility

In a familiar passage wherein Paul speaks of how God 'gave them up to dishonourable passions' (Rom. 1:26) he prefaces the remark by referring to God 'the Creator, who is blessed forever' (Rom 1:25). There is an apparent contrast between people who have 'dishonourable passions' and the Creator, who as 'blessed', has no passion at all. 'In the New Testament eulogētos (blessed) is never used of men. It is exclusively doxological'.¹ When the ancient rabbis contemporary with the New Testament, and the people who emulated them, used this word for God (or its Hebrew-Aramaic equivalent) it was as 'Ersatz des Gottesnamens' (substitute for God's name).²

Though throughout the Bible God is anthropopathically represented as hating, repenting, grieved, loving and similar, these terms were not (or should not be) understood literally any more than references to God's eyes, nostrils, wings, feathers, hands and the like.

God is 'blessed forever' (Rom. 1:25; 9:5), never before time began, nor since, in need of anything to be supremely 'happy'. He created the world sovereignly by will and word, but not out of any inner or outer necessity, nor swayed by emotion.

That there is something in God which is commensurable by analogy with human emotions (as we shall say more about) cannot be doubted. But it is not per se passion, pain, feeling in any ordinary sense.

At the present time, social and intellectual forces, both within and without orthodox theology, are very unfriendly to the consistently-held orthodox doctrine of the divine blessedness, or impassibility: hence this chapter, which is a condensation of my own research on the subject.

I. Definitions

Impassibility comes into our language as translation of the Greek word apatheia in the writings of church Fathers, according to the Oxford English Dictionary. Apatheia, despite the obvious etymological connection with apathy and apathetic in modern English (Pelikan), started out as meaning 'the state of an apathēs (alpha privative, plus pathos) without pathos or suffering'.³ Among the Greek Fathers pathos or passion was the right word for the suffering of Christ, as it still is. So in theology, to be impassible means primarily to be incapable of suffering. Early theology affirmed that in heaven our resurrected bodies will be apathēs in this sense. The word came to be extended to mean incapable of emotion of any kind and beyond that, apathēs (impassible) in important theological discourse meant without sexual desire.⁴ As applied to God, incapacity for any emotions sometimes is meant. We will return to this. The twelfth canon of the Second Council of Constantinople (ad 553, Fifth Ecumenical) seems to say that Christ on earth was impassible in the sense of 'longings (passions, presumably sexual) of the flesh'.⁵

In this chapter I am interested mainly in the question of whether or not the divine nature is capable of emotion, including, in a secondary way, the experience of suffering.

II. Impassibility in the Ancient Church

There was no difference of opinion on this subject among orthodox theologians of the ancient church. Even Tertullian (c. 160–240), perhaps the most anti-philosophy theologian among important early writers, vehemently opposed the notion that God could suffer pain.

This appears prominently in the first line of Tertullian's five books Against Marcion. Arguing that since goodness is the most central attribute of God, this center never wavers for any cause. The expression of this goodness as it occurs in what God does in His creation varies. 'The differing expressions', says Tertullian 'are but the expressions of the one constitutive attribute of God—his unchanging and perfect goodness. Thus while God himself does not change ... yet the mode of expressing his goodness changes in accordance with the change in the human situation and circumstance.’⁶

Reading of the Cappadocian Fathers (Gregory Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa and Basil the Great) in preparation for a paper on the post-Nicea apologetics of orthodoxy sparked my notice of uniform and vehement agreement of Christians on God’s impassibility. A careful rereading of J. N. D. Kelly’s Early Christian Doctrines confirms that all the Fathers, including even most heretics, strongly believed the divine Being is impassible.⁷ Jaroslav Pelikan shows at length and in detail that belief in divine impassibility was firmly asserted by all the orthodox Fathers.⁸

This issue colored every aspect of efforts to clarify Christology at the first four ecumenical councils (Nicea 325, Constantinople 381, Ephesus 431, Chalcedon 451). Nobody orthodox denied impassibility and even the heterodox acknowledged it. They did not separate impassibility from divine simplicity (mentioned more frequently) but regarded it as a necessary aspect of simplicity. They did not cite Aristotle’s unmoved mover, Plato’s eternal forms or anything of the sort. Their arguments were based mainly on the usual biblical texts we still today cite to teach God’s immutability.⁹ Simplicity, that is, God is not composed of parts, was then as now, established logically. Anything composed of parts is the sum of the parts, each of course less than infinite. Any number of finite parts do not add up to infinity. Since God is infinite, as established by Scripture and demonstrated by reason, God is simple, not compound or complex. The three members of the Trinity each possess the Godhead fully. They are not three thirds: a trinity of God, not three gods.

At this point I want to anticipate charges that the early church Fathers corrupted a pure biblical doctrine of a loving, personal God through introduction of Greek speculative philosophy. Let us hear what they said about this charge.

Thomas Weinandy in concluding his chapter on ‘The Patristic Doctrine of God’ observes:

What the Fathers brought to the philosophical conversation, a conversation that had been in progress for centuries was precisely the new data of the Christian faith—the revelation of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. Whatever they said that was new was not due to their faithfulness to some philosophical innovators. They were theological innovators and their innovation was founded on the Bible.¹⁰

A sophisticated Christian theology which employs formal logic, precise definitions and elegant literary techniques, as some of the ancient theologians did, does not constitute betrayal of the gospel treasure. The early theologians nevertheless had to defend their doctrine against detractors and opponents. Irenaeus, while insisting ‘the faith’ is ‘one’, yet explained that theological refinements were of value. In Against Heresies he says, ‘Inasmuch as certain men have set the truth aside ... by means of their craftily constructed plausibilities draw away minds of the inexperienced ... I have felt constrained to compose the following treatise in order to expose their machinations’.¹¹ These ‘certain men’ are later named. Most of them were highly educated scholastics, wise in their own eyes, whom Irenaeus felt he had to meet, not entirely on their own ground, but in such a way as to provide his readers sufficient skill and knowledge to rescue themselves from these so called ‘gnostics’—not a term of derision then, but more equivalent to our ‘experts’ or ‘intelligensia’. His book is strewn with the language of these people. So to answer these errorists some skill (he does not call it philosophy) is helpful. They should not be allowed to get away with doctrinal murder, so to speak, just because they are cunning and eloquent.¹² More importantly, by such skill ‘one may [more accurately than another] bring out the meaning of those things which have been spoken in parables, and accommodate them to the general scheme of the faith; and explain [with special clearness] the operation and dispensation of God connected with human salvation...’¹³

Christian theology was not ‘as Harnak tried to maintain, the product of encounter between Gospel and Hellenism. It is not the Hellenisation of Christianity. It was not the fruit of speculation but sincere effort to use the techniques of the learning of the day to elaborate Christian truth.’¹⁴

Clement of Alexandria had to face opposition from those who opposed any employment of philosophical learning. He said they ‘prefer to block their ears in order not to hear the sirens’ and that Christians as a whole ‘fear Greek philosophy as children fear ogres—they are frightened of being carried off by them. If our faith (I will not say our gnosis [knowledge]) is such that it is destroyed by force of argument, then let it be destroyed; for it will have been proved that we do not possess the truth.’¹⁵

Clement asserted that philosophic learning has many positive uses. He really means theology which employs the techniques of learning, which we would now call systematic theology.¹⁶

The climax of ancient consolidation of orthodoxy was in ad 451, at Chalcedon, the Fourth Ecumenical Council. Jaroslav Pelikan devotes several pages merely to summarize the impassibility doctrine as expressed in the Fathers before the Fourth Ecumenical Council.¹⁷ Rather, since the climax of consolidation of orthodoxy came at Chalcedon 451, the Fourth Council, let me cite two learned Fathers whose views on impassibility coincided quite exactly and whose views were specifically endorsed and incorporated in the Definition and Canons of that Council. The letters of each were read at the Council and essentially adopted as the doctrine of the Council: hence passed into received orthodoxy of the church from that day to this.

Neither was present and neither expressly addressed the Council. Cyril’s ‘Dogmatic Letter’ addressed the heresy of Nestorius and had been written to him twenty years earlier. The letter by Leo, Bishop of Rome (The Tome of Leo), had been first addressed to Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, two years before the Council. Both Epistles were read, weighed and vigourously endorsed at Chalcedon.

Cyril’s letter had been first addressed directly to Nestorius just before the Third Council (Ephesus 431) because it was he who was deemed to be dividing the church through denial that Mary gave birth to incarnate deity. Cyril’s Epistle to Nestorius was then read at the Third Council. It had a positive effect in winning that Council to the orthodoxy of 325 (Nicaea) and 381 (Constantinople). But shortly trouble arose from another quarter. Eutyches, an old archimandrite at Constantinople, promoted the doctrine ‘not only that after his incarnation Christ had only one nature but also that the body of Christ is not of like substance with our own’.¹⁸ This and other problems made a Fourth Council (Chalcedon 451) necessary.

So Cyril’s letter was read again at the later Council.¹⁹ Some revelant portions of Cyril’s letter now follow:

We say that he ‘suffered and rose again’. We do not mean that God the Word suffered in his Deity ... for the Deity is impassible because it is incorporeal. But the body which had become his own body suffered these things, and therefore he himself is said to have suffered them for us. The impassible [God] was in the body which suffered.²⁰

The Tome of Leo was read by his representative. Hold in mind that the doctrinal problem being addressed was to define the incarnation of the Son of God. As Cyril’s letter was intended to correct Nestorius, so Leo’s Tome was to correct Eutyches. I cite several portions related to impassibility.

While the distinctiveness of both natures was preserved, and both met in one Person ... the inviolable [divine and impassible] was united to the passible, so that ... the same ‘Mediator’ ... might from the one element be capable of dying and also from the other be incapable [of dying].²¹

The Lord of the universe allowed his infinite majesty to be overshadowed, and took upon him the form of a servant; the impassible God did not disdain to be passible Man, and the immortal to be subject to the laws of death.²²

To pass by many points—it does not belong to the same nature to weep with feelings of pity over a dead friend [Jesus over Lazarus] and, after the mass of stone had been removed from the grave where he had lain four days, by a voice of command to raise him up to life again.²³

In the first excerpt passibility is said to be part of human nature but not of God’s. In the second the same idea is enlarged in elegant language which says that God was impassible and immortal, hence incapable of suffering as of dying. In the third, as God the Son our Lord was ‘incapable of feelings of pity’, such as He expressed when He wept at Lazarus’ tomb. ‘Incapable of feelings of pity’ means impassible in the sense of incapable of emotion.

At this climax in the doctrinal consolidation of Christian antiquity, the report of Session II goes on to say that ‘after the reading of the foregoing epistle’ the most reverend bishops cried out: ‘This is the faith of the fathers, this is the faith of the Apostles.... Piously and truly did Leo teach, so taught Cyril. Everlasting be the memory of Cyril ... This is the true faith.’²⁴

In all of Christian antiquity I was able to find only Origen (ad 185–254) among the learned, orthodox writers (later declared heterodox) who dissented from this view. In a book on early Christian doctrine, Gods and the One God by R. M. Grant, the author shows that Origen’s early views promoted the Christian consensus that God is impassible but late in life, when of about sixty-nine years, he taught that God is passible. Grant comments, ‘Apparently the threat of Patripassianism did not bother Origen, at least at this point.’²⁵

[My pursuit of the subject of this chapter has not, of course, included reading even in translation of all of Origen’s extant writings. Others have, among them Thomas Weinandy, cited frequently in this chapter. He contends that Origen, in an anthropopathic sense, meant that the transitive attributes (my term) of God set forth in Scripture mean to say God has steady unwavering love, hate, grief, etc. Yet, as a metaphysician trying to affirm absolutes, even Origen held God to be impassible. This is to say, ‘Origen upholds both the impassibility of God and the passion of God. To say that god is impassible is to deny emotional (i.e. to speak with anthropopathism) changes of states with God. It is a negative way of upholding the absolute otherness of God and of His radical perfection'. [Thomas Weinandy, Does God Suffer? (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 2000), p. 99]

III. Why the Patristic Consensus on God's Impassibility?

Enlightenment and liberal critics and historians blame the influence of Plato and other Greek philosophers, but I propose to the contrary a compelling reason in the fact that in Scripture God is most forcefully and grandly said to be supremely 'blessed'.

This occurs ten times in the New Testament, eight times employing eulogētos, used only of God in the New Testament. I cite two of these, Romans 1:25 and 9:5. The first refers to 'God ... the creator, who is blessed [eulogētos] forever! Amen.' The second speaks of 'Christ who is God over all, blessed forever. Amen.'²⁶ The first two refer to Jehovah God, the others to the 'Father of the Lord Jesus Christ'. In Mark 14:61 the high priest is employing 'the Blessed' as a very old circumlocution for Jehovah and in 2 Corinthians 11:31, 'he who is blessed [eulogētos] forever' [emphasis added] is undoubtedly the familiar Septuagint rendering of Exodus 3:14 'I am ho on' (I Am The One Who Is). It seems to me relevant to the 'impassibility' of God that eulogētos means 'blessed', that it renders baruk (blessed) throughout the Septuagint and seems to refer to the joy of God in heaven and of those whom God has blessed there. In standard Christian theology and hymnody 'blessed' (and 'blessedness') is the standard word for the joys of heaven, unmixed with pain or sorrow (Rev. 21:4).

Twice in the New Testament, the word makarios is used of God, both times by Paul (viz. 'the gospel of the blessed God', see 1 Tim. 1:11 and 6:15, 16). It is a peroration of Paul: 'the blessed [ho Makarios] and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality dwelling in unapproachable light.' In this passage Paul seems to exhaust the powers of the Greek language to proclaim what recent scholars (neo-orthodox, orthodox, Roman Catholic and even some evangelicals) phrase as 'the Wholly Other', still 'dwelling in unapproachable [uncreated] light' even as incarnate in Christ on the cross. I think ho apathētos (impassible) if it had then been in current use for precise theological statement, Paul might have put it in in apposition to ho makarios, the blessed.'

Though I shall not here carry this argument further, the biblical evidence from eulogētos and makarios has impressed me that we need not give up the impassibility of God. God transcendent in heaven and immanent in all creation is supremely happy (a synonym of blessed), always has been so, and forever will be.

IV. Impassibility to the Reformation

As an aspect of the simplicity of God, impassibility continued to be a seldom contested assumption of orthodox theology. It shall be sufficient for present purposes to cite the scholastic work of Anselm that evangelicals love most to cite—Cur Deus Homo (Why the God-man). 'The doctrine of the atonement in Anselm of Canterbury was based on the axiom that the divine nature is impassible, and that it can in no sense be brought down from its loftiness or toil in what it wills to do.' I quote one of Anselm's responses in his dialogue with Boso in Cur Deus Homo:

For without doubt we maintain that the divine nature is impassible—that it cannot at all be brought down from its exaltation ... And we affirm that the Lord Jesus Christ is true God and true man—one person in two natures, and two natures in one person. Therefore when we state that God undergoes some lowliness or weakness, we understand this to be in accordance with the weakness of the human substance which he assumed, not in accordance with the sublimity of his impassible [divine] nature.²⁷

V. Impassibility among the Reformers of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries

It is frequently remarked that Martin Luther was unconcerned about consistency in doctrines. Neo-orthodox writers are pleased with his alleged paradoxes. And we must acknowledge that his kerygmatic theology (doctrinal preaching) was at certain points in tension with his dogmatics, if it is correct to use that word in its proper sense. At the close of Althaus's treatment of Luther's 'Two-nature Christology' he remarks that it was not 'unified within itself but displays contradictions'.²⁸ In one place Luther could say 'Christ on the cross did not feel his deity but suffered purely as a man'.²⁹ Yet he could also say that 'the deity of Christ, because of the incarnation and of its personal unity with the humanity, enters into the uttermost depths of its suffering. God suffers in Christ. However Luther did not teach patripassianism ... He always regarded God's suffering as an incomprehensible mystery.'³⁰

Calvin was more explicit about employing two manners of speaking about God. On the one hand he insisted that we must employ the ad hominem, metaphoric language of biblical revelation, and on the other hand we must employ some technical language in dogmatics because it is necessary to define truth and to expose heresy. In this I think Calvin had as great a debt to Hilary of Poitiers as to any other theologian. He does not quote Hilary but acknowledges admiration for him, especially Hilary's idea about how to interpret the Bible's way of communicating truth about God. I cite a sentence in comment on Psalm 110:3, 'I have begotten thee from the womb before the morning' (LXX). God's 'purpose is to educate the faculties of men up to the knowledge of the faith by clothing Divine verities in words descriptive of human circumstances'³¹ and similarly through several paragraphs.

Calvin puts it this way: 'Let us then leave to God the knowledge of himself ... But we shall be "leaving it to him" if we conceive him to be as he reveals himself to us, without inquiring about him elsewhere than from his word.'³² Many times in his writings Calvin discourages all speculation about God's essence. Rather, says he, we should contemplate God in His works as guided by the Bible.³³ Yet that did not prevent Calvin from employing the somewhat speculative categories of the 'way of negation' ultimately derived from ancient 'enlightened' Greek speculations about Zeus or Theos conceived in a monotheistic manner (immutability, infinity and similar). Among these Calvin rather incidentally lets out his acceptance of the patristic consensus on divine impassibility. Once in comment on God's 'repentance' he says the description of the deity is 'accommodated to our capacity so that we may understand it. Now the mode of accommodation is for him to represent himself to us not as he is in himself, but as he seems to us. "Although he is beyond all disturbance of mind ... whenever we hear that God is angered, we ought not to imagine any emotion [i.e. passion] in him, but rather to consider that this expression has been taken from our own human experience" [emphasis added].'³⁴ A sifting of the Institutes turned up several passages wherein Calvin accepts it as axiomatic that the divine nature in itself is impassible.

Impassibility was not in itself an important issue in the sixteenth century. However, it is clear that the patristic axiom was not rejected. Theologians continued to affirm the immanent attributes of God such as simplicity, immutability, infinity and the rest. In that context of a priori thought about God, impassibility really does not need to be mentioned, for it is a near necessary inference.

Quite early in the Reformation Era the Anglican Articles of 1553 (Art. #1) affirmed that, ‘God is without bodily parts or passions.’ This is usually understood to mean that in His incorporeal essence God has no passions, for He is forever ‘blessed and only potentate’, and so on. The first paragraph of the Augsburg Confession says that evangelical churches confess ‘that the decree of the Nicene Synod concerning the unity of the divine essence ... to wit, that there is one divine essence ... eternal, incorporeal [incorporeus], without parts’. The word impassible is pointedly omitted, though the Nicene Creed as understood by the framers of it (ad 324, 381) unquestionably meant that too.³⁵ Charles P. Krauth, the greatest of Lutheran historians of The Conservative (Lutheran) Reformation, evidently thinks that the divine nature was impassible before incarnation but by virtue of communication of attributes (Communicatio Idiomatum) the divine nature became passible. So before the incarnation God was impassible but now is passible. He argues this at length.³⁶ If Krauth is right, then after the incarnation the divine nature—Father, Son and Holy Ghost—is passible.

The Roman Church, following the ancients, continued to affirm God the Father is ‘invisible, incapable of suffering, immortal, incomprehensible, immutable’³⁷ though the Son incarnate was impassible, untroubled ‘by the sufferings of the soul and the longings of the flesh’ (cites Canon 12 of Second Council of Constantinople [Fifth Ecumenical]).³⁸

VI. Among the Immediate Heirs of the Reformation (1600s, 1700s)

Through the scholastic period of Protestant theology I detect no variation from the patristic consensus. The Westminster Confession I, iv, approved by the Long Parliament 1647, says ‘God ... is ... a most pure spirit, invisible, without body, parts, or passions’. I think that clearly says that God’s ‘infinite being’ is ‘without parts or passions’ as in similar way theology of the day affirmed, though Buswell does not think so³⁹ and A. A. Hodge is obscure on the matter.⁴⁰ Buswell seems to say that it means God has no body which has parts. I think it says God’s infinite being has no body, no parts and no passions, and so agree all the usual readers of the confession.

For present purposes I shall quote only one further representative of the period, the most learned and voluminous of England’s dissenting (Baptist) theologians, John Gill (1697–1771). His two great volumes (A Body of Doctrinal Divinity) are the very embodiment of a systematic theology bound to the Scriptures. Even present-day publishers of new editions of Gill’s Divinity emphasize that his discussions are in the very language of Scripture. He wrote:

... for as it has been commonly said, ‘Christ remained what he was, and assumed what he was not’; and what he assumed added nothing to his divine person; he was only manifest in the flesh; he neither received any perfection or imperfection, from the human nature; though that received dignity and honour by its union to him and was adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit without measure.... Nor was any change made in the divine nature by the sufferings of Christ; the divine nature is impassible, and is one reason why Christ assumed the human nature, that he might be capable of suffering and dying.... Yet he was crucified in the human nature only, and his blood was shed in that, to which the divine person gave virtue and efficacy, through its union to it; but received no change at all by this.⁴¹

If you have followed the progress of this chapter you will recognize this extract as a near republication of Cyril's Epistle to Nestorius and Leo's Tome at the Council of Chalcedon (ad 451).

Both Lutheran and Reformed theology went through a stage of 'scholastic fortification' of the early evangelical symbols and other Reformation formulas: to be followed by a rationalistic reaction in the 'Age of Reason'. In the scholastic period, speculative writing about the simplicity and immutability of God rendered Him not just immutable but almost immobile, hence of course impassible.⁴²

VII. In the Late Protestant Era

In Britain and America, the immutability of God came to be a matter of dispute between orthodox writers of Calvinistic persuasion and Wesleyan theologians. I suppose it was a spin-off from the debated question of free will. This is explained clearly in the article on 'Immutability' in the McClintock and Strong Cyclopaedia (IV, 20). This truly great work of the nineteenth century, though of Arminian-Wesleyan aegis, is always scrupulously fair.

The article first quotes the work of Stephen Charnock (1628–75), On the Divine Attributes, on immutability, a decidedly Calvinistic work. The excerpt was well chosen by the editors. Charnock is still in print and read today as he was when I was in seminary, and for about 300 years now. For Charnock, God is a 'Being, whom nothing from without can affect or alter ... an eternal Being, who always has and always will go on in the same tenor of existence'. The word impassibility is not there, but the idea is clearly affirmed in other words.

Then the Cyclopaedia assigns equal space to Richard Watson (1781–1833), the classic interpreter of Wesley in theological terms and most eminent Wesleyan theologian (and perhaps still ought to be).⁴³ After gentle warning to take the Calvinists cautiously Watson (who always wrote in the style of educated English Calvinists) defends the view that God's immutability consists not in his essential nature or even adherence to his 'purposes' (which in Arminian theology are subject to change) 'but in his never changing the principles of his administration'.⁴⁴ In favour of this Watson (whom I checked out at length in the two tattered volumes of his Institutes that I am privileged to own) writes at considerable length. I suppose this divergence prevails to the present. Interest in such matters has waned in modern Methodism, though not in some related evangelical Wesleyan groups.

VIII. The Impassibility of God in Recent and Contemporary Theology

With the coming of the Age of Reason (the eighteenth century onward), theologians outside the stream of rather strict Augustinian orthodoxy (Calvinist and Roman Catholic) have veered sharply away from views of God which could entertain simplicity (no parts), and hence immutability and consequent impassibility. Orthodox Wesleyan Arminianism, early in the epoch, has already been noted. Philosophical-theological development (Schleiermacher and his emphasis on feeling, Kierkegaard and his anti-metaphysical subjectivism, and the like) began the mood that welcomed departure from classical theistic-Trinitarian assumptions. Then came Ludwig Feuerbach (1808–1872). In his books

The Essence of Religion and The Essence of Christianity, Feuerbach made two points of interest to the present subject. In the first place, theological dogma is purely subjective in origin and crystallizes the inner aspirations, hopes and fears of people. Their inner yearnings create pictures of what they seek. The mental pictures are projected by creating gods which embody what they seek. In the second place, the pervasiveness of evil in the sense of human suffering proves that an omnipotent, holy and loving God does not exist. He is only the creation of religious people, by projection of what they desperately wish to be true. Feuerbach also had a socialist-political agenda to promote with his 'protest atheism'. He rightly discerned that the God of the Bible and Christian creeds could hardly be enlisted to support Feuerbach's political-social programme.

Then also came Adolph von Harnak (1851–1936). In his view Christian theology got off to a bad start by pollution with classical Greek ideas of God, derived mainly from Plato. His seven volumes of History of Dogma (1886–1890) trace what he thought was a true history of a false orthodox theology which 'jumped the track' of ethical religion in the first apologists of the second century and never got back. Christian theology until the rise of liberalism has been simple faith in a God of love taught and exemplified by Jesus, but transformed by the influence of Greek philosophy into cold-blooded dogma.

Several recent and contemporary figures including Karl Barth, John Macquarrie and Jürgen Moltmann, all theologically somewhere between historic orthodoxy and modern liberalism, have sought to answer the protest atheism of Feuerbach, the pure ethicism of Harnak, and liberalism in general by resort to a redefinition of our Lord's incarnation and the holy Trinity. By resort to a redefinition of Trinitarianism these authors have sought to rescue God from the charge of impassibility, which they equate to impassivity and immobility. Jürgen Moltmann, in a manner quite consistent with ancient Patristicism, has opposed the historic orthodoxy. Recent Roman Catholic theology (not all of it orthodox in any historic sense) is on both sides of the issue.

They have influenced many in the same direction, some of them evangelicals. Among those who now rather thoroughly reject impassibility and regularly participate in programmes of the Evangelical Theological Society are Gordon Lewis and Millard Erickson. One of the founding members of ETS, J. O. Buswell rejected it also.

A rather dispassionate survey of the present situation will be found in Alister E. McGrath's Christian Theology.⁴⁵ McGrath, who seems to be writing for secular university classes, presents the matter rather clearly but characteristically, without making any commitment of his own. Perhaps it's the current British style, though if so there are exceptions.⁴⁶

Process Theology, as a matter of principle, rejects the impassibility of God. Tracing their theology to the philosophy of Hartshorne and before him of Whitehead, they say that 'this concept derives from the Greeks'. Since the world is part of God's 'constitutive reality', the future of the world is not foreseen to God. Self-determining acts of free, worldly beings like human beings contribute to His being. Hence 'These three terms—unchangeable, passionless, and absolute—finally say the same thing, that the world contributes nothing to God and that God's influence upon the world is in no way conditioned by unforeseen, self-determining activities of us worldly beings. Process Theology denies the existence of this God.'

W. Waite Willis, Jr claims the Trinitarian theologies of K. Barth and J. Moltmann as his own and claims Karl Rahner also as a fellow traveller. He asserts that this theology answers the atheistic critics of Christianity of modern times, especially Feuerbach. The God of speculative theology, says Willis, is the one against whom 'protest atheism' succeeds. The Trinitarian God of the Bible has no problem of unexplained suffering. He's against it and suffers from it along with us and will continue to do so until in the consummation, God, we may suppose, becomes completely God. Is this a union of krisis theology with process theology and with liberation theology?⁴⁷ As related specifically to impassibility, I cite the following assertions of Willis regarding theodicy and the Trinity:

God ... has become concrete and sensuous.... [T]he Trinity comprehends the Christian God's concrete, sensuous, praxis on behalf of human suffering ... God ... joins the protest ... against human suffering ... works in suffering love and ... will not be fully God while suffering persists ... surrenders his impassibility.⁴⁸

Conclusions and Proposals

But we really cannot give up the doctrine of divine impassibility. Recent movement to demolish it takes away too much. I see no mightier than Cyril, Leo, Augustine, the three Cappadocians, Anselm, Aquinas, Calvin, Edwards, Gill and Shedd on the present scene or the future horizon. It may be that chucking the ancient faith in this regard is a concession to the Zeitgeist, particularly to the subjectivism at all levels in popular thought today.

When the language of biblical revelation speaks of a wide range of God's emotions it is speaking analogically. Perhaps Thomas Aquinas can help us.

Thomas pointed out that when an adjective (attribute) is ascribed to God, 'wise', for example, it must be understood to apply to God's very being (essence), an aspect of His indivisible simplicity. But when applied to mankind, 'wise' does not apply to our essence, for sometimes we are unwise. So there is analogy between God's 'wise' and mankind's 'wise', but only of proportionality. In an analogy of proportion, 'Two things are related by a direct proportion of degree, distance, or measure: e.g. 6 is in direct proportion to 3, of which it is the double.... This analogy is called analogy of proportion.'⁴⁹ But when 'two objects are related one to the other by means of another and intermediary relation; for instance, 6 and 4 are analogous in this sense that 6 is the double of 3 as 4 is of 2, or [in mathematical procedure] 6:4::3:2 ... this kind of analogy is based on the proportion of properties; it is called analogy of proportionality.'⁵⁰ G.M. Sauvage cites Thomas' treatise, 'De veritate' (Concerning Truth), not in either Summa Theologica or Summa Contra Gentiles. Thomas does not describe analogy of proportionality in the articles on analogy in the two Summas (Theologica i, 13 and Contra Gentiles i, 34).

I think analogy is still the route to go, especially what Thomas Aquinas called the analogy of proportionality, or, as I prefer, of 'commensurability'. Because mankind is commensurable with the divine essence, God could become a member of our race, but never an ape, a camel, an insect or a fish.

Yet we cannot leave the matter there even today. Like us, the believers of old said, 'Jesus loves me, this I know, for the Bible tells me so', and 'the Father loves me too, or He would not have given his only begotten Son to save us from our sins'. The pastors of ancient times also read their Bibles—more than we, for they didn't have all the 'how to' courses in seminary to teach and to master! So they also knew of God's love for His people in every age, however explained.

Final Proposals

To bring this matter to at least a tentative conclusion, it seems to me we must affirm that we know as much of God as He has seen fit to reveal. The way of negation (incomprehensibility, immutability and similar) in theology is a way of confessing this in part. The simplicity and immutability of God are, however, not merely speculation, Greek or otherwise. Sound Trinitarian teaching affirms not a tripartite God but one God—a God who has no parts at all. In the plurality of personae, prosopa, hypostases, persons is a plurality-in-unity that cannot quite fully be explained, but only affirmed and believed. Like Augustine we affirm, 'Certainly there are three.... Yet when it is asked, what three, human language labors from great poverty of speech. We say "three persons", not that it may [rightly] so be said, but that we may not say nothing at all'.⁵¹

Similarly, it seems to me, to reject the impassibility of the Godhead is to dissipate the unity (simplicity and immutability) of God in accommodation to a modern understanding of what constitutes personality that is unknown to the people who gave us not only the doctrine but the terminology of a Trinitarian theology. The creeds do not teach three distinct centres of consciousness in the Godhead, as is popularly supposed. Where we say person the ancients said soul. They did not say there are three souls in the Godhead; but that seems to be what many mean by three persons.

Jonathan Edwards rejected every notion of an indigent, insufficient or mutable God 'or any dependence of the creator on the creature for any part of His perfections or happiness'.⁵² In such a case God did not plan, create and control a world with a man in it who would breed a fallen race so God could either be happy or unhappy. God did not need mankind either then or now in order to be 'God blessed forever'.

The anthropopathisms of the biblical revelations are all true on the basis of analogy. Analogy means similarity of some sort, but not equivalence; otherwise it is not analogy but definition. Ancient theologians figured out right away that God's 'repentance' is not an emotion of His being but a change of treatment of mankind or some other part of the creation. Their writings employ the very illustrations (sun's actions on clay or wax, and so on) that we use today. The analogy is a bit crippled but about the best 1,900 years of thinking has produced. As to God's love and all other emotions—fear, hate, jealousy and the like—we then must say that just as there is analogy between mankind's repentance and God's change of treating us so there is analogy between our emotions (or passibility) and something about God's treatment of us. We just have not found a good name for it—yet. There is no consistency in regarding God's hate, repentance and wrath as only analogically true while making out love and suffering to be non-analogical. We cannot, in my judgment, have it both ways, and this is what those theologians—evangelical or otherwise—are asking us to do in saying God is passible, that is, subject to emotions, either of suffering or its opposite. Prayer is only one aspect of worship which depends on the validity of analogy. In prayer we say, 'Our Father'. Yet father is a human word indicating a human function of begetting with a whole plethora of accompanying ideas. Some of this is like God. Some is not. It does not fit God perfectly at all, but whether in the prayer of a small child or the dying words of his grandmother, 'Father' is a right name for the God of revelation and the vocabulary of prayer.

Conclusion: Minding our Language and Mending it

Though we affirm the limitations and values of analogical language, let us not read into God's being any human ideal having its origin in the spirit of the present world. The spirit of our epoch is not the Spirit of God, but the sullen mood of this present evil age. There may be something analogous to sexuality in God—the doctrine of the image of God may imply such—but no sexuality. So there is something in God by way of a certain analogy called love and/or hate, but no emotion.

I think we may greatly exaggerate correspondences of analogy in talk about God. There may be analogy of proportionality rather than of strict proportion, to employ the language of medieval, scholastic discourse. But the distinction between analogy of proportion and analogy of proportionality drawn from Thomas Aquinas is a subject for another day. Something about mankind is analogous to something in God. But that scarcely gives us leave to define God as simply a human being on infinite scale, as has been done in polytheism and some Christian writing. The other extreme is so to emphasize the immutability of the divine Being as to render Him immobile, not free even to answer our prayers. This was characteristic of some theology of the age of Protestant scholasticism.⁵³

The language of technical theological discourse has its place, and that is what I am defending. I must, however, live and die with the language of revelation as expressed best in the perennial hymns. In this too God's lack of change of any kind, dare I say, impassibility, has a prominent place. A stanza from Henry F. Lyte's hymn lyric, Abide With Me, is a noble example:

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day;
Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away;
Change and decay in all around I see;
O thou who changest not, abide with me.

¹ TDNT, ii, 764, sub eulogetos.

² Strack-Billerbeck, ii, sub Mark 14:61, p. 51.

Oxford English Dictionary The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary

³ Liddell and Scott, Lexicon.

⁴ Gregory of Nyssa, The Great Catechism, chap. xxxv in NPNF, II, 5, pp. 502–504.

⁵ Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St. Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954), p. 224.

⁶ Thomas G. Weinandy, Does God Suffer? (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000), p. 101.

- ⁷ J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, Revised ed. (New York: Harper Collins, 1978). See pages 84, 120, 122, 142, 143, 169, 291, 299, 372, 314, 317, 322, 325, 476, 488.
- ⁸ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, vol. I The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971), pp. 52–55.
- ⁹ Ps. 102:27; Isa. 40:10; Mal. 3:6; James 1:17.
- ¹⁰ Thomas Weinandy, op. cit., p. 108.
- ¹¹ ANF, I, 1.
- ¹² ANF I, x. 2, 3.
- ¹³ ANF I, x. 3. Above citations are all from Antenocene Fathers, I, pp. 315–331.
- ¹⁴ Jean Danielou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture: A History of Early Christian Doctrine Before the Council of Nicaea, trans. J. A. Baker (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1973), p. 303.
- ¹⁵ Danielou, op. cit., pp. 304, 305.
- ¹⁶ Danielou, op. cit., pp. 306–322.
- ¹⁷ Pelikan, op. cit., pp. 52–55.
- ¹⁸ J. H. Kurtz, Church History I, trans. John MacPherson (New York: Funk & Wagner, n.d.), p. 334.
- ¹⁹ The article on Cyril in William Smith's six-volume Greek and Roman Biography, Mythology and Geography, vol 1, p. 918, right column, says Ephrem of Antioch speaks of a now lost treatise by Cyril on impassibility and another on suffering.
- ²⁰ Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 67.
- ²¹ NPNF, vol. 14, p. 255.
- ²² ibid., p. 256.
- ²³ ibid., p. 256.
- ²⁴ ibid., p. 253.
- ²⁵ R. M. Grant, Gods and the One God (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1986), pp. 91–93.
- ²⁶ See also Mark 14:61; Luke 1:68; 2 Cor. 1:2; 11:21; Eph. 1:2; 1 Peter 1:2

= See also Mark 14:61; Luke 1:68; 2 Cor. 1:5; 11:51; Eph. 1:5; 1 Peter 1:5.

27 Anselm of Canterbury, vol. iii, ed. and trans. by J. Hopkins & H. Richardson (Toronto & New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1976), pp. 58, 59.

28 Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 196.

29 ibid., p. 198.

30 ibid., p. 197.

³¹ On the Trinity, vi, 16 NPNF, II, 9, p. 103.

³² Calvin, Institutes, I, xiii, 21.

³³ ibid., I, 2, 2.

³⁴ ibid., II, 2. 3.

³⁵ Lutherans, at least some of the time, think they should stick by strict biblical language more than Calvinists do.

³⁶ Charles P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1875), pp. 316–320.

³⁷ Denzinger, op. cit., Index 18, right column.

³⁸ ibid., Index 8 f and #224, pp. 88, 89.

³⁹ James O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, i (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 56, 57.

⁴⁰ A. A. Hodge, The Confession of Faith (London: Banner of Truth Trust ed., 1964), pp. 48, 49.

⁴¹ John Gill, Complete Body of Divinity, vol. i (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), p. 54. 1767 is the original publishing date of A Body of Doctrinal Divinity quoted here.

⁴² J. A. Dorner, History of Protestant Theology II (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1871), pp. 120 ff.

McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

⁴³ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes II 29th ed., ed. J. McClintock (New York: Nelson & Phillips, 1850), p. 401.

⁴⁴ ibid., p. 492.

⁴⁵ Christian Theology, An Introduction, p. 250–254.

⁴⁶ Alister E. McGrath, Christian Theology, An Introduction 2nd ed. (Oxford: Blackwell Publ., 1997), pp. 248–54.

⁴⁷ W. Waite Willis, Jr, Theism, Atheism and The Doctrine of the Trinity: The Trinitarian Theologies of Karl Barth and Juergen Moltmann in Response to Protest Atheism (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1987), pp. 106–107 and chapter vi ‘The Exchaological Trinity’.

⁴⁸ ibid., pp. 105–106

— ibid., pp. 105, 106.

⁴⁹ G. M. Sauvage, ‘Analogy’ in The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. I, p. 449.

⁵⁰ ibid.

⁵¹ de Trinitate, V, 9; see Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Vol III, p. 92.

⁵² G. P. Fisher, History of Christian Doctrine (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1949, 2nd ed.), p. 406.

⁵³ Dorner, op. cit., p. 142 ff.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (216). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 2

ANTHROPOLOGY

Man as Created

1

Introduction to Anthropology

Two appealing preliminaries tempt us away from direct engagement with the Scriptural doctrine of mankind. Neither can be fully avoided but attention to each must be limited. One is the abundant literature of the world, all of which in one way or another celebrates mankind's excellencies or failings; ecstasies and despairs; accomplishments and 'affairs' in prose, poetry, art and drama. But the 'world itself could not contain the books' (John 21:25) if that route were to engage major attention. A second temptation is to join battle with the 'rational-animal-nothing-more' view of mankind which permeates both the social life and intellectual atmosphere of our time.

These variegated areas are both interesting and of some importance to the study of our race. They should claim some attention in every offering in the liberal arts division of a university. For, a Christian doctrine of mankind ought to condition all our thoughts about the liberal arts we study and enjoy as well as about how we live. Our present duty, however, focuses primarily on humanitas, humanness in and of itself, and not in the various special creations, accomplishments and failures of the members of our race. It is our duty to release these topics to other venues.

A Major Topic of Theology

As the study develops it will become clear why theological anthropology is a major consideration of most books of systematic theology. Why should it not be? There are members of our race on every page of the Bible: the story of our origin on the first page and of our destiny on the last with the story of our fall and redemption traced through all the pages in between.

Christian anthropology is not founded on empirical study of mankind in their physical and cultural variety. Christian, theological anthropology derives most of its biblical data from the accounts in Scripture (mainly the first two chapters) of the creation of primal mankind. These two chapters, together with the many interpretative statements elsewhere in the Bible, especially Psalm 8, constitute the major sources of our doctrine. John Murray's opening sentence in treatment of the doctrine of man declares: 'For our knowledge of man's origin we are mainly dependent upon the first two chapters of Genesis (cf. also Matt. 19:4, 5; Mark 10:6, 7; Luke 3:38; 1 Cor. 11:8, 9; 1 Tim. 2:13).'¹ The doctrine of sin, or mankind as they now are, fallen from their original state, is the next locus of theology, usually entitled hamartiology, or the doctrine of sin.

This introductory chapter addresses those first two chapters of Genesis, summarizing what we deem to be the most relevant information and stating some necessary inferences, some primarily historical, others theological and practical. In later chapters we return to relate the whole of scriptural information to the question of the Hebrew shepherd-poet: ‘what is man that you are mindful of him, and the son of man that you care for him?’ (Ps. 8:4).

The Lost Image of Mankind

If a human being were a mere ‘sac of water’ with an interesting ‘variety of chemicals reacting with one another therein,’ as in some current materialistic philosophy, then a book on physics and chemistry might explain him sufficiently, though no such being, in my judgment, could possibly either write or read such a book. If he were also ‘a fantastic piece of workmanship in bone, muscle, and nerve—a high point of evolution in the animal kingdom,’ a biological approach might suffice. If he be only a ‘busy hedonist’ prowling for pleasure until jaded and exhausted he covers his disillusionment in the night of death, then something on psychology might help explain mankind. If, Gnostic, New-Age style mankind is a misplaced piece of divine mind, temporarily dislodged and longing for home back in the cosmic flux, then a dash of metaphysics is in order. (The quotes are from F. I. Collingwood.²)

But, if mankind is as significant and magnificent as his aspirations (freedom, fulfillment, immortality) and ideals (goodness, beauty, truth) suggest, then the religious dimension must be brought to the Hebrew poet’s question. Only the illogic of special interest, or of intellectual myopia, could lead one to accept any one of these partial views just suggested. Yet there are contemporary ‘intellectuals’ committed to each one of them.

There is nothing to inspire art, poetry and song in these current departures from belief in God and mankind’s greatness as His special creation. It should be no surprise that increasing numbers of all social classes have taken up a style of life commensurate with their Lost Image of Man, the title of a book by Julian N. Hartt.³

The Specifically Relevant Texts

As already observed, three portions of the Old Testament form the initial ground of biblical anthropology. They are Genesis 1:1–2:4a; Genesis 2:4b ad fin; and Psalm 8. Poe and Davis say of the origin of individuals, ‘all people are made of clay by God (Job 4:19; 10:8–12; Isa. 29:16, 64:8; 45:9, 64:8; Lam. 4:2; Rom. 9:20, 23; 2 Cor. 4:7), yet the Bible just as steadfastly asserts that God made each person within each of his or her mother’s womb (Job 10:18; Ps. 139:13–16; Isa. 44:2; Jer. 1:5).’⁴ Many have noticed the three Scripture passages do not appear to be of exactly the same literary genre, or, if the same then with markedly individual features. One like the present writer, a professional theologian, scarcely dares express a view on the subject lest he alienate a major portion of the readership, for opinions are strong and often associated with deep emotions. Yet whether strict historical narrative, parable, pictorial summary or whatever, the apparent meanings and the plain inferences are the true ones. The part of the first passage (Gen. 1:1–2:4a) which bears directly on anthropology is contained in verses 26–29 of chapter 1.

The Question of Literary Genre

A full discussion of the literary genus of Genesis 1 and 2 is too large a project for now. I have already argued for the presence of symbolical as opposed to strictly a historical-literal interpretation of every sentence. I shall get back to that, but at this point it must be said that whatever the genus (genre) or literary vehicle we decide the author of Genesis 1 and 2 employed, the weight of later biblical references requires the believing interpreter to insist on the basic historical nature of the narrative itself and factual referents for every symbol. Authentic symbols represent something and in the Bible that something is true. Jesus treated the narrative of Genesis 1 to 3 as factual and founded a theology of marriage as it ought to be upon it (Matt. 19:3–8). Paul constructed his arguments regarding the ministry of women and the relation of the sexes squarely on the creation accounts not only as true but essentially historical (1 Tim. 2:9–15; Eph. 5:28–31). Isaiah’s challenges to the encroaching idolatry of his day were based largely on the Genesis creation account (Isa. 40:21; 42:5; 45:18 et al). Jeremiah alludes to the story (Jer. 4:23) and many Psalms reflect not only awareness of the account but full acceptance of it—especially Psalm 33:6–8.

Ten Preliminary Propositions

It will be convenient in this preliminary assessment to group teaching regarding mankind’s original constitution and situation under seven propositions.

1. Man is the crown of God’s creative art, the piece de resistance, and best in an ascending scale. Beginning with an inchoate ‘heavens and the earth’ the narrative proceeds through the ordering of earth for various living genera—of plants, aquatic life, birds, animals—and finally of mankind, male and female. The language moves from the inanimate through vegetable life and then increasingly complex forms of animal life to human beings. It is the honest prose of common people, direct and plain—not unscientific but pre-scientific and non-technical. That the ascending scale is intended to show mankind’s superior excellence cannot seriously be doubted.

There is further basis in the dominion of mankind over all living creatures on earth proclaimed in Genesis 1:26. H. C. Leupold concludes a long discussion this way:

Taking the verse as a whole, we cannot but notice that it sets forth a picture of a being that stands on a very high level ... of singular nobility and endowed with phenomenal powers and attributes, not a type of being that by its brute imperfections is seen to be on the same level with the animal world, but a being that towers high above all other creatures, their king and their crown.⁵

2. Mankind is like God—or perhaps better, simply God’s image—in a unique, but unspecified manner. This apparent grounding of his excellencies, privileges and duties will call for extensive elaboration in later chapters.

3. Mankind was created male and female, with no distinction being drawn between the degree to which each sex shares in the excellencies, privileges and duties involved; perhaps the two in aggregate rather than each in toto is ‘in the image and likeness of God.’ This also will be treated at length later.

4. Human beings have the privilege and duty of dominion over the rest of God’s earthly creatures (Gen. 1:26). Already at this pristine state of revelatory history, mankind’s rule over terrestrial creation is not a goal to be attained but an announced fact. People will fulfill the mandate whether aware of the 'command' or not. It is a part of human nature to do so as the progressive dominion of the race over surrounding nature, even under the misdirection caused by sin, demonstrates. It is worthy of note that the heavens are not included in the mandate, a matter of fact reflected in Psalm 115:16, 'The heavens are the Lord's heavens, but the earth he has given to the children of man.' This announcement is reaffirmed as well as explained and enlarged for postdiluvian mankind: 'The fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth,' etc. (Gen. 9:1–3). Some exegetes call attention to the plural, 'let their,' and similar, suggesting that this authority was intended for all Adam's posterity, 'hence we infer that none of the conveniences and necessities of life might be wanting to men.'⁶ Others note the high status of human beings here.

5. Related but added is the privilege and duty to subdue the earth. This may be presumed (in parallel with what has actually happened throughout history) to mean that we human beings are supposed to employ earth's resources (exploit is not too strong a word) for our own service. If, as an older commentator wrote, the former privilege, 'have dominion,' is 'the colonist's charter,' then 'subdue it' is the farmer's, the scientist's and the industrialist's charter. Contemporary environmentalist criticism of these provisions will be treated later.

6. Human beings have the duty to multiply their species by natural reproduction. It is apparent that though stated in what seems like an imperative mode, it is grammatically in Hebrew (as English) a declarative. It is our nature (as we sometimes as sinners have reason to regret) at a certain age to take conjugal action to reproduce our kind. There was first a single act of divine creation, producing an original male. Then out of the male the first female (Gen. 2). After that, procreation was to be the method of enlarging the numbers of our race. That this was to be only within monogamous marriage is later specified (Gen. 2:23–25; 4:1 ff.). Given the full integrity of human nature before sin and consequent loss of the generations by death, the duty to 'replenish' (Heb. 'fill') the earth would have been accomplished after many generations by very small families. This is only an inference, but a necessary, interesting and important inference. Imagine fifty generations living contemporaneously! This also calls for later exploration.

7. A special point is made of the privilege of mankind to use the fruit of the earth (as do animals also Gen. 1:29, 30) for food. This privilege is not an aspect of dominion and subduing set forth earlier in Genesis 1, even though perhaps intended as enlargement. The ground from which the human body was taken is to furnish his bodily nourishment. This will appear again in chapter 2 of Genesis.

8. Mankind has affinities with 'the earth,' the inanimate creation of the ninety-plus elements. God 'formed' us not by simple fiat, ex nihilo. Genesis 2:7 explains Genesis 1:26, 27. Hence Paul could say, we are 'from the earth, a man of dust' (1 Cor. 15:47). Though this affinity resulted in a return to dust in death after man became the sinner, his affinity with the natural world was necessary. From the beginning he gained sustenance from the fruits of the ground, walked on it, breathed its atmosphere. John Murray comments:

There is congruity between man and his environment. And for this there is a necessity. If it were not so there would be a discrepancy between man and his habitat, between man and his task, in incompatibility that would have negated the verdict ... 'very good.'⁷

9. Though by virtue of unique likeness to God, there is no personal, spiritual, rational correspondence with other earthly animate creatures, we have affinities with other living creatures (2:7, 19). They, like our first male parent, were formed from earthy substance: mankind ‘of dust from the ground’ (Gen 2:7); they from ‘the earth.’ They, like mankind, have animate life for which every person should have a care, hence ‘Whoever is righteous has regard for the life of his beast’ (Prov. 12:10; cf. Deut. 25:4; 1 Cor. 9:9; 1 Tim. 5:18).

10. Finally, it should appear that God had His highest purposes for mankind. His place as the crown and climax of creation as well as several of the privileges granted and duties imposed suggest that God intended earth to be an orderly and cultivated planet, and a ‘developed’ one (in the current social-economic sense). The story of Genesis 3 shows that mankind was made in God’s image to have fellowship with Him in a happy situation within and without. Recent writers of Christian apologetics have turned mankind’s eminence in the natural order into what they call ‘the anthropic principle’—as evidence of intelligent design in the whole natural order.

If the revelation in Genesis 1 were all we knew of mankind, we would still possess much important and precious information—sufficient to encourage us to believe it is a marvelous thing to be born a member of the human race.

The Two Accounts

In the next section of the Genesis account of creation a somewhat different literary mode is employed, as we shall see. Whether the second section begins at the end of Genesis 2:4 or in the midst of it is a matter of minor exegetical difficulty. There is an important tradition of exegesis (I think the correct one) which holds that the first part of Genesis 2:4 (‘These are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created’) is the end of the first account, a kind of colophon or signature. See for summary evidences G. P. Spurrell and P. J. Wiseman.⁸ In this case, starting mid-verse for the second section, the section begins: ‘in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens. When no bush of the field was yet in the land,’ etc.

Editors and translators are rightfully cautious about introducing new features of format in Bible Versions that affect interpretation. Topical headings are important always. Just where the first ‘account’ ends and the second begins is of great importance to interpretation here. The New International Version and the English Standard Version put all of Genesis 2:4 in the account of Adam and Eve’s creation. The New English Bible, with which I concur in this case, divides the verse in the midst, viz.: ‘This is the story of the making of heaven and earth when they were created’ ends the narrative which began at 1:1, ‘In the beginning,’ etc. Then neb inserts the topical heading, ‘The beginnings of history’ and continues with the translation: ‘When the Lord God made earth and heaven, there was neither shrub nor plant growing wild upon the earth ... nor was there any man to till the ground.’ Then after one short verse (6) comes the statement about the creation of mankind in verse 7, ‘Then the Lord God formed a man,’ etc. Commentators are divided.

Even if the second section now before us is given less of an independent relation to the first than this explanation suggests, the emphasis of the second section (Gen. 2:4b–25) is different in a supplemental sense, from Genesis 1. In chapter 1 mankind is culmination; in chapter 2 mankind is center.

Literal—Figurative—Factual

Let us not rush to judgment as to how much of the Mosaic account of creation is literally intended and to what extent figurative. Meanwhile let us assume that historical facts are conveyed to us (as shall be defended later). Many uncontested contrary realities place severe restraint on efforts to make these two chapters read like the historical accounts in Exodus or Samuel and Kings.

In the first place, the nature of the creative events is all supernatural, even in minor detail. Consider even the food eaten by Adam and Eve on the sixth day of creation. If grain, was it miraculously created? Or did it have a year's history as grain today? If it had a history, when? Similarly, no one knows the precise source of the barley loaves and Galilee fish miraculously supplied for the 5000 at the time of the famous miracle. Claims are made that they were all specially and instantaneously created de novo in the hands of Jesus. Yet no one can know for sure that such was the case. Or the bread and fish on the coals which the risen Christ fed seven astonished disciples (John 21:9). Did a fishmonger and an early-rising baker sell them to an unrecognized, risen Jesus? Who gathered the sticks for the early morning fire? Did Jesus 'create' the fire, the sticks, the fish, the bread ex nihilo? Anyone who says he knows is pretending.

Some advocates of 'creation science' and of young earth theories claim the bread had a created history of seed, germination, growth, ripening, harvest, milling and baking all compressed into a moment of creation. That certainly may be true, but though suggestive, hardly demonstrates the theories of 'creation science' regarding geological history. Neither can the theory be arbitrarily discounted.

I have no purpose either to encourage or discourage the efforts of advocates of recent creation and a 'young earth.' *The Genesis Flood*⁹ has now been read widely for several decades. Subsequent volumes, such as The Early Earth, 1972 (by Whitcomb), continue to convince some. I suspect that contrary views by evangelical scholars that give the geologists free range to attempt a history of earth to beginnings billions of years ago have been equally persuasive. They have been less persuasive in making a case for remote antiquity of mankind. It seems to me the early earth advocates err for sure in only one respect—their regular disparagement of the integrity of the faith of evangelicals who disagree with them. This is evident throughout Whitcomb's books. The following is typical. Having asserted sudden creation with a 'superficial appearance of age,' John Whitcomb adds:

Few doctrines of Scripture have met with such misrepresentation and ridicule as this, not only by secular writers but also by some who claim to be evangelical Christians.¹⁰

This is a put-down for such evangelical stalwarts as J. Oliver Buswell, author of extensive arguments for a great antiquity of human origins.¹¹ As for the requirements of Scripture, Buswell wrote: 'as for the antiquity of man on the earth, we must bluntly say that the Bible gives us no data on which to base any conclusion, or even any estimate.'¹²

Dr Whitcomb had all his seminary courses in Old Testament from me quite a few years ago. We have been friends—engaging in correspondence—throughout the years. This is only the latest in my so far unsuccessful efforts to convince his sharp mind he cannot be absolutely sure he's right on this matter and ought not to make his view a test of the integrity of the faith or scholarship of others.

Secondly, the entire narrative of Genesis 1 and 2 was revealed to Moses (I know no better name for the author). Whether God spoke to Moses ‘face to face, as a man speaks to his friend’ (Exod. 33:11), or some other way, there is little likelihood that ‘all the wisdom of the Egyptians’ (Acts 7:22) educated Moses to the level he would have understood the technical data of creative events any more than, without an engineer’s training, I will ever be able to understand the mysteries of a funny-looking box with typewriter keys and a video screen that sits in my study cabin. For example, it seems very likely (if less than absolutely certain) that in the momentous announcement of Genesis 1:1 and the record of the Flood ‘the earth’ (Heb. ha’aretz) meant anything more definite than the firm ground beneath Moses’ feet as far as one can see and perhaps wherever it extended. Such ideas as ‘sphere,’ ‘planet,’ ‘orbit,’ ‘circumference’ and the like were still far in the future and no matter of concern to readers of the Pentateuch for many generations.

Stated otherwise, everything about the narrative must be interpreted first within the limits of the meanings of the words employed and in a manner compatible with the understanding of the first human author and his readers. Some of the questions addressed to the story today are not relevant to the text, because the text was addressed to different questions. In the section of this systematic theology treating God’s work of creation,¹³ I have argued that these chapters supply not one scintilla of proof for evolutionary origins. Nor can all the assertions about the ‘young earth’ of current ‘creation science’ be based strictly on the language of this chapter.

In the third place, it seems utterly reasonable that if signs and symbols, unchronological parentheses and foreshortening of perspective are employed in Scripture to represent future eschatological events beyond strictly human ken, then the same would apply to the remote past beyond human ken. Creation was a supernatural event, by definition, inexplicable. It is a severe challenge for the super-literalist to interpret even the first three verses of Revelation 20 in strict, literal fashion. Keys we know are made of hard materials like iron and brass. Chains are likewise composed of many links and hooks. Does my hypothetical strict literalist think that the great evil spirit, ‘that ancient serpent . . . the devil and Satan,’ will be kept in restraint for a millennium by such means? So most convinced advocates of literal interpretation acknowledge, upon reflection, that many of the terms in this very important text have to be interpreted symbolically and that one really does not know the supernatural means by which Satan will be put under ‘absolute restraint.’ The theology of the passage is no less true if premillennialists are right and they are no less dependent on common-sense, figurative hermeneutics than the most ardent non-millennialist. One therefore should not hesitate in applying similar common sense to the situation in the early chapters of Genesis. In regard to mode of revelation, these chapters are not unlike the predictive sections of the Bible.

Let us therefore think of Genesis 1 and 2 as theological summaries rather than strictly chronological registers. Recent theology has rightly pointed out that the Mosaic account must be set against the contemporary polytheism, idolatry and animism in ancient culture—all shot through with an undefined but latent pantheism. Viewed as theology (orthodox and restrained), whatever else these chapters at the beginning of our Bible may be, as we have already observed from Genesis 1, a beautiful and utterly practical doctrine of mankind emerges.

The talk is in the language of appearances, not of science, or no one would have understood it for thousands of years. Think of Genesis 1 as a literary pyramidal structure with mankind at the pinnacle, and chapter 2 as a spiral of concentric circles with man, male, at the center, woman his mate being nearest.

The Supplementary Account

The scene at the beginning of movement is an earth in whose field there is no ‘bush of the field.’ Thereupon, ‘the Lord God formed the man of dust from the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living creature’ (Gen. 2:7). Then God planted a garden, ‘and there he put the man [male only] whom he had formed’ (v. 8), with fruitbearing trees for food—all produced from the same ground out of which he had been taken. The man’s task was to till the garden. Next God created useful beasts and birds (fish not being mentioned) which the man named but among whom there was found no companion for him (vv. 18–20). Lastly, out of the flesh and bone of the man God makes a woman, bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, and presents her to the man who acknowledges her as his mate (vv. 21, 22). The author of Genesis indicates that this is the foundation of the human family in the monogamous union of man male and man female (v. 24). Thus man, male, is joined by female at last at the center with earth’s animate members gathered about them to serve and help them.

The doctrine of mankind here gains very important truth, supplemental to the revelations of Genesis 1, regarding his original constitution, his duties and his privileges.

1. The creatures of earth are for mankind—for their use and pleasure. As just noted, the frame of the narrative (the circles with mankind at center) and the interpretive comments within Genesis chapter 2 (see vv. 18–20) clearly indicate this. While this element is not quite absent from Genesis 1 it does not receive emphasis there. The Weltbild of Genesis 2 is definitely anthropocentric.

2. Nevertheless, as God made him, man is also earthbound. He can never (space travelers not excepted) quite see the earth-system as a spectator. Mankind is ‘of the earth, earthy’ (1 Cor. 15:47 kjv). He is now always physically and emotionally a participant in the earthly scene however high he may think he rises above it and even though destined for heaven later. He is fit by original constitution for earth only—an earthling. The Bible makes few statements in these chapters which can be construed to describe the literal mechanical, physical connections of the various parts of God’s creation, but as to scales of value and spheres of interest or importance to God’s revelation, the Bible is clearly geocentric—earth-centered. And in the same respect, as just noted, the earth-system is anthropocentric. Thus Psalm 115 assures us that ‘Our God is in the heavens’—that He alone is to be trusted rather than mere idols that are but human artifacts. As Maker of all that exists, ‘The heavens are the Lord’s heavens, but the earth he has given to the children of man’ (Ps. 115:16). The race of mankind are earthlings. They are crown and center of creation, but they belong here on earth. Exploration of the moon in a spacesuit tends only to render that more emphatic. To live elsewhere mankind must reproduce earth’s conditions and take them along. Wherever they may travel, they will never cease to be earthlings.

3. Another emphasis of Genesis chapter 2 is that man’s nature is in part on the level of other creatures and in part on the level of his Creator, i.e. some things he shares with all else formed from ‘the earth’ but others he alone shares with God who breathed something special into him. That is to say, man is only in certain respects a part of ‘nature,’ i.e. the world of determined things, ruled by what people call ‘natural laws.’ He is in other respects not a part of the natural order at all. This will, of course, be denied by the positivists and the naturalistic materialists. It is not the present purpose to defend the idea. We wish only to show that the Scriptures teach it.

This is the meaning of Genesis 2:7. Those interpreters (and they are legion) who see in the act of God in breathing into man’s nostrils the breath of life (whereupon he became a ‘living soul,’ kjv) the creation of mankind’s rational and spiritual faculties and his spirit (soul) are surely correct. This may be established not strictly on the meaning of the Hebrew words rendered ‘breath ... soul ... life [living]’ but upon the consistent teaching of the Scripture (taken on its own terms rather than the terms of the ‘reconstructing critics’) that man is a spiritual being, that while a person’s spirit may die towards God, it is essentially indestructible. This indestructibility is not immortality, for by biblical definition alienation from God is death. Nor does ‘essentially indestructible’ mean that the spirit (soul) has existence then, now or ever apart from the continuing divine work of preservation. True, in the milieu of philosophical discourse one may speak properly of the ‘immortality of the soul.’ But then immortality simply means the same as durability or indestructibility. In biblical language God ‘alone has immortality.’ Genesis 2:7 in graphic pictorial language presents this truth of mankind’s spiritual nature.

4. A fourth and very important emphasis is the organic vital unity of the human race. ‘[T]he Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, and while he slept took one of his ribs and closed up its place with flesh. And the rib that the Lord God had taken from the man he made into a woman and brought her to the man. Then the man said, “This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man’ (Gen. 2:21–23). The narrative proceeds to trace the life of every human being back to this pair (Eve is called ‘the mother of all living,’ Gen. 3:20), as a comparison of Genesis 5:3–32 with 9:18, 19 shows. This unity provides the key to the possibility of redemption through the ‘last Adam’ (Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:45).

5. The first man, while as far as we know not highly informed, possessed great native intellectual ability such as enabled him to assess the quality of all the animals brought before him by the Creator and to give them names. In the later culture of the Bible, as well as in scientific nomenclature, names usually suggested something important about the one on whom they were conferred. Presumably that would be true of the case here in Genesis 2:19. We should not be surprised by reports later (Gen. 4) of the early, and possibly sudden, development of many of the chief aspects of culture with us today. There are no pre-humans or hominids in the Bible, only Homo sapiens.

Lutheran theology preserves a persistent tradition going back to Luther himself that Adam and Eve both had great scientific and philosophic knowledge that did not persist through the fall: ‘man ... had such a grasp of natural science such as unattainable today even by diligent study.’¹⁴ This knowledge, according to John Theodore Mueller, Francis Pieper’s summarizer, was ‘intuitive knowledge of God’s creatures (science) such as no scientist after the Fall has ever attained.’¹⁵ Both Pieper and Mueller cite Luther. This carries a legitimate apriorism in epistemology a bit too far. Dorner, a great Lutheran scholar of the nineteenth century, while rejecting pure empiricism (all knowledge comes from sensory experience) asserted,

The soul is never a mere tabula rosa ... there is a world of the unconscious. If in our knowledge there is already inherent no innate relation to what is rational and good—a relation that is an original dowry of our nature and not our own work—then knowledge of truth and goodness is out of the question.¹⁶

A. H. Strong also strongly supported an apriorism in human knowing but rejected the extreme of Luther and some of his later disciples. He spoke of first truth ... a knowledge which, though developed upon occasion of reflection, is not derived from observation and reflection—a knowledge on the contrary supposed, in order to make any observation or reflection possible.¹⁷

6. The joyful, relaxed relation of the sexes is given emphasis, as is their freedom from onerous restraints. They do not even wear clothing. In that connection it is announced that the procreation of children is to occur only within monogamous marriage. This is a distinct advance from Genesis chapter 1, where the command to multiply is without this condition. This should be acknowledged as evidence that even on the natural physical side of mankind's nature he is not at the level of the brute creation. That the passage (2:23–25) is intended to teach monogamy is decisively supported by Matthew 19:3–8. In this connection it is well to note the dignity of womanhood found in the passage. Many find here essential equality with the man hinted by the fact that she was taken not from the man's feet (to suggest inferiority), nor from his head (to suggest superiority), but from his side (suggesting equality).

7. A duty barely suggested in Genesis 1 (v. 28) is rendered explicit herein—the duty of labor. God 'put him in the garden of Eden to work it and keep it' (2:15). Many inferences may be drawn: mankind is homo faciens, toolmaker and user from the beginning. The ethic of work is not a 'Calvinist ethic' but a clear biblical teaching. Not only so, mankind the laborer, given the normal condition of non-sin, is fully capable of developing the arts—in the absence of abundant leisure time. Sad is the fact that a low level of moral attainment has all too frequently accompanied artistic excellence. Does this suggest why? In his excellent discussion of the creation ordinances John Murray has well stated the connection between manual labor and true high culture—a connection at present largely unnoticed. A few lines will impart a bit of the flavor of his remarks.

There is warrant for the judgment that economics, culture, morality and piety have suffered grave havoc by failure to appreciate the nobility of manual labor. Multitudes of men and women, if they had thought in terms of this principle and had been taught in the home, in the church, and in the school to think in these terms, would have been saved from the catastrophe of economic, moral, and religious ruin because they would have been preserved from the vain ambition of pursuing vocations for which they were not equipped and which, on sober and enlightened reflection, they would not have sought. It is a fallacy to think, and it is one that has greatly impoverished the life of society that culture cannot exist and flourish among manual toilers.¹⁸

After the fall of man the duty of labor is made even more explicit (see later in this chapter). The New Testament treats voluntary idleness as sin serious enough to be rebuked with the kind of strong language often directed toward fornication, idolatry, drunkenness and other coarse sins. Said Paul, 'If anyone is not willing to work, let him not eat' (2 Thess. 3:10; cf. 6–10; 1 Tim. 5:8–16; 2 John 10, 11).

8. Without laboring the point, it seems to me that those who find a command for man to observe the Sabbath of God in connection with his work, here in Eden, are correct. Does Jesus' remark, 'The Sabbath was made for man' have reference to Exodus 20 or to Genesis chapter 2? See also Exodus 16:22–30 and Nehemiah 9:13, both of which indicate that the Sabbath long antedated the Mosaic ordinance.

The third great biblical passage treating the state of mankind at creation is Psalm 8. Actually the passage does not contemplate 'the fall' at all. It treats the Genesis revelation as though the facts about mankind's creation reported there, in the main, relate to postlapsarian quite as much as prelapsarian humanity. Such is indeed the case, in general. Yet adjustments had to be made, as we shall soon observe in later chapters. However, mankind remained mankind. Only such adjustments as sin made necessary were introduced.

Some Questions

There are several questions about mankind's nature and original state that reflection on these revelations in the light of later biblical statements inevitably arouses. People want to know if man's nature was morally free or determined; if he was able not to sin or not able not to sin; if soul is the same as spirit in mankind, or if they are different; and if the souls of human offspring are procreated by parents, as are their bodies, or if God creates the souls in some other manner and infuses them into the bodies, and, in either case, when? and how? A further question is: What constitutes 'the image of God' in which God created 'them' (i.e. the first pair)?

The significance, difficulty and importance of these questions is indicated by the size of the books theologians write, sometimes on only one of the above questions. An older work, Hurd's, The Tripartite Nature of Man for example, on the question of whether soul and spirit are the same, runs to nearly 400 pages. Volume one ('Human Nature') of Reinhold Niebuhr's The Nature and Destiny of Man runs to over 300 pages, while G. C. Berkouwer's Man: The Image of God runs to 375 pages. The anthropology sections of standard works of Systematic or Dogmatic Theology for over fifteen centuries (if we include Augustine's Anti-Pelagian Writings) have been about the most ponderous of all sections of those works.

These questions of interpretation must not obscure what ought to be plain as day: mankind's original state was one of happiness wherein personal and community fulfillment were possible. This is the normal state of mankind. It was sadly not to be a permanent state. As to why God allowed sin to enter we can speculate but our best answers fall short of certainty. This is true not only because God has not revealed why, but also because the reasoning powers of fallen people such as we, in such an area of investigation, are not fully to be trusted. It is too easy to let erroneous or sinful presuppositions get in the way.

Some Conclusions

If human beings were today such as mankind then was, social organization could be completely effective for beauty, truth, happiness, fulfillment, freedom and all other possible goods. Such social organization would not need to be coercive, for people would respond joyfully to such organization without constraint. What we call coercive civil government or social 'control' would not exist. Not only is the man of paradise normal man, but he is essential man. That is to say, just to the degree that mankind is perverted, degraded or alienated from his original nature he is variant from essential humanity. The proverb 'To err is human' could not be further from reality. The truth is 'To err [i.e. to sin] is inhuman.'

None has ever seen this more plainly nor put it more vividly in words than Blaise Pascal, French mathematician, philosopher and Christian apologist (1623–1662). He wrote:

The greatness of man is so evident that it is even proved by his wretchedness. For what in animals is called nature we call wretchedness in man; by which we recognize that, his nature now being like that of animals, he has fallen from a better nature which once was his. For who is unhappy at not being a king except a deposed king?... Who is unhappy at having one mouth? And who is not unhappy at having only one eye? Probably no man ever ventured to mourn at not having three eyes. But anyone is inconsolable at having none.¹⁹

Few have been more precise in addressing this truth to the present world than Reinhold Niebuhr. Though not quite the sensation today that they were when he published them first in 1941, the words of his chapter 'Justitia Originalis' are still impressive:

No man, however deeply involved in sin, is able to regard the misery of sin as normal. Some memory of a previous condition of blessedness seems to linger in his soul; some echo of the law which he has violated seems to resound in his conscience. Every effort to give the habits of sin the appearance of normality betrays something of the frenzy of an uneasy conscience. The contrast between what man is truly and essentially and what he has become is apparent ...²⁰

Though Niebuhr's views of the 'previous condition of blessedness' take some liberty with the proper sense of Scripture, for he rejects out of hand the idea of a historical fall of man, he is right again when he writes:

The reason why there is a heightened sense of sin in Christianity is that the vision of Christ heightens the contrast between what man is truly and what he has become; and destroys the prestige of normality which sinful forms of life periodically achieve in the world.²¹

A man born blind and deaf would naturally suppose that all people, known to him only by the other three senses, were blind and deaf, except that he would have no concept of blindness or deafness. Sin, disorder and violence, manifest signs of human moral squalor, everywhere appear among the manifest signs of mankind's magnificence. Mankind viewed either as an individual person or as a society is magnificent—a magnificent ruin! Seen in full perspective he is more similar to the ruined Parthenon atop the Acropolis of Athens than the Washington monument or the Taj Mahal.

Excursus 1. The Gender Problem of 'Man' and Generic Pronouns

I have deliberately waited till well into the discussion of theological anthropology to introduce the meaning of the word, 'anthropology,' and a problem related to it. The problem is 'inclusive language' or the so-called 'gender neutral' use of language being demanded of us, not only by feminists but by some editors and publishers in deference to the sensibilities of some prospective readers.

Anthropology is of course derived from a masculine gender noun, anthropos, man or mankind, used as a term for individuals of either sex or as a generic term for the human race, rarely with the feminine article, sometimes employed of a woman (with the masculine gender endings).²² Greek has another term, anēr, which refers always to a human being of the male sex (a significant case in 1 Tim. 2:8).

German (to which our ‘Anglisch’ is related) has Mensch, used about as the Greek anthropos above. German also has our word ‘man’ (with two ‘n’s), man, male, husband, but in compounds sometimes refers to females too (Mannbarkeit, fem. gender, womanhood).

In English, except by borrowing the adjective human from Latin, and lately, turning it into a noun, we have only the word man, sometimes a generic name for the race of man, sometimes referring to an individual male, and in compounds such as man-child and manly; in other compounds generic, i.e. mankind—as in Tennyson, ‘The parliament of man, the federation of the world’ (Locksley Hall). In common speech as well as literature of all sorts, man has always been employed either to designate an adult male of our race or in a generic sense to designate the human race. He, his, him, ordinarily are understood as pronouns (stand-ins for nouns) whose antecedents are masculine gender or, generically, for either sex. Examples: ‘When somebody gets sick he goes to a doctor.’ ‘When a criminal is about, we hope the police arrest him.’ ‘Somebody drove his car off the road here.’ Some legal documents carefully point out that throughout, ‘he, him, his, they, them’ refer to either or both sexes. My thoughts coincide with Michael Novak’s, viz.:

That certain words have more than one sense, covering varying ranges of cases, is true of all languages and of the nature of language itself, if not indeed, the workings of the human mind. The Latin word homo may be used of a male alone (as in ‘Ecce homo’ [Behold the man]) or by contrast that includes vir (male [virility]), mulier (woman), infans (infant), puer (boy), and puella (girl). Intelligent people ought to be able to follow basic laws of language without artificial crutches, and to judge from context how broad a range of applications is intended, without turning linguistic somersaults.²³

Hence we employ the doctrine of ‘mankind’ or ‘man’ interchangeably with ‘anthropology’ in deference to immemorial use but without intent to bruise the feelings of any who are sensitive about the matter. I think when ‘the moon is old and stars are cold’ the created nature of the world, including mankind, will then be as it has been for time out of mind in this regard—including generic pronouns he, him, his and the masculine gender of all nouns and pronouns referring to God. I note that technical and scientific discourse, including television, has remained pretty much unaffected by feminist sensitivities and agenda in regard to masculine generic nouns and pronouns.

I regret that the subject (anthropology) of this part of my book seems to have required this diversion. I hope that readers of different sensibilities who have read through the first chapter with some sense of pleasure and profit will not be now alienated by this forthright explanation.

It remains to be said about the word ‘anthropology,’ that the Greek term meaning ‘the science of mankind in the widest sense’ (Oxford English Dictionary) in philosophical and religious context, is at least as old as Aristotle (384–322 bc), ages before a branch of modern science co-opted the word.

Excursus 2. The Schema of the Doctrine of Primal Mankind

No faithful, informed treatise on systematic theology ever becomes quite irrelevant or out of date. Insofar as authors relate Scripture truly to the study of theology and to the current human scene, they remain perennially pertinent to a Christian understanding of divine things and to life in this world where divine providence reigns. Human nature has not changed at all; God is ever immutable and ‘the present evil world’ as well as the natural order only go through many phases. I think, for example, in his prime, Julius Caesar or Marcus Aurelius or Niccolo Machiavelli would make himself at home in the political swirl of the Washington Beltway in a fortnight.

The ancient Christian anthropology of Augustine—really the first after Paul to put this theme together—was rightfully preoccupied with man’s cognitive powers, his moral constitution and body-soul questions. In medieval times Thomas Aquinas anticipated later Christian anthropologies in treating the doctrine of mankind—after God and creation—and like Augustine in psychological emphases in his main topics (free choice of the will, and the like). These were topics reflective folk and the learned of his times talked and wrote about.

The anthropologies of Charles Hodge and Robert Dabney, both nineteenth-century Presbyterians, in addition to the usual attention to mankind’s spiritual and moral constitution, lay emphasis on his probation and fall in relation to his covenant relation to God, while contemporary W.G.T. Shedd was concerned much about the race’s physical and spiritual connection with the Adam in our probationary test in Eden. Shedd produced the most extensive (and I think decisive) advocacy of traducianism in the history of Christianity. All three were responding to the rising popularity of evolutionary theories. A. H. Strong’s massive volume devotes unwonted large space to evolution, by way of accommodation to the spirit of the age, in a superb treatment of anthropology otherwise acceptable to historic British-American, Baptist Calvinism. Recently Charles Ryries’ popular survey likewise devotes major space to evolution in connection with creation and anthropology, but by way of rebuttal. The positive doctrine of mankind is treated very briefly, almost summarily. Millard Erickson, to conclude with a contemporary, prominent Baptist writer, takes special care (perhaps with good reason) to relate his ‘doctrine of humanity’ (without endorsing feminism, he is accommodating toward feminist concerns and fights shy of the generic term man) to a theology of society, a consuming interest of the last half of the twentieth century. He devotes this last of his five chapters to the races, the sexes, the poor, the aged and the unmarried.

Each had his own good reasons. In my judgment, ‘the present distress’ calls for emphasis simply on the elements of a theological doctrine of mankind as directly derived from Scripture as possible, but in continuation of the Augustinian anthropology of the great Reformation theologians. This, I hope to show, is what the present world of intellectual discourse among Christians desperately needs. Psychological theories come into style and go out of style several times in each generation. Our anthropology should not therefore be couched in terms fully acceptable to ephemeral theories of psychology. The same can be said of social theories and current perceptions of the social order. The same must apply to our theories of church growth and Christian nurture. These too are part of the very unprecedented preoccupation of recent decades with human feelings and perceived needs. If the church is to recover its own character as the body of people where truth is sacred and Holy Scripture reigns supreme over our religious convictions—where Christ is Lord—then we must come to understand ourselves both as we are, might have been and by grace yet shall be. We must return to a primary concern with truth, that is, a doctrine of mankind as revealed by the Lord of truth and with a decent respect for the shape of anthropology as delivered to us by the Reformation theologians who paid great price for their convictions.

I intend to merge my hermeneutical ‘horizon’ with that of Moses as Anthony Thistleton²⁴ admonishes and I do acknowledge, as Professor Stanley Grenz proposes, that I am consciously constructing theology in this sensitive area for ‘post-moderns’ within the paradigm of plausibility supplied by my own conservative evangelical ‘community of faith.’²⁵ How do we reach the ear and keep the steady attention of the post-moderns out there, as Stanley Grenz describes them? He has not provided a solution to the problem these post-moderns create for us who write theology, but I can’t wait to learn. Maybe I already know. I will try.

A proper approach to a scriptural doctrine of mankind necessarily has two parts, based on the fact that we are not today normal in the best sense of that word. A fall from our primal, created condition took place at the beginning of human history. To understand our present fallen condition we must understand what God has revealed of our former condition. Hence we must first consider man as created by God. This will entail attention to many facets of revelation, but they will all be subsumed under rubrics which appear as chapter titles to follow.

¹ John Murray, Collected Writings, Selected Lectures in Systematic Theology, Vol. II (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977) p. 3.

² F. I. Collingwood, Man’s Physical and Spiritual Nature (New York: Rinehart & Winston, 1963), p. 1.

³ Julian N. Hartt, The Lost Image of Man (Louisiana State University Press, 1963).

⁴ H. L. Poe and J. H. Davis, Science and Faith: An Evangelical Dialogue (Nashville, TN: Broadman & Holman, 2000), p. 131.

⁵ H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Genesis (Columbus, OH: The Wartburg Press, 1942), pp. 92, 93.

⁶ John Calvin, Calvin’s Commentaries, Genesis i (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1847).

⁷ Murray, op. cit., pp. 6, 7.

⁸ G. P. Spurrell, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Genesis (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1887), pp. 20, 21. P. J. Wiseman, New Discoveries in Babylonia About Genesis (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, Ltd., 1946), pp. 45–47.

⁹ J. C. Whitcomb and H. M. Morris, The Genesis Flood (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian Reformed Publ., 1961).

¹⁰ John Whitcomb, The Early Earth, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Book, 1972, 1986), p. 40.

¹⁰ John Whitcomb, The Early EARTH, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1972, 1986), p. 40.

¹¹ James O. Buswell, Jr, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 321–343.

¹² Buswell, ibid., p. 325.

¹³ Part I, chaps. 17, 18.

¹⁴ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics I (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 517.

¹⁵ John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1955), p. 206.

¹⁶ J. A. Dorner, History of Protestant Theology (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1871), p. 82, as cited by Gordon Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man (Jefferson, MD: Trinity Foundation, 1984), p. 20.

¹⁷ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 52–56.

¹⁸ John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957, 1971), p. 36.

¹⁹ Blaise Pascal, Pensees (Meditations), para. 409.

²⁰ Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, A Christian Interpretation, Vol. I (New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons, 1941, 1964), p. 265.

²¹ ibid., p. 266.

²² Liddell and Scott, Lexicon.

²³ Michael Novak, 'Women, Ordination, and Angels,' First Things magazine #32, April, 1993, p. 26.

²⁴ Anthony Thistleton, The Two Horizons (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980).

²⁵ Stanley Grenz, Renewing the Center (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2000).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (227). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

2

The Origin and Unity of Mankind by Creation

In systematic theology, logically everything that follows anthropology grows like a many-branched tree out of anthropology. The views one takes of mankind's original constitution and primal history determine in a direct way views one takes of Christ, His work of redemption, the doctrine of salvation and even of final destiny (in heaven or hell). It is therefore important that we seek to understand the first part of the Bible about human origins in the light of how the rest of the Bible understands it. There is a unity of teaching. Stanley Grenz in a provocative book proposes that evangelical theology is more a mosaic of beliefs than a system of doctrines.¹ He may be correct, but he does not (nor does any competent theologian) say this is how Christian doctrines should be arranged. A preacher's beliefs may even resemble a montage or simply a collection. But if there is no system (logical order) he ought not to mount a pulpit. There is a matrix, and a growth out of it. A sound theology must look at all of it.

I. The Human Race Began in a Single First Man

The Scriptures teach that the human race began in a single first man, male, who was brought into existence by creative acts of God.

No Pre-Adamites and No Non-Adamites

That there was an original, single, first male is a revelation of the familiar narrative of Genesis. There were no pre-Adamite human predecessors. What puts this out of all question, with those who believe the divine revelation, is, that it is expressly said, that before Adam was formed, 'there was not a man to till the ground,' (Gen 2:5).² 'And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul' (Gen 2:7 kjv).³ All we really know about the origin of mankind is furnished by the accounts of Genesis 1 and 2.

Every aspect of the New Testament doctrine of mankind as expressed by the Lord and the apostolic authors is plainly derived from the account of Genesis. Matthew 19:4 and Mark 10:6 ('God made them male and female') refer to Genesis 1:24 and 5:2 Mark 10:7, 'Therefore a man shall leave,' etc. directly quotes Genesis 2:24. When Paul wrote as his doctrine, 'Adam was made a living soul' (1 Cor. 15:45 kjv) he is employing the language of Genesis 2:7. His argument for the oneness of the race both in sin and reconciliation builds his case on the Genesis story of human origin (Rom. 5:12–19). He employs the same method in teaching the proper relations and functions of male and female in the Christian assembly (1 Cor. 11:9, 10; 1 Tim. 2:12–14).

This verse (Gen. 2:7) is not an enlargement, but a narrowing focus of the thought of Genesis 1:26, 27, upon the separate, single creation of the man, male, previous to the existence of the female. 'Then God said, "Let us make man in our image,"' etc., (v. 26) and 'So God created man in his own image' (v. 27). That in Genesis 1:26 the race as a unit was in God's mind ('Let us make man' etc.) is indicated by absence of the usual Hebrew article ha before ʾadham (man). That the race is indicated, not an individual, is borne out by the further statement 'male and female he created them.' ʾAdham is singular, 'man' not 'sons of men,' bene ʾadham (a circumlocution for the plural, 2 Sam. 7:14). Mankind is an excellent translation. At Genesis 2:7 the word ʾadham ('the Lord God formed the man' bears the article ha prefixed, viz. ha-ʾadham. '[T]he man' (niv, esv) is grammatically correct, but the true sense is better conveyed by '... the Lord God formed a man' (neb), i.e. a single specimen. A later section of this chapter will give attention to the significance for all loci of theology, of the fact there was a single human, male being before there was a pair, male and female.

Adam, Something New, Without Precedent

We are still considering the proposition stated above: ‘... the human race began in a single first man, male, who was brought into existence by creative acts of God.’ There is an extensive variety of verbs for God’s ‘creative’ acts, viz.: ‘Let us make man’ (1:26); ‘created ... created ... created’ (1:27); ‘God formed a man’ (2:7 neb). ‘Make,’ ‘created,’ ‘formed’—just what is indicated by these expressions? Each English word translates a different Hebrew word.

It must regretfully be acknowledged that most scholarly interpretation has paid scant attention to the Old Testament usage of these terms. A majority of orthodox writers acknowledge that ‘made’ and ‘formed’ allow the employment of existing materials and then make the claim that ‘create’ means to bring into existence without employment of existing materials. Hence Genesis 1:1, ‘God created,’ is said to mean God brought the world into existence ex nihilo, out of nothing. In the case of the creation of mankind, likewise some aspect (the soul) was created ex nihilo. It is true that logic and context require absolute beginning of ‘the universe,’ hence ex nihilo creation somewhere in a Christian doctrine of origins.

But such doctrine is not inherent in the meaning of the words used. It is true, as frequently observed, in the simplest verb stem (qal) of the Hebrew, bara ♣ God is always the subject of the verb. This does not however imply ex nihilo either. It is not correct to say, as do many writers, ‘the verb bara ♣ [in the Kal] ... signifies an effect for which no natural antecedent existed before, and which can be only the result of divine agency,’⁴ for it is not supported by examination of the way the Hebrew Bible uses the word.

It is quite demonstrable that such qualifications as ‘out of nothing’ (ex nihilo), ‘no natural antecedent,’ ‘immediate,’ ‘no pre-existing material’ have no relation at all to the essential meaning of bara ♣ usually rendered, ‘create.’ This becomes evident in certain definitive occurrences wherein we learn what Moses and the Hebrews understood by bara ♣ ‘he created.’ Unlike other Hebrew words for doing, making, forming, of which there are several, when bara ♣ is used the product is always something new. The product, not the materials employed, is new. When God creates something in the sense of bara ♣ the product is fresh, new, unique, even unprecedented—something that has not happened before. Materials employed are irrelevant.

The clearest demonstration of this fact is in the story of Korah’s rebellion of Numbers 16:1–50. The rebellion threatened the very existence of the covenant nation, especially the integrity of Moses and the Mosaic covenant. Decisive action was called for. At the critical moment (see vv. 1–30) ‘Moses said ... “If these men die as all men die, ... then the Lord has not sent me. But if the Lord creates something new [emphasis added], and the ground opens its mouth and swallows them up, ... and they go down alive into Sheol [grave?], then you shall know that these men have despised the Lord’ (vv. 28–30). The sequel was immediate and exceeds in terror the laconic manner of reporting.

To further demonstrate this distinctive of bara ♣ observe the root word appears twice in series, viz.: ‘creates’ and ‘something new.’⁵ It appears here as an ‘imperfect’ form of the word, bara ♣ qal, masculine, singular following ♣ m, ‘if.’ Then follows the noun feminine, singular, beri ♣ h, derived directly from bara ♣ and aptly rendered ‘something new,’ ‘something totally new’ (niv), ‘an entirely new thing’ (nasb). The Brown, Driver and Briggs Lexicon aptly supplies, ‘unparalleled,’ and tells us Beri ♣ h is a ‘cognate accusative.’ This is a characteristic Hebraic device whereby the verb gives its own meaning to its object or vice versa, as Luke 8:5, ‘a seeder went out to sow seed his seed and as he seeded,’ etc. (Gr.). Thomas McComiskey asserts, the root bara has the basic meaning, ‘to create.’⁶ It seems clear the basic meaning is ‘to bring into existence something new.’ Newness is always present where bara appears in the Hebrew text.

Never in earth’s history had a chasm opened up to swallow alive a previously designated group of people. When it did God acted in the special sense of bara The event was then properly called a beriah, an unparalleled, unique, totally new thing. This distinct sense of bara is present in every use in the simple (qal) stem and is possible in other stems. See especially Jeremiah 31:22 (v. 21 Heb.) where hadash, new, is used with bara in the exact sense of beriah: also Psalm 51:10 and Isaiah 65:17. In Exodus 34:10 the niphal (simple, passive stem) of bara is rendered, ‘I will do wonders never before done [emphasis added] in any nation in all the world’ (niv). ‘[N]ever before done’ translates only one word, an inflected form of bara Again this shows how the idea of newness, something unprecedented, is inherent (i.e. not derived from the context) in the word.

Hence both in the case of mankind and of other instances where bara is employed (Gen. 1:1, 21) God brought into existence something new, not seen before. If Latin is desired, then de novo is perhaps the right phrase, ‘toward something new.’

Whether God, therefore, used materials previously brought into existence by Him or by simply speaking them into existence is not conveyed by the word bara create.

If the words for ‘create’ and other synonyms employed (make, form) do not require creation out of nothing, neither do they specify any other manner or means. For over a century now, a few evangelical theologians have conceded a possible evolutionary origin of mankind from lower animals. In my judgment, though seemingly necessary, the lopsided attention to evolution draws attention away from the strict silence of Scripture as to how God’s power, wisdom and plan really worked. The Bible really says nothing about evolution or any other supposed manner or means, except at Genesis 2:7 where divine breath and dust of the ground are mentioned. The many later references in the Bible say little more.

Commenting on the sharp shift of narrative of the creation at Genesis 2:7, Allan MacRae, a quite strict ‘fundamentalist,’ wrote:

Here God made something that was sharply differentiated from anything that had existed before. Patterns of similarity might have been used, but a distinct divine act is described, and man becomes animate only after he becomes man [emphasis added].⁷

We observe further that after the man is ‘formed ... of dust from the ground’ (Gen. 2:7), the next time dust appears in the record is in the pronouncement, ‘you are dust, and to dust you shall return’ (Gen. 3:19)—dust, that is, of the grave, not of some beast ancestral to the first man.

Unnecessary Concessions to Evolutionism

Roman Catholic concessions to the evolutionary-favorable atmosphere in both science and theology have been considerable, though cautious. Regarding human origin, Pius XII⁸ declared the question of origin of the body, though not the soul, open to unrestricted research by scientists and theologians, but warned that the origin of the human body from organic (animal) material was unproved.⁹ Ludwig Ott in his authoritative volume, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, says: ‘According to the Bible Commission the literal historical sense is to be adhered to in regard to the formation of the first woman out of the man ... 1 Cor. 11:8: “The woman is of the man.” However, the saying is and remains mysterious.’¹⁰

If somehow we can order our minds so that Darwin and his disciples slip below the view of our mental and theological horizon, perhaps the profound simplicity of the doctrinal materials will make a proper impact.

We have already observed that the critical word bara is irrelevant to this matter. The context only seems to have the earth ‘bring forth’ bird and ‘the waters bring forth’ the denizens of the waters, presumably fish (Gen. 1:20, 24 kjv). The Hebrew text does not have the waters or the earth as such producing either fish or animals, and not birds of the air. The language only indicates that God said there should be swarms of life in the waters and that birds should fly over the earth. It is impossible to tease any material source for these living things out of the text. Once (v. 21) bara is used of God’s action in ‘creating’ whales, other water life and birds. True, on the sixth day ‘God said, “Let the earth bring forth”’, of the creations of larger land animals—Hebrew totse ‘cause to come forth’ (v. 24). This indicates a mediate creation. Appropriately they came from the earth and all return to it. Verse 25, however, traces the result to God’s action not some dynamic of the earth: ‘and God made ... according to their kinds.’ I have abbreviated H. C. Leupold’s comments.¹¹ The meaning in each case has reference only to what God produced not how (method) or by what means. It is bad exegesis even to introduce such issues into interpretation of the text of the first chapter of Genesis.

Except for Genesis 2:7 nothing is said of what method or materials God did or did not use in creation of anything. For those whose minds crave some assurance at this point I make two suggestions. The first is that there is not a positive suggestion or hint in the early chapters of Genesis or elsewhere in the Bible that evolution of any sort had any part in the creation of the universe and the natural order. People already convinced of evolutionary origins have managed to adapt the Genesis narrative to their version of evolution, but not one ever derived his theory from the Bible.

Creation Language

My second suggestion is that the narrative language can be interpreted, but not necessarily so, to support the immediate creation of mankind by God. It is said that since context and logic imply absolute beginning in bara ‘create,’ in Genesis 1:1 the same may be true when the same word (‘Let us create,’ etc.) is used of the origin of mankind (Gen. 1:26, 27). If so, only the soul was immediately created for at 2:7 God ‘formed man of the dust of the ground’ (kjv). The earth ‘brought forth’ the animals (1:24) in some unspecified way. The language of 2:7 suggests a more direct act of God, viz.: He ‘formed man’ (Heb. yatsar, used of what potters do with clay, many times in Jer. 18; used of divine shaping of the fetus in his mother’s womb in Jer. 1:5; and twice used of a sculptor shaping an image in Hab. 2:18). The origin of the human soul, not only in the first man, but in all mankind, will soon be treated at length.

Let us seek to dissociate the question of evolution from other possible employment of means or material. The divine breath (2:7) is an obvious figure of speech. Whether a figure for creativity itself or of some imparting of divine nature or likeness cannot be settled apart from general doctrinal considerations. God certainly does not breathe air into nostrils in the manner of resuscitation procedures.

The ‘Creation’ of the Bible Over 1,500 Years

It is easily (though not frequently occurring in the polemical atmosphere of inter-creationist controversy) demonstrated that means or materials are employed even when Scripture language seems to imply immediacy.

Let us start the demonstration with a familiar proof text of the divine origin of Holy Scripture, 2 Timothy 3:16, ‘All scripture is given by inspiration of God’ (kjv). This verse in the King James Version has given English-speaking Christian peoples the name ‘inspiration’ for the doctrine of Holy Scripture. It has become well known to students everywhere that the single Greek word, theopneustos, is here rendered ‘given by inspiration of God,’ five words, and that the literal rendering would be ‘God-breathed-out’ not ‘God-breathed-into.’ How do we know that? Quite apart from grammatical considerations, we know because Paul was employing a very prevalent biblical figure of speech for the divine activity of creating things. Human breath over vocal cords through throat, tongue, teeth and lips creates words of human speech. Thus the repeated, transparent ‘God said,’ ‘Let there be,’ etc. of Genesis 1 means simply ‘God created.’ God, of course, does not have physical organs to produce the vibrations of air we call speech. This figure for divine creativity is vigorously employed in the Psalms, viz.: ‘By the word of the Lord the heavens were made, and by the breath of his mouth all their host... For he spoke, and it came to be; he commanded, and it stood firm’ (Ps. 33:6, 9). Hebrews 11:3 reflects these verses in the Psalms and in Genesis. This interpretation of the anthropomorphism of the divine speech or breath is based on uniform analogy of Scripture from Genesis 1:3 to Revelation 19:15.

So Paul says Scripture, like the universe, was spoken or breathed into existence by God. Yet (and here’s the nub of the evidence) God used forty or so human authors who employed parchment or paper and ink, plus several secretaries whose names we know (Baruch, Tertius) to ‘breathe’ ... ‘speak’ ... ‘command’ ‘all scripture’ into existence, and required from about 1,400 years bc to ad 100—roughly 1,500 years—to do so!

The Bible Does Not Affirm Either Mediate or Immediate Creation

Hence if Bible language regarding the divine creation of Scripture by command, breath and speaking, when many years, human agents and material means were required, then when the same sort of language is used of creation of people and things it is illogical in the extreme to exclude the possibility of agents, materials and time. It may all have occurred by instantaneous events of coming into existence but the language of Scripture cannot be compelled to convey that meaning. These details are God’s business. He has seen fit not to reveal a smidgen of information about it. Certain scientists may suppose a big bang origin of matter and certain Bible interpreters may suppose a similar big bang origin for everything created by God, but the language of Scripture, understood in the Sitz im leben of Bible times and peoples does not support them. The creation of mankind is, like the feeding of the 5,000, the parting of the Jordan and the widow’s flour bin, a miracle. We know nothing for certain now about how God did it. It is unlikely either the ‘creation scientists’ or the scientism of the universities of today will ever tell us.

II. The Organic Unity of the Human Race

The Scriptures teach the organic unity of the human race in an original, single, human, male specimen out of whom all others, including the first female, were formed.

The language of Genesis 1:26, 27 plainly indicates that ‘man’ includes not the ‘male’ only but also the ‘female,’ viz.: ‘man in our image ... male and female he created them.’ Throughout Genesis down to 4:1 the word ʾadham has the article (ha ʾadham), indicating either the male or mankind, not an individual person’s name. Beginning at 4:25 the prefixed article ha (the) is dropped. ʾAdham (English Adam) is the proper name of the first male, human specimen. Hebrew proper names do not normally take the definite article, as the Greek language of the New Testament does. The distinction is not always plain, for the summary of previous race history at 5:1, 2 employs ʾadham without the article, perhaps because Adam’s personal history was essentially the race history in creation and fall. His name is personal at 4:25.

The narrative of the forming of the first female, Eve, mate of the first man and ‘mother’ thereby ‘of all living,’ out of Adam’s side is too familiar to require repetition here, though later it will call for special attention.

Whatever the female was, was completely derived from the male. A whole traducian event. As Paul says, ‘For man did not come from [ex, out of] woman, but woman from man’ (1 Cor. 11:8 niv). Discussion of the origin of souls will soon occur herein, but at this point it must be emphasized the narrative drops no hint that God specially created a soul for Eve. Paul distinctly writes that the entire woman came out of the man. His subject at 1 Corinthians 11:8 is not precisely the organic unity of the race but that doctrine is certainly consistent with Paul’s argument. Let us develop the subject further.

III. Organic Unity Before Forensic Unity

The human race is an organic unity by natural generation from a single pair who in turn began in the single male from whom the female was taken.

1. This is firmly established not only by the narrative features of the first chapters (1:27, 28; 2:7; 2:22) but also by two summary statements, viz.: before Adam was created, ‘there was no man to work the ground’ (2:5) and of Eve that ‘she was the mother of all living’ (3:20). These texts plainly trace the origin of every human being, including Eve herself, back to Adam. The line of physical descent from this pair, through their son, Seth, leads to Noah’s three sons ‘Shem, Ham, and Japheth ... and from these the people of the whole earth were dispersed’ (Gen. 9:18, 19). It is the clear intention of the author of Genesis to teach that the entire human race, without exception, is derived from the first man, Adam.

Jesus did not comment on the unity of the human race but he did evidently accept the story of human origins in Genesis as true (Matt. 19:4–6) and related it to the subject of marriage. Paul developed several teachings on the basis of the unity of the race in a first man through a primal pair, male and female.¹²

2. The doctrine of universal prevalence of guilt, corruption and culpability of the human race, through Adam's first transgression, is built squarely upon the unity of the race in Adam. 'Therefore, just as sin came into the world through one man, and death through sin, and so death spread to all men because all sinned' (Rom. 5:12). Paul does not tell the story, but he assumes the readers are acquainted with it, refers to it, believes it and employs it. Sin and all its consequences were passed on from and through Adam to all his progeny throughout their generations. Adam was not merely archetypal man, he was man, the race, in a way that cannot be explained to Paul's satisfaction apart from the organic oneness of the race in Adam. If, as shall be treated later in connection with the doctrine of sin, we hold that Adam was the representative head of the race (C. A. Hodge and many Reformed theologians), then it is proper to remind ourselves that the seminal, organic connection of Adam with the race explains why God chose to regard him as our federal representative head. This also calls for extended treatment later.

3. Paul grounds the provision of salvation for all mankind in the unity of the human race, with which our Lord became united by incarnation: 'by the one man's obedience the many will be made righteous' (Rom. 5:19). The Epistle to Hebrews completes the connection: 'Since then the children have flesh and blood, he too shared in their humanity so that by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death' (2:14 niv) and 'he took on him the seed of Abraham' (2:16 kjv). This also must receive much fuller consideration.

4. Paul, like Isaiah and Jeremiah, employed the fact of the divine creation of mankind to refute the practice of idolatry, first among unlettered heathen (Acts 14:15–18) and later among the literate and sophisticated idolaters of Athens. He appealed both to the fact of divine creation (Acts 17:22–25, 28, 29) and, more pointedly, to the unity of all mankind in a single common ancestor, viz. 'From one man [ex henos, out of one; msc. sing.] he made every nation of men ... Therefore ... we should not think that the divine being is like ... an image made by man's design and skill' (Acts 17:26, 29 niv).

Races Within the Unity of Race

This is an appropriate juncture to consider what guidance the Scriptures might supply to the fact of races of people ('Red and yellow, black and white/All are precious in His sight') and of the apparent 'natural' tendency of peoples and races to separate themselves into continents ('black Africa'); into regions, as eastern Asia (the so-called 'yellow' races); the white people in Europe and other rather definite regions; into nations (Arabia, Serbia, Armenia, etc.); and into communities, cities, clubs and churches, even racially distinct tables in college commons and benches in the park.

There is no general teaching in Scripture this writer knows of why people come in genetically perpetuated colors. The history of population growth and of culture, including religion, may help explain national and regional groupings (see Gen. 10), but they tell nothing of the origin of skin pigmentation and other 'racial' features. The Scriptures do provide doctrines, hints and inadvertent data which bear upon the question.

In about the year 1968 when race and civil rights were pressing issues I participated in a public forum on the subject of racial problems in America. I was expected to speak in summary of the bearing of Christian theology on the topic. What follows is a condensation of what I said.

1. The distribution of mankind into national groups and permanent people-associations is a matter of special divine providence. The ancient Song of Moses has this striking stanza,

When the most High gave the nations their inheritance,

When He separated the sons of man [or Adam],

He set the boundaries of the peoples

According to the numbering of the sons of Israel.

For the Lord's portion is His people;

Jacob is the allotment of His heritage (Deut. 32:8, 9 nasb).

Three technical matters require notice. 1) There is an obvious connection, intended by the author, between 'the sons of men' (whole human race) and 'the sons of Israel.' 2) There is no weighty evidence for the Septuagint and Qumran reading, 'the angels of God' instead of 'the sons of Israel.' 3) Verse 9 is intended to explain and enlarge verse 8, viz. 'For' or 'Because' (ki, Heb.) makes the connection. Hence the special providence for 'the sons of Israel' (God's elect nation) was because they were the Lord's 'portion' or 'inheritance' (v. 8, cf. Deut. 7:6; 10:15; Exod. 19:5).

In context (v. 7) this means all previous distribution of mankind ('the sons of man') from the earliest (Gen. 10) onward was directed by God for the benefit (in part, at least) of God's own special people ('portion' 'inheritance'). There must always be room for them. It is the 'land of Israel,' 'the holy land.' As we shall see, Paul explained these territorial arrangements as for the benefit also of all mankind—'nations,' 'peoples,' 'sons of Adam.' This special divine concern for land-space for God's special people, of course, does not fit the present zeitgeist (spirit of the time) nor is it pleasing to the wise of this present world. It will not fly well either in the Village Voice or the New York Times, much less the U. S. Congress. Wherever the races of mankind dwell, God's providence was not absent in arranging it, whether by means of peaceful settlement, war or even unlawful infiltration. History goes on as history does and God is never surprised.

2. The providential movements of nations and races of mankind, including permanent settlements, are designed for their spiritual opportunity and possible salvation. Near the conclusion and application of his Areopagus sermon the great Apostle of the Gentiles made this point: 'From one man he [the God who made the world and rules it] made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth; and he determined the times set for them and the exact places where they should live. God did this so that men would seek him and perhaps reach out for him and find him' (Acts 17:24–28 niv). The lands of earth provide sufficient for everyone to have enough to eat, wherewithal to be clothed and to dwell, not necessarily economic superfluity as people now demand, but enough advantage that if they pursue it they find God. Of course most of them do not. This is not the place to pursue the questions of natural light and general 'revelation.'

These two texts, Deuteronomy 32:8 and Acts 17:24–28, balance one another. The former states God's special concerns for the elect nation, the children of Israel (and as the New Testament elaborates the Old Testament types, His 'elect [are to be taken] from every nation'), the latter His love and concern for all mankind—this in regard to the races, nations and peoples of the whole earth.

3. Beyond these two principles, the Bible barely recognizes the existence of distinctly colored (pigmented) races of mankind. It is difficult to find a biblical Hebrew or Greek word which unambiguously designates any group of human beings by color of skin or any other physical feature, except greatness of size—there are anakim (giants) as well as gibborim (heroes). The one exception seems to be the Cushite, or Ethiopian, as we note in the following point.

4. There is only a trace of the presence of race antagonism (or prejudice) in Scripture. I know only of two references. The kjv very literally and accurately translates the relevant passages and is to be preferred.

‘And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian [Heb. Kushith, i.e. Cushite] woman whom he had married’ (Num. 12:1). The word itself is the word for Cush, in Moses’ time a region above upper (southern) Egypt, with a feminine gentile suffix, a woman of Cush. Unless this be an exception, Cushite always refers to people from Nubia, a region in the area of the Upper Nile River. Archaeological and documentary evidence is interpreted by some to mean Cushites were dark-skinned, probably Negroes, by others certainly black Africans (Negroes). My opinion rests partly on Jeremiah 13:23 (niv): ‘Can the Ethiopian [kushi = Cushite] change his skin or the leopard its spots? Neither can you do good who are accustomed to doing evil.’ The translation is accurate. The implication is that changing (from black to white) would be something an Ethiopian might wish to do. Further, during the twenty-fifth dynasty of Egypt that land was ruled by Kushite (= Ethiopian) kings. The ‘Tirhakah’ king of Ethiopia (2 Kgs. 19:9) was one of them.¹³ These conquerors, whom the Egyptians called Kushites, are represented sometimes in Egyptian art as black Africans. At an earlier time a schoolboy copied a royal inscription (the documentation is in J. A. Wilson, The Culture of Ancient Egypt) as follows: ‘... one prince is in Avaris [eastern delta, near Asia], another is in Ethiopia, and (here) I sit associated with an Asiatic and a Negro ...’¹⁴ Obviously the Ethiopian prince was a Negro.

So, despite many demurrals by writers who wish to escape the obvious, it seems clear that Miriam’s and Aaron’s displeasure with Moses’ new wife was based on offense at her skin color! (Num 12:1). And some people of Jeremiah’s time who were black wished they were white (Jer. 3:23). None of this approves of racial pride or prejudice. The first reference, however, as any one ought to know, shows that miscegenation may be a cause of family tensions and inter-alienation when it occurs. Those contemplating marriage outside their own ‘race’ will be wise to think about that. Miriam and Aaron were punished by God for their public rebellion, not for their feelings about their sister-in-law. In the aphorism of Jeremiah, perhaps we may conclude only that when surrounded by white people and a white man’s culture, black people might wish they were white [not black]. Similarly we may suppose a white man might profoundly wish he were black if surrounded only by black people.

5. There are many restrictions against social intercourse, including marriage, between the ancient people of God and neighboring heathen people. It was the idolatry and immorality of the ‘nations round about’ that was objectionable, not their color or ancestry. There are many reasons for assuming that the Canaanites were not racially different from Israelites and we know from the records of Genesis that Ishmaelites, one of many Arab peoples, the Moabites and Amalekites (Gen. 19), also the Edomites, people of Esau, Jacob's twin, were not of a different race or shade of skin.

Further Aspects of Racial Unity

6. The general tenor of the whole Bible is to emphasize that mankind is one, the human race. Cultural differences there were and are—all to the good. It was more interesting to travel before world commerce, cinema, TV and radio homogenized most outward aspects of cultures, or at least brushed over the surface of the world's cultures. Of whatever level of culture, race or education, people vary greatly in size, health, worldly goods and in many other ways, but on the deepest levels we are all the same.

We are one in many ways. Let us take note of some of them.

- In a common created human nature, both physical and psychical. Each branch of mankind is cross-fertile with every other. Given similar nurture in similar physical and social environment we develop much the same excellencies, display much the same weaknesses and tend to commit the same sins. There are prominent national traits (see Paul's comments on the Cretians, Titus 1:12) and special gifts and tendencies, but only within narrow limits.

- In guilt, corruption and punishment for original sin. 'Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned' (Rom. 5:12 niv), including even infants ('all sinned ... even ... those who did not sin by breaking a command,' Rom. 5:12, 14 niv). Rich and poor, great and small, male and female, Greek philosopher or barbarian, all are 'under sin.'

- The work of Christ in life, Passion, death and resurrection has made eternal life applicable and available as far as sin has gone. In the language of Romans 5:18, 'so one act of righteousness leads to justification and life for all men.'

- The gospel of grace is for all people, without distinction, viz.: 'For everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved' (Rom. 10:13).

- Finally, the body of Christ on earth and the 'assembly of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven' (Heb. 12:23) will be composed ultimately 'from every tribe and language and people and nation' (Rev. 5:9).

¹ Stanley J. Grenz, Renewing the Center (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 2000).

² John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity I (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, repr. 1978), p. 5.

³ Because discussion continues to move in the language of the King James Version, we will employ it fairly frequently in this chapter.

⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 375.

5 'Make' in the kjv is an exceptional translation. It is usually 'create.'

⁶ Thomas McComiskey in Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament, ed. Harris, Archer and Waltke (Chicago: Moody Press, 1980), I, 127.

⁷ Allan MacRae, ‘The Principles of Interpretation of Genesis 1 and 2’, Bulletin of the Evangelical Society, II, 4, 1959, p. 5.

⁸ Encyclical Humani generis, 1950.

⁹ Denzinger, Henry, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St. Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954, 1957), paras. 3027 and 2286.

¹⁰ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Rockford, IL: TAN BOOKS, 1960, 1974), p. 95.

¹¹ Herbert C. Leupold, Exposition of Genesis (Columbus, OH: Wartburg Press, 1992), pp. 82–85.

¹² John Murray, Collected Writings, Selected Writings in Systematic Theology, vol. II (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), pp. 10, 11.

¹³ Jack Finegan, Light From the Ancient Past, 2nd ed. (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1959), p. 127.

¹⁴ J. A. Wilson, The Culture of Ancient Egypt (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, Phoenix Books, 1951, 1960), p. 164.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (240). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

3

Mankind the Image of God

Specific and Indirect Biblical References

‘Then God said, “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.... So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him’ (Gen. 1:26, 27). Everyone who has even begun to read the Bible knows about the doctrine of the divine image in mankind, for these redundant expressions (four times) meet the reader the first time human beings are mentioned. That is half the number in the entire Bible of sentences saying God made man in His image or likeness. The others are at Genesis 5:1; 9:6; 1 Corinthians 11:7; and James 3:9. In these seven verses mankind in the image of God is announced eight times. There are no other direct references to God’s image in mankind in the Bible.

Language suggestive of the idea turns up in two New Testament verses (Col. 1:15 and Eph. 4:24) where Christ is said to be the perfect image of God. Similarly, three brief passages refer to the new, regenerate mankind as an eikon (image) of Christ, who in turn is understood to be the image of God (Rom. 8:29; 2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 1:10). These five texts clearly allude to the Genesis passages. Though these texts do not directly restate the doctrine they may be understood as amplifying the doctrine of mankind, the image of God. It is clear, therefore, that though a person's relation to God, to himself, to the created order and to other people is the very stuff of every page of the Bible even though Scripture does not directly employ the doctrine of the divine image as a framework of any subject of doctrine.

The Theological and Exegetical Tasks

In our time the worlds of science, philosophy and public education labor mightily to relate mankind totally to the order of nature. The world of 'socially correct' discourse is as Abraham said of ancient Gerar: 'There is no fear of God at all in this place' (Gen. 20:11). Diane Sawyer on ABC television network omitted 'by their Creator' in citing the Declaration of Independence—'all men are endowed by their creator,' etc. Perhaps in reaction some have been understandably tempted to outdo the scriptural dimensions of the biblical teaching that all mankind are the image of the Creator. Let us try to treat the doctrine in biblical, historical and traditional context meeting the challenges of unbelief as well as avoiding exaggerations of overzealous advocates of 'fulfillment' ideals among certain Christian psychological and sociological movements.

We want to know as precisely as possible what the Scripture phrases meant at the time they were written: 'in our image, after our likeness ... in the image of God' (Gen. 1:26, 27). What do the later uses of similar phrases—'in the likeness of God'—mean (Gen. 5:1; Col. 1:15; Eph. 4:24)? What is the connection of the divine image with the dominion of mankind over the animals and his commission to subdue the earth and to exploit it? Is God's creativity in Genesis 1:1–25 the original of which mankind's creativity is the image? How are image and likeness related? What precisely in each man and woman constitutes the image? Such questions are primary and must be addressed.

Most of these questions might not need to be raised if the Hebrew language were furnished with the fine set of precise terms for every sort of grammatical connection, which New Testament Greek and our own English language have. But Hebrew does not have them and Moses did not invent any such linguistic refinements. Obviously, the passages are as plain as God intended them to be, so eschewing the eager help of overly interpretive translations and paraphrases we do the best we can. I shall not attempt to take the reader through all the technical linguistic data and arguments, but will in a series of statements lay out the subject as clearly as I can make it.

1. Mankind was created 'in the image' of God. This is stated three times in Genesis 1:26 and 27. Though 'likeness' is also employed once here and again at Genesis 5:1, 'It is clear that the key term is tselem, image.'¹ What is a tselem or 'image' as understood in Old Testament times? It is derived from a root meaning to cut, as of a statue or chiseled likeness (1 Sam. 6:5, 11) in two or three dimensions as of heathen gods (Amos 5:26) or even of pictures (Ezek. 23:14).² A chiseled, three-dimensional statue is the primary sense, though a molded image also could be a tselem (Num. 33:52). Beginning my reading of the Bible at Genesis at age twelve it was natural to assume that God looked something like my father. That impression of course was spiked long before I reached John 4:24, but the Old Testament nevertheless several times gives us leave to believe that the divine Spirit sometimes may properly be represented as having form, even if He does not have a two or three-dimensional form (Dan. 7:9, 10; Rev. 4:2; 5:1, 8). Even though Israel heard the sound of words of God at Sinai and 'saw no form' of Him (Deut. 4:12), and Isaiah 40:18 denies any comparison or 'likeness' of Him, nevertheless Ezekiel says that he saw the 'likeness' (the same word as in Gen

1:27) of a man—‘a likeness with a human appearance [from the Hebrew word to see]’—in his vision of the heavenly throne and its occupant (Ezek. 1:26). He goes on to say he saw not a likeness of God, but ‘likeness of the glory of the Lord’ (Ezek. 1:28). Something therefore about God or His glory may at least be represented to people as manlike in form. Or one might say, when the Lord God of the Old Testament assumed a form (as in Ezekiel’s visions and in theophanies) it was appropriate that the form should always be a human form.

2. The image or representation of God in mankind is similar to God in some unspecified manner, that is to say, the tselem, image of God, is more than a mere sign or symbol such as a national flag or representation, viz.: ‘man in our image, after our likeness’ (Gen. 1:26); ‘he made him in the likeness of God’ (Gen. 5:1). It has been asserted that ‘image’ (tselem) and ‘likeness’ (demuth) are simple Hebrew parallels or hendiadys, a grammatical term meaning one through two. In such a case the two words would express only one idea. This however is by no means certain, and the words are not strictly synonymous any more than ‘instruction’ (musar) and ‘law’ (torah) are, though they frequently appear in so-called synonymous parallel (Prov. 1:8).

In this case likeness (demuth) following image (tselem) certainly explains, enlarges, specifies tselem as an image that is not merely representative of God, but actually like Him. The flag of fifty stars and thirteen stripes only represents the U.S.A. but is not like the U.S.A. at all. A two-dimensional map, however, is somewhat like the country, a three-dimensional raised map even more so. Although both mainly represent, there is real similarity. From the whole Bible context of Genesis 1 we are assured that important, perhaps even structural, similarity is intended (see Gen. 9:6 and James 3:9).

3. We must consider whether mankind is the image of God, not merely in the image of God. Paul says ‘man ... is the image (eikon) and glory of God,’ thus giving biblical legitimacy to the notion. There is also a possibility that Genesis 1:26 should be rendered, ‘Let us make man as our image,’ so also in verse 27.

There are three Hebrew prepositions called ‘inseparable prepositions’—joined in pre-position directly to the following word. They are b (in, by, with), k (as, like, according to, a word of comparison) and l (to, for, at, frequently like ‘to,’ in English, a prefixed part of an infinitive as in ‘to read,’ and similar).

Since Hebrew is exceedingly poor in logical connectives of all kinds, the Bible employs these three tiny words, plus and, another single consonant (our double U).³ Translators know these four words fill in for many transitional and relational thoughts for which Hebrew has few strictly equivalent terms. A full listing, therefore, of the renderings of b (primarily meaning ‘in,’ as Greek ‘en’ and Latin ‘in’) in the several Versions and the renderings proposed by commentaries, would extend to several pages.

There is precedent in the Old Testament for rendering the b before tselem, ‘as the image.’ The Brown, Driver and Briggs Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament finds about forty shades of meaning in five categories—demonstrating how poor Hebrew is in special transitional and relational connectives and conjunctions of distinct meanings. Among these is b essentiae of the grammarians. In such cases as is a proper translation. Among examples cited in Gesenius’ Hebrew

Grammar the most convincing are Isaiah 28:16, which might be rightly translated, ‘I make Zion a foundation’ and Ezekiel 20:41, ‘As a pleasing aroma I will accept you.’ In the latter case the grammatical structure is somewhat similar to ‘... make ... in our image.’⁴ J. A. Clines, in a well-documented article, has sought to show that b here is b essentiae (as the image).⁵ I do not think Clines has proved his case, but he has made it not unreasonable to accept it. His summary statement says that mankind is created not in God’s image ... but as God’s image, or rather to be God’s image, that is to deputise in the created world for the transcendent God who remains outside the world order. That man is God’s image means that he is the visible corporeal representative of the invisible, bodiless God; he is representative rather than representation.... However, the term ‘likeness’ is an assurance that man is an adequate and faithful representative of God on earth.⁶

Note that Clines says image means representative. He does not mean representation. If so, ‘in the image’ means mankind is God’s vicegerent, minister-in-place-of on earth. I have written above that an image is sometimes a representation. As for example, the figure of a pine tree on a tourist map of America’s Northwest represents the lumber industry. In the case of mankind, however, the representation (tselem) is truly similar (demuth). This view is similar to Clines’ but differs in that Clines then affirms that mankind’s rule over earth is the central affirmation of God’s tselem (image) in mankind. This remains to be proved. In my judgment, to render ‘as the image of God’ or to say ‘mankind is the image of God’ does not settle other related questions, though it has an important bearing on them, as we shall see. How much difference does it make whether one says John Jr. ‘is spat in the image of his father,’ as the proverbial saying has it (corrupted to ‘the spittin’ image of’), or ‘Johnny is the image of John Sr.’?

Whatever the narrowest possible significance of God’s making man betselem (in the image, or, perhaps, as the image) it has always been plain (ubique, semper, ab ommnibus) to believing Christians, lay or scholars, that man is different in kind, not mere degree from the rest of creation, that this difference consists in a likeness to God, and that competence to be and do what God commands flow from these facts. The question of Psalm 8, ‘what is man?’ does not refer specifically to the divine image, nor does it say or imply that in crowning him with ‘glory and honor’ as well as making him to have ‘dominion’ over God’s other works the image consists of these. The thrust of Psalm 8 is not to indicate man’s likeness to God, or to call attention to the image; rather it is to give worshipful expression to man’s essential distance from and humble inferiority to Him, even though graciously exalted by God in several marvelous ways. This is the tenor of the whole Psalm. It exalts God, not man.

4. The whole of man, soul and body, is ‘in the image of God’ and ‘according to his likeness,’ or to quote James, ‘after the similitude of God’ (James 3:9 kjv), yet not every aspect or part of the human being in the same manner or to the same degree.

One of the early false starts in explaining the image of God in mankind was Augustine’s effort to show how the pattern of his constitution is found in the Trinity. Calvin, who truly respected Augustine’s insights, nevertheless said: ‘Augustine, beyond all others, speculates with excessive refinement, for the purpose of fabricating a Trinity in man.’ He goes on to acknowledge that Augustine, in accepting Aristotle’s enumeration of ‘three faculties of the soul’—intellect, memory and will—might be right. He himself prefers the simpler ‘two parts, which is more used in scripture.’⁷

The whole creation reveals God’s glory and His attributes of wisdom and power. So it should not be thought improper to find in man’s nature certain likenesses to deity, even though the likeness be only by some sort of analogy. Since God is Spirit and Scripture fiercely guards against any idea of physical form or feature in God, theology must be on guard against ancient errors of literal idolatry in efforts to ‘explain’ this mystery.

Among the dozens of theologians who comment on the question I have never found one who would say the human body is like (or an image of) God’s body. Yet there seems to me full warrant to say that there is something about the human body which is analogous to something in the Godhead. In the process of time God took ‘the form of a man,’ including a man’s body. It was appropriate that God should do so or there would have been no ‘Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.’ It is unthinkable that the permanent incarnation (enfleshment) of the Second Person of the Godhead should have been in ‘the form of’ a snail or even a lion or a sheep—both of which serve as metaphors (‘Lion of the tribe of Judah,’ and ‘Behold, the Lamb of God’). Calvin might agree, though he argued from ‘renewal’ of the image ‘through Christ,’ citing Ephesians 4:24 and Colossians 3:10 that the image consisted in knowledge of God, ‘true righteousness and holiness.’⁸ Yet even he elsewhere makes remarks in agreement with what I have said above. Most Calvinist writers do not depart far from their master teacher. Even Gordon Clark, who restricts the image to mankind’s rational faculties might acknowledge that human bodies are more ‘commensurable’ to the form of God (Phil. 2:6) than the bodies of four-footed beasts and creeping things.⁹

Perhaps, some say, this is the form (Gr. morphē) Paul had in mind when he wrote of the pre-existent Christ; He existed en morphē theou (Phil. 2:6). Though morphē, form, almost always indicates outward appearance or shape in the koinē (common spoken and written Greek of New Testament times) literature, theologians have insisted that here it refers to the dignity and prerogatives of deity, and not a structure (1), since God as pure Spirit has no ‘form’ in the ordinary sense and (2) in context the ‘form of God’ is contrasted with ‘the form [morphē] of a slave’ (doulos) not the form of a man (anthrōpos). Yet in context God the Son becomes (ginomai) in ‘the likeness of’ generic mankind (anthrōpos). Though reminiscent of Genesis 1:26, ‘after our likeness,’ this expression, so far from indicating, in context, only similarity, means ‘in every respect he was a man.’ So, whatever the analogy, mankind’s physical form is not like any physical ‘form’ in God.

It is important that the superlative ‘very good’ was pronounced upon the created world only after mankind was created (Gen. 1:31). The supreme goodness and beauty in the mind and Person of the Creator when He created mankind are mirrored (a word often used by theologians in this connection) in the human body. I am certain brides and grooms through the ages would all agree that the human body, male and female, is the highest of earthly beauties. Romantic verse, crude or elegant, supports the allegation.

Whether or not the Mosaic level (Genesis) of revelation conceived of human nature as composed of body and soul may be moot. It is certain from later texts that God knew about this distinction. In such a case, if (as agreed) the non-material aspects of mankind (call it soul or spirit) are in God’s image it is fitting that the house (body) should also be in God's image, granted that it is more difficult to conceive. We should be on cautious notice that throughout the Bible the soul is frequently put for the individual—whether animal or human.

In forming the body of man from material creation, which already bears the impress of God's power and glory (Ps. 19:1, 2), God went a step further. The language of Genesis 2:7 requires a special house for whatever was uniquely conveyed by the very breath of God.

Some recent theology likes to carry this line of reasoning a step further, finding the divine image in the distinction of male and female and in their conjugal relation. The texts of Scripture nowhere say so. It may well be that even though not aspects of the image, the image makes possible unique physical, psychical, emotional, and social beauties and benefits to mankind through the distinction of male and female. Sex differences are basic to the distinct psychical and emotional (perhaps also intellectual) inclinations and powers manifest in men on the one hand and in women on the other. I shall not in the present charged atmosphere pursue that thought very far. Of course there are mother-like as well as father-like qualities in God (even Moses called himself a 'nursing father'). The very form of embrace in sexual coition appears to be a part of the plan of God to make deep spiritual community a part of the physical act. Is this why only fornication is said in Scripture to be a sin against the body (1 Cor. 6:18)?

Dietrich Bonhoeffer, evidently taking a cue from the 'male and female' shortly following 'in his own image' (Gen. 1:27), declared therefore, 'Man duality—man and woman—is brought into the world of the fixed and the living in his likeness to God,' and 'The likeness, of man to God, is not analogia entis [analogy of being] but analogia relationis [analogy of relation].' Though Bonhoeffer drew some nice thoughts about social relations and God-man connections this is not one of his better ideas.¹⁰

Karl Barth promoted a similar notion of the image being relational, connecting 'Let us' with various dualities (soul-body) in the human constitution as well as the male-female and man-fellowman. He never, in many pages, gets around to summarizing the notion.¹¹ Wolfhart Pannenberg comments on this theology and the connection of 'male and female' with 'Let us' and 'in his own image': 'It allows us to conclude that both man and woman are created equally in the divine image but not that the likeness consists of the relation between the sexes.' He rightly rejects flat out Barth's notion that 'the sexual relation corresponds to the trinitarian relation.'¹²

Of course the truth of John 4:24, 'God is a spirit,' and of the numberless warnings of the Old Testament against any thought of a material substance in God, whether visible or invisible, prevent us from considering that the physical aspect of mankind is the image of a physical aspect of God. It is apparent that while the human body, per se, is in no respect an image of the God of the Bible, all of man's physical nature was originally created to bear that image. This may seem to be an excessively fine distinction, but it is a necessary one.

Some theologians see a humanity of God suggested by the prevalent anthropomorphism of the Old Testament. Yet this road does not lead far, because God in the metaphorical language of the Bible has wings and feathers too, as well as hands and arms. The profusion of anthropomorphism in Scripture yields no evidence for a divine image in the human body, for there is ‘zoomorphism’ as well. God is not like a beast.

The Bible says nothing specifically to the effect that the divine image resides only in our ‘higher powers’—spirit, intelligence and the like. Yet this also must be said: there are two aspects of man’s nature—as will be shown in a later chapter—soul/spirit and body. This is suggested by the creation event as described in Genesis 2:7. Like the beasts, mankind’s body is from the earth. That which distinguishes him from beasts is not derived from earth but from the creative ‘breath of God.’ The earthy side of mankind is visible. Our outward, physical likeness to beasts (though superior in many ways) may indeed in some way mirror something about God as well as our spirit and personality. The implication has been stated well by Norman Shepherd:

However as man’s kinship with the earth is most clearly visible in the body, so the image of God is best seen when man is viewed from the perspective of his spirituality.

Theologians [the present writer among them] have sought at this point to enumerate those aspects of man’s spirituality that define his humanity and set him apart from the animal creation... It is the personality of man which separates him from the animals and is a reflection of the personality of God. The animals have their existence from God, but man has his being in God, and is his offspring, Acts 17:28, 29.¹³

This outlook is not out of step with Aquinas, who held the image to be present in the human body as ‘traces’ and with Calvin who asserts in a summary, ‘although the primary seat of the divine image was in the mind and heart, or in the soul and its powers, yet there was not part of man, not even the body itself, in which some sparks did not glow.’¹⁴

5. Being a creature in God’s own image means people are distinct from animals in an absolute manner, notwithstanding our having, as animals also do, a physical body. The Bible furnishes no ground whatsoever for any genetic connection between the ‘lower’ species (animals) and the ‘higher,’ mankind. Mankind is the crown of creation but not of evolution as far as Scripture is concerned. Genesis 2:7 states simply and clearly, ‘man became a living being’ (niv, neb), not the other way around. Whatever may be said for possible mediate creation of mankind, this verse cannot be stretched to say any living creature or ‘soul’ became a ‘man.’ Hence, ‘The Bible does not countenance the view that a previously living creature developed into a man, nor ... that the image of God evolved from a lower form of life. The moment man became a living creature, he was in the image of God.’¹⁵

Those who understand that the Bible is what it claims to be in all its parts, including a Mosaic Pentateuch, the very opposite of an animal ancestry is how they understand the record. Yet there have been exceptions—i.e. advocates of ‘mediate’ creation of mankind, the ‘dust of the ground’ (Gen 2:7) being understood as animate dust. It is apparent, for example, that A. H. Strong, premier Baptist theologian of the past 125 years, very reluctantly adopted theistic evolution.¹⁶ He sought to harmonize this view of mankind’s origin with the dominant Darwinism of his day. Yet, no one ever labored more earnestly to show the utter contrast between animal nature and human nature than he. He restricted the possible evolutionary origin of man to the body alone, summarizing:

The radical differences between man’s soul and the principle of intelligence in lower animals, especially man's possession of self consciousness, general ideas, the moral sense, and the power of self-determination, show that that which chiefly constitutes him man could not have been derived, by any natural process of development, from inferior creatures. We are compelled, then, to believe that God's 'breathing into man's nostrils the breath of life' (Gen. 2:7), though it was a mediate creation as presupposing existing material in the shape of animal forms, was yet an immediate creation in the sense that only a divine reinforcement of the process of life turned the animal into man. In other words, man came not from the brute, but through the brute, etc.¹⁷

Strong then goes on to argue so strenuously against any natural evolutionary origin even of animals apart from the immediate and imminent power of God that one wonders truly if and how he ever even tentatively adopted an evolutionary origin of any living form in the first place.¹⁸ It is, of course, of a piece with his doctrine of the imminent Logos, which he adopted in late career and never succeeded quite in merging into his previously composed, thoroughly orthodox, Calvinist systematic theology. Yet the importance and value of Strong's work is witnessed that through various editions it remained in print from the first printed 'Lectures in Theology' (1876) up to the present. It was for generations a widely prescribed textbook in fundamentalist and evangelical schools for ministers. A friendly but critical assessment of these and other developments within Strong's theology will be found in Carl F. H. Henry's Ph.D. dissertation Personal Idealism and Strong's Theology.¹⁹ Strong's contemporaries, B. B. Warfield and several other orthodox Protestants of the epoch, adopted theistic evolution. See article 'Evolution' in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology.

As we move away from the primal narrative in Genesis 1 and 2 to bring the rest of Scripture to bear on the doctrine of the imago dei it appears that the doctrine is assumed throughout but never defined. Questions arise to which answers, however tentative or limited, must be given. I shall continue the propositional approach.

6. The fall of man marred the image of God, but did not remove it. Let us consider some of the scriptural evidence. There are only three passages which bear directly on the matter and they seem to me decisive.

'Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed, for God made man in his own image' (Gen. 9:6). This is the definitive text on the punishment of the crime of murder. It is postlapsarian and pre-Sinaitic law, i.e. it relates to divine law for the human race under the condition of race-wide depravity through all ages and 'dispensations.' It relates to mankind whom Paul describes as 'by nature children of wrath' (Eph. 2:3) and 'alienated from the life of God' (Eph. 4:18). It seems utterly lame logic to say, as some do, that this drastic punishment of murder by the death of the murderer is only out of respect for what man once was but no longer is, similar to Jehu's concern that the remnants of Jezebel's corpse be given decent burial because she was once a princess. See John Murray's excellent discussion in *Principles of Conduct*²⁰ and Collected Writings.²¹

'With it [the tongue] we bless our Lord and Father, and with it we curse people who are made in the likeness of God' (Jas. 3:9). This statement plainly refers to people in general: not specifically before the fall or after regeneration. It is not with reference to what mankind once was, but to the divine likeness, which all people of every age bear, imparting a supreme dignity. To curse with the tongue is to commit a form of lese-majesty, the majesty of the divine image present in every human being.

‘For a man [anēr, male of our race] ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God, but [de, on the other hand] woman is the glory of man’ (1 Cor. 11:7). Paul is treating proper decorum in dress for group worship. He is making a specialized use of the doctrine of the divine image, not denying the woman is also in God’s image. Its relevance to the present discussion is simply that the divine image is still present in mankind. (See Murray’s discussion in his Collected Writings.²²) Other passages presuppose a special analogy, likeness, correspondence between God and human beings (Ps. 94:7–10; Prov. 20:12; Exod. 4:11; Luke 11:9–13). The assertion that the image of God is permanent in mankind, is enlarged and supported by the following.

7. The image of God in the creation narrative in Genesis and in the other references cited above, appears to be what distinguishes mankind from the rest of animate creation. Our first parents, as created, undoubtedly possessed human nature in its full integrity including knowledge of God, true righteousness and holiness. Though they lost that integrity in the fall, it does not follow that knowledge, righteousness and holiness constitute per se the divine image. If defined in these terms, as Calvin observed, then of course the divine image was lost in the fall. However, the Genesis narrative (Gen. 1:26, 27; 5:1) and other specific references (Gen. 9:6; 1 Cor. 11:7; James 3:9) do not affirm that moral integrity constitutes the image, even though before their fall our first parents possessed moral integrity. It may be much better to say that possession of the image and the gift of freedom that accompanied it precisely rendered mankind capable of sin. Animals are not capable of sin. They do not and cannot sin. It is possession of the image which renders mankind in fallen condition not merely unhappy and miserable but a sinner, a rebel against God.

The image of God therefore constitutes mankind as mankind. It still today renders sin the atrocity that it is, worthy of divine wrath forever.

8. The question of how the race, after loss of moral integrity and in a fallen condition, could continue to possess the image of its Maker as in its first integrity, has been commonly addressed by distinguishing between the image in a broad sense from a narrow sense, the latter being lost in the fall, the former being retained. The broad sense (sometimes called natural likeness) includes such elements as personality, rationality, moral sense and capacity, aesthetic sense, and perhaps sense of humor and love of play. These are aspects of spiritual being: the narrow sense being moral likeness (righteousness and holiness) and true knowledge of God. In the broad sense then, mankind is still mankind though greatly marred, while in the narrow sense the image is gone. This latter is what is involved in being ‘dead in trespasses and sins,’ ‘the natural man,’ who cannot even desire to know the ‘things of the Spirit of God.’ Though held by far the majority of Protestant, especially Reformed, theologians, few propose it as more than theory. On Protestant principles these proposals (especially 6 and 7) are almost a necessity. Not so the Roman Catholic teaching as we now proceed to show.

9. In usual Roman Catholic doctrine, the ‘image of God’ consists of our powers of reason and free will. These constitute mankind as mankind. Though not totally unaffected by the fall they survive intact. Thus by use of reason, man can know much of God by reasoning from the facts of the created world, including himself.

In Tridentine Roman Catholic religion the ‘likeness’ of God is something different from the image of God. It refers to the moral and ethical integrity of primal mankind. This likeness is not a part of basic human nature (= image of God) but something imparted (donum superadditum) by God to Adam in addition to the complete humanity (humanitas) or image of God. In the Fall mankind lost this likeness but not the image.

Seeds of this view are to be found in Origen and Irenaeus.²³ The doctors of the Western church through the ages have not been in agreement as to when, to what degree and at what time the ‘image’ was conferred and whether contemporaneously with or later than the ‘likeness’ (superadded gifts). Since Trent and the defender of Trent, Robert Bellarmine, official dogma has been quite clear. In the fall, Adam lost such added ‘graces’ as holiness, righteousness and immortality and we do not have them in ‘the state of nature.’ ‘Since the Fall of Adam’ the condition of mankind ‘is only different from Adam’s condition before the Fall in the sense that Adam has been bereft of his clothes [superadded holiness, righteousness, etc.]’ whereas ‘man since the Fall’ has not yet put them on. ‘Human nature is no more afflicted with ignorance and weakness, than if it were in a state of [pre-fall] pure nature.’²⁴ The mischief this doctrine has introduced into the Roman view of sin and salvation is incalculable.

Commenting on this point Gordon Clark says:

Even though the neutral state [immediately after the fall] was soon defaced by voluntary sin, man without saving grace could still obey God’s commands upon occasion. After regeneration a man could do even more than God requires. This then becomes the foundation of the Roman Catholic doctrine of the treasury [of merit] of the saints. If a particular man does not himself earn enough merit, the Pope can transfer from the saints’ accounts as many more merits as are necessary for entrance into heaven. One horrendous implication of all this is that although Christ’s death remains necessary to salvation, it is not sufficient. Human merit is indispensable.²⁵

Yet even orthodox Romanism at its best grants in its own way that sinners are unable to come to faith by reason alone apart from grace and special divine enablement. Readers may be both encouraged that there are soundly ‘saved’ Roman Catholics as well as surprised by the comments of the premier Roman Catholic theologian, Thomas Aquinas. Commenting on Philippians 2:8–10 he says: ‘But this salvation of grace is by faith in Christ. In the justification of an adult who has sinned, the movement of faith towards God, coincides with the infusion of grace.’ The ‘infusion’ of grace is not what Paul meant, as our Reformers insisted, but at least Aquinas did not believe in ‘total ability’ of unaided, fallen, human nature to seek and find God. He goes on to say that faith does not originate within ourselves, that ‘free will is inadequate for the act of faith since the contents of faith are above human reason.’ Faith must be taught by the Spirit of God. Then arguing from Romans 11:6 (‘by grace ... no longer on the basis of works’) and 1 Corinthians 1:29–30 (‘no human being might boast in the presence of God’) he even argues for particular divine election, citing the same texts the Reformers used against Catholics of their day, concluding on the basis of Romans 8:30: ‘For predestination is nothing else than the pre-arrangement of God’s blessings, among which blessings our good works themselves are numbered.’²⁶ In this exposition the Angelic Doctor turns in altogether a better exposition than many of the deliverances we hear from pulpits and broadcasts of supposedly sound evangelical preachers today.

10. Paul does not specifically claim to be interpreting the references to the divine image of God, but in several places he alludes to the Genesis texts in such a manner as to demonstrate that restoration of the moral image of God, considered as righteousness and holiness, is the goal of the sending of the Messiah into the world. Christ as Last Adam bears the true image of God (not merely an eikon or tselem or image). Christ is the image of God (eikon tou theou, 2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15). He is not image in a derived sense, but according to Hebrews 1:3 (asv) ‘the very image [character] of his substance [hypostasis].’ Though hypostasis in course of theological statements in the Greek language came to be used alternately for Latin persona, a theatrical mask or impersonation, the common meaning when Hebrews 1:3 was written was substance, being, or essence. This is reflected rightly in the niv translation as ‘being.’ Hence, whatever the being of God is, the Son of God is—not by derivation or creation but by nature. Christ came into the world not to demonstrate what God’s body is like, but to demonstrate fully what God’s holy character is. In His redemptive work as Last Adam He has made it possible for human beings to recover the lost moral likeness which was possessed by the man of paradise but lost wholly in the fall.²⁷

I do not think this line of argument, exploited in an impressive way by Calvin, leads to Calvin’s conclusion that the divine image of Genesis 1:26, 27 is precisely ‘knowledge, then pure righteousness and holiness.’ It seems to me it is rather that the divine image, constituted in mankind’s spiritual nature, as a personal being, enables mankind to have true ‘knowledge ... pure righteousness and holiness’ and then by disobedience to lose them.²⁸

No doubt Calvin as well as Aquinas²⁹ before him and texts of other authors (C. Hodge, J. O. Buswell) follow that line of argument I have reported as being drawn from Paul’s teachings (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15) and Hebrews 1:3 (I have not produced all the texts) are right in finding Christ’s holy character an example of the divine image undistorted by sin. Historically, as early as Athanasius,³⁰ a similar line of argument was proposed and related to the Logos doctrine. John of Damascus taught that the components of the image in the man of paradise were intelligence, free will and virtue, which had their seat in the human reason and spirit, ‘But all of these qualities found their fullest expression in the Logos as “the substantial image of God,” through whom the image of archetypical humanity could be said to have its reality.’³¹ Damascus’ view leads to a further development (which Calvin did not endorse) that Adam was created in the image of the humanity of Christ that in eternity was foreknown (determined) in the mind of God. This early, but somewhat bizarre variation, has never disappeared. Though Calvin’s view is similar in many ways to Aquinas’,³² I do not recall that Calvin ever cites Aquinas in this connection.

11. It seems correct to say that the story of redemption which occupies every page of Scripture is tracing what God has done, is doing and shall do to restore the holy character of mankind’s being, which whether constituting the image as many hold, or as lost to the image as I and many others prefer to think. Hence it is correct to speak of the restoration of the image of God in redeemed humanity by the Last Adam (Scripture does not speak of a ‘second’ Adam, as if there might be several; see 1 Cor. 15:45).

It is objected that anything unholy cannot bear God’s image (Hodge). This is like saying that John, Jr., who looks exactly like his father, cannot be ‘spat in the image’ because he is a bad boy.

12. The fellowship of mankind with God in paradise is not featured in the Genesis account, but it reports that God sought Adam (3:7–10) in the Garden. The context clearly implies previous communion between the Creator and the pair created in His image with instructions to fill the earth with their progeny. The conclusion, therefore, cannot be avoided that in the Hebraic way of simply juxtaposing ideas that belong together in causal or purposive context without stating the connection, God created mankind for fellowship. This theme is capable of expository development with reference to Israel at Sinai that God might ‘dwell with you’ and of the mishkan, tabernacle or ‘dwelling’ ‘in the midst’ of the camp; further, of the sad movement of the shekinah or glory presence out of Jerusalem in Ezekiel and of His return at the Second Advent (Zech. 14:1 ff.). The doctrine of the church in its own oneness and with Christ falls in line. ‘Yet she on earth has union with God the Three in One and mystic, sweet communion with those whose rest is won.’ With the image restored and perfected in the redeemed, worship of the Godhead and fellowship with Him is our prospect for eternity (Rev. 21:22).

From a somewhat similar point of view this aspect of the doctrine of the divine image in mankind is movingly expounded in relation to the latter chapters of John’s Gospel by Cornelius Plantinga, Jr., in ‘Images of God.’³³

13. It has been argued cogently by many through the centuries and fervently in the twentieth century (by Dorothy L. Sayers in The Mind of the Maker) that mankind’s creativity in fulfilling the command to ‘work, till the garden,’ and the like is the essence of the image. More theologians have been attracted to the interpretation that mankind’s capacity as vicegerent (or vice-king) of the earth implied in ‘have dominion, fill the earth and subdue it,’ constitutes the divine image. In my judgment it is more consistent with the text of Genesis 1:26–30 to regard the image of God as qualifying mankind to rule and subdue the earth and as enabling him through the rationality-aspect of the image to use his latent physical powers creatively. In other words, fellowship with God is a goal or purpose of God in making mankind in His image, not an aspect of it; dominion is made right and possible by the image, not of its essence; and conquest (‘subdue it’) or exploitation, in a reasonable and fruitful way, the privilege, not the image, as such.

14. I cautiously raise the matter of the practical bearing of the image of God in mankind on arts, scientific disciplines, social projects and similar in Christian perspective. I commend the measured comments of M. J. Erickson in his Christian Theology under the heading of ‘Implications of the Doctrine.’³⁴ The older works in my library I regard highly say nothing about it. Even L. Berkhof who published a Systematic Theology in 1949, says nothing directly about this.

A. J. McClain, my very practically oriented professor of theology, made remarks that survive in my notes on his lecture: (1) ‘It is the likeness to God which gives man his peculiar dignity and worth even as a fallen being.’ I later heard him apply this insight to the importance of care for human need, respect for people’s rights, and the like. (2) It justifies capital punishment for murder, quoting Genesis 9:6. (3) Cursing anybody is evil because every person is in the image of God, hence directed against the Creator, citing James 3:9 in asv. (4) Human life is sacred.

As I reflect on the matter it seems to me McClain covered the ground in a seminal but comprehensive manner. If Job had thought of these things he might not have cursed the night he was conceived and surely would not have been so displeased with his birthday as the third chapter of Job famously declares!

Yet the doctrine is capable of being pressed too far. It does not justify every human impulse, now stimulated and titillated from every quarter, toward self-fulfillment. Not quite every natural or induced longing of the heart is either holy or wholesome. Christian ‘counsellors,’ as the current jargon has it, need be cautious in this regard. Christian psychology and sociology as well as ‘Christian Education’ are businesses nowadays, as well as fields of enterprise and, we hope, of service. Let this caveat be the last word in the present chapter: every Christian professional discipline would like to find a biblical authority for its enterprise. This is especially desirable for innovations, without traditional precedent and clear texts in the Bible to support them (as with pastor, evangelist and the like). Many seek to find root and authority in human need, interpreted in light of the divine image of God in mankind. Let us beware that we do not judge the needs under the influence of the spirit of the age rather than the doctrines of creation, fall and redemption. The Scriptures interpret the Zeitgeist, not the other way around. Let us not decide independently of Scripture what we think mankind is and needs and then seek scriptural authority to justify our procedures.

¹ J. A. Clines, ‘The Image of God in Man,’ Tyndale Bulletin, 1967, p. 70.

² Brown, Driver & Briggs, Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament.

³ Richard C. Steiner, ‘Does the Biblical Hebrew Conjunction Have Meanings, One Meaning or No Meaning at All?’ Journal of Biblical Literature, Summer of 2000, pp. 249–267.

⁴ A. E. Crowley, ed. 2nd English ed., Gesenius Hebrew Grammar (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1910, 1963), p. 119, para. 5.

⁵ Clines, op. cit., pp. 53–103.

⁶ Clines, op. cit., p. 101.

⁷ Calvin, Commentary on Genesis I, Edinburgh: Translation Society, p. 93.

⁸ Calvin, Institutes I.15.4.

⁹ Gordon Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man (Jefferson, Maryland: The Trinity Foundation, 2nd ed., 1992), pp. 14–19.

¹⁰ Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Creation and Fall (New York: Macmillan, 1959), pp. 36–38.

¹¹ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics III ed. G. W. Bromiley & T. F. Torrance (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1936, 1975), pp. I. 190 ff. and II. 323, 324.

¹² Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology II, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), pp. 205, 206.

¹³ Norman Shepherd, 'Image of God' in Baker Encyclopedia of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988), p. 1018, col. 1.

¹⁴ John Calvin, Institutes I, 15.3.

¹⁵ Shepherd, op. cit., p. 1018.

¹⁶ Strong's contemporaries B. B. Warfield and several other orthodox Protestants of the epoch adopted theistic evolution. See article "Evolution" in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology.

¹⁷ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 466, 467.

¹⁸ ibid., pp. 467–474.

¹⁹ Carl F. H. Henry, Personal Idealism and Strong's Theology (Wheaton, IL: Van Kampen, 1951) (a very rare book).

²⁰ John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957, 1971), pp. 112, 113.

²¹ ibid., pp. 35, 36.

²² ibid., pp. 36, 37.

²³ Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.6.1.

²⁴ Robert Bellarmine, Disputations Tom., 4, p. 11, col. 2. Also as cited by A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), p. 336. The Catechism of the Catholic Church of 1994 does not quite agree: 'Human nature has not been totally corrupted: it is wounded in the natural powers proper to it; subject to ignorance, suffering, and the dominion of death; and inclined to sin.' Para. 405, p. 102. English ed.

²⁵ Gordon Clark, op. cit., p. 13.

²⁶ Thomas Aquinas, Commentary on Saint Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, trans. M. L. Lamb (Albany, NY: Magi Books, 1966), pp. 94–97.

²⁷ He did not lose what may be called moral capacity or he could not be morally responsible and a sinner.

²⁸ Calvin, Institutes I, XV, 4.

²⁹ Aquinas, Summa Theologica i, 93, 6.

³⁰ Jaroslav Pelikan. The Christian Tradition, 5 Christian Doctrine and Modern Culture (since 1700) (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1989), p. 203.

³¹ ibid., p. 203.

³² Aquinas, op. cit., Q93, 6–8.

³³ Cornelius Plantinga, Jr., ‘Images of God,’ Christian Faith and Practice in the Modern World, ed. M. A. Noll & D. F. Wells (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988), pp. 51–67.

³⁴ Millard J. Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1985), pp. 515–517.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (248). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

4

The Non-physical Aspects of Human Nature

The absence of a chapter on the human body, the physical aspect of mankind, does not mean that we do not regard it as important, for it is. There is sufficient reason for absence of a separate chapter. The body can be perceived by our senses. No one in his right mind forthrightly denies its existence. The same is not true of the soul.

The Soul, Its Distinct Features and Functions

God did not first create the soul and put it in a body but the other way around (Gen 2:7). John Murray, revered professor of theology at Westminster Seminary said:

The notion that the body is the prison-house of the soul is pagan in origin and anti-biblical; it is Platonic, and has no resemblance to the biblical conception. The Bible throughout represents the dissolution of body and spirit as an evil, as the retribution and wages of sin, and, therefore, as a disruption of that integrity which God established at creation. If [Adam] were not dust, he could not return to dust. But the reason for return to dust is not that he is dust, but that he has sinned (Gen. 2:17; 3:17).¹

In Funeral Liturgy

In the graveside liturgy of Christian committal, Protestant ministers usually intone the following from The Book of Common Prayer: ‘Unto Almighty God we commend the soul of our brother [or sister] departed, and we commit his [or her] body to the ground,’ etc. The Westminster Confession of 1647, normative for Presbyterians, Congregationalists and (until recent decades) for most Baptists, states: ‘After God had made all other creatures, he created man, male and female, with reasonable and immortal souls.’ The Westminster Assembly mandated Scripture ‘proof’ for ‘male and female’ is of course Genesis 1:27; for ‘immortal souls’ it is Genesis 2:7 (kjv)—‘God ... breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living soul.’ They included Ecclesiastes 12:7, ‘and the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns to God who gave it.’ Other ‘proofs’ include Luke

23:43, recording the dying pronouncement of Jesus upon the repentant thief, ‘Truly, I say to you, today you will be with me in Paradise,’ and Jesus’ warning in Matthew 10:28: ‘And do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather fear him who can destroy both soul and body in hell.’²

In the above quotations from the Anglican service book and the Westminster confession, ‘soul’ is being used in a sense common to English-speaking people for centuries, referring to the immaterial part of mankind, seat of consciousness, thinking, feeling, of personal being and which endures (‘survives’ death is an oxymoron) beyond death. Peoples everywhere in every age of whom there are written records, even archaeological remains, are known to have assumed this personal center = soul. Even when ‘soul’ is used for the sense of individual person (‘She was a cheerful soul’) the body is not the focus of meaning but the person, the word the present generation prefers to employ.

A Cautious Statement

Under the heading, ‘Man’s two-fold Being,’ J. O. Buswell provides a cautiously-stated definition of age-long Christian doctrine, relating anthropology of ‘the soul’ to an eschatology of the same—as must be done. Orthodox doctrine employs sayings of Jesus and of the New Testament to explain or enlarge what Genesis says of the ‘living being’ brought to existence by divine breath after God formed mankind of the dust of the ground. He says it is obvious (and wearisome volumes and columns of so-called biblical theology to the contrary of recent generations will never erase the obvious)

That according to the Bible man is both a material and a non-material substantive entity, both body and soul, and that these two aspects of man are not only logically distinguishable, but separable, so that at death the non-material man goes into the realm of the unseen [either], heaven or the place of the wicked dead, to be reunited with his body at the resurrection, and that the body returns to the dust, awaiting the resurrection—that there is this two-fold division in the being of man as presented in the Scripture is most obvious.³

People have always thought this way. The slightest acquaintance with the religion and mythology of ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, Greece and Rome and any other large group known to man, demonstrates that belief in the existence and ‘immortality’ of the soul is a universal human orthodoxy produced and enforced by conscience, Ubique, semper, ab omnibus.

Many modern writers of ‘Old Testament theology’ try to explain it away. Yet the temptation of ‘necromancy’ or communication with the dead prohibited specifically in Deuteronomy 18:11—the practitioners were said to be ‘an abomination to the Lord’—shows that belief in separability of body and soul, with the soul enduring intact, was assumed by ancient Israelites. Not that some ancient people did not deny it. In several of Socrates’ monologues in the dialogues of Plato, the famous philosopher refers to these skeptics—ancient counterparts of the positivists and behaviorists and other infidels and atheists of our time.

The Bible sometimes uses our word ‘soul’ as name for the immortal non-material aspect of man’s nature, but not often. When these studies reach Eschatology (Part 7), in connection with the doctrine of death and the intermediate state, a fuller account must be given. For now it needs to be said that contrary to the frequent assertions that belief in the ‘immortality of the soul’ or ‘life after death’ is absent from the Old Testament, there is strong evidence for such belief. (1) The Hebrews would hardly have avoided being quite saturated with that belief, recalling their origin in Mesopotamia, sojourn in Canaan and long residence in Egypt, countries where there was profound acceptance of such belief. (2) The New Testament comments on the Old Testament and interpretations of it, especially the faith of Old Testament believers and saints, makes plain they cherished the blessed hope of eternal life with God, that death does not end all. Though most of the evidence (in both Testaments) relates to the resurrection of the body in an eschatological setting, there is evidence of belief in ‘immortality of the soul’ also, though that phrase must be severely qualified, as we shall see.

How the New Testament Interprets the Old Testament

The chief evidence is the New Testament interpretation of Old Testament faith and hope found in certain outstanding passages of the New Testament. A passage in Hebrews is especially plain. After surveying the life of faith on earth of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Scripture says: ‘All these people were still living by faith when they died. They did not receive the things promised [land in Syria, numerous offspring on earth]; they only saw them and welcomed them from a distance. And they admitted that they were aliens [pilgrims] and strangers on earth. People who say such things show that they are looking for a country of their own ... they were looking for a better country [home]—a heavenly one’ (Heb. 11:13–16 niv). Obviously these folk did not expect to take their bodies along to their ‘better country’ in heaven.

It must be admitted that this hope for a home of the soul in heaven is not plain in the narrative of the Old Testament. The writer of Hebrews is plainly thinking of what certain patriarchs and others said (‘People who say such things’). Jacob, speaking to Pharaoh, referred to his 130 years and the long lives of Abraham and Isaac as a ‘pilgrimage’ or ‘sojourning’ (Gen. 47:9). In the closing hour of Jacob’s life he declared, ‘I wait for your salvation, O Lord’ (Gen. 49:18). At such a moment an earthly salvation would not have been on Jacob’s mind.

The author of Ecclesiastes, a preacher, declared expectation of a coming time (Eccles. 12:13, 14) when the deeds of earthly life would be brought to judgment—a near universal faith. ‘[T]he Preacher’ says nothing here of a resurrection of the body. The author of Psalm 119:19, in praise of ‘the Law,’ which Paul pronounced ‘spiritual,’ exclaims, ‘I am a sojourner on the earth; hide not your commandments from me.’ These and who knows what other Old Testament sayings were in the mind of the Apostle who wrote Hebrews 11:13. Charles Bridges, in an old but very valuable commentary on Psalm 119, says: ‘this has been the character, confession, and glory of the Lord’s people.’ Bridges cites in addition to the above texts Genesis 23:4, wherein Abraham declares to the Hittites of Hebron, ‘I am a sojourner and foreigner among you’ and Psalm 39:12, in which David worships saying, ‘O Lord ... I am a sojourner with you, a guest, like all my [pious] fathers.’⁴ It appears David felt that all his godly ancestors thought their natural home to be with God in the unseen world, and were only pilgrims and foreigners on earth. John Murray concludes:

The highest exercises of man as a rational, moral, religious being are predicable of men by this aspect [the soul retains identity and character after death]. All that we are most characteristically as beings created in the image of God, has its seat, unity and abiding meaning in the entity. There is an ‘ego,’ spiritual in nature, indivisible and indestructible continuously subsistent and active through all the changes in this world, in the disembodied state, and in the resurrected life in the age to come.⁵

An Old Testament Theology of the Soul

In the section concerned with eschatology, the last part of this book, detailed attention will be directed toward important Old Testament features expressing belief in ‘souls’ as distinct from ‘bodies’ and the destiny of souls. I therefore find it interesting that one finds Herman Schultz, a critical and sometimes rather skeptical Old Testament theologian, making remarks like these about Old Testament teaching:

There is a possibility of man “living forever” should he eat of the tree of life⁶.... Man is capable of holding personal communion with God, and of living a life that reaches out beyond space and time.... As a spiritual and personal being, man is the goal of creation.⁷

On the creation of mankind in the image of Elohim, though acknowledging possible reference to the body, it is the body as expressing the self-manifesting personality [which] must have seemed to this narrator [the P of the Wellhausian scheme] to have the likeness of God, and to bear the stamp of dignity characteristic of human nature⁸.... On the basis of impersonal life [body], man is to be personal; on the basis of transitory life, spiritual; on the basis of limited, sensuous life, morally free.⁹

Whether or not in the Old Testament ‘the belief that eternal life also belongs to the idea of man,’ the idea starts ‘as far back as we can go.’ On the basis of Genesis 6:3, if ‘mankind’ had not sinned as Genesis 6 says they did, ‘they would have had the Spirit of God “ruling in them forever”—in other words, they would have been immortal.’¹⁰

Then arguing from 2 Kings 2:1–11 (the translation of Elijah) and Genesis 5:21–24 (the translation of Enoch) Schultz draws the conclusion: ‘without dying’ they are ‘taken up to fellowship with God. Consequently, when man raises himself [where is the grave here?] into a true union with God, he is represented as fit for an everlasting life with God.’¹¹

The Bible devotes little attention either to the existence of the non-material part of human nature which we call the soul, or to the existence per se of unembodied created spirits (demons, angels). Both are assumed. When a saint dies he goes to Abraham’s bosom or the paradise of ‘the house of the Lord for ever’ or ‘my Father’s house.’ It is assumed that readers will understand these expressions as referring to a disembodied state of undying souls of people.¹²

Little is to be gained by study of the Hebrew and Greek terms for mankind’s psychic side (heart, mind, bowels and the like). They turn out to be popular terms occasionally used in a simple primary sense but usually in the same general, inexact, frequently metaphorical senses people do today in speaking of the same things. Literary efforts toward a psychology of the Bible based on study of language and words have been of very limited success. Hebrew and Greek words for soul, spirit, affections, hates, mind, evil and the like are usually names for some part or function of the physical body, as for example, heart, bowels, breath, but have come to be attached to some aspect or function of the psyche or soul. Then that aspect or function is frequently, by a figure of speech (synecdoche, metonymy), put for one's whole being as when David cries, 'my heart and my flesh sing for joy to the living God' (Ps. 84:2).

Theology must concern itself with those features of mankind's constitutional nature that provide capacity for right and wrong action, with consequent effects on communion with God and eternal life with God, in the New Testament sense (John 3:16; 5:24; 10:25, 26). Like God and other created spirits, man is a moral being. This means he must be able to think in order to weigh actions and consequences, to feel emotions of sorrow, joy, despair, and exultation, and the like. And he must be able to make choices. Theology summarizes these capacities and refers to them as emotion (feelings, desires, affections), intellect and will. This threefold analysis of mankind's rational-moral constitution should be conditioned by two cautions. (1) The analysis into three is not uniformly accepted—it is only convenient. (2) Since body and soul in this life are united it is correct to say that emotion is the whole person feeling; intellect, the whole person thinking; will, the whole person choosing—even though these are transacted in the center which we call the soul. Somewhere in this complex of capacities, not the same as any of them but related to all of them, is that activity of the soul called conscience.

Since God has thoughts, loves and hates, wills and chooses, mankind in His image has the same. Since the soul is immortal, even death cannot end these activities (see Luke 16; Rev. 6; and similar).

Theology is specially concerned with those activities of the soul called will and conscience—in the case of the former, with a proper definition and whether it is free or determined; in the case of conscience, with proper definition, its competence and its relation to the moral life of mankind.

The Will and Its Freedom

A wise theologian once said: 'In every system of theology ... there is a chapter De Libero Arbitrio [concerning free choice]. This is a question which every theologian finds in his path, and on the manner in which it is determined depends his theology, and of course his religion.'¹³ Hodge is thinking of mankind's will under the condition of sin. No one doubts everybody has the faculty of making choices and that we feel no external coercion in choosing. But whether those choices are made apart from a permanent inner disposition away from right choice is another matter.

Theologians have learned to be cautious in defining aspects, functions and powers of the soul, even as they must be careful to have regard to the normal (i.e. in living people) unity of a person's nature. Intellect, emotion and will are not faculties or organs like eyes as organs of sight or ears as organs of hearing, but activities of the whole of a person thinking (learning, knowing), feeling and choosing. Of course, we think with the mind (or soul) not our feet or hands, but there are consequences for the hands and feet. The adjective psychosomatic conveys the idea of this unity. Nevertheless the act of a person in thinking and feeling consummates in decisions resulting in actions. It is the power of the soul to decide, the 'executive faculty' of the soul which must be considered.

Some Christian Philosophical Failures

Augustine, adjusting his thoughts in relation to the pagan philosophers of his time, wrote a fair-sized book, De Libero Arbitrio Voluntatis (Concerning Free Choice of the Will). I once taught a college course in which we spent days trying to master it. Aquinas has nine articles on the will.¹⁴ Both seem quaint and strange today. Neither I nor my students felt particularly persuaded of anything. I fear our benefits were chiefly antiquarian. Neither Augustine nor Aquinas got around to an adequate definition of the problem.

Calvin's modest approach to this subject, after reading Augustine and Thomas, comes as a great relief. In raising the subject of the soul and its faculties he remarks, 'It would be foolish to seek a definition of "soul" from the philosophers' and 'I leave it to the philosophers to discuss these faculties in their subtle way.'¹⁵ He felt they all failed to give sufficient notice to effects of the fall on all the soul's 'faculties.' Then after noting Plato's thoughts on the five senses and Themistius's three appetitive faculties—will, anger and desire—he comments: 'Since I fear that they may involve us in their own obscurity rather than help us, I think they ought to be passed over.'¹⁶ I shall recommend the same for my readers and suggest 'passing over' the strange views of America's foremost theologian, Jonathan Edwards, in his Essay On the Freedom of the Will (1754) and the volumes of response it generated. His Treatise Concerning Religious Affections directly and plainly supports the views advocated here.¹⁷

A Modest Proposal

Calvin reduced the number of aspects of the soul of concern to theology to two—understanding (or intellect) and will. Of these he dealt only with will, and there only with the question of freedom of the will in a preliminary way, viz.:

Let us, therefore, hold—as indeed is suitable to our present purpose—that the human soul consists of two faculties, understanding and will. Let the office, moreover, of understanding be to distinguish between objects, as each seems worthy of approval or disapproval; while that of the will, to choose and follow what the understanding pronounces good, but to reject and flee what it disapproves¹⁸.... Choice [was] added, to direct the appetites and control the organic motions, and this makes the will completely amenable to the guidance of reason.¹⁹

He is, of course, speaking of mankind as created, not as fallen. Attention to the state of the corrupted will comes later in his treatment.

Calvinists, Arminians, and any other serious, orthodox theologians including Roman Catholics, have no necessary disagreement on the above limitation of the question, even though they disagree on the answer.

Theology is not concerned greatly with psychological processes as presently conceived. Materialistic schemes such as Watson's and Skinner's behaviorisms, which deny the existence of a 'psyche,' i.e. a soul, immortal or otherwise, have nothing really to talk about that theology has any interest in and vice versa. Psychology today, except under Christian aegis, regards people as we find them as normal mankind. The idea of the predisposition of the will to evil, by having been corrupted by a primeval fall—a depraved will, in theological language—is foreign to the 'natural man,' of any occupation or profession.

Was it possible for Adam not to sin (possere non peccare) and thereby continue in that original righteousness until confirmed and permanent? Might Adam have attained some heavenly bliss such as Enoch (Gen. 5:21–24) attained by translation and which is the prospect of all the redeemed, without sin and death? Most theologians have thought so. Calvin says it well:

In his integrity man by free will had the power, if he so willed, to attain eternal life. Here it would be out of place to raise the question of God's secret predestination because our present subject is not what can happen or not, but what man's nature was like. Therefore Adam could have stood if he wished, seeing he fell solely by his own will. But it was because his will was capable of being bent to one side or the other, and was not given the constancy to persevere [why God did not give us this constancy is not ours to inquire] that he fell so easily. Yet his choice of good and evil was free, and not that alone, but the highest rectitude was in his mind and will, and all the organic parts rightly composed to obedience, until in destroying himself he corrupted his blessings.²⁰

Later we will show that even after the fall mankind is still no automaton, acting like the beasts in response to instinct and external stimulus. People still make decisions informed by intellect and moved by feeling; they act freely in the sense of being uncoerced by God, destiny or any other necessity than their own being, which has been affected by sin in all its parts and aspects.

The ruin caused by the fall, says Gordon Clark, did not reduce [man] to the status of an irrational animal. Man is still man after the fall ... still a person ... still rational. To be sure, he acts irrationally. Yet his life is not one of instinct as is the case with animals. Sin does not eradicate the image, but it certainly causes a malfunctioning.²¹

That ruin put man's heart, the spiritual, mental, cognitive center of his being, in a perverse mode which is called depravity. He cannot be rescued except the Lord reach into his heart and turn him around. '[N]o one understands; no one seeks for God' (Rom. 3:11). Jesus said, 'No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him' (John 6:44). Fuller development of this sad theme will come shortly in connection with the doctrine of sin (Part 3 of this book).

Statements of Scripture about mankind's depraved heart refer to ordinary, garden-variety people—all of us—not to some extraordinarily degraded specimens. The following selected passages apply universally: 'Out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery,' etc. (Matt. 15:19); 'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked (Jer. 17:9 kjv); 'The Lord saw that the wickedness of man was great ... and that every intention of the thoughts [not feelings] of his heart was only evil continually' (Gen. 6:5). Paul says of this 'generic' common man that he 'does not accept [they are distasteful] the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able [emphasis added] to understand them because they are spiritually discerned' (1 Cor. 2:14). His receiving apparatus was 'fried' in Eden long ago.²²

The Conscience

Conscience²³ is a universally observed fact of human nature. All people are aware of a sense of right and wrong. They know they ought to think and do certain things and ought not to think and do others.

Very early in life everyone experiences a sense of duty. This ‘sense’ (inaccurate inasmuch as no sensation occurs) is never given a name in the Old Testament, though, without a name, the idea occurs frequently. When one thinks or does what his ‘heart’ tells him is wrong, feelings of self-accusation and ill desert arise coupled with fear of retribution; or if one does right, opposite feelings arise.

Biblical Examples of Conscience Working

The Old Testament furnishes many examples of the operation of moral sense (for want of a better name) informing the heart, with resulting self-condemnation or self-approval. Abimelech, king of Gerar, was not in fear of mere social convention when, deceived by Isaac into thinking beautiful Rebekah was unmarried, he complained, ‘One of the people might easily have lain with your wife, and you would have brought guilt upon us’ (Gen. 26:10). He is speaking of objective guilt, of doing wrong deserving of punishment. This untaught awareness of right and wrong, a ‘sense’ that one ought to do right and that punishment will follow doing wrong (cf. Gen. 12:7 and context), was at least as strong in the pagan Abimelech as in either Isaac or Rebekah. We might say that he had ‘a sense of decency.’ Abraham, earlier, had been mistaken when in an amazingly near-identical situation he shamefacedly apologized saying, ‘I thought, There is no fear of God at all in this place’ (Gen. 20:11). In the same early epoch Joseph made an appeal to the law of God written in the heart, in appealing to the wife of Potiphar (Gen. 39:9).

These cases point to several facts of human nature: first, deep conviction that some things are right, others wrong; second, a common universal awareness of what some of those rights and wrongs are; third, feelings of self-accusation when wrong is done; fourth, and conversely, of self-congratulation when right is done; and fifth, apprehension of future punishment by God when wrong is done. The worshippers of the Lord God of Israel were apparently no more in fear of an eschatological ‘judgment’ than Philistines, Egyptians, Greeks or Romans.

Writers on conscience sometimes say that the Old Testament makes nothing of this ‘innate’ conscience, but speaks only of obedience or disobedience of God who makes himself known in the written Torah.²⁴ It is of course evident to any one who has read the Old Testament that obedience and disobedience to the revealed will of God is a ruling theme. Nevertheless at the beginning of our human story both our first parents had an inner sense that they ought to obey and ought not to disobey. Furthermore, Adam and Eve sought to hide from God because they had broken His commandment and knew the consequences. This does not however explain why they felt shame at their nakedness. Here we have the first case of fallen moral being, the self, being accused by that other thing, the conscious self, hence the word con (with) science (knowledge).

Two Elements in Conscience

Two elements are involved in conscience, the ‘I’ or self which is aware of itself and that other something, indefinable, which accuses or excuses the I-self. This understanding of the subject—the I-self which has knowledge of a standard of right, which does or does not do right, in parallel with an internal witness and tribunal which truly judges—is patent in Romans 2:12–16. I quote part of the passage:

For when the Gentiles [ethnoi, heathen, nations], who do not have the law [written biblical law, or Torah], by nature do what the law requires, they are a law to themselves, even though they do not have the law. They show that the work of the law is written in their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness, and their conflicting thoughts accuse or even excuse them (Rom. 2:14–15).

Paul is not commenting on what some few extraordinarily depraved of the common run of mankind are or are not, do or not do, rather as C. A. Hodge says:

It is evident from the context.... His object is to show that the heathen world have a rule of duty [another name for conscience] written on their hearts; a fact which is not proved by some heathen obeying the law, but which is proved by the moral conduct of all men.... Men generally ... all men, show ... they have a knowledge of right and wrong.²⁵

Conscience Is Constitutional in Mankind

This knowledge, which mankind in general has, is not an induced condition but a constitutional one of what we are ‘by nature’ (Gr. physis) (Rom. 2:14). ‘The physis of anything,’ Hodge goes on to say, ‘is the peculiarity of its being, that in virtue of which it is what it is; it is that which belongs to its original constitution, and is opposed to what is taught, acquired, or made.’²⁶

Paul here introduces the word suneidēsis (Rom. 2:15), the exact Greek equivalent of our Latin-derived word, conscience. We shall later see how this word and its central meaning are employed in Scripture. Of it Hodge adds, ‘Suneidēsis is ... the inward judge, whose acts are described in the following clause: “their thoughts alternately accusing or even excusing”.... The inward monitor [= conscience] acquits or condemns, as the case demands.’²⁷ There is among all people a ‘present operation of conscience, which approves or condemns their conduct.’²⁸

All up to now has been related to what conscience is. We have noticed appearances of something like conscience in the stories of Adam, Abraham, Isaac and Joseph. We took note of awareness of a universal divine law in the souls of men, together with that monitor within the heart which brings one’s own deeds to judgment and threatens punishment. Though technically only the monitor is conscience, it is a common thing to speak of the whole of these matters as conscience.

In his book, The Voice of Conscience, A. M. Rehwinkel has written at length and well on conscience. He summarizes, in an encyclopaedia article, as follows:

Conscience is innate ... not the product of environment, training, habit or education, though it is influenced by all of these factors. As to function, conscience is threefold. (1) Obligatory. It urges man to do that which he regards as right and restrains him from doing that which he regards as wrong. (2) Judicial. Conscience passes judgment upon man’s decisions and acts. (3) Executive. Conscience executes its judgment in the heart of man. It condemns his action when, in conflict with his conviction by causing an inward disquietude, distress, shame, or remorse. It commends when man has acted in conformity with his convictions.²⁹

Professor Rehwinkel shows that Paul was perhaps more accurate even than he knew when he spoke of the natural knowledge of right and wrong and of an inward voice that approves or disapproves. He writes ‘that man by nature ... has an awareness of sin and consciousness of guilt when he violates this natural law is confirmed in an extraordinary manner in the literature of pagan nations of old.’³⁰ He then quotes at length from the Book of the Dead of ancient Egypt the confession before the god Osiris of a man at the approach of death. It goes on for thirty-five lines. Rehwinkel then moves on to ancient Babylon, quoting a ‘penitential hymn’ of similar length which reveals, he says, ‘a most remarkable knowledge of basic requirements of the universal moral law referred to by Paul, and a deep sense of guilt for having transgressed that law, not because they had offended society, but because they had sinned against God.’³¹ Then Rehwinkel turns to ancient Persia and the Vedas of ancient Hindus, where words similar to David’s penitential Psalm 51 are quoted,³² and finally to classical Greeks and Romans.³³

Near the close of this section our author summarizes with a quote from Sir William Blackstone, the eminent English jurist.

The Law of Nature, being co-equal with mankind and dictated by God Himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding over all the globe, in all countries and at all times. No human laws are of any validity if contrary to this.³⁴

But to speak precisely as ‘teachers of the Law’ and in order to understand what we do in our calling to ‘cure’ or ‘care for’ souls, let us propose the following.

How Conscience Works

A sound conscience does not legislate or discover laws for the soul. It is neither teacher nor comforter. Conscience is the monitor or judge—either of one’s own acts and thoughts, or those of others when we say their conduct offends one’s conscience.

The conscience judges on the basis of opinions, laws, norms supplied by all one’s sources throughout previous life, perhaps even innate knowledge. This explains why all people feel obligated to follow their conscience’s directives, yet one man’s conscience may direct differently from another’s in many areas. Reason and experience plus nurture have created these differences.

Yet conscience is steady and infallible in that it, with sternness, inwardly commands every person on earth to do what one is convinced is right. It is at this point that evolutionary naturalism, as in non-theistic ethics, loses its argument that conscience is wholly acquired, like the conditioned reactions and behavior of animals. No animal ever thought he ought not to steal his neighbor’s food out of bad conscience.

The idea of conscience as set forth in this chapter is deep in many narratives and moral instructions in the Old Testament, even though no word for conscience, as such, exists in biblical Hebrew. Usually the Hebrew word employed for conscience is lev, or levav (heart), as when ‘David’s heart smote him.’³⁵ The heart, or mind, or soul in which moral sensibilities reside is designated.

The word is employed thirty-three times in the New Testament and in such a way as to insure it reflects a common understanding of suneidēsis in the Greek-speaking world. Though biblical religion puts a special ‘spin’ on the word, the restraints of common grace on mankind have insured survival of the moral monitor everywhere in the Greek literature of which the New Testament is a part.³⁶ Without further effort at precise definition I offer the following as important biblical teachings about conscience.

The Conditions of the Conscience

1. Conscience is intact and operative in the unbelieving heart as well as the believing heart. The scribes and Pharisees slunk away from their encounter with the penetrating insight of Jesus, in the episode of the adulterous woman, ‘being convicted by their own conscience’ (John 8:9 kjv). And, the ‘conscience’ of the heathen ‘bears witness ... their conflicting thoughts accuse or even excuse them’ (Rom. 2:15).

2. Christian conscience should be to some degree informed and regulated by purely human ordinances. In as much as a magistrate is a ‘minister of God ... ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath [i.e. wrath of human law and civil magistrates], but also for conscience sake’ (Rom. 13:4, 5 kjv). We all live in a world where government frequently exceeds its divinely given limits by meddling with matters properly none of its business, and where (as in Europe’s Middle Ages) the rules of an established church are enforced by civil power. This chronic condition has always been and remains a source of acute distress for conscientious Christians.

At the time of the Reformation, Protestant leaders had to think through the question of what limits, if any, the Scriptures place on the submission of Christians to unrighteous demands of civil government and of church demands enforced by civil law. The most important for developments within western Europe and English-speaking America were the careful writings of John Calvin. This issue is the declared topic of a chapter of the *Institutes*³⁷ and is never quite out of sight in the entire Fourth Book of 510 pages.

Calvin’s definition is brief.³⁸ Previous discussion in the present chapter is quite compatible with it, as are most Protestant treatments. Calvin’s concern was to decide to what extent people of Christian Europe were bound ‘for conscience sake’ to obey the dictates of rulers, civil and ecclesiastical. He denies, however, that bad laws of rulers and ecclesiastics bind Christian conscience. Rulers have authority over conscience only in matters of proper jurisdiction.³⁹ ‘Human laws, whether, by magistrate or by church, even though they have to be observed (I speak of good and just laws), still do not of themselves bind the conscience. For all obligation to observe laws looks to the general purpose [‘genus’], but does not consist of the things enjoined [‘species’].’⁴⁰

This bit of Protestant scholastic casuistry has had enormous consequences in the religious and political life of Europe and America. These convictions led to the exasperated, reluctant resistance of Reformed, Presbyterian, Baptist, Quaker and other denominations against the laws of the nations of Europe and thereby to fierce wars in what was thought to be defense of liberty of conscience and of political freedom. These words were echoed in thousands of sermons in the pulpits of the thirteen U.S. colonies in the decades before July 4, 1776.⁴¹ This Protestant understanding of conscience has had and continues to have enormous consequences. How this could have happened in the supremely conservative thinking of Calvin, his disciples and successors is the story of Western history since

1536 when the Basle printers, T. Platter and B. Lasins, issued Chapter Six of the first edition of Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion. In this chapter Calvin expounded not only a biblical conception of Christian freedom of conscience but also set forth a coherent conception of 'what the relation between Church and State would be in a society inspired by the Gospel.'⁴²

This brief treatment of Calvin's thought about conscience is designed to show that a biblical conception of conscience has been and remains of inestimable import and consequences not only for both personal Christian conduct but also for community and national life wherever biblical religion is a significant factor in society.

3. A 'good conscience' (Acts 23:1) and 'pure conscience' (2 Tim. 1:3 kjv) may be defined in the words of Paul, who furnishes two-thirds of the thirty-three occurrences in the New Testament, as a conscience 'void of offense toward God' (Acts 24:16 kjv) which 'bears' one 'witness' (Rom. 9:1) as truthful and is supported by 'everyone's' conscience and even before God (2 Cor. 4:2). This was a very great comfort for the Apostle Paul, much maligned by outraged legalistic countrymen and jealous religionists. Everyone who has been falsely charged of wrong by family, friends or foes knows how comforting such a conscience is and how difficult to obtain apart from the grace of redemption.

4. A 'weak conscience' (1 Cor. 8:7, 10, 12) is unjustifiably scrupulous about matters indifferent (adiaphora), and tends to be unnecessarily offended by others who exercise Christian liberty in good conscience. This has always been a problem, especially in multicultural societies like that in ancient Corinth (see 1 Cor. 8) and Rome (see Rom. 14:1–23). It is difficult for folk truly to accept the words of Jesus, oft repeated to His disciples, that there is nothing entering into the body which defiles it, that evil has its origin in the heart not in substances. Weak consciences abound in every corner of Christendom and perhaps in some corner of every Christian soul.

5. The 'seared conscience' (1 Tim. 4:2) belongs to the person who has sinned so often and so seriously that conscience ceases to speak very loudly. The sinner sins largely undisturbed by self-accusation. He sleeps well at night after committing all his favorite sins.

6. A 'defiled conscience' (Titus 1:15) is the opposite of a pure conscience. This conscience calls good evil and evil good (Isa. 5:20, 21).

7. An 'evil conscience' in context (Heb. 10:22) appears to be simply the heart of natural man who 'does not accept the things of the Spirit of God,' to whom such things are a 'folly' (1 Cor. 2:14), 'dead in ... trespasses and sins' (Eph. 2:1), 'darkened in their understanding ... alienated ... because of ... ignorance ... hard ... of heart ... callous' (Eph. 4:18, 19).

8. The 'purged conscience' (Heb. 9:14 kjv; cf. 10:2) has been delivered by grace through justifying faith from 'evil' and 'defiled' conscience. It is the ideal of the Christian heart.

9. The Christian may expect faithfulness to God's revealed will in good 'conscience toward God' (1 Peter 2:19 kjv) will get him into trouble, in which case Christ, Himself, is his example (1 Peter 2:17–25).⁴³

10. Inconvenient and limiting in some ways as it is, true love for one's brother will direct us to limit the liberty we have in Christ out of deference to the brother (1 Cor. 10:28–33)—though we may also use our liberty to instruct the ‘weaker brother.’ He really needs to learn who is strong and who is weak. Choose the occasion carefully!

¹ John Murray, Collected Writings ii (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), pp. 14, 15.

² The ‘scripture proofs’ incorporated into the Westminster Confession were added by parliamentary directive after the Westminster Divines submitted it. This does not mean those truly conscientious biblicists had not considered the Scripture evidences first in composing the document. The initial parliamentary mandate had not clearly specified Scripture ‘proof texts.’

³ J. O. Buswell, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962), p. 237.

⁴ Charles Bridges, Exposition of Psalm CXIX, 17th ed., 1861, p. 33.

⁵ Murray, op. cit., p. 21.

⁶ Herman Schultz, Old Testament Theology II (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1892), p. 254.

⁷ ibid., p. 256.

⁸ ibid., p. 257.

⁹ ibid., p. 258.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 264.

¹¹ ibid., p. 264.

¹² Recent controversies with monism of mankind's nature as advocated by Murray Harris will be reported later in this book, in connection with Eschatology (Part 7).

¹³ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 278.

¹⁴ Aquinas, Summa Theologica I, Q82, 83.

¹⁵ Calvin, Institutes I, 15. 6.

¹⁶ ibid.

¹⁷ I am following Gordon Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man 2nded. (Jefferson, Maryland: The Trinity Foundation, 1992), pp. 79–81.

¹⁸ Calvin, op. cit., 7.

¹⁹ Calvin, op. cit., 8.

²⁰ ibid., i. 15. 8.

²¹ Clark, op. cit., p. 73.

²² See Bruce K. Waltke's article 'Heart' in EDBT, '[T]he heart plans, makes commitments, and decides. It is the inner forum where decisions are made after deliberation; here a person engages in self-talk.' See also Gordon Clark, op. cit., pp. 78–88.

²³ See Calvin, Institutes, IV, 10.3–8; Erickson 583–5; J. Rickaby, 'Conscience,' Catholic Ency. IV, 268–273.

²⁴ The well-researched article in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible on 'Conscience' (I, pp. 941–949), by L. I. Grandberg and G. E. Farley should be corrected in this regard by the brief summary in A. M. Rehwinkel's article 'Conscience' in EDT.

²⁵ Charles A. Hodge, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint 1947, 1993), pp. 54, 55.

²⁶ ibid., p. 55.

²⁷ ibid., p. 56.

²⁸ ibid., p. 57.

²⁹ A. M. Rehwinkel, 'Conscience' in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. Walter Elwell (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1984), pp. 267, 268.

³⁰ A. M. Rehwinkel, 'Conscience' in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. Walter Elwell (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1984), pp. 267, 268.

³⁰ A. M. Rehwinkel, The Voice of Conscience (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1956), p. 34.

³¹ ibid., pp. 36–38.

³² ibid., pp. 37–40.

³³ ibid., pp. 40–45.

³⁴ ibid., pp. 47, 48.

³⁵ 1 Sam. 24:5; cf 2 Sam. 24:10; 1 Sam. 25:31; 1 Kgs. 8:38.

³⁶ Maurers' article in Theological Wordbook of the New Testament VI, sunoida, suneidēsis, pp. 899–919.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

³⁷ Chapter X of Book IV, pp. 1179–1210.

³⁸ Calvin, Institutes IV, 10. 3.

³⁹ ibid., IV, 10. 5.

⁴⁰ ibid., IV, 10. 5.

⁴¹ Alan Heimert, Religion and the American Mind From the Great Awakening to the Revolution (Cambridge: Harvard Univ. Press, 1966), p. 668.

⁴² Francois Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (New York: Harper & Row, 1950, 1963), p. 112.

⁴³ Christians may protect good conscience in many social situations by not asking too many questions before responding to invitations to social gatherings (1 Cor. 10:27).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (258). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

5

The Elements of Human Nature

Introduction to the Problem

Before setting out on a quest for the origin of souls, another question must be raised, and at least tentatively resolved, whether or not 'soul' is a designation of all of mankind's non-material nature: specifically whether the invisible inner man, director of the visible outer is one aspect or two aspects, one ‘substance,’ if we may allow the word, or two. Is mankind body and soul-spirit (bipartite), or body, soul and spirit (tripartite)? This is the way the question has been put since the very beginning of reflection on a Christian doctrine of mankind.

Karl Barth has said man is body and soul, in common with all independent living creatures of earth (i.e. animals but not plants), but he has spirit also by virtue of the coming of God’s Spirit into vital union with the soul, rendering him thus a person, ego, self-conscious being. This is something more than dichotomy, something less than trichotomy. It is indeed a mixed view. Mankind is body and soul but he has spirit (not a spirit) or Spirit depending on what point of anthropology Barth is making. Paul’s dictum, ‘In him we live and move and have our being’ (Acts 17:28), together with the many texts which associate beginning and support of life with the entrance of God’s Spirit as in Psalm 104:30, are Barth’s scriptural support for this doctrine. This presence of Spirit/spirit is what renders each member of the human race different from ‘the beasts which perish’; it is the unique humanity of every human being.

One is never quite certain Barth himself would agree with this or any other summary of his doctrine, but this is how I understand his very extended statements, restatements, summaries, cautions and distinctions over the nearly 100 pages of his treatment of the elements of human nature.¹

The theory meshes with Barth’s soteriology and eschatology. For him, God has graciously taken the human race into a covenant of salvation whereby all ultimately will be saved. Therefore he has no problem with the presence of God in the ‘mode’ (Barth’s word) of Spirit residing permanently in union with every soul of man. I shall regard this view, in my further discussion, as a variety of dichotomy view, to be treated shortly, as Barth indeed shows without employing the word ‘dichotomy.’

Anthropological Monism

There are many monisms in philosophy—idealism and materialism in metaphysics as well as pantheisms of various sorts. All regard ultimate reality, the basic building blocks of the universe, as a single essence or substance. In theological anthropology this not very apt name is employed for the view that what others call soul does not and cannot exist apart from the body. Hence when the body dies the soul ceases to exist. By some it is said to sleep. This is not the same figure of speech which the Bible employs where the sleep-like posture and appearance of a corpse suggests ‘sleep.’ Jesus and Paul both employ it (John 11:11; 1 Thess. 4:13, 14).

Monism can lead to other results than soul-sleep, in older literature called psychopannychia.² The error often arises among folk who begin by fixing attention on the many texts of Scripture which do indeed speak of the normal unity of each “specimen” of our kind, then proceed by reinterpreting the doctrine of death as annihilation and non-existence or sleep until a future resurrection, a resurrection which would really be a re-creation. Passages which speak clearly of the conscious existence of the soul ‘whether in the body or out of the body’ are then wrested to support their case.

Dr. Murray Harris, in two books, Raised Immortal (Eerdmans, 1985) and From Grave to Glory (Baker, 1990), insisted on a ‘basic monism of the New Testament’ and managed the New Testament texts to teach that each believer at death immediately receives a permanent resurrection body. So there is no period of disembodiment between death and resurrection. According to this scheme apparently our earthly bodies remain in their graves forever. He supposes that after teaching a physical resurrection of believers at the future Second Advent in a very early Epistle (Gal. 4:13 ff.) Paul changed his mind and taught reception of a spiritual body, freshly created at the moment of one's death in the later Epistle (2 Cor. 5:1 ff.).³

Dr. Harris claims the names of thirty-eight modern scholars as supporting this change in Paul's teaching.⁴ I noticed few conservative scholars' names in his list. It has been reported that Dr. Harris may have reversed his opinion. He has done so on other matters of doctrine.

As we shall see, monism (the doctrine that the human soul has no existence apart from a body) is unbiblical and, if strictly adhered to, is incompatible with orthodox Christianity. Yet it can be innocently stated in connection with an undoubted truth: each individual man is truly a psychosomatic unity. If one adds the word indissoluble as in, 'Each human being is an indissoluble psychosomatic unity,' then monism is being affirmed, that is, the soul does not exist apart from the body. What is frequently meant is, each human being is normally (that is if sin and death had never introduced an abnormality into the human situation) a psycho-somatic unity. At death body and soul are rent apart. The unity is broken, the body going to death and dissolution, the soul to be in heaven or hell!

The doctrine of monism is prevalent today in liberal theologies of the Old Testament as well as in Reformation times among certain radical Anabaptists. Soul-sleep, corollary of monism among religious people, is official teaching of several Adventists sects, notably Seventh Day Adventists. An official publication sets forth the teaching in detail.⁵ The book states, 'The dust of the ground minus the breath of life yields a dead person or dead soul without any consciousness.... The elements that made up the body return to the earth from which they came.... The soul has no conscious existence apart from the body, and no Scripture indicates that at death the soul survives as a conscious entity.'⁶ I have already addressed this ancient error in a previous chapter. It is introduced here simply as one of the views of the non-material side of mankind. It has never been held by any large number of otherwise orthodox believers.

It would be a distraction from Christian theology at this point to go deeply into the question of mind-body relationships as treated in philosophy and psychology. The following summarizes what you might learn about mind-brain (body-mind) connections in a college course in Introduction to Philosophy. For strict materialists there is no problem. We are our bodies, our thoughts are electrical brain waves, energy passing through nerve cells, or like the morning star and the evening star, two ways of viewing the planet Venus. For pure idealists we and everything else in the world are pure ideas, hence no problem. The idealists and materialists think reality is of one kind of 'substance'—they are called monists. Granting the soul and body are not the same, philosophers have proposed that mind and body interact causally on one another producing both mental events and events in our bodies (Interactionism). Parallelism holds minds and bodies are not causally connected but even so are correlated in some mysterious way, running side by side. Nicholas Malebranche (1638–1715), a Catholic philosopher, proposed God Himself is the causal connection between body and mind (soul). God produces corresponding mental and physical events. When the mind wills the body to do something, on that occasion God causes the body to do it (hence occasionalism). This is not a widely held view in today's secular climate. A more popular theory today holds that while body and mind (whatever it is) are not the same, two kinds of entity, all mental occurrences have physical causes. There is no reciprocal effect. Conscious, mental processes simply accompany certain events (processes) in the neural (nerve) system—hence epiphenomenal, like the fever which accompanies an infection, the mental effects are not the main event. So this primarily medical term enters philosophy. The theologian is under no biblical obligation to adopt any of these theories, though it is useful to know about them.

Evidences of Dichotomy

Some such theories seem amenable to Christian teachings about the soul and body of mankind. The Bible says much of flesh and spirit as ethical terms, but nothing of a mode of brain-mind connections. Barth reluctantly addresses the subject of the soul's relation to the body and brain.

In one of his better passages (he says he will be brief and in a measure succeeds) Barth points out that 'the Bible actually describes the activity of the body and its organs wholly as that of the soul, or conversely, and in the same terms, the activity of its soul wholly as that of its body.'⁷ He has already made four summary points explaining how 'The human existence of the one man is that he [the man] is the soul of his body and then also the body of his soul.'⁸

In the Old Testament, Barth points out, the flesh cries out for the living God (Ps. 84:2) and that flesh does so in a dry and thirsty land (Ps. 63:1). Sometimes a person's 'bones are troubled' (Ps. 6:2), or strengthened by God (Isa. 58:11) or waste away when a person keeps silent before God (Ps. 32:3), or the bones may even rejoice (Ps. 51:8). Other parts of the individual human being stand for the whole man, body and soul. He cites bowels (Jer. 4:19; Job 30:27; Lam. 1:20) the reins (kidneys) (Jer. 11:20 kjv; Ps. 7:9 kjv; Prov. 23:16 kjv). 'More frequent and emphatic ... is the heart.'⁹ Barth thinks that these expressions are poetic, but not purely figurative. They must be understood as referring to both body and soul 'or they cannot be understood at all.'¹⁰

Barth has put his own mark here upon what is a near consensual interpretation of the biblical information. An article by V. E. Anderson and B. R. Reichenbach on the contributions of modern science to understanding human nature ends: 'One might wish that from this discussion a definitive picture of the human person might arise.' They admit failure on this point but claim their study 'does point to a number of important conclusions.' If I may be permitted to summarize: (1) both brain and genetic research have enlarged our knowledge of important formative roles played by our biological heritage; (2) this 'bottom up' approach, though somewhat fruitful, cannot give a 'complete account' of mankind without learning from a 'social science', which they characterize as top down; (3) hence, practice of medicine and other health care must be 'holistic'; (4) the scientific account of the human person is from the Christian perspective incomplete, for it fails to take account of our relatedness to God. They appeal for an approach to study of mankind which employs 'both the lenses.' The cautious authors do not seem hopeful. Agreed. We will wait and see where science leads.¹¹

Dichotomy and Trichotomy

Monism is essentially an unbiblical and un-Christian teaching. Even as explained by some early Anabaptist and presently by Seventh Day Adventist believers, it must be labeled error. H. C. Thiessen says, 'All are agreed that man has both a material and an immaterial nature. His material nature is body; his immaterial nature is his soul and spirit.’¹² Most theologians hold that soul and spirit are not two ‘parts’ but alternate names for the same, sometimes with different emphasis. This view is called dichotomy. A smaller number hold soul and spirit are not the same, i.e. distinct parts of mankind’s threefold nature. This view is called trichotomy.

Anthropological Dichotomy

The word ‘dichotomy’ is derived from the Greek word for two and the word for part. In theology it refers to the theory that complete human nature (the whole man) is composed of two and only two elements. In contrast to monists, dichotomists hold that soul or mind is not per se a function of body (brain), nor is its existence dependent on the body. In contrast to the trichotomy theory, anthropological dichotomy holds that the soul (= spirit) includes all our non-material features and qualities—emotions, intellect, i.e. both feeling and thinking, as well as choosing.

Dichotomy does not deny that human nature is normally a unity. ‘The Bible teaches us to view the nature of man as a unity, and not as a duality.’¹³ During life on this earth each person exists as a unit, not two elements, body and soul in parallel. It is the whole man who is well or sick, who is innocent or guilty, and who is alive or dead. When God created mankind, admittedly the body is represented as formed first, into which God breathed the breath of life (Gen. 2:7). When the text adds that the man ‘became a living soul’ the meaning is that man was now a living being, an animated being. That animation in his case came as a special act of his Creator so his life was not the same as other animate things (animals). The text does not mean that man is a soul which inhabits a body. True, Scripture plainly teaches that the conscious soul endures in a disembodied state after the man dies, but Jesus did not say (Luke 16:22) that the body of the beggar died and the soul lived on. He said ‘The poor man died’—the whole man died. Of course his body went to dissolution, but the Lord went on to say the beggar ‘was carried by the angels to Abraham’s bosom’ (kjv).

Jesus speaks of Lazarus in Paradise and of the rich man in Hades, each a soul without the natural body, as a person—a man, a human being. I say that my father and mother, both as persons (if not quite whole until the resurrection), are present with the Lord in heaven. But I mean something quite different when I say my parents sleep side by side in their graves in a graveyard in Yakima County, Washington.

Though it is natural to say that the body is dead while the soul lives on in heaven, of Lazarus the beggar’s case, it is more correct to say, ‘Jane Doe is dead,’ as when Jesus Himself declared of another man with the same name: ‘Lazarus has died.’ The body of Lazarus of Bethany has now long since dissolved to physical elements (for after awhile Lazarus died again); his soul endures in heaven with Christ. As long as we understand this we will not be greatly in error when we inexactly say the soul lives on after death, or even that it survives death. Jesus, Himself, seems to have suggested such (Matt. 22:33) and perhaps also Peter (1 Peter 3:18 ‘made alive in the spirit’; also rsv, asv, cf. neb).

Both dichotomists and trichotomists agree in what has just been said. Their differences are not critical, except that some have used trichotomy to support erroneous theories of original sin, of sanctification and of the two natures of Christ. These errors are not, however, inherent in trichotomism and are equally rejected by both orthodox parties.

The real enemies of trichotomy are enemies likewise of dichotomy—the anthropological monists in psychology who see nothing but a material organism in mankind, in whom all intellectual, affective and volitional elements are functions of the body (brain, neurons and the like). Gordon H. Clark has provided a succinct epitome of mind-body theories from ancient to modern times.¹⁴

It is probably impossible for faith-compelling ‘scientific’ proof ever to be produced for the existence of the human soul apart from the body. Maybe ‘honest unbelief’ is possible, but research since about 1950 may have made it less respectable. A long article in Coronet magazine (3/51) began, ‘Startling experiments are lifting a mysterious veil and confounding the skeptics.’ The experiments were by doctors treating brain-damaged or epileptic patients at the Neurological Institute in Montreal. The article summarized: ‘When everything about the brain (including all its physical and mental associations) has been explained and explored, something inexplicable remains. The surgeon can make the patient move, hear, see, have sensations and even dream dreams. But the patient never believes that he does these things of his own accord.’ By stimulating the appropriate region of the portion of the brain, exposed by surgery, with an electrode ‘The doctor can force the patient to lift his arm but he cannot make the patient will to do it ... although [the surgeon] now can probe into the brain’s deepest recesses [he], still cannot manipulate the human mind ... Scientists have begun discovery of the physical basis [instrument?] of the mind—the “seat of the soul” ... but their work does not explain the nature of the elusive spirit who seems to dwell there.’ The scientists have discovered the switchboard but the operator, who is apparently there, is still beyond their reach.

This and much further research is fully reported, along with names of the scientists and their reports, in The Mysterious Matter of the Mind by the late A. C. Custance, M.D.¹⁵ The book is very encouraging reading.

Again, dichotomy asserts that mankind’s nature is in one respect material, called body or flesh, and in another respect immaterial, called spirit or soul. Further, the immaterial aspect of mankind is one element of our being, not two.

Trichotomy as noted above holds that there are two distinct elements in our immaterial nature, soul and spirit. The soul (psuche) is the principle of our animal life, perhaps seat of the emotions, and the spirit (pneuma) is the principle of our rational life—intellect, conscience, will and similar.

As evidence that dichotomy is the better theory, I cite the following:

1. Reflection on human conscious awareness can distinguish an immaterial element and a material element in my being but not two immaterial ones. The material (body) and immaterial (soul) are always associated and interactive in this present life. I can discern that some pleasures (taste of candy) and pains (a sore throat) are more directly concerned with the material, and others with my emotional life (the pleasures of sight and sound, enjoyment of baseball), and still others with intellectual accomplishment (winning at checkers, understanding quadratic equations); but I am not aware that there is one seat of enjoyment of sight and sound and another of winning at checkers.

2. There is no two-stage in-breathing of the divine Spirit at creation, but one action (Gen. 2:7) whereby the clayish body was made a whole human being. Life from God gave the body a single added principle. Together they constitute mankind a living being. In the language of the Old Testament life and soul exchange (Job 27:3; 32:8; 33:4 and 18), indicating a possible identity intended by the language.

3. The words ‘soul’ and ‘spirit,’ not only in the English Bible but in the original texts, are frequently used interchangeably, that is, ‘so far from the nephesh [Heb.], psychē [Gr.], anima [Lat.] or soul, being distinguished from ruah [Heb.], pneuma [Gr.], animus [Lat.], or mind [or spirit] ... these words all designate one and the same thing. They are constantly interchanged ... [or] substituted ... and all that is predicated of the one ... is predicated of the other.’¹⁶ Many passages support these statements.¹⁷ This is not to say there are no exceptions.

4. The soul is assigned the very highest place in man’s nature, in no wise less capable of personal relation to God than the spirit, contrary to the trichotomist view. The Bible refers to the soul (nephesh, psyche) as the principle of life; it can be saved or lost; it goes to meet God when we die; ‘The soul is the man himself.’¹⁸ Leviticus 4:2, quoted elsewhere in Scripture, says it is the soul that sins. Everywhere in Leviticus this is so. It is for the soul that atonement is made. The soul loves God. 1 Peter 1:9, as other texts, says that the end of faith is the soul’s salvation. The list could go on. There is nothing in human nature higher, more capable of fellowship with other persons or even God than our soul.

5. To the same effect, the Bible represents body and soul, or body and spirit, or body, soul and spirit as constituting the whole person. Such is the force of Jesus’ remark regarding body and soul (Matt. 10:28), of Paul’s regarding body and spirit (1 Cor. 5:3), and again of Paul’s regarding ‘your whole spirit and soul and body’ (1 Thess. 5:23). In the last case Paul seems to be speaking non-technically, indicating the whole of each and every man, woman and child, and emphasizing the idea by repeating the idea with a different term—as Jesus did (Mark 12:30, 33).

6. A. H. Strong calls attention to passages of Scripture in which the soul is distinguished not from the human spirit but from the divine Spirit from whom the human spirit proceeded originally (to Adam) and from the body. Numbers 16:22; Zechariah 12:1; 1 Corinthians 2:11; and Hebrews 12:9 distinguish the Spirit of God from other spirits whom He has created and thereby refute emanationism or pantheism. Genesis 35:18, 1 Kings 17:21, Ecclesiastes 12:7 and James 2:26 distinguish the soul, or spirit, of man from his body and refute monism and materialism.

7. In a class by itself are references to the soul (psychē) and spirit (pneuma) of Jesus. In one of the seven sayings of Christ on the cross he cried, ‘Father, into your hands I commit my spirit [pneuma]’ (Luke 23:46) and it is said that ‘he bowed his head and gave up his spirit [pneuma]’ (John 19:30). Yet in other texts it is said he gave ‘his life [psyche] as a ransom’ (Matt. 20:28) and ‘I lay down my life [psyche] for the sheep’ (John 10:15).

Anthropological Trichotomy

Anthropological trichotomy is the view that human nature has three distinct elements or aspects: body, soul and spirit.

The view took form very early as part of efforts by the Fathers Clement of Alexandria and Origen to harmonize original sin with free will and regeneration. Clement taught that the initiative in renewal of the sinful human heart is taken by the free will of the sinner himself. Fallen man still has power to turn toward God and holiness, after which God will help him. Origen said that though God gives the faculty to will righteousness, mankind's power to use it is wholly his own, with God's help. W. G. T. Shedd comments:

To understand their theory of original sin it will be necessary first to exhibit their psychology. They subdivided the constitution of man into soma, psuche and pneuma. The first was the material part; the second included the principle of animal life, together with the sensuous appetites and passions that relate to the physical world; while the third was the rational and spiritual principle, including the will and the moral affections of human nature.¹⁹

According to these two teachers at Alexandria, the corruption of original sin inheres only in the body and sensuous parts (soul = psychē) of mankind but not his spirit (pneuma). But they thought that each spirit pre-existed from an earlier epoch and since it entered the body after conception it did not directly participate in the corruption inherent in soul and body by generation of parents. Will is seated only in the pneuma (= spirit) not in the psychē (= soul) and is free to do as the corrupt body and soul incline to or not to do. Hence, though caused to sin by corrupt body and soul, the spirit does so by free will!²⁰

Another ancient error found support in trichotomy. According to Apollinaris, Bishop of Laodicea (died about 390), Christ derived only a human body and soul (psyche) from the Virgin Mary. However, the spirit (pneuma) of Christ was not a human spirit but the eternal Word. Jesus had no human nous (mind), or pneuma (spirit), in which case our Lord was two-thirds man and one-third God—a tertium quid (a third kind of entity, neither human nor divine). Apollinaris' proposal seemed reasonable to many in a time when the 'Christological problem' occupied the attention of all the best minds in Christendom, that is, from the First Ecumenical Council (Nicea 325) to the Fourth (Chalcedon 451). Trichotomy is not rendered false because it became the vehicle for a seriously defective Christology, of course. Though regarded then and now as a 'capable and enthusiastic defender of the Nicene orthodoxy ... Apollinaris, his teachings and his followers, were condemned at Rome in 377, at Antioch in 378, by the ... Second Ecumenical Council at Constantinople in 381, and by Rome again in 382.... The Decree of Chalcedon (451) was very explicit in its rejection of Apollinarinism.'²¹

More recently, uncritical, popular anthropology has been heard to say that unsaved people have intact a living body and soul but are without a living spirit, hence incomplete until at regeneration the Holy Spirit makes the spirit alive. Ephesians 2:1, of course, is cited.

Most trichotomists of today, however, are not errorists or heretics. On the basis of Paul's references to natural man (psychikos), carnal man (sarkikos) and spiritual man (pneumatikos) in 2 Corinthians 2:14–3:4 and 1 Thessalonians 5:23 (which says, may 'your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless' kjv) a threefold nature of mankind is posited. A supporting text is Hebrews 4:12 which speaks of God's word as 'piercing to the division of soul and spirit' (rsv). Yet, the verse does not say soul and spirit are separated, but penetrated. Soul and spirit are in apposition here. Mark 12:30, where heart, soul and mind indicate not three immaterial parts of human nature but simply one's innermost being, is cited by opponents of such an interpretation of these texts.

Most theologians agree that there is a higher aspect or activity of mankind's immaterial, invisible nature, the rational aspect which is 'receptive of the Spirit of God' (Alford on Heb. 4:12), and lower aspect which he has in common with animals. Like animals, which also are conscious, though not self-conscious, man has many appetites for which the organ of expression is the body. Unlike animals he is a self-conscious person, is attracted to 'goodness, beauty and truth,' and has personal attributes and functions by virtue of being in the image of the Person who created him. It is not unbiblical to call the lower 'part' soul or soulish (psychikos) and the higher, spirit or spiritual (pneumatikos). Yet soul and spirit, as frequently used interchangeably, do not designate two parts of mankind's invisible nature.

I am partially obliged to A. H. Strong for suggesting six reasons, aside from the main theological considerations, for regarding trichotomy as untenable.

- Pneuma as well as psychē is used of the brute creation, even of fish (Rev. 3:21; 16:3).
- Psychē is ascribed to Jehovah (Amos 6:8, Heb. 'by his soul'; Isa. 42:1; Jer. 9:9; Heb. 10:38).
- The disembodied (righteous) dead are called psychoe, souls (Rev. 6:9; 20:4).
- The highest exercises of religion are attributed to the psychē (Mark 12:30; Luke 1:46; Heb. 6:18, 19; James 1:21).
- To lose the psychē is to lose all (Mark 8:36, 37).

Passages relied on to support that soul and spirit are two parts of our immaterial aspect may be better explained not to indicate that the soul and spirit are two distinct substances or parts, but to designate the immaterial aspect of mankind's being from different points of view.

¹ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics iv (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936, 1975), pp. 344–436.

² The young Calvin wrote a book in refutation of 'soul sleep,' Psychopannychia, available in English (Calvin Trails, trans. H. Beveridge, Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1851, which I found valuable in refuting the error in present forms of what in the sixteenth century was regarded as an 'Anabaptist error').

³ Murray Harris, Raised Immortal (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985) p. 98.

⁴ ibid., p. 255, note 2.

⁵ Seventh-Day Adventists Believe (Hagerstown, MD: Review & Herald, 3rd printing, 1989), chap. 7, 'The Nature of Man.'

⁶ ibid., pp. 352, 353.

⁷ Barth, Church Dogmatics iii, 2, p. 435.

⁸ ibid., p. 432.

⁹ ibid., p. 435.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 435.

¹¹ Anderson and Reichenbach, 'Imagined through the Lens Darkly: Human Personhood and the Sciences' in Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, 33, 2, June, 1990, pp. 197–213.

¹² H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949), p. 225.

¹³ G. C. H. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962), p. 192.

¹⁴ In 'A Philosophical Appendix,' Gordon H. Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man, 2nd ed. (The Trinity Foundation, 1992), pp. 88–95.

¹⁵ A. C. Custance, The Mysterious Matter of the Mind (Grand Rapids: Zondervan and Probe Ministries, Int'l, Richardson, TX 75080, 1980), p. 105.

¹⁶ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 48.

¹⁷ Examples are Gen. 41:8; cf. Ps. 42:6; John 12:27; cf. 13:21; Matt. 10:28; cf. 27:50; Heb. 12:23; cf. Rev. 6:9.

¹⁸ op. cit., p. 48.

¹⁹ W. G. T. Shedd, A History of Christian Doctrine II (Minneapolis: (Klock & Klock Christian Publ., reprint 1978), pp. 34, 35.

²⁰ ibid., p. 34.

²¹ J. L. Neve, A History of Christian Thought, vol. I (Philadelphia: The Muhlenburg Press, 1946), pp. 126, 127.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (268). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

The Origin of the Soul

There is a certain irony in the appearance of this topic in a book of systematic theology, for all theologians agree the Bible says little or nothing direct and specific about how human beings acquire their souls. Yet a quick check of some seventy volumes of systematic and biblical theology within reach shows that most who treat biblical anthropology have a section on this subtopic and several have extensive discourses on ‘the origin of the soul’! An interesting major exception is John Calvin, who was somewhat impatient of any discussion of the subject of the origin of souls (see below).

Shedd (1888) devotes 132 pages advocating Traducianism; Barth (1951) has hundreds of pages, expounding an existentialist metaphysic with an act-of-God formula for body-soul-spirit connection; Aquinas (thirteenth century) devotes 142 pages of the Summa Theologica anthropology and later six pages to a creationist doctrine of the origin of human souls since Adam—and so on.¹ Thomas Aquinas is the only theological writer I have encountered who labeled ‘heretical’ the view that human souls are derived from human parents. Granted his premises, of course, he was correct.

The subject can be slighted but not quite ignored. Why? Because of the inextricable connection of the origin of the soul with the doctrines of inborn, or original sin, together with a proper understanding of imputation of Adam’s guilt for sin to all people and the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to all who believe, i.e. to the elect. The precise connections will appear more plainly when those topics are discussed later.

In previous chapters we have treated the existence of the human soul as a distinct, identifiable immaterial substance normally joined to the body, but the origin of souls, whether by natural generation (procreation) by the parents from generation to generation or by special divine creation, the only proposals compatible with biblical Christianity, is quite another question, yet to be addressed. It must be addressed before the question of imputation of sin may be logically addressed.

If the substance of my soul was present in Adam, if the substance of Adam’s soul was passed on to me by natural generation, then I participated in Adam’s fall and all the results of it really and therefore I am guilty of his sin by participation in it. When theologians use ‘really’ and ‘real’ of our presence in Adam’s nature and participation in his probation and fall they are not thereby pledged to philosophical realism in the question of the status of universals. One can take any view of that and still affirm natural, seminal or real existence of the human nature we each possess in Adam.

On the other hand, if God creates each soul individually at natural conception or birth it apparently becomes sinful by the effect of union with a corrupt (depraved) body not by immediate participation in Adam’s sin. In such a case the guilt of Adam’s sin is imputed to me because God counted the whole race in Adam and therefore God imputes Adam’s sin with all its results to me. I was not there except by representation. In the first view (Traducianism) Adam was my seminal or natural ‘head’; in the second (creationism) my federal or covenant head (representative or federal view).

Views of the Origin of Individual Human Souls

Roman Catholic theologians, who always like to start with the patristic age, have slightly different names for the views, providing a somewhat more specific analysis than the Protestant nomenclature does. Ludwig Ott speaks of (1) Pre-existentialism, (2) Emanationism, (3) Creationism and (4) Traducianism.

1. Pre-existentialism

Pre-existentialism teaches that souls exist even before connection with physical bodies—according to Plato and Origen, from all eternity—and are exiled in bodies, as a punishment for moral defect.² He points out it was condemned by synods in 543 and 561. See Denzinger in Sources of Catholic Dogma.³ Orthodox Christianity in all its branches shook off this pagan outlook in the fourth century and has never again been overcome by it. Passages of Scripture which specifically renounce such a view are Genesis 1:31, which pronounces the first man ‘good’—in soul and body; Romans 5:12, which says sin entered the world through the disobedient act of our first parents; and Romans 9:11, which says of Jacob and Esau that while in their mother’s womb they had not yet done either good or evil. For biblically oriented Christians this idea is scarcely more than a curiosity—more related to the pagan Greek metempsychosis and Hindu samsara (reincarnation) than Christian revelation.

2. Emanationism

Emanationism is Ott’s word. Protestants know of it but usually make no mention of it. Barth is an exception. He says: ‘According to this doctrine the human soul is an efflux or emanation of the divine substance. It is not a creature, but of divine substance.’⁴ In the present time, when Eastern pantheistic religions are competing for the minds of Christians, it is important to know that there were ancient Gnostic and Manichaean sects, renounced by the undivided church, which taught that every human being is an emanation out of God (not a creation by God). Mystical extremes among Christians throughout our history have veered toward that error. Catholic mystics seeking the ‘beatific vision’ of God have yielded ground toward it. Modern ‘New Age’ religion revels in it.⁵

3. Creationism

According to this view ‘the soul of the child is created by the immediate agency of God.’⁶ The important word is ‘immediate,’ for Traducianists hold that God creates children mediately through human parents by procreation. Though a leading contender for this view, Hodge closes his remarks in a way quite amenable to Traducianism: ‘Creationism does not necessarily suppose that there is any other exercise of the immediate power of God in production of the soul, than such as takes place in the production of life in other cases.’⁷ He admits that ‘since the origin of souls is not clearly revealed in Scripture’ certainty cannot be attained. Yet creationism becomes pivotal to much Hodge later has to say about imputation of Adam’s sin to the race in a succeeding chapter. His Scripture ‘proofs’ of creationism are brief and inconclusive though he thinks their trend is ‘against traducianism and in favor of creationism.’⁸

Though many Reformed theologians tend to favor creationism (as more amenable to an emphasis on the idea of covenant of grace and the ‘federal headship’ of Adam) Calvin himself seems less than decisive. His comments are very precise in his discussion of the seat of original sin and its transmission.⁹ He is somewhat impatient with emphasis on the problem: ‘Who should worry about the derivation of the soul when he hears that Adam had received for us no less than for himself those gifts which he lost.’ Though not all agree in my opinion, it seems to me that the rest of the section leaves Calvin uncommitted to any theory of the origin of the soul.¹⁰ The older Augustine ended up the same way, even though the younger Augustine was Traducianist. Luther was aware of the state of the problem though ultimately inclined to ‘Augustine’s theory of Traducianism.’¹¹ Lutheran theologians generally are Traducianists. F. Pieper lists the subject of the soul’s origin among ‘open questions.’¹²

Theologians who distinguish very severely between God's acts of creation (which ended on the seventh day of the creative week) and His continuing work of providence, tend to be Traducianists, as, e.g. A. H. Strong¹³ and, very interestingly, Gordon Clark, who says, 'Traducianism is well nigh inescapable.'¹⁴ Clark digests Shedd's overwhelming biblical argument for Traducianism and declares it a winner over C. A. Hodge's 'poor showing.'¹⁵ But Luther does not make that strong a distinction, hence, 'He who made man out of the ground also creates men to this day from the blood of the parents.'¹⁶ This is Traducianism.

Arguments for creationism are not complicated.

1. Ott (Roman Catholic) says creationism 'is intimated in Ecclesiastes 12:7: "The spirit returns to God who gave it," ... and Hebrews 12:9 (distinction between fathers of the flesh and the Father of Spirits = God).' In Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma Ott also cites the apocryphal Wisdom 15:11. C. Hodge would add Zechariah 12:1, God forms 'the spirit of man within him'; Isaiah 42:5, 'God ... giveth breath to the people ... and spirit'; Numbers 16:22, 'God of the spirits of all flesh,' i.e. spirits of people's bodies.¹⁷ Berkhof and other creationists rely on the same texts, of which Hebrews 12:9 is by far the strongest as F. Delitzch, a Traducianist, asserts in his Commentary on Hebrews (loc. cit.).

2. Creationism 'is clearly far more consistent with the nature of the human soul than Traducianism.'¹⁸ Creationists claim that the soul, being immaterial, is also simple and indivisible (Hodge and Berkhof). God can create such new souls, but Traducianists must, according to Hodge and Berkhof, admit separation out from the substance of Adam's soul if their spirits are generated (procreated) by parents. Aquinas agrees similarly.¹⁹ Shedd, who has produced perhaps the most persuasive and voluminous arguments for Traducianism, agrees as to the fact: 'Generation in the Godhead admits no abscission or division of substance; but generation in the instance of the creature implies separation of essence. A human person is an individualized portion of humanity.'²⁰ He obviously thinks this is no obstacle to Traducianism. No one knows precisely how our bodies (complex) are separated out in seminal substance from the substance of our parent's bodies. Recent discoveries about cells, genes and DNA, and the like still do not tell us how, hence they provide no advance useful to a theology of the origin of souls.

3. Creationists point out that they have no problem explaining our Lord's sinless human nature, for sin of nature belongs to soul not body. If God created the human soul of Jesus de novo, it was obviously sinless and remained so, but creationists must be embarrassed by the fact that they cannot explain how immediately created souls of the rest of the human race are invariably sinful. Both Hodge and Berkhof (I cite them as representative evangelical creationists) both acknowledge the difficulty. Traducianists almost invariably account for our Lord's sinless soul and uncorrupt body by the miraculous conception in the virgin, without a human male parent, by a sancification of the human nature of Christ in the womb. Further, if, as creationists must say, all human souls invariably become sinful as result of union with bodies generated by Adam's fallen physical nature, why was not the same true in Christ's case? A miracle must be assumed in the case either of Traducianism or creationism.

4. Thomas Aquinas is the only author ancient, medieval or modern known to me, who declares Traducianism heretical. The heart of his reasoning is this: 'Since it [intellectual soul] is an immaterial substance it cannot be caused through generation, but only through creation by God. Therefore to hold that the intellectual soul is caused by the begetter, is nothing else than to hold the soul to be non-subsistent [i.e. not independently existent], and consequently to perish with the body. It is therefore heretical to say that the intellectual soul is transmitted with the semen.’²¹ So, the Angelic Doctor thought ‘generationism’ (his name for Traducianism) no possible orthodox alternative because it led to what we might today call behaviorism, the psychological theory of Watson and Skinner. Of course, neither the ancient Traducianism of Tertullian and the early Augustine nor that more recently held by Shedd and Strong and others even remotely endorsed anything like the materialism Aquinas feared. Science can now describe the development of infant bodies in the womb but has no information as to ultimate causes, much less their souls! ‘As you do not know the way the spirit comes to the bones in the womb of a woman with child, so you do not know the work of God who makes everything’ (Eccles. 11:5).

4. Traducianism

All human beings are in every respect a ‘kind’ or ‘species’ of living being and like every other sort of species of sexually-propagated living beings, the species was created whole in its first pair and propagated by them and successively by their progeny. Traducianism affirms that every human being is a divinely created being in the sense of mediate creation—God creating through human parents. God’s creative power is employed in the beginnings of all life in nature, as Psalm 104:14–30 proclaims, climaxing in the words, ‘When you send forth your Spirit, they are created.’ When God hides His face, ‘they are dismayed; when you take away their breath, they die and return to their dust’ (v. 29). But in every case of such beginning of life in ‘man or beast’ God’s power is effected in the parent-medium. We do not know how God’s power is extended to or effected in the parent, to produce offspring any more than we know how, having created the worlds, His power now sustains them in their places by His invisible forces. ‘The laws of nature are the habits of God.’ Throughout human history and to the present moment no one has yet quite figured out what any kind of natural life is, much less exactly how living human souls originate.

Traducianism need not affirm that either the body or the soul of the parents or body and soul together generate the child’s soul. It seems almost impious to ask. It seems to be true that while every human body has parts, the soul is simple, having no parts. In such a case no one can know how separation of a part could take place. On the other hand neither do we know how generation of the body of a child takes place. We know about sperms, ova, gonads, wombs, birth canals and similar but no one has a clue as to what the life is which is previous to conception or afterward. Generation of souls is scarcely more mysterious. Perhaps human ‘life’ is the soul. If so, the biblical terms would harmonize perfectly, as any one familiar with the Hebrew and Greek vocabulary of human nature knows. The translations reflect it.

Biblical evidences supporting this view of the matter will be presented here: first, as the natural sense of the Genesis narrative; secondly, as indicated by the use of the words for man; thirdly, as indicated by the ‘building’ of woman out of man; fourthly, taking account of texts which seem to forbid creation ex nihilo of human souls; and fifthly, considering other texts that relate to the origin of human souls and that can be explained best by mediate creation, that is Traducianism.

1. Supported by the natural sense of the Genesis narrative. The creation of mankind climaxes a narrative wherein every living thing in the waters was to reproduce ‘after their kind,’ likewise every ‘winged fowl’ and every beast of the land and domestic animal ‘after their kind.’ In each case no one doubts the whole living creature in each offspring was to be completely the procreated offspring of its parents. Creation first of man, male, then of man, female comes precisely at the climax of that movement of the narrative, with the command to ‘be fruitful and multiply.’ It would be assumed by any one who reads on that the same would be the case, notice to the contrary lacking. The same fully ‘after their kind’ in every respect would be assumed to be the case when in obedience to the command to be fruitful, it is said ‘And [connecting with previous narrative] Adam knew Eve his wife, and she conceived, and bare Cain’ (Gen. 4:1 kjv). It is plain Eve was aware that God was the effecting power of the procreation (mediate creation), for she said, ‘I have gotten a man from the Lord’ (kjv). Genesis 5:1–3 carries the plain fact further when it says that God created man (generic, adham) ‘in the likeness of God,’ and that they, male and female, were called man (adham, generic man), and then that ‘When Adam had lived for 130 years, he fathered a son in his own likeness.’ Should we suppose that what Adam and Eve brought forth was half created de novo by God, utterly apart from their own procreative powers implanted in the first place by their Creator, God? I think not.

2. That man was created a species, that the species included the male and the female and was commanded as a species to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:26–28), indicates clearly (the contrary absent) that every aspect of the species in the two parents would be replicated in the offspring, both body and soul. As already noted, adham, man in Genesis 1:26 (‘Let us make man’) and Genesis 1:27 (‘So God created man’) is without the article, indicating not a specific individual named Adam, but the race of mankind. When God ‘formed’ man of the dust (2:7) it is the same.

3. The species was in the first male (not yet called Adam). The woman (in Hebrew, ‘female man’) is drawn completely from the man. It is ‘the man,’ adham without the article (2:22), from whom a rib was taken and from whom the Lord God made a woman (2:22). Then ‘the man’ said ‘she was taken out of Man’ (2:23).

The Hebrew word for ‘made’ is bona, occurring over 300 times in the Old Testament and is almost invariably rendered build, built, building and the like, usually with employment of appropriate materials—wood, stone, brick and similar. Here God took the materials from the human specimen already created and this time built (not created) another specimen. I shall not here address the question if the female element of the species was present in Adam previous to the forming of Eve.

We must emphasize that the Greek New Testament even more distinctly affirms that man is a species, and that the common designation, anthrōpos, designates the race, composed of both males and females. And, further, it must be acknowledged that the most primitive and pervasive designation of that in all Germanic languages, including English, is simply man(n).

It seems to this writer that it takes some shading of evidence from sincere convictions drawn from another quarter of doctrine to suppose that adham and anthrōpos (whence ‘anthropology’) ever means just man’s body to the exclusion of his soul.

4. We may grant to creationism that a creationist interpretation might be placed on the passages cited above where begetting, conceiving and bearing children are the subject. I do not know any evangelical creationists whom one would accuse of wresting Scripture in this connection. Is it possible that when it is said that Eve became ‘the mother of all living’ and that Adam ‘fathered a son in his own likeness’ the natural propagation was only of the bodies of offspring? That such is not the case is contrary, we think, the following texts of Scripture show.

Romans 1:3 (kjv) states that our Lord ‘was made of the seed of David according to the flesh.’ In this case, as in John 1:14, ‘the Word became flesh,’ flesh designates the whole human nature of Christ, body and soul. He ‘was made’ renders the verb ginomai, meaning ‘to become.’ It refers not to ex nihilo creation but in this case to conception and birth as in the nativity stories. Jesus’ entire human nature therefore, body and soul, ‘became,’ through the virgin mother, seed of David. The passage does not even hint that His human soul was created ex nihilo by God.

Hebrews 12:9, often claimed in support of immediate creation of the soul, really supports Traducianism. The verse reads, ‘we have had fathers of our flesh ... and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live?’ (kjv). Is this contrasting human males as fathers of our material nature and God as Father of our immaterial nature? Quite to the contrary. Note it is not said God is Father of our spirits, but simply of spirits. The argument is from the less to the greater to encourage reverence toward God. So the author is arguing that if we revere the lesser earthly parents of our humanity we surely should revere the greater universal heavenly Father-God of all spirits. The manner of generating parts of human nature is not even under consideration.

Other passages seem to imply quite direct, human, parental generation of the complete human nature of all offspring, i.e. Traducianism.

Genesis 46:26 (kjv) refers to the ‘sons of Jacob’ who migrated to Egypt as ‘All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, that came out of his loins.’ ‘[S]ouls’ is plural (here) of nepshesh with kol, ‘All,’ and means not soul in any narrow sense, as all agree, but is about equivalent to ‘the whole people’—seventy plus or minus of them. The passage simply and without sophistication means that these people as such (the wives are not included) came out of Jacob’s genital organs—not by Jacob’s soul. No metonymy seems intended, though of course it is possible.

Hebrews 7:10 (kjv) and context argues for the superiority of Melchisedec’s priesthood over that of the sons of Aaron by pointing out that Aaron’s tribal eponym, Levi, was ‘yet in the loins of his father [Levi], when Melchisedec met him [Abraham].’ That reverence which Abraham (Levi and Aaron being in his generative organs) paid with ‘tithes of all’ (Gen. 14:20) to Melchisedec was not of mere physical posture (bowing or prostrating the body) but an act of spiritual worship of ‘God Most High, Possessor of heaven and earth’ (Gen. 14:19). One may scoff at the logic, if he wishes, of the notion that Aaron and his sons were, as to their souls, seminally present in Abraham’s genital apparatus, but it is nevertheless the argument of the passage.

In Jeremiah 1:5 the initial divine summons of the prophet announces, ‘Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you; I appointed you a prophet.’ Almost every devout scholar on record says this means that Jeremiah’s tender heart impelled him to plead with his people with earnest tears; likewise his steadiness of purpose and courage, which enabled him to denounce kings, and generals, and priests and scholars, were formed by God in Jeremiah’s soul in the gestation process in his mother. God knew him and consecrated him, but his parents procreated him, body and soul. All his ancestors had a part in generating the soul of the weeping prophet. Similar remarks could be made regarding Paul's birth. God, says Paul, 'set me apart before I was born, and ... called me by his grace' (Gal. 1:15). Those qualities, which by heredity were part of Paul's nature, equipping him for apostolic missionary evangelism, were apparently not created ex nihilo but passed on to him from all his ancestors. Characteristics dominant or recessive from each mother and father back through the countless generations to our first parents came to manifestation again in the lively hearts, minds, souls and spirits of Jeremiah of Anathoth and Saul of Tarsus. Divine power working in providence 'created' the souls of the prophet and the Apostle as the same providence does for us all. These usual inferences were heard often of old from expository pulpits, no less from creationist pulpits than Traducianist, but more consistently, I think, from the latter.

I will close this treatment of the origin of human souls with some general remarks.

1. The origin of the soul became important to Calvinists persuaded of 'covenant theology.' In this system the ground of imputing Adam's sin to us is usually explained as the same as ground of imputing our sins to Christ—by the representative principle. Christ, though without sin, became our representative in bearing guilt and punishment as our representative in our place. So the sin of Adam our representative is imputed to us. Even though we were not in Eden we were there in the divine mind. We stood or fell with our 'federal head,' not because we were really there but because our representative was.

In this system the natural (seminal) presence of us all in Adam may be acknowledged, but if important, it is so only as making representation more appropriate. If our souls are drawn from Adam by genetic connection through the 'nature' then we were really present in Adam not merely representatively. Our soul-substance is then 'condemned already' naturally from the moment of conception. In federal-creationist theory the soul is not derived from Adam's substance, but created by God at conception. How souls become corrupt is therefore something of a mystery. In any case, say the federal theologians, they are culpable and guilty because they are counted so in their representative. So the parallel of covenant theology is preserved: the soul is guilty of sin the same way Christ on the cross was—by representation. Christ for us, Adam for us.

Calvin, himself, remained purposely naive on this subject. He roundly condemned the notion that human creation was by emanation out of God (a view by some called Traduction).²² But Calvin also clearly implies a Traducian origin of our souls in an important passage. I refer to his discussion of what the editor of the Westminster Edition of the Institutes captions, 'Original Sin defined as depravity of nature which deserves punishment.'²³ He modestly declines a judgment on previous writers and says that 'it appears' to him 'original sin is a hereditary depravity and corruption of nature, diffused into all parts of the soul.' Calvin goes on to 'note,' and I quote:

First, we are so vitiated and perverted in every part of our nature that by this great corruption we stand justly condemned and convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocence, and purity. And this is not liability for another's transgression. For, since it is said that we became subject to God's judgment through Adam's sin, we are to understand it not as if we, guiltless and undeserving, bore the guilt of his offense but in the sense that, since we through his transgression have become entangled in the curse, he is said to have made us guilty. Yet not only has punishment fallen upon us from Adam, but a contagion imparted by him resides in us, which justly deserves punishment. For this reason, Augustine, though he often calls sin ‘another’s’ to show more clearly that it is distributed among us through propagation, nevertheless declares at the same time that it is peculiar to each. And the apostle himself most eloquently testifies that ‘death has spread to all because all have sinned’ (Rom. 5:12). That is, they have been enveloped in original sin and defiled by its stains. For that reason, even infants themselves, while they carry their condemnation along with them from the mother’s womb, are guilty not of another’s fault but of their own. For, even though the fruits of their iniquity have not yet come forth, they have the seed enclosed within them. Indeed, their whole nature is a seed of sin; hence it can be only hateful and abhorrent to God. From this it follows that it is rightly considered sin in God’s sight, for without guilt there would be no accusation.²⁴

Calvin herein affirms the essential feature of Traducianism: that a ‘contagion imparted from him [Adam] resides in us, which justly deserves punishment.’ This is not representation but participation, not federal headship and not quite affirmation of ‘real presence’ but certainly ‘seminal presence.’

The great systematizer of scholastic Calvinism was Francis Turretin (1623–1687).²⁵ Turretin hedged on the subject. Though immediate creation of souls favored his system, as Shedd points out he ‘vibrates’ from preference for creationism to grudging acknowledgement of Traducianism: ‘Both theories are in his system, and are found in conflict.’ ‘Turretin defines Adam as the “stem, root, and head of the human race” ... (IX. ix. 23) but qualifies this by saying he was so “not only physically and seminally, but morally and representatively.” But a representative proper could not be denominated the stem, root, and head of his constituents.’²⁶

Dr. J. O. Buswell was a late twentieth-century evangelical Presbyterian and admirer of the Hodges. In his survey of teaching on the origin of the soul in the theology of his Calvinist Augustinian antecedents (Augustine, the Hodges, Warfield—he seldom mentions Shedd in his writing) and relating the same to the birth of Christ, he pushes all supposed arguments aside and concludes by taking note of ‘the perfect uniformity and regularity of the arrival of a soul whenever a human life begins to be.’ He then observes, ‘[W]e usually ascribe the results [in other matters] to the secondary forces which God has created and which He maintains by His providence. For this reason only, I am inclined toward the traducian view.’²⁷ Gordon Clark digests Shedd’s overwhelming biblical argument for Traducianism and declares it a winner over C. A. Hodge’s poor showing.²⁸

G. C. H. Berkouwer’s treatment (the latest prominent European Dutch Reformed theologian to publish his views extensively) comprises a lengthy chapter. He concludes that we should simply reject the dilemma. I finished this part of his book, Man, The Image of God,²⁹ with disgust and I wrote, ‘This chapter as many previous in this book leads nowhere. Problems are stated, views presented, some biblical evidence set forth but no attempt at synthesis. Shall we just give up on theology and write mystery or enigma after the title to each division. The mind of thoughtful people will not rest where Berkouwer leaves him.’

Finally, in his recent, quality systematic theology text, Robert Reymond is equally disaffected by

Berkouwer's cop-out, denouncing it as 'reductionist ... unscriptural and cannot be safely followed.'³⁰ Reymond's reasons for favoring the Traducianist view are, like Buswell's, not complicated: (1) the Bible throughout 'appears' to assume it; and (2) it solves the problem best.³¹

In concluding this chapter, I add (among other reasons for commitment to the tradutionary origin of souls): it satisfies the requirements of Romans 5:12–19, where the problem of original sin comes to focus. This will be discussed in the next section of this book, concerning hamartiology, or, the doctrine of sin.

¹ Aquinas, Summa Theologica, trans. by the English Dominican Province (Westminster, MD: Christian Classics, 1911, 1981), Q 118, art. 2.

² Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, 4th edition (Rockford, IL: TAN Books, 1954, 1974), p. 99.

³ Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma (St. Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954, 1957), pp. 203, 236.

⁴ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics III (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936), pp. 572, 573.

⁵ A footnote in the Westminster ed. of Calvin's Institutes (Calvin, Institutes I, p. 249, note 10) calls this view 'Traducianism, by which Adam's soul is regarded as bearing an element transmitted from the divine essence and as the source of all human souls.' Such use of 'Traducianism' can be defended etymologically, but in ordinary theological discourse emanationism and Traducianism are poles apart in meaning. Perhaps the note itself is in error. I know of no confirmation of such employment of 'Traducianism' except in this note.

⁶ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology ii (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, repr. 1970), p. 70.

⁷ ibid., p. 76.

⁸ ibid., p. 71.

⁹ Calvin, Institutes II, 1. 7.

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 160.

¹² Francis Pieper, Church Dogmatics i (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 94.

¹³ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 493–497.

¹⁴ Gordon Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man (The Trinity Foundation, 1992), p. 53.

¹⁵ 15 50

¹⁴ ibid., pp. 45–52.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 88.

¹⁷ C. Hodge, op. cit., pp. 70, 71.

¹⁸ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint 1979), p. 199.

¹⁹ Aquinas, Summa Theologica I, Q 118, art. 2.

²⁰ W. G. T. Shedd, A History of Christian Doctrine ii (Minneapolis: Klock & Klock Christian Publ., 1978), p. 434 footnote.

²¹ Aquinas, op. cit., 118.2.

²² Calvin, Institutes I, 15.5, note 15, Westminster Ed., 1960, p. 191.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

²³ ibid., ii, 1.7, p. 250.

²⁴ ibid., p. 251.

²⁵ Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, 3 vols. trans. G. M. Geiger (Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1991).

²⁶ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1969), pp. 36, 37.

²⁷ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion i (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962, 1971), p. 252.

²⁸ Gordon Clark, The Biblical Doctrine of Man, pp. 45–52.

²⁹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962).

³⁰ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson, 1998), p. 425.

³¹ ibid., pp. 424, 425.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (275). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

In this chapter our inquiry relates to the external situation into which God placed the first human pair, what their capacities were for coping with that situation (call it environment, if you will, without current distortions of meaning) as given by their Creator. Again, to borrow from the current jargon, we mean original human ecology.

I had been thumbing English dictionaries and the lexicons of three or four foreign languages for twenty-five years, when in about 1964 my youngest brother told me his MSc degree at Oregon State University was to be in ecology—plant ecology, yet I had to ask him what the word meant. Older theology texts do not use the expression ‘human ecology,’ but as of now, original human ecology is precisely the subject of much of this chapter if not quite the name for it.

The Literary Genus of the Source

We must begin with a few sentences about how the narrative of the first three chapters of Genesis should be understood. What kind of literature is it? This has always been a matter of minor difference of opinion among those who profess biblical religion, whether as in ancient Judaism or in Christianity. Most believers have understood the early chapters of Genesis in a straightforward manner right up to the present moment. This allows for the presence of undefined figurative elements, as in all normal verbal intercourse, but within a literal, factual framework.

The Hermeneutical Approach

Briefly I hold that the literary form (Lat. genus; French genre) of the biblical creation account would have been one that those of the time who heard it read would have recognized as existing in the polytheistic culture of their time. The beliefs about origins in the pagan religions of Syria and Assyria-Babylonia were couched in narratives about the crude and licentious escapades of their supposed gods and goddesses. These tales came to clear light only in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It is to be expected that these forms of literature, some of the literary devices, forms and motifs, would be employed in the Hebrews' account.

Let me support that statement with analogy from the rest of the Bible. Those versed in the Greek literature of the Apostles' time point out that the forms of Epistles (Romans to Jude) follow the forms of epistolary literature of the time, whereas the Gospels, though unique, teach ‘religion’ through narrative, as many other religions did. The Psalms are now known to employ poetic forms, devices and vocabulary that are identical in detail with religious poetry of the ancient Phoenicians. Exploration of the Ras Shamra literature of the official religion of Ugarit in coastal Syria has vastly enriched our understanding of the book of Psalms. Psalm study will never be the same again since the publication of Mitchell Dahood's three volumes (Anchor Bible) wherein every page brings to bear some linguistic or structural light from Ugaritic poetry and psalmody. Nineteenth-century translation of Egypt's hieroglyphs turned up the striking fact that the some of the proverbs of the Old Testament were similar in form and in content—except for the Yahwist monotheism. It came as a surprise to learn that the various sacrifices prescribed by Leviticus are matched by similar forms of sacrifice in surrounding religion and similarly some of the functions of priests and prophets and kings. The Life and Times Historical Reference Bible, annotated by thirteen competent and believing historical and linguistic scholars, helps the reader understand the Bible in its historical setting by pointing out innumerable instances—not borrowing from heathen religious writing as such but simply employing the language, its idioms and the culture, in which writers, readers and ‘those who hear’ (Rev. 1:3) were at home.¹ If we call the heathen stories myths, says Gordon J. Wenham,

In all these cases there is no simple borrowing by the Hebrew writer. It would be better to suppose that he has borrowed [employed] various familiar mythological motifs, transformed them, and integrated them into a fresh and original story of his own.²

Finally, W. H. Griffith-Thomas comments: ‘[I]f by myth is meant a form of picturesque teaching suited to the childhood of the world, it may be said that even if myth in form, its underlying teaching and details must be true to fact. Even parabolic teaching pre-supposes facts which correspond to the symbol used.’³

The scope of the present book does not entertain extended debate on the subject. This author’s views have been presented earlier. It is, however, necessary to make clear how much we do not share with what goes for systematic theology in writings currently popular. The following quotation from Robert C. Denton, a plain-spoken source puts in simple language what writers such as Brunner, Tillich, Reinhold Niebuhr, MacQuarrie, Norman Pittenger and their recent successors say extensively and obscurely.

The story of the garden is, in reality, the story of Everyman. It is not concerned with events which happened once for all in a far-off mythical time, but with what had happened, and is happening, in the lives of all men everywhere. The very name Adam suggests that this is the proper interpretation of the story, since in Hebrew it means simply ‘man.’ This account of man’s defection from his Maker is not placed at the beginning of Bible history because there really was a time when snakes could speak and trees bore fruit capable of conferring immortality or secret knowledge, but because there is no other story in the world’s literature which pictures so clearly the essential human situation. Here we see mankind both in its high dignity and pitiful distress. We see man created for the noblest of destinies, called to serve God and live in fellowship with Him, but reduced instead to the status of an outcast, a sinner and a slave to sin, in desperate need of redemption from bondage to his sins and to his own corrupt self-centeredness.⁴

This is typical of the views of current liberal authors, who wish to be regarded as Christian theologians, yet contemporary and educated. Hence, though presented in the manner of a factual narrative, these early chapters are really mythological, or allegorical. Truth conveyed as myth or allegory or fiction is more truthful than history, they commonly affirm.

If, however, we follow the example of Jesus (if unacquainted read Matt. 19:4–6 for one example), and Paul (1 Tim. 2:13, 14), as well as the underlying hermeneutical assumptions of the most serious anthropological reasoning in the whole New Testament (Rom. 5:12–21), we shall be compelled to interpret these chapters, with due allowance for figurative features (as in all language), in a literal way. A common designation is ‘grammatical-historical.’⁵

A recent valuable textbook for biblical hermeneutics by Wm. Klein, Craig Blomberg and Robert L. Hubbard, Jr. observes:

A second apostolic approach was that of literal-contextual interpretation. This approach interpreted Old Testament Scriptures according to their normal meaning. Here again, their method followed Jesus' example. Jesus rebutted Satan's clever but twisted use of Old Testament passages with straightforward Old Testament quotations (Deut. 6:16 in answer to Ps. 91:11–12; cf. Matt. 4:4, 7). Twice Jesus invoked the normal sense of Hos. 6:6 ('I want faithful love more than I want animal sacrifices' ncv) to answer the Pharisees' criticism of him or his disciples (Matt. 9:13; 12:8).⁶

However much symbolism may occur in the passage, the author intended to report real events which took place at the beginning of our race, just as the book of Revelation, with even more symbolism, predicts real events of the eschaton.

There is a further caution. Admittedly, in the matter of miracles, whether at the time of creation in the remote past or of the consummation (eschatology) in the remote future, divine revelation employs symbolism and the 'prophet,' in this case, Moses, functions as receptor and reporter of 'revelation' (Gr. apocalypsis) not as reporter of witnessed or researched history. Yet, we know Moses as agent of revelation was unique in more than one way. His intimate discourse with the deity (Num. 12:6–8) was 'mouth to mouth, clearly,' not in 'vision ... dream ... riddles.' In this respect the mode of revelation is much more plain and direct, with less necessity of decoding or interpretation, than is the case with the predictive portions of the great Old Testament prophets and John the Revelator of the book of Revelation. Yet it may be significant, as many commentators point out, that many features of the 'garden eastward in Eden' reappear in John's visions of the millennial earth (Rev. 20–22).

I. Eden, the Land of Mankind's Beginning

The human race began its history in a circumscribed area of this planet in conditions partially unique to that time and place.⁷ It was in a 'garden in Eden, in the east' (Heb. gan-be-edhen miqqedhem). Eden was eastward from the viewpoint of the author, as likewise we may suppose from all Scripture (see Matt. 2:1), actually the Tigris-Euphrates valleys and adjacent lands. This is the most natural sense.

The precise location of Eden with its pleasant garden, while not of primary importance, has captured the interest of countless generations and has generated some serious research, linguistic and geographical, as well as speculation. I remember being fascinated by the question about the same time I studied geography in the fourth grade.

The word garden (Heb. gan) is clear enough. An examination of biblical texts and language authorities yields an enclosed, well-watered, protected area where plants may grow and sometimes where animals range in a controlled situation, where birds nest, fly, etc., and where people can find both employment and enjoyment as well as sustenance. In the Septuagint (the ancient Greek Version) gan is rendered by paradeisos, in English modified to 'paradise.' The earliest extant uses of the word are by Xenophon (430–355 bc), who borrowed the word from Persian (his famous Anabasis, or Retreat, where he many times used the word, was in Persian territory at the time). The word is also in Hebrew as Pardes, three times in the Old Testament (Neh. 2:8, Eccles. 2:5, Song. 4:13).

There are good reasons for receiving the brief description in Genesis 2:10–14 as being factually intended. Let us proceed in a manner consistent with the rest of Genesis, subsequent Scripture and other acknowledged facts.

1. When mankind left Eden they located immediately in the region between and beside the two great rivers Tigris (Heb. Hiddekel) and Euphrates. These rivers have been known throughout historical times and to the present. They are not mythical like the River Styx.

2. After the Great Flood, the ark of Noah settled in ‘the mountains of Ararat,’ i.e. of Armenia (Gen. 8:4, not ‘Mt. Ararat’). The highlands of ancient Armenia is precisely the area where, very close together, the headwaters of the two clearly identifiable rivers, the Tigris and Euphrates, are to be found—identifiable in Moses’ time and ours.

3. The geography and location of the lands and rivers was still that of the time Genesis was written (observe the present tense in kjv of ‘compasseth’ [Heb. Sovev, v. 11], ‘goeth’ [Heb. holekh v. 14]). It should not be said, therefore, it seems to me, that the Flood ‘drastically altered’ the topography of the area as some advocates of ‘flood geology’ are wont to say.

4. ‘A river flowed out of Eden to water the garden’ must not be understood of a single stream that went away from Eden to water the garden, for the garden was within the borders of Eden (v. 8). That the Hebrew term yatsa ~~to~~ to go forth, is used in the sense of issuing or springing forth from the earth (within Eden), especially as applied to plants and streams of water, is unquestionable.⁸ Such is the case here. ‘Out of Eden,’ is indication of source in Eden. The preposition min employed like the Greek ex and English ‘out from’ indicates source from which quite as well as the partitive (or separative) idea of away from. I cite the other instance wherein the same Hebrew Kal participle of yatsa indicates water or plants springing up in a certain place, rather than departing from it. This is Deuteronomy 8:7—‘fountains and springs, flowing out in [lit. springing up in] the valleys and hills’; Deuteronomy 14:22—the seed that comes from the field year by year’; Ezekiel 47:1—‘water was issuing from below the threshold’; Ezekiel 47:8 (kjv)—‘waters issue out’; Ezekiel 47:12—‘water ... flows from’, etc.

Relevant and true also are these comments: ‘Nahar [river], is a stream, or used collectively, streams [as English ‘fish’ serves both for singular and plural], the river systems ... a similar use is found in Jonah 2:4, where the same word in the singular and connected with a singular verb, denotes the ocean streams [currents] that surrounded Jonah.’⁹

5. There are several other large rivers which have their sources within a few miles of the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates. If any of these are Pison and Gihon cannot be known because these names, known when Genesis was written, have been lost entirely. There really is no scholarly consensus about the rivers Pison and Gihon.

6. Of the precise location of Havilah (v. 11), downstream from Eden, nothing can be ascertained as likewise the ‘land of Ethiopia (Cush)’. This text is cited as evidence of a Cush in the East as well as the better known Cush south of Egypt.

These and other considerations far too lengthy to treat here lead this author to locate Eden in the area of the pre-diluvian headwaters of the Rivers Tigris and Euphrates. There is no important reason to think those rivers were in a different area of earth in either Moses' time or ours.

That Eden was a real place located in a definite place on this earth is helpful, if not essential, to a sound theology of mankind. If that place can be given some bearings of longitude and latitude so much the better. The Last Adam, 'the Savior of the World,' is a Man who lived out His earthly days in a defined area of this planet among a limited society of people. This fact is important to all aspects of Christian doctrine. The story of the Last Adam's career as Savior of the world has force and influence because He is no mythical 'voice' from Never-Never Land but from an area 75 by 150 miles in ancient Syria. The case is the same with the first man in Eden.¹⁰

Lamentably, once we set the narrative of human origins free of some definite space in finite time on earth we weaken the strength of reality for any biblical doctrine of 'normal' mankind. So enter the mythological interpretations (and worse) we have already rejected. Or, if from the standpoint of literary and form criticism, Genesis 2:8–15 is declared of 'no significance,' a discordant, interpolated 'independent element' is introduced in the form of myth in an otherwise fairly coherent theology of mankind.¹¹

Those who think the story is borrowed myth scrubbed clean of polytheism find all sorts of inner incoherence. There is another outlook among many scholars who specialize in Near-Eastern studies for example, E. A. Speiser.¹² They regard the story as truly reflecting ancient Akkadian and Sumerian traditions, locating Eden near the head of the Persian Gulf, where the Tigris and Euphrates converge. This, they claim, is not revealed truth but simply very early tradition.

Some modern discoveries support the antiquity of the main elements of the story, locating it all in Mesopotamia, and lend some support to the view that a specific location there is meant. On Eden, E. A. Speiser has written,

Heb. eden, Akk[adian], edines [is], based on Sum[erian] eden 'plain, steppe.' The term is used here clearly as a geographical designation, naturally enough, with the homonymous but unrelated Heb. noun for 'enjoyment.'¹³ ... [T]he geographical term 'Eden' ... is especially significant in that this word is rare in Akk[adian] but exceedingly common in Sum[erian], thus certifying the ultimate source as very ancient indeed.¹⁴

Speiser's comment rests on the fact that Akkadian culture (Assyro-Babylonian) was a relatively late arrival, one which took over the culture and language of Sumeria in that part of the world.

These evidences do not prove Moses or any other writer of Holy Scripture 'borrowed' his 'facts' from Mesopotamian mythical lore, any more than John borrowed the doctrine of the Logos from Philo. They do suggest that what Moses knew by revelation, Mesopotamia, cradle of the human race, had not quite forgotten.

Theologically, to give up the literal, historical-geographical quality of the place called Eden is part and parcel of retreat to some form of mythological interpretation. I am, of course, employing 'myth' in its normal sense of fictitious, fanciful, imaginary. That 'myth' in another sense may sometimes be a powerful vehicle for teaching truth I do not deny.

II. Paradise the Scene of Mankind's Probation

Paradise is simply the Greek word for a pleasant garden, modified slightly for English, employed long before Christ to translate the Hebrew word gan in Genesis 2 and 3. Eden as in 'garden in Eden' was a place name in ancient Sumerian at least a millennium before it entered the Torah of Israel. That in Hebrew the homonym means 'delight' is the probable reason why both words, paradise and Eden, have had such a marvelous history. Paradise was used by Jews from intertestamental times as a name for the destination of the righteous in Abraham's bosom—Jesus addressed the dying thief's understanding when He said, 'Today you will be with me in Paradise.' Paul says he was caught up to 'heaven,' also in context (2 Cor. 12:1–4) 'caught up into paradise.' In the Septuagint, 'a garden in Eden' (Gen. 2:8) becomes 'the garden of delight' (to paradeisō tōs truphōs) only seven verses further along (2:15), as also in Genesis 3:24, and echoed in Joel 2:3. So, though none of the prophets uses the word 'paradise' of the coming kingdom of Messiah (or of God) on earth, conditions characteristic of the paradise at the beginning (Gen. 2, 3) are predicted in great detail about a new earth in that coming kingdom (or city), where God's will is to be done on earth as presently it is in heaven (Isa. 11, 35, 65, 66 are examples). The visions of John the Revelator promise the same (Rev. 21; 22). Jesus refers to a future 'paradise of God' and even places 'the tree of life' in it (Rev. 3:7). He further connects paradise of old with the coming city by placing 'the tree of life' in its midst (Rev. 22:2). In this coming kingdom, or city, just as God walked and talked with mankind in the paradise of Eden so the Tabernacle of God shall be with human beings—He shall be their God and they shall be His people.

Hence, little as systematic theology of past and present has made of the paradise of Eden in anthropology, much has been made of it by the narrative theology of biblical prophets and apocalyptists. Paradise has captured the imagination and interest of expository and speculative preaching through the ages and to the present hour. It is too important to leave to the occultists, cultists, and sensationalists, and their followers. The ecology of mankind in paradise, in Eden, is adumbrative of mankind in heaven now and in the coming kingdom of God, and should not be left out of formal anthropology.

At this point, if limitations of time and space allowed, a full discussion of such questions as the antiquity of mankind, possible pre-Adamite, prehistoric man, theories of the origin and growth of culture, would be appropriate and profitable. I have been both observer and participant in the discussion and have modified my views of many aspects of this important subject over the years. In my judgment, however, a theology which deals in anything like doctrinal certainties will stay close to the strictly revelational element, i.e. scriptural sources, remaining open to any facts scientific research may discover. It was my assigned duty for several academic seasons to teach courses called Christian Evidences, Factual Apologetics, Philosophy of Religion, Philosophical Apologetics and the like in the academic atmosphere of informed and current evangelical commitment. I do not denigrate the value of those courses for young adults about to launch out either into the tempestuous seas of contemporary secularism and unbelief disguised as modern Christianity on the one hand or into reactionary religious conservatism on the other.

Experience teaches one to be cautious about making statements about earthly (and specifically human) origins not strictly warranted by Scripture on the one hand. On the other hand, unwarranted assertions of science 'falsely so-called' need not frighten us into sub-Christian, unbiblical dogmatism about an evolutionary ‘ascent of man.’ We stand on essentially the same ground as far as ultimate questions about how the world began, human origins and mankind’s first earthly ‘ecology’ as thoughtful Christian scholars before the rise of the modern sciences. Science has nothing to tell us about mankind before sin entered the family. Only God has immediate knowledge of it. We know only as much as the Scriptures tell us. Some learned folk think (possibly correctly) that ‘original sin’ may also be inductively established from data gathered from the history of the twentieth century—collectively in wars, holocausts, economic depressions brought on by cupidity and stupidity on the one hand; on the other, crime, the sexual revolution, and declining morals individually—in such a case ‘unrelieved depravity’ might be a more modest induction than original sin. Yet no amount of reasoning can establish an original righteousness nor can research establish that mankind ever existed in such a state or even if so, what the circumstances might have been. (A full discussion of theories and schemes of pre-history of the human race and earth in the literature and preaching of the last several generations, interesting as it might be, must find another venue. Research has not demonstrated any of the theories to be true. Furthermore, the theology of mankind, anthropology, is not furthered by digression from the spare but clear statements of the Bible itself.)

‘The highest heavens belong to the Lord, but the earth he has given to man’ (Ps. 115:16 niv). Like ‘The first man’ we are all ‘of the earth, earthy’ (1 Cor. 15:47 kjv). These words indicate that though God placed the first pair initially within a limited space it was God’s intention that later they were to inhabit any spot on earth they could subdue and have dominion over. Every ‘seed’ and ‘fruit,’ it is said, ‘you shall have ... for food’ and they were to have dominion over every fish, bird, and animal—wild or domestic—of ‘all the earth’ (Gen. 1:26, 29).

Search for some reasonable extended exposition of the texts relating to the natural, physical aspects of the Garden of Eden has turned up nothing of consequence. My own reflections have proved likewise quite without extensive, reportable positive results. We can affirm the following:

1. It was a delightful place, if we may accept the normal meaning of Hebrew edhen (delight) as applicable. In any case sensuous delight is clearly indicated by the latent allusion to the paradise of Eden in the Song of Solomon 4:12, 13—a trysting spot for lovers. ‘Your shoots are an orchard [Heb. Pardes = paradise]’ and similar (v. 13). Indeed the whole section has a sensuous tone. Artists—painters and sculptors—through the ages have sought to give this visual expression. Our own over-stimulated and underdisciplined generation, believers and unbelievers alike, are well advised to check their imagination at this point (as well as their sensual fantasies). However, the race’s beginning in nuptial purity in the midst of natural beauty ought not to be overlooked. Beauty as we know it in nature at its best—without thorns and thistles, blights, perhaps also droughts, storms, and other threatening disasters—was everywhere to behold and to enjoy.

Philosophers with too much time on their hands and too little to do will continue unsuccessfully to fabricate an answer to the question, What is beauty? Yet our first parents had knowledge of true beauty through the immediate sensations of their healthy bodies, and without a name for it recognized it intuitively.

2. The ‘garden [paradise] in Eden’ was an orderly, planned place—planted, cultivated, trimmed and harvested. It evidently was that way when God ‘put the man’ there (Gen. 2:8). It was already a gan, for which the lexicons give enclosure as first meaning, translated ‘garden’ always in kjv, where are waters, trees, herbs—and even a ‘house’ (2 Kgs. 9:27), or else attached to a house (2 Kgs. 21:18), usually enclosed (Song. 4:12). Sometimes it is artificially irrigated (Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12) as the one in Eden seems to have been. ‘This accords with the statement ... (v. 10): A river flowed out of Eden to water the garden emanating from a spring, and not by rain.’¹⁵ In the case of the garden in Eden, it is so perfect a spot as to be a veritable ‘garden of God’ where there is nothing better (Ezek. 28:13; 31:8, 9)—more like Morton Arboretum or a model farm than Walden Pond or an environmentalist’s favorite primitive ‘unspoiled wilderness.’ Eden was a place for people of some culture and taste. Such we must suppose our first parents to have been, poles removed from barbarism. Provision for all human physical wants and needs, anything conducive to health of body and mind, was there.

3. Relief from malaise or boredom was provided in the work of tilling and taking care of it (‘keep it,’ kjv). Just what this involved must be left to speculation. We are not told. It is enough to know that work, for which the physical and psychological nature of mankind, both male and female, is designed and necessary, was a part of the regular regimen. I will say more of the duty of labor. For now, ‘to dress it’ (Heb. ‘avadh’) means to work it (with a hoe?), and to ‘keep it’ (Heb. shamar) often means to guard. Gardens must be protected then and now from the ‘little foxes that spoil the vineyards’ (Song. 2:15) and, in Minnesota, from the raiding racoons. Did Adam build a garden wall or fence to keep out herbivorous animals? There is more we do not know about ‘the garden in Eden’ than we know. The first inhabitants found it a cultivated garden of delight and were expected to keep it that way.

The weekly Sabbath rest is counterpoint to the duty of work.

4. Worship of God is both informal communion and formal recurring ‘liturgical’ event (if we may use the word). These ideas will be expanded shortly.

5. The garden was botanical, not zoological. ‘Every green plant’ God gave for food at this stage. How soon after the fall mankind began to eat the flesh of animals is not quite certain. God specifically authorized slaughter of animals for food after the Flood (Gen. 9:3), but immediately prior to that, Noah built an altar and offered ‘clean’ beasts and fowl as burnt sacrifice thereon. In later ritual ‘clean’ meant proper for either food for man or sacrifice to God. Much before that, in the first generation after the fall, righteous Abel was a keeper of sheep. One might ask, For what purpose? The words for offer (Hiphil of bo ~~ו~~) and offering (minḥah) in Genesis 4:2–4 are not decisive on the question, but by later prescribed Mosaic ritual a minḥah of grain such as Cain’s would ordinarily be cooked in some way. An animal for sacrifice would be slain. Then the properly prepared carcasses would in some cases be wholly burnt on an altar, in others shared between offerer, priest and the altar. Whether therefore Abel, Seth and Seth’s progeny ate animal flesh should be left an open question.

The geological record, with its layers of fossil-bearing rock as well as the teeth and bones of fish and animals of ages past, shows no epoch when lions and leopards had teeth and digestive systems designed for consuming only plants—unlike bovines, sheep and deer. As far as the same record shows, there never was a time when most fish of the sea had anything to eat other than other fish! The best evidence produced solely from Scripture argues from prophecies of the coming kingdom of God on earth (Isa. 35; 65; 66; Rev. 21; 22) that in the world of Adam’s innocence they did not ‘hurt nor destroy' as in all God's coming 'holy mountain.' Death in the human race is the wages of sin, but not necessarily in the plant and animal kingdoms. If outside the garden in Eden nature behaved as today, then we have a clue as to why Adam's commission was literally 'to work it and keep [or guard] it'. He was evidently required to cultivate plants, even if there were as yet no thorns and thistles. Raccoons a menace to Adam's sweet corn?

Umberto Cassuto, who systematically and somewhat contemptuously rejects the critical documentary-development (JEDP) orthodoxy, translates v. 5, 'Now no thorns of the field were yet in the earth and no grain of the field had yet sprung up.'¹⁶ Whereas the critics usually accept the kjv 'plant' and 'herb,' Cassuto, whose thorough competence cannot be discounted, turns the critics on their heads, saying: 'What is meant by the siah of the field and the esebh of the field mentioned here? Modern commentators usually concede the terms to connote the vegetable kingdom as a whole; thence it follows that our section contradicts the preceding chapter, according to which the vegetation came into existence on the third day. Dillman, for example, states that siah and esebh, the most important categories of the vegetable world, represent the latter in its entirety.'¹⁷ He cites others who interpret the text as saying: 'even' such unimportant plants as these were missing. Cassuto comments: 'But there is nothing in the text corresponding to the all-important word even. All interpretations of this kind introduce something into the text that is not there, in order to create the inconsistency. When the verse declares that these species were missing, the meaning is simply that these kinds were wanting, but no others. If we wish to understand the significance of the siah of the field and the esebh of the field ... we must take a glance at the end of the story.' He holds the 'thorns and thistles' (3:18) simply expand on siah (plant, kjv 2:5) and Adam will 'till the ground' to obtain grain (esebh) 'in order to eat bread' (3:23). Further, Cassuto reminds us that in that part of the world (and largely so elsewhere) thorns and thistles come up in tilled ground after rain soaks the field. So since rain had not yet fallen there were no thistles in the garden. He explains finally that Genesis 2 says plants that multiplied by seed alone (no cultivation) appeared on the third day. Thorns and thistles accompany cultivation of the soil, as Genesis 3 explains, even though a very few are in natural prairies and woods and 'corn' (in U.S., 'grain'), though in patches around the planet they have to be cultivated to grow in amounts to sustain the 'daily bread.'¹⁸ Cassuto's evidences (abbreviated here) convinced me and modified my understanding of the relation of Genesis 1:1-2 and 2:4 ad fin.

If paradise had a wall or fence, as most Eastern gardens from time immemorial, then perhaps it would have required maintenance. Beyond this, if we have not already gone too far, it seems unfruitful to speculate.

How unfallen mankind would have gone about it to subdue the earth and rule it we do not presently know. One can only imagine. We should think of this 'cultural mandate' not so much as a command to be obeyed as an inner impulse deep within human nature to pioneer the vast expanse of the earth's surface as settler and farmer, and to develop the resources, both those exposed to view and those hidden beneath the ground. The course these impulses took as civilization developed after mankind fell, leading to 'the end of all flesh' in the judgment of the Noachic Flood, was different from the course a race of holy people would have taken.

III. The Capacities of Mankind in Their Original Integrity

1. For dominion over the whole earth. Some highly esteemed and competent biblical theologians have understood that ‘have dominion ... over all the earth’ (Gen. 1:26) was an immediate state of mankind’s relation to nature and that to ‘subdue it’ was an effortless enterprise at the beginning—a state of affairs rather than a future project. Francis Pieper, a leading orthodox, American Lutheran held that exercise of ‘dominion over the creatures ... was an immediate consequence of possessing the divine image ... [W]illingly all creatures rendered man service. After the Fall, man retained only a caricature of his original dominion; he must now employ cunning and force to assert some kind of mastery over the animals.’¹⁹

Then citing Luther as source, Pieper goes on to say:

All that is left of this dominion, Luther calls a ‘mock sovereignty’ ... It is true that man succeeds by cunning and coercion in subduing the creatures partially. But in spite of all the creature remains in revolt against its sinful master. The beasts harass, harm, kill, and eat their former Lord; in the air he breaks his neck; the water drowns him; the earth becomes his tomb, etc. Such considerations, says Luther, serve a useful purpose. They teach us what an abomination before God sin must be, since it has so thoroughly deranged the relationship between man and the rest of his creatures.²⁰

J.T. Mueller, wrote in agreement:

Man’s dominion over the creatures, according to the Scripture was an immediate result of his possession of the divine image ... The dominion of man, must be regarded as real sovereignty, so that all the other creatures willingly rendered him service. After the Fall man possesses only a faint vestige of this absolute dominion ... The rebellion of the creatures against man is the direct consequence of his own rebellion against God.’²¹

Though the Lutheran theologians just cited regard the dominion of mankind over the creatures as a consequence of the divine image, their Reformed counterparts bring other passages of Scripture to suggest the dominion was to be progressively attained. Dominion was something ‘to which our race was destined,’ not to be immediately exercised.²² Psalm 8 avers that God has placed all things under our feet. And 1 Corinthians 11:7 with reference to man, male, what the Apostle says about woman’s subordination to man indicates that he ‘should do nothing which implied the denial of his right to rule.’ Hodge claims, however, that according to Paul, much more than authority over animals was intended by the Psalmist.

In 1 Corinthians 15:27, Paul says, ‘when it [Psalm 8] says, “all things are put in subjection,” it is plain that he is excepted who [i.e. God, Himself] put all things in subjection under him.’ And Hebrews 2:8 says, ‘Now in putting everything in subjection to him, he left nothing outside his control.’ It was therefore an absolutely universal dominion, so far as creatures are concerned.

This ... has been realized and attained only by the incarnation and exaltation of the Son of God. But as God sees the end from the beginning, as his plan is immutable and all comprehending, this supreme exaltation of humanity was designed from the beginning, and included in the dominion with which man was invested.²³

This latter view is far superior to the speculative, albeit evangelical views of Pieper and Mueller.

Luther's picturesque exposition (vid. Pieper, op. cit.) failed to regard what Psalm 8 and the above-cited passages have to say by way of inspired comment on mankind's dominion. It is not something rendered void by sin, however difficult of attainment. Reinforced to the sons of Noah (Gen. 7:2, 3) it remains God's purpose for mankind as God's vicegerent on earth, to be consummated in and through the incarnate Son, the Last Adam. The grant to mankind in paradise of vicegerency over the creatures makes it right today for mankind everywhere to colonize, utilize and employ all things God has made and placed on this planet, but only in subjection to and direction by the laws of God, whether of what some call natural revelation or the teachings of Scripture. There is a basis here for a theology of conservation of natural resources, of environmental protection as well as of proper development and exploitation. It would be speculative and subject to contrary argument to theorize how civilization would have developed if the fall had not taken place, for Scripture has nothing to say about it. Eschatology must be brought to bear and from that direction it is well to remember the present world of mankind is under sentence of judgment, doomed to pass away and destined to be replaced by a genuine 'new world order.' It will be a new earth 'wherein dwelleth righteousness' and 'there shall be no more curse' and 'They shall not hurt or destroy in all' God's 'holy mountain' (Isa. 11:9). Meanwhile we had better respect the powers of God in what people call 'nature' and practice conservation of needed natural resources. As for the current 'save the environment' debates—may the wisest win!

2. Powers inherent to achieve the divinely given mission to populate, subdue and rule the earth.

It would be difficult to say anything new on this subject. Rather clear inferences are to be made from the Genesis narrative and in a few instances what later relevant Scripture has to say.

In a general way we observe that Scripture doctrine clearly asserts or implies the following.

a. Mankind was created in a state of maturity. That is, Adam was a full-grown man, not an infant. If either he or Eve possessed a navel it was an unnecessary physical feature, for neither was ever in a mother's womb or had an umbilical cord attached. Nor was either of them ever a savage or barbarian—Scripture knows of no evolutionary 'ascent of man' from brute via savage and barbarian to civilized Homo sapiens. Homonids and humanoids of modern 'scientific' imagination are 'nothing in this world', as Paul declared of the gods and goddesses of ancient heathen imagination.

b. Mankind was created in a state of perfect adaptation to the environment in which they were placed. It is impossible on the basis of Scripture to suppose the first people suffered a shivering, diseased, fugitive existence in caves, forests and marshes, pursued by cold and disease and threatened by beasts. During certain periods of history and prehistory in certain parts of the world genuine specimens of homo sapiens have existed under such conditions, but there is no proof at all that human life began that way. Such conditions have existed in many parts of the world throughout history and still exist. Our first parents did not do well with their fine natural gifts in a perfect environment but that was not on account of any defect of mind or body.

c. Primal mankind was endowed with full capacity for reflective thought and thereby the creative powers necessary for the divinely given mission on earth. Adam probably knew no algebra or calculus but neither was his mind a tabula rosa of the philosophy of empiricism. Adam would never have attempted to create a four-sided triangle nor Eve have added three cups of sugar to two gallons of vinegar for a sum of seven oranges.

d. Mankind initially had a language and was able to use it. They conversed with God. The first pair conversed with one another and Eve with the serpent. It is a singular fact that specific languages in their most primitive-known stages are very much more precise and fully inflected for every possible shade of meaning than in their later stages. They do develop increased vocabulary and multiply idioms. Adam must have begun the process, though at the Tower of Babel language took a new turn.

e. Capacity for reflective thought combined with rational use of verbal symbols enabled the man to name the animals of Eden. This involves both percepts and concepts as well as memory. Though there is no evidence Hebrew was the language of paradise, the language of the narrative and the conceptual framework is Hebraic. In that setting names are never simple arbitrary symbols like numbers on automobile license plates or serial numbers on mass-produced machine parts. Names signified perceived character or some important feature conceptualized. Adam was not nonplussed about the animals of Edenic paradise as St Paul was about what he saw in the paradise of the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2–4).

f. Mankind was directed to subdue the earth. If we think of that even in the most limited sense of soil, rock and water, imagine what innate powers of invention were involved!

g. He was put in the Garden ‘to work it and keep it.’ Did Adam invent the first hoe? The first shears? What did the two use to sew ‘fig leaves together’ (Gen. 3:7)? Obviously they invented and used tools.

h. They could understand rules and foresee consequences or the terms of the ‘contingent situation’ of the ‘Adamic Administration’ (John Murray) which some Reformed theologians like to call ‘the Covenant of Works.’ Without this understanding their work would have been senseless exercise. This is another way of saying—as we have dwelt upon at length earlier—that they were moral beings.

Innate Human Rational, Ethical and Aesthetic Capacities

Our first parents did not have to fall into sin to be philosophers. Eve had the concepts of ‘goodness, beauty and truth,’ or the conversations between the serpent and Eve, between Eve and God and between Adam and God would have been meaningless. The aesthetic sense was especially prominent in Eve, for the tree ‘pleasant to the sight’ (Gen. 2:9) became ‘a delight to the eyes’ (Gen. 3:6). Her sense of objective beauty was obviously intuitive. Beauty for Eve was recognized by her mind, not created by it. As everyone knows who has watched children grow up, their appreciation of music and ability to produce it start very early. People do not need to be taught notes and scales or learn about octaves to enjoy music. We apparently distinguish good and evil by the voice of conscience as soon as we can think. Eve knew about the distinction between truth and lie or the warnings about the tree in the midst of the Garden would mean nothing.

The Gulf Between Brutes and Human Beings

The distance of ‘man,’ ‘made him a little lower than the angels’ (Ps. 8:5 kjv) from every animal is not merely a step upward on a gradual, evolutionary scale but a yawning gulf. Three centuries of effort by generations of scholars under the pervasive demands of Enlightenment and post-enlightenment atmosphere of discourse have failed utterly even to throw a line across that gulf.

The radical differences between the human soul and the principle of intelligence in the lower animals, especially our possession of self-consciousness, general ideas, the moral sense and the power of self-determination, show that which chiefly constitutes us humans could not have been derived, by any natural process of development from the inferior creatures.²⁴

Though marred by too many concessions to the reigning Darwinism, Strong erected a formidable summary of evidence against any psychological-intellectual kinship with brutes. Man, said David in Psalm 8:4 and 5, is only a little lower than angels in this regard but infinitely above animals. Animal-rights folk and lovers of pets may impute human qualities to the behavior or responses of dogs or porpoises but here the desideratum is in the eyes of the viewer rather than in the nervous system of the animal. Strong points out the following:

1. The brute is conscious, but man is self-conscious ... The brute does not objectify self ... does not distinguish itself from its sensations ... has percepts [but not] apperception, i.e. perception accompanied by reference of it to the self.
2. [The brute] has only percepts; man has also concepts ... [no] power of abstraction ... of deriving abstract ideas from particular things or ... experiences.
3. [The brute] has no language ... why ... not? Because they have nothing to say, i.e. have no general ideas which words might express.
4. [The brute] forms no judgments, e.g. that this is like that ... Hence no sense of the ridiculous [humor], and no laughter.
5. [The brute] has no reasoning ... that this follows from that ... a feeling that the sequence is necessary. Association of ideas [events] without judgment is the typical process of the brute mind.²⁵
6. [The brute] has no general ideas or intuitions as of space, time substance, cause.²⁶ The physical in man, on the contrary is only an aid to the spiritual.
7. [The brute] has determination but not self-determination [that is, it is wholly determined by heredity and environment]. Even [Thomas] Huxley²⁷ has said that taking mind into account, there is between man and the highest beasts an ‘enormous gulf,’ a ‘divergence immeasurable’ and ‘practically infinite.’
8. [The brute] has no conscience²⁸ and no religious nature.²⁹

I close this section with the words of the eminent naturalist, John Burroughs—employing language both forceful and elegant.

Animal life parallels human life at many points, but it is in another plane. Something guides the lower animals but it is not thought; something restrains them, but it is not judgment; they are provident without prudence; they are active without industry, they are skillful without practice ... wise without knowledge ... deceptive without guile ... When they are joyful, they sing or they play [or appear to]; when they are distressed, they moan or they cry ... and yet I do not suppose they experience the emotion of joy or sorrow, or anger or love as we do, because these feelings in them do not involve reflection, memory, and what we call the higher nature.³⁰

That these capacities of the soul, present in primal mankind, are present, however diminished, in fallen mankind is demonstrable. They are not induced by nurturing in culture. They are born within. I frequently conduct graveside services and when I do almost without exception, along with the reading of appropriate Scripture, quote several moving lines from Tennyson's Crossing the Bar and Bryant's Thanatopsis. Recently, after reciting the lines over the grave of a pastor who died, as we say, an untimely death, a man who went to school only a little and never really learned to read, approached me. With tears and halting voice this supposedly crude man stammered, 'Pastor, that was beautiful.' Nobody had taught this dear man rhyme and rhythm, simile and metaphor. His own speech is of iron horse shoes; he lives the sights and scents of the livestock sale barn. Yet he understands the meaning of great poetry and responds to it—more truly and deeply than some of the so-called doctors in literature presently standing before many uncivilized denizens of our university classes.

'Down in the human heart, crushed by the tempter, feelings lie buried that grace can restore.' If these capacities for appreciation of goodness, beauty and truth are present in mankind's fallen state how much more so in the primal purity of the race, the image of God still fully intact in moral dimension!

¹ The Life and Times Historical Reference Bible: A Chronological Journey Through the Bible, Culture and History. New King James Version (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1997).

² Gordon J. Wenham, Word Biblical Commentary: Genesis 1–15 (Waco, TX: Word Books, 1987), p. 33.

³ W. H. Griffith-Thomas, Genesis: A Devotional Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1946), p. 25.

⁴ Robert C. Denton, A First Reader in Biblical Theology (New York: Seabury, 1961), p. 3.

⁵ See Bernard Ramm's extensive, now almost classical, discussion in his Protestant Biblical Interpretation, 3rd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1970, 1990), pp. 113–127.

⁶ Wm. Klein, Craig Blomberg, Robert L. Hubbard, Jr., Introduction to Biblical Interpretation (Dallas, TX: Word Publ., 1993), p. 30.

⁷ At this point the reader who is not well acquainted with Genesis 2:8–17 should read it carefully.

⁸ George Bush, Notes on Genesis (Minneapolis: Klock & Klock Christian Publ., repr. 1976), p. 57.

⁹ S. C. Bartlett in the Smith-Hacket Dictionary of the Bible i (New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1875), p. 660.

¹⁰ Robert D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1976, 1993), pp. 213–214.

- ¹¹ See G. von Rad, Genesis, A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961), pp. 77, 78.
- ¹² E. A. Speiser, The Anchor Bible, Genesis (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964), pp. 14–20.
- ¹³ ibid., p. 16.
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 19.
- ¹⁵ Umberto Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Genesis, Part One, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: The Hebrew University, Magnes Press, 1944, 1978).
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 100.
- ¹⁷ ibid., p. 101.
- ¹⁸ ibid., pp. 102, 103.
- ¹⁹ Francis Pieper, Church Dogmatics i (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 522.
- ²⁰ ibid., p. 522.
- ²¹ J. T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1934, 1955), pp. 208, 209.
- ²² Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology i (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 102.
- ²³ ibid., p. 103.

²⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 466.

²⁵ Feed grain regularly to a horse or cow two or three times out of a white bucket and it will henceforth approach eagerly expecting a treat. In fact it will start moving when you slam the back door en route to the granary! This is known as the power of association—not knowledge of cause-effect sequence.

²⁶ Hence no generalizing, no progress except physical, no power of association of ideas—only of events, no tool-making. The physical never serves intellectual or spiritual.

²⁷ Still the famous skeptic 100 years after his death.

²⁸ Aspen trees quake but are not afraid of anything, just as dogs skulk but feel no guilt. They only act out the ritual-like submission of canines to the dominant member of the pack, in this case a substitute in the form of a human master.

²⁹ op. cit., pp. 467–469,

³⁰ ‘Ways of Nature’ as cited by Strong, op. cit., p. 469.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (282). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

8

The Divine Purpose In and For Mankind

H. D. McDonald has pointed out in clear language the exegetical ground for a proper attention to the subject of this chapter.

The impression ... the Genesis account gives is that man was the special focus of God’s creative purpose. It is not so much that man was the crown of God’s creative acts, or the climax of the process, for although last in the ascending scale, he is first in the divine intention. All the previous acts of God are presented more in a continuous series by the recurring use of the conjunction ‘and’ (Gen. 1:3, 6, 9, 14, 20, 24). ‘Then God said, “Let us make man”’. ‘Then’—when? When the cosmic order was finished, when the earth was ready to sustain man. Thus while man stands before God in a relationship of created dependence, he has also the status of a unique and special personhood in relation to God.¹

The personal, even naive sermon-like manner of Calvin in commenting on the creation of mankind points with deep feeling to the pedagogical motive behind the very narrative in Genesis.² It was to tell us that the creation was made for mankind and mankind for God. I quote somewhat at length to give the reader a sample of the depth of insight. The narrative was not intended to satisfy cravings for information about origin. Rather

Moses relates that God's work was completed not in a moment but in six days.... [B]y this ... we are drawn away from all fictions to the one God who distributed his work into six days that we might not find it irksome to occupy our whole life in contemplating it.... [W]e ought in the very order of things diligently to contemplate God's fatherly love toward mankind, in that he did not create Adam until he had lavished upon the universe all manner of good things.³

The idea was so important to the sage of Geneva that he shortly repeated the idea in even more vigorous language and declared the special purpose of God in preparing a whole world for mankind's happiness. We must not only recognize that God has destined all things for our good and salvation but at the same time to feel his power and grace in ourselves [i.e. in God's image], and so bestir ourselves to trust, invoke, praise and love him.... [W]hen we call God the Creator of heaven and earth [reciting the Creed], let us at the same time bear in mind that the dispensation of all those things which he has made is in his own hand and power and that we are indeed his children.... So, invited by the great sweetness of his beneficence and goodness, let us study to love and serve him with all our heart.⁴

Probably no man who ever lived better mastered the grand scheme of God's plan expressed in Scripture—God's eternal purposes in creation, preservation, providence; mankind's fall, redemption and history's consummation in the eschaton. He would therefore have pondered and searched for God's purposes in the human race. They are to trust God, pray to Him, love Him and to serve Him.

Granted that God created mankind for Himself in some important way, the larger questions relate to the way in which this purpose was to be fulfilled. I have searched the literature for an answer—finding almost nothing. Exceptions are one nineteenth-century work of Old Testament theology and that of a recent Roman Catholic scholar. In the midst of a wonderful passage too long to include, G. F. Oehler relates the creation of mankind to 'the design of creation.'

[I]n all His creating God approves the work of His hands; but still the creating God does not reach the goal of His creation until He has set over against Him His image in man. From this last plain fact it is plain that the self-revelation of God, the unveiling of His being, is the final end of the creation of the world; or to express it more generally, that the whole world serves to reveal the divine glory (kabhodh), and it thereby the object of the divine joy, Psalm 104:31.⁵

Psalm 104:31 reads, 'May the glory of the Lord endure for ever; may the Lord rejoice in his works.' Oehler thinks the final verse, 'Let sinners be consumed from the earth,' (v. 35) shows that God's glory is not fully revealed in the earth until there are no sinful men remaining in it.

This suggests that people—a term which includes both sexes without ambiguity—absent tarnishing of the divine image by sin—are the highest object of God the Creator's love and par excellence the manifestation of the created glory of God. This is not to detract from the uncreated glory of God to which Jesus referred as 'the glory which I had with thee before the world was' (John 17:5 kjv). This may account for the command to increase and multiply until the earth be filled with parents and children (Gen. 1:28) and the several predictions that when King Messiah has renovated the kingdoms of the world, ‘they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth’ (Ps. 72:16 kjv), and our Lord’s redemptive work is not for the few but for the many (Isa. 53:12). Further the Old Testament prophets predict an eschaton wherein multitudes of children romp in populous cities and John the Revelator saw multitudes of the redeemed around the throne of God and the eternal home of those ‘saved out of the earth’ as an immense city coming down from God out of heaven to earth where He put our first parents in a garden. Theologians may muse even if not allowed to predict, may they not?

Joseph Fichter, a pious Roman Catholic scholar, understood the difficulty, commenting: ‘Let us admit ... that a definitive study of man will always be in the making. Creation itself is mysterious, and man and his relationship to God are doubly so. Man’s role in creation is one of ever active and dynamic response and surrender, set as it is in a situation where man can enter into dialogue with a transcendent Person.’⁶ We should point out that in spite of restraint of men’s sins by God’s Spirit and dimming of His created glory by the sin of mankind (Gen. 6:3), and the decimation of earth’s non-human inhabitants in the judgment of the Deluge, along with most of the human race, the continuance of the world order is assured—there will be no such future world-wide judgment ‘While the earth remains’ (Gen. 8:21, 22; 9:11).⁷

Divine providence has guaranteed that the divine image of God in mankind will be manifest supremely and forever, through the gracious plan of salvation, including the forming of a people for His name and glory, the church.

At this point let us recall that Psalm 8:5 literally reads of ‘man’ (v. 4 rsv), ‘Yet thou hast made him little less than God [Elohim].’ The Septuagint, perhaps following the weekly synagogue Targum, renders it ‘angels’ who are also called ‘sons of God.’ The idea is that we here on earth, in plain view to the universe, are only slightly below (in rank and capacity?) beings who ‘do behold the face’ of the Father. Verses 7–10 of Psalm 8 go on to relate this to Lordship of earth and her creatures. The Genesis 2 account, in a burst of ‘narrative theology shows in the clearest manner possible, this unique position of man in the category of created beings.’⁸

Thus Hermann Schultz, the learned and devout Goettingen professor, enlarged in beautiful prose, of which I quote only a few lines:

[T]he body of man is formed by a special exercise of God’s artistic power, as is the body of woman afterwards [Gen 2:7, 21, 22 yatsar, to mold as a potter would, bana / to build as a master-carpenter]. The Spirit of God is communicated to the man by an operation which God personally performs on him. Human life is therefore regarded as in a definite personal relation to the divine life. Man does not merely reveal this divine life as a natural life, the way it is revealed by other forms of individual life in nature; he reveals it as a life personally active, self-conscious. Hence the other terrestrial creatures are created with express reference to man (Gen. 2:19).⁹

This sublime, and I judge correct, insight of God’s purpose to make mankind revelator of the divine excellencies, came from one who thought there to be no history at all in Genesis 2, but a distillation of what ‘saintly’ Hebrews later thought of mankind in contrast to the gross conceptions of their heathen neighbors. In a measure Schultz’s insight, with which I heartily concur, having met it first in his writing, suggests the purpose of the Christian faith also, as Peter says of New Testament saints, God’s ‘new creation’: ‘you are ... a people for his own possession, that you may proclaim the excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light’ (1 Peter 2:9).

William Shakespeare may have captured the creative sublimity of this insight in Hamlet’s sarcastic response to Guildenstern: ‘What a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! How infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals.’¹⁰

Many later theologians in their preoccupation with the ‘hard questions’ of mankind’s origin and nature give spare attention to the divine purposes of God in and for mankind in creating him. Some standard works provide only incidental remarks, rarely a rubric or chapter. The evangelical creeds furnish only a little more. I have chosen to employ Question 6 and its answer in the most evangelical Heidelberg Catechism to organize my further treatment of the topic of this chapter, ‘The divine purpose in and for mankind.’ I quote here the translation from Schaff’s The Creeds of Christendom. The sense is not changed in the translation of my philosophy professor, Allen O. Miller, published by United Church Press on the 400th anniversary of the original (1963).

Q. 6. Did God then create man so wicked and perverse?

A. By no means; but God created man good and after his own image, in true righteousness and holiness, that he might rightly know God his creator, heartily love him and live with him in eternal happiness to glorify and praise him.

A Significant Omission

This primitive evangelical statement (1563) of God’s purposes in the creation of mankind says nothing about a ‘covenant of works.’ Two generations later, early in the scholastic age of Protestant theology, the covenant idea became pervasively imbedded in Protestant creeds and theologies especially of the Reformed. The Irish Articles of Religion (1615) speaks of ‘the covenant of the law’ and the Westminster Confession after another generation expresses itself (VII, 2) thus: ‘the first covenant made with man was a covenant of works,’ etc.

As a consequence very little is said in much Reformed literature about the divine purposes in and for mankind, even though God’s noble purposes for us is a truly appealing subject. Many others find the dour prospect of rigid covenantal language a poor introduction to theological anthropology. Perhaps that is why at least two representatives of recent generations (James Orr and John Murray, both Presbyterians) abandoned the idea at least as regards God’s purposes and mankind’s duties in paradise.

James Orr saw the values in this ‘federalism’ at the time in the seventeenth century when it arose but pointed out the greater deficiencies as the church entered ‘the age of reason.’ For the benefit of those who might otherwise never become acquainted with Orr’s corrective comments, I cite at length.

No doubt there is a Scriptural idea at the heart of the conception, and it had the conspicuous merit of introducing the idea of historical progress into the study of Biblical revelation [precious to Orr whose great work, The Progress of Dogma, is justly famous]. It brought the divine purposes into connection with time, and gave it something of that flexibility and movement—that dynamical character—which we have described as the corrective to the static conceptions of the eternal decree. At the same time it failed to seize the true idea of development, and by an artificial system of typology, and allegorizing interpretation, sought to read back practically the whole of the New Testament into the Old. But its most obvious defect was that, in using the idea of the Covenant as an exhaustive category, and attempting to force into it the whole material of theology, it created an artificial scheme which could only repel minds desirous of simple and natural notions. It is impossible, e.g. to justify by Scriptural proof the detailed elaboration of the idea of a covenant of works in Eden [emphasis added], with its parties, conditions, promises, threatenings, sacraments, etc. Thus also the Reformed theology—the more it had assumed this stiff and artificial shape—failed to satisfy the advancing intellect of the Age [of Reason], which, under the influence of new philosophical conditions, had already acquired a rationalistic bent.¹¹

John Murray, late Professor of Theology at Westminster Seminary, was equally blunt. After laying out the divine arrangements for mankind in Eden, he refers to the same as ‘the Adamic administration’ and goes on to say:

This administration has often been denoted ‘The Covenant of Works.’ There are two observations. (1) The term is not felicitous, for the reason that the elements of grace entering into the administration are not properly provided for by the term ‘works.’ (2) It is not designated a covenant in Scripture. Hosea 6:7 may be interpreted otherwise and does not provide the basis for such a construction of the Adamic economy. Besides (3), Scripture always uses the term covenant, when applied to God’s administration to men, in reference to a provision that is redemptive or closely related to the confirmation of promise and involves a security which the Adamic economy did not bestow.¹²

Several popular, strident promoters of the notion of human history governed by a series of covenants (the federal idea) might not be taking the damage current polemics is dealing them if they had noticed the absence of this system in their rightful hero, John Calvin, the rejection of the same in their most outstanding twentieth-century transatlantic scholar, James Orr, and the good counsel of John Murray at their premier school in the U. S. A. I have no quarrel of a general sort with these fellow soldiers, numerous among conservative Reformed and Presbyterians. Yet they will not win on a non sequitur. They have all those in every age saved by an Abrahamic covenant, which for some is an everlasting covenant with two administrations—Old Testament and New. But as Murray reminds us, ‘The first or old covenant is the Sinaitic [Mosaic, not Adamic or a former ‘older’ Abrahamic covenant] ... The view that in the Mosaic covenant there is a repetition of the so-called covenant of works, current among covenant theologians, is a grave misconception and involves an erroneous construction of the Mosaic covenant as well as failing to assess the uniqueness of the Adamic administration.’¹³

For a quite contrary view of ‘the Covenant of Works’ in particular and the Federal theology in general see Dr. Robert L. Reymond’s book, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith.¹⁴ For what some regard as a coup de mort of that theology, see Abraham’s Four Seeds by John G. Reisinger, subtitled, ‘An Examination of the Basic Presuppositions of Covenant Theology and Dispensationalism as They each Relate to the Promise of God to Abraham and His Seed.’¹⁵ Several new authors, apparently in contact with Reisinger, are seeking to save what they can of the Federal system in a ‘New Covenant Theology.’¹⁶

Some of those who prefer the ‘covenant of works’ framework do acknowledge that the Genesis record does not present the subject of God’s purposes in and for mankind in the framework of a covenant. Herman Hoekema has no direct comment at all on the last half of Answer 6, rather a long chapter on a so-called Covenant of Works, of which the Catechism says nothing.¹⁷ He admits the Covenant of Works framework to be an innovation of post-Reformation scholastic theology, making no effort to trace the innovation back to the prime Reformers.

There is great merit to the framework of covenants in many loci of theology. In fact the Scriptures frequently trace the benefits of salvation back to covenants of promise. This of course is mandatory Christian truth. Yet, I think we do well to think of God’s purposes for mankind in paradise and in His eternal counsels under other biblical categories.

Six Affirmations of Ursinus and Olevianus in the Heidelberg Confession

Let us follow the language of Zacharius Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus, authors of the Heidelberg Confession. In their words God created mankind

(1) that he might rightly know God his Creator, (2) heartily love him, (3) and live with him (4) in eternal happiness (5) to glorify [Him] (6) and praise him.

These six affirmations all terminate on God, Himself, as the end of mankind’s created being. In this, of course, there is only a constriction of focus within the grand purpose of the whole created heavens and earth. The ‘twenty-four elders’ of John’s vision express the broader theme. In heaven they worship God saying: ‘Worthy are you, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they existed and were created’ (Rev. 4:10, 11). Christians acknowledge this in the hymns they sing, as do many of the biblical Psalms.

Man in paradise, however, was equipped to return intelligent worship to God by virtue of the undiminished divine image he bore, as crown of creation. As Psalm 104 says, the non-human, animate creatures dumbly and unknowingly wait on God that He may give them their meat in due season, but sub-human creatures do not know God and do not really praise Him—in spite of hymnic metaphors to the contrary. It is mankind’s honor alone to express natures’ praise to God. Only we, a little lower than the angels, can bring voiced, intelligent worship that is creation’s debt to its Creator.

1. That He Might Rightly Know His Creator

‘God created man good and after his own image in righteousness and holiness, that he might rightly know his creator.’

This is to say that in mankind’s original integrity he possessed the moral likeness to God, defined as righteousness and holiness. Ursinus and Olevianus, following good precedent, cite Ephesians 4:24 as proof of this aspect of the likeness, viz.: ‘put on the new self, created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness.’ Colossians 3:10, cited without quoting, says: ‘You ... have put on the new self, which is being renewed in knowledge after the image of its creator.’ (In both these passages where esv has ‘self’ the Greek word is anthrōpos, uniformly ‘man’ in older Versions. Some recent scholarship likes to understand the sense as humanity. This does rightly greatly expand the meaning.)

Considering how much the modern world thinks it knows, meanwhile devoting headlong effort to escape having anything whatsoever to do with God, it is necessary to label the world's knowledge not only defective but also false. Only '[we] know him who is true' and that because 'we are in him who is true' (1 John 5:20 rsv). The passages cited above imply that holiness, i.e. transparent moral purity of character, issues in and becomes manifest in knowledge of God. This knowledge results in faith, hope and love, in James' phrase: 'Religion that is pure and undefiled before God' (James 1:27). James H. Thornwell has said:

Adam, as endowed with this knowledge, looked abroad upon creation and saw what science with all its discoveries so often fails to discern—the traces of the Divine glory. ... Nature was a vast mirror, reflecting beauty, and as he saw he loved and adored.... [T]he whole universe was full of his name ... written upon the starry vault, the extended plain, the lofty mountain, the boundless sea; upon every living thing.¹⁸

2. That He Might Heartily Love God

For mankind in Edenic integrity truly to know God was sincerely to love God. This duty and privilege for the man of paradise arose spontaneously in him. In the history of salvation the same came to be incorporated in the 'great and first commandment': 'The Lord our God, the Lord is one. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your might' (Deut. 6:4, 5; cf. Matt. 22:37). God intended the entire human race to serve Him in love. If to know God truly is to love Him, then to love God is to serve Him. As God's only knowing creatures here below and as God's servants, it is our duty in love to make God's will our law. 'Our wills are ours, We know not how; /Our wills are ours, to make them thine' (Tennyson, In Memoriam).

3. That He Might Live with God

The emphasis is on 'with God.' The life mankind had in paradise was to be one of communion (fellowship, conversation, social intercourse) with the Creator.

We have little or no information as to how the Lord made Himself audible and visible to Adam. '[T]he Lord God commanded the man, saying' (Gen. 2:16), indicates speech and language. Most recent translations correctly, I think, use 'sound' (not 'voice'), i.e. of footsteps of God 'walking' in the Garden at evenfall. This indicates form and mass—perhaps a theophany like the many in the case of patriarchs, prophets and leaders in later Old Testament times. Or is this a profound anthropomorphism for something now lost to us and incapable of being fully communicated to us under the condition of sin? In either case the meaning is the same. We who presently walk by faith not by sight can only congratulate (envy?) the privilege of our first parents. Like the David of Robert Browning's Saul, 'My flesh in the Godhead I seek ... see the Christ stand.' Throughout the Bible God declares His purpose to be with His people. Paul reminded an erring people of this to encourage holiness, saying, '... ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people' (2 Cor. 6:16 kjv). This purpose, interrupted at the gate of Eden long ago, was fulfilled penultimately 'in the days of his flesh' and ultimately in the restored paradise of a ‘new earth’ when ‘now at last God has his dwelling among men! He will dwell among them and they shall be his people, and God himself [Gr. autos ho theos] will be with them’ (Rev. 21:3 neb). Restoration of this state is the major theme of the history of salvation from one end of the Bible and on through it to the very end. The Old Testament Tabernacle in the midst of the camp, the temple in the midst of the land, preserved the idea and pointed back to the paradise of Eden and forward to the future paradise of the new earth.

4. That He Might Live with God in Eternal Happiness

‘And enjoy him forever,’ is how the Westminster Catechism puts it. God’s purposed happiness for Adam cannot be separated from God’s purposes of grace for the saved of all ages. The idea of an elect nation, church of the living God, whose names are written in heaven, was not an afterthought of the Godhead when He discovered a palpable mistake in exposing free beings to temptation. No, it was according to plan (Eph. 1:10, 11) and they were all individually chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world.

‘Live with God in eternal happiness’—‘enjoy him forever.’ This is nuptial language. Married couples are supposed to enjoy one another. ‘Bliss,’ a rather hyperbolic word for any earthly joy, is often predicated of some marriages. We should not therefore be surprised or shocked that the language of enjoyment or happiness of the ideal human marriage is directly applied to God and His redeemed people in the paradise of the new heaven and the new earth. Nor is it any wonder that much devout interpretation of the Song of Solomon has related the book to believers’ communion with Christ or God. It is entirely proper, in light of amazingly vivid scriptural descriptions of the future estate of the redeemed, to apply the word nuptial to life in a paradisiacal future with God. The passages are familiar. The new Jerusalem is prepared as a bride adorned for her husband and even called ‘the bride, the Lamb’s wife’ (Rev. 21:9; cf. v. 2) simply because God’s redeemed people will live there. Nearly a hundred generations past—all much less conditioned than we against poetic figures and typological interpretation—have found the bride-or wife-husband imagery of the Song of Solomon typical of a God-Israel relation in the past and a Christ-church in the present or God-redeemed people of the future paradise. Sensual figures of marriage intimacies in mystical literature regarding communion with God are well known—even if not presently widely read.

The restoration of paradise up ahead tells us therefore what God intended for the Edenic paradise of old in respect to His happy enjoyment of a holy people and in respect to their’s of Him.

5. That He Might Glorify God

Few Christians will doubt or deny this truth encapsuled for us by the Westminster divines: ‘Man’s chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever’ (Shorter Catechism, Question 1). No matter that ‘although they knew God, they did not honor him as God’ (Rom. 1:21). This purpose of God for mankind in paradise includes all the other subordinate purposes and includes all the good (blessedness, happiness) the Creator designed for our race, under Him. If God is all-wise, we may be sure His purpose was most comprehensive. Only in making Himself, the infinitely good and great, the end for which every ‘creature under heaven’ exists, could infinite wisdom be served. Further, we shall see mankind had and still has a central place in that order designed for God’s glory. Human beings were in a special way to glorify God and to be the instrument for bringing glory from all earth's creatures to God.

The reader of this page could be overwhelmed with a list of readings from the Bible affirming in one way or another, explicitly or implicitly, directly or indirectly, that all of God's acts of creation were designed specifically that His glory—innate, inherent in God as God—be made manifest to intelligent beings—viz.: men and angels. Let me only list some of them in literary order: Numbers 14:26; Proverbs 16:4; Isaiah 43:7; 48:11; 60:21; 61:3; Ezekiel 20:9; 36:21, 22; 39:7; Romans 9:17; 11:36; 1 Corinthians 1:26–31; 10:31; 15:28; Ephesians 1:5, 6, 9; 2:8–10; 3:9, 10; Revelation 4:10, 11. The last reference perhaps captures the main thrust of all. Twenty-four heavenly elders in the presence of myriads of angels, and experiencing special manifestations of the three members of the Godhead, cry with faces downward in reverence, 'Worthy are you, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they existed and were created.'¹⁹

Some cautions are in order:

a) When Scripture directs us to 'give God the glory' it does not mean He has no glory until we give it. Here language misleads us. Christian theology knows of God's 'uncreated glory' to which Jesus once referred (John 17:5). God is inherently glorious and perfectly happy. We only have the privilege and duty to acknowledge His glory, without resentment in our hearts and to express that privately or in public worship.

b) When God had created mankind He gave him three natural impulses (all three represented as commands). The first was to 'fill' the earth with his progeny, i.e. to populate it. Contrary to many misguided voices of recent times, it must then be that God wants mankind to dwell in all areas of the surface of this planet fit for habitation. The second was to subdue the earth. The one was 'the colonists charter.' One thinks of the royal charters of several British kings and queens resulting in a Virginia, a Carolina, a Georgia, and similar. The other was the royal charters, so to speak, of the guild of the smiths, who subdue the metals, and the hydrologists, who subdue the rivers, and so on. The third was to take dominion over the earth and all the living creatures, every living thing that moves (Gen. 1:28). The Hebrew radhah (here masculine, plural, imperative) means to 'have dominion,' and followed by an object with the Hebrew preposition, has the sense of 'rule over' (Brown, Driver and Briggs, Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament). It is a 'take charge' word. Under the condition of sin many people instinctively resent the rule of others. Many others aspire to dominate other people and things.

c) There is no command for establishment of civil government—of some people by other people—in the Edenic arrangement. This came after the utter violence of antediluvian society brought on the divine judgment of the Great Flood.²⁰

d) How God intended the dominion of mankind of paradise over beasts, fish, birds and 'every living thing that moveth' (including himself) is attractively set in the context of the coming Messiah's reign, when our Lord shall sit on the throne of His glory.

In his days shall the righteous flourish,

And abundance of peace, till the moon be no more.

He shall have dominion²¹ also from sea to sea,

And from the River unto the ends of the earth (Ps. 72:7, 8 asv).

e) Such a scheme was intended (some radical anti-biblical ‘environmental’ and ‘ecological’ propaganda notwithstanding) to produce a balanced and perfectly functioning society in which ‘the righteous’ do not suffer resentment from their peers, but ‘flourish’ and there is abundance of shalom (peace), prosperity, well-being, good health. Was Tennyson inspired by this vision? He

[D]ipped into the future, far as human eye could see,

Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;

... There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,

And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapped in universal law.²²

f) Therefore, since the Scriptures plainly say repeatedly and in various ways that the created order of this planet was designed to bring glory to God and to enhance His reputation, and since mankind was told to populate it, subdue it and rule it as God’s vicegerent, each person is not merely personally responsible to express heartfelt acknowledgement of God’s glory, but, as the next paragraph asserts:

g) They are collectively also to take charge of this world in such a manner that the earth demonstrates not only God’s power as Creator but His glory and majesty, by this planet’s well-governed productivity, harnessed possibilities and the like. A world civilization of a type envisioned in Psalm 72:1–17 is required by the scriptural language everywhere.

6. That He Might Praise God

Although the Scriptures amply support the proposition that God created the man of paradise in order that He should be praised by all creation, there appears to be no verse which specifically affirms this. The Psalter everywhere both expresses praise of God and enjoins it of godly people. For example, Psalm 107 begins, ‘Let the redeemed of the Lord say so’ (v. 2). Four times later (vv. 8, 15, 21, 31) comes this exclamation: ‘Let them thank the Lord for his steadfast love, for his wondrous works to the children of men!’ The final Psalm (150), a summary of all five books of the Psalter, begins and ends with ‘Praise ye the Lord’ (kjv)—in Hebrew either two words, halelu Jah, or joined as one, and in every language the familiar Hallelujah. There are thirteen clauses in Psalm 150. The verb for each one is the imperative verb, praise! The last verse says: ‘Let everything that has breath praise the Lord!’

Every New Testament reader knows the recurring emphasis on praise as expression of Christian existence in God. In the Apocalypse, John the Revelator reports the final purpose of our race and of every created being, as announced in heaven, by angels, cherubim and myriads of redeemed men. ‘These were all round the throne ... Myriads upon myriads were there, thousands upon thousands upon thousands, and they cried aloud: “Worthy is the Lamb, the Lamb that was slain, to receive all power and wealth, wisdom and might, honor and glory and praise!” Then I heard every created thing in heaven and on earth and under the earth and in the sea, all that is in them, crying: “Praise and honor, glory and might, to him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb for ever and ever!” And the four living creatures said, “Amen,” and the elders [perhaps representative of all the redeemed of ages now in heaven] fell down and worshiped’ (Rev. 5:11–14 neb).

This is how the story of creation, fall, redemption and consummation concludes. There can be no doubt God planned it that way from the beginning: for the worship of God by those holy people who know Him, love Him, live with Him in eternal happiness, to glorify Him and to praise Him. This was the purpose of God in and for the mankind of paradise and shall yet be accomplished at the end of the days. The ‘mystery shall be finished’!

¹ H. D. McDonald, ‘Doctrine of Man’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1984).

² Francois Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (New York: Harper & Row, 1950, 1963), p. 171.

³ Calvin, Institutes, I, 14.2.

⁴ ibid., 14.22.

⁵ G. F. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1883), p. 121.

⁶ Joseph Fichter, Theological Anthropology: The Science of Man in His Relation with God (South Bend, IN: Notre Dame Univ. Press, 1963), p. 37.

⁷ ibid., p. 121.

⁸ Hermann Schultz, Old Testament Theology ii, trans. J. A. Patterson (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1892), p. 255.

⁹ ibid., p. 255.

¹⁰ Shakespeare, Hamlet. Act II, Scene II.

¹¹ James Orr, The Progress of Dogma (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1901, 1952), pp. 303, 304.

¹² John Murray, Collected Writings ii (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), p. 49.

¹³ ibid., p. 51.

¹⁴ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson Publ., 1998), pp. 503–537.

- ¹⁵ Available at Sound of Grace, 5317 Wye Creek Dr., Frederick, MD 21705. John Reisinger is a Reformed Baptist pastor, author, lecturer of keen insight and rhetorical skill.
- ¹⁶ Tom Wells and Fred G. Zaspel, New Covenant Theology, 5317 Wye Creek Dr., Frederick, MD 21703: New Covenant Media, 2002.
- ¹⁷ Herman Hoekema, The Triple Knowledge: An Exposition of the Heidelberg Catechism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, Kregel, 1943), p. 1070.
- ¹⁸ James H. Thornwell, Collected Writings i (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1875, 1986), p. 237.
- ¹⁹ I have treated ‘The Purpose of Creation’ in Chapter 14 of Part I: Theology Proper: Introduction and Doctrine of God, pp. 113–121.
- ²⁰ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government, a Biblical View (Edmonton, Alberta: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 2000), p. 308.
- ²¹ radah as in Gen. 1:28.
- ²² Locksley Hall, lines 120, 129, 130.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (293). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

The Apostasy of Mankind: Probation, Temptation and Fall

Preliminary to Engagement with the Subject

At this point in the structure of any system of Christian doctrines one must deal with a sad fact. No person such as the man of paradise exists on earth and, save for one, has never existed on earth, outside that primal period.

1. This chapter therefore treats the question of how it happens that people are universally sinful and every human life invariably ends in the tragedy of death. How and when did the change come? We already know from the last previous chapter that this was not God’s declared intention. God created mankind holy, knowing God, living with God, loving Him, serving Him and in a happy state, and, as we shall see, with prospects of an eternal life of blessedness. When and how did the change come? Answers of course will be sought in the early chapters of Genesis.

Not every scholar agrees that the first three chapters of Genesis should be studied to find answers to questions about sin and death. John Skinner, author of the first volume of the International Critical Commentary says these chapters are ‘aetiological or explanatory myths ... of the most naïve and childlike description’ explaining why a man should hold fast to his wife (Gen. 2:24), why a peasant must ‘drudge’ in the fields and the woman must endure the pangs of child-birth.’ There is nothing of doctrinal value here at all.¹ Somewhat more on target, Umberto Cassuto, a learned, conservative Jewish commentator, says any doctrine of ‘first causes’ is absent; the message is related to practical uses.² If these authors are correct all Christian exegesis and biblical-systematic theology have been in error.

We affirm that both doctrine and practical moral guidance for godly folk in personal conduct and social relation are present in concentrated form here, as well as some of Skinner’s ‘aetiological’ and Cassuto’s practical uses. These chapters are the vestibule of the whole Bible, telling us by narrative and through archetypical authority exactly how life is and must be under the condition of sin. As we shall see, both Jesus and Paul employ the human actors (Adam and Eve) as being, in themselves and what happened to them and what God said to them, archetypes of all mankind. What they became, we are. What God said about them and to them is true of every one of us their offspring as well.

If any chapters in the Bible are profitable both for ‘doctrine’ on the one hand and practical for ‘reproof, correction and instruction in righteousness’ on the other, they are the first three chapters of Genesis.

A biblical-Christian view rejects all suggestions that mankind ever was a part of nature in the sense that death is a normal and necessary termination of all human existence on earth. The Scriptures nowhere indicate that Adam’s sin had anything to do with the origin of death in the world of nature. Romans 5:12 relates to the origin of death in the human race, not among plants and animals, ‘and so death spread to all men’ (Rom. 5:12 rsv). The ‘reign of tooth and claw’ among all animals is supreme, invariable, and apparently always has been so. Plants die and by death serve the higher orders of life. The geological record, granting some validity to the geological table developed by specialists, gives us not a hint of any time, from Archaean to Pleistocene, when death was not normal and ‘natural.’ Though also ‘of the earth, earthy,’ the mankind of paradise was not merely a part of that order of nature. He was ruler-designate over it but not of it.

That mankind was in the created scheme the topmost ‘specimen’ is plain. Both in paradise and excluded from paradise mankind survives (lives on through) by exploiting nature and in the present is caught up in and by nature in its steady course (Gen. 8:22). In spite of nature’s convulsions (plagues, floods, earthquakes, epidemics, droughts), whether we know about Noah and the Great Flood or not, we human mortals all depend on the Creator’s postdiluvian promise: ‘While the earth remains, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease’ (Gen. 8:22 rsv). ‘Nature’ will continue to meet mankind’s essential needs as a physical being. True, what has been called natural theology (doctrines derived from what God created, including the specific nature of man, rather than by special revelation) has some validity (though the older ‘natural light’ was more accurate. revelation used to be reserved for supernaturally supplied information). Yet, A. H. Strong was right in saying: ‘The universal use of the phrase ‘natural theology,’ ... compels us ... to employ the word “nature” in its broader sense as including man, although we do this under protest and with an explanation.’³

2. The object of our quest is not the origin of evil in the universe though it is appropriate now to set the record straight as to what Scripture says and does not say about it. An evil being, later referred to as the ‘ancient serpent’ (Rev. 12:9), ‘who is called the devil and Satan [Adversary]’ was already about and ready to exercise his poisonous presence in paradise of old. Neither he nor any of his minions or their principles will be allowed in the paradise to come (Rev. 21:27), which suggests that God designed for him to be present in the first paradise, and absent from the restored paradise. There is no passage of Scripture which speaks directly and clearly to the subject of the origin of evil and of Satan. It is a matter of considerable importance that the Bible nowhere attempts to justify God (theodicy) in allowing evil in the created world. The book of Job is sometimes supposed to explain its presence and to justify God. ‘The denouement (chap. 38–42) shows God cannot be summoned like a defendant and forced to bear witness against Himself. No extreme of suffering gives mere man license to question God’s wisdom or justice as Job had done. It is apparently on this very point that Job repents and recants.’⁴ Yet, however much Job may tell the devout believer about right reactions to those ‘natural’ evils (loss of property, family, health and the like), which a pagan cosmology calls ‘misfortune’ or ‘bad luck,’ the book never once attempts either to blame God or to justify Him in letting it all happen. Rather God, who all the time is known (by the reader, who is let in on the conspiracy, so to speak) to be benevolent, omnipotent and omniscient, is acknowledged by a believing, but most fractious patriarch, to be so. The focus of interest is not the presence of evil in the world, but a good man’s response to evil.

Furthermore, the Bible makes no bones about assigning the existence of evil to the permission of God’s government (providence). Amos asks, ‘Does disaster come to a city, unless the Lord has done it?’ (Amos 3:6). Isaiah reports the Lord’s words to Cyrus, ‘I am the Lord, and there is no other, besides me there is no God.... I am the Lord, and there is no other. I form light and create darkness, I make well-being and create calamity, I am the Lord, who does all these things’ (Isa. 45:5–7). This language seems to assign the natural evils mentioned to God’s direct agency. It is, however, only a manner of speaking. It was clearly understood by the ones for whom the Bible was first written to apply to God’s permissive providence operating through second causes toward certain ends which God’s wisdom appoints. An example will help. 2 Samuel 24:1 reports an act of human disobedience to God as if it were brought about by direct divine agency: ‘the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he [the Lord] incited David against them, saying, “Go, number Israel and Judah.”’ It shortly turns out that the taking of a census was contrary to the moral will of God. It is also apparent that in both David’s case and the nation’s case, previous sins had brought each to a stage where judgment was necessary. Thus, the passage conveys the message that God set up this as occasion to bring matters to a head. Nevertheless, this is not the end of the matter. 1 Chronicles 21:1 indicates Satan’s place in the affair as immediate, proximate cause of David’s temptation to sin: ‘Then Satan stood against Israel and incited David to number Israel.’⁵

This latter text (1 Chr. 21:1) is not an effort to save the character of God. The texts simply present two aspects of one truth. Evil is allowed in the world for reasons God has never seen fit fully to disclose and which human wisdom has not discovered. Yet evil is not beyond God’s control. It is this fact of providence that prompts such a biblical saying as ‘Surely the wrath of man shall praise you’ (Ps. 76:10) or ‘Ah, Assyria, the rod of my anger’ (Isa. 10:5). God raised up wicked tyrants such as the Pharaohs of the oppression and Exodus so that God’s name ‘may be proclaimed in all the earth’ (Exod. 9:16, cf. Rom. 9:17). In a prophetic declaration an oppressive and destructive Nebuchadnezzar is called ‘my servant’ by God (Jer. 25:9).

There are two prominent cases reported in Scripture wherein divinely permitted evil was overruled for great good—both inevitably cited when this subject comes up. The first is the villainy of Joseph’s brothers in kidnapping him and selling him as a slave, thus leading to his enforced residence in Egypt—where he rose to high political office, whereby he saved from starvation not only many Egyptians but his own lately repentant brothers (Gen. 50:15–21; cf. 45:1–15). Joseph’s words, ‘you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good’ (Gen. 50:20), can hardly be improved upon as statement of the distinction between divine agency and human agency—both divine providence and human action—in causation. The other case is the crucifixion of Jesus. (See Acts 2:23; 3:13–18; 4:27, 28.) When moral agents go too far in dallying with evil, God can so move in their own activity that even demonic acts fall in line to promote God’s ultimate purposes. God sets limits on evil and even uses it, but He is not complicit in it.

3. Nor is our quest specifically the origin of moral evil, that is, of sin, in the sense of sin’s cause either in the case of our first parents in paradise or of any one else. Origin as commonly understood involves cause. What caused something to begin is the goal of the search for origins, as usually understood.

In the biblical-Christian outlook, sin is an enigma, a fact incapable of explanation. We know, as all evangelical and orthodox maintain, that God is not the author of sin. We simply do not accept it as a possibility. This matter became important at the time of the Reformation and on that account found a place in several creedal documents. The chief Lutheran statement⁶ cites Romans 9:22 and interprets Paul as teaching that God endured the human instruments of sin without making them what they are. God is not to blame. Our own human choices are to blame. God is neither the author nor the cause of sin. The Heidelberg Catechism asks (Q.7) ‘Whence then proceeds this depravity of human nature?’ and making no effort at ultimate cause of sin simply answers (A.7): ‘From the fall and disobedience of our first parents.’ The Westminster Confession (chap. VI, art. 1) says that God ‘pleased’ to ‘permit’ human sin but affirms nothing about cause. All the evangelical creeds of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are in agreement. The Roman Church is no less insistent on the matter, tracing sin only to its beginning not to some first cause. Its official dogmatic statements trace the beginning of sin in our race, and thereby of death, directly and solely to Adam’s first sin. They rely, as we all must, on the plain statement of Romans 5:12: ‘Therefore, just as sin came into the world through one man, and death through sin, and so death spread to all men because all sinned.’ (It does not say ‘death passed upon all created life—animal or otherwise—through Adam’s sin.’) Theologians of an exceedingly philosophical and speculative bent are here required to be simply biblical. There is nowhere else to go but to the Bible. The Second Council of Orange (529), assembled to combat Semi-Pelagian errors, issued this statement which is essentially Paul’s interpretation of the story (Gen. 3; Rom. 5):

If anyone asserts that Adam’s sin was injurious only to Adam and not to his descendants, or if he declares that it was only the death of the body which is punishment for sin, and not the sin, the death of the soul, that passed from one man to all the human race, he attributes an injustice to God and contradicts the words of the Apostle: ‘Through one man sin entered into the world and through sin death, and thus death has passed to all men because all have sinned.’⁷

4. The Bible’s explanation of the beginning of sin is a story—a true story. How could it be otherwise? As the great conservative volume of G. F. Oehler truly says:

Genesis gives no theory of creation, no thesis on the essence of sin, no theory of its origin; but it sets forth, in the form of a story, a sin from which each one can easily for himself develop the theory, and the thoughts involved in the narrative—thoughts which are decisive for the whole course of revelation. A definition of religion is not given; but the way in which it came about that man feels a dread and fear of God ... dominated ... by the feeling of guilt, is exhibited in a statement of facts.⁸

As implied above, the beginning of sin is no more a legitimate subject of philosophical or speculative inquiry than the arrival of the first robin or the first runner past a finish line. The Bible simply reports the beginning (entrance would rather imply a previous train of causes) in the first three chapters. Those plain but profound chapters tell a story which countless generations have regarded as a sober history. Whatever there may be of what Calvin calls God's baby talk to us, condescending to our world-picture—call it time-space-bound frame of reference or cultural paradigm—it has every mark of being a sober history, to be taken in utter seriousness. Mythological and allegorical interpretations appeared very early among those predisposed already to that approach to much of the Old Testament—the school of Alexandria. As we have contended earlier in this book, the New Testament affirms the events of Adam's fall really happened. (I have already cited 2 Corinthians 11:3; 1 Timothy 2:14; Romans 5:12–19. Add Jesus' connecting the devil in John 8:44 with Genesis 3). Jews in the last epoch before the New Testament period accepted the story simply as it reads, as shown by the Wisdom of Solomon 2:24: 'Through the envy of the devil came death into the world.' Also Ecclesiasticus (Wisdom of Sirach) 25:24, 'Of the woman came the beginning [Gr. archē, as in John 1:1] of sin, and through her we all die.'

5. Even though the beginning of sin is reported in Scripture, a general ignorance of what sin is prevails among the masses of mankind. It is guilty ignorance. 'They did not like to retain God in their knowledge,' (Rom. 1:28) 'therefore their foolish heart was darkened' (Rom. 1:21). Jesus severely rebuked this guilty ignorance, even among disciples (Luke 24:25; Matt. 15:16, 17; Mark 7:18; Mark 8:17, 18). It accounts for the rejection of Jesus by the Jews (John 12:37–41). God has sent His Spirit into the world to convict it 'of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment' (John 16:8 niv). As every converted sinner knows, the special work of awakening grace floods the darkened heart with the light, the light of truth. This light is unfiltered and unslanted by self-serving interest, rendering one aware that before God one is 'without excuse' (Rom. 1:20) and 'guilty before God' (Rom. 3:19 kjv). That sin, any sin at all, is gross—productive in every instance of pollution, culpability (blameworthiness) and guilt (deserving of punishment)—always comes to sinners as an overwhelming revelation if it is sufficiently vivid to lead to repentance and faith. Scripture and history provide outstanding examples—Saul of Tarsus (Acts 9), David (Ps. 32), Augustine (Confessions), Luther (in the tower of Wittenberg), John Newton (and Mr. Everyman).

6. In another respect sin is inexplicable nonsense. Words such as insane, senseless, pathological (i.e. mentally sick), terms often nowadays employed by otherwise blasé journalists to characterize especially repulsive crimes of violence, really apply to sin of any kind or degree. This idea is brilliantly developed by G. C. Berkouwer in his series of Studies in Dogmatics.⁹ The riddle of sin bears no relation to biblical mysteries such as the Incarnation (1 Tim. 3:16) and the relation of Christ and the church (Eph. 5:32) known to mankind only because God has revealed them, even though still inexplicable to mere human intellect. Then there are things once unknown but later made known (Rev. 17:3–7). Sin is neither of these; it is a unique enigma, something insane, senseless and sick, out of step with the reality of the created scheme of things. ‘One cannot find sense in the senseless or meaning in the meaningless.’¹⁰ Those who approve of sin are fools. Such fools are the celebrated villains of the book of Proverbs. We shall return briefly to this theme in treatment of the doctrine of sin. For now, it is important to realize sin had a beginning in history, known to us only by biblical revelation, but there is absolutely no explanation of why or even how. See J. D. Godsey’s The Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer.¹¹ Bonhoeffer writes: ‘The fall of man ... is both inconceivable [Godsey, Bonhoeffer’s interpreter, uses incomprehensible] and unalterably inexcusable, and therefore ... disobedience does not exhaust the facts. It is revolt ... departure ... defection.’¹²

It does not occur to Christian believers who start their journey of Bible interpretation of Genesis with the dictum of Jesus (‘it is they that bear witness about me,’ John 5:39; Luke 24:24–27) to doubt that the first prophecy of Jesus is Genesis 3:15. So also they who let the New Testament interpret the Old Testament draw from Paul’s remarks about parallels (negative and positive) between Adam and Christ (Rom. 5:12–19) know that Genesis 3 describes ‘the Fall’ of our race at the beginning of its history. We shall reserve most details for the next locus of theology, hamartiology, or the doctrine of sin (Part 3). Likewise many agree who come with ‘critical’ naturalistic assumptions, as for example John Skinner, who forthrightly refers consistently to ‘The Creation and Fall of Man.’¹³ Victor P. Hamilton notes ‘not all ... agree’ (Claus Westerman, for example). He goes on to say, ‘Kant praises Adam for his willingness to make his own moral judgment ... the biblical scholar D. R. G. Beattie takes a similar approach in “What is Genesis 2–3 About” (Expository Times 92) ... Similarly J. Bahr “The Myth of Man’s Fall” (Expository Times 92, pp. 235–237).¹⁴

Although, as we have already noted, Judaism has no firm doctrine of ‘original sin,’ i.e. of a primeval fall, yet in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, Ben Sirach says: ‘Of the woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die’ (Ecclesiasticus 25:24). 2 Esdras says: ‘O Adam, what have you done? Though sin was yours, the fall was not yours alone; it was ours also, the fall of all your descendants’ (2 Esdras 7:119, Revised English Bible). These Jewish sources suggest rather firmly that when Paul wrote Romans 5:12–19 he was not creating a new theological idea. Yet most Jewish comments on the story of ‘the fall,’ fall in line with the heresy of Pelagius that Adam and Eve only provide a paradigm of how everyone ‘falls’ into sin. Adam lost nothing for us all, he only set a bad example.

The Narrative of the Fall

Rightly to interpret as an historical account the story of creation, temptation and fall, one must humble oneself. Where human learning would propose an erudite discourse on principles, the scribe of the kingdom of God will sit like the naive child, believing because God is speaking. Inductive treatment of the whole scope of probation and fall with comment on each detail as it appears is useful, but it is not the method of systematic theology. Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s *Creation and Fall*¹⁵ and Franz Delitzsch’s *New Commentary on Genesis*¹⁶ are two very different types of approach, but I have found them most interesting and suggestive. Of the systematicians, I have found the treatment by the Baptist John Gill, perhaps the greatest of eighteenth-century evangelical Old Testament scholars and theologians, the most helpful.¹⁷ Over a long period of time I have found my own research in this crucial passage forwarded much by Gill's rather brief but clear treatment, though I follow my own plan not his. It would be unfruitful and confusing to attempt to document many years of reading on the subject of the fall and the exegesis of this passage.

Bare recitation of the momentous story of the fall of mankind and the attending results requires little time and effort; nor is there anything complicated—only twenty-four verses are devoted to it. Like a head-on collision of two automobiles on a two-lane road the event can be described quite briefly. However, the aftermath in human suffering as result of such an 'accident' will inevitably be enormous and the written record of the litigation might fill a file drawer. So it is with the most utterly disastrous events of the fall of mankind so very early in our history. The results do go on forever and the literature of the world—all of it in one way or another related to that fall—keeps growing and, to borrow John the Beloved's vivid language, 'I suppose that the world itself could not contain the books.'

We shall discuss as briefly as is consistent with our purposes, the scriptural narrative of the apostasy of mankind under the rubrics of (1) probation (Gen. 2:16, 17); (2) temptation (Gen. 3:1–5); (3) fall (Gen. 3:6); and (4) consequences.

I. The Probation of Mankind (Genesis 2:16, 17)

'And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die' (kjv).

The Authorized Version (kjv) is to be preferred here because this is one of those texts where it is important to know if only one person, 'thou' (2nd singular), is addressed or more than one, 'ye.' The Hebrew clearly indicates that only Adam himself, responsible head of the human race, is addressed by God's commands in these two verses, prior to the creation of Eve. The narrative of Eve's creation immediately follows (2:18–25). We know that Adam must have conveyed the command to Eve from her response to the serpent (Gen. 3:2, 3).

Much theological writing misses the especially sharp, intensive, grammatical modes and fierce tone of these two verses (Gen. 2:16, 17), viz.: (1) of all the words for God's instructions to human beings, the word 'commanded' (Heb. tsawah) is the strongest. It never occurs except in the intensive stem, either piel (act.) or pual (pass.). When, as here, followed by the preposition 'al, above, over, upon, against, the phrase means to command strictly. We can almost visualize Elohim shaking the finger at Adam and saying 'Do not!' In the case of permission 'thou mayest freely eat,' 'freely' translates the absolute or intensive infinitive of eat—'eating thou shalt eat'—so 'freely' does partly capture the idea. But in the case of prohibition from eating the tree of knowledge of good and evil the Lord God's 'Thou shalt not' employs the very same mode. In English, the simple indicative future with the usual Hebrew negative lo means 'no' or 'not.' It is used in eight of the Ten Commandments of Exodus 20—'Thou shalt not'—fourteen times in the passage. We can imagine a mild fatherly tone as the Lord God gave Adam custody of the Garden, but such a relaxed ambience is utterly foreign to the instructions about eating and not eating. The intensive (absolute) infinitive is used again to raise the emphasis on the certainty of death as penalty for breaking the commandment, viz. 'thou shalt surely die,' literally 'dying thou shalt die.'

‘Of every tree ... the tree of life in the midst of the garden ... the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.’ Each tree had a place in mankind’s future. We know the tree of life was designed for life not death, as Revelation 22:1, 2 explains. We cannot doubt that had our first parents passed their probation—for how long a time we cannot now know—they would have been granted that access to life ‘for ever’ (Gen. 3:22) and not have had ‘the way to the tree of life’ (3:24) barred by God’s cherubim. God wants everyone to have the same knowledge of good and evil—i.e. passage from righteous innocence to intellectual and moral maturity. This was to be attained by a right use of the freedom they enjoyed as created in God’s image. They traded, so to speak, the possibility of a knowledge of good and evil such as God has for the kind the devil has.

The story does not tell all. One wonders why Adam and Eve had not already eaten of the tree of life. It was not prohibited (2:9). The answer probably is that the presence of the trees in paradise is only indicated at Genesis 2:9 as narrative setting for the action of chapter 3. There were many other trees in the Garden, but God called special attention only to the tree of testing—the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Though we know there was a tree of life in the Garden, Adam may not have known about that until after the fall. The tree of testing was prominently set ‘in the midst of the Garden.’ The tree of life may have been set remotely in an obscure place. At any rate they were not attracted to it. Apparently Eve had no interest in the tree of knowledge until the tempter called attention to it by his suggestive question. Only then (3:6) did, ‘the woman’ see ‘that the tree was good for food ... delight to the eyes, and ... to be desired to make one wise.’

The Ancient Snake

The narrative does not say whence came this evil person. Evil evidently originated in another probation and fall in which there was no tempter, hence no redemption. The ancient snake, the devil, Satan (Rev. 20:2), then became the tempter of this probation. There have not been wanting critics and commentators to suggest that the tempter seems to have been necessary for the trial to take place. Necessary or not, he was there, and any doctrine of providence will find itself obligated to insist that the serpent was there quite as much by divine intent as the two trees which figure so prominently. The serpent was as certainly present in the Garden of Eden by divine design as Judas Iscariot was present among the Lord’s apostolic group.

The foregoing remarks on exegetical details and their meaning, however, do not explain fully the significance of the trees and the command concerning them as a probation. The scope of this book does not allow a survey of (the several interpretations of these verses, and of) the narrative to follow, as myth. There are theories that regard it as an adapted oriental myth of the gods’ jealousy to keep mankind from knowing their secret divine privileges, or a myth to explain the awakening of mankind to the pleasures and pains of sexuality. There is also the Story-of-Everyman theory which makes the narrative a moral lesson regarding how everyone meets moral temptation. And there are others.

Details of Interpretation

Christians have always, with some minor variations, interpreted Genesis 2:16, 17 as setting out the basic details of a probation which our first parents failed utterly, with tragic consequences for us all. Probation designates a period of time during which certain subjects are placed under a set of rules requiring specified good behavior, at the successful termination of which they will receive or retain certain rewards, privileges and the like.

What was the promise on condition of obedience, presumably for a period of time? The threat contingent on disobedience was death. From this we may legitimately infer the converse promise was life everlasting in a growing continuation of the life already enjoyed with God and with one another in the Garden. Each of the negative commands of the Decalogue implies a positive. This same principle seems to apply here. This inference is supported by a number of data in the text and later biblical references to the probationary experiences. We observe the following.

1. The tree of life represented everlasting life in some unspecified symbolical or ‘sacramental’ way. God had some provision in mind in deliberately exposing this significance after the probation failed: ‘Then the Lord God said, “Behold, the man has become like one of us in knowing good and evil. Now, lest he reach out his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat, and live for ever—” ’ (Gen. 3:22–24). To us later ‘probationers’ (of sorts) the Son of Man promises, ‘I will grant to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God’ (Rev. 2:7; cf. 22:2). This mystical language of the Revelation does not resolve all of the obscurity, but certainly ‘leaks’ the information that eternal life was God’s design for a successful probation of the ‘First Adam.’

2. Our Lord lived and died, rose and ascended, to provide or restore, what Adam lost. Adam had life which might have become elevated and made eternal had he passed the probation. Jesus passed the test and won for us God’s gift of eternal life:

If, because of one man’s trespass, death reigned through that one man, much more will those who receive the abundance of grace and the free gift of righteousness reign in life through the one man Jesus Christ.... For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. 5:17; 6:23).

3. Paradise in which Adam was placed was suited by God to promote growth and development both in holy character and in happiness, that is, to pass successfully. Adam had the society of both a beautiful wife specially made for him to meet his social needs (Gen. 2:18 ff.), and a gracious heavenly Father who created him for His own fellowship, and a natural environment lacking no spiritual, material or aesthetic need or lawful desire.

4. There was the possible opportunity of attaining physical immortality (rather than the dread and pain of death before resurrection and translation which come to pass for us all). The means was the fruit of the tree of life (Gen. 3:24).

I have already suggested as much, but there is more that ought to be said. The Bible nowhere affirms ‘natural immortality’ of any created being. 1 Corinthians 15:45–50 contrasts the Last Adam and the First Adam, not as Adam was after his apostasy, but as ‘made.’ The phrase, ‘was made a living soul’ is quoted directly from the Septuagint of Genesis 2:7. As thus made he was—‘from the earth, a man of dust’ (1 Cor. 15:47) and as only ‘flesh and blood,’ like the rest of us, could not in that state inherit (enter actual possession of) the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:50). He, like us, would have had to be changed. The means of change was the fruit of the tree of life apparently provided for checking decay and preserving youth. ‘If Adam had maintained his integrity, the body might have been developed and transfigured, without intervention of death’—able not to die would have become not

If Adam had improved on his opportunities for development of a confirmed, permanent holiness by passing his probation he would have been granted access to the tree. As to this possibility, Strong remarks:

The tree of life was symbolic of communion with God and of man's dependence on him ... because it had a physical efficacy. It was sacramental and memorial to the soul, because it sustained the life of the body [that is, it did not convey eternal spiritual life]. Natural immortality without holiness would have been unending misery. Sinful man was therefore shut out from the tree of life, till he could be prepared for it by God's righteousness. Redemption and resurrection not only restore that which was lost, but give what man was originally created to attain ... Rev 22:14 'Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have the right to come to the tree of life.'¹⁹

5. The temptation, including both the tree of knowledge and the serpent, were the very arrangements designed by God to improve Adam's character, that is, not only to demonstrate holiness of character but by obedience to God to grow into confirmed holiness. In the language of Latin theology, Adam, who by free will, rightly used, was already posse non peccare, able not to sin, would have become non posse peccare, not able to sin. Our Lord increased in wisdom and stature, in favor with God and man (Luke 2:15), proving Himself the competent, holy Last Adam. Even He had to be tempted, as is well known. Whereas the First Adam used his freedom to learn disobedience, the Last Adam 'Although he was a son, he learned obedience through what he suffered. And being made perfect, he became the source of eternal salvation to all who obey him' (Heb. 5:8, 9).

In this section on the probation I have ventured into some details that might seem more speculative than exegetically derived. Yet precisely because Christians ask questions about these matters and try to offer answers to one another these comments seem necessary.²⁰

II. The Tempter of Mankind (Gen. 3:1–5)

'Now the serpent was more crafty than any other beast of the field that the Lord God had made' (1a).

His Identity

The tempter was ostensibly a creature of the 'field'—i.e. a wild animal—yet Scripture is plain that 'the serpent' was a great evil being in existence ages before paradise was planted. Whether the devil employed the organs of the snake to talk we cannot discover. The mystery is no less than the ass that reproved the prophet Balaam (in which case 'the Lord opened the mouth of the donkey' [Num. 22:28]). Ordinarily neither snakes nor donkeys make speech in human languages except in Greek and German fables. We know the devil or Satan—to give him a proper name—was the one who supplied the snake's words. See Revelation 12:9 which identifies 'that ancient serpent' with the dragon, the devil and Satan (see also John 8:44; 1 John 3:8; 1 Tim. 2:11). We do not know how he became evil, or by what manner, means or process he fell from created holiness, but that pride was the root of his primeval fall we properly infer from 1 Timothy 3:6. Christian tradition takes that hint straight to Isaiah 14:12–14 and following ('Lucifer, son of the morning' kjv) and Ezekiel 28:10–19 ('in Eden, the garden of God'). A very impressive 'conflict of the ages' theology of universal history by the late pastor of Tenth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia connects the Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28 passages with the serpent of Genesis 3 and the dragon of Revelation—to the edification of multitudes who heard him speak or who read his book.²¹ John Milton, greatest of the Puritan literati, created two great epic poems around the same theme: Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. Lacking absolute ‘proof,’ the consensus is nevertheless very impressive. Lucifer, light-bearer, as a name for Satan in Christian history, is supplied by the Latin Vulgate Version of Isaiah 14:12.

His Character and Methods

He is wicked, threatening and dangerous, for he is likened to a roaring lion (1 Peter 5:8) and said to be a murderer and liar (John 8:44). Believers are told to beware of him, and to be sober and vigilant against him. This is because he is ‘subtle,’ that is, cunning, deceitful, everything a successful tempter needs to be. This, of course, Eve did not know. One wonders why the Lord God had not warned her of him. At any rate it was precisely the serpent’s deceit, making evil appear good, desirable, and beautiful, that gave him victory over Eve. And the Bible does not fail to make that point for our benefit. Deceit is his modus operandi (Eph. 6:11; 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14). To discuss the Hebrew and Greek names of this being who first steps on stage here before the curtain of primeval mystery would be interesting and instructive, but distracting at this stage of present inquiry.

Steps Leading to the Fall: the Serpent’s attack on Eve’s Innocence (Gen. 3:1–5)

Minor problems of interpretation occur, but nothing that obscures the stages of swift collapse of human integrity brought on by the subtlety of the tempter. Let us supply a brief analysis of steps emanating from the serpent’s subtle suggestion.

1. The serpent first insinuated doubt of the benevolence and veracity of God with a question: ‘Did God actually say, “You shall not eat of any tree in the garden”?’ (v. 1). It is to be supposed that the stealthy snake was lurking somewhere nearby when God initially instructed Adam (2:16, 17) or when Adam passed along the word to Eve. Satan is not omniscient.

2. A parley with the devil on the subject of forbidden fruit then took place (vv. 1b–3). This was Eve’s first step downward. ‘She might have suspected ... some design upon her, by introducing such a subject ... by so extraordinary a creature; and therefore should have broken off at once.’²² Eve’s answer was truthful. ‘[N]either shall you touch it’ seems to be an innocent comment, implicit in the command. She should not be charged with ‘adding to the Word of God.’ She surely understood fondling the fruit would be wrong, leading almost inevitably to eating it. Except for the mistake of even conversing with a disreputable character, Eve is still on safe, if risky, ground.

3. Then the serpent outrightly charged God with falsehood (vv. 4, 5). He did not, like the modernist or infidel, deny that God has spoken through prophet, apostle or Messiah, but acknowledged that God indeed had spoken and that what God had said was false. Like most audacious disturbers of the peace of the righteous, the devil really was and continues to be a garrulous windbag, guilty of the very trespasses against truth and domestic tranquillity he charges to others.

The attack was successful: ‘the woman being deceived was in the transgression’ (1 Tim. 2:14) kjv); ‘[T]he serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty’ (2 Cor 11:3 kjv).

Elements in the Temptation (Gen 3:6a)

The devil played his hand just right to remove obstacles placed by God’s direct command. Now the interplay of the inner world of human nature with the external world led to the woman’s swift slide to utter moral defeat. The tree and its fruit appealed to physical appetite for tasty food, ‘good for food’; it appealed to her con-created feminine appreciation of beauty (‘a delight to the eyes’) and to that supremely blessed human capacity, curiosity (desire for knowledge of the novel)—‘the tree was to be desired to make one wise.’ The last is closely related to the social impulse, to meet, associate with and converse with other people.

The same triad of channels to the will were employed ages later when the devil proposed three temptations of Jesus (Matt. 4), but with notable lack of success.

John says, if I interpret him correctly, that these three types of temptation (or channels of appeal) exhaust the possibilities—that there are no more. Having instructed, ‘Love not the world’ or anything in it he goes on to say: ‘For everything in the world’ (niv) (which means all without exception here), viz.: ‘the cravings of the flesh’ (which certainly includes hunger, sexual pleasure, and similar), ‘the lust of the eyes’ and ‘the pride of life.’ The last employs bios for ‘of life.’ It is the word employed when Jesus said the father ‘divided unto’ his sons ‘his living’ (Luke 15:12 kjv), i.e. money, wealth, materials contributing to support of natural life. When later (15:13 kjv) the younger son ‘wasted his substance [i.e. the ‘living’ given earlier] with riotous living’ a wholly different word is used (dzaō), a verb meaning to be alive as opposed to dead. So John’s expression, ‘the pride of life,’ means pride of owning or having something—anything from a kiddie car to a pretty face, to an unshared secret, to a university degree, to the secret of how to earn a million dollars.

These appeals of the world are neither good nor bad in themselves—certainly not before the fall. ‘[T]he whole world [kosmos, the world as managed by the devil] lies in the power of the evil one’ (1 John 5:19), but everything in the world is still the good creature of God. In Eve’s case the appeal was simple and direct.

III. The Act of Apostasy or the Fall (Gen. 3:6b)

The culmination of the act was in the eating of the fruit, first by Eve and then by Adam. ‘[S]he took of its fruit and ate, and she also gave some to her husband who was with her, and he ate’ (Gen. 3:6b).

James 1:14 and 15 tell precisely what took place. I furnish my own translation to avoid the unnecessarily pejorative sense of ‘lust’ in kjv, and ‘evil desire’ of niv, and others.

‘But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own desire [neutral, neither good or bad] and enticed. After that when the desire has conceived it gives birth to sin’ (James 1:14, 15).

The heart had been corrupted before the hand plucked the fruit or ever it passed Eve’s lips and passed on to Adam’s hand and mouth. ‘Thus man fell inwardly, before the outward act of eating the forbidden fruit ... fell in that one fundamental determination whereby he made supreme choice of self instead of God.’²³ ‘[H]ence she inwardly sinned before she ate of the forbidden fruit.’²⁴

In our time of strange public bickering about ‘victimization’ of women and shrill counter-accusations, it might be well to know how esteemed authors of yesteryear regarded the relations of the sexes in this tragic affair. I cite one.

That Adam sinned as well as Eve, is most certain; for though it is said ‘Adam was not deceived’ [1 Tim. 2:14]; the meaning is, that he was not first deceived, that he was not deceived by the serpent but by his wife [I wonder about this last]; and when she is said to be in the transgression [1 Tim. 2:14], the sense is, that she was in the transgression first; but not only [alone]; for Adam was also; hence we read of Adam’s transgression, Rom. 5:14. And if he was with his wife when she ate of the fruit ... he sinned in not attempting to detect the sophistry of the serpent; in not defending his wife from his assaults; in not persuading her not to eat of the fruit; in not warning her of the danger; yea in not using his conjugal authority [after all was she not supposed to be Adam’s ‘helper’?] and laying his commands upon her not to eat; for if he was present and silent, he must be criminal and accessory to her sin.²⁵

These remarks, however trivial and a bit passé they may seem to a ‘progressive’ reader, do not seem so to most earnest people who give careful, knowledgeable thought to the text and the doctrine of ‘first sin.’ Over the years I have presented these matters to graduate classes in theology and in Old Testament. These are precisely the questions people—lay and learned—ask and the sort of answers given. Gill is so very succinct I have cited his remarks almost as my own, even though now almost 200 years old. They were already old when Augustine discussed them, yet still new to each generation.

Over the generations Christians less prone to ‘demythologize’ than ours and, taking the narrative as true—what it says as well as what it does not say—have wondered, what if Eve had sinned in Adam’s absence and then later ‘gave to her husband’ and if so with what persuasion, and he with what motives joined with her? Assuming Adam was not deceived by Eve (1 Tim. 2:14), it has been argued that he ate the fruit out of immense love for her, being unable to think of going on in integrity without her. Many sermons have argued thus and compared Adam’s love for lost Eve with God’s (Christ’s) love for lost humanity even to the point of death in each case—all on the slim scriptural basis of ‘Adam ... who is the figure of him that was to come’ (Rom. 5:14 kjv).

At any rate, Adam alone was the natural, or seminal, or organic head of the race of mankind and of Eve, as well, for she was taken out of his side. It has been conjectured that if Eve alone had sinned, the guilt would have been personal only. Since, however, she could not be mother of sinless generations to follow, God would then have produced another mate for Adam.

The persistence of these and related questions and proposals—some reasonable and some not—forbids that we ignore the speculations. Pastors and teachers as well as parents who do serious Bible reading with their children need to be aware; not surprised when questions arise about this very critical event in our history. We will continue to interpret the narrative of the fall in the next chapter.

¹ John Skinner, Genesis, ICC., 2nd ed. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1910, 1950), XII.

- ² Umberto Cassuto, Commentary on the Book of Genesis (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, The Hebrew Univ., 1944, 1978), p. 139.
- ³ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 26.
- ⁴ Marvin H. Hope, Job, The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday & Co., 1965, 1980), p. lxxx.
- ⁵ A comparison of Revelation 13:2, 7 and 8 with 17:17 or reading of 2 Thessalonians 2:7–12 reveals similar instances.
- ⁶ The Formula of Concord, art. 19.
- ⁷ Gerald Van Ackeren, Editor, The Church Teaches, Documents of the Church in English Translation (Rockford, IL: Tan Books Publ., 1973), p. 157. A better rendering than Deferrari-Denzinger translation.
- ⁸ G. F. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, rev. G. E. Day (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1883), p. 53.
- ⁹ G. C. Berkouwer, Studies in Dogmatics: Sin, chap. 5, ‘The Riddle of Sin’ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971), pp. 130–148.
- ¹⁰ ibid., p. 134.
- ¹¹ J. D. Godsey, The Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), p. 137 ff.
- ¹² Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Creation and Fall (New York: Macmillan, 1937, 1959), p. 77.
- ¹³ John Skinner, Genesis, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1910, 1960, 1980), pp. 51–89.
- ¹⁴ Victor P. Hamilton, The Book of Genesis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), pp. 211, 212.
- ¹⁵ Bonhoeffer, op. cit., pp. 64–94, musing during a critical period in the author’s life.
- ¹⁶ Franz Delitzsch, New Commentary on Genesis, vol. i, trans. Sophia Taylor (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1888), pp. 146–176.
- ¹⁷ John Gill, Body of Divinity, 2 Vols., first published 1795; rep. Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978. Vol. I, pp. 451–462, ‘Of the Sin and Fall of Man’ and ‘Of the Nature of the Sin of Man.’
- ¹⁸ Strong, op. cit., p. 527.
- ¹⁹ Strong, op. cit., p. 527.

²⁰ My approach to these verses is traditional in the main, yet based on my own studies of the Hebrew text over a period of about 10 years when I taught first and second year Hebrew, never failing carefully to work through these verses. The interest of liberal critical scholars is keen but antiquarian, not theological. For them this is ancient ethnic saga filtered through Hebrew monotheism. Skinner, however, has witty outline captions: The Temptation (1–5); The Inquest (8–13), etc. Cassuto's Jewish interpretation makes verses 1–5 a parable that went on in Eve's mind!

²¹ Donald Grey Barnhouse, The Invisible War (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1965), p. 288.

²² John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), p. 451.

²³ Strong, op. cit., p. 584.

²⁴ Gill, Body of Divinity I, p. 452.

²⁵ ibid., pp. 452, 453.

10

Consequences of the Fall of Mankind

In the chapter just ended we were considering the narrative of the primeval tragedy which theology and preaching usually describe as ‘The Fall of man.’ The probationary arrangement, the temptation to violate the arrangement and the act of apostasy came before our attention. Now in this chapter we consider the consequences for mankind (personal, spiritual and moral), also judgment and grace for mankind, and the beginnings of civilization.

IV. The Immediate Personal, Spiritual and Moral Consequences of the Fall

The consequences, of course, were precisely what God had said they would be, viz.: ‘in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die’ (Gen. 2:17 kjv). There was to be grace in divine alleviation of the tragic sentence of death, yet not remission of the sentence.

There are three aspects of human death in Scripture. In that revelatory light the two aspects currently in effect are firstly, spiritual, that is, alienation from God. It is to be ‘dead in [trespasses and] sins’ (Eph. 2:5 kjv), ‘alienated from the life of God’ (Eph. 4:18). Secondly, death is physical, separation of the soul from the body. Physical death is more familiar to us since we see physical death in others and in the recurring biblical references to the departure of the spirit at death. The third aspect, ‘second death’ (Rev. 20:14) belongs to the eschaton, not a consideration in Genesis 2.

This understanding is enforced without question in the physical death of the Savior: ‘Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost’ (Luke 23:46 kjv). Recent Bible Versions which change the recurrent ‘gave up the ghost [or spirit]’ of the King James and other older Versions to ‘breathed his last’ or some similar expression are yielding far too much to current culture and modes of speech.

Physical death follows spiritual death, being its consequence—sometimes occurring in the womb, sometimes being delayed 969 years (Gen. 5:27).

The alienation of Adam and Eve from the Lord God and loss of holiness is manifest in their hiding from Him and their efforts to conceal their nakedness. Their feelings of guilt come forth in their new sense of shame, and evasive response to God’s questions (Gen. 3:7–12). These facts require no expert exegesis. They are readily understood in early childhood. Children are easily taught modesty about nakedness and early know both shame and guilty feelings.

In due time physical death came also. Of course if God ever planned a heaven and earth to be populated by the myriads of Psalm 72:16 and Revelation 5:11; 7:9, then the lengthened physical lives of Adam and Eve were in the plan. God did not simply and graciously decide to remit the words ‘in the day ... you shall surely die.’ It is, was and always has been usual (‘normal’ is the wrong word) for physical death to come after an extended period of physical life, even for fallen mankind (Heb.

9:27). How could it be otherwise if the human race was to survive? These obvious facts must occupy our attention, however briefly, because it is being said by some that God did not carry out His threat of immediate death. (R. C. Sproul, among others, asserts this in a video lecture.)

There is no reason why the physical regenerative processes inherent in human physical nature could not continue to perpetuate life indefinitely. Death is not per se a physical necessity. Yet God set a schedule in mankind so that in each of us, at a certain point, the forces of dissolution become greater than the forces of growth and regeneration. Put another way, life is like a fire, not the fuel and oxygen that maintain it. The fire weakens and goes out when the supplies give out. A. H. Strong proposed still another way of approaching the difficulty, a law of grace to resist the ‘law of sin and death’:

In a true sense death began at once. To it belonged all the pains which both man and woman should suffer in their appointed callings.... [T]hat man’s earthly existence did not at once end, was due to God’s counsel of redemption. ‘The law of the Spirit of life’ (Rom. 8:2) began to work even then, and grace began to counteract the effects of the Fall. Christ has now ‘abolished death’ (2 Tim. 2:10) by taking its terrors away, and by turning it into the portal of heaven. He will destroy it utterly (1 Cor. 15:26) when by resurrection from the dead, the saints shall be made immortal.¹

The Sanctions of the Law of God

The state of death into which Adam fell by sin involved the sanctions of that moral order of the universe which may rightly be called divine law. Whether, and by what means, the entire human race fell with Adam, and is affected by those sanctions of the law of God, also are matters which urgently call for attention later. The sanctions of God’s law were three: (1) depravity, or corruption of nature; (2) guilt, or blameworthiness, deserving of punishment (Latin reatus culpae—hence our word culpable—meaning accused state of blameworthiness); and (3) penalty (Latin reatus poenae, hence such words as penal, penology) meaning an accused state of deserving punishment, viz. punishment by the author of the moral law, to whom all rational creatures are responsible. This is called ‘the wrath of God’ in Scripture. Sometimes writers speak of only two sanctions imposed by God as consequences of the first sin of mankind—depravity (or corruption of nature) and guilt. In such a case, guilt is understood to include not only the fact of blameworthiness, as in courtroom language, when a jury reports, ‘we find the defendant guilty as charged’ but also obligation to suffer punishment, as when a judge announces ‘I sentence you to be hanged by the neck until dead.’ In the narrower sense guilty defines what the offender’s state is, and penalty defines the consequence as a debt owed to justice. The former cannot be changed by anything at all; the latter can be removed by suffering the penalty, i. e. the punishment due in exact proportion to the offense committed—hence ‘An eye for an eye ... burn for burn’ (Matt. 5:38, 39; Exod. 21:24, 25; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21). Not vindictive, but vindicative punishment, serving divine justice, rendering service to what is right.

I conclude this necessarily brief summary on the subject of the theological meaning of Genesis 3:1–6 with a pronouncement of Wolfhart Pannenberg, sometimes cited as a guide to conservative theological renewal:

We engage in sin because of the deception. Our voluntary committing of it is enough to make us guilty [we don’t need original sin!]. There does not have to be a primal and one-for-all event of a fall for which Adam was guilty quite apart from all entanglement in sin. Paul certainly follows the paradise story when he says that ‘one man’s trespass led to condemnation for all men’ (Rom. 5:18). But this was because ‘all men sinned as Adam did’ (Rom. 5:12). Adam was simply the first sinner. In him began the temptation by the power of sin that still seduces us all today. All of us sin because we think we can attain a full and true life thereby. In this sense the story of Adam’s sin is the story of the whole race. It is repeated in each individual.²

This is the error preached by Pelagius and his disciples which called forth from Augustine of Hippo his most earnest and perennially applicable polemical and apologetical writings—called ‘Anti-Pelagian’ writings. Augustine saw in this theology the very spear-point of the devil’s strategy to empty the Christian message of the pure grace of God.³ So much for one of the lions of the supposed revived Protestant orthodoxy in late twentieth-century Europe. He teaches the heresy of Pelagius, condemned by every orthodox body of Christians.

V. Judgment, and Grace for Perpetuation of Mankind

Such were the immediate personal, spiritual and moral consequences of Adam’s sin. These, however, were not the only consequences, for life would now be different for the race from what they might have been if the probation had succeeded. ‘Of all the sad words of tongue or pen,/The saddest are these: It might have been.’ There would be changes in their bodies, for ‘the law of sin and death’ had now taken effect. The mutual relation of man and wife and man with man will now be vitiated by selfishness, pride and all the other fruits of concupiscence, i.e. natural desires gone wrong. And, if life and the generations were to go on to consummation in that restored paradise of a new heaven and a new earth, then a working world-order of human life, under divine providence, yet under the dominion of sin and the devil, would have to be established.

The third chapter of Genesis, with parts of chapter four, reinforced by the whole of sacred Scripture, specifies, reports, hints at what the newly adjusted world-order would be. To treat this fully requires a fair-sized book. I have written (but not yet published) such a book: Human Life After the Fall: A Sociology for Sinners. For present purposes some observations on Genesis 3:14–24 will set the stage for the doctrine of sin (hamartiology) to follow.

The form of Genesis 3:14–19 is a series of judicial sentences, first upon the serpent, then upon the woman and last upon the man. Yet in each case, even of ‘the serpent,’ there is a bit of grace.

1. The Serpent (vv. 14 and 15)

Our discussion must be limited. The first promise of redemption of the fallen race is here, as asserted in every age of the church and in the ancient Jewish synagogue as well.⁴ No one should read these verses as applying solely to an animal (snake) which, because it must crawl on its belly, will swallow much dust. The curse is on the devil (see Rev. 12:9 for the identification). Satan’s time is now limited. Though he shall afflict the race he shall be crushed ultimately by the seed of the woman (seed may be singular or plural; here it is singular as in Gal. 3:16), the Last Adam, even though Satan will inflict great injury on Him. What is only hinted here becomes explicit in the whole of the Bible, especially Isaiah 53. (Delitzsch’s learned comments, being those of a Christian Jew, are recommended.⁵ For the opposite extreme of critical liberalism see John Skinner).⁶

2. The Woman (v. 16)

Though addressed to Eve personally, the sentence is for her as archetypal woman, womanhood throughout the ages. There is infinite mercy and grace in the sentence. It is here that we begin to see the adjustments the fall made necessary in certain aspects of human behavior. These are chiefly in the conditions of family life. Here we are enlightened as to how the race can continue through stresses and tensions in relative domestic peace and social common weal—how among a race of corrupted, guilty sinners under the sentence of death (Heb. 9:27) the domestic virtues of home and family can even exist. What life might have been if our first parents had successfully passed their probation, and a holy society had developed, we cannot know. It certainly would have been different.

1. A very important facet of the new situation for womanhood is multiplied conception: ‘I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception.’

Before proceeding, a matter of translation must be addressed. A literal rendering of the Hebrew results in the above (essentially the same in kjv, asv, rv and nasv marg.). Eve will now have both more pains and more pregnancies. Several recent Versions, beginning with rsv (and now even esv), change the sense from two things to one thing. The two things of the Hebrew text and of the 1611 Version are an increase in pains (sorrows) for woman (again Eve is an archetype) and an increase in the number of children she will conceive and bear. The one thing of the new translations is neither of the two but something else, namely, ‘I will greatly increase your pains in childbearing.’

The two are said to be an hendiadys, a Greek word which means one-through-two. As nearly as I can trace it, E. A. Speiser spread this notion many years ago through his influence on a now older generation of scholars. For reasons I find utterly unconvincing, Speiser insisted on hendiadys as a strong feature of Genesis. No other author in the Anchor Bible series whom I have read makes such a big deal of hendiadys.⁷

Hendiadys does exist in the Hebrew Bible, but Genesis 3:16 is not an example of it. Sorrow and conception are not two phases or expressions of one idea. Quite the contrary. The whole human race seems quite agreed that there is much pleasure in connection with conception of babies (and far too much preoccupied). The sorrow comes later and lasts for years. As a matter of fact ‘sorrow’ or ‘pain’ appears later in the verse and as a separate member of the four-member address to the woman. Is the whole verse about sorrows for females? I think not! Bible translations are like many other things; improvements may be irregular; and not every new rendering is better than the old. Translators, like department stores, do follow fads. The coming of death for every person (‘It is appointed unto man once to die’) required ‘a quantum leap’ in the number of conceptions and births if the race were not to end soon. Each married couple must produce more than one or two offspring, or instead of ‘increase and multiply’ we have ‘decrease and disappear’—as the Swedes are now grudgingly acknowledging of their new contraceptive society.

Women must now bear more children to perpetuate the race, since death has modified the social equation. If death had not entered, every baby born would have become a permanent inhabitant of earth. Countless generations would have become contemporary. Now, on the contrary, since death soon removes each generation within a few decades, every couple on the average must produce at least three offspring who survive to procreate children of their own, to fulfill the command to ‘multiply and replenish the earth’—two to replace themselves; one for minimal increase.

2. Closely related but of wider reference than to the mere act of motherhood is, ‘I will surely multiply your pain.’ The word ‘tsabbon’ is used only three times in the Old Testament: once of the pains of the male earning a living from the soil (Gen. 3:17), once of the tragic sorrow of all human kind (Gen. 5:29); and here of female pains through the whole of life. Woman (man, female) surely does experience more sorrow and pain than man, male, does. From adolescence onward there is the recurring menstrual cycle with all its familiar complications, disorders and inconveniences. Motherhood is her normal vocation while fatherhood (i.e. siring offspring) can be, and nowadays frequently is, only an avocation. No loving husband who has stood by her side and listened to her cries in travail of childbirth can doubt that God did greatly increase her pain. One cannot suppose childbirth would have been like this in paradise.

Happily God made some more necessary adjustments to ‘fine tune’ the social machine. Otherwise the human race would have died out at the beginning. Why would any mentally balanced woman desire marriage under the conditions of increased conception and increase of severe pains of life (as well as the perils to life in childbirth itself)—given also a fallen, self-serving disposition (depravity) as well? And granting she did marry, why should she continue to sleep with her husband when childbirth has become a burden? This question is answered next.

3. There comes, then, a third adjustment in human nature, an inherent attraction to her husband: ‘Your desire shall be for your husband’ (v. 16). This means she desires her husband and not the other way around. The whole world is familiar with the pervasive, aggressive male desire for and interest in the female. Because men know this passion so well in themselves, many of them suppose they understand it in their women. However, understanding of the mystery of womanhood on this score will not come to a man by projecting his own feelings. Woman is dispositioned to desire and need a husband along the whole range of life together—though this is not to say women do not cope with widowhood better than most men do. Desire (I am told by good authority) is not initially focused on coitus as in the male. Adult maidenhood has well-known drawbacks; it is seldom deliberately chosen as a way of life.

The interpretation I have just given of ‘Your desire shall be for your husband’ is the common one among many conservative Protestants (e.g. G. J. Wenham),⁸ as well as some liberal critics (e.g. John Skinner)⁹ and Jewish scholars, e.g. U. Cassuto¹⁰, who puts his learning into practical aphorism: ‘Measure for measure, you influenced your husband and caused him to do what you wished; henceforth, you and your female descendants will be subservient to your husbands. You will yearn for them, but they will be the heads of the families, and will rule over you.’¹¹

Susan Foh in the Westminster Theological Journal (37, 1974/75, pp. 376–383), and later in a book of which she alone was author, and finally in a symposium,¹² set forth the view—quite insistently—that the woman’s urge (or desire) toward her husband (Gen. 3:16) is not a sexual craving or general interest in meeting his demands and needs but a desire, said to be universal among wives, to dominate their husbands. Exegetical support is thought to be found in use of the same word, desire (teshuqah), for sin's 'desire' to dominate Cain (Gen. 4:7). I do not know if this interpretation originated with Mrs. Foh. (Her views on the subject of the scriptural position of women in home and church are traditional, with which I concur. I simply do not support her view of the clause 'your desire shall be to [dominate] your husband.') The third and only other occurrence of teshuqah in the Hebrew Bible is in Song of Solomon (7:10) where erotic love is the subject. So why not here in Gen. 3:16? Mrs. Foh cites no supporting scholars, ancient or modern. In a debate with her in the symposium (Women in Ministry) cited above I concluded with the following:

There are enough agreed consequences of the sin of our first parents ... we struggle with these grim theological and personal realities every day. We do not need another one—a putative, inevitable husband-wife contest for power. Let us be spared this till-now-undiscovered consequence of the Fall.¹³

Interest in a husband first appears in a young girl toward her father. (The words for man, male, and for husband are the same both in Hebrew and Greek.) It expands, changes direction and grows in adolescence; flowers in courtship and wedding; bears fruit and matures in the marriage-relation, children, home and extended family. It is perverted thinking to deny these things and futile as well as harmful to oppose them. This interest lasts as long as life. God has blessed it (Ps. 127, 128), yet it has its drawbacks, as every wife knows. Great harm has been done through unhistorical, unrealistic, unbiblical expectations. It is cruel to romanticize marriage out of the true shape of reality. Nothing causes quite such bitter disappointment and resultant frustration as failure of unjustified expectation. Marriage, as it took shape under the conditions of sin, was not designed by Him who blessed it, to be blissful. Bliss is reserved for heaven. Its very perpetuation requires built-in tensions—a yin and a yang. The racial dynamic is partly built upon them.

4. This leads to the fourth and last of the adjustments in the female role in life, like the other three, written more in female human constitution than in new laws of behavior: 'and he [husband] shall rule over you' (3:16).

That there should be a precedence of authority of the man in marriage is not the result of the Fall according to F. Delitzsch. 'The subordination of the woman to the man was intended from the beginning; but now the harmony of their mutual wills in God is destroyed, this subordination becomes subjection.... That slavish subjection of the woman to the man which was customary in the ancient world, and still is so in the East, and which revealed religion made more tolerable and consistent with her human dignity, is the result of sin.'¹⁴

That there should be a precedence of authority of the husband in marriage is not the result of the fall. Jesus gives us the example of returning to prelapsarian precedent in such matters, saying in regard to the lamentable prevalence of divorce in His day and the Mosaic concession, 'from the beginning it was not so,' referring to the initial establishment of marriage in Eden (Matt. 19:8) and, drawing His doctrine from Genesis 2:24, 25, made the original marriage mandates still valid (Matt. 19:3–6). So it is of greatest significance that of the archetypal pair in Eden that the woman was taken out of Adam's side and created, made for the man and not the other way around. We will suspend treatment for present purposes of 'I will make him a helper fit for him' (Gen. 2:18).

There is a rather large current literature on husband-wife relations in Bible times. The Bible itself provides some extended vignettes—the homes of the folk in the book of Ruth, the parents of Samuel, of Samson, of the virtuous woman of Proverbs 31. Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary demonstrate the godly shalom—‘Peace be upon this house’—that actually prevailed. This contrasts sharply with the degradation of women throughout most of the pagan societies of old.¹⁵ Paul tells us plainly what this means in 1 Corinthians 11:3–12.

One hesitates to comment on account of heated controversy over the role of women. It is my opinion if the plain teachings of this and all relevant texts were better known and accepted as normative much of the debate among believers, at least, would soon subside. Let this much be said:

Viewed as a whole, the Bible explains and amplifies what is called the ‘submission’ of wives to husbands and the leadership of men in the church’s congregational life, chiefly to demonstrate that it is not repressive for those whom Peter—to the disgust of some feminists—calls ‘the weaker vessel.’ This will be the case, however, only under the condition of a civilization whose basic ethic is of biblical origin. The universal effect of paganism has been the degrading of womanhood, while the effect of Christianity on pagan culture has been uniformly a proper emancipation of women. There is a whole literature on the history of how Christianity purified the ancient Roman world of heathen practice regarding abortion, exposure of infants, divorce, both oppression and false elevation of women, and sanctifying family contra pagan practices, whether savage, barbarian or ‘civilized.’

In the present apparent progressive paganizing of Western culture it is not hard to discern the regression of our women, both single, adult women (of whom there is a growing ratio) and the married, to drudgery and oppressive time-schedules under harsh conditions of marketplace and business office for which they were never intended by the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the Father of all mercies. The so-called post-Christian era, now in mid-stage, seems already to be regressing backward rapidly as the enslavement of women to men’s work, with frantic encouragement from many quarters, progresses. The fearful cost in the lives of unhappy, dysfunctional families, broken homes, social disorder is frightful and the end, though easy to predict, not pleasant to contemplate.

3. The Man (vv. 3:17–19)

The divine sentences on the woman relate primarily to the future of home and family life. Those directed toward the man relate more to the human race in the total natural environment in which the history of human civilization would develop over the tempestuous millennia until ‘the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ and he shall reign forever.’ They are threefold: the ground was cursed ‘because of you,’ he was condemned to hard labor and he would ultimately have to die. While we must think of these as punishments, as in the case of many divine punishments short of the final one, the punishments are also preservative and pedagogic, i.e. designed to keep the race alive through the generations, and representing God’s gracious means of directing the thoughts of men toward better eternal things.

1. Cursing of the Ground

‘[C]ursed is the ground for thy sake’ (kju v. 17). Notice of this is significantly repeated later in connection with the birth of Noah (meaning ‘comfort’): ‘Out of the ground that the Lord has cursed this one shall bring us relief from our work and from the painful toil of our hands' (Gen. 5:29)—showing that many generations later mankind were suffering under the curse and understood why. Paul refers to the curse in Romans 8:20, 21, 'For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (asv) and adds that the present creation is groaning and travailing in pain. This curse may not mean that any important change in what we call nature occurred outside Eden. The very presence of sin and death in the earthly lord of creation, who was charged to 'subdue' the earth, was in itself to be in bondage to corruption. In such a case the blood of Abel (the first human death and first murder) brought forth from earth (in a figurative manner of speaking) a groan of protest (Gen. 4:10, 11) and a severe resistance to Cain's tilling of the ground as well (Gen. 4:12), as any one who has fought weeds with a hoe understands very well. No generation of the sons of Adam and Eve has escaped these consequences of the curse upon the very ground upon which we walk and which produces either immediately or mediately all our food, clothing and shelter.

2. Condemnation to Hard Labor (vv. 17b–19a)

Very severe labor is specified, for 'by the sweat of thy nose thou shalt eat bread' (v. 18, my translation). The standard Versions all miss this, avoiding, I suppose, the displeasing image of a bent figure in a hot field, hands gripping weeds or hoe or plough, with a stream of sweat falling off the end of the nose. The nose is used instead of face because the author intends to represent a worker bent over, breathless and panting from vigorous exertion. Sorrow (pain) shall always accompany his work to earn a living from earth—whether in primary contact as a farmer or several stages removed as in the case of a physician or salesman. Even old age will not end that ('all the days of your life ... till you return to the ground'), as everyone who has lived into old age knows only too well. If there were no pain of hard labor in life there would be no 'Lord, How long?' If no affliction there would be less longing for heaven. Redemption already promised (Gen. 3:15) does not mean we are not 'by nature children of wrath' (Eph. 2:3), but it is not necessary to remain 'Accursed children' (2 Peter 2:14).

3. Death and the Return of the Body to the Ground (v. 19)

'[T]ill you return to the ground ... to dust you shall return.' Adam was made from dust ('aphar') of the ground (adhamah) (Gen. 2:7). There is more than a mere play on words. Even mankind in paradise had no reason to put on airs, for he was of common clay, albeit capable of endless life. Now his life-term is limited. Let us observe the following.

Firstly, Eve shared in this severe sentence, being taken 'out of man' and, being also disobedient to the command, she was subject to the threat (2:17).

Secondly, it is perfectly natural in Hebrew idiom to understand that the threat of physical death, following spiritual apostasy and death, should not take place immediately. Hosea 13:1 states, 'Ephraim ... incurred guilt through Baal and died.' Spoken not long before Ephraim, i.e. the northern kingdom of Israel, came to an end by military defeat. It was in consequence of a previous apostasy long before, when Ephraim rejected a pure worship of the one true God. Designed by his creator to walk the path of the righteous that shines brighter and brighter until full day (Prov. 4:18), by reason of his apostasy Adam came instead to judgment, death and the grave. Yet, by redemption and restoration to God's fellowship, life was possible. Thus Adam, by the name he gave his wife, 'Mother of All Living,' expressed faith in the offered redemption, as did their son Abel (Gen. 4:4; Heb. 11:4). There was still strong faith in the future. Hope had not been abandoned.

Thirdly, Old Testament religion, from these verses on to the end, was aware of the connection of death as a returning to the ground. I do not think it too much to say that believers throughout biblical history knew the story of Genesis 1–3, of death and the grave as penalty for sin, and of promised redemption.¹⁶ References to the subject in later stages of the biblical story reflect the very language of Genesis 3. 'You return man to dust and say, "Return, O children of man!"' (The Prayer of Moses, Ps. 90:3). '[W]hen you take away their breath [man and beast], they die and return to their dust' (Ps. 104:29). Elihu proclaims, '[A]ll flesh would perish together, and man would return to dust' (Job 34:15). 'All are from the dust, and to dust all return,' says the Preacher (Eccles. 3:20) and 'The dust returns to the earth as it was' (Eccles. 12:7). 'So and So died and was buried' is standard biblical formula, expressing the same in different words. The preference for burial over cremation or other disposal of the bodies of the dead throughout the Christian era is in part a continuation of the same biblical awareness—'We have borne the image of the earthy but shall bear the image of the heavenly!' 'Massa's in the cold, cold ground' (Stephen Foster), 'All valiant dust that builds on dust' (Recessional, R. Kipling) and hundreds of other hymns and poems perpetuate the repulsive but fascinating mystery of universal, inevitable—no exceptions—return to the ground of every child of Eve.

These are the three aspects of change for man, male, thrust out of paradise: (1) the very ground cursed; (2) universal condemnation to hard labor; and (3) the humiliation of death and return to the ground. They are of supreme significance in explaining life in all ages under the condition of sin. All three are heavy restraints upon the excesses of that ambitious aggressor, the untamed male of our species. Though earth challenges his effort and may even inspire him to work, she very reluctantly, in most cases, yields her fruits. He must toil to exhaustion to gather them (from a crop of peanuts to an ounce of uranium). Ultimately he must give them all back to the earth and return to her himself. There are no exceptions among either the rich and famous, the poor and lowly, both saints and sinners.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power

All that beauty, All the wealth e'er gave

Await alike the inevitable hour;

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.¹⁷

'You return man to dust and say, "Return, O children of man!"'—spoken by one who lived to 120 years of age, whose eye was not dim nor his natural force abated, Moses, the man of God (Ps. 90:3; cf. Deut. 34:7).

Yet in a society of sinners, this is how life is and must be if man, male, is to be the breadwinner, faithful husband and loving father. His wife is relieved of the excesses of his pursuit of his passions simply because toil has stolen from him the inclination to pursue them. If he is to be fit to live with, let him not have too many days off!

VI. The Beginnings of Civilization in the Fallen Race (Gen. 4)

Civilization never had a chance to develop in a society of sinless people. So no one knows what customs and institutions, aside from family, might have developed. So the narrative continues immediately with initial developments of civilization among the growing population of sinful bearers of the noble image of God.

At this point some theological schools of thought begin to talk about covenants—of works and grace, or of nature and grace—as a category of thought for developing a theology of God’s dealing with the human race through ensuing ages. The Reformers frequently spoke of the covenant of salvation by grace through faith on the ground of ‘the redemption which is in Christ Jesus.’ But the invention of what came to be called Federal, or Covenant Theology, was largely a seventeenth-century development, even though Calvin and immediate successors spoke of the covenant of salvation and similar expressions. This is acknowledged by its best representatives.¹⁸ Though by no means uniformly adopted, it is common among Presbyterian, Reformed, a few Lutheran and even some leading Baptists, as Gill and Spurgeon.

More recently many other theologians have spoken of developments in God’s management of the ages of sinful humanity under the category of ‘dispensations.’ This nineteenth-century development was crystallized in the Scofield Bible of 1909. It was a very popular Bible until about 1960. The notes became a systematic theology of sorts for multitudes, after liberalism took over the seminaries where pastors had formerly received their education. Such was my first personal Bible—in an epoch when many families could afford only one Bible. The Scofield Bible was modified in interaction with covenant theologians and others in the New Scofield Bible of 1967 and dispensational theology is being modified further among representatives in several different schools and denominations.

One should be aware of these presently vigorously debated approaches to understanding what has been called ‘God’s plan of the ages.’ Each has a certain limited validity and should not be discouraged except to observe that each may be too rigorously applied. Then they fall into conflict.

Dr. Buswell presents an extensive discussion on human life in this age,¹⁹ prefacing it with an extensive comparison of covenantal and dispensational approaches.²⁰ In this he is unique and, for those unacquainted with this subject, quite informative. Yet, as he proceeds, his commitment to covenant thinking does not seem to reduce his valuable remarks for readers not persuaded of his Federalism. Which leads me to say that the biblical record furnishes no comprehensive category under which to subsume these developments. What we do see in Genesis 4, in my judgment, is the beginnings of civilization, i.e. the activities and institutions of mankind, informally defined, in a society as they prevail to the present.

1. The Human Family. (See the addendum at the end of the chapter)

One of the first activities (and perhaps institutions) of the family is the exercise of religion, each of the two sons engaging in formal worship of God the Creator. Some, especially those who like to employ the rubric of ‘covenants,’ call this ‘institution’ the church. Yet, however much validity the concept of covenant has in this connection, it seems unhistorical to use either word for this activity, for which no English words except religion and worship seem to fit.

2. Religious Worship

One brother's worship was true worship as it was ever intended to be among a race of believing sinners, 'By faith Abel offered to God a more acceptable sacrifice' (Heb. 11:4), the other's false, essentially an anti-worship form of religion, 'Cain ... was of the evil one and murdered his brother' (1 John 3:11, 12). It was a 'way' rather than a worship—'they walked in the way of Cain' (Jude 11). Civilized life has supported both religions ever since, both competing for mankind's allegiance throughout our lifelong journey through the valley of the shadow—the one a vivifying hope, the other a hopeless ministry of death unto death. Here is the true answer to the philosophers' quest for the origin of religion. Generic religion does not exist. There are really only religions, and basically only two of them, both arising out of our need to return to God from alienation brought by sin—one a revealed religion of grace and another that pervasive, false, natural religion of human merit.

Forms and Observances (Liturgy?)

There is a hint of an appointed time in the Hebrew, i.e. 'at the end of days' ('In the course of time,' v. 3). The idiom is not clear. It might have been seven days and related to a Sabbath command (Gen. 2:3; Exod. 20:11; Neh. 9:14). Perhaps there was also an appointed place known as 'the Lord's presence' (4:3, 'to the Lord;' 4:16, 'the presence of the Lord').

The exegetical base of this distinction is less than definitive, yet it seems proper to note that both men seem aware of the importance of sacrifice. The Levitical language of slaughtered sacrifice is not used of either son's offering (Gen. 4:2, 3). The flesh of animals may not yet have been used for food. Presumably the fleece and skin of sheep and goats were used for clothing and other purposes. Perhaps Abel kept a diary! Each brought to God what his life-work produced, though Cain brought only a portion of grain and Abel from the choicest of his flock. It is not without significance, however, that these two members of the first generation born in our race were aware of the appropriateness of a 'gift' (Heb. minḥah) to be formally presented to God as an act of worship. One cannot avoid thinking of 'without the shedding of blood there is no remission' and applying the atonement theology of John 1:29 and Isaiah 53. There was excellence of some sort, for Hebrews 11:4 calls Abel's 'a better sacrifice' (niv). Though perhaps it was wholly Abel's faith which rendered it so.

We are on solid ground in asserting that Abel's worship was accepted as pleasing to God because he had a heart of faith. H. C. Leupold remarks:

But the significant thing, noticed by Luther and most commentators since, is that this regarding with favor directs itself first to the person, then to the offering; so in the case of both the brothers. This fact very significantly shows that the determining factor in worship is the attitude of the individual. Him or his heart, God weighs. If he is not found wanting, the gift is acceptable. If he fails to please the Almighty, his gift is reprobate.

This fact is so important that it alone is stated.²¹

Hebrews 11:4 plainly says faith—the indispensable condition of salvation—was present in Abel and, if so, then based on some word from God to be believed and obeyed (Rom. 10:17). It is, of course, not unlikely that the 'word' from God was an impulse silently placed there by the Spirit of God. These remarks are in agreement with Delitzsch,²² Keil²³ and Oehler.²⁴ Gerhard Von Rad, to the contrary, if I understand his terse remarks correctly, thinks the narrative means God was more pleased with ‘the sacrifice of blood’ because ‘the narrator wants to remove the acceptance of the sacrifice from man and place it completely within God’s free will.’²⁵

These forms and truths were ever destined to be the heart of true worship of God, of true religion: (1) a place of recurring assembly; (2) ‘the presence of the Lord’ (cf. Heb. 10:25, not neglecting John 4:24); (3) a recurring time of assembly (whether on a first or seventh day of the week); (4) a basis in required sacrifice; and (5) a faithful heart.

Natural folk religion is ‘the way of Cain.’ The unbelief of Cain and the faith of Abel cannot humanly speaking be explained at all, except for what theology calls special grace. Perhaps Cain was not a bad boy and Abel a good boy. Apart from this work of the Spirit in Abel’s heart there would have been no faith. Abel would have been another Cain. Cain observed good religious forms, perhaps about the same as Abel’s, but just that—forms without heart faith. He came trusting the fruit of his own best effort, singing, so to speak, the very denial of ‘Nothing in my hand I bring, simply to thy cross I cling.’ His religion turned out to be vicious hate both for the true worshipper and his faith. The results, as for all ‘will worship’ and unbelief were disastrous: disappointment (vv. 5, 6), slavery to sin (v. 7), deeper depravity (vv. 8, 9), further disapproval by God (vv. 10–12), misery in this life (vv. 13, 14) and ultimately alienation from God forever. There is nevertheless a possibility for a better ending. God’s last act on Cain’s behalf was one of grace, a mark on Cain to lengthen his life and give space to repent. We shall have to wait for the rest of the story.

3. Two Lines of Family Descent

Let us observe that civilization developed in two lines of family descent. The majority population were of the lineage of Cain the apostate, both genetic and spiritual; the minority—a remnant group it finally turned out to be—the genetic and spiritual lineage of Seth, who replaced Abel in the succession of righteous offspring of our first parents. This is only obliquely reported in the statement of verse 26: ‘To Seth also a son was born, and he called his name Enosh. At that time people began to call upon the name of the Lord.’ It has ever been so from that day to this.

4. Horticulture and Husbandry

We are made aware of the immediate development of horticulture in Cain, who brought to God the fruits of his farm, and of animal husbandry in Abel, who brought the best of his flock and the fat of a slaughtered specimen of the flock. Again, it seems doubtful that flocks were kept solely for wool and hide and for sacrifice to God. Surely they served for food as well. A major portion of the diet of many bedouin to this day is milk, butter and cheese from flocks of sheep and goats.

5. Arts, Industry and Philosophy

Arts were quick to follow, for in a few generations there were those who ‘play the lyre and pipe’ (v. 21), also metallurgical industry, forging ‘all instruments of bronze and iron’ (v. 22). Such developments require the gathering of population into centers, hence early in the history there was at least one city (v. 17).

The several sciences dealing with human antiquity do not help to sort out details of the springing up of culture in the early generations of mankind—urban development (vv. 16, 17), industry (vv. 20–22), philosophical and artistic expression (vv. 19, 23, 24). Modern science does not think these arose quickly. I have no desire to demean either Genesis or the labors of earnest scientists. Perhaps there is some foreshortening of perspective in verses 16–24: by omission of intervening generations. For our purposes, the important truth is that it all happened in a society of mankind impaired by the loss of moral integrity and in a climate of spiritual apostasy. There was as yet no coercive government to require civil order. Nothing was guaranteed. A steady decline toward a universal divine judgment (the Deluge), followed by a new world-order among fallen humanity, is not surprising at all. I have written at length of these matters elsewhere.²⁶

An Addendum

The monogamous family consisting of a conjugal union of a man and a woman of child-bearing age, with their children, is the basic social unit and engine of human civilization. As the integrity of this family and no other in morally upright parents and obedient children prevails, so the order and ‘general welfare’ of human society is achieved.

This arrangement for the population of the earth and happiness of its residents was provided for in the created nature of our first parents as well as in the two Scripture mandates of Genesis 1:28 (‘Be fruitful and multiply and replenish [fill] the earth’ kjv) and Genesis 2:21–24 (‘Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh’ kjv). The first mandates the procreation of children by every male and female pair and the second that sexual activity and procreation occur only within the bonds of permanent monogamous marriage of one man and one woman.

We cannot know how this would have worked out if the first couple had continued in full moral and spiritual integrity. How it would develop under the condition of sin is introduced to the narrative briefly in Genesis 3:13 ff as noted earlier in this chapter (pp. 313–317).

This venue does not allow full treatment of this urgent matter. The Scripture doctrine of marriage and family is superbly expounded by John Murray (Principles of Conduct: Aspects of Biblical Ethics, pages 45–81). I know of nothing more convincing and accurate. The Howard Center for Family, Religion and Society, 934 North Main St., Rockford Illinois 61103 under the direction of Allan Carlson publishes The Family in America, a monthly magazine and other excellent literature on the subject.

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 590.

² Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology ii, trans. G. W. Bromiely (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), p. 263.

³ These writings have been sifted out of the immense number of surviving writings of Augustine and published as Volume 5 of NPNF. Let the interested reader begin with ‘A Treatise on Nature and Grace’ (NPNF, pp. 115–151).

⁴ Franz Delitzsch, New Commentary on Genesis (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 1888), p. 164, note 2.

⁵ ibid., pp. 160–165.

⁶ John Skinner, Genesis (ICC Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1910, 1950), pp. 71, 72.

⁷ E. A. Speiser, Genesis: Introduction, Translation and Notes, Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1964), p. 24.

⁸ G. J. Wenham, Word Biblical Commentary: Genesis 1–15 (Waco, TX: Word Books, 1987), pp. 81, 82.

⁹ John Skinner, op. cit., pp. 82, 83.

¹⁰ U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Genesis (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew Univ., 1944, 1978).

¹¹ ibid., pp. 165, 166.

¹² Robert & Bonnidell Clouse, ed., Women In Ministry, Four Views (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1989).

¹³ Clouse, ibid., p. 109.

¹⁴ Delitzsch, op. cit., p. 166.

¹⁵ Consult books on manners and customs and biblical antiquities. One of the best is an old one in Biblical Archaeology [Antiquities] by F. C. Keil, vol. i, pp. 150–202. Roland deVaux's, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions (New York: McGraw Hill), Part I is helpful. Also articles on marriage, children, etc. especially P. Trutze, "Marriage" in ZPEB, vol. iv.

¹⁶ Under the rubric, 'Sin, Death and Life' Pannenberg furnishes a useful guide to modern ideas in liberal theology about death as a consequence (divine penalty) of, or as a normal consequence of, finitude and other views. He also brings Jewish views—ancient and later—to the subject. He says the resurrection of Christ puts the subject in a 'new light' but as near to an orthodox statement as he comes is the closing sentence: 'We achieve liberation from sin and death only when the image of the Son takes place through the operation of the Spirit of God'. op. cit., pp. 267–275.

¹⁷ Thomas Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard, lines 33–36.

¹⁸ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), pp. 362, 363. J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962, 1971), p. 308. B. B. Warfield, Biblical & Theological Studies (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), pp. 268, 269.

¹⁹ op. cit., pp. 344–428.

²⁰ op. cit., pp. 267–268.

²⁰ op. cit., pp. 307–320.

²¹ H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Genesis i (Columbus, OH: The Wartburg Press, 1942), pp. 196, 197.

²² Delitzsch, op. cit., pp. 129–131.

²³ J. K. F. Keil, Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament, vol. i Pentateuch (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, n.d.), pp. 109–111.

²⁴ G. F. Oehler, Old Testament Theology (New York: Funk & Wagnalls Publ., 1883), pp. 54, 55.

²⁵ Gerhard Von Rad, Genesis: A Commentary, trans. J. H. Marks (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1961), p. 101.

²⁶ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government: A Biblical View (Edmonton, Alberta: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology, and Public Policy, 2000), p. 208.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (311). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

Fallen Mankind in the Order of Nature

Nature, in the sense of the earth, all in it and all that pertains to it, is intended by ‘order of nature’ in this chapter. It is the subject of the study of what used to be called natural history, by definition ‘the study of zoology, botany, mineralogy, geology, and other subjects dealing with the physical world.’¹

We have already taken note of the fact that in consequence of Adam’s fall, there was a change in his relation to the earth from which he was formed and from whose soils he must draw his living—no longer by dressing and keeping a Garden (or paradise), but by working till the sweat drips from his nose! In that connection God’s sentence on Adam includes the striking sentence, ‘cursed is the ground because of you’ (Gen. 3:17).

An important fine point connected with a play on words and derivation is present in the Hebrew. Among the several available terms for ‘man’ the one used in verse 7 (rendered Adam but meaning ‘man’) is ʾadham. Now, the word for ground used later in the verse is ʾadhamah, the same as the word for ‘man’ except that ground is feminine gender. Hence we understand that in calling him ‘Adam’ (ʾadham) God is calling attention to his physical origin from the ground—‘the Lord God formed the man [ʾadham] of dust from the ground [ʾadhamah]’ (Gen. 2:7). Thus the derivation of the generic name and the first man’s personal name designates our ‘groundly’ origin and provides a key to why, once he was cursed for sinning, the ‘blessed ground’ from which he was taken had to be cursed also. It is apparently neither possible nor proper for a cursed man to gain his living from blessed ground!

The Goodness of Nature

Yet there is unquestionable evidence of Scripture that God's original pronouncement of 'good ... very good' on all He had made has never been revoked. Six times in all, in connection with each creative day except the second, it is said, 'God saw that it was good' and finally, 'God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good' (Gen. 1:31)—including mankind, male and female in that omnibus. Let us dispense for now with further examination of Hebrew words, for they add little or nothing by way of qualifications of what we intuitively understand by 'good' in the contexts of God's creative acts. Nor will we presently be diverted by disquisitions to define 'the good, the beautiful and the true.'

The Bible throughout, especially Psalm 104, joyfully proclaims the goodness of creation and the benevolence of the Creator, for the happiness of the human race and all God's lesser creatures.

Psalm 104, the marvelous hymn of creation, rhapsodizes:

You make springs gush forth in the valleys;

they flow between the hills;

they give drink to every beast of the field;

the wild donkeys quench their thirst.

Beside them the birds of the heavens dwell;

they sing among the branches.

From your lofty abode you water the mountains;

the earth is satisfied with the fruit of your work.

You cause the grass to grow for the livestock and plants for man to cultivate, that he may bring forth food from the earth and wine to gladden the heart of man, oil to make his face shine and bread to strengthen man's heart (Ps. 104:10–15).

The poem continues in this pleasant joyful train until near the end, after an address of praise to the Lord, a strange reversal of tone takes place with these harsh sounding words: 'Let sinners be consumed from the earth, and let the wicked be no more' (v. 35). Only two lines later, after another very brief address of praise, the poem abruptly ends. It is almost as if the poet had forgotten about sin and disorder as he contemplated the goodness of the natural order. When consciousness of evil deeds and evil men returned, he declared them to be out of place in God's earth and destined ultimately to be eliminated.

In What Consists the Curse of God on 'the Ground'?

This subject, introduced earlier, must now be more thoroughly considered. What then are we to say of 'cursed is the ground' and of thorns and thistles, also of tornadoes, earthquakes, floods, and other natural events disastrous to mankind and, at least at first glance, certainly not good?

Post-lapsarian mankind was to find nature perverse, unresponsive and only reluctantly fruitful. This was to be true of nature in her 'natural' state, as the roving Bedouin finds her, and likewise as modified by the efforts of the agriculturalist (i.e. the 'dirt farmer'). In the former case she gives not only grass, but also 'thorns and thistles' in the field; in the latter the hard ground compels endless grinding toil.

The New Testament explains the connection of the fall of mankind with the present condition of the order of nature as follows, 'For the creation waits with eager longing for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to futility [i.e. fruitlessness, failure of effort], not willingly [creation is unconscious and non-rational as such], but because of him [i.e. God] who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay [whether this be death in nature or perhaps defilement by mankind's sin and death is debatable] and obtain the freedom of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation has been groaning together in the pains of childbirth until now' (Rom. 8:19-22).

The curse may not consist solely in any divinely effected change in the material world per se. The man designated by his Creator to fill the earth with offspring and to 'have dominion over ... every living thing' animate and inanimate in or on it (Gen. 3:17) became a sinful creature capable of rapacious exploitation and perverted use of God's good earth and its treasures.

This view is skillfully stated by Robert Haldane, author of a renowned commentary on Romans. He comments:

What is called vanity in the twentieth verse is in the twenty-first denominated bondage of corruption. When the creation was brought into existence, God bestowed on it his blessing, and pronounced everything that he had made very good. Viewing that admirable palace which he had provided, he appointed man to reign in it, commanding all creation to be subject to him whom he had made in his own image. But when sin entered, then in a certain sense, it may be said that all things had become evil, and were diverted from their proper end. The creatures by their nature were appointed for the service of the friends of their Creator, but since the entrance of sin they have become subservient to his enemies. Instead of the sun and the heavens being honored to give light to those who obey God, and the earth to support the righteous, they now minister to rebels. The sun shines upon the wicked; the earth nourishes those who blaspheme their Maker, while its various products, instead of being employed for the glory of God, are used as instruments of ambition, of avarice, of intemperance, of cruelty, of idolatry, and are often employed for the destruction of his children. All these are subjected to vanity when applied by men for vain purposes.²

This view of ‘bondage to corruption’ and ‘cursed is the ground on your account’ is supported by certain Old Testament prophets:

Therefore I will take back my grain in its time, and my wine in its season,
and I will take away my wool and my flax, which were to cover her nakedness (Hos. 2:9).

Sometimes the creatures are represented as protesting against the wickedness and venality of mankind: ‘For the stone will cry out from the wall, and the beam from the woodwork respond’ (Hab. 2:11).

Human evil has, in this sense, polluted the whole natural order simply by being present, the malodorous, garrulous, disruptive guest at the party. The prevalence of evil and misery witness to the dishonor done to creation’s Author. It would be degrading the name of God to suppose that the present state of some of His works—wherein disorder and destruction are prevalent—is the same as that in which they were originally made or that they shall continue forever as they now are.

Dr. Franz Delitzsch interpreted the two passages just cited (Gen. 3:17, 18 and Rom. 8:19–22) in a similar fashion:

All nature stands ... in the closest actual relation to man, who is, in virtue of his personality, which is at once spiritual and material, the link between it and God. All that affects man affects at the same time that world of nature which was ordained for common development with himself. Man having fallen from communion with God, the world of nature became like him, its appointed head, subject to vanity, and needed as he did, redemption and restoration to recover its lost condition and high destination. Man, and with him nature, will, though by a long and indirect path at length attain to the ‘liberty of the glory’ (Romans 8:21), i.e. be free and glorified. Meanwhile the curse which has fallen upon the world has a reverse side of blessing for man. The curse is not peremptory, but pedagogic.³

Dr. Delitzsch goes on to affirm that nature in her resistance to mankind not only carries out God’s judgment on him, but in the discipline of the sweat of his brow opposes his pretensions to usurp God’s place and ‘awakens aspirations for heaven.’⁴

Because of the importance of his remarks I quote Oscar Cullmann somewhat at length:

We are ... concerned with a particular aspect of the more comprehensive relationship between redemption and creation. The creation is discussed not only on the first page of the Old Testament but throughout the Bible, right up to the very last page of the New Testament.

The fact that he is created in the image of God raises man, whom God created in the beginning, above all other creatures; but it also means that the whole creation has been drawn into the drama occasioned by man's sin. The earth is cursed for the sake of Adam. This is stated not only in the book of Genesis but also in the book of Romans (8:20). But for the same reason the redemption of man by Christ's death on the cross also affects the whole creation. According to the Synoptic Gospels the earth grew dark when Christ's sufferings reached their climax, and according to the Gospel of Matthew (27:51) the earth shook at the moment of his death, in which all things are reconciled to God through the blood of his cross (Col. 1:20).⁵

Dr. Cullmann further explains that the creation shares in the waiting and 'groaning' of mankind (Rom. 8:21, 22) in a hope based on the 'all important event' which 'took place on the cross.'⁶

Death in Nature

To raise momentarily one of the problems raised, did death in nature originate at the time of mankind's fall? The existence of fossils deep in the earth's crust, as many writers have noted, suggests a negative answer.

It is to be regretted that this has become a matter of severe difference among some evangelical writers. Over the past 100 years most learned evangelical authors who treat the subject accept as true the verdict of geology that the earth has been here for a very long time. They tend neither to be skeptical of the results supplied by the various 'scientific' time clocks nor outrightly reject them. I cite a wise and respected author whose helpful writings have been and continue to be read widely. Of 'the earth' Erich Sauer says:

[The earth's] history reaches back to a more remote period than the beginning of the human race ... the following case will be noted.

The present condition of the world of nature on earth shows a fateful disharmony of splendour and terror, communion and confusion, life and death ... and permit us to perceive that behind this discord in nature lies discord in the kingdom of the spirit. But this cannot have first entered with the history of man; for the stratified rocks, showing the history of the earth, prove beyond doubt that death and destruction existed in unthinkable ages before the history of the human race begins [emphasis added]. The Bible itself allows us to see that before the fall of man there existed an adverse kingdom of evil, and in some way it was clearly interested in the earth and in man. Therefore also, the command given in Paradise itself that the man should not only cultivate the garden but 'guard' it (Gen. 2:15).⁷

Mr. Sauer theorizes that this might be associated with Satan's fall and adds: 'In any case it is proved by the rocky strata of the earth that ancient destructions by death, with beasts and catastrophes were connected.' He wisely concludes: 'Closer investigation here is not the task of a history of salvation but of natural science.'⁸

My own view is, let the geologists and paleontologists ‘do their thing.’ We will judge their ‘discoveries’ and theories and form our own conclusions, not ignoring their advice.

I acknowledge a rather large literature defending the theory that the universe, including earth, is of recent creation—a few thousand years ago at most—and that the fossil record cannot be interpreted as geologists do to establish any systematic arrangement into eras and periods of time. It is asserted that the Noahic Flood killed all these fossil forms (vegetables, as coal and animal) and deposited them as they now are found. To the current leading advocates of this theory, it is therefore unthinkable that there should have been death in the world of plants and animals before the fall of mankind or that he ate the flesh of animals before the Deluge.⁹

Though asserted and defended with great vigor, and convincing to many, this outlook is not widely held among evangelical scholars, whether in the sciences or in the Bible and theology. I have read their literature, some of it by some of my best former students and (I say regretfully and with respect) without being convinced that their assessment of the facts, either of biblical revelation or of natural history, is correct. I find nothing in Scripture which demands that the earth’s evident great age is a false impression. I find no compelling scriptural reason to affirm positively that human beings did not eat the flesh of animals before the Flood.

It is by no means certain that the death of living forms in nature is evil in any pronounced sense. Nor is it certain in what sense nature ‘travails in pain’ to be delivered. It is sufficient for the present study simply to know that it does.

A Note on Interpreting the Genesis Timescale

I taught Old Testament, then Apologetics, for a period of several years before moving into Systematic Theology. In each discipline it seemed important and necessary to devote extended attention to interpretations of the creative week, the age of the earth, the antiquity of the human race and kindred questions. We have already devoted some attention to these questions herein.

The footnotes of my first Bible, my only Bible until I entered Seminary, offered the theory that the geological ages fall in a ‘gap’ between Genesis 1:1 and 1:2 on one page and that the six days might be the geological ages on another page. I rather quickly decided not to endorse or commit myself to either of these proposals. When I came to teach the subject to college and seminary students and necessarily read everything I could lay my hands on concerning this subject it became apparent to me that there is neither sufficient information available nor biblical mandate to require commitment to any theory of interpretation of the creative days. Reasons for not interpreting the six days as six solar days of twenty-four hours each follow in the order of importance in convincing me and my classes, (1) Plants were created on the third day before the sun—which causes plants to grow and nourishes them—was created on the fourth day. (2) The crowded schedule of the sixth day, during which God created all the animals, man, male and female, including surgery on Adam’s side, formed of Eve, brought all the animals before Adam, and which included Adam’s naming of these myriads of creatures. It seems obvious that this was not done on any ordinary Friday afternoon. (3) Genesis 1 and 2 approach the subject of creation with entirely different literary techniques, which I have explained earlier. While the second account is indeed somewhat supplementary, it is of somewhat different literary genre. (4) The number seven has a unique non-literal meaning in all ancient Near-Eastern literature, not the least the Old Testament. Take the number seven out of the Gilgamesh Epic and you would modify the story. Moses appears to employ the number seven in similar manner. The evidence on this score is simply overwhelming. (5) As indicated earlier, God informed His prophets about the remote future in highly figurative language even though it appears to be literal on the first reading—see for example the last chapters of the book of Ezekiel, and the last two chapters of the book of Revelation. God used similar modes in revealing the unknown past. (6) Young earth theorists insist not only on six literal twenty-four-hour days of creation but that the Flood not only covered all the planet and that violent eruptions of the earth's crust and crashing mountains of water changed the configuration of the earth's surface—to form the various strata of rock, coal beds, etc. Yet the Bible plainly says that the Rivers Tigris and Euphrates were apparently still in the same places after the Flood as they were before, employed by Genesis to define the location of Eden (pre-Flood), and the route of Abraham to Canaan, as well as the northern border of the land of promise. (7) Finally, the suggestion of several towering figures in systematic theology, including W. G. T. Shedd and Aurelius Augustine, that the days of Genesis 1 and 2 are really heavenly days not days on earth at all. In such a case they are also days of revelation no more related to solar days than the wheels of Ezekiel's vision of deity are to a wagon wheel.

My opinion is, however, that further treatment of these extremely controversial questions would unnecessarily complicate this particular study of theological anthropology.

Moral Agents Not a Part of Nature

Nature includes no moral agents. God stands above nature. Man also, though he shares biological life with nature, is, in the biblical perspective, and in very truth, above nature. This is, of course, commonly denied today. Yet biblically informed people, and even many others not convinced of materialistic humanism, insist that we are not really, at the deepest level of our existence, a part of nature. The God of nature is no God. Nature is God's creation, but He is beyond it, as the Hebrews had been taught. Nature is the kingdom of necessity, bound to unvarying laws, but God is eternally free. God exists outside nature and so does mankind, for although man is a child of nature, he is also a child of God. If he does not know himself as a child of God, he must eventually consider himself merely an animal, and has no rights except those that he says he has.

Modern Theories of Nature

Came the theories of Relativity in physics, astronomy and related fields and with them a new concept of what 'nature' is. In a book first orally addressed to members of a chemical society (not mathematicians or physicists) Alfred North Whitehead explained the new concept of nature. The structure of material reality in this new physics/metaphysics is four-dimensional (in some very recent theory, multidimensional). The abstractions of science in the new concept of nature have made reality in nature to consist of 'the relations of events which arise from their spatio-temporal structure'. These 'abstractions of science are entities which are truly in nature.... These event-particles are the ultimate elements of the four-dimensional space-time manifold.'¹⁰

Most people who think they understand Einstein and Whitehead agree they are on to something—convinced, as I was when as a sophomore, I picked up and read in our high school library a new small book, Space, Time and Relativity.

‘Man’s Place in Nature’ is more than a topic of theology, it is the title of another important small book. ‘On November 29, 1859, Charles Darwin’s On the Origin of Species was published.... A pre-publication copy had been sent by Darwin to [Thomas H.] Huxley [grandfather of Aldous, Julian and Andrew], who on November 23 wrote an enthusiastic letter to Darwin ... promising to stand by him’ against inevitable ‘abuse and misrepresentation.’¹¹ Huxley’s book published in 1863, and afterward on into the twentieth century, is described as a ‘classic’ and ‘a landmark in the history of science.’¹² Huxley was a self-confessed philosophical agnostic and skeptic. ‘The only approach to certainty which he admitted lay in the order of nature.’¹³ He had rejected previous evolutionary proposals but found in Darwin a ‘consistent uniformitarianism’ which postulated organic evolution. So he accepted it as an intelligible hypothesis good enough as a working basis.¹⁴

Huxley argued that mankind is a part of nature, organically in an evolutionary continuum with the genus of apes (not directly with extant apes). But he also recognized there is a ‘gulf’ (his word) between the physical and intellectual level of the highest animal and mankind. Further, he rightly observed the complete absence of transitional forms (living or fossil) between man-like animals and man: ‘[N]o one is more strongly convinced than I of the vastness of the gulf between civilized man and the brutes; or is more certain that whether from them or not he is assuredly not of them.’¹⁵ So this skillful writer left the subject.

In the optimistic atmosphere of the times strong efforts were made to incorporate the doctrine of Darwinian evolution into Christian theology—and out came theories of theistic evolution as well as efforts to unite evolution with pantheism.

Since then the theory of evolution has become a ‘fact’ in the mind of millions, propagated vigorously in university textbooks and lectures, public schools, and the secular press generally. I have shown that God has ‘created’ some things mediately over time, but I see not the slightest hint that such was the case in the creation of mankind. Biblically, mankind’s ‘place in nature’ in any case forbids that his spirit is derived from earth (Gen. 2:7).

It is therefore entirely in harmony with the Scriptures that in modern times those areas of mankind’s habitation where his likeness to the living God is officially and dogmatically denied have been the precise areas (i.e. where Marxist, materialistic socialism prevails) wherein human rights and freedom have been most systematically suppressed and, significantly, where what we now call ‘the natural environment’ has been most severely neglected, raped and even destroyed.

Perhaps if the life of mankind was to continue at all on earth after his failure in his first probation, the world of nature in which his life must be set had to be adjusted appropriately. What those adjustments may have been we do not know. Mankind’s connection with nature made this a necessity, as did also his subjection to God’s judgment.

Ascetic and Legalistic Errors About Nature

Care must be taken to keep strictly before one’s attention that there is no moral quality whatsoever in inanimate and irrational things. Jesus took considerable pains to correct a contrary opinion which His disciples had derived from contemporary Judaism. Paul likewise emphasized that there is nothing unclean of itself, as the most influential and most deeply morally earnest of the Protestant Reformers likewise insisted. Yet precisely because some of Christ's most devoted followers today do not see this clearly the following testimonies are here presented.

There were 'traditions of the elders' of Jesus' day to the effect that the eating of food under certain conditions would defile the bodies of otherwise godly men.¹⁶ It was thought likewise that there was moral defilement from eating from dishes not properly washed (Mark 7:1–4; cf. Matt. 15:1–3, 8). Unlike dualistic Manicheans and Zoroastrians, the pharisaic Jews did not, so far as is now known, hold matter to be evil and spirit to be good, but in practice they veered in the direction of such opinions. They obviously did not discern the mainly religious and ceremonial significance of the laws of ritual purity in the Pentateuch. To correct this Jesus said: 'Hear me, all of you [including all present-day legalistic pietists], and understand: There is nothing outside a person that by going into him can defile him, but the things that come out of a person are what defile him' (Mark 7:14–15). Observe the imperative mode of address. Jesus well understood the perverse tendency of religious people to put religiosity in place of true piety; to apportion the blame for one's personal inner corruption on things of environment, diet, amusement, and the like. Jesus did not say tobacco smoke would not induce cancer or that it is not physically a dirty habit. But inhaled tobacco smoke is not a moral or spiritual defilement of the 'temple of the body'—many sermons to the contrary notwithstanding. Jesus said 'There is nothing outside a person that by going into him can defile him.' In a case of disagreement between Jesus and clergy, let us always follow Jesus!

So Paul could circumcise Timothy for practical missionary reasons (Acts 16:3), but could leave another helper uncircumcised (Titus, Gal. 2:3) for other practical missionary reasons. In neither case was there anything bad or good, as such, about possession or non-possession of a foreskin. He could warn against excessive use of wine by bishops, deacons, and aged folk (for whom in days before Digitalis, Excedrin, Aspirin and Geritol, excessive intake of wine was a great temptation), yet he could also recommend wine for the 'stomach's sake' (1 Tim. 5:23) in the case of an ailing evangelist. To the Romans he wrote: 'One person believes he may eat anything, while the weak person eats only vegetables [so vegetarianism is no sign of robust spirituality]. Let not the one who eats despise the one who abstains, and let not the one who abstains pass judgment on the one who eats, for God has welcomed him' (Rom. 14:2, 3). How many there are who claim the Bible as their final authority, yet respond to Jesus and Paul on these matters with a 'Yes, but,' and continue to follow their own inherited prejudices! The human spirit is startlingly obstinate in such matters.

John Calvin, whom many think they can cite as a classical killjoy, really saw this subject in a biblical fashion. Dozens of passages in which he proposes moderate, temperate use of all earth's good gifts from God as part of God's will might be cited. In a famous essay on Christian liberty he inveighs against the abuse of Christian freedom for gluttony and luxury, but affirms: 'Surely ivory and gold and riches are good creations of God, permitted, indeed, appointed for men's use by God's providence. And we have never been forbidden to laugh, or to be filled, or to join new possessions to old or ancestral ones, or to delight in musical harmony, or to drink wine [we might add coca cola, coffee, tea or milk].'¹⁷ Then he goes on to condemn intemperance, saying 'Away then, with uncontrolled desire, away with immoderate prodigality, away with vanity and arrogance—in order that men may with good conscience cleanly use God's gifts.'¹⁸

Any believer with doubts as to whether or not good Christians should enjoy the ‘good things as gifts of God’ should read Book III, chapter 10 of the Institutes.¹⁹

So we are taught by Scripture and the best of its expositors that even though in some not quite clear sense, the world of things is a ‘fallen’ world and ‘in bondage to corruption,’ it is not defiling as such. It is all to be used and received with thanks (1 Tim. 4:3). Defilement proceeds from within (‘uncontrolled desire ... immoderate prodigality ... vanity ... arrogance,’ says Calvin in the paragraph above). Jesus’ words to this effect call for no comment: ‘Are you also still without understanding? Do you not see that whatever goes into the mouth passes into the stomach and is expelled? But what comes out of the mouth proceeds from the heart, and this defiles a person. For out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, theft, false witness, slander. These are what defile a person. But to eat with unwashed hands does not defile anyone’ (Matt. 15:16–20). Having said this, we must observe further that we should not eliminate the possibility that the life of fallen but moral man will be something less than ideal—as it develops in the world of nature, which produces thorns, thistles and clods as well as fruits, vegetables and flowers; tornadoes and floods as well as gentle breezes and nourishing showers. The society of mankind will be a scene of both joy and despair.

These important facts have serious consequences for mankind in relation to the natural order. A rigorous realism will be necessary, together with a vivid idealism, to attain a proper balance of view. The magnificence of mankind by creation, and the goodness of earth by virtue of the same creation, render praiseworthy every effort of agriculture, science, government and industry to promote order and harmony in lawful efforts to utilize the bounties of earth. Yet, on the contrary, there must be limits of expectation. Man will not cease to be the sinner and the soil will not cease to produce thorns and thistles to keep him toiling. This is for our own good. To date, all the efforts of science and industry have failed to deliver mankind from the dark side of nature. For example, the goals of added leisure for overworked toilers in the early decades of the industrial revolution, advocated by reformers and secured by civil laws, are desirable. But free a man from the divine decree of toil entirely and you attack both his moral character and his essential manhood. The present state of affairs in many departments of civil life manifests ignorance of the realism of the biblical record.

There should be no doubt that God has a purpose for the presence of evil, with consequent suffering and death, in the world. He planned, created, sustains and governs the world and He presently ‘works all things according to the counsel of his will’ (Eph. 4:11). There are hundreds of articles and whole books in print which wrestle with the problem of why God allowed moral evil in the first place, and still divine providence introduces calamities of every kind.²⁰ As to the specific question—Why, to what purpose, did God include sin and suffering in His plan (decree)?—Douglas Spanner’s proposal is appealing. He proposes that God’s plan ‘envisages’ a glorious consummation which required suffering and evil. He writes:

[H]ow could God commend his love so powerfully to us if we had not been sinners? How could our Lord have manifested the ‘greater love’ to us if we had not been in mortal need?... This line of thought, stemming from the suggestion that the primal creation contained elements of pain, may provide a clue to why the Creator has allowed evil in all his world.²¹

Not uncommonly non-theists, and even some non-Christian theists, have represented evil as merely limitation or creatureliness, or even as good in the process of becoming. And there are many other views of evil. But whether he knows the name for his view or not, every biblically informed Christian takes a theistic view—i.e. we know the world to be created, sustained and controlled by a personal God who is holy, wise and powerful in infinite degree. We may have moments of doubt when, like the patriarch Job, we may be tempted to reproach God for allowing pain or sin; we may reflect upon the hypothetical possibility that God cannot do better; and one may even question God's benevolence, asking, 'Does Jesus care?' Yet, faith always recovers, as Job's did, for our basic convictions, drawn from Scripture and experience, by the Spirit of God, allow us no recourse but to leave the questions with God, whom we know we can personally trust. We accept the partial answers we have, with faith, and await impartation of further knowledge in the day when the believer no longer walks by faith alone, but by immediate vision of God. It is not quite exact to say we suspend judgment on the question, for one makes a judgment on what one already knows of God, postponing rational explanations for the time when there is sufficient information, perhaps for ever.

¹ Webster's New World Dictionary, 3rd college ed., 1988.

² Robert Haldane, Expositions of the Epistle to the Romans (New York: Robert Carter, 1847 and reprints up to 1970), p. 378.

³ Franz Delitzsch, New Commentary on Genesis I (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1888), p. 168.

⁴ ibid., p. 168.

⁵ Oscar Cullmann, The Early Church (London: SCM Press, Ltd., 1956, 1966), p. 108.

⁶ ibid., p. 108.

⁷ Erich Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 17.

⁸ ibid., p. 18.

⁹ See John Whitcomb and Henry Morris, The Genesis Flood (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ. Co., 1961); John C. Whitcomb, The World That Perished (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1988); John C. Whitcomb, The Early Earth, rev. ed., (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1972, 1986).

¹⁰ Alfred N. Whitehead, The Concept of Nature, MI: (Univ. of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, 1959, repr. of the book first published by Cambridge Univ. Press, 1920), pp. 172, 173.

¹¹ Ashley Montagu in 'Introduction' to the Ann Arbor Paperback Edition of Thomas H. Huxley's Man's Place in Nature (Univ. of Michigan, Ann Arbor Paperback, 1959), pp. 1, 2.

¹² ibid., p. 1.

¹³ W. T. Thiselton Dyer, 11th Edition Encyclopedia Britannica, XIV, p. 19.

¹⁴ Huxley, op. cit., p. 18.

¹⁵ Huxley, op. cit., pp. 129, 130.

¹⁶ A reliable source of information regarding the prevalent legalistic and external formalism among the Jews of Jesus' time is the standard work of Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, rev. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1890; 3rd reprinting by Hendrichson Publishers, Peabody, MA, 1998), See especially Second Div., Vol. I, 'Halacha and Haggah' pp. 329–350 and Second Div., vol. ii, 'Life Under the Law,' pp. 90–125.

¹⁷ Calvin, Institutes III. 19.9.

¹⁸ ibid.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹⁹ Westminster ed. of 1960, Vol. I, pp. 719–725.

²⁰ Some of my own effort in this direction came out in an article, 'The Nature and Origin of Evil' in Vital Apologetical Issues, A Symposium, ed. Roy B. Zuck (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 1995), pp. 10–18.

²¹ Douglas Spanner, Biblical Creation and the Theory of Evolution (Exeter: Paternoster Press, 1987), pp. 148, 149.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (321). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

Fallen Mankind, in their World

Our examination of mankind's relation to the order of nature after the fall and exclusion from paradise did not discover any complete disruptions. Properly treated, the environment furnished by the physical world is still friendly toward its human inhabitants, even though because of sin we must walk always through a valley of the shadow of death during three score years and ten, more or less. Spiritually and morally, however, the change from the happy existence of paradise is thoroughgoing and threatening.

There was a tempter even in paradise and Adam was required to 'work' and 'guard' his 'garden.' Two holy beings possessing holy nature, who were possere non pecare (able not to sin), did nevertheless yield to the serpent's enticement. The society of mankind known in the New Testament as 'the world' (oikoumene, inhabited earth; aion, present age; kosmos, the presently prevailing order of all human societies) would inevitably develop in a perverse and wicked manner.

‘The Present Evil Age.’

Some striking New Testament references set out the sad state of affairs in this age of the world wherein after Adam’s fall we all must live out our days.

‘[Christ] gave himself for our sins to deliver us from the present evil age’ (Gal. 1:4).

‘... the god of this world [Satan]’ (2 Cor. 4:4).

‘... I testify about it,’ said Jesus of ‘[t]he world,’ ‘that its works are evil’ (John 7:7).

‘[T]he whole world lies in the power of the evil one’ (1 John 5:19).

‘And the great dragon was thrown down, that ancient serpent, who is called the devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world’ (Rev. 12:9).

To summarize: the world in which the sons of Adam dwell is a present evil age, its works are evil, its god is the devil, it lies in the power of the evil one and the ancient snake of paradise who deceived Eve deceives it wholly.

The world of nature is still relatively ‘good,’ certainly without moral taint. But the human race and all our systems of power, however necessary, are morally tainted, sinful and threatened ultimately with the judgment of God. As civilization increases in refinement and complexity, sins seem to multiply and intensify in proportion to the square of that increase. Western civilization, as everyone knows, seems to be on the brink of a crisis of that development. We have now lived a long time under the threatening shadow of ‘the bomb.’ Civilization could invent it but does not know how to control it. Cain killed Abel with a stone or perhaps his fist; Brutus used a knife to assassinate Caesar; while by Aaron Burr’s time, human genius had provided a pistol to do in Hamilton. Present engines of mass murder stifle the imagination, however much the television producers try.

World-wide Social Crisis

No innate human impulses nor divine mandate placed any coercive control on our race during the antediluvian epoch. Acutely aware, as we are, of withering of restraints on barbarism in the Christendom of our day it should come as no surprise that before long in the antediluvian age ‘the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and ... every intention of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.... Now the earth was corrupt ... and ... filled with violence’ (Gen. 6:5, 11).

Institution of Coercive Social Controls in the World

The Great Flood of Genesis 6–8 put an end to unrestrained corruption and violence generated by the imagination of human hearts ‘only evil continually.’ To insure that such drastic measures as the Flood would not need to be repeated to preserve the race from self-destruction God instituted coercive social control, placing the coercive power of the sword in the hands of man to punish and restrain the violent deeds of men.

And for your lifeblood I will require a reckoning: from every beast I will require it and from man. From his fellow man I will require a reckoning for the life of man. ‘Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed, for God made man in his own image. And you, be fruitful and multiply, teem on the earth and multiply in it' (Gen. 9:5–7).

Although most works of systematic theology make little or no reference to civil government as an aspect of the order of divine preservation, consequent to the fall, it is the most prevalent Protestant interpretation of the Scripture data. Luther set the pace. He became aware he had set loose social forces which were incompatible with the papal-Thomist theory that civil government proceeds necessarily from human nature as created. His approach to politics was theological. 'As a pastor he conceived it to be as much a part of his duty to instruct his flock on their temporal responsibilities as to prepare them for the spiritual life of the world to come.'¹ Luther's comments exegetical and expository on Genesis fill eight volumes of over 400 pages each.² His teachings regarding civil government are in comments on Genesis 9:5, pages 139–142 of Volume Two, Lectures on Genesis 6–14.

In Luther's Commentary on Genesis, Luther expressly contrasts the state with the original state of the world by saying that in the original state of mankind before it had fallen, God ruled men uno notu digito (with one movement of His finger).³ When sin came, inner rebellion came into the world—and with it the threat of chaos. Then God was obliged to institute orders of force which would hold the menacing chaos in check. These orders of force are represented by the state. And thus the state itself becomes a representative of this aeon, which, precisely because it is a fallen aeon, requires force. And thus we may assume that, insofar as the demonic power is really the 'ruler of this world,' this dominion will find expression particularly in the area of the state.⁴

Augustine also found the basis for a doctrine of coercive, civil control of society (government) not in the created order, but in the presence of sin in every man⁵ as did also most of the early Protestant writers.⁶

Believers in and into the World but Not of it

Because the Christian knows that God loved the world and in Christ reconciled the world to Himself (2 Cor. 5:17) godly people can live peacefully in it. Since Christ is 'the propitiation' for the sins of 'the whole world' (1 John 2:2) believers must be actively in the world proclaiming peace to those both 'near' and 'far off' (Eph. 2:11–18). Yet, while they must go 'into the world' they are not 'of the world' (John 17:16–18).

This then means that though he lives on a cursed earth and in the midst of a fallen race, being himself only a sinner saved by grace, the Christian can view the world with compassion. However offended by what falls in the line of his spiritual vision, he can ever see, as God sees, a world doomed but presently approachable. Rescue of individuals is possible. Wider social influence is possible. It also means that he may feel admitted to the company of the world, if not quite at home in it. Though the world is still an enemy of God, a 'truce' has been effected.

Ambiguities in the Biblical World-picture

So the world appears in Scripture somewhat ambiguously as created superlatively good, yet fallen on account of mankind's fall: in bondage to corruption; in moral perspective, a 'present evil age'; nevertheless reconciled to God by the death of His Son. As it is written, 'in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them' (2 Cor. 5:19). If so, then the Christian believer has both rights and duties with respect to his human environment.

Origin of Civil Government

These ambiguities of the biblical picture of the world—good but fallen, evil yet reconciled to God—present a pair of paradoxes. These in turn represent that condition of the world which the Reformers, especially Luther, saw as such that, except for the restraining presence of civil government, would have quickly destroyed itself. In the language of Luther, the state belongs to the order of preservation not of creation. According to the great Reformer, though, the fall set loose centrifugal forces that drive people apart and which send them toward destruction, through civil government inaugurated by the Noahic Covenant (Gen. 9) God gives an institutional instrument for preservation of the race from violent self-destruction.

As Helmut Thielicke has said, 'Hence the state is simply the institutional form of God's call to order.... for Luther the state is the gracious intervention of God which puts a stop to the self-destruction of the fallen world with a view to giving men a kairos [season] and bringing them to the last day.'⁷

Accordingly, the state must be seen as a work of God whereby some of the effects of redemption are distributed to the elect of all the nations and of all the ages. It is a force holding people in relatively peaceful check while the messengers of the gospel are free to preach and to persuade people to be reconciled to the God who has already provided the reconciliation by the death of His Son. Hence, though of the order of preservation, rather than of creation, practically speaking, in light of what we have seen of the present state of the world and the need for civil tranquillity as a condition of evangelism and Christian nurture, the state is important to the order of salvation. For that reason Christians should most certainly pray for their 'city' and their rulers. To 'all the people ... taken into exile,' God commanded Jeremiah to write and 'seek the welfare of the city where I have sent you into exile, and pray to the Lord on its behalf, for in its welfare you will find your welfare' (Jer. 29:1, 7). Much later Paul would directly connect godly prayers for domestic tranquillity with the desire of God 'who desires all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth' (1 Tim. 2:1–5).

The World As Evil

One New Testament text refers to it as 'this present evil world' or 'age' (aion) (Gal. 1:4). Jesus Himself, after being dared by the members of His own family to perform his 'works' openly in Jerusalem, to show Himself 'to the world' (kosmos John 7:3, 4), said to His unbelieving brothers: 'My time has not yet come, but your time is always here. The world cannot hate you, but it hates me because I testify about it that its works are evil' (John 7:6, 7). Jesus 'testifies' that the world's deeds (presumably all of the world's deeds) are evil. In Galatians 1:4 'world' is a Greek word which means age; the word in John 7:4, 7 has the essential meaning of world-system. Jesus' brothers, however, were not thinking of it in either of these senses, for they meant 'world' in the sense of public, and open as opposed to private. Nevertheless, Jesus' simple affirmation signifies that the present world-system ordinarily has no place for friendly reception of the Son of God, once He is recognized on the deeper levels of His being and significance.

It is not important at this point further to elaborate or qualify the affirmation that the present world-system of mankind is evil. We cannot, indeed, dare not, forget that the present world-system occupies a world of nature created good by God. Even though fallen, it is without moral taint; it is still God's good gift, serving mankind in opposite ways. If its showers nourish, its floods chasten; if its zephyrs and breezes cool the land, its tornadoes and hurricanes rebuke us. This is the Christian and biblical point of view.

Progressive Deepening Evil

But mankind and his man-created systems have been subverted to evil. The observed facts support the biblical assertions. As human civilization increases in refinement and complexity, its sins expand, multiply and intensify. A newspaper editorial brings out an aspect of this horrifying fact of existence:

Mankind (as a wise member of the species once observed) hasn't learned yet how to use the wheel. Attached to multitudinous high-speed vehicles, it still kills thousands every year. How then can man be expected to be sage and undestructive in his use of such recent and overpowering creations as atomic power? That wisdom gap between technical brilliance and ethical stupidity has become a troubling concern of many scientists, and it was a subject of brooding concern at a recent meeting of geneticists.... Geneticists have not only learned the code used in the transmission of characteristics from one generation to the next, they have reached a point where they will be able some day to direct the course of evolution [sic] by eliminating undesirable traits and creating desirable ones.

Whither mankind?⁸

The editor goes on to say that so far mankind has already altered his environment by air and water pollution and may have scarred the race genetically by atomic radiation. Mankind who has extinguished so many other species may succeed only in extinguishing himself.

This editor is only saying on a popular level what scholars have been writing in their journals for years and what the Scriptures have taught for millenniums. Cain killed Abel with his fist or perhaps a stone. Brutus used a knife on Caesar while centuries later Burr shot Hamilton with a pistol. Presently we use flame-throwers, napalm, machine guns and many other garish horrors, but the root of it all is the same—fallen mankind operating in a present, evil, world-system. Both mankind and his world, viewed from the side of their own closed systems, are quite incorrigible. There is no hope for the future from this quarter.

This aspect of the doctrine of 'the world' comes in for extended treatment in a later section of this book.

The World As Reconciled to God by Christ

Another ambiguity of the biblical depiction of the world is that the world already has been reconciled to God by Christ. This is not the place for extended discussion of the vexing theological question of the extent of the atonement. That subject will be examined more at length in Part 4: Christology, but I must relate it to the present topic.

This author is among the many who, holding that the Scriptures plainly teach a special reference of the redemptive ministry of our Lord to the elect, hold there is also a general reference of that work to all people, indeed to all creation. As is the case with many important Christian truths, though capable of being stated in self-consistent propositions, all of which, when viewed in full perspective, are also mutually consistent, there are refinements which at first seem paradoxical. All true biblical paradoxes, on full examination, in the light of completed revelation (some yet to come), are explicable.⁹

Since no one who has even a minimal knowledge and acceptance of biblical teaching doubts a particular value of the atonement for the elect (or if preferred, those who hear the gospel and believe it), that matter may be disposed of quickly. Jesus, as He paused momentarily before stepping out to meet Judas and the high priest's deputies that last night, distinctly indicated that His main interest was His chosen ones through the age to come after His death. 'I am praying for them,' said He, 'I am not praying for the world but for those whom you have given me' (John 17:9). And a bit later, 'I do not ask for these only, but also for those who will believe in me through their word' (John 17:20; vide v. 24). Other texts frequently cited in this connection are John 10:11 ('I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep') and Matthew 1:21 ('... you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins'). So we know that in a strict sense Jesus, on these occasions at least, prayed only for those 'given' to Him; that He died in the stead of 'sheep' only; and that His whole coming was for the salvation of his 'people' only.¹⁰

Other texts of Scripture, however, speak of a work of reconciliation by Christ that went as far as sin has gone. The impact of these texts is cumulative and impressive. 'For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but in order that the world might be saved through him' (John 3:17). 'He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world' (1 John 2:2). 'And we have seen and testify that the Father has sent his Son to be the Savior of the world' (1 John 4:14). Paul's words are most explicit also—'in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them' (2 Cor. 5:19); 'Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all' (1 Tim. 2:5, 6). These texts and several more have been the battleground for a long time between those who argue on the one hand that atonement is for the elect only and on the other that it is for every person in the entire world without distinction.

Many who wish to take all the Bible seriously and seek not to 'wrest ... the ... scriptures' (cf. 2 Peter 3:16 kjv) have sought a via media. It does not seem to be so hard to find as some think. Without pursuing the subject further at this point than is presently meet, observe that some of Paul's words seem almost to be a specific explanation of a via media. He affirms that all hope should be set on the 'living God, who,' he explains, 'is the Savior of all people, especially of those who believe' (1 Tim. 4:10). This seems clearly to say that though the Son of God is 'specially' the Savior of believers only, there is a broad sense in which He is the world's Savior too.

Those scholars appear to be on the right track who insist, then, that the redemptive work of Christ was not only personal and individual for each elect believer but also completely effective for them. This, of course, is overturned if the atonement is construed to be precisely the same for every human being who lives, has lived or ever shall live as for the elect. But I judge these same interpreters are clearly on the wrong track if and when they seek to empty the atonement in some sense of a clear biblical reference to all the world. Some weak arguments against any form of universal effect of the Savior's work, based on sickly irrelevancies such as 'all Judea' (Matt. 3:5) and other passages which do not bear on either the subject or the idiom, are really unworthy of serious notice.

Even as ardent a defender of 'limited atonement' as John Murray has written:

Since all benefits and blessings are within the realm of Christ's dominion and since this dominion rests upon his finished work of atonement, the benefits innumerable which are enjoyed by all men indiscriminately are related to the death of Christ and may be said to accrue from it one way or another. If they thus flow from the death of Christ they were intended thus to flow. It is proper, therefore, to say that the enjoyment of certain benefits even by the non-elect and reprobate, falls within the design of the death of Christ. The denial of universal atonement does not carry with it the denial of any such relation that the benefits enjoyed by all men may sustain to Christ's death and finished work.¹¹

Perhaps it is the difficulties of this subject that have been great enough to discourage even such a leading Calvinist as G. C. Berkouwer from discussing it. At any rate in his 350-page book on the work of Christ he discusses the topic hardly at all.

A comparison of Greek prepositions may render important assistance. Matthew reports the Lord's words: 'the Son of Man came ... to give his life as a ransom for many' (Matt. 20:28). The 'many' are surely those who believe, not all men, but 'many' of them. The word rendered 'for' is anti, the Greek preposition which almost invariably in the New Testament carries the sense of 'in the place of.' In the strictest sense Christ's atonement was 'in the place of' only those for whom He prayed (John 17). Another text of similar sound reads: 'Christ Jesus ... gave himself as a ransom for all' (1 Tim. 2:5, 6). Here the word 'ransom' (antilutron) combines the word anti, 'instead of,' with the usual word for 'ransom' (lutron) used in Matthew 20:28 quoted above. So the idea of substitutionary ransom is present. But the preposition 'for' renders a different word from that of Matthew 20:28. It is hyper. This word (though capable of bearing the sense of 'instead of') normally conveys either a 'locative' sense of over, above, beyond or a 'purposive' sense—for one's safety, for one's advantage or benefit. So Paul is saying that the ransom Jesus made was for the safety, advantage, benefit of all.

A Truce Declared

Paul is acutely aware of this fact of world-reconciliation, devoting an especially exalted peroration to it (Col. 1:19–23). He is deeply convinced of the special benefit for believers of Christ's work, as is indicated by the words 'in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins' (Col. 1:14 et al). This is followed by declarations that nevertheless all that is, God excepted, was created by Jesus Christ and for Him, being Himself the very image of God. The church is His special body (v. 18). Then comes the great text:

For in him all the fullness of God was pleased to dwell, and through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross. And you, who once were alienated and hostile in mind, doing evil deeds, he has now reconciled in his body of flesh by his death, in order to present you holy and blameless and above reproach before him, if indeed you continue in the faith, stable and steadfast, not shifting from the hope of the gospel that you heard, which has been proclaimed in all creation under heaven, and of which I, Paul, became a minister (Col. 1:19–23).

Our present interest focuses on verse 20, where reference is made to Christ's work 'to reconcile to himself all things ... by the blood of his cross' and verse 23 which states that 'the gospel that you heard ... has been proclaimed in all creation under heaven' (cf. vv. 5, 6: 'the gospel, which has come to you, as indeed in the whole world'). How has Christ reconciled 'all things' to Himself? In what sense has the gospel been 'proclaimed in all creation under heaven'?

'To Reconcile to Himself All Things'

With regard to the first question, it must be stated initially that the doctrine of universal salvation, either of all creatures (including demons, fallen angels, and the devil) is eliminated as inconsistent with the doctrine of eternal punishment of the unrepentant distinctly sounded out elsewhere in the New Testament. It is also inconsistent with the fervent zeal of the early church and the apostolic witnesses to win people out of the world.

Limits on Reconciliation

In addition to what has been presented above about limited redemption and unlimited reconciliation, we observe that here, though Paul uses the expression 'to reconcile all things,' employing ta panta, the ordinary expression for the whole of creation, when the writer particularizes he omits 'things under the earth.' The latter is the expression Paul uses elsewhere for the unseen evil powers in such enumerations, though he does mention 'things ... on earth' and 'things ... in heaven' (contr. Phil. 2:10, 11). So we need not suppose that Paul referred to any reconciliation with Satan and his hosts effected by Christ's redemption. Certain European authors (chiefly Oscar Cullmann and Karl Barth) have asserted and sought to prove that reference is here made to a victory by Christ in His redemption over the devil and his hosts which has compelled their obedient, if unwilling, service.

Oscar Cullmann has given wide advocacy to the notion that 'the powers that be' of Romans 13:1 are governmental officials backed by demonic powers—the real 'powers that be.' He constructs thereby a very interesting argument by connecting the same with the fact that Philippians 2:10 speaks of a conquest of the 'things under the earth', i.e. demon powers, by Christ. He does not seem to mean that Calvary atoned for them, but rather conquered them. In his book The State in the New Testament he notes that all the earliest Christian doctrinal formulae mention this conquest of the demon powers. Since these formulae collected 'only the most important points of their faith [this] proves how significant for them was this belief in the conquest of the powers.' Yet he notes that certain other texts (1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 10:13) present the conquest as a future expectation. So the demon powers (within and above government), though conquered now, have a measure of freedom—they are bound with a rope that can be lengthened. He draws significant conclusions for governments and obedience to them by Christians. As long as government stays within limits imposed by God's past victory in Christ they are to be obeyed. When they make totalitarian demands, requiring for Caesar what is God's alone, they go too far and are to be resisted.¹² He does not use the word 'disobey.' He concludes:

Against the background of this belief in the vanquished powers at work behind earthly happenings, it becomes especially clear that the State is now a temporary institution not of divine nature but nevertheless willed by God; that we must remain critical toward every State; that we must nonetheless obey every State as far as it remains within its bounds.

But particularly, from this point of view, we shall understand how in the same New Testament in which we read the words from Romans 13:1: ‘Let every person be subject,’ and the rulers are ‘God’s servants’; we hear also about this same state—Nero’s State (in Revelation 13)—that it is ‘the beast from the abyss.’ Now this is spoken from the point where the State is trying to free itself from its subordination and is becoming satanic, in that it is demanding what is God’s. The state which makes itself independent, which absolutizes itself, deifies itself, is precisely the classic expression of the Antichrist.¹³

It seems to me more likely that Paul is thinking in the terms of ultimate restoration of the non-rational creation, which will take place with the glorification of God’s regenerate sons (Rom. 8:19 ff.) at the consummation. Since mankind’s fall brought the curse, their restoration and consummated glorification presages nature’s ‘redemption.’ Thus a connection between the ‘reconciliation’ wrought through Christ’s atonement and the ‘reconciliation’ and ‘redemption’ of ‘all things’ is established. The holy heavenly beings and things, since they have never been alienated from God, are not included in the reconciliation. This much only needs to be affirmed: whatever the effects of human sin have been and wherever they have reached, there ‘peace through the blood of His [Christ’s] cross’ has gone. One may walk into a saloon, a brothel, a vice den, the godless emporiums of Wall Street or the financial districts of any city and say to the thoughtless and godless, ‘God now holds nothing against you. The Spirit and the Bride say, Come, take of the water of life freely.’

‘Preached in All Creation Under Heaven’

In regard to the second problem, in what sense the gospel has been ‘preached in all creation under heaven’ it may be said that the gospel had already in Paul’s time reached all areas of the Roman oikoumenē, the world civilization of the day. The meaning of ‘all creation under heaven,’ from the popular point of view Paul employs, is certainly nothing more inclusive than that, and needs no wider application than the command of Caesar that ‘all the world should be enrolled’ (Luke 2:1). ‘The catholicity of the gospel is a token of its divine origin and power.’

This then means that though he lives on a cursed earth and in the midst of a fallen race, being himself only a sinner saved by grace, the Christian can view the world with compassion. However revolted by what falls in the line of his spiritual vision, he can ever see, as God sees, a world doomed but presently approachable. Rescue of individuals is possible. It also means that he may feel admitted to the company of the world, if not quite at home in it. Though the world is still an enemy of God, a ‘truce’ has been effected.

So the world appears in Scripture somewhat ambiguously as created superlatively good, yet fallen on account of man’s fall and in bondage to corruption; thus in moral perspective, somewhat a ‘present evil age’; nevertheless reconciled to God by the death of His Son.

(At this juncture, or as a supplement to the whole of systematic theology, it has seemed proper and necessary to many to expand greatly on the topic of this chapter—‘Fallen Man [Mankind] in His World.’ As an example I cite the fourth and largest book of Calvin’s Institutes, which significantly relates to this topic. John Gill's eighteenth-century, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Body of Divinity is laced throughout with such matters, scarcely separating 'duties' from 'doctrines.' J. O. Buswell devotes more than a third of the 200 pages of anthropology to 'Human Life in this Age.' This chapter is drawn largely from a much larger section of my volume, Civil Government: A Biblical View [Edmonton: Alberta, Canada: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology, and Public Policy, 1975, 2000].

Beginning with the ninth chapter of Genesis on to the close of Revelation the fact of rule of men by man, i.e. civil government, pervades the holy Book. On the most basic level it is: 1) a fact of biblical history, a pervasive phenomenon under which people of all times, including ours, have lived. Civil government was 2) a frequent topic of preaching and writing by the prophets of Israel and Judah. On another level it is 3) a subject of divine legislation in four of the five Books of Moses and on still another level 4) a matter for much reflection and practical advice in the Old Testament Wisdom literature. In the New Testament human government is 5) a subject of special instruction—and example—by Jesus Himself and apostles and prophets, providing the ingredients of a Christian doctrine of civil government. Finally, there are 6) New Testament exhortations and warnings for believers with regard to their response both to just rulers and to unjust as well as proper attitudes toward their laws, courts, agencies and agents.)

¹ Cargill Thompson, 'Martin Luther and the Two Kingdoms' in Political Ideas, ed., D. Thompson (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 27.

² Luther's Works, 55 vol. ed. Jaroslav Pelikan & Helmut Lehmann (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1955).

³ Martin Luther, Commentary on Genesis, Weimar Ausgabe, vol. 42, 1–19.

⁴ Helmut Thielicke, Man in God's World, ed. and trans. John W. Doberstein (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), p. 181.

⁵ Aurelius Augustine, The City of God, trans.

⁶ I pursued this matter at length in a paper, ‘Civil Government with Coercive Power of Special Divine Origin or Simply a Development in History.’ 22 pages, read at the Evangelical Theological Society annual meeting in Washington, D.C., November 19, 1993.

⁷ I have tried desperately to recover the place of this quote in the many volumes of Thielicke in my library, without success. I vouch for its accuracy.

⁸ I have lost the source.

⁹ This does not apply to certain mysteries such as Christ’s two natures or the Holy Trinity.

¹⁰ Vide also Ephesians 1:4–7; 2 Timothy 1:9, 10.

¹¹ John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1955, 1965), pp. 43–55.

¹² Oscar Cullmann, The State in the New Testament, rev. ed. (London: SCM Press LTD, 1963), pp. 43–55.

¹³ ibid., pp. 55, 56.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (329). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 3

HAMARTIOLOGY

Man as Sinner

1

Introduction to Hamartiology

To present a comprehensive treatment of the doctrine of sin both focused and rationally organized is a difficult project. As we have seen earlier, sin is an irrational thing in itself and we scarcely understand it in ourselves. There is not complete agreement among theologians as to which aspects are comprehensive, which are essential or only tangential or even trivial. The Bible does not clearly reveal how moral evil originated in either earth or heaven, though we know how sin entered into the world of mankind. And this is not the only gap in our information, for the Scriptures do not categorically state how sin is passed down through the generations, even though we know it is, both from Scripture and experience.

In the face of such difficulties one must humbly recognize that the same Holy Scriptures which are sufficient for life and godliness also set limits to speculation on some doctrinal issues and bid us to come to terms with the facts of revelation we do have, whether pleasant or disagreeable.

No structure of the subject is immediately apparent. No outline that is specific in all its parts can include every feature. Hence this treatise is not alone in following an outline as much pedagogical as logical and packing unclassifiable material in an introduction and in more than one incursion of unclassified questions and problems.

Thinking man (homo sapiens) does try to make sense of his deepest convictions. We do not like to live with contradictory beliefs if we are aware of them. This is why decisions made about the innate conditions of human beings—such decisions as whether innately good or evil, whether innocent at birth or ‘conceived in sin,’ whether guilty of Adam’s transgression or guilty only of personal transgressions consciously performed, whether culpable for a corrupt nature or only unfortunate, whether with a free will able to make choices for holiness or a child of wrath by nature—these decisions inexorably affect not only every subsequent division of systematic theology, but how we view salvation and the project of world evangelization.

The informed reader will recognize immediately by the way the last previous sentence is phrased that the present writer is in the tradition of orthodox Reformation theology, preceded by the evangelical thought of Anselm and Gottschalk to Augustine and ultimately to the emphasis of Paul in the Epistles of Romans, 1 Corinthians, Galatians and Ephesians.

In no area of theology, systematic as well as biblical, is the theologian more in debt to forebears in the discipline. One cannot escape them. They have furnished both the questions and the clues to answers. Yet the intellectual and social ferment of our times add color and poignancy, if not depth, to the discussion, as we shall see. The depths of the human heart, without acknowledged awareness of God and God-relatedness, have been plumbed by several depth psychologies and existentialisms. Yet they solve no important problem, only adding some color to David's cry: 'Who can discern his errors? Declare me innocent from hidden faults [hidden from myself]' (Ps. 19:12).

Decisions on certain aspects of sin have immediate effect on many problems of conduct, of course. What is not as well understood is how a doctrine of man that includes man as sinner affects many professional disciplines—psychological counseling and therapy for example. Though I taught the whole of systematic theology over a period of many years, for three or four years in the mid-1980s I was assigned annually classes of about twenty-five, most of whom were in a program leading to a degree in 'biblical counseling,' doing 'therapy' for emotionally and mentally distressed people. These earnest students were graduates of secular universities and being evangelical believers, had long been aware of sin but had never become fully aware of how blameworthy every child of Adam is for the corruption of human nature, each 'a sinner by choice and an alien by birth.' No one readily accepts this in the university-bred atmosphere of our time. Nevertheless, quickly and regretfully yet thankfully, every one of them accepted the truth of it when exposed in assigned readings and classroom discussion. The Christian revelation made sense in the nonsense of sin as they met it in their lives, in their world and in the Bible. Though the beginning of sin in the human race is narrated in grim detail in the third chapter of Genesis, as Paul assures us (Rom. 5:12), strangely, the word sin is not employed at all. 'Sin' first appears almost incidentally in the Bible at Genesis 4:7 in connection with the story of Cain, the first child of our race and the first act of murder. We do not know in what language God spoke to our first parents and their immediate offspring, but the report of the incident employs the most common word for sin in the Hebrew Bible, usually translated in the Greek Old Testament into the commonest New Testament term for sin.

If there is a generic term for sin in the Bible it is this word—ḥaṭṭāʾ (and its verb equivalent ḥaṭṭāʾ). The Greek Old Testament (LXX) usually renders it by hamartia (238 times TDOT I, 268). Hamartia is the usual word in the New Testament for sin, following the Septuagint example.

The negative idea of missing, failing, neglecting is the primordial sense of both words and they are often used in that narrow sense, yet frequently also simply as designation of moral evil in responsible personal beings. Strangely, either as a noun or as a verb (ḥaṭṭāʾ) this word is not used at all in the narrative of the fall, not even once in the detailed report of moral corruptions culminating in the Flood. Paul, however, uses the 'generic' hamartia (noun) and hamartanō (verb) several times for Adam's sinning, as a comprehensive term. He uses several other terms, however, to designate the specific character of that event. Hence theologians have not been amiss in designating the doctrine of sin as hamartiology. Transgression, trespass, wickedness, etc., and their equivalent terms in the biblical languages are too specific to be used as the comprehensive name for moral evil.

There is no clear definition of sin in the Bible, though certain texts in the New Testament have been treated as definitions. Yet they are neither specific nor comprehensive. 'For whatever does not proceed from faith is sin' (Rom. 14:23) has only the appearance of a definition. In context it says only that when Christians parade their 'mature' faith by acting in such a way as unnecessarily to offend other believers they are not acting in faith, hence sinfully. However relevant to a full definition of sin, the verse is less than a definition. '[W]ithout faith it is impossible to please him [God]' (Heb. 11:6) is a near equivalent expression but has only the appearance of a definition of faith. The copula 'is' does not make a clause a definition except under specific conditions. First John 3:4 is in context closer to a definition: 'sin is lawlessness.' Yet it is more description than definition; for as we shall see, like the mystery of sin's origin, the very nature of sin is baffling. It is never the less fully apparent to human conscience. In due time we shall attempt a definition.

There are some distinctions intrinsic to the biblical doctrine of sin that must be considered.

1. Distinction Between Sin and Sins

A careful reading of Scripture discovers a crucial distinction between sin and sins. This may be clearly perceived in connection with two similar sounding but subtly different passages, viz.: '... he will save his people from their sins [emphasis added]' (Matt. 1:21); 'Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin [emphasis added] of the world!' (John 1:29). The former, 'sins,' has obvious reference to the many evil deeds of 'people.' The latter reference, 'the sin of the world,' speaks of the world's guilt before God in which all men share. Romans 5:12 puts it this way: 'Therefore, just as sin came into the world through one man, and death through sin, and so death spread to all men because all sinned.' There is a 'sin of the world.' It 'came into the world' as a definite event at a particular past time. 'All' mankind 'sinned' in and with Adam in that event. Paul charged 'all the world ... guilty before God' (Rom. 3:19 kjv). John declared 'the whole world lieth in wickedness' (1 John 5:19 kjv). James wrote: 'Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Therefore whoever wishes to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God' (James 4:4). All these texts find their unifying meaning in the fact that the world itself, in the sense of the spiritual principles upon which it is ruled (by Satan) and operates as a world, an organized kosmos, is itself presently destined to judgment. Many New Testament passages assume or state that the world itself is a single entity. From the time of Cain and Abel onward to the Last Judgment the world is en bloc simply sin. One cannot even live in the world as a Christian without being stained by it, hence Jesus' pronouncements on his last night: 'Peter said to him, "You shall never wash my feet." Jesus answered him, "If I do not wash you, you have no share with me"' (John 13:8). 'I am praying for them. I am not praying for the world ... the world has hated them because they are not of the world' (John 17:9, 14) even though they are now sent into the world (John 17:18). Practically speaking, the world is a dangerous place, because sin is of its very essence, pervasive and powerful—as the whole narrative of Scripture bears witness and all human history and experience manifests. This was discussed in the last chapter of the previous section, 'The Doctrine of Man.'

2. Sin As a Principle

In a related (but not identical) way sin (singular number again) is a principle. Or to use Paul's word, sin is a 'law' working in every man's 'members.' He discusses this in detail in Romans 7, vividly summarizing:

... but I see in my members another law waging war against the law of my mind and making me captive to the law of sin that dwells in my members.... So then, I myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin (Rom. 7:23, 25).

The Apostle uses the words ‘flesh,’ ‘mind,’ ‘me’ and ‘I’ as well as ‘sin’ and ‘law’ in varying senses in this chapter, yet his message is clear: there is a principle, law, or call it pervasive tendency or disposition, present even in regenerate people, which is properly called sin. The mere presence of this disposition toward doing evil is wrong. Even when the Apostle is ‘wishing [thelonti] to do the good,’ ‘evil [to katon] is lying beside me’ (parakeitai moi) (Rom. 7:21). This ‘evil’ is a law (nomos), the law of sin (Rom. 7:23). It takes advantage of the very law of God to work all sorts of sins and evil acts of thought, word and deed. The sins of ‘saints’ as well as of ‘sinners’ are many, but the root cause is a depravity deep in the heart, which Paul calls sin. Later we shall see this depravity is a punishment for Adam’s original sin and that every human being bears deep-dyed guilt because of it.

3. Sin As Action of Personal Moral Beings

Sins (plural) are evil events, actions, thoughts, deeds, states and intentions of personal moral beings. They are both simple and complicated, both devious and prevalent, and infinitely numerous.

Each of these three features—1) sins and sin, 2) sin as a ‘law’ or principle, and 3) sin as a deed of moral beings—will be topics of discussion later in this book.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (337). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

2

The Vocabulary, Common and Biblical, About Sin

As seen in the preceding pages, the Bible refers to sin and to sins. It does so in many ways. The English language employs hundreds of words for sin: verbs and adverbs, nouns and adjectives, some rude and plain, some delicate or even elegant. The English Versions employ a very large number of them and we know what the words mean: sin, wicked, wrong, lust, error, transgression, trespass, iniquity, fault, guilt, unrighteous, blame, vile, shameful and many more. They obviously share a common area of meaning, viz.: moral evil. The Hebrew and Greek originals of Scripture display a similar variety of expressions. ‘Iniquity,’ for example, appears about 250 times in the kjv but translates five different Greek words and at least ten different Hebrew words. ‘Evil’ is on the pages of the kjv about 500 times, but translates twenty or more different Hebrew and Greek words.

This is not as confusing as it seems, for usually the sense in context is plain. For a precise understanding of some of the variegated colors and various shapes of the sin and sins which are in the world some synthesis and organization of the materials is necessary. Many of the Hebrew and Greek words and expressions were drawn from commercial and legal discourse and the same is true of the English terms used to translate them. This serves to illustrate their meaning.

Three Comprehensive Aspects of Sin

Beginning with the earliest pages of the Old Testament and on to the last page of Revelation three comprehensive aspects of this form of evil are always present, even if not always stated. Let us look at each in order and the relation between them. These three are: first, sin as commission, something positive; second, sin as omission, something negative; third, sin as blameworthiness for sins of commission and omission. Some of the words in English Versions of Scripture for the first are the nouns transgression, sin, trespass, rebellion, revolution, offense and related verbs. Common terms for the second are sins of ignorance, neglect, fault and missing. The commonest is simply sin. For the third, indicating sin as blameworthiness, the almost uniform kjv term is iniquity. However, at the first appearance of the Hebrew word commonly rendered ‘iniquity’ (ʾwōn) in Cain’s anguished complaint, it is there correctly rendered ‘punishment’ (Gen. 4:13 kjv, niv, rsv, reb, nasb, esv). Others are ‘fault concerning’ and ‘mischief.’ Significantly when divine forgiveness of ‘sin’ is stated, i.e. remission of guilt, this is the word (ʾwōn) employed (e.g. Jer. 33:8 twice; Jer. 36:3).

1. Sin As Commission

Two very frequently occurring Hebrew words in innumerable passages represent sin as doing something aggressive such as breaching of standards, passing a proper boundary, breaking a just law. The meaning of one of these, the verb (ʾavar), in a non-moral setting illustrates the sense, viz.: the children of Israel ‘crossed [ʾavar] the brook Zered’ (Deut. 2:14) and ‘go over’ the river Jordan (Deut. 12:10). Abraham is called an (ʾvri), probably one who passed over, because he came across the Euphrates River into the Land of Canaan. Examples in moral life are, ‘I have not transgressed [ʾavar] any of your commandments’ (Deut. 26:13), ‘All Israel has transgressed your law’ (Dan. 9:11). The New Testament has the equivalent of this word (parabasis and parabainō) (Matt. 15:3 and Rom. 5:14) rendered transgression and transgress.

The second frequent Hebrew word also often rendered transgression (pasha ʾ noun or pasha ʾ verb) appears frequently in the context of civil life, and is there rendered appropriately rebel or revolt—in each case against some constituted authority, viz.: ‘Moab rebelled [pasha ʾ] against Israel’ (2 Kgs. 1:1); ‘Edom revolted [pasha ʾ] from the rule of Judah’ (2 Kgs. 8:22). Examples in reference to moral life are Isaiah 1:2, ‘Children have I reared and brought up, but they have rebelled against me’ and Psalm 51:3, ‘I know my transgressions [pasha ʾm], and my sin is ever before me.’

2. Sin As Omission

Several other words in the biblical vocabulary represent sin as something negative, something omitted: missing a target when one should hit it, failing when one should succeed, ignorance of what one should know, falling when one should stand, neglect of duty when one should attend to it, defaulting a debt when one should pay it.

This negative idea is the meaning of the commonest words for sin both in the Old Testament and the New Testament. The verb ḥaṭṭa is rendered strikingly at Judges 20:16, ‘every one could sling a stone at a hair and not miss’ (ḥaṭṭa’). Four other Hebrew words, all derived from this verb, mean essentially the same. These words appear hundreds of times. In usage usually rendered sin (noun) or ‘to sin’ (verb), they become almost a generic term for any sort of moral evil, yet also frequently in a way limited to the essential, original idea of missing or failing. Lexicons list to miss, fail, to go wrong and the like as first meanings and find the same root with the same meaning in ancient cognate languages (Aramaic, Assyrian, Sabeian, Ethiopic). They point out that its New Testament equivalent is hamartia (noun), hamartanō (verb), discussed earlier herein. Illustrative passages usually cited are

Judges 20:16, cited above, and Proverbs 19:2, (niv) ‘It is not good ... to be hasty and miss [emphasis added] the way.’

In discussion of this word theological writers correctly point out that missing the mark or way in the biblical use of the two words suggests deliberate choice, hence culpable, blameworthy, not merely unfortunate. But this is not always the case. The book of Leviticus lists numerous ‘sins of ignorance’ for which sin offerings were required, One of the meanings of the Hebrew word is sin-offering, especially in Leviticus 4–23. In Leviticus 4 and 5 there are repeated references to sinning ‘unintentionally.’ In several of these cases (see Lev. 4:1, 22, 27) the word for sinning is ḥaṭa. Leviticus chapter 4 is very clear that one is rendered ‘guilty’ of breaking God’s law even if done unintentionally. An even more convincing example is the case of any Nazirite who wholly unintentionally broke his vow of avoidance of anything ritually unclean. Numbers 6:1–21 gives details. He was not even to share in necessary preparation for burial of a next of kin: father, mother, brother, sister (v. 7). Verse 9 goes on to say: ‘if any man dies very suddenly beside him and he defiles his consecrated head [of hair],’ he becomes unclean. This canceled out his previous time under the regimen of his vow and required a ‘sin offering’ and ‘burnt offering’ and the priest was to ‘make atonement for him, because he sinned [hata] by reason of the dead body’ (v. 11). In a system where all of life was regulated by very elaborate divine do’s and don’ts plus even more elaborate and detailed ritual requirements, sins of failure were almost inevitable. Yet this is the doctrine of sin that is carried straight into the New Testament.

Paraptoma rendered trespass, offense, fall, sin, fault is employed twenty-two times in the New Testament: derived from parapiptō, fall beside the way or go astray. ‘Fall’ (Rom. 11:11, 12) and ‘fault’ (Gal. 6:1; James 5:16) convey the same negative idea of missing the mark present in the more common word hamartanō. In New Testament teaching, sin, therefore, is a fall beside the way when one should have stayed on the way. Parakoē, from parakouō, to hear casually or to overhear, conveys the idea of disobedience because of inattention.

Several recent writers rightly suggest that though ‘missing the way,’ ‘failure and sins of ignorance’ seem to indicate ‘innocent ignorance,’ the ignorance was willful ‘due to their hardness of heart’ (Eph. 4:18).¹ It is doubtful if all sins designated by these negative terms arise from conscious darkening of the mind. We are after all ‘by nature children of wrath’ (Eph. 2:3). David confesses for us all, ‘I was shaped in guilt [awon] and in sin [heta] did my mother conceive me.’ These expressions can hardly describe anything but inborn deficit of righteousness, innate guilt—more about this later. I was a sinner already before I was born. I do not need to premeditate my failure to perform duties or to neglect requirements. It comes quite without conscious deliberation—‘naturally.’

Isaiah 53:6, in the great prophecy of our Lord’s atoning death for sin, employs another word and though seldom used elsewhere for sin, it provides what surely must be a defining metaphor for this negative aspect of sin: ‘All we like sheep have gone astray’ (ta ḥh, to go astray, err, wander). The precise sense in a non-moral situation is in they ‘wandered [ta ḥh] in desert wastes, finding no way to a city to dwell in’ (Ps. 107:4), ‘your enemy’s ox or his donkey going astray’ (ta ḥh) (Exod. 23:4). In most of the other occurrences moral lapse is involved: used about fifty times in kal; rendered, to err, go astray; in hiphil to cause to wander, cause to err, seduce. My comment in a lecture on exegesis of Isaiah 53 reads: ‘This word does not seem to describe willful sin, so much as the result of innate weakness. [See Pss. 58:3; 107:4; Isa. 16:8; Isa. 28:7; etc.] Thus through no willful act [voluntary] of our own we enter into the sinful nature of the race. But as many point out, this sin is culpable ... cause for personal guilt.' I do not think David was restricting his meaning to any special class of super-sinners when he said, 'The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray [ta ḥh] from birth' (Ps. 58:3).

It is not generally understood quite how prevalent the distinction between sin as negative (missing, neglecting, failing) and as positive (trespassing, transgressing) is in passages which do not in translation obviously convey both aspects. The distinction has great importance, as shall appear shortly.

Illustrative Scripture and Historic Statements

A quite faithful rendering of Psalm 32:1 and 2 might read: 'Oh the blessedness of him whose transgression (pasha ♪) is forgiven (literally, "lifted up"), whose sin (ḥaṭṭa ḥh) is covered. Oh the blessedness of the man (Heb. ḥadham) unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity' (ḥwon, guilt, punishment).' In this passage the positive offense against God's laws, passing of boundaries or transgression (pasha ♪) is taken away but the negative failures, flaws, etc., are covered. Transgressions are not coverable nor are defects capable of being taken away. In the case of the blessed man, taking away and covering have rendered the 'man' without guilt, i.e. justified. Paul takes these sentences to be comprehensive for the removal of sin in all its aspects (Rom. 4:5–8). A careful examination of other Old Testament texts, such as the scapegoat ceremony (Lev. 16) and the prophecy of our Lord's great act of atonement (Isa. 53), indicate that these two aspects—positive transgressions and negative failures to come up to standard (i.e. sins in the narrow sense)—include all the others. They provide scriptural precedent for the familiar liturgical lines from the General Confession of the Book of Common Prayer, 'We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; and we have done those things which we ought not to have done.' They also render support to Question 14 and Answer of the Westminster Shorter Catechism: 'Question. What is sin? Answer, Sin is any want of conformity to [negative], or transgression of the law [positive] of God.'

3. Sin As Guilt (Culpability, Blameworthiness, Deserving of Punishment)

These distinctions will be moved on to the next category: guilt or culpability involving deserved punishment, comprehending both sin as commission and as omission as one inevitable continuum. Guilt is of the very essence of sin.

The Hebrew word which most distinctly unites sins of all kinds with their penal consequences is ḥwon. The King James Version renderings are reflected in Brown, Driver and Briggs' Lexicon: 'iniquity, guilt or punishment.' Iniquity (I think not the best choice of word) is not a very specific word (the Latin negative, in, plus aequus, even, equal, just, fair), injustice or unfairness. But the Hebrew word always involves the legal sense of guilt as the invariable consequence of sin. Whatever personal moral evil happens to be the subject of discourse, personal guilt is its consequence. Illustrative passages are numerous. In the first appearance Cain complains, 'My punishment [ḥwon] is greater than I can bear' (Gen. 4:13). Job tells his accusatory friends that divine 'wrath brings the punishment [ḥwon] of the sword' (Job 19:29). The merging of wrong deed (iniquity) with guilt and punishment for the same is reflected in the alternation of translations in the common Versions. The subject of Numbers 5 is marital unfaithfulness, adultery, viz.: ‘The man shall be free from iniquity, but the woman shall bear her iniquity’ (Num. 5:31); ‘Moreover, the man will be free from guilt, but that woman shall bear her guilt [emphasis added]’ (nasb); ‘The husband will be innocent of any wrongdoing, but the woman will bear the consequences [emphasis added] of her sin’ (niv). BDB The Hebrew Lexicon translates the first clause of Numbers 5:31 ‘[The man will be] freed from punishment’ (emphasis added).²

Thus it is plain that though sin may be an act either of commission or of omission, in either case guilt for the same (blameworthiness) and deserved punishment are inevitable accompaniments. There are many other words for sin in the Bible. They fill out our understanding of causes for sins of omission and commission, varieties of the same, motives, etc., but we have before us the main content of biblical revelation on the subject. Enforcement and illustration of these broad assertions can be demonstrated for ancient Israel’s sins in connection with Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement, Lev. 16) and the comprehensive, once-for-all act of ‘propitiation ... for the sins of the whole world’ (1 John 2:2) by the Servant of the Lord (Isa. 53, especially v. 6). Let us look carefully.

The first fifteen chapters of Leviticus constitute the whole complicated apparatus for ritual expiation and reconciliation for every aspect of Israel’s sin and sins—for every class of people in the nation and for every situation. Every time one reads it one is impelled to wonder if any one ever completed one of the rituals exactly right.

The denouement took place annually on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lev. 16:29) in Yom Kippur, the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). The tone and theme for this annual observance is set in Leviticus 23:26–32. Warnings were severe. All work was to cease. The whole nation went into solemn mourning from sundown on the ninth day till sundown on the tenth. During those hours the priest made ritual atonement for himself and his family (Lev. 16:11). Then he made ritual, sacrificial atonement ‘for the Holy Place, because of the uncleannesses of the people of Israel’ (Lev. 16:16). After that he made his once-a-year-only entrance to the holy place to make ‘atonement for himself and for his house and for all the assembly of Israel’ (Lev. 16:17).

Finally, the high priest climaxed the ritual removal of all Israel’s sins in the ceremony of the scapegoat. During the previous preparatory ceremonies, an identical goat having been slain as ‘the sin offering ... for the people’ (Lev. 16:15), another ‘live goat’ was kept ready. Then the ‘live goat’ was brought to the brazen altar. But it was not slain, rather:

Aaron shall lay both his hands on the head of the live goat, and confess over it all the iniquities [awon] of the people of Israel, and all their transgressions [pish eyhem], all their sins [hattō ham]. And he shall put them on the head of the goat and send it away into the wilderness by the hand of a man who is in readiness (Lev. 16:21).

Observe that the three words for sin as commission, as omission and comprehensively as guilt, are in this total confession of Israel’s sins of the past year. In this case sin is last, and seems to be used in its non-specific sense as designating moral evils of all kinds. The next verse, however, makes it plain that awon is the word which gathers up both aspects of sin, omission and commission, or whatever was blameworthy and deserving of punishment, for, ‘The goat shall bear all their iniquities [emphasis added] on itself to a remote area, and he shall let the goat go free in the wilderness’ (Lev.

16:22). In the final act of disposing of Israel's sins, now propitiated (Godward) and expiated (manward) by vicarious sacrifice the whole is removed comprehensively and completely as guilty, deserved punishment.

This sequence and relationship is even more precisely involved in the case of Isaiah's prophecy of our Lord's act as 'the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world' in Isaiah 53 (especially v. 6). The prophecy takes the form of a contrite sinner's confession. In order to highlight the three words for moral evil I cite my own translation. This is in my lectures on the exegesis of Isaiah and in my book, The Sufferings and the Glory.³ 'All of us as the flock have gone astray; we have turned each one to his own way and the Lord has caused to strike on him the punishment due all of us.' There are intertwined here a fairly complete doctrine both of sin and of atonement for sin.

Conclusions in Isaiah 53:6

1. Man is collectively a sinner by nature, i.e. born in Adam's sin. (a) This sin is universal: 'of us all.' This includes all who share in the confession. Though Delitzsch referred to it in context primarily to a repentant nation of Israel, Peter was not reluctant to apply it directly to Christian believers (1 Peter 2:22–25). That this is proper is further witnessed by the fervent manner in which Christians always enter personally and as a congregation into recitation of Isaiah 53:6. In this sin we have already moved 'as a flock' (Heb., katson).⁴ The word is a figure drawn from the well-known movement of all gregarious herds of animals, especially the domestic flocks of the Near East (not just of sheep, but of sheep and goats mixed). '[L]ike sheep' in most Versions erroneously suggests individual movement rather than the collective motion of a mass as Romans 5:12 teaches.

More to the point, the character of the sin in which in Adam we collectively participated is not personal and not even consciously committed by the confessors, then or now. 'Have gone astray' might more exactly be translated 'went astray' (taʿnu Kal. perf. 1 c.plc, from [taʿh], go astray, wander, err). It all happened long ago, and still happens every day. The word characterizes not so much willful, rebellious 'sin with a high hand' as sins of innate weakness (see Isa. 16:8; 28:7; Pss. 58:3; 107:4; and 119:176), 'I have gone astray like a lost sheep.' Thus through no personal act of our own we participate in the sinful nature of our human kind. We are innately disposed to go astray. It is inherited sin whereby as one flock every human being has wandered away from God and become lost to Him except by rescue. This must receive special treatment later. It is 'not doing the things we ought to have done.'

2. Men are individually sinners by choice. The sequence of words of Isaiah 53:6 in Hebrew reads: 'Each to his own way has turned,' each (ʿish, singular, distributive) is emphatic. The language is of the up to date, the here and now. Individual, personal sins are confessed. The sense of the word for each is rendered 'every man' (twice in Num. 16:17 kjv) and 'each [emphasis added] ... for himself' (Num. 31:53). And in this aspect, the character of sin is a personal act, 'every man' for himself deliberately chosen. This turning from the way of life, of obedience to divine commandment, contrary to the voice of conscience is, of course, what we have seen of sin as commission (rebellion, transgression, trespass, revolt and the like). This kind of moral offense in personal life is the fruit of Adamic sin (cf. Ps. 14:1 with Rom. 3:10 ff.).

3. Sins of omission and commission are culpable, that is, blameworthy, guilty, deserving of punishment, viz.: ‘And the Lord caused to strike on him the punishment due all of us’ (Isa. 53:6). It is of great importance that this clause lifts to highest prominence the word ʾwōn (in the Versions, iniquity), as the precise burden our Lord bore at Calvary: that which in David’s language is non-imputed to the contrite, believing and confessing sinner (Ps. 32:2), and which was imputed to the atoning Servant, viz.: ‘the iniquities [guilt] of us all.’ Cain said ‘My punishment [emphasis added] [ʾwōn] is greater than I can bear’ (Gen 4:13). Through the prophet (Amos 3:2) God declares, ‘Therefore, I will visit (ʾp̄h̄qodh from paqadh, to effect something upon, often rendered visit upon, in certain contexts) upon you all your punishments’ (lit. trans.); this literal rendering gives the more precise sense of ʾwōn, focusing on guilt and punishment, the results of transgression and sin.

A lengthy monograph would not exhaust the evidences for the above summary of the basic vocabulary about sin in Scripture.

Vocabulary of Sin in Common Speech of the Bible

The very large number and variety of terms for moral evil is more a reflection of common speech about moral evil than a source for divine revelation on the subject. Bible dictionaries, which one might expect to go into some detail, do not do so. This I judge to be because the number and variety of biblical terms, aside from the more technical ones we have already discussed, are more a reflection of common speech about moral evil in ancient times than fruitful source for divine revelation on the subject. In agreement with this opinion I will present and discuss very briefly several of these words which in one way or another make us aware of how truly various are the manifestations and shades of moral evil and how great the dangers are from it.

Sin is an unpaid debt: we owe divine justice, or perhaps better, duty to God that we have not performed, as in the petition, ‘forgive us our debts’ (opheilēma, Matt. 6:12).⁵ An examination of this word and related (opheilē and opheilō), owe, or be indebted, and opheiletēs, debtor (rendered ‘offenders’ at Luke 13:4, ‘sinners’ in kjv), shows we human beings enter this world to be God’s servants and instead pay our debt of service to sin and the devil.

Agnoēma, ‘errors’ (kjv), ‘sins ... committed in ignorance’ (niv), appears only once in the Bible. It is used at Hebrews 9:7 in connection with the Old Testament sacrificial ritual for ‘sins of ignorance’ (cf. Heb. 5:1–3; and Lev. 4, 5, 22; and Num. 24–29). ‘Folly is bound up in the heart of a child’ (Prov. 22:15) and ‘The devising of folly is sin’ (Prov. 24:9). We are born with a wisdom deficit and never get over it, for as Peter says, men of every age are ‘willingly ... ignorant’ (2 Peter 3:5 kjv), ‘exchanged the truth about God for a lie’ (Rom. 1:25) and ‘did not like to retain God in their knowledge’ (Rom 1:28 kjv).

Hēttēma, ‘fault’, appears only twice: of these only once as moral evil, in 1 Corinthians 6:7, ‘there is utterly a fault [hēttōn] among you’ (kjv); in Romans 11:12 rendered ‘failure’ (esv) or ‘diminishing’ (kjv) and related to the verb hēttaomai, ‘to be inferior,’ and hēttōn, ‘worse’ or ‘less,’ this word for moral evil designates the condition of being less or worse than one ought to be—a failure to improve on opportunities. This, of course, as life goes on and one grows older bears fruit in envy and jealousy of others who are better and have more—particularly the poor man’s sin. Material poverty is no sign of superior spirituality.

The atmosphere of Old Testament religion and conscience does not seem ever to sever guilt from threatened punishment (or possible atonement) from any aspect of sin or any word for the same. Existentialist philosophers often refer to the concept of dread or despair, which they hold to be an aspect of human finitude. Hence all people fear death and the unknown to follow. Paul Tillich, an existential theologian defined the task of theology as one of ‘correlation,’ ‘namely the correlation between existential questions and theological answers.’⁶ For Tillich, who rejected Scripture and the historical Christ Jesus as revelation, the question to be given an answer ‘by correlation’ is ‘death, finitude and guilt.’⁷ He really gives no answer other than the equivalent of Henley’s Invictus, a counsel of despair:

It matters not how strait the gate,

How packed with punishments the scroll.

I am the master of my fate.

I am the captain of my soul.

The most specific biblical word for guilt as deserved punishment is ʾasham. The focus may be on some feature of omission or commission, but modern discovery and translation of ancient Near East literary remains shows the Hebrew people and their neighbors were unable to conceive of sins without devastating consequences—and God agreed. This the affair of Abraham’s wife Sarah and Abimelech (Gen. 20:1–17, especially v. 9), and of Isaac’s wife Rebekah and Abimelech (Gen. 26:6–11, especially v. 10) amply demonstrates. Pharaoh interpreted the ‘great plagues’ as punishment for taking away a man’s wife (Gen. 12:17–19); Abimelech was warned that punishment would follow what the Philistine king himself called a ‘great sin’ (Gen. 26:9) with attending punishment, God being his informant (Gen. 26:6–7). In the incident of Genesis 26, after Isaac’s affectionate display gave public lie to his claim Rebekah was only his sister, Abimelech complained: ‘What is this you have done to us? One of the people might easily have lain with your wife, and you would have brought guilt [ʾasham] upon us’ (Gen. 26:10). This word, and its derivatives, is the most comprehensive word for sin. ‘The primary meaning of the word ʾasham seems to center on guilt, but moves from the act which brings guilt to the condition of guilt to the act of punishment.’⁸ A learned article says, ‘... ʾasham varies in stress. It may denote acts of sin, responsibility for sin, punishment, and even the aftermath of punishment ... the totality of alienation from God, including consequences.’⁹

The most specific New Testament word for sin as transgression of divine law is parabainō (transgress, break, deviate from the way, overstep) and its noun derivative, parabatēs (transgressor) and parabasis (transgression). This is normally used in the New Testament when sin is viewed in relation to God’s will or law. Jesus said the Pharisees and scribes ‘break [parabainō, “transgress” kjv] the commandment of God for the sake of your tradition’ (Matt. 15:3); Paul, ‘You who boast in the law dishonor God by breaking [parabasis] the law’ (Rom. 2:23); and James, ‘you are ... convicted by the law as transgressors’ (James 2:9).

Each of these words emphasizes some aspect of the biblical doctrine of sin, though no single one may be said either to define sin comprehensively or to designate the essence of sin.

Literature

The literature of research into the biblical terms for and vocabulary for sin is endless. We have quoted and cited some of it already in the Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia. A very superior article, remarkable for its brevity, is ‘sin,’ by C. C. Ryrie and R. A. Killen.¹⁰

Sometimes the accomplishments even of prominent saints and scholars of previous generations are neglected simply because the welter of recent literature submerges it in obscurity. Even so an occasional accolade is paid to the superb chapters on sin in the Old Testament Theology of Herman Schultz. In his chapter XIV (Vol. II) ‘Manifestation and Names of Sin in Israel,’ in eleven pages, Schultz sets forth the data I have presented in classical elegant language of the nineteenth century with all the technical evidence in footnotes. If it were possible I would have inserted it into my book without modification instead of my less elegant, modest prose. I close this chapter with an exemplary quote from Schultz on ‘the stages and climax of sin’ from the above-mentioned chapter.

Notwithstanding the variety of its forms, the sin of Israel is all of a piece. From comparatively small beginnings it advances step by step to its utmost height. From the most innocent forms, in which it still has a pleasing aspect, sin goes on growing till it openly boasts of its devilish hostility to God. It commences with sinful feelings in the heart, which even the good and pious still experience (e.g. Ps. 73:2; Prov. 4:23 ff.); with the sins of youth which are chargeable to human frailty—for ‘stolen waters are sweet’ (Job 13:26; Pss. 25:7; 19:13; Prov. 9:17). It commences with that rather innocent ignorance which God is still able to excuse. ‘They are foolish, and know not what is right’ (Pss. 19:13; 90:8; cf. Jer. 5:4). There is a sinful state in which the sinner still feels his sin a burden, a misery from which he seeks restoration and deliverance (Ps. 51:5; Prov. 9:4). But out of this rather animal state of nature, sin does its best to grow. It keeps firm hold of the will, until it ceases to struggle. It saturates with its poison the innermost parts of the Ego. It turns sinners into enemies of God, men who do evil habitually, and who yield themselves up wholly, with all their personal faculties and gifts (Pss. 6:9; 14:4; 37:1–7), as instruments of evil (Ps. 37:20; Deut. 5:9).

The highest stage of sin is likewise shown by the shamelessness with which it flaunts itself openly. The fool, the scorner, despises rebuke; correction only makes him worse (Prov. 1:7; 9:7 ff.), he knoweth not shame (Zeph. 3:5). The boldness of its countenance testifies against God’s people when, like Sodom, it openly proclaims its sin (Isa. 3:9; Hosea 5:5; Jer. 3:3; 6:15; 7:12). This is shown in wanton disregard of a neighbor’s interests, when one considers everything allowable that one has the power to do (Micah 2:1). But the most terrible display of the real nature of sin is when a man delights in evil because it is evil, and loathes good because it is good (Micah 3:2, 9; Ps. 52:5). Then bitter is called sweet, and darkness light (Isa. 5:20; Amos 6:12; cf. Matt. 12:31). Then whosoever eschews evil is declared an outlaw (Isa. 5:15; cf. Prov. 29:27). Then men hate light and truth (Job 24:13), and rejoice over the misfortune of a neighbor (Ps. 35:11 ff.; 41:6 ff.). Nay more, they have no longer even the natural instinct of a brute beast for what is wholesome and good. They seek after their own hurt (Isa. 1:2 ff.; Jer. 8:4 ff.).

At this stage, when a man takes delight in doing mischief, and cannot rest without doing it, when he is wise to do evil and ‘exults the more, the greater the evil is’ (Prov. 2:14; 4:16; Jer. 4:22; cf. Isa. 29:20), he is of course irretrievably lost. When one has grieved God’s Holy Spirit (Isa. 63:10; 65:3), has, as it were, bidden God adieu (Job 1:11; 2:5, 9; 12:6; Ps. 10:3), the heart has then become insensible to every saving influence. Then it has to be said: ‘As the Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots, so this people cannot do good, because it is accustomed to do evil’ (Jer. 13:23; cf. 4:22; 7:24 ff.; 9:2, 4; Isa. 6). The soul of the wicked desires evil; he makes a jest of infamy (Prov. 9:23; 21:10; cf. Ps. 11:5).¹¹

¹ Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1985), p. 565.

BDB Brown, Driver and Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament

² Brown, Driver & Briggs, A Hebrew And English Lexicon of the Old Testament (New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1906), p. 731.

³ Robert D. Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory (Eugene, OR: WIPF and Stock, 2001), pp. 6, 77–83.

⁴ (ts ſn), means ‘literally, small cattle [i.e. domestic animals], usually of sheep and goats in one flock’ (BDB, p. 838).

⁵ Some incautious efforts to update scriptural language, such as to substitute ‘debts’ by ‘sins’ in the Lord’s Prayer, are severely mistaken. Opheilema means unpaid debt. Sin is the broader term, including unpaid obligations. The prayer is referring to our debt to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul and mind, etc.

⁶ Paul Tillich, Systematic Theology I (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 13.

⁷ ibid., pp. 66–68.

⁸ G. H. Livingston, art. in TDOT I, p. 78.

⁹ ibid., p. 79.

¹⁰ Ryrie and Killen, Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia II (Chicago: Moody Press, 1975), pp. 1593–1595.

¹¹ Hermann Schultz, Old Testament Theology, trans. J. A. Paterson (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clarke, 1892), pp. 289–291.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (341). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Nature of Sin: Sin As Moral Evil

The Roman Church had already developed elaborate formulations of a doctrine of sin when the Reformation broke upon Europe. It was mainly a philosophical overlay of traditional and biblical concepts. The Reformers and immediate successors did not attempt a philosophical definition of sin. A Protestant perspective on sin began with Luther's acute consciousness of sin and from that day to this the progress of evangelistic, missionary, Protestant Christianity has begun its appeal to lost sinners with gospel preaching designed first to awaken sinners to their sad plight as condemned sinners (John 3:36). In preaching and missionary evangelism 'Law and Gospel' march together. Unless men's hearts are convinced and convicted of sin, grace has no meaning for them. Without necessarily defining law the preacher uses law. He seeks to bring truth to bear on conscience. He designs through Word and Spirit to make listening sinners aware of God, His will and law before whom they stand condemned. Like Paul, we expound divine law and human sin 'that every mouth may be stopped, and the whole world may be held accountable to God' (Rom. 3:19; see also Rom. 1:32; 2:12-14; 4:15; Heb. 10:26-31). The repentant thief (Luke 23:41), Isaiah in the temple (Isa. 6:5) and Peter in the presence of God manifest in flesh (Luke 5:8) needed no course in a theology of sin to know they were sinners under the judgment of divine law.

Sin Is Moral Evil

There is still no agreed formal definition of sin. 'There is a variety of description in the Bible rather than formal definition, hence the various elements must be gathered together.'¹ G. C. Berkouwer rightly asserts:

No one has ever defined sin in a way that embraces the multiplicity of the Biblical expressions. Such attempts have been made, of course, and have utilized a number of images to fill out our picture of 'sin'.... That very multiplicity in expressions should caution us against a preference for any single term.²

In view of the way the Bible speaks about sin, however, there can be no doubt about its ethical character. It is not mere calamity that wreaks havoc among people. It is not merely social disruption. Contemporary loss of such words as fornication to 'sexually active,' 'adulterer and adulteress' to 'girl friend' and 'boy friend,' shows how far the shapers of current thought and speech have moved public discourse from sound conscience and biblically shaped public awareness. In biblical teaching men are not mere victims of social evil. They are not mere passive captives of genetic misfortune. We are responsible for what we are and do. The Bible from Genesis chapter 3 onward to Revelation chapter 22 addresses us this way. Only personal moral beings can commit sins, and only they can be guilty of sin, and only they can understand what sin, i.e. moral evil, is. We are not under the control of irresistible forces or we would not be addressed by commands; nor would we be responsible for our behavior. A berserk elephant tramples its keeper and some spectators, but if blame is assigned it is likely to be laid on the keeper or the spectator. A panther attacked a San Diego jogger and even though the animal was shot later it was not because the animal was wicked. Animals can be dangerous but not sinful. Only personal moral beings can be instructed in moral good or evil. The immediate consciousness of moral beings may be addressed. The word 'ought' has meaning to them for the very center of being answers to it. 'He knows that when he is not what he ought to be; when he does what he ought not to do; or omits what he ought to do, he is chargeable with sin.'³ Alfred M.

Rehwinckel opens his book, The Voice of Conscience, with the following correct account of the universal awareness of 'I ought':

When God created man, He did not make him only potentially a moral being: he was by his very essence a moral being. There was in him not only a knowledge of the will of God, but also a readiness to apply such knowledge as an ethical norm for his own will and his whole life. For God placed in him a natural aptitude, thereby his moral responsibility was spontaneously suggested to his consciousness and endowed him with the readiness and the power to respond accordingly. After the Fall this mysterious faculty in man is the most sublime ... and most perplexing problem of human existence.⁴

Sin Is Primarily Against God

The Bible represents sin as an attack against one or all of three parties. (1) Sin is an offense against the sinner himself. He is the first to suffer from it—in conscience. This is more than an inference drawn from the many stories of accusing conscience, which show this to be true. Numerous pieces of practical exhortation in the Proverbs expressly say so, viz.: 'he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul' (Prov. 8:36 kjv); 'He who commits adultery lacks sense; he who does it destroys himself' (Prov. 6:32; see also 18:6–8; 29:6). 'The coward dies a thousand deaths; a brave man dies but once' (old English proverb).

(2) Sin may be against other individuals and society as a whole. David's wicked decision to number all Israel was an offense against his kingdom (2 Sam. 24:1–10) resulting in the death of 70,000 people (2 Sam. 24:15). 'Bad company corrupts good character' (1 Cor. 15:33 niv). Adam's sin brought disaster upon the whole human race (Rom. 5:12–19).

(3) Against God. Herman Schultz pointed out that from Amos onward Old Testament prophets were careful to show that 'manifold forms of sensuality and selfishness are at bottom a result of opposition to the will of God—that is, to God Himself, the whole of Israel's sin is really "a sin against God alone"' (Ps. 2:6; cf. Jer. 8:7; 14:7, 20; 16:10; Isa. 42:24).⁵ The 'prodigal son' knew that he had harmed himself and had sinned against his father but when 'he came to himself' he determined to say, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you' (Luke 15:18). Samuel was aware he would 'sin against the Lord by ceasing to pray' for Saul (1 Sam. 12:23). Disobedience to the law was seen by God's prophet to be sin against the Lord (Isa. 42:24). For Abimelech to take another man's wife was sin, not so much against Abraham and Sarah, who had brought their lying scheme down on their own heads, as against God the Creator and Lord of all His servants. '[I]t was I who kept you from sinning against me. Therefore I did not let you touch her' (Gen. 20:6).

David was aware he had done great harm to Bathsheba and Uriah her husband, to his family and kingdom as well as himself, yet in his conscience the offense of adultery was only against God. There had already been destructive personal and social consequences, but his agitated tongue could only say to Nathan 'I have sinned against the Lord' (2 Sam. 12:13) and his anxious pen could only write 'Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight' (Ps. 51:4).

It may be that David's conscience was impressing on him the infinite wrong of sin against God in defiling God's image in himself and another man's wife and this moved him to say 'Against you only I have sinned' (ḥaṭṭa ʾiḥi). In the strictest sense it was not his own law he had broken or Bathsheba and Uriah's, but God's law. This gave his evil thought and acts a moral character. David goes on—'and done that which is evil [hara ʾi in thy sight.' With reference to the affected people in such a case, the general term 'evil' would cover the material, physical, social harm. Bathsheba had conceived out of wedlock. She had been put to public shame and her husband was dead.

In its primary and distinctive character as sin, therefore, moral evil is only God-related. One may act wickedly so as to 'wrong his own soul' (Prov. 8:36) and do harm to others, but in its peculiar character as 'sin,' moral evil is specifically against God. '[T]he whole duty of man' is to 'Fear God and keep his commandments' (Eccles. 12:13). As Jesus Himself said: '[The] great and first commandment' is to 'love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind' (Matt. 22:37). Conscience agrees with Scripture that offenses against self and neighbor are wrong because both are in the divine image. All belong to Him. All mankind are His servants.

The fields of psychology and sociology, even civil justice and penology, seem confused today in their operational philosophy by the lack of awareness of the God-relatedness of all human beings and of all human conduct. Without God-relatedness there can be social harm to be restrained, social utility to be promoted, but no moral evil to be reprov'd, punished or pardoned. 'Whatever is right' (Alexander Pope) is 'enlightenment' philosophy, which has produced its own brand of denial of certainties of all kinds.

In eagerness, I suppose, to give a name to the burst of this confusion among people generally—at least the ones we professors meet—someone invented the term 'post-modern.' But it is also pre-modern, at least as old as the ancient Greek cynics and Pilate's cynical question, 'What is truth?'

Sin Is Moral Evil in Relation to God's Will and His Law

In the context of this sentence 'will' means the general moral inclination of the Creator not any particular 'wish' or decree or plan. Law also in this connection is God's general standard for all moral beings. These do not change and there are no exceptions, whereas God's particular will and standard may vary. It was God's will for Jacob to move from Canaan to Egypt as it was also for Joseph and Mary to move from Egypt to Nazareth, but not law until they were informed about it. Earlier it was not the will of God for Abraham to go to Egypt; His orders (law) were to go as far as Canaan only. These are particular. The Decalogue is an expression of God's will in general, and expressed either on tablets of stone or written on the fleshy tablets of the heart is to be obeyed by all men everywhere and at all times.

Since God is holy, His will is holiness—perfect moral goodness—for every moral being. Lack of conformity to divine law, therefore, constitutes sin as sin. Its root is the very essence of uncongeniality of the creature's fallen nature with the Creator's perfectly holy nature. 'Be ye holy, for I am holy' is the permanent order of the created heaven and earth, but any man who glimpses that holiness becomes immediately aware he is not holy at all. Yet he knows he ought to be and must be.

For these reasons many good theologians have defined sin as lack of conformity to the character or will of God which, when expressed in any manner at all, is the law of God. This is not to say sin is defined as lawlessness in Scripture, though 'sin is lawlessness' (1 John 3:4) reads like a definition.

Alford (also C. A. Hodge) is right in saying the sentence is convertible, viz.: lawlessness is sin. The sentence says something about sin and law but defines nothing any more than to say ‘milk is a liquid’ defines milk or ‘trees are tall’ defines trees. ‘It is only one of many seeming definitions of sin.’ G. C. H. Berkouwer is correct when he says:

No one has ever defined our sin in a way that embraces the multiplicity of biblical expressions ... That very multiplicity of expressions should caution us against a preference for any single term [i.e. one of the many Hebrew and Greek terms]....

We agree that when scripture describes our sin we sometimes get the impression that it gives a ‘definition.’ Nonetheless its descriptions are never meant in an exclusive sense. ‘Sin is lawlessness,’ we read in 1 John 3:4, yet that same letter combines the terms lawlessness and godlessness, and both are viewed in close connection with unrighteousness and wrongdoing (1 John 5:17). It is incorrect to say that these biblical expressions ‘complete’ each other. At the same time they are mutually illuminating and ought to be seen as such.⁶

In a similar way, ‘God is love’ is not a definition of God any more than ‘Our God is a consuming fire.’ Some would make one or the other such, but only to produce an unbalanced and incorrect doctrine of God.

Sin in the members of our race is an internal disorder. Our nature made in the likeness of God with regard to moral disposition, thought-life and acts is now contrary to the divine will. A constitutional distortion of the moral nature has occurred. This unlikeness to God is sin. ‘As the opposite of reason is unreason, and the opposite of good is evil; so the opposite of the divine holiness is sin. It is not mere negation or absence of the good (Augustine notwithstanding), for the positive aspect of sin is opposition to God’s moral will and law’ (C. A. Hodge). ‘For the mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God, for it does not submit to God’s law; indeed, it cannot’ (Rom. 8:7).

Faith in God involves acceptance of God’s Person and Word and will. Hence ‘whatever does not proceed from faith is sin’ (Rom. 14:23). In context neither is this text a definition of sin. Rather, it states a principle of Christian morality, which is that for an act to be righteous it must be done in reverence of God. Otherwise it is sin. ‘[S]in is lawlessness,’ i.e. anomia. It is sinful to do anything in disregard of divine law.

Every one of the words for sin in all its aspects in Scripture in one way or another has reference either to failure to come up to the standard of divine law or to breaking divine law. And throughout the Bible, as in human conscience everywhere, God ‘the Judge of all the earth’ (Gen. 18:25) sets the standard.

Sin Is Not Restricted to ‘Voluntary Acts.’

To change the form of the statement: ‘It is a grave error to say that only conscious and deliberate actions against God’s will constitutes sin.’⁷ Scripture says we are ‘by nature children of wrath’ (Eph. 2:3), i.e. we come into the world deserving God’s wrath, long prior to conscious life and before we are capable of moral decisions. Sometimes, Paul says, when we want to do good, moral evil is already present in us, warring against any good impulses (Rom. 7:17–24). Many heinous crimes are committed entirely without previous reflective thought. They are sometimes produced by habits of response that in turn flow from the fallen, sinful condition of the soul.

Bondage of the Will or Freedom of the Will?

This question must be related to a proper understanding of what is meant by the word, will, and in what sense the will is free or in bondage. Reformation theology rejected the Roman theology on this point. According to many Roman scholastic theologians and even some official canons and decrees, only deliberate acts can be sins. The Council of Trent (assembled to answer the evangelical doctrines of the Reformation) was not entirely clear on the subject. We may safely take the citations by Henry Denzinger as sufficiently trustworthy. The official ‘Systematic Index’ of the volume summarizes Roman Catholic teaching regarding the relation of the knowledge and will of persons to sin. The Systematic Index summarizes numerous dogmatic sources throughout this famous book, viz.:

To sin (actual) there is presupposed a knowledge of the law, whence it is not committed with invincible ignorance, but nevertheless with vincible; moreover, it ought to be a voluntary act, by a personal will; placed with true freedom, not only from coercion, but from necessity.⁸

The Papal Bull, ‘Exsurge Domine’ of 15 June 1520, which condemned all the ‘errors’ of Martin Luther’s earliest teaching, condemned Luther’s denial of free will among sinful men.⁹

Papal anthropology teaches that the ‘image of God’ in man at creation (Gen. 1:26) consisted in his rational and spiritual faculties only. The ‘image of God’ is permanent and unaffected by the fall. The ‘likeness’ is not a natural endowment of Adam and his descendants, but a ‘superadded’ supernatural gift.’ This likeness is said to be Adam’s original righteousness (moral purity). As a consequence of the fall the superadded gift of righteousness was withdrawn. The rational, spiritual nature remained unaffected by the fall to the extent that man is fully able to perform acts of will (choice, etc.) freely.

W.G.T. Shedd said of the dogmatic teaching of the Council of Trent: ‘Original righteousness being a supernatural gift, original sin is the loss of it, and in reality the restoration of man back again to the state in which he was created.’¹⁰ In this, Trent differs from the main line of Augustinian anthropology in the earlier Catholic tradition. Bellarmine, semi-official expositor of Trent, remarks as follows:

The state of man after the fall differs no more from the state of man as created ... than a man originally naked differs from one who was once clothed.... Hence, the corruption of nature results not from the subtraction of any gift belonging to [human] nature by creation nor from the addition of any evil quality, but solely from the loss of a supernatural gift which was over and above the gifts of nature.¹¹

The Fifth Session of the Council of Trent declares:

[C]oncupiscence, which at times the Apostle calls sin [Rom 6:12 ff.] [i.e. indwelling sin] the holy synod declares that the Catholic Church has never understood to be called sin, as truly and properly sin in those born again [i.e. by baptism], but because it is from sin and inclines to sin. But if anyone [Reformation theologians] is of the contrary opinion, let him be anathema.¹²

I quote these statements to assure the reader that even though some Roman Catholic theologians do not fully agree, church dogma rejects the teaching that man at heart is a sinner with a depraved will.

Three Senses of ‘Will’ and ‘Voluntary’

It will be helpful to point out there are different senses of ‘will’ and ‘voluntary’ in theological discourse. To be disposed by nature, or inclined by disposition, i.e. to be inherently and by habit disposed in the direction either of holiness or of sin is properly called will. To say truly as Paul, ‘I delight in the law of God, in my inner being’ (Rom. 7:22) [even when delight fails of accomplishment] or ‘his delight is in the law of the Lord’ spoken about the blessed man of Psalm 1:2, or the words of Psalm 40:8, referring to Messiah in His First Advent, quoted by Hebrews 10:7: ‘I desire to do your will, O my God; your law is within my heart’ (see also John 4:34 and 5:30)—all these designate the renewed will at the center of being, the heart.

Paul refers to the ‘mind that is set on the flesh’ (‘carnal mind’ kjv) which ‘is hostile to God’ (Rom. 8:7) and says, ‘Those who are in the flesh cannot please God’ (Rom. 8:8) and ‘The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned’ (1 Cor. 2:14). This invariable inclination away from the holy creator-God, even though the heart be empty of all true joy without Him, is what Reformation theology calls ‘the depraved will.’ To it Jesus traced all sinful deeds and expressions. This sinful will He characterized as a sinful heart (Mark 7:20–23; Matt. 12:34, 35; Luke 6:45; Matt. 15:18). In all these texts ‘heart’ refers to the very center of our being, what the depth psychologists explore, discuss and ruminate about endlessly. They are on to something real, however, even though being without an adequate anthropology they cannot put an ethical value on their findings.

The Protestant doctrine of sin—both Lutheran and Reformed-Calvinist—as opposed to Roman and Arminian-Wesleyan, has consistently recognized three proper senses of the word ‘will’ in connection with the question of whether sin is confined to 1) deliberate, conscious choices of the will, but also 2) spontaneous actions rooted in affections or tastes, and 3) fixed habits or states of disposition.

As for the first, deliberate, conscious choices, one need not be an astute theologian to regard all acts of deliberate, conscious choice contrary to God’s will and law as sin. That, however, is only the most obvious sense of the word ‘will.’

A second sense of ‘will’ includes all spontaneous expressions of our feelings, loves and hates whether inherited or acquired. If these lead to evil actions, even if there is no reflective thought involved, the actions are sinful and are punishable, even in the civil laws of mankind.

As for the third, I shall seek to demonstrate that actions rooted in innate disposition or even acquired habits, if wrongful, are voluntary and properly classed as willful and sinful.

One of the most convincing treatments of this subject I know is by W. G.T. Shedd ‘The Human Will.’¹³ Other excellent treatments by writers of systematic theology are by Francis Pieper who cites the Lutheran confessional documents in support of the position taken here and writes, ‘The Apology [to the Augsburg Confession] designates the teaching that only consciousness, deliberation, voluntariness belong to the essence of sin as a pagan error’¹⁴—see also C. A. Hodge,¹⁵ and A. H.

Strong, whose treatment is the best organized, focused and convincing on this point in print.¹⁶ I am heavily indebted to his marshaling of the evidence.

Is Sin to Be Defined As ‘a Voluntary Transgression of Known Law’?

This question arises mainly because of John Wesley, the founder of the Methodist Church, the second largest denomination in English-speaking lands. Throughout most of his long ministry Wesley insisted on defining sin as voluntary transgression of known law. Wesley’s definition was more often heard in discussions a couple of generations ago when Methodists in particular and other ‘main line’ denominations were more interested in personal salvation from sin than they have been through the recent social action epoch. In recent years, however, conservative evangelical Wesleyans have revived interest in Wesley’s definition. New biographies of Wesley and new editions of his works are now being read. The Wesleyan holiness movements of say 1825 to 1950 in America have lost their aggressive force. Present-day ‘holiness’ preaching and literature seems to retreat from some nineteenth-century extremes and to seek to be more purely Wesleyan. Their scholars are expositors of the Wesley canon.

Albert C. Outler, who died in 1989, was perhaps the leading interpreter of Methodist doctrinal teaching in the twentieth century from his position at Perkins School of Theology. Outler was General Editor of The Works of John Wesley. In one of his latest works, Outler shows how Wesley’s definition of sin is related to his doctrine of perfection. Outler affirms Wesley did not go so far as some later Methodist holiness movements with their doctrines of ‘entire sanctification’ ‘as a second and separate work of grace.’¹⁷ Yet many passages from Wesley biographies and even Wesley’s works seem to teach something distinctly like that. I think Outler means Wesley did not think of entire sanctification as ‘eradication of the old nature’—a phrase that seems to have passed out of ‘holiness’ vocabulary about 1965.

(In a class at Trinity Divinity School a few years ago I had just finished a lecture in which I identified the Mennonite Brethren in Christ [now United Missionary Church] as holding to eradication of the ‘old nature.’ At the end of class a student member of that group informed me the denomination had abandoned that doctrine. A few days later he brought a copy of their official statement of faith. It clearly affirmed progressive sanctification as in Reformation theology.)

As Wesley developed his doctrine of sin and sanctification in the face of criticism from other evangelicals of his day, it came to be taught that by employing some Wesleyan ‘Methods’ (hence Methodism) a state of perfection could be attained. Outler says:

In his view, ‘perfection’ may be ‘realized’ in a given moment (always a gift from God, received by trusting faith), yet never a finished state [one can lose it]. ‘Perfection’ connotes two conjoining ‘powers’: (1) the power to love God wholeheartedly, and (2) the power not to commit sin voluntarily (‘sin properly so-called’) which Wesley consistently defined as ‘a violation of a known law of God.’¹⁸

Outler earlier affirms Wesley ‘distinguished between voluntary sins (sin properly so-called) and our involuntary shortfallings (wandering thoughts, sin in believers, etc.),’¹⁹ I do not find in Outler’s remarks any clearer statements. Outler is more interested in showing development of Wesley’s ideas than extended systematic display of them.

The same is not true of L. G. Cox, an outright evangelical scholar, which Outler was not. Cox's chapter on 'Sin and Grace' is plain.²⁰ Wesley had a grimly pessimistic view of fallen human nature. 'Man by nature is wholly corrupted, according to Wesley.'²¹ Wesley said, 'Allow this, and you are so far a Christian. Deny it, and you are but a Heathen still.' Even though he defined sin as voluntary transgression of known law he believed all men are 'guilty of Adam's sin.'²² Hence for Wesley, salvation is by grace alone (sola gratia). He did not however teach the usual Protestant doctrine of election. God does take the initiative. Wesley thus agreed in part with Calvinists. There is a 'common grace,' which God gives to all men. This grace, which Wesley called prevenient grace, makes orderly human life possible. In addition, according to Wesley (but not by either Lutheran or Calvinist theologians), by grace God has freed every man's will. He thought it better to call this extra benefit preventing grace. Unless one has quenched the Spirit, every man is given 'conscience' and sooner or later has 'good desires.' These have been imparted (infused?) by grace (here defined not as unmerited favor as the Reformers did), 'So that no man sins because he has not grace, but because he does not use the grace he hath.'²³ God has restored to everyone the power to turn to God as an act of divine grace (not of justice as in Arminius).

So, we are on the way to understanding: 'a constant and clear teaching of Wesley and Wesleyans has been that the believer does not commit sin.'²⁴ From the Reformation point of view we are guilty for our sinful nature, under wrath as 'children of disobedience.' For Wesley, even though a Christian who has attained perfection still has remaining sin of nature (now thoroughly repressed), he bears a sort of 'guilt' for it but is not condemned for it. We are condemned only for personal acts of sin. These only are sin proper, 'voluntary transgression of known law.'²⁵ 'It is this willful sin that is pardoned because it alone can bring condemnation from God.... All this means ... that the sin in an infant, or in a believer, is not that which makes one a sinner in the true sense of the word. It is his own personal turning to and choosing the sin as his own.'²⁶

So Wesley and his true followers can define sin as voluntary transgression of known law and by this means say a sanctified believer may live without sin. I intend to show this is really declassifying much that the Bible calls sin. Wesley had no intention to deliver believers from adherence to every aspect of God's will and law, rather the opposite. He did, however, set the stage for later developments (antinomianism on the one hand, and the doctrine of entire sanctification (eradication of the fallen nature) on the other) among some of his followers. As one reads Wesley, his expositors and defenders, it becomes clear that Wesley never truly systematized his own views. As Cox, a spirited defender from the 'holiness' perspective, acknowledges, 'Wesley's opinions were too complex for many to follow him wholly.'²⁷

As we shall show presently, whatever Wesley and others may have thought, the very worst forms of sin for which we are profoundly guilty are not voluntary in the sense of personal exercise of will at all, but rather in settled disposition of the heart.

Dr. Warfield's ever present criticism of perfectionism is its inadequate notion of sin. Perfectionism is impossible, he claimed, in the presence of a profound sense of sin. The perfection of the Higher Life Movement is a subjective rather than an objective perfection, that is from ‘known sin,’ but not from the corruption of man’s heart. And this because it ignores the fact that sin consists of any lack of conformity unto the law of God as well as transgression of that law.²⁸

Is ‘Concupiscence,’ Even in the Regenerate, Sin?

Concupiscence, as all agree, remains even in the regenerate. Protestants, both Calvinists and Lutherans as well as others, have insisted that even before it breaks out in acts of sin, concupiscence (i.e. natural desires) is itself sinful. Catholics have said not. The confessional documents of Lutheran, Reformed and even the Anglican Thirty-Nine Articles say, ‘Yes.’ The same difference prevails to the present day among orthodox of each of these partisans. (Wesley must not have paid very close attention to this article.)

It will help us make up our minds to clarify the question and to set out the presuppositions upon which the Roman Catholics approach it from one side and all the original Protestants on the other.

Concupiscence is a very old term of theology, which now requires explanation for modern people. ‘Concupiscence’ (Gr. epithumia, literally ‘on the mind’) appears only three times in the Bible, ‘But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence [emphasis added]’ (epithumia) (Rom. 7:8 kjv; ‘covetousness’ esv). Here it is something generated by the sin nature when stimulated by the commands of God, ‘Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness ... evil concupiscence’ (epithumian kaken) (Col. 3:5 kjv; ‘evil desire’ esv). Concupiscence is one of several kinds of inordinate desire or sins related to uncontrolled desire. A believer is told to ‘possess his vessel’ (physical body) ‘in sanctification and honor; Not in the lust [Gr. pathos, passion] of concupiscence [emphasis added]’ (1 Thess. 4:4–5 kjv; ‘... not in the passion of lust’ esv). This seems to make concupiscence a source of lust, which in context is sexual desire, though perhaps pathos should be rendered as an adjective, ‘lustful.’

In each case concupiscence translates epithumia, the Greek word for desire. Of course, in fallen man, none of our desires is pure—Adam lost that for all of us. But is desire as such impure? Is it sin?

In my judgment this question, which has been debated fiercely for centuries, suffers from lack of clarification of what the debate is all about. Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich supply the following information. In secular Greek the word epithumia is predominately employed as a morally neutral term and sometimes so in the Septuagint, for example, ‘the desire [epithumia] of the righteous will be granted’ (Prov. 10:24). It seems to be a neutral term in some New Testament passages, for example: Mark 4:19 (‘desires for other things’) and Revelation 18:14 (‘fruit for which your soul longed’ [emphasis added]). Of course, the Greek word is not rendered concupiscence in these biblical texts. The classical Lexicon of Liddell and Scott reports that in Herodutus and in Attic prose epithumia means ‘longing after a thing, as water, bread, etc.’ A look at the Latin dictionaries demonstrates that the primary meaning of concupicentia like the Greek it translates is ‘an eager desire,’ i.e. morally neutral.²⁹ The word also has a good sense, desire for ethical-spiritual, holy, pure things. In the New Testament Jesus said, ‘With desire [epithumia] I have desired [epithumeō] to eat this passover with you’ (Luke 22:15 kjv; ‘earnestly desired’ esv) and Paul, ‘I am hard pressed between the two. My desire [epithumia] is to depart and be with Christ’ (Phil. 1:23).

There are, of course, numerous passages showing epithumia (concupiscence) has an evil sense, in which case in the New Testament it is the usual Greek word rendered lust.

When concupiscence was discussed by early theological writers (Tertullian, Augustine) they did not usually indicate whether they meant morally neutral desire (as for food and drink), or covetousness for riches, or the natural attraction men have to women and women to men, or inordinate lustful desire for any sort of thing.

The Fathers early got a perverted tilt toward the notion that even in marriage sexual desire is wrong. In these writers concupiscence, as a word, is almost always tilted toward a sexual frame of reference. The discussion was tainted with this misunderstanding down to the Reformation.

In Reformation times Lutherans and Calvinists asserted that righteousness (Lat. justice) was possessed by Adam as an aspect of the divine ‘image’—for which ‘our likeness’ (Gen. 1:26) is simply a parallel term. Likeness and image are convertible terms. In such a case Adam’s desires along the whole range of human interests were holy by nature. The Roman Church taught (and still teaches) that Adam’s righteousness (justitia) was a superadded gift not an aspect of the image of God in man. So the desires of nature, inherent in the image of God, are morally neutral. If controlled by reason they issue in good, if not, then in evil. As such they are neither good nor bad.

Both the Lutherans and Calvinists and, somewhat later, Anglicans, were certain of two things: (1) separation of the image from the likeness is exegetically and theologically impossible, and (2) every part of man was vitiated by the sin of Adam. So, though desire of any kind in Adam would have been holy and good (proper for a creature in communion with his Creator), desire was not unaffected by the fall. Thus the very heart of man—his innermost being, where sin originates and from which every desire originates—is tainted, hence sinful: even so-called innocent desires for food and drink.

It has been rightly pointed out that the ‘internal part’ of the first sin ‘was the originating and starting of a wrong inclination.’ She ‘desired’ the fruit of a tree. Desire is what concupiscence means. ‘This evil inclining and desiring is denominated “concupiscence” in theological nomenclature. In the Augustinian ... anthropology [Calvinist and Lutheran and others] it includes mental as well as sensual desire; in the Pelagian anthropology, it is confined to sensual appetite.’³⁰

Calvin said of Adam after he deserted his original righteousness: ‘Not only did a lower appetite seduce him but ... impiety occupied ... his mind and pride penetrated to the depths of his heart.’³¹

Calvin rejected the medieval notion that impulses of the senses are the seat of concupiscence or the ‘kindling wood’ of sin and states:

Paul removes all doubt when he teaches that corruption subsists not in one part only, but that none of the soul remains untouched by that mortal disease ... the inordinate impulses of the appetites ... especially the mind is given over to blindness and the heart to depravity.³²

Shedd called attention to Luther’s comments on Galatians 5:17:

When Paul says that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, he admonishes us that we must feel the concupiscence of the flesh, that is to say, not only carnal lust, but also pride, wrath, slothfulness, impatience, unbelief, and such like.³³

In a relative sense, of course, many desires of our human nature are as such (if we were not fallen creatures) innocent. But we are not where Adam was before the fall. Desire is never ‘as such,’ i.e. unaffected by our sinful nature. The sensations associated with appetite for food and consequent desire, for example, was probably the same in Edenic Adam as in us, but depravity at the center of fallen man today affects all our appetites. C. A. Hodge summarized the Romanist position this way:

... [T]he opposition between appetite [concupiscence] and reason is natural in man, and ... though it be an imperfection it is not a corruption of nature. Nor have the inordinate desires [actual concupiscence] the nature of sin, being the free and deliberate transgression of the law of God [sic] can be only in the rational will [still unvitiated by the fall]; though it be true that they are temptations to sin, becoming the stronger and more frequent the oftener they have been indulged ... they contract the malice of sin only when consent is given by the will.... Hence the distinction of concupiscence antecedent and concupiscence consequent [note the persistent over refinement of scholastic distinctions such as antecedent and consequent] to the consent of the will; the latter is sinful, the former is not.³⁴

These are not all the distinctions Romanist theology makes, but sufficient to clarify how they answer the question, ‘Is concupiscence sin?’ (I have not yet counted the number of kinds of ‘grace’ in Roman scholastic theology.)

The Council of Trent acknowledges, as we have seen earlier, that St Paul calls concupiscence antecedent to the will, sin, but asserts that he does so not because it is sin but because it can lead to sin.³⁵ The issue did not die, however, but continued to demand attention until the Bull of Pius VI, ‘Auctorem fidei’ of 28 August 1794.

Let evangelical theology then stand where the sixteenth century Reformation stood: the bad news is that when mankind fell, everything about us became tainted with sin and corrupt, especially the heart. I was a pastor of a family where the godly wife and mother had a profane, raucous and promiscuous sister who visited frequently. This was a matter of grief to the husband and a strain on the family tie. Wife Zetta, who loved her wayward sister, once burst out to me as she, with tears, reported her sister’s latest escapade: ‘but Pastor, Lizzie is really good at heart.’ Of course there was great value in the poor sister’s soul, both for God and for Zetta. But the seat of the problem was precisely Lizzie’s bad ‘heart’ where original sin remained, as in us all, and where the law of sin and death still prevailed.

It is very important to understand the basic difference between Lutheran and Reformed doctrine on the one hand and Arminian-Wesleyan and Catholic on the other to note a fact of history. The Lutheran position is clear in the Formula of Concord:

... [O]riginal sin is no trivial corruption, but so profound a corruption of human nature as to leave nothing sound, nothing uncorrupt in the body or soul of man.³⁶

The concupiscence of original sin remains even in believers, according to Luther:

... [T]he believer ... according to the flesh still has sin ... There all manner of filth still clings to him, and evil concupiscence ... always remains beside his faith.³⁷

And according to the Westminster Confession, Chapter VI, 5:

This corruption of nature, during this life, doth remain in those that are regenerated; and though it be through Christ pardoned and mortified, yet itself and all the motions thereof, are truly and properly sin.

The early Reformed leaders except for Zwingli were in complete agreement,³⁸ as also the official Confessions of the Reformed and Presbyterian churches. Generally so also were the many English-speaking denominations that developed out of Puritanism. Historically, the inclination to sin of our fallen nature which theologians call concupiscence is sin whether or not it issues in acts of sin. They do not say hunger, thirst, social interest, the mating impulse, etc., per se, are sinful, but are seated in the fallen nature of man and therefore sinful, as is everything else about us, even after justification.³⁹ That concupiscence is sin was specifically rejected by John Wesley in some of his writings. Though Methodism adopted the Thirty-Nine Articles as its own it modified Article VII, 'Original Sin or Birth Sin' by omitting the part of Article VII which says original sin 'doth remain in them that are regenerated' and 'the apostle doth confess that concupiscence ... hath of itself the nature of sin.'

¹ J. E. Kuizenga on 'Sin' in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia IV, p. 2798.

² G. C. Berkouwer, Studies in Dogmatics: Sin V (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971). p. 255.

³ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 181.

⁴ Alfred M. Rehwinckel, The Voice of Conscience (St Louis: Concordia Publ. Co., 1956), pp. 1, 2.

⁵ Herman Schultz, Old Testament Theology, trans. J. A. Paterson (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clarke, 1892), p. 288.

⁶ Berkouwer, op. cit, pp. 255, 256.

⁷ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics I (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), p. 528.

⁸ Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma (St Louis: B. Herder Co., 1957), 'Indexes,' p. 47.

⁹ ibid., pp. 775, 776.

¹⁰ William G. Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine II (2 Volumes, Grand Rapids, MI: Minneapolis, MN: Klock & Klock Christian Publ., 1978), p. 146.

¹¹ Bellarmin, De Gratia Primi Hominia as cited by Shedd, ibid., pp. 148, 149.

¹² Denzinger, Sources of Catholic Dogma, p. 792.

- ¹³ William Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine Chapter III, pp. 115–147.
- ¹⁴ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, pp. 528, 529.
- ¹⁵ C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), pp. 186–188.
- ¹⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 549–559.
- ¹⁷ Albert C. Outler, ed. T. C. Ogden and L. R. Longden, The Wesleyan Theological Heritage (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1991), p. 122.
- ¹⁸ ibid., pp. 121, 122.
- ¹⁹ ibid., p. 86.
- ²⁰ L. G. Cox, John Wesley's Concept of Perfection (Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1964), pp. 27–67.
- ²¹ ibid., p. 28.
- ²² ibid., pp. 28, 29.
- ²³ ibid., p. 32.
- ²⁴ ibid., p. 44.
- ²⁵ ibid., p. 48.
- ²⁶ ibid., p. 48.
- ²⁷ ibid., p. 194.
- ²⁸ S. C. Craig, in his Preface to B. B. Warfield's, Perfectionism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1967), p. XI.
- Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.
- ²⁹ See the monumental Latin-English Lexicon, W. Freund and E. A. Andrews.
- ³⁰ Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, p. 179.
- ³¹ Calvin, Institutes II, i., 9.

³² ibid.

³³ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology, vol. 2, p. 180.

³⁴ J. J. Ming in Catholic Encyclopedia vol. IV (New York: The Encyclopedia Press, 1913), p. 208.

³⁵ Denzinger, Sources of Catholic Dogma, para. 792.

³⁶ Formula of Concord, Art. I, iii, Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom IV (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, n.d.), p. 100.

³⁷ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, p. 236.

³⁸ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, p. 542, note 29.

³⁹ See E. C. Gibson. The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, ‘Article IX, of Original Sin,’ pp. 357–377, for further details of Reformation Theology of Concupiscence.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (348). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

4

The Nature of Sin: Sin As Disposition

In this chapter we continue to define features of the nature of sin and to answer some related questions.

Sin Is a State or Disposition of Moral Evil (the Depths of Sin)

Among those for whom sin is esteemed to be the correct name for moral evil, who would deny that outward acts against moral standards are sin? Yet there is a common silent assumption of many that sin consists only in outward acts. Further, no one is so far advanced in holiness in this life as not to be reminded that ‘as a man thinks in his heart so is he.’

In our time Christian doctrine no longer informs common opinion about what constitutes the soul of man. Many are not even sure there is such an entity as mankind or human nature, which might be either holy or corrupt. Behavior and ‘relationships’ are now the focus of attention even though motives, i.e. inner forces producing behavior, are the substance of what we now call psychological counseling. This movement calls what it tries earnestly to do, therapy. I presume there are schools of psychology which assign a moral quality to what their clients are ‘at heart’ when therapy starts, but we hear very little of moral judgments from psychologists. Such expressions as social harm, dysfunctional, sexually active, poorly adjusted personality, paranoid, etc., have no inherent moral content.

I have said earlier that for Christian counselors to be worthy of the name, and certainly to address the reality of their clients' condition they must come to realize that there is such a thing as a morally evil heart; further, that every human being, without exception, has such a heart. Partly because of my own experience in teaching classes of students already committed to Christian (called 'biblical') counseling, I feel it is important to point out what must be understood. This conviction has been deepened by literature on Jungian and other schools of psychology furnished to me by former students, now professors, by contacts with professors, and one of my children now a professional psychology clinician, Psy.D.

The following remarks are designed to remind believers that any departure from submission to God or lack of conformity to His law, in state or disposition—what the Bible calls the 'heart'—is sin. Perhaps some who are skeptical of the very categories of moral good and moral evil may even take notice.

Has 'Total Disability' Been Totally Annulled by Preventive (or Prevenient) Grace?

From a certain point of view, to say man is evil at heart is simply to affirm total depravity and original sin. Both of these expressions require considerable explanation if they are to be employed at all. 'Bad at heart ... damned for original sin ... totally depraved' are hard to accept. Such teachings seem to many to be contrary to experience. These charges seem to take too little account of the generous acts, noble aspirations and selfless charity of ancient and modern heathen—failure to notice, even among unregenerate men who never even heard of Christ, the goodness of mother love; filial piety; strivings after God; and admiration of the good, the beautiful and the true. Wesleyan theology claims that God has as an act of grace universally restored some of man's powers for good. Every man has the restored power under universal grace to choose Christ or to reject Him—without further divine aid. Wesley did not reject total depravity. He put it in a theoretical past, finding biblical support for his conviction in John 1:9: '[Christ] ... the true light, which enlightens everyone, was coming into the world.' As previously noted herein, this is sometimes called prevenient (going before) grace or preventing (same essential meaning) grace. There are other refinements too detailed to report here. Augustinians respond that 'children of wrath' (Eph. 2:3) and 'not able to understand them' (1 Cor. 2:14) and similar texts tell us what we actually are—not what we would theoretically be apart from preventing grace.

Although L. C. Cox, Director of Ministerial Training at Marion College, of Wesleyan heritage, sets forth the Wesleyan outlook fairly,¹ for sake of brevity I quote the summary statement of another competent Wesleyan, R. G. Turtle Jr, as follows:

Prevenient or preventing grace for Wesley describes the universal work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts and lives of people between conception and conversion. Original sin ... makes it necessary for the Holy Spirit to initiate the relationship between God and people ... which prevents them from moving so far ... that when they finally understand the claims of the gospel ... he guarantees their freedom to say yes.²

A. H. Strong, while a rather strict Augustinian, was convinced that despite the utter blameworthiness of every fallen soul that fact does not mean 'the soul [is] wholly given over to the power of evil.' He says:

While we maintain that this is true of man apart from God, we also insist side by side with the evil bent of the human will there is always an immanent divine power which greatly counteracts the force of evil, and if not resisted leads the individual soul—even when resisted leads the world at large—toward truth and salvation. This immanent power is none other than Christ, the eternal Word, the light which lighteth every man; see John 1:4, 9.³

Strong, however, was a believer in particular special grace and particular election, so he disagreed essentially with Wesley. His post-millennialism is evident in the above statement.

J. O. Buswell, a strict Calvinist, held to a doctrine somewhat like the ‘universal enablement’ of Wesley and the ‘immanent divine power’ suggested by Strong.⁴

... [A]lthough I cannot cogently prove it from the Scripture, I postulate that the convicting work of the Holy Spirit is absolutely universal to the entire human race in all ages and in all areas.⁵

Calvin went far toward what we have now seen in Wesley, Strong and prominently in Buswell, but with perhaps more precision. Having acknowledged the presence ‘in every age [of those] who, guided by nature have striven toward virtue throughout life’⁶ he affirms that ‘amid ... corruption of nature there is some place for God’s grace; not such grace as to cleanse it, but to restrain it inwardly.’⁷ Such uprightness and virtues as manifest in Camillus, a noble but unrewarded patriot, are ‘not common gifts of nature, but special graces of God, which he bestows variously and in a certain measure.’⁸ From this beginning set forth in the Institutes II, chap. iii, 1–14, developed the doctrine of common grace in H. Bavinck, C. Hodge and more recently in John Murray’s ‘Common Grace,’ chap. 10.⁹

The Severe Blameworthiness of Innate Depravity of Heart

These citations, of course, anticipate the doctrine of original sin later in this book. They are cited here to alleviate some of the grim, harsh impact on the reader of the certain fact that the evil habits of the heart, or the innate depraved disposition we all have as members of Adam’s race, is sin and more blameworthy than the acts which proceed from it. I think a review of the evidence will convince the attentive mind, however reluctantly. I shall argue from (1) jurisprudence, (2) modern psychology and (3) the consensus gentium (the general opinion of the race), on the one hand, and (4) Scripture and (5) Christian experience on the other. The first three are suggestive, the fourth conclusive and the fifth supportive.

(1) The Principles of Jurisprudence

Common knowledge available to any person aware of what goes on in our world is all we need for demonstration that every human heart is morally defective. It will not be necessary to cite particular parts of common law, or statutes of legislation, or cases to prove that in law a very clear distinction is made between unlawful acts performed ‘with malice aforethought’ and such acts of sudden response to circumstances (passion) and unlawful acts which are traceable to the offenders’ prevailing disposition, constitutional avarice (nowadays called the criminal mind). There are other technical designations. Courts have always recognized these distinctions. We at present (the first decade of the twenty-first century) are seeing the reversal of a trend to be lenient toward the ‘habitual’ (dispositional) criminal on the supposition that environment and training had made him so. It seems more evident to jurists and laymen today that however and whatever the cause of such depravity, it deserves punishment as guilty and blameworthy. This is being forced upon very reluctant ‘progressive’ jurists and public. The law codes of antiquity, not least the Mosaic code, embody this principle. The lex talionis is the only just reason for punishment of crimes.

(2) Evidence of Modern Psychology

As I have asserted, modern psychologists are not unanimous in rejecting moral judgments upon psychological states, though from what I read as a layman, it seems very many do. There seems to be agreement now and has been for over a century, that there is a vast area of the human psyche that lies below the level of awareness. Who can say for sure each man has an id, an ego and a superego or if in addition to the conscious there is an unconscious self and a subconscious self? I shall not pretend currency in the field by attempting to discuss important psychologists, their experiments and theories. They do all operate on the assumption that there is an area of great depth below consciousness.

Long ago Augustine, who certainly thought deeply and wisely on the subject, spoke of it many times as a ‘vast court’ (and as a ‘vast field’). Therein ‘great is the force of memory, excessive great O my God.’¹⁰

Out of this deep, below the level of ordinary awareness, proceed our dreams during slumber, and many of our thoughts in moments of reflection and suppressed lusts on occasion of temptation. We are disgusted with the coarseness of our own dreams, as well as the transgressions of our own moral sense in our fantasies. Whence comes all this? Sound theology joins some, at least, of modern psychology, in saying: from the self, which at the deepest level is still human nature, fallen human nature, and therefore corrupt and sinful.

(3) The Consensus Gentium, or the Common Opinion of the Human Race

This is the larger datum of which the last previous point is a prominent aspect. I know of no essay or book that expands this matter, though theological textbooks do take note of it. People generally trace good deeds as well as bad ones, virtue as well as vice, to the more or less permanent moral disposition, i.e. the subconscious mind or soul, of the people who perform them. This is true of group behavior to a degree and strongly of individual behavior. This generally accepted outlook is manifest by such common expressions as ‘terrible temper,’ ‘stinking pride,’ ‘insanely jealous,’ ‘criminal mind.’ In recent political campaigns in the U.S. ‘the character issue’ has become important because many people feel what a man will do in office, how faithfully he will keep his promises, etc., can be known somewhat ahead of time if his character can be assessed accurately. He will be forgiven mistakes and even some sins, but not a markedly bad character. True or not, such labels as ‘Tricky Dick’ and ‘Slick Willie’ hung on a politician, and generally accepted as true, render him unelectable. (Sadly, some are tricky and slick enough to deceive both themselves and a majority of the electorate.) Further, people generally feel childhood is a time of character building; that bad impulses must be overcome, good ones strengthened in childhood and youth; that the more settled and permanent an evil disposition the worse it is—hence such proverbs as ‘there’s no fool like an old fool.’ People condemn perceived bad character in any one, no matter how one comes by it—whether tendencies unrebuked by parents, hereditary family traits, or even sectional or group prejudices passed down through generations. The individual is blamed. 'We do not excuse arrogance or sensuality on the ground they are family traits' (Strong). Further, we know that the longer vicious tendencies are harbored and allowed to be acted out the worse the disposition becomes; till at last one is in the complete control of the vice. It is then most hateful and properly despised. Otherwise the most depraved man in the world would be the most innocent.

(4) The Proof from Scripture

(a) As I write my mind is full of readings in the Pentateuch regarding the institution of atoning sacrifice in the Mosaic system (from some months of study and writing on the redemptive work of Christ). The most numerous scheduled offerings (daily evening and morning offerings, at Sabbaths, the seven feasts and festivals) were all for sins of ignorance, sins of failure, general sinfulness in Israel. To take only one of a multitude of examples, every woman who had 'conceived and borne a child' was required to offer specific sacrifice in a prescribed way for 'her purifying' (not physical, but spiritual). 'Atonement' was required. Even Mary, the mother of our Lord, was not exempt, no more free from inborn sin than the rest of us, the dogma of 'Immaculate conception of the Virgin' notwithstanding. (See Luke 2:22–24.) G. F. Oehler in Theology of the Old Testament explains:

This sinful inclination is hereditary [and] is indirectly contained in the passages [Gen. 6:5; 8:21] cited, although it is not expressly said.... Mosaism, although it derives the propagation of man's race from God's blessing, still regards all events and conditions which refer to birth and generation as requiring a purifying expiation; compare the Law, Leviticus 12:2–6 and 15:7 ad fin in which the thought lies that all these conditions are connected with the disturbance of sin.¹¹

Further, in the Mosaic scheme of things every male infant was circumcised at eight days of age. J. Barton Payne has this to say about it:

This early date possesses a two-fold significance. It demonstrates, on the one hand, man's need for redemption and regeneration, from the time of birth itself. David went even further and exclaimed, 'Behold I was brought forth in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me.'¹²

Circumcision is a minimal removal of the external male organ of reproduction. Of this Payne says (and several Old Testament theologians could be cited):

As to the precise significance of this ceremonial action, it may be said negatively that uncircumcision expressed unfitness, and particularly that of the natural life (Exod. 6:12). When Moses referred to his 'uncircumcised lips' he meant he had poor native speaking ability. To specify therefore an uncircumcised heart (Jer. 4:4) was to picture a soul that was covered with its natural wickedness. In contrast, then, to circumcise meant to remove one's sin (Deut. 10:16).¹³

(b) In Pauline literature acts of sin proceed from a sinful heart. Paul's figures for this sin at the center are 'the sin,' 'the body of sin,' 'our old man,' 'this body of death,' 'flesh,' 'the body of sin and death,' and 'the carnal mind.' All are figurative expressions for the sinful 'heart' which in turn is a figure for the center of man's rational being. From this fountain, says Paul, all our sinful deeds flow forth. In Galatians nearly a score of the ‘works of the flesh’ are mentioned, but the flesh itself is always only one, a unit, lying at the center of our being. ‘Now the works of the flesh are evident ...’ (Gal. 5:19) and the names of seventeen of them follow.

(c) Jesus clearly taught the same, saying, ‘But what comes out of the mouth proceeds from the heart, and this defiles a person’ (Matt. 15:18). Then He mentioned seven of those things beginning with evil thoughts and murders, ending with false witness and blasphemies. He reproved the scribes and Pharisees, not for their outward works which were ‘clean’ like ‘the outside of the cup and the plate’ and white like the outside of sepulchers. Their fault lay in the fact that like sepulchers, they were ‘within ... full of dead people’s bones and all uncleanness’ (Matt. 23:25–27).

(d) In Scripture sin as a state can even specially characterize certain tribal, family or national divisions of mankind so that they stand condemned as a group. They were to be under ban, to be excluded from any participation in the covenant of the Lord with Israel (except certain individual members after a ‘third’ or a ‘tenth’ generation) and deserving to be exterminated. Any ‘heathen, dwelling as a stranger in the land, could by circumcision (or member of a circumcised man’s household) [e.g. Ruth], become incorporated among the covenant people ... (Exod. 12:48); with the exception, however of the Canaanitish tribes, which fell under the curse. To these the Moabites and Ammonites (Deut. 23:4ff.) were added as excluded persons.’¹⁴ Later God’s grace removed these bans, but the clear teaching is that the ban was justly imposed. This certainly was not in every case because of what these people did or might do, but because of extreme depravity of hearts. This is illustrated in the Lord’s promise to Abram that only after several hundreds of years would his family return to the land of the Amorite kingdoms (Canaan)—‘for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete’ (Gen. 15:16).

(5) Support of Christian Experience

An aphorism of Christian spirituality affirms ‘the closer one is to the light the more plainly dark marks are seen.’ Contrariwise, the less one has entered into a clear apprehension of the divine holiness, the more defensive of one’s own character. Christians find this true whenever they undertake serious presentation of gospel and law to sinners. Frequently we find ourselves saying words, thinking thoughts, doing deeds on impulse, which we know to be expressions even, sadly, revelations of depravity of nature we are not ordinarily consciously aware of. It would burden these pages to quote them at length, but those very people of Christian history, famous for saintly lives, are the very ones who by their most earnest writings confess themselves still to have sin at heart, for which they grieve and make confession to God. Let us note several.

The longest chapter by far in St Augustine’s Confessions is chapter 10. He declares his purpose ‘to confess to men also in thy presence what I now am, not what I have been ... what I am within.’ Later, ‘I ... in thy sight I despise myself, and account myself dust and ashes.’ He is, of course, thinking of an Old Testament saint who discovered his own heart (Job 42:6) saying, ‘I ... repent in dust and ashes.’ Time would fail to tell of Luther, Edwards, Brainerd, King David (Pss. 51 and 32), Isaiah (Isa. 6:5), Daniel (Dan. 8, especially vv. 8–11), Peter (Luke 5:8) and Paul (Rom. 7; 1 Tim. 1:15).

‘It may be doubted,’ wrote A. H. Strong, ‘whether any repentance is genuine which is not repentance for sin rather than for sins.’¹⁵

Sin Is Both Guilt and Corruption (Pollution)

Discussion of these two aspects of the doctrine is disagreeable, but both necessary and salutary: necessary because true and salutary because properly understood and accepted, they are seen to be part of the burden of the Savior when He became the Lamb of God, slain; salutary also because they remove the last supports of human pride. Both come in for larger treatment in connection with original sin. Our treatment here will be limited to definition and scriptural support. They were mentioned earlier as effects of the fall. Let us observe four points about sin as guilt.

(1) Guilt in the Bible, as in jurisprudence, is never a subjective feeling as in psychological literature today. It always refers to the objective state of one who has broken the law.

(2) In a popular, non-legal sense it means simply the state of being blameworthy, of inherent demerit. We speak this way all the time. When someone steals another’s property (ball glove, doll, money, and hides it somewhere) that person is a thief. That person can never, never cease to be guilty of the theft till the end of time. It is true if no one else ever knows about it and till memory is dead it will always be a burden of conscience to be borne. Non-guilt can never be restored any more than a lost virginity.

(3) In a formal or legal sense, in human justice and in divine justice, guilt is an obligation to receive and pay the appropriate penalty, according to the common formula, ‘the punishment should fit the crime,’ and the biblical lex talionis, an eye for eye, a tooth for a tooth, burning for burning. Since sin of any degree or sort is against the majesty of God (lese majestie) it is deserving of the penalty for attacking all God is and stands for (i.e. death), as James says, ‘For whoever keeps the whole law and yet stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it’ (James 2:10 niv). The law is as unforgiving as bungee jumping or hang-gliding—the punishment is as severe for one broken rope as for failure of every piece of the equipment!

Though what is usually called guilt, in the popular sense of blameworthiness or demerit, is permanent, formal or legal guilt on the other hand may be removed by meeting the just demands of God the Lawgiver in one’s person or in Him who died for us all in our place—‘the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all’ (Isa. 53:6).

That the whole world of mankind are guilty in both senses is taught expressly by Romans 3:19; 5:18; and Ephesians 2:3. In my judgment, R. L. Dabney was right in affirming that what I have called a ‘popular’ sense and he ‘potential guilt,’ the ‘intrinsic moral ill-desert of an act or state ... is of the essence of sin.’ The legal sense (Dabney, ‘actual guilt’) is the ‘penal sanction’ and not of the essence of sin.¹⁶

It is, then, quite unreasonable to think of any personal being, infant or adult, who is morally corrupt (polluted, depraved) at heart as not being sinful and therefore not guilty.

In my judgment, however, this fact is not sufficient to render the pollution of nature by descent from Adam any sufficient basis for imputation of Adam’s sin as in the theory of mediate imputation—to be treated later in these pages. We are guilty not only personally for sins expressing a sinful heart, but we enter also into guilt for Adam's sin, i.e. 'original sin,' and the latter more devastating (universal death sentence) than the former. In some important sense each of us was there in and with the head of our race when he took the awful plunge.

¹ L. C. Cox, John Wesley's Concept of Perfection (Kansas City: Beacon Hill Press, 1964), pp. 38–44.

² R. G. Tuttle, Jr, 'John Wesley' in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1984), p. 1166.

³ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 551.

⁴ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 158–161, especially on the convicting work of the Holy Spirit.

⁵ ibid., p. 160.

⁶ Calvin, Institutes II, iii, 3.

⁷ ibid.

⁸ ibid., viii, 20.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

⁹ John Murray, Collected Writings II (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1977), pp. 93–119.

¹⁰ Augustine, Book 10 of Confessions, paras. 17–20.

¹¹ G. F. Oehler, trans. by George Day, Theology of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, n.d. [originally publ. 1873], p. 162.

¹² J. Barton Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962), p. 393.

¹³ ibid., p. 391.

¹⁴ Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, p. 180.

¹⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 556.

¹⁶ R. L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1978), p. 310.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (358). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Sins As Acts Committed by Sinners

The preceding chapters have treated sin (singular) as a fact or phenomenon in the human race. Now the focus will be on particular sins committed by particular persons. Their number and variety are too numerous to count. One of the offenses of medieval theology against reality was the demand of the confessional for specific recounting of all sins—even the ones there was no name for. The Reformers protested that even King David, who certainly had occasion to reflect on the subject, exclaimed, ‘Who can discern his errors? Declare me innocent from hidden faults’ and ‘my iniquities have gone over my head . . . they are too heavy for me’ (Pss. 19:12; 38:4). Calvin remarks: ‘Who would now think of reckoning up his sins when he sees David cannot begin to number his?’¹

This does not mean a sound theology says nothing about sins. In fact only soundly religious people have anything substantial to say about their sins. And in so speaking they should wish to be biblically and doctrinally sound. The Bible furnishes many striking examples. Psalms 51 and 32, recited or read fervently at communion observances, are only sample texts. Not every pious Christian pursuit of perfection, i.e. of ceasing from committing sins, has had sound operating definitions.

The Bible from Genesis 3 through Revelation 22 is concerned with specific sins of sinful men. Earlier generations of believers were very concerned with knowing what the dangers were of temptation to particular sins as well as the call of God to particular virtues. There is great force to the stark simplicity of biblical warnings and exhortations in this regard (especially in the King James Version) of two verses in the last two chapters of the Bible:

But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death (Rev. 21:8 kjv). For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie (Rev. 22:15 kjv).

See also Proverbs 6:16–19 on seven things the Lord hates.

‘Sin’ and ‘Sins’ in our Language and Literature

Every branch of the Teutonic group of languages has this word. Long before biblical virtues affected our ancestors’ thought-patterns they made the moral distinction between what ought to be and what ought not to be. The Oxford English Dictionary traces the written employment of the word sin to ad 825 in a Psalter rendering of Psalms 4 and 108, and also a work of King Alfred (ad 897). ‘As psychology recognizes a distinction of pleasure and pain, and metaphysics of good and evil, so morality assumes the difference between right and wrong in action.’ The subject of this chapter is sin as action, hence the pertinence of these words of the famous Prof. Morris Jastrow of the University of Pennsylvania in the article on ‘Sin.’² He goes on to say:

As psychology recognizes a distinction of pleasure and pain, and metaphysics of good and evil, so morality assumes the difference between right and wrong in action, and good and bad in character, but the distinction in psychology and metaphysics applies to what is [whereas], the difference in morality is judged by what ought to be. When the act or the character does not correspond with the standard, this want of correspondence may in different relations be variously described. In relation to human society, and the rules it imposes on its members, action that ought not to be is crime; a habit which is injurious to a man's own moral nature, especially if it involves evil physical consequences is described as vice. If a man is thought of as under the authority of God, any transgression or want of conformity to the law of God is defined as sin. Crime is a legal, vice a moral, and sin a religious term.... Sin is a term applied not only to actions, but also to dispositions and motives.³

The very word itself implies the existence of God, divine law and human responsibility to both; which fact explains why sin is a word not found frequently in current 'scientific' psychological literature. Happily there has been some success in restoring the word to popular use even among some psychologists.

'Sin' and 'Sins' in Ecclesiastical Tradition

The medieval church, supported by scholastic theology, had an elaborate system of grading sins according to amount of demerit and necessary acts of contrition and penance. This system together with the confessional and the doctrine of purgatory was vigorously rejected by all the Protestant Reformers, mainly because it seemed to teach that some sins are undeserving of the full punishment of divine law and that their opposite virtues were somehow productive of earned merit toward eternal life. Whether these undoubted opinions of the laity then or now were official Roman doctrine or not is debatable. This system also tended to externalize sin whereas the biblical emphasis is on the heart attitude in 'acts' of sin. I am not sure what Rome today thinks of the 1966 Dutch Catechism. The Dutch Catechism does call attention to real dangers unnoticed by the more recent 'official' Catechism of 1994, viz.:

The sharp distinction between 'mortal' and 'venial' sin contributed in no small measure to the education of the people.... It is a way of expressing the seriousness of sin—which is not concealed in Scripture.

But a too precise juridical definition of the difference has also its disadvantages. One can be so preoccupied with it that the attention becomes exclusively fixed on the action while little heed is taken of the attitude of heart, which remains, however, as Jesus said, the real source of all evil (Mark 7:14–23).⁴

The Roman Church has preserved the system in the 1994 Catechism of the Catholic Church approved by Pope John Paul II, the present reigning pontiff. (Hereafter to be cited as 1994 Catechism.) The Roman teaching is summarized as follows:

Sin is mortal or venial; it may be actual, habitual, formal or material ...; of ignorance if the lack of knowledge is culpable, of infirmity if the result of sudden passion or a bad habit, and of malice if it is deliberate and calculated wickedness.⁵

In addition, Roman theology emphasizes the tenth commandment (which they divide into a ninth and tenth: coveting your neighbor's wife and coveting his property) as internal sins, 'more dangerous than sins which are openly committed.’⁶

There are further refinements. These are the leading points in Rome’s efforts to inform her children and guide them to the sacramental removal of guilt. Some of the distinctions, at least, are derived from Scripture. A bit later I will treat some biblical categories of sins. For the present let us try to understand what the Roman preceptor means by these variations on the theme of sins as acts. I shall quote official sources.

(1) Mortal and (2) venial sins. The 1994 Catechism on ‘The Gravity of Sin; Mortal and Venial Sin’ states:

The distinction between mortal and venial sin, already evident in scripture footnote to 1 [John 5:16, 17] became part of the tradition of the Church... Mortal sin destroys charity in the heart of man by a grave violation of God’s law; it turns man away from God, who is his ultimate end and his beatitude, by preferring an inferior good to him. Venial sin allows charity to subsist, even though it offends and wounds.... Mortal sin ... necessitates ... a conversion of the heart ... normally accomplished within the sacrament of reconciliation [i.e. penance].⁷

The Catechism then quotes St Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologica) to the effect that in the case of blasphemy, perjury, homicide, adultery, ‘the sin is mortal but thoughtless offenses are venial.’⁸ In my opinion a fair reading of St Thomas shows (in scholastic language) he really did not think there are categories of sins venial or mortal ‘according to genus of the act,’ but the gravity of it.⁹

‘For a sin to be mortal,’ according to St Thomas, it must be in ‘a grave matter and which is committed with full knowledge and deliberate consent.’¹⁰

Protestant interpretation of Scripture insists that all sins of men are mortal in that they merit death of the sinner and venial in that they are remediable through the blood of Jesus Christ, which is sufficient atonement for any and every sin. All sins are likewise mortal in the sense that every sin proceeds from a fallen, sinful heart, which is in itself guilty and culpable. First John 5:16, 17 is the slender scriptural basis cited by the Catechism. With due respect to loyal lay and clerical Roman believers it must be said this distinction, which has been very productive for the confessional, has not created scrupulous moral concern in routine matters of commerce, politics, even of matrimonial faithfulness in lands where it has been widely adopted. It, of course, is incompatible with evangelical doctrines of salvation wholly by grace through faith.

(An extensive discussion of Rome’s teachings on venial versus mortal sins and related sacrament of forgiveness by the church through the priest [confession, absolution, contrition, penance] would be relevant but a diversion at this point. A certain interpretation of 1 John 5:16, 17 and inferences drawn from it supply supposed support of the distinction between venial and mortal sins. Some medieval theology and the Council of Trent assert all ‘grievous sins’ [i.e. deadly] must be orally confessed to a priest in detail but confession of venial sins is not necessary, since sorrow for sins, prayer, good works, abstinence and Holy Communion are sufficient to expiate venial sins see Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, pp. 432, 433 and [Denzinger, paras. 899, 917].)

Raymond E. Brown, one of Rome's most generally trusted biblical scholars, expounds on 1 John 5:16, 17, citing other scholars, most of them Protestant, and says nary a word about 'venial' sins. Rather he thinks the passage is a warning against apostasy from faith in Christ (Anchor Bible, vol. 30, pp. 610–619). Some form of this view has the approval of scholars as early as Augustine. Alford lent his great name to this view and the Expositor's Bible gives it beautiful (if terrible) exposition. It seems Father Brown might even agree with Calvin's strong language: 'The Apostle ... does not here distinguish between venial and mortal sin, as it was afterwards commonly done. For altogether foolish is that distinction which prevails under the Papacy' (Commentary on the Catholic Epistles, en loc). This difficult passage has at least fifteen somewhat overlapping but distinct interpretations.

My own judgment is that the sin unto death, or 'deadly' (= mortal) sin, is sin on account of which God calls some believers home early, i.e. the death in the aged Apostle's mind is natural or physical. Christian brothers and sisters should pray for one another, especially for victory over our manifold enticements to sin. He does not tell us how to recognize the exceptional kind of sin. Perhaps the formula 'according to the will of God' only two verses above is John's intention. '[A] sin unto death' (1 John 5:16 kjv) is too focused. There is sin unto death refers to many evil thoughts, words and deeds which in the wisdom and grace of God bring on early infliction of the universally applied sentence of physical death. Some of these sins are described in 1 Corinthians 5 and specifically at 1 Corinthians 11:30 There are several biblical parallels. Numbers 18:22 prohibited approach of non-Levites to the Tabernacle lest 'they bear sin and die' (lit. sin of death, esv). A rapist was to be executed but the young woman raped was not to be punished because she has done no 'sin of death' (Deut. 22:25, 26). In Jubilees 33:12–18 incest is said to be 'a sin worthy of death.' In the New Testament Ananias and Sapphira committed sins the Apostle Peter deemed worthy of death, even though they were presumed true believers (Acts 5:1–11). Paul referred to such sins in 1 Corinthians 5:5 and 11:30. Finally, Jesus uses the phrase sickness 'unto death' of the physical death of Lazarus (John 11:4). As 1 John 5:16, 17 reads in the English Standard Version, the passage falls neatly into this understanding of John's meaning. 'If anyone sees his brother committing a sin not leading to death, he shall ask, and God will give him life—to those who commit sins that do not lead to death. There is sin that leads to death; I do not say that one should pray for that. All wrongdoing is sin, but there is sin that does not lead to death' (1 John 5:16, 17 esv).

(3) Capital sins or (4) vices. Christian tradition recognizes 'four cardinal virtues': prudence, justice, fortitude and temperance. They were transferred to very early church tradition from ancient Greek philosophy. To these four traditions were added three 'theological virtues' (faith, hope and charity), which add up to seven. The capital sins 'are called "capital" because they engender other sins, other vices.' They are opposite the above-mentioned cardinal and theological virtues, and being seven in number are 'pride, avarice [greed], envy, wrath, lust, gluttony and sloth.'¹¹

That there should be seven capital sins and seven cardinal virtues is not owed to Roman Catholic tradition, for the distinction long antedates the division of the church into eastern (Greek) and western (Roman, Latin). When Greek was still the language of popular discourse throughout most of the Roman world, young men destined to be scholars attended Greek academies, of which the most famous was at Athens, where Aristotle had taught his Nicomachean Ethics. Aristotle was still standard fare much later when the scholars and teachers of the churches of the first four centuries got their education. Paul, for example, who knew of the lesser lights of classical learning (he quoted Epimenides, Titus 1:12 and Aratus, Acts 17:28) would almost certainly have studied Aristotle.

From Aristotle all educated early Christians learned of four cardinal virtues: prudence (phronēsis), justice (diakaiosunē), temperance (sōphrosunē) and fortitude (andreia). From Paul they derived faith (pistis), hope (elpis) and charity (or ‘love’) (agapē) (1 Cor. 13:13). They had no trouble finding all the spiritually valid ‘gentile’ virtues of Aristotle in the formula of Philippians 4:8, ‘Finally, brothers, whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is commendable, if there is any excellence’ (‘virtue’ kjv, Gr. aretē), etc. Popular instruction simply matched these cardinal virtues with an equal number of capital sins. We might do well to remember all of both categories.

There is also the well-known biblical example of seven things especially abominable to the Lord (Prov. 6:16–19). Pride has first place in this ‘Solomonic’ list as well as the traditional Christian list. Several others coincide. Earlier generations more given to various mnemonic devices would have found both the Christian lists useful—along with the Ten Commandments, etc.

Following Thomas Aquinas in Summa Theologica I–II, Question 72, Answer 5, sins may be of (5) commission or (6) omission. This distinction is biblical and, of course, carried on into evangelical theology.

Another important distinction was between (7) material and (8) formal sins. (Calvin was contemptuous of this distinction.) Material sins turn out to be essentially sins of ignorance, what one does is wrong but he doesn’t know it is wrong or steals another’s property thinking it is his own. A formal sin would be one of doing right, but in bad conscience.

Sins are said to be (9) internal sins or (10) external. After the Reformation, Rome at the Council of Trent closely defined internal sins (Session XIV, c.v.)—partly, I think we may justly say—in shoring up the doctrines associated with Mass (Transubstantiation and the confessional). Roman moral theology distinguishes three kinds of internal sins: (a) delictatio morosa, i.e. the pleasure taken in sinful thought or imagination even when there is no intention to do what is imagined, (b) gaudium, i.e. ruminating without restraint on sins one has previously committed, and (c) desirium, desire (lust) for what is sinful.

Evangelical doctrine may judiciously employ some of these and other traditional distinctions and terms with approval. But we part company from Rome thoroughly because Rome insists there must be a conscious, willful component of ‘sins’ that are really sin.

Older Roman Church canonical literature is as plain on this point as is the 1994 Catechism. A. C. O’Neil, from the standpoint of Rome states:

Luther and Calvin taught as their fundamental error that no free will properly so called remained after the fall of our first parents; that the fulfilment of God’s precepts is impossible even with the assistance of grace, and that man in all his actions sins.¹²

Though O’Neil disapproves, he is, of course, correct as to these two Reformers and most Protestant theology.

In Rome's theology, grace is not as in Paul's doctrine a way God saves sinners apart from their lack of merit. Grace in salvation, for Rome, is something God imparts to sinners through sacraments by means of which, by works of righteousness, they come to merit salvation. Hence Rome calls evangelical teachings about grace in salvation 'Protestant Errors.' Though not so prominent in recent pronouncements, the liberal Dutch Catechism (pp. 287–289) and the conservative papal 1994 Catechism practically equate grace with the saving activity of the Holy Spirit, helping us to be our most proper selves and to love God and man with our whole heart. I fear late twentieth-century Protestantism partially lost its roots at this same point. (See later pages in Soteriology, the Doctrine of Salvation.) Roman theology for all its sincere concern about sin and sins has not discerned the depths of fallen human nature. 'T' was grace that saved a wretch like me,' not by rendering assistance, but by reaching down and actually effecting deliverance. Jesus is Savior before He is Teacher. There is no point in theology where Rome and evangelical theology are both so near and so far apart. Rome teaches that salvation is all of grace—as a freely imparted divine enablement to merit salvation. Evangelical theology proclaims that grace is a name for God's method of saving sinners apart from their merit, hence sola gratia, by grace alone. See any Catholic encyclopaedia, theology or catechism on any entry containing the word, 'grace.'

Source and Causes of Sins

The immediate source of all our sins is our corrupt nature: what Jesus referred to as the evil heart, the corrupt tree, and by other metaphors; Paul as the old man, the carnal mind, the flesh, sin, sin in the heart, sin that dwells in me, the law of sin (Rom. 7; Gal. 5).

This sinful, corrupt heart was received from immediate parents who received it from the generations of their ancestors. We Gentiles know our remote ancestors were all heathen, Gentiles who 'know not God' (Eph. 2:11–13; 4:5). They were children of disobedience (Eph. 2:3) and 'All of us also lived among them at one time' (Eph. 2:3 niv).

That universal corruption arose from the corruption of nature brought upon them by their willful departure from holiness when our first parents failed their probation.

There are internal causes of sin and there are external. There would be no end to a pursuit of names and description of all such causes. The internal causes are as complicated as the human nature of which they are only aspects, while the external causes are as diverse as the wide world in which we live.

Let us restrict the discussion to some New Testament expressions that directly treat the causes of sin in a functional-analytical way. They are three: temptation, the world and desire, pungently captured in the proverbial expression, 'the world, the flesh and the devil.'

(1) Temptation to Sin. There is a large amount of literature on the subject, technical, devotional and sermonic. Earlier this book has treated the temptation of our first parents. Most of that previous discussion is apropos here.

Evolutionary theory, applying Darwinism to the realm of human moral development, finds impulses to what religion calls sin in surviving natural impulses from previous animal stages in human development.¹³

As a college student in philosophy from my young professor who was fresh from Reinhold Niebuhr's influence, I learned another theory: 'existential angst' or anxiety: 'Anxiety is the inevitable concomitant of the paradox of freedom and finiteness in which man is involved. Anxiety is the internal precondition of sin... the internal description of the state of temptation.'¹⁴ For Niebuhr an historical fall is not how sin began, but 'the temptation to sin lies in the human situation.'¹⁵

There are several economic theories to explain the causes of what Christians call temptation and resulting sin. Most of these have been influenced by Marxist views of mankind as essentially economic beings. Struggle between economic classes is as near as Marxism comes to a doctrine of sin. I leave to the department of Apologetics a thorough canvass of the several Marxist, essentially anti-Christian theories. Chief among them is liberation theology. Though it was primarily a movement among post-Vatican II Roman Catholics, students in undergraduate university classes in sociology met much of the same thought many long years ago when the now generally despised Stalin was still darling of many professors and Chairman Mao was soon to appear.

There are various psychological interpretations of temptation. Some Christian psychologists see fallen human nature and temptation to sin in a biblical manner, but these professionals are a minority. I do not know to what extent professionals face the issue of whether or not man has an immortal soul; I do know that many operate as though he has none and reject even the idea of personal moral responsibility—with terrible consequences in our courts where victims of crime can now be made out to be the causes of it. I recently wrote the following response to solicitation from a graduate school of psychology where one of my family was a student.

I am a regular reader of your bulletins and a 'careful reader.' Up to now I had seen little to indicate that your philosophy includes moral values in your approach. By warm welcome to 'Gay' (homosexual) and lesbian advocates and their so-called artists you take away (or at least, so it seems) the necessary frame of reference for human behavior. Normalcy does not exist in such a world. It is evident that sin has dropped out of your vocabulary. But the fact has not dropped out of human conscience and therefore not out of social standards and civil law.

I beg you to reconsider this breach of decency and of common sense. You stand to lose much more than you gain.

I wish to support your program. The recent announcement makes this difficult.

Signed, Amicus

The factors in temptation consist simply in our being fallen physical, psychical and spiritual beings in a world created by God but presently dominated in certain ways by the evil 'prince of this world.'

(1) Temptation is an ethically neutral word, both in the original languages of Scripture and in English, though for sound reason it takes on the pejorative sense of enticement. Nasah to prove, or try, or tempt and massah, a trial or proof are the Hebrew words; peiradzō (verb) and peirasmos (noun) of similar meaning are the Greek words. These terms are of wide application—'testing' Abraham's faith (Gen. 22:1); ‘tempting God’ (Exod. 17:2; Ps. 70:18; Acts 15:10; Heb. 3:19); Jesus ‘tempted of the devil’ (Matt. 4; Luke 4). The subjects tempted in each of these cases were morally upright and remained so. Typically, as when Jesus was ‘tempted of the devil,’ temptation takes the form of enticement. We are all familiar with the urgency of many enticements.

(2) The World (as we showed at length in treating the effects of the failure of Adam’s probation) involves several polarities. The world is good as created, yet evil as employed by the devil: cursed yet redeemed. In relation to sinners, the subjects of temptation, it is evil or good as they respond to it. Psalm 104 which rightly revels in ‘natural,’ spiritual enjoyment of the world, ends miserably with sinister, almost spectral, notice that it is also evil (Ps. 104:35).

(3) Desire in man, at times seemingly in every fiber (as in our mating urges as well as hunger for food and thirst for drink) is directed toward that world. We have earlier treated concupiscence (Latin) and epithumia (Greek), the theological and New Testament words for ardent longing.

Temptation, i.e. desires within the man and the world without the man come together as they do in every human being who arrives at conscious awareness. Every infant is immediately invited to participation in life in the present world. It cannot be avoided. Yet this invitation, as enticement to sin, should be resisted at any cost.

Correlation Between Desire Within and the World Without

The correlation between enticement and desire (what traditional theology called concupiscence) in temptation to sin is plainly set forth in 1 John 2:15–17. The King James Version is to be preferred as most literal here:

Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust [better, ‘desire’] of the flesh, and the lust [‘desire’] of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust [‘desire’] thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever.

Though the subject invites the writing of a book, let us be brief and to the point. John plainly intends to treat the temptations of the world completely and comprehensively: ‘all that is in the world,’ all its physical, economic, artistic features or whatever. He adds later, ‘the whole world lieth in wickedness’ (1 John 5:19 kjv; ‘under the control of the evil one’ niv). This relates to all our eyes see, our bodies touch, our tongues taste, our nose smells, our ears hear: viewed as a kosmos or system it is geared by Satan to bring us down, even though we are bid to have ‘dominion’ over it, from one point of view, and to scratch out our living in it from another (Gen. 3).

The ‘world’ gets at us in three ways, and in only three ways in John’s analysis. These three are by virtue of what we children of Adam are by created and fallen nature. We are drawn by three kinds of attraction in our ‘environment’ (i.e. ‘the world’). It is difficult not to find this triad of enticements parallel to the three enticements and corresponding human desires in the temptation of Jesus. R. E. Brown (Anchor Bible), Augustine and others have related the Johannine triad to the three temptations of Jesus (Matt. 4:3–11; Luke 4:3–13): the temptation to turn stones to bread being related to ‘the desire of the flesh’; the showing of all the kingdoms of the world to ‘the desire of the eyes’; and the throwing of oneself from the pinnacle of the temple to ‘the pride of life.’¹⁶ The triad also parallels Eve’s enticement: (1) ‘good for food,’ (2) ‘delight to the eyes’ and (3) ‘desired to make one wise’ (Gen. 3:6).

The first is literally ‘the desire of the flesh.’ Of the many metaphorical meanings of sarx. (flesh) in the Bible—all living animals, the human race, wicked desires and impulses—none applies here. This is John writing, not Paul. Let us not read John’s writings through Paul’s spectacles. John is thinking of all possible human wants, needs and desires, not least those dictated by our hormones and enzymes—as R. E. Brown thoroughly demonstrates.¹⁷

If we indulge these appetites in unlawful and undisciplined ways, surrendering to physical and material pleasures, the devil’s world has captured us.

The second is ‘the desire of the eyes.’ The eyes are the chief gate by which the world enters our soul’s awareness. God planted our race in a garden of every sort of delight to the eyes, to be lawfully enjoyed. One cannot help but wish to walk in the beautiful world, travel about it, even make photographs of it. There are scriptural, ethical, disciplined, lawful ways at least to attempt ‘possession’ of the things our eyes see and souls desire. But several of the Decalogue’s commands require that we earn (or inherit) what we own, and that we severely regulate our interest in the neighbor’s ox, ass, wife, automobile or summer home.

The third is harder to define. John shifts from epithumia (desire) to aladzonía (pretension, arrogance; hence ‘the pride of life’ kjv). ‘Life’ is bios as in biology and biography. If we let John’s own Epistle explain what kind or aspect of life he has in mind our clue is 1 John 3:17 where the literal rendering of kjv ‘this world’s [Gr. kosmos] good’ (bios) (or goods) means worldly possessions which support life. The niv interprets rather than translates, but does so correctly, ‘material possessions.’ Surely, then, this same author only a few verses earlier in chapter 2, verse 16, means pride of worldly goods or possessions by ‘the pride of life.’ There is much linguistic support for this, too extensive to burden these pages with it.¹⁸ These possessions can be material, the possession of civil, ecclesiastical, political, economic power or even a record of recognized accomplishment. Everyone wants (and not necessarily unrighteously) a kingdom of one’s own. A child’s first word after ‘Mamma’ and ‘No!’ is likely to be ‘Mine!’

So there is no limit on the external field of temptation by enticement: all that is in the world appeals to appetites of the flesh; the appreciation of beauty (and who knows what else) in what the eyes see; the pride of possessing things whether of goods or knowledge, position of honor and the like, or a record of doings. There apparently is nothing else. R. E. Brown suggests John ‘does not state that these three factors are all that is in the world; they are examples of what is in the world.’¹⁹ But this comment contradicts precisely what John says as an apparently all-inclusive statement: ‘all that is in the world.’ He did not say, ‘samples of what is in the world.’ As seen above, the world that offers these is in the lap of the devil.

The Occasion and Process of Temptation

Let no one say when he is tempted, ‘I am being tempted by God,’ for God cannot be tempted with evil, and he himself tempts no one. But each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire. Then desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin, and sin when it is fully grown brings forth death (James 1:13–15).

In certain passages God is said to ‘tempt’ certain people, Abraham, for example (Gen. 22:1; see Deut. 4:34; 7:19; 29:3). And God’s providence does place all of us in positions where our adherence to truth and righteousness are tested. Yet in such situations God’s influence is always toward obedience to divine will and law. Believers are assured God is always on their side against enticement to sin (1 Cor. 10:13).

The occasion is always something ‘out there’ in the world: the world as remembered, as presently perceived or of future contemplation which draws one away by one’s own inward impulses, thoughts and desires. In King David’s case sexual desire was inflamed by sight of a beautiful woman bathing; Achan, sight of a wedge of gold and a Babylonish garment; Judas, mental contemplation of future monetary reward; Diotrefes, desire to possess preeminent honor in the church (3 John 9). The list could be as long as ‘everything that is in the world,’ to use John’s words.

Each occasion for sin is also an opportunity for holy obedience as well. David could have gone downstairs and had a screen erected on either his own or Uriah’s rooftop patio; Achan could have carried out the ban on Jericho and gone back to camp victorious; Judas could have become a ‘hero in the strife’ by remaining loyal; and Diotrefes might have promoted the apostolically chosen elder in his church rather than to attempt toppling him from pre-eminence. Jesus Himself is our example of holy resistance (Heb. 12:1–4) to temptation of whatever sort on whatever occasion.

The process of temptation is described in James 1:13–15 (rsv): ‘Let no one say when he is tempted, “I am tempted by God,” for God cannot be tempted with evil and he himself tempts no one; but each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire. Then desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin; and sin when it is full-grown brings forth death.’

This brief but comprehensive passage by our Lord’s brother is outstanding for accuracy, comprehensiveness, understandable simplicity and correspondence with universal experience.

(1) One is lured away by one’s own desire. The word exelko-ō, ‘lured,’ means to lure away from hiding as in hunting or fishing, or ‘to take something in tow’ (Liddell & Scott, Thayer, Bauer). So the will allows desire to come out of disciplined control to become undisciplined desire, or lust. How easily and quickly this happens will be determined by previous moral and spiritual culture. Once the tiger is out of the cage, however, he is hard to recapture.

(2) Enticement (deleadzō), ‘entice’ (Bauer, Arndt & Gingrich, Lexicon; ‘catch by bait,’ used elsewhere only in 2 Peter 2:14, 18—‘beguile,’ ‘allure,’ Thayer, Lexicon). It is furnished by imagined pleasures in the world ‘out there’—whatever captures the tempted person’s attention. It is truly amazing with what dazzling glory one’s imagination can supply as reward for breaking a commandment such as ‘Thou shalt not steal’ or ‘Thou shalt not bear false witness.’ We seem ready to be ‘taken in tow,’ to employ the suggested language of the lexicons.

(3) ‘Then desire when it has conceived ...’ (‘Then when lust hath conceived ...’ kjv). Lust, now no more disciplined desire, does ‘conceive.’ Steps are taken to act on impulses furnished by lust and the object of lust. The two are ‘cast together’ (as Gr. sullambanō, here rendered to conceive, suggests to conceive in the sexual sense) and now sooner, not later, the issue will come. The woman who has conceived a child in utero ‘has to go through with it’ one painful way or another.

(4) ‘... gives birth to sin.’ Pregnancy is never partial, nor can it be terminated ordinarily apart from a birth. The seed planted, being what it is, determines what the result will be—horrible to contemplate by the remorseful conscience after the deed is done.

(5) ‘... and sin when it is fully grown.’ Sin may be indulged for a long time, but not forever. It has to come to fruit.

(6) ‘... brings forth death.’ ‘The wages of sin is death.’ The book of Proverbs is replete with warnings of this end and of the process leading to it.

[T]emptation to sin cannot be from God, while trial is from him. The one, being our proof, works endurance and endurance, when she has a perfect work, life: the other, being bait and excitement arising from lust ‘brings forth sin and sin being completed, brings forth death.’²⁰

Satan As Adversary and Tempter

The book of Job puts this on vivid display. One of Satan’s names is ‘The Tempter.’ Long ago he set in motion the process by which fallen man is tempted by everything in his environment. This matter was treated earlier in this book as an aspect of the doctrine of creation and of the fall of man.

¹ Calvin, Institutes III, iv, 16.

² Morris Jastrow, Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed., xxv, p. 137.

³ ibid.

⁴ A New Catechism, trans. of ‘De Nieuw Katechismus’ (New York: Herder & Herder, 1967), p. 452.

⁵ The Catholic Encyclopaedic Dictionary, 3rd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1958), p. 463.

⁶ A. C. Neil, Catholic Encyclopedia, XIV, ii.

⁷ Catechism of 1944, pp. 1854–1856.

⁸ ibid.

⁹ St Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica I–II, Q. 88, Art I.

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ Catechism of 1994, paras. 1805 and 1866.

¹² op. cit., p. 7.

Catholic encyclopaedia The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes

¹³ Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1983, 1985), pp. 581–585.

¹⁴ Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man I (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1949), p. 182.

¹⁵ ibid., p. 251.

¹⁶ R. E. Brown, The Anchor Bible: The Gospel According to John (New York: Doubleday, 1966, 1970), p. 307.

¹⁷ ibid., pp. 306–308.

¹⁸ Brown, The Anchor Bible, John pp. 311, 312.

¹⁹ Brown, The Anchor Bible, John p. 306.

Liddell & A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

Bauer Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

²⁰ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers (Chicago: Moody Press, n.d.), p. 1595.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (364). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

Divine Control and Human Extremes

In this chapter we consider how God has made it possible for human families to exist and civilized life to go on in spite of the enormity of sins throughout human culture.

Divine Providence in Ruling and Overruling Sin

Even though, as James insists (James 1:13), God tempts (i.e. entices) no one to sin, there are many texts which seem to say the opposite (e.g. 2 Sam. 16:10; 24:1; but cf. 1 Chron. 21:1). God sometimes severely judges those who will not welcome the truth, who prefer credulous acceptance of lies. In what may be the most pivotal chapter on eschatology in the Bible, Paul declared,

... because they refused to love the truth and so be saved. Therefore God sends them a strong delusion, so that they may believe what is false, in order that all may be condemned who did not believe the truth but had pleasure in unrighteousness (2 Thess. 2:10–12).

It is a terrible judgment. The scriptural doctrines of preservation and providence explain that in God's sovereign rule, sins are said to be divinely caused only in the sense of divine concurrence (or concursus) in all that happens, since He is not only Creator but Sustainer and Governor of the world. The Creator concurs in everything that happens in all creation in that He sustains all existing things, not because they are evil but simply as created existences. '[T]he universe was created by the word of God' (Heb. 11:3 emphasis added), so also is the world sustained for He 'upholds the universe [including wicked men and angels] by the word of his power' (Heb. 1:3 emphasis added). The wills of wicked men and angels are free, in the sense that they are not coerced by God. So God does concur in preserving them in existence though only they are responsible for what they do. God is still in sovereign control and uses even the acts of the wicked to procure His ultimate designs. The reflective sinner knows neither God nor the devil 'made me do it' when he sins. The prime impulse is from his own sinful heart, 'drawn away by his own lust,' as James said. Through sinful men only as proximate or second causes can God be said to 'tempt' and this is what the Bible itself assumes in the texts cited above. God has created those who choose their own course of sin and He preserves them in life. But in that course of sin even the reflective sinner attributes sin to himself, knowing God hates and will punish it.'¹

The doctrine of preservation implies a natural concurrence (mutual action of God and His creatures) in every occurrence either of mind or matter and whether good or evil. So there is a particular relevance to the doctrine of sin. Scripture says of political power, 'there is no power but of God' (Rom. 13:1 kjv) and the same is true of the physical power to press a computer key or to persuade an audience, and we all know that frequently these powers are by men directed toward morally evil ends.

(I have used concur, concurrence and concursus in two previous paragraphs. These terms have long been used by some theologians to signify the relation between God and all His finite creatures in effecting providential control of the world. Pulpit explanations frequently point out that ultimately divine power created and sustained the iron in the hammer that drove the nails into the hands of Christ and also sustained the arm and hand of the soldiers who swung the hammer. The Bible which insists on every page that God has complete sovereign rule over all that exists similarly insists that human decisions and acts are by truly responsible human beings. Augustine seems to have been first to speak of this as a divine concursum, the medieval scholastics perpetuated the term and the doctrine. Modern theology makes only a little of it, most subsuming all they have to say of preservation and providence without this refinement. C. A. Hodge explains the doctrine of concursum and evaluates it [Systematic Theology, pp. 598–605]. He does not condemn the teaching but raises three objections of which the most impressive is that it raises more questions than it answers: that it seeks to explain the inexplicable.)

Pelagians, Arminians and many others (who may have no consistent theology at all) object to the doctrine that God is in specific control (i.e. Providence) of everything that happens. They argue that specific concurrence previous to evil acts and in them makes God the author of sin. Augustinians (Calvinists and others who take the Bible seriously when it over and over affirms directly that God supplies concurrent power with every action, either of good or of evil) acknowledge the difficulty but do not think any one is free to deny God's absolute control even of 'free' actions of moral beings, angels or men, since the Bible clearly teaches it. The clearest texts which teach God's predestination and concurrence as cited in previous sections of this systematic theology are Genesis 45:5; 50:19, 20; and Acts 2:23; among many others are Exodus 14:17; Isaiah 66:4; Romans 9:22; and 2 Thessalonians 2:11.

We are staking out no new ground in pointing out that Scripture assigns four different kinds of divine control over men's sins.²

(1) Preventive Control. Some sins that would be destruction of the very order of the world or, if committed, would interfere with the divine plan, are prevented. God prevented Abimelech from committing adultery with Sarah (Gen. 20:6); Laban from doing harm to his son-in-law, Jacob (Gen. 31:24); David prayed for God to prevent him from deeper, presumptuous sins (Ps. 19:13)—to provide only a short list. God has used many means of preventive control, merciful checks on deadly courses of sin, viz.: fear of consequences, Sunday School, church, human laws, even ignorance, old age and weakness. To live a long life is to pass through stages where temptations to 'the sins of my youth' (Ps. 25:7) are replaced by that of middle age (Ps. 19:12, 13; the book of Job) and then of old age (Ps. 71:9). The unbidden voice of conscience, properly trained, has prevented innumerable sins. Sometimes God removes men from earth by death to prevent worse sins than they have committed already. Perhaps this is an aspect of the meaning of 1 Corinthians 11:30, 'That is why many of you are weak and ill, and some have died' and of 1 John 5:16, 'There is sin that leads to death.'

(2) Permissive Control. This is easier to understand and accept, since we are aware of no visible, identifiable obstacles placed by God against our sinful actions. God plainly left Hezekiah to his own impulses when he stupidly exposed the national treasures to ambassadors from Babylon (2 Chron. 32:31) and God gave His people over 'to their own stubborn heart, To walk in their own counsels' (Ps. 81:12 nkjv) and when they 'had a wanton craving in the wilderness ... he gave them what they asked, but sent a wasting disease among them' (Ps. 106:14, 15). Many such statements are in Scripture (see Hos. 4:17; Acts 14:16; Rom. 1:24, 28; 3:25). God is not represented as either indifferent to sins or complicit in them. Rather the Old Testament sometimes speaks of God as doing what He only permitted to be done, to fulfil His own plan as in 'It pleased the Lord to bruise him'; to be sure God is even said to have 'put him to grief' (Isa. 53:10). Yet it was the work of several wicked men, whose names we know (Judas, Annas, Caiaphas, Pilate) and whose wicked acts are reported (Acts 2:23). God did not restrain them from planning the execution of the Savior and carrying it out, even though they might have been restrained by 'legions of angels' (Matt. 26:53).

(3) Directive Control. God guides the evil efforts of sinful men to ends of His own choosing rather than ends of their choosing, even though like the wicked brothers of Joseph and the betrayer of Jesus, they think they have secured their own goals. The classic sentence in this connection is from Psalm 76:10, 'the wrath of man shall praise you.' The King of Assyria did not know he was to be 'the rod of my [God's] anger.' He thought his own bloodlust to be the reason for his expedition against Zion, but God sent him 'Against a godless nation' (Isa. 10:5, 6), even though that 'godless nation' (Israel) was 'more righteous than he' (Hab. 1:13), and even though the Assyrian 'does not so intend, and his heart does not so think' (Isa. 10:7). God directed Joseph's brothers' wicked deeds. They 'meant evil ... but God meant it for good,' that is, to spare many people from starvation (Gen. 50:20). Peter told the Pentecost crowd that when in the earlier Passover season they had by 'wicked hands' crucified and slain their properly accredited Messiah, it was by 'the definite plan and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23).

We cannot doubt God is doing such things each day. Like the servant of Elisha, we do not see that 'the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire all around Elisha' (2 Kgs. 6:17), even though Elisha saw it plainly. The secular spirit has so infiltrated thinking in our time that it is hard for us even to think in the category of divine providential control. How much more natural it is for us to say, 'It thundered' than 'the God of glory thunders' (Ps. 29:3)!

In God's directive control of the wicked acts of sinful men He in no way entices men to sin. The world and its god do that. Judas was moved by lust for money, Joseph's brothers by jealousy of his prominence. In each case God so directed the course of events that, though an undeserved execution (of Christ) took place, and some years of miserable servitude (for Joseph), great good came about.

(4) Limiting Control. Though the 'imagination of men's hearts is only evil continually' and the world offers vast opportunity to follow out those evil imaginations, God has set limits beyond which they cannot go. That a flood to destroy all mankind never be necessary again, God set limits on the extent to which violence and lust could lead (cf. Gen. 8:21, 22 with 9:5-7). Society nowhere exists in pure anarchy precisely because some undefined pervasive social 'instinct' for collective justice (civil control) became universally present in the post diluvian race. Limitations in the unseen world of wicked spirits have been imposed by God (Job 1:12; 2:6). The 'mystery of iniquity' consummated in the man of sin has always been kept under control by some restraining power (2 Thess. 2:3-6 niv), known to Paul's readers but unknown to us, and by some person ('one') as in 2 Thessalonians 2:7 niv. In some mysterious manner this 'thing' and that 'person' assist believers in their efforts to resist temptation, either as trial or as enticement. David said that 'if it had not been the Lord who was on our side' our triers and tempters 'would have swallowed us up' (Ps. 124:2, 3).

Sins that Cry to Heaven for Vengeance and Sins of Outstanding Offense to God

Some sins are worse than others because they are more productive of human misery or such perversion of divine order for the world that they threaten civilized social order or mount an assault against the majesty of God. It comes as a rebuke to socially complacent Christians and Christian groups that many of these sins occur in the manner of treatment we mete out to our neighbor—who may or may not be a fellow believer. I mention first those that are said to cry from earth to heaven to be set right or call for vengeance. The first four are part of what traditional theology calls 'the catechetical tradition', i.e. taught to children and others preparing for 'first communion.'³

(1) Oppression of the poor or any socially disadvantaged group. When the children of Israel were poor and oppressed in Egypt, 'the people of Israel groaned because of their slavery and cried out for help. Their cry ... came up to God' (Exod. 2:23). 'Then the Lord said, "I have surely seen ... and have heard their cry ... and I have come down to deliver them” ’ (Exod. 3:7, 8). God took notice not only because of His covenant with their ancestors, for all sins of oppressing the poor on earth are particularly offensive to heaven, but because ‘Whoever mocks the poor insults his Maker’ (Prov. 17:5) and his sins will not go unpunished, for ‘Whoever closes his ear to the cry of the poor will himself call out and not be answered’ (Prov. 21:13). (2) A second sin that cries to heaven for vengeance is oppression of foreigners (refugees from oppression elsewhere), widows and orphans. The consequences of this sort of sin are harsh indeed. Among the ‘judgments’ associated with the giving of the two tablets of the law is one related to oppression of foreigners.

You shall neither mistreat a stranger nor oppress him, for you were strangers ... You shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child ... they [will] cry ... to Me, I will surely hear their cry; and My wrath will become hot, and I will kill you with the sword; your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless (Exod. 22:21–24 nkjv).

(3) Injustice to wage-earners who need their earnings to buy daily bread.

You shall not oppress a hired servant who is poor and needy, whether he is one of your brothers or one of the sojourners [aliens, possibly refugees?] who are in your land within your towns. You shall give him his wages on the same day, before the sun sets (for he is poor and counts on it), lest he cry against you to the Lord, and you be guilty of sin (Deut. 24:14–15).

In addition to these sins that are said to ‘cry out to God’ there are others particularly offensive to the divine Spirit. One can almost say they trigger wrathful response like nothing else, as biblical history bears witness.

(4) Sins of sexual impurity and sexual perversion—specifically, fornication, adultery and homosexual acts are especially abominable to God. God loves mankind, He ‘makes their families like flocks’ (Ps. 107:41) and makes family life a picture of heaven. The Old Testament is a story of families. Therefore, sins against the propagation of and ordering of our race are hateful to God simply because God loves us. Hence, the expedition from heaven via Abraham’s tent to Sodom and Gomorrah, whose ‘sin is very grave,’ and the heavenly messengers’ grim word to Lot, ‘we are about to destroy this place, because the outcry against its people has become great before the Lord, and the Lord has sent us to destroy it’ (Gen. 18:20 and 19:13). The sin, laid bare in chapter 19 was plainly community-wide, unreproved and unrestrained homosexuality. This sin is an arrow aimed straight at the heart of marriage, home, personal and family discipline with terrible consequences in community and national life. No wonder the Torah calls homosexual practice an abomination, calling for the very most severe civil penalty. The eighteenth chapter of Leviticus goes into great detail on this matter. The very land is polluted when its inhabitants do such things. These sins brought on the divinely decreed annihilation of the Canaanites and later the land ‘spewed out’ the Israelites who took their place and repeated these sins. The language of Leviticus 18 (especially vv. 22–30) is sufficient to bring on a chill to any citizen of any corrupted country who takes these verses seriously.

(5) The sins of murder and failure of civil officers to discover, to convict and punish murderers. The first homicide called forth this reproof of the murderer from the victim’s Creator: ‘The voice of your brother’s blood is crying to me from the ground’ (Gen. 4:10). Cain was rightly convinced all men would regard his crime as deserving of death, with which the Lord agreed, but spared the miscreant by placing a special mark on him (Gen. 4:14, 15). The enormity of the crime of homicide offended heaven to the extent that when ‘the earth was filled with violence’ it was brought to a sudden end with the Great Flood and a true novus ordo seculorum (new order of the world, the inscription on all U.S. paper currency). (See Genesis 6:11, 17; 9:1 ff.)

The Noahic covenant, reinforced by the Mosaic code, requires that premeditated murder, like Cain’s, be punished by death and made it a prime responsibility of civil rulers to see it is carried out. Failure to do so is very offensive to the divine Creator of human civil order. The importance of this matter is in full display in the thirty-fifth chapter of Numbers. After laying out a fair and thorough procedure for establishing guilt or innocence of murder, the severity of God’s anger with murderers is plain, as also the civil punishment: ‘... he shall be put to death.’ No monetary fine would substitute. Murder, as well as sexual pollution, ‘... pollute the land in which you live, for blood pollutes the land, and no atonement can be made for the land for the blood that is shed in it, except by the blood of the one who shed it’ (Num. 35:31–33). God simply refuses to dwell ‘in the midst’ of any people who practise repugnant sexual license, sexual vice and avarice, no less where civil laws, officers and processes fail to discover, prosecute and punish murder. In comment on Deuteronomy 21:1–9, Gleason Archer writes:

... in the case of unsolved murders a public hearing had to be held in which the elders of the community in whose borders the crime had occurred would have to take an oath of innocence and then offer a sacrifice to God with an accompanying prayer for forgiveness, lest their land should remain polluted.⁴

(6) The sin of idolatry. The first and second commandments (Exod. 20:1–6) give this sin first place among all moral offenses. The worship of any material object makes a fool of man and dishonors God. ‘I am the Lord ... [and] my glory I give to no other, nor my praise to carved idols’ (Isa. 42:8). There is only one God, by whom and for whom man was made in the beginning, hence, ‘My glory I will not give to another’ (Isa. 48:11). This sin, in literal sense of giving either veneration or obeisance to a material object, called forth the fury of divine wrath repeatedly in Old Testament history (see Ps. 78 and Judg. 2). It is condemned as the prime sin of the heathen world in Romans chapter 1, verses 19–25 and in Paul’s sermon at Athens (Acts 17:22–31). The article ‘Idolatry,’ by F. B. Huey, Jr, gives a brief but thorough treatment, especially as to ‘why idolatry is condemned in the Bible.’⁵

In ancient times astrology was a near invariable adjunct of idolatry and remains so in present-day New-Age religion. Astrology flourishes on the ashes of biblical religion produced by widespread apostasy into these delusions of our time. Abba Hillel Silver asserts:

Under Canaanitish and Assyrian influence astral worship as well as astrology developed in Israel, for wherever there is worship of heavenly bodies there is also ... astrology.... In the period of the prophets worship of the ‘host of heaven’ was prevalent in Isaiah, and the prophets ... exerted themselves to the utmost to denounce it.⁶

(Rebuke of idolatry and its devastating effects occupies hundreds of pages of Old Testament law, narrative and prophetic writing. Its most ruinous form was sacrifice of infants to the Canaanite [Phoenician] god Moloch. The prevalence of the custom in the Semitic culture of Old Testament Israel is witnessed in the many acres of cemeteries for disposal of the bodies of the tiny unfortunate victims of this horrid practice. A classic book, The Idea of the Holy by Rudolph Otto [second edition of 1950], sets the background in human response to nature which gives rise to worship of unknown power; The Religion of the Semites by W. Robertson Smith [1927] is a second classic showing how the Semite, apart from a revealed and organized faith [or even in spite of it] responded with superstition and idolatry to the natural world in which Israel's history unfolded. F. B. Huey in a condensed article summed up the subject ['Idolatry,' ZPEB III, pp. 242–248].)

Idolatry was the prime sin of Canaanites leading to their expulsion. Associated with idolatry all sorts of wicked occult practices arose, all condemned by Moses (Deut. 18:9–14) and denounced by prophets.

Partaking of Other Men's Sins

This phrase, taken from 1 Timothy 5:22, appears in a passage directly applicable only to Timothy and presumably pastors in positions like Timothy's as chief pastor at Ephesus. It has been variously interpreted. When in the twentieth century unbelief in the form of 'modernism' first arose among professors and seminaries, then among pastors, churches, and church literature and even whole denominations, problems of association were thrust upon many earnest believers. Sadly, the scourge of unbelief professing to be intelligent faith has gradually rendered much of Christendom apostate with the result that this admonition to avoid partaking of other men's sins has been difficult for pastors and members of those groups to obey. I will not attempt here to report the debate about the problem of ecclesiastical separation over the past century among American Protestants. The results of doing nothing decisive are manifest now in the sidetracking of 'mainstream' Protestantism in America. The natural tendency to be courteous sometimes even makes us complicit with outright heretical cults whose messengers call on us. John warns of the one who 'does not abide in the doctrine of Christ,' saying 'whoever greets him takes part in his wicked works' (2 John 11), and Paul says to 'avoid them' (Rom. 16:17; cf. 1:32).

Sin by Giving Unnecessary Offense

To give offense in the sense of Romans 14:13 is to use one's Christian liberty in such a way as to offend the conscience of a brother who does not yet understand the liberty Christians rightly ought to enjoy. The teaching of the chapter is that we ought not to judge one another in things that God has blessed—food, drink, legitimate pleasures, things not wrong as such. Some believers, however, are not well informed about these adiaphora, or 'things indifferent.' Their feelings should be respected. The 'weak' (uninformed) ought not to judge his 'strong' brother (the informed about Christian liberty), yet consideration for the 'weak' should direct the 'strong' to respect the brother's conscience, lest he be induced to sin against his conscience (Rom. 14, especially vv. 21–23). To do otherwise is to put a stumbling-block (Gr. skandalon) in a brother's way (Rom. 14:13), an occasion for unnecessary distress or backsliding.

A much more serious sin of offense (Gr. skandalon) is described in Romans 16:17. It is the offense of propagating false teaching within the church, viz.: 'I appeal to you, brothers, to watch out for those who cause divisions and create obstacles [Gr. skandalon] contrary to the doctrine that you have been taught; avoid them.' It is a sin to ignore the offense (false teaching) and neglect of duty not to bring the 'scandal' of false teachings and false teachers to the attention of the church. Much is said of this throughout the New Testament, especially Paul's Epistles. To fail to act is a form of partaking of other men's sins. I have written at length of it in my book of 1993, A Wakeup Call.⁷

Jesus denounced those who cause such scandal, viz.: 'Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to sin, it would be better for him if a great millstone were hung round his neck and he were thrown into the sea' (Mark 9:42).

Our attention will now be directed to the question of how sin has been transmitted through the generations of man. This will require first, some further consideration of original sin, second, the imputation of sin, third, further exegesis of Romans 5:12–21, and finally the salvation of infants.

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 365, 411, 418, 419.

² Thiessen, Lectures in Theology, pp. 182, 183; Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 423–425; Calvin, Institutes I, xvii, pp. 1–4; Wendell, Calvin, pp. 177–184; F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics I, pp. 489, 490; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology on 'Concurrence,' pp. 171–175.

³ 1994 Catechism, para. 1867; Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, p. 570.

⁴ Gleason Archer, 'Crime and Punishments' in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975), p. 1032.

⁵ F. B. Huey, Jr, 'Idolatry' in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible III (Zondervan, 1975), pp. 242–248.

⁶ Abba Hillel Silver, Messianic Speculation in Israel (Boston: Beacon Hill Press, 1927, 1959), pp. 253–259.

⁷ Robert D. Culver, A Wakeup Call (Clayton, CA: Witness, Inc., 1993).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (372). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

7

The Transmission of Sin Through the Generations of Man

Importance and Difficulty of the Subject

There is no theological system in Christendom with the slightest right to be called a system of orthodox Christian doctrine, which does not attribute immense importance to the probation and fall of Adam in explaining the spiritual ruin of our race. His sin somehow explains why we are sinful in thoughts, words and deeds and why we are aware of the fact, unless we suppress it. Yet the Bible says only a little about the connection. In fact the Old Testament says almost nothing about Adam after the fifth chapter of Genesis. We have the story of Adam's probation and fall in chapters 2 and 3, that he begat Cain, Abel and Seth in chapter 4, and he begat a son named Seth in his own likeness, as well as other sons and daughters, in chapter 5. 'But there is not a solitary passage in all the rest of the Old Testament which can ... be made to suggest that the sin of Adam inflicted any injury of any kind upon his descendants.'¹ Job 31:33 and Hosea 6:7 refer to Adam's sin, but not to any effects on his sons and daughters of any generation.

In the New Testament, only Paul says very much about such a connection—not Jesus, not Peter or James or John or Jude—and he only in two texts. Each Pauline text proposes a parallel between a unity of men in Adam and a unity in Christ. In 1 Corinthians 15:22 it is said that just as all mankind are dying physically in Adam so all mankind will be resurrected physically in Christ. This text does not teach universal salvation in Christ; it teaches universal physical resurrection through the Logos (John 1:1–3) Creator of us all.

In the other text, Romans 5:12–21, Paul eight times and in as many ways declares that just as the one man Adam's offense brought the immeasurable evils of death and judgment, rendering all sinners, so our Lord's death in obedience to the Father's will brought the infinite blessings of life and righteousness, rendering many justified by the free gift of God's grace. R. W. Dale points out how even this passage introduces the subject as illustrative of something else.

But even this passage—the critical passage on the doctrine—the account of the evil results of Adam's sin is incidental; Paul speaks of Adam's transgression and of the effects of it, not for the sake of giving an explanation of human sin, but for the sake of illustrating the greatness of Christian salvation.²

I shall discuss the passage in some detail later, but first let us see what doctrinal construction has been made of it.

The Doctrine of Original Sin

Through the first two and one-half chapters of the Epistle to the Romans, Paul establishes two facts related to the transmission of sin: (a) every man is a corrupt being at heart even before consciously committing sins. Not only so, we know at heart that this is true unless we suppress the knowledge. (b) We are also aware that we are guilty, under just condemnation by our Creator and deserving of punishment both for being sinners at heart and for transgressions we commit.

This is the main thrust of the first three chapters of Romans ending at chapter 3, verse 20. The evidence is summarized in verse 19, viz.: ‘every mouth ... stopped ... all the world ... guilty before God’ (kjv). Calvin remarks, ‘The whole third chapter of Romans [vv. 1–20] is nothing but a description of original sin.’³

Then through Romans 3:21–31, all of chapter 4 and through 5:11, the subject is justification—i.e. that God declares believing sinners righteous wholly of grace on the ground of Christ’s finished work of redemption.

At this point comes Romans 5:12–21, both difficult in certain ways and yet marvellously plain. The unity of the race in Adam and his sin is presented as a parallel to and explanation for the oneness of the ‘many’ elect believers in Christ. It will call for later comment but for now, it seems that Paul felt his readers to be more thoroughly familiar with the harrowing of life and conscience by their sins than with the glories of divine grace. Experiential knowledge of the former (our thorough guilt for sin) would throw light on the latter (our full salvation in Christ), which must be first a matter of faith before it becomes a matter of growing experience.

Great as are the mysteries of justification ‘in Christ’ Paul is saying, they are not without parallel in something every competent sinner knows: that he and the race of which he is a member are guilty, deserving of punishment. The latter throws light on the former and Paul is bold, shocking as it may be, to let the fact of damnation in Adam throw light on redemption in Christ. Since very early in the patristic age these revealed truths about imputation of guilt of Adam’s first transgression to his posterity and their depravity as basic to the imputation have been called ‘Original Sin.’⁴

A. Original Sin As Understood in the Early Church

Calvin sets the facts straight about how ‘original sin’ entered Christian theology. After noting that according to Romans 8:20–22 ‘all creatures ... are groaning ... subject to corruption, not of their own will ... bearing part of the punishment deserved by man for whose use they were created,’ he adds, ‘therefore it is not unreasonable if it [corruption] is spread to all his offspring.’ He then explains, ‘This is the inherited corruption which the church fathers termed original sin.’⁵

The term ‘original sin’ was used somewhat diffidently by the Fathers—even obscurely. Historians agree the Latin Fathers were reluctant to articulate a doctrine of race sin in Adam lest they give

Christians leave to blame their transgressions on someone else (Adam) and themselves fail to resist unto blood striving against sin.⁶ This is why, after it had been fairly well articulated, Pelagius said he rejected the doctrine of original sin. Pelagius, a British monk of Irish origin came to Rome in ad 400 and was distressed at the low state of conduct there. Feeling that there was need of more moral effort he was shocked by the prayer in St Augustine's Confessions, 'Give what thou commandest and command what thou wilt.' His teachings seem to have aroused no stir until he went to Carthage (where Augustine was bishop) after the sack of Rome in ad 410.⁷

In the East before ad 200 opinions were not firmed up about individual moral depravity. The sin of every man, it was thought, had its type in Adam but the will was not clearly seen as impaired by Adam's fall.

The moral depravity of every individual ... appeared to be a repetition, rather than a consequence of the first sin ... they had recourse to the influence of demons ... rather than to a total bondage of the will as the result of original sin.⁸

J. L. Neve quotes J. H. Kurtz to the same effect:

Opposition to Gnosticism and Manicheism led the elder fathers to emphasize as strongly as possible moral freedom of men and induced them to deny inborn sinfulness as well as the doctrine that sin was imprinted in men in creation, and to account for man's present condition by bad training, evil example, the agency of evil spirits, etc.⁹

Tertullian in his De Anima (Concerning the Soul) was the first clearly to teach original sin.¹⁰ Yet a few years earlier Irenaeus (died about ad 200) held the doctrine of original sin in nuce. He said:

The first Adam misused his free will and disobeyed God, in consequence of which he fell, and with him all mankind. Through the fall man ... lost the divine image and became the victim of death.¹¹

Irenaeus followed with a soteriology derived in part, it would seem, from Romans 5:12–21.

B. Original Sin As Seen by Augustine and Later Augustinians

Augustine had learned about original sin from his first Christian pastor and preceptor, Ambrose of Milan, but it was in response to a denial of any sort of effect of Adam's sin upon his descendants by the British monk, Pelagius, and his associate, Coelestius, that called forth his first extensive and fully coherent statement of our oneness with Adam in guilt, corruption and punishment (i.e. original sin). Augustine's writings on original sin and related matters are very extensive—many pages in The City of God, volumes of anti-Pelagian writings and at least seven letters to various parties.^{12, 13}

Augustine said much on the subject and the English translations of his writings vary, but a comment on Psalm 119:119 in relation to the death of infants and the rite of circumcision is appropriate to quote here as bringing his argument to focus.

He has first asserted 'infants, not personally in their own life, but according to the common origin of the human race, have all broken God's covenant in that one in whom all have sinned [Rom. 5:12, 19].'¹⁴ He goes on to argue from the practice of infant baptism for removal of guilt of original sin; a view common at that time, saying: ‘If on this account, then, even the infants are, according to the true belief, born in sin, not actual [of act] but original, so that we confess they have need of grace for the remission of sins.’ He argues from Psalm 119:119 which read in his Bible, ‘I have counted all sinners on earth as lawbreakers’ (Septuagint) that even infants have broken divine law and did so only in ‘the law which was given in Paradise.’¹⁵ In his lifetime Augustine was accused of inventing the notion of original sin by Julian of Eclanum (c. ad 418/419). See Vernon J. Bourke’s Augustine’s Quest of Wisdom.¹⁶

Contrary to claims of recent opponents to the Protestant-Augustinian view of imputation of original sin, Augustine does not make Romans 5:12 (Latin) pivotal to his view.

Anthropology and Hamartiology (man and sin) are the main foci of Shedd’s great two-volume work, History of Christian Doctrine. To summarize Shedd’s history: Augustine perceived that a biblical soteriology (doctrine of salvation) wholly by divine grace is required by biblical anthropology (doctrine of man) and of hamartiology (doctrine of sin). Augustine’s formulation of these doctrines rather quickly prevailed, particularly in the West. Lamentably, though honored in profession, these truths gradually were subverted to Semi-Pelagianism in actual practice during the Middle Ages. Augustine’s theology of the fall of man and its permanent effects became the theology of the Protestant Reformation and, I think, correct to say, is still dominant in informed evangelical theology even today, at least ought to be. W. G.T. Shedd’s important summary follows.

1. Man was created holy, and from this position originated sin de nihilo by a purely creative act. Original sin [as Adam enacted it] is voluntary in the sense of being self-will [not compelled by any external force], and is therefore a purely creative act.
2. Man was created as a species, in respect to both soul and body; and hence the Adamic connection relates to the entire man—to the voluntary and rational nature, equally with the corporeal and sensuous.
3. By the Adamic connection, the will, the pneuma, is corrupted as well as the psyche and soma.
4. Infants are guilty, because they possess a sinful bias of will, and not merely a corrupt sensuous nature.
5. The corruption of the sensuous nature is the (material) consequent, and not the antecedent of apostasy in the rational and voluntary.... The corruption of the flesh is not the cause, but the effect of the corruption of the reason and will.
6. The Holy Spirit takes the initiative in the change from sin to holiness, and there is no co-operation of the human with the Divine agency in the regenerating act. The efficiency or activity of the human will up to the point of regeneration is hostile to God, and therefore does not co-operate with him.¹⁷

C. Original Sin in the Protestant Reformation and Onward

There is no aspect of doctrine unaffected by the decision one makes on the teaching of original sin. This effect is most profound in soteriology. I shall not here trace the history of the subject except to say, though the objections raised by Pelagius and Coelestius in the early fifth century have reappeared from time to time throughout Christian history, the main streams of orthodox Christian theology have preserved the main features of Augustine's construction (summarized above) intact. This is witnessed by the chief Reformation creeds and confessions, Calvin's Institutes, Melancthon's Loci Communes of 1555 (Lutheran), and later standard works of theology. Luther himself, one may rightly say, in The Bondage of the Will, fully endorsed the doctrine of original sin (as James Packer's Introduction to the latest English edition avers vigorously).

Except for a rather subtle bent toward Traducianism in Shedd's summary (not incorrect, I think) what he writes is the confession of all Protestant orthodoxy today. Roman Catholic theology agrees with much of it, except that it regards man's rational faculties as not vitiated by the fall of Adam.

Groups of evangelical Christians who implicitly or explicitly reject systematic formulations of doctrines ('The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible') may not perceive the importance of original sin and its correlates, but join with confessional Christians in the hymns they sing—Reformed, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Congregational, Mennonite, Baptist, Independents, Pentecostal, and recently, Roman Catholics. Eastern Orthodox think somewhat differently, though there have been strong expressions of a similar synthesis even among them. See Confession of Augsburg II (1530) 'Of Original Sin' (Bettenson, 295); The Formula of Concord, Art. I 'Concerning Original Sin' (Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, 97–106); Calvin, Institutes I, i, 1–10; Anglican 'Articles of Religion,' art. IX 'Of Original or Birth-Sin'; Westminster Confession (1643) chap. VI 'Of the Fall of Man, of Sin, and of the Punishment thereof'; Methodist The Articles of Religion (1784), art. vii 'Of Original or Birth Sin' in The Articles of Religion, 1984, p. 57. The Savoy Declaration (1658) of Congregationalists embodies the Westminster Confession as does also The Philadelphia Confession (1685) of Baptists. This list could be extended at great length. I cite these to show that as unacceptable to unregenerate reason and the secular mind of every age as 'Original Sin' is, it is the confession of orthodox, evangelical Christianity as well as of the ancient church. With important modification it remains intact even in the Roman Church.

There is no more faithful exponent of historic Lutheranism than C. P. Krauth in his great work of 832 pages, The Conservative Reformation. He says of original sin and consequent universal necessity for regeneration:

On this point, all sound theology of every part of our common Christianity is a unit.... The Romish and Greek Churches recognize the impossibility of the salvation of any human creature without change from that condition in which he was born.

This great fact must not be forgotten that on the main difficulty of this part [necessity even for infants to be born again on account of original sin], all but Pelagians are in unity of faith with our church [Lutheran]. The testimony of the Church through all ages is most explicit on this point: That no unregenerate person, infant or adult, Pagan or nominal Christian, can be saved. Without holiness, no man shall see the Lord—but no man can be holy with his natural heart unchanged. Except we have the Spirit of Christ we are none of His; but this Spirit is given to us in and by the new birth alone.¹⁸

As for the recent past, neo-orthodoxy, flowering as it did (and does) after two World Wars, a terrible depression and concurrent with the revelation of the Nazi atrocities, used eloquent language in describing human depravity. I was a student, pastor, then professor while Barth, Brunner, Bonhoeffer, the Niebuhrs, Tillich and the rest discovered and expounded what the ‘fundamentalists’ knew all along. (I preached the community’s ‘Victory in Europe’ Day sermon in 1945, taking Psalm 46 as my text.) I have long since destroyed my files on what I then read, though the memory lingers. In April of 1995 on the fiftieth anniversary, an article by Gerald Parshall in U.S. News and World Report makes the point with reference to how history has confirmed our orthodox faith in original sin, viz.:

But the Holocaust was clearly more than a testament to the beastliness of Germans or the excesses of fascism. In an editorial called, Gazing into the Pit, the Christian Century wrote that the atrocities showed ‘the horror of humanity itself when it has surrendered to its capacity for evil ... Buchenwald and the other concentration camps spell doom. But it is not simply the doom of the Nazis; it is the doom of man unless he can be brought to worship at the feet of the living God.’ Even for secular intellectuals, the Holocaust supplied the most powerful brief yet for the existence of original sin. Two centuries earlier, thinkers were asserting the perfectibility of man. Now, they were debating whether Germans were human. The answer, tragically was yes.¹⁹

Protestant evangelicals of today, largely through historical forgetfulness, are not aware fully of their spiritual ancestors’ faith. In Reformation times the enormously learned linguist, Erasmus, published a ‘Diatribes’ expounding free will of man in the spirit of the Semi-Pelagianism of the Roman Church. Luther responded in The Bondage of the Will, ‘The Masterwork of the Great Reformer,’ of which a new translation by James I. Packer and O. R. Johnson was published in 1957. Near the end of their long Introduction these authors say:

What is the modern reader to make of The Bondage of the Will? That it is a brilliant and exhilarating performance, a masterpiece of the controversialist’s difficult art, he will no doubt readily admit; but now comes the question, is Luther’s case any part of God’s truth? And, if so, has it a message for Christians today? No doubt the reader will find the way by which Luther leads him to be a strange new road, an approach which in all probability he has never considered, a line of thought which he would normally label ‘Calvinistic’ and hastily pass by. This is what Lutheran orthodoxy itself has done; and the present-day evangelical Christian (who has Semi-Pelagianism in his blood) will be inclined to do the same. But both history and Scripture, if allowed to speak, counsel otherwise.²⁰

The Problems of the Imputation of Adam’s Sin to Succeeding Generations

Earlier, in connection with the fall of Adam, we have seen that Adam’s sin rendered him guilty, depraved and condemned to the punishment of death. Now we must consider first the question, put as poignantly as possible: Is each descendant of Adam truly guilty of that first sin? Put another way, are we guilty sinners in God’s sight only because of our own personal transgressions or are we already born sinners under God’s just sentence? In the language of John, are we truly ‘condemned already’ (John 3:18)? The question has become acute with seeming denials of the orthodox Protestant answer in recent evangelical publications. See David L. Smith’s With Willful Intent: A Theology of Sin.²¹ Second, assuming we are guilty of Adam’s sin, how can this be? I remember nothing of any sin before my birth. I was not asked to join my ever-so-great grandfather in what he did wrong; how then can I share in his blame? It does not seem right, yet according to the Bible it is right. How? Why? The answers are found in Romans 5:12–19. We proceed here directly to the two questions. These two questions constitute the topic, imputation of Adam’s sin.

(1) In answer to the first question, as to the fact, yes, the Scriptures clearly teach that: (a) ‘by the one man’s disobedience the many were made sinners’ (Rom. 5:19). In the context of verse 12 the ‘many’ are ‘all men.’ ‘Made’ translates kathistēmi which in the New Testament never means to change the character of something: rather to establish, render, constitute (as a judge, or ruler, or the like; see Luke 12:14; Matt. 24:45) someone in a particular way. Hence, it is correct to say Adam’s disobedience (transgression, sin) rendered all his descendants guilty by virtue of the first man’s first sin.

(b) Adam’s sin is charged to every member of the human race. This is only a different slant of the meaning of the point just made. Placing in parallel our justification in Christ but in contrast to it Paul says, ‘the gift of God is not like the result of the one man’s sin: The judgment followed one [man’s] sin and brought condemnation’ (Rom. 5:16 niv). The kjv, ‘by one that sinned,’ renders ex henos, lit. ‘out of one,’ emphasizing one human actor or action. It could be either Adam himself or his first offense. ‘Condemnation’ renders katakrima, a judgment or sentence of condemnation by a judge. It was pronounced on ‘all men’ (vv. 12, 18, 19): plus ‘many’ (v. 15), not when each one sins, but on the occasion of Adam’s transgression.

(c) ‘Death came to all men, because all sinned’ (Rom. 5:12 niv). Paul employs a tense of the verb for sin (hamartanō), the aorist tense, which in context places the action of ‘all sinned’ in one past act, not a succession of acts. The result was and is not merely that since Adam’s transgression all his descendants are going to die (though 1 Cor. 15:22 does say so, ‘in Adam all die’ and human experience testifies that every man is indeed mortal); the sense is that all sinned in Adam and are from the first moment of natural life, dead already in trespasses and sins (Eph. 2:1; Col. 2:13). They are ‘by nature children of wrath’—that is, divine wrath.

(2) In answer to the second question, assuming then the fact of original sin, guilt for Adam’s act, how can it be? How can God justly hold each of us responsible for Adam’s sin? (My professor of systematic theology did not presume to know how but simply accepted universal human guilt for Adam’s sin as a biblical fact. Professor McClain may have felt the several theories as to why were too complex to explain adequately or inconclusive, and that there were better uses of time than to assess theories that go on forever.) Nevertheless, I propose the following as a probable solution to the problem.

(a) Because there is an organic, natural connection of Adam with each of his descendants. There is greater difficulty for the creationist, in whose view each human soul is directly created by God. But, on the basis of Traducianism, that each infant born was begotten and conceived entire, body and soul, in the womb of the mother, procreated by both parents, there is a lesser problem. All human nature, quantitatively and qualitatively, was in Adam when under the conditions of the probation he fell and thereby corrupted not only himself but the very nature of man. Nature is not a material substance as we ordinarily think of substance. One need not adopt the metaphysics of medieval ‘realism’ to adopt Traducianism and the idea that all mankind in that nature was seminally (i.e. in seed form) present in Adam and, as seed, fell with and in him. Robert Dabney well said:

[I]n history, the ex traduce [Traducianism as defined above] theory has been thought more favorable to original sin, and has been usually connected with it, till modern times; while Creationism was strenuously advocated by Pelagians. If the Traducian theory can be substantiated it obviously presents the best explanation of the propagation of sin.²²

I have observed that Calvin and Augustine, while never quite formally committing themselves to Traducianism, employ arguments for each individual's guilt for Adam's sin which plainly require both the body and soul be procreated by parents and their individual guilt for what he (Adam) did because he is seminally present in him. In one of several paragraphs against Pelagianism Calvin says,

We must surely hold that Adam was not only the progenitor but, as it were, the root of human nature; and therefore in his corruption mankind deserved to be vitiated [i.e. mankind as nature in Adam deserved to be punished by being 'vitiating,' that is, corrupted].²³

Calvin adds,

Adam by sinning ... plunged our nature into like destruction. This was not due to the guilt of himself alone, which would not pertain to us at all, but was because he infected all his posterity.²⁴

Calvin's language on through several paragraphs of this section employs language implying that human nature fell in Adam—there was a nature including body and soul that fell in Adam and was propagated onward. Augustine makes many direct statements that come close to an endorsement of Traducianism. I cite only one of them which implies the seminal presence of every descendant in Adam and the corruption of human nature itself as grounds for guilt, condemnation and death of everyone.

God created men aright, for God is the author of nature, though he is certainly not responsible for their defects. But man was willingly perverted and justly condemned, and so begot perverted and condemned offspring. For we were all in that one man, seeing we all were [emphasis added] that one man who fell into sin through the woman who was made from him before the first sin. We did not yet possess forms individually created and assigned for us to live in them as individuals; but there already existed the seminal nature from which we were to be begotten. And of course, when this was vitiated through sin, and bound with death's fetters in its just condemnation, man could not be born of man in any other condition ... mankind is led from that ... corruption at the root.²⁵

This passage espouses the same justification for condemnation on account of original sin found in Shedd (Dogmatic Theology, 1888); Strong (Systematic Theology, 1907); H. C. Thiessen (Lectures in Systematic Theology, 1949); and in somewhat attenuated form in Erickson (Christian Theology, 1983); as well as Lewis and Demarest (Integrative Theology, 1990). Official statements among Protestants apparently grounded in the Traducian outlook begin with the Lutheran Augsburg Confession and the Apology for the Confession.

(b) The doctrine of race sin, hence universal guilty responsibility, is supported by the facts of human life. Think of what Hitler's depravity inflicted first on his own German people then on Jews and all the inhabited earth. Whether these effects are right, just, correct or not, they are true. (I refer the reader to a later section on ‘the universality of sin.’)

(c) We who lend at least tentative support to the above Traducianist theory agree at least this much with those who hold to Federal or covenant headship (see below) that Paul draws a parallel between race unity in Christ and in Adam. In Christ’s case the unity was by forensic (legal) action of God (i.e. imputation). Imputation was made appropriate and possible, however, by Christ’s natural (organic) connection with humanity in His incarnation. A careful reading of the chief modern advocates of Federal headship (including both the Hodges, C. A. and A. A., John Murray, Robert Dabney, James Thorwell, Louis Berkhof, and others) will show that in imputation of guilt for Adam’s sin to posterity, the natural (or seminal) connection with Adam rendered the forensic appropriate and possible. Similarly, the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to human beings was possible only by His becoming one of us by nature (incarnation) and likewise Adam’s sin is ours and we are guilty in and with him only because we were truly, seminally, in him. The parallel is not exact. We cannot quite agree with those who, like A. H. Strong, hold that the race was created originally in Christ in any organic sense.

(d) Death among mankind is not in the true nature of things an inevitable event in normal course. It is abnormal, something inflicted on mankind as punishment for sin. The Bible is clear that death in human kind, at any age, is not merely the natural outcome of life, but the imposed penalty for sin. When infants die, it cannot be a penalty for consciously committed personal sins. The only proper explanation is that the infant shares in race guilt for Adam’s sin. So Paul argues in Romans 5:14 and Augustine emphasizes. Adam had no built-in metabolic clock to tell his body when to grow old, but every one of his descendent children has one. Science has not found our ‘life-maintenance clock’ but it is there. It will neither be found nor reset—eager proponents of various kinds of life-science research notwithstanding.

(e) If the fruit (i.e. evil thoughts and deeds) of the fallen nature (the sinful heart) in each one of us deserves condemnation and punishment, then surely the evil root does also. Many texts throughout the Bible assert that both are evil, for example: Job 14:4; Genesis 6:5; Matthew 15:19.

(f) Further, everyone in possession of common sense knows he is individually responsible—whatever his nature and nurture—for his own offenses. He knows he ought to do right and knows he does much that is not right. Conscience tells him so. Conscience also threatens him with punishment. He knows his evil deeds are the fruit of evil in his heart and that he is guilty and punishable before the righteous Judge of all, if not before worldly tribunals, not only for the evil which he does but for the evil which he is in his heart. No man’s conscience is quite at ease with a God who is ‘a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart’ before whom no creature is not manifest (Heb. 4:12, 13 kjv) until he has come to peace ‘with God’ through the blood of Christ and peace ‘of God’ through the life of the Spirit. He may not have the slightest idea where his bad heart came from but he knows it is deserving of punishment and he fears the judgment to come on account of that.

The Bible offers no palliatives for the clear teaching of original sin. The Bible plainly proclaims the bad news because until we not only know, but feel ourselves under the righteous judgment of God for what we are, we will never be in any mood to hear the good news or to have any inclination to respond to it. Like the prodigal son, we never say ‘I will arise and go to my father’ until we truly acknowledge, ‘I have sinned against heaven . . . I am no longer worthy’ (Luke 15:18, 19).

¹ R. W. Dale, Christian Doctrine (London, 1899), p. 214.

² ibid., p. 215.

³ Calvin, Institutes II, i,9.

⁴ A very competent introduction to this difficult subject will be found in Jaroslav Pelikan's The Christian Tradition I, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971), pp. 178–192.

⁵ Calvin, Institutes II, i,5.

⁶ J. L. Neve, A History of Christian Thought I (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg Press, 1946), p. 138.

⁷ Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), pp. 73, 74.

⁸ Hagenbach, cited by Neve, Christian Thought I, p. 138.

⁹ Neve, Christian Thought I, p. 138.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 138.

¹¹ Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2,8, summarized by Neve, Christian Thought I, p. 80.

¹² H. Pope, St. Augustine of Hippo, p. 180.

¹³ The core of the ancient literature of this controversy will be found in Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, pp. 73–88 and passages in Augustine, The Kingdom of God, XII, 22; XIV, 11, 12; XIV, 11–15.

¹⁴ Augustine, City of God Book XVI, chap. xxix, 27.

¹⁵ ibid.

¹⁶ Vernon J. Bourke, Augustine's Quest of Wisdom (Milwaukee: Bruce Publ. Co., 1945), p. 191.

¹⁷ Wm. G. T. Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine ii (New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co., 1863), pp. 91, 92.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

Bettenson Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church

¹⁸ C. P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1875), p. 420.

¹⁹ Gerald Parshall in U.S. News & World Report (April 3, 1995), p. 65.

²⁰ reprint in 1994 by Baker Book House, Grand Rapids, Michigan, pp. 57, 58

²¹ David L. Smith, With Willful Intent: A Theology of Sin (Wheaton, IL: Victor Books, 1994), pp. 368–371.

²² Robert Dabney, Lectures on Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1972, first published in 1878), p. 317.

²³ Calvin, Institutes II, i,6.

²⁴ ibid.

²⁵ Henry Bettenson translation, Augustine City of God (Baltimore, MD: Penguin, 1972), XIII.14.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (378). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

8

Theories of the Imputation of Sin

Up to this point the doctrine of original sin expounded and its corollary, imputation of Adam's sin to us all, has been the Augustinian view traceable through the Protestant churches of the Reformation and all the chief Protestant Reformers, back to Augustine. I do not mean to say we owe the doctrine of original sin to any theologian ancient or recent. It is spread throughout the New Testament. That the Christian message to mankind is called 'the good news' means it is to bring deliverance from the bad news. The structure of books like Romans and Ephesians is shaped on this premise. This view is essentially that also of Anselm and other defenders of Augustinian anthropology in the Middle Ages.

There are varieties of outlook on imputation by earnest theologians, but all the evangelical views are modifications of the primitive Augustinianism described above. These modifications inevitably led—and still lead—to variations from the Reformation Protestant doctrines of the decrees of God, atonement, election and especially the order of salvation (ordo salutis), viz.: if natural man is dead spiritually, then God must not only provide salvation in redemption but actually impart some spiritual life to the spiritually dead sinner, whose will is not free but enslaved and whose mind is darkened, before he can repent or believe. He must be made to want to believe before he chooses to do so.

The basic difference may be said to boil down to the question: Who determines who are to be saved? According to Semi-Pelagians, Arminians and Wesleyans, man determines. All hinges on human choice. In a strange way, so agrees Norman Geisler, who in an effort to avoid what he calls extreme Calvinism manages to become not a moderate Calvinist but a pretty good synergist, i.e. an Arminian.¹ According to the Augustinian scheme (including all the leading Reformers), God does. He not only provides the Savior but makes 'his people' desire to receive Him. And this modifies one way or another many other aspects of doctrine and of Christian life, personal and corporate.

Further implications are correctly pointed out by C. A. Hodge:

Although this may be said to be the turning point [between systems of theology] which has divided the Church in all ages, yet this point, of necessity, involves all the other matters of difference: namely, the nature and design of the work of Christ; and the nature of divine grace, or the work of the Holy Spirit. Thus, in a great measure, the whole system of theology, and of necessity the character of our religion, depend upon the view taken of this particular question. It is, therefore, a question of highest practical importance, and not a matter of idle speculation.²

These sentences significantly are from Hodge's remarks on 'The Plan of Salvation' not on his sections on original sin and imputation.

A satisfactory answer to this question (i.e. who determines who will be saved) has been confused historically by what look now to be overrefinement of issues and answers. No view is quite without problems. Yet some mention ought to be made of the way teachers of doctrine have phrased issues, evidence and answers. My procedure will be to present first historically important views orthodox Protestantism has regarded either as false or inadequate—even though some evangelical bodies hold to them. Then to discuss two views that merit being called orthodox Protestant or Augustinian, (both Calvinist and Lutheran) and a modification.

The Pelagian Theory

Pelagius and Coelestius propounded their views in Rome, Carthage and elsewhere shortly after ad 400. Pelagius, whose views were condemned by the Council of Carthage (ad 418), denied the existence of any problem. Infants are born with souls immediately created by God, hence, innocent of any trace of sin, Adam's or otherwise. Their probation starts where Adam's did, in a state of innocency. Romans 5:12, 'death spread to all men because all sinned' means simply we all follow Adam's bad example and therefore die. God imputes guilt only for our own personal sins when we commit them. Pelagius is significant today chiefly because others, beginning with Augustine, have been stimulated by his attractive but unscriptural errors to formulate a coherent doctrine of sin. Later, Socinians (anti-Trinitarians of the Reformation epoch), Unitarians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and present-day 'liberal' theologians endorse teachings similar to Pelagius' views.

In an effort to prevent Coelestius from being ordained at Carthage, Paulinus, a deacon at Milan, sent a letter to the bishop charging him and Pelagius with six errors: (1) Adam was mortal and would have died whether he had sinned or not sinned; (2) the sin of Adam injured himself alone, and not the human race; (3) newborn children are in that state in which Adam was before his fall; (4) neither by the death and sin of Adam does the whole race die, nor by the resurrection of Christ does the whole race rise; (5) the law leads to the kingdom of heaven as well as the gospel; (6) even before the coming of the Lord there were men without sin.³

Bettenson provides a slightly fuller report.⁴ The few original sources of information about

Pelagius and brief explanation of his views are easily available in Bettenson.⁵ Also A. H. Strong furnishes ‘seven points of Pelagianism.’⁶

Every generation, however, has produced a few serious theologians whose reflections on the human condition would not allow them to accept the radical and universal sinfulness of man. There are not today, however, many theologians (or psychologists, for that matter) who think any human being has ever been innocent. The twentieth century, with its wars, economic depressions, social turbulence and crime, has not been conducive to optimism regarding human nature.

Semi-Pelagianism

Both in origin and in history this view might perhaps better be designated semi-Augustinian. Augustine and his successors defined depravity as total: human will enslaved, salvation wholly of grace and wholly by God’s initiative. These teachers, while not exactly in reaction to Pelagianism, were stimulated by it. Those who shortly after the Augustinian victory at the Council of Carthage (ad 418) and for the following century retreated somewhat from the decision of Carthage probably were not any kind of Pelagians—semi-or otherwise. They were semi-Augustinians.⁷ They sought to define depravity, ‘free will,’ salvation by grace and faith in such a way as to leave man able to turn to God, to initiate repentance. The Semi-Pelagians agreed that all Adam’s descendants received a fallen, corrupt human nature from Adam, but were only weakened by sin, not dead in sin. This appears in extracts from pertinent ancient reports.⁸ These views were common among some ‘Protestants’ of Reformation times. The Lutheran Formula of Concord apparently first called this outlook ‘semi-Pelagianism.’⁹ It has affinities with Arminianism, Wesleyanism, some Southern Baptist theology, a good bit of Mennonite thinking and synergistic Lutheranism, as well as the Roman Tridentine theology. Even Zwingli has been accused of being ‘semi-Pelagian’ in his view of sin.¹⁰ This outlook does not regard fallen man as quite dead in trespasses and sins, though he may be very sick. He has sufficient spiritual power to co-operate in conversion. As we turn to Arminianism and Wesleyanism (Methodist theology) it will be seen they partake of some main features of this semi-Augustinianism (named Semi-Pelagianism to condemn it).

Consistent Pelagianism is rightly called a heresy. It is an anti-Christian doctrine. Revived in Reformation times by Socinianism and in eighteenth-century American Unitarianism, it is still with us in apostate, that is to say, liberal religion, both Roman and Protestant, today as G. Gresham Machen proclaimed in his 1920 book, Christianity vs. Liberalism. As J. L. Neve comments in A History of Christian Thought, the Protestant Reformers and their orthodox successors were right in rejecting explicit synergism, the name then given to the notion fallen men have power, apart from enabling divine grace, to co-operate with God in coming to faith. Even the Canons of the Council of Trent agree on this point.

Semi-Pelagianism and its latent synergism rest on a defective understanding of what it means to be ‘by nature children of wrath,’ ‘dead in trespasses and sins,’ having no life because they are ‘condemned already.’ Still millions of thoroughly Christian people, if they think about the problem at all think of imputation of Adam’s sin as Semi-Pelagians. Likewise they may think they came to Christ wholly by choice of their own ‘free’ will. In my judgment, they have, to that extent, a defective theology, but certainly not heretical. They still pray as though all depends on God and sing praise to the Holy Spirit in ‘convicting me of sin’ and at Christmas time, of how ‘God imparts to human hearts/ The glories of his heaven.’ The view of the Greek (Eastern Orthodox) churches of original sin and imputation of guilt for the sin of our first parents is to this day in all essentials the same as Semi-Pelagianism. For a description of Eastern Orthodox theology on these points by an Englishman who converted to orthodoxy and later wrote almost as spokesman to the English-speaking world see The Orthodox Church by Timothy Ware, on ‘Grace and Free Will’ and ‘The Fall: Original Sin.’¹¹ For a fair presentation of ‘The Greek Anthropology’ see Shedd’s History of Christian Doctrine.¹²

Arminius and Early Remonstrants

After the death (ad 1564) of Calvin (whose expressions in the perspective of the history of scholastic Calvinism seem quite moderate) some of his immediate successors in Geneva and the Reformed leaders in the Netherlands stated the doctrines of depravity, grace and election in terms that then, as now, offended many sensitive believers and gifted scholars.

For Calvin, election (in distinction from the doctrine of decrees or predestination) is a soteriological doctrine: election is to eternal life from the mass of the unsaved. It presumes man as sinner already. Pressed on the point, Calvin acknowledged that if God has ‘decreed all whatsoever comes to pass’ that includes the damnation of the non-elect as well. As Paul, in Romans 11:33–36, both Luther and Calvin accepted this as a mystery of revelation. The logic is inescapable. If man is dead spiritually, then God, to save him, must find him, choose him, impart both spiritual enlightenment of mind and power of will to do so, in order to save him. The logic starts with the question of original sin and the corollary, imputation of guilt (death) for Adam’s sin to all of Adam’s progeny. In such a case regeneration is a ‘monergism’—only God acts. Faith follows. Salvation by grace, means all of grace.¹³ The beginning of faith is by divine power alone and by divine choice (election) alone. God foreknows because He elects, election being nowise dependent on ‘foreseen faith.’

(I have already shown that by whatever name, the Scriptures teach the total absence of spiritual life in fallen men. In their natural fallen state, men do not love God and do not want to love Him. Wesleyans and Arminians are wont to diminish the total incapacity of the unregenerate in spiritual, God-related matters by diminishing the strength of the biblical language about it, saying for example, ‘dead in ... trespasses and sins’ [Eph. 2:1; cf. Col. 2:13] is only a figure of speech. Man, they say, ‘still has free will.’ But Paul is using no mere figure. The total direction of the unrenewed will away from God is part of that spiritual death, which is not partial but total. This is the point Erasmus would not see and Luther stifled with an avalanche of Scripture truth in The Bondage of the Will.)

This teaching is capable of perversion and unbalanced advocacy as well as of caricature. In ‘Supralapsarianism’ (before-the-fall-ism), as it arose after ad 1563 (death of Calvin), God’s way of manifesting His grace and justice was to select from hypothetically existing men (men to be created) a certain number to be vessels of mercy, and certain others to be vessels of wrath. In the order of thought of this scheme, election and reprobation precede the purpose to create and to permit the fall. Carried to a logically extreme conclusion, Christ’s death was not ‘for the sins of the whole world’ (1 John 2:2). Infralapsarianism (below-the-fall-ism) as a more moderate Calvinism, holds, ‘God, with the design to reveal his own glory ... determined to create the world; secondly to permit the fall of man; thirdly, to elect from the mass of fallen men a multitude ... as vessels of mercy,' etc.¹⁴ There are sentences in Calvin's Institutes which some have interpreted as Supralapsarian. The Institutes, though revised several times by the author, remained essentially the same in doctrine as in his earliest work. His later comments on Scripture are clearly Infralapsarian and hardly favor the doctrine of limited atonement as stated by its most strident advocates. (See my comments later in Christology.) Calvin did not express himself precisely on this subject because severe controversy about the subject was not raised until he had passed off the scene. Most Protestants, including leading Calvinists, defend Infralapsarianism. (See, for example, A. H. Strong's citation of Calvin's comments on 1 John 2:2.)¹⁵

Soon a reaction against hyper-Calvinism set in, the chief spokesman being Jacob Arminius (or Hermansen) (ad 1560–1609), a professor at Leyden (Netherlands). He was a very learned man in a very learned age. The English edition of his collected works runs to 1771 pages. The controversy and its issue in the five 'Arminian articles of Remonstrance' and the contrary five points of the 'synod of Dort' (ad 1619) are beyond our present scope to report.¹⁶ It is the teachings and assumptions of Arminius and followers regarding original sin and imputation of guilt for Adam's sin that interests us at this point.

Arminius did not hesitate to call Pelagianism a 'heresy'¹⁷ and from his very learned and skillful writings enough moderate Calvinism can be extracted that Carl Bangs wrote an article entitled 'Arminius was a Calvinist' in Christianity Today magazine and Strong cites Moses Stuart in an article from Biblical Repostory, 1831, saying, it is 'possible to construct an argument to prove Arminius was not an Arminian.'¹⁸

His theology of sin is that of the ancient semi-Augustinians, whom modern church history calls Semi-Pelagian, and is very similar to the views of the Eastern Fathers before Augustine. A good many hours of examination of Arminius' writings confirms: 'It is plain that by inherited sin Arminius meant only inherited evil, and that it was not of a sort to justify God's condemnation.'¹⁹ Though he makes many statements affirming Traducianism, 'He denied any being in Adam, such as made us justly chargeable with Adam's sin, except in that we are obliged to endure certain consequences of it.'²⁰ Arminius' statements regarding fallen man's ability to repent and believe are ambiguous. Sometimes Arminius seems to say fallen man has sufficient knowledge of God and residual freedom of will to turn to God for salvation even without God's special grace. He is concerned with God's justice in condemning sinners who have no power to repent and believe. So he posits grace sufficient to enable any one 'who wills' to believe and be saved, adding 'were the fact otherwise, the justice of God could not be defended [emphasis added] in condemning those who do not believe.'²¹

My own search of Arminius' works fully confirm the following assessment by W. G. T. Shedd:

The Arminian theologians did not believe that the unity between Adam and his posterity ... was of such a nature as to make the first sinful act of Adam a common act of mankind, and thereby justify the imputation of original sin as truly and properly sin.... Their objection to the doctrine that original sin is guilt, proceeds on the assumption that Adam's act of apostasy was purely individual, and that the posterity were not in any such real sense as the phraseology of their own doctrinal statements, if taken in its strict and literal application, would imply.²²

Socinianism, Unitarianism and Modernism

The Socinians of the Reformation era in Europe, Unitarians of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in English-speaking lands, and Modernism of the twentieth-century era all departed from evangelical orthodoxy along the whole range of doctrines—though not always in the same way. They agreed, however, in repudiating any direct connection between the fall of Adam and the sinfulness of men.

All of early sixteenth-century Europe was influenced by the moralistic view of Christianity propounded by Erasmus. The presumption that his scholarship was unrivaled gave him and his views great prestige everywhere. ‘His way of thinking was to have little influence on the Reformation as a whole, though much on Socinianism, and is that represented in a great deal of modern [i.e. Modernist] theology, of which he was thus the spiritual ancestor.’²³ The theology of Erasmus may be stated thus:

To him Christianity was but the fullest expression through Christ, primarily in the Sermon on the Mount, of universal, essentially ethical religion, of which the philosophers of antiquity had also been bearers. He had little feeling for the sacramental or the deeply personal elements [repentance, faith, regeneration, etc.] in religion. A universal ethical theism [worship of one personal God], having its highest illustration in Christ, was his idea.²⁴

Though the followers of Fausto Sozzini (Socinians) were concerned to be biblical, the following quotation applies equally to the theology of Socinianism, Unitarianism and the Modernism of the Protestant denominations between the two World Wars and through the Great Depression. ‘Original justice meant for Socinus merely that Adam was free from sin as a fact, not that he was endowed with peculiar gifts; hence Socinus denied the doctrine of original sin entirely.’²⁵ Socinianism was an academic theology. Only what is provable by reason can be Christian truth (as in Kant’s essay, Religion Within the Bounds of Reason).

In the sixteenth century, Poland became a refuge from the Inquisition for ‘heretics,’ including anti-Trinitarian theologians. The most influential of the anti-Trinitarians was the Italian, Fausto Sozzini (ad 1539–1604), nephew of Lelio Sozzini (d. ad 1562). The elder Sozzini trained the younger in his Unitarian views and left to his nephew his unpublished manuscripts. The Sozzinis were in opposition to the Roman Church and in Poland, F. Sozzini (Socinus) was influential in forming a body of Unitarian people whose doctrines are known as Socinianism.

The theology of the younger Sozzini was expounded in the Racovian Catechism in ad 1605 (so named for Racow, the Polish city where it was formulated). According to this theology, mankind was created in the condition of mortality. The first man possessed no high degree of wisdom or knowledge. Since his knowledge was imperfect and his will untried, desire (concupiscence) was stimulated by the command not to eat and being overpowered by it he yielded. It is almost as if God, Himself, were responsible for Adam’s sin. The fall deprived neither Adam nor his descendants of the power of the will to good or evil. There is no inherited inclination to sin. Socinianism holds that scriptural commands to repent and believe show conclusively that ordinary people have inherent power to do either.

Socinianism, remarks Neve (and he could have said the same of later Unitarianism and Modernism), is not a theology of religious people. Neve quotes Harnak as saying ‘The religious motive in the deepest sense is absent in these Italians’ and then comments:

Sin as a condition in man, irrespective of any special sinful act, the solidarity of our race coupled with the conviction of responsibility of the group for the individual and of the individual for the group, the whole matter of sin and grace as expressed in the language of piety, prayer, liturgy and song through the ages—out of this rings a testimony regarding sin as a natural depravity, involving a responsibility that cannot be ignored and a divine grace needed to meet this condition.²⁶

Renaissance rationalism produced Socinianism at the end of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. The same views of Christianity, including doctrines of man and sin, arose in strength under the lengthening impulses of the Renaissance and the rising so-called ‘enlightenment’ of the eighteenth century and still later among the British and American Unitarians. Over the last 150 years, in Modernism, accelerated by recent scientific and philosophic forces, the heresies of Socinianism have been established first, in mainline Protestant colleges, seminaries and churches, and then in their Roman Catholic counterparts with even more drastic departures from orthodoxy.

Socinianism is, of course, with slight modification, the ancient heresy of Pelagianism redivivus.

Wesleyanism

‘Arminianism was to prove, in the person of John Wesley, its possibility of association with as warm-hearted and emotional a type of piety as any interpretation of Christian truth can exhibit.’²⁷

The immediate followers of Arminius (Remonstrants) in the Netherlands quickly retreated from evangelical faith to views similar to Socinianism and practically disappeared from history. As imported to the Church of England, subsequently, Arminianism accompanied sharp spiritual decline; but Wesley and his followers favored what they called Evangelical Arminianism. The modification of Arminianism by Wesley and Wesleyans as well as the genuine revival of biblical religion in the masses, where Methodist preachers extended the revival, demonstrate the justice of the adjective, evangelical.

The Wesleys, John (ad 1703–1791) and Charles (ad 1707–1788), for a season allowed themselves to be yoked with evangelicals of fervent Calvinistic opinions. They were agreed fully in the main as to mankind’s spiritual condition and the cure for it.

The language of Arminius over a century earlier had been so learned and so guarded that his yielding up of Augustinian views of original sin and imputation of Adam’s guilt was not entirely plain. Wesleyanism, on the contrary, is forthright in its doctrinal outlook. I shall cite Richard Watson’s Theological Institutes II for Wesleyan doctrine.

Richard Watson gave the first, and still preeminent systematic treatment of Wesley’s theology. John Wesley never wrote a comprehensive detailed exposition of Christian doctrine. Watson’s Theological Institutes follow the style and methodology of the Calvinist theologians of the time. Charles Hodge thought highly of Watson’s work incidentally remarking ‘the Rev. Richard Watson, whose excellent system of theology, or “Theological Institutes” is deservedly in high repute among Wesleyan Methodists, etc.’²⁸ In 1852 Dr John Brown of Edinburgh characterized Watson as ‘a prince in theology, and the Institutes as the noblest work in Methodism.’ J. W. Alexander compared him to Turretin in theology and Blackstone in law in eminence as the theologian of Methodism.

(At this point it is only fair to make the reader aware that learned and competent theologians of Wesleyan persuasion have carried Wesleyan doctrine of restored ability and Watson’s careful formulations up to date. Among Wesleyan theologians who have addressed these problems are the following: John Miley [Systematic Theology, two vols. New York: Hunt and Eaton, 1892], Henry Orton Wiley [Systematic Theology, three vols. Kansas City: Nazarene Publishing House, 1940]. The three volumes of Thomas C. Oden’s Systematic Theology [San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1920] avoid these problems. Dr Oden intends what he calls ‘consensual theology.’ Evidently he finds no consensus in these matters.)

He was learned, systematic and straightforward both in agreements with other orthodox and in the exposition of early Wesleyanism.

In Watson’s understanding, all mankind were rendered corrupt at heart by the fall. The doctrine of total depravity is fully affirmed. Richard Watson is very explicit and emphatic.²⁹ But what formulations up to date Watson takes away with the left hand he takes back with the right, for the ability of fallen man exists only ‘so far as they are left to themselves.’³⁰ He then asserts that by virtue of the ‘Holy Spirit’ who ‘has been vouchsafed to “the world” through the atonement’ the ability to repent and believe has been universally restored. He says commands imply ability to obey; invitations imply ability to respond favorably. He goes on to say:

It is thus that one part of Scripture is reconciled to another, and both to fact; the declaration of man’s total corruption, with the presumption of his power to return to God, to repent, to break off his sins, which all the commands and invitations to him imply.³¹

Whether imputation of Adam’s guilt to his descendants was mediate or immediate seems irrelevant to Wesley and his followers (though I may have missed something). Robert Dabney, one important Augustinian, thought the distinction seemed over-refined and unnecessary because it solves no problems.³² The orthodox Protestant views begin by affirming universal human guilt for Adam’s sin. This is their distinguishing feature.

Like Arminius, Wesley taught that God had restored to every man the ability to co-operate with God in responding favorably to the gospel, but with a very important difference. For Wesley this is due entirely to God’s grace, hence his soteriology is soundly evangelical. In Arminius, restoration of plenary ability to repent and believe is a matter of justice, demanded of God. God owes it as a debt to justice. It is the same ‘fairness doctrine’ heard today in debate over many social issues and is implicitly a heresy.

If the Scriptures teach anything at all, salvation is not in any respect a matter that God owes sinners. Let us group together several theologians who agree we are sinners in need of grace, corrupt in heart by natural descent from Adam in one way or another, but not guilty and under sentence of death by any guilt for what Adam did.

A recent book by David L. Smith concludes:

Adam's sin created a 'virus' ... tending toward sin, which infects every human being coming into the world, being passed from parent to child in biological transmission. The guilt for sin however, is not imputed to an individual until he recognizes that he is a sinner by apprehending his or her guilt under the law. When that awareness of accountability as a lawbreaker occurs, the virus of sin becomes full-blown and guilt for transgression is then imputed and spiritual death occurs. Thus, those who do not reach a point of awareness and accountability are in a state of imputed innocence in which their sins [what sins?] are covered by the finished work of Christ on Calvary.³³

In this view there is no imputation of guilt for Adam's sin at all. Our sinful tendency is a misfortune but there is no blame to be charged for it. Smith's view is not greatly different from that of the ancient Semi-Pelagians and modern Arminians and of LaPlace (ad 1596–1665) before he 'recanted.'³⁴

Smith also shares essentially the same ground with what theologians call Mediate Imputation. Though the mediate imputation theory will be discussed later, Dr Smith's view merits attention here. The first articulate advocate among American Protestants was a thoroughly converted associate of Jonathan Edwards named Samuel Hopkins (ad 1721–1803), though he did not follow Edward's distinctive teachings. Bold to the point of rashness, he suddenly announced to his congregation (built by his own evangelistic efforts) of slave-traders and slave-owners at Newport, R.I. the demand 'in the name of the Highest' that they all manumit their slaves. 'Only one family left his church; the others freed their slaves,' is the historian's laconic summary of what happened. It was this energetic scholar-preacher who in Puritan New England, among other challenges to the current Calvinist consensus, propounded as his doctrine of 'original sin': 'Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have, and are accountable for no sins but personal.'³⁵

This view is important because it was taught by prominent, influential, godly men, strategically placed. In addition to Hopkins, they were chiefly Nathaniel Emmons (ad 1745–1840) who thought himself to be neither a strict nor moderate Calvinist, but a consistent one; Timothy Dwight (ad 1752–1817) the preacher-president of Yale College whose faithful efforts delayed Yale College in its slide into unbelief; Nathaniel Taylor (ad 1786–1858, professor at Yale Theology Dept., 1822–1858) taught a near-Pelagian doctrine of sin, denying any connection with Adam's sin at all. Charles G. Finney is counted as among this group who while claiming to be Calvinists came in their latest representations to deny not only Calvinism but any Pauline theology of sin. For obvious reasons later theologians have called this line of development the New England or New School of Theology.

Dr David Smith rests his case on Ezekiel 18:1–20, especially v. 20, which he quotes in the niv:

The soul who sins is the one who will die. The son will not share the guilt of the father, nor will the father share the guilt of the son. The righteousness of the righteous man will be credited to him, and the wickedness of the wicked will be charged against him (Ezek. 18:20).

He comments: 'Ezekiel is very clear, then, that the guilt of the fathers is not charged against their children. Thus we may be sure that Adam's guilt has not been passed on to us. The idea of inherited guilt contradicts the biblical teaching here.'³⁶ Earlier Smith writes, 'Augustine's doctrine that all human beings are made guilty because of Adam's sin is simply unbiblical. Ezekiel disposes of such a concept.³⁷

There are many false assumptions, errors of exegesis and misconstructions in those two sentences. One hesitates to oppose and forcibly reject sincerely held opinions of a fellow evangelical writer, but once noticed, the errors must be addressed. Anti-Augustinian writers for centuries who cite texts supposed to forbid any race guilt for Adam's disobedience usually also cite Deuteronomy 24:16: 'Fathers shall not be put to death because of their children, nor shall children be put to death because of their fathers. Each one shall be put to death for his own sin.' Let us attend to what these passages really say in the literary and historical context of each. They present no objection whatsoever to the immediate imputation of Adam's sin to each of his descendants. If they did the objection would apply as well to the imputation of Christ's righteousness to believers.

1. The precise question proposed by the exiles in Babylon whom Ezekiel was addressing related to the still recent destruction of Jerusalem by Babylonian forces, slaughter of many inhabitants, captivity of others to Babylon and break-up of the political commonwealth of Judah under the house of David. The younger generation in Babylon were complaining that they in Babylon were suffering for the sins of their ancestors in 'the land of Israel' (v. 2). There had indeed been a covenant between the Lord and their ancestors. The punishments by God on them and their offspring if they broke covenant are amply described in Deuteronomy 28. They are complaining about the alleged injustice of God in making them suffer for what their ancestors in 'the land of Israel' had done. Ezekiel is therefore setting the record straight that whatever Providence had done in the sad end of the Judean kingdom, His ways are 'equal.' Not one of them would die in punishment for his father's sins if he disapproved of those sins and did not repeat them.

2. This text has no reference at all to spiritual death and eternal life whatsoever. As far as our race of sinners is concerned, God kills millions of us every day. Some He takes to heaven and some to hell. We have no recourse. As for rewards and punishments on the human scale, no magistrate may justly set the children's teeth on edge (Jer. 31:29; Ezek. 18:2) for parental sins, and neither may he inflict the ultimate penalty on parents for the next generation's crimes, nor the converse. Neither Ezekiel 18 nor Deuteronomy 24 is relevant in the remotest manner to the subject of original sin.

3. If one were to allow that Ezekiel 18:23 applies somehow to some form of a doctrine of guilt or non-guilt for Adam's sin one runs into irreconcilable conflict with Exodus 20:5 which says, 'I the Lord your God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity [lawon, guilt, punishment] of the fathers on the children to the third and the fourth generation of those who hate me.' God, it seems clear, can do as He pleases about such matters, whatever the magistrates and conquerors contemplated in Ezekiel 18 ought or ought not to do.

4. Furthermore, Dr Smith and others who deny we were born guilty sinners deny what Scripture specifically affirms, viz.: that we are all guilty before we come to consciousness, conceived in sin, children of wrath by nature and that Paul at least five times connects that wage of sin directly with what Adam did (Rom. 5:12–19). In the Bible, death, while not often inflicted on account of one's own sins or of one's parents (as Jesus was careful to say; see John 9; Luke 13), is without exception the penalty for sin of some kind by someone. In case of infants the death for sin is not their personal sins, for they have not personally committed any, but their first male ancestor's sin. The Bible is perfectly clear about this.

5. The probationary arrangement was with Adam not Adam and Eve. What is not plain with the dropping from the niv of the singular thee and thou and even the plural ye (second person plural) of personal pronouns, is perfectly plain in the kjv and all older Versions. Those fateful words in Genesis 2:16, 17 were passed on to Eve by Adam, no doubt (Gen. 2:23), but the command was to the man and the issues lay with him and him alone. The effort of David Smith³⁸ and J. L. Garrett³⁹ to make Eve equally with Adam the bearer of the responsibility is negated not only by the narrative of Genesis but by every subsequent reference to the matter in the Bible. 'In Adam all die' 'through one man that sinned.'

Dr Smith's theory has much in common with the mediate imputation theory associated at the beginning with the name of LaPlace. Description and evaluation of that view follows shortly.

Under the rubric of 'original sin' we have already shown that the Bible clearly indicates that all mankind are corrupt at heart, under the just punishment of death and that this is because of shared guilt for Adam's first act of sin in his probationary state.

'[W]hile there has been difference of opinion and looseness of statement as to the grounds of our just accountability for Adam's first sin, the whole Church [including Roman Catholic] has always regarded our loss of original righteousness and innate moral corruption to be just.'⁴⁰

Supplement on Romans 5:12–19

Christian theology of every age has been driven to the doctrine of 'original sin' (to employ the usual term) by the plain sense of Romans 5:12–21. I shall presume the reader's acquaintance with the passage and beg the reader to open a standard translation to the passage before going on here. My statements will be brief and to the point. First let us look at the passage as a whole.

1. The theme of Romans 5:12–19 is righteousness and life through Christ, as it has been from Romans 3:21 onward to 5:11. The teaching of our unity with Adam in his sin and condemnation is introduced to serve as help to understand our oneness with Christ in righteousness and life.

2. The goal of Paul in the passage is to help sinners to understand forgiveness of sin and life in Christ by finding a reverse parallel of forgiveness of sin and life in Christ with sin and death in Adam 'who was a type [Gr. tupos] of the one who was to come' (Rom. 5:14, last clause).

3. As in all biblical types and parables the correspondences are not in every respect, but usually only one. So here the correspondence is only in respect of a certain oneness with Adam and oneness with Christ. Paul calls attention to differences between our oneness in and with Adam and our oneness in and with Christ by several negatives—'the free gift is not like the trespass,' v. 15; again, 'the free gift is not like,' etc., v. 16; and several contrasts indicated by the adversative conjunction, 'but,' vv. 15, 16, 20.

4. Paul's emphasis and our interest here is in the first member of the comparison-contrast, i.e. what

Adam gave us (what we have in him) in his fall, rather than what we have in Christ.

5. Let us note seven statements of the text as to what happened to us all (the human race) when Adam sinned, beginning with verse 12. Emphasis is added.

(i) ‘sin came into the world through one man, and death through sin’ (v. 12)

(ii) ‘so death spread to all men because all sinned’ (v. 12)

(iii) ‘many died through one man’s trespass’ (v. 15)

(iv) ‘the result of that one man’s sin ... the judgement following one trespass brought condemnation’ (v. 16)

(v. ‘because of one man’s trespass, death reigned through that one man’ (v. 17)

(vi) ‘as one trespass led to condemnation for all men’ (v. 18)

(vii) ‘by the one man’s disobedience the many were made sinners’ (v. 19)

6. The evidence is plain: in and through Adam’s act of sin the human race en toto, as a whole, immediately (no lapse of time until we each could be born) became sinners.

7. The decisive terms are ‘all sinned’ (v. 12, past tense, aorist active) and ‘made sinners’ (v. 19, past tense, aorist active).

(a) As to the first, ‘because all sinned’ (ef ho pantes hēmarton) (v. 12); the usual aorist tense as used here indicates a ‘punctiliar’ act in the past. ‘All sinned,’ not ‘have sinned’ (which would normally require the Greek perfect tense), is the right translation as most recognize, even those who interpret the sense as the personal act of sinning which every human being of accountable age commits. The rest of the passage, which six times more connects our guilt and corruption to Adam’s one act of disobedience tells us we should seek no other meaning. The comment of the learned Dean of Canterbury, commenting on ‘all sinned’ (pantes hēmarton), is on target:

Observe how entirely this assertion of the Apostle contradicts the Pelagian or individualistic view of man, that each is a separate creation from God, existing solely on his exclusive responsibility—and affirms the Augustinian or traducian view, that all are involved by God’s appointment from an original stock, and though individually responsible are generically in the corruption and condemnation [emphasis added] of their original.⁴¹

(b) A second decisive term, ‘were made sinners’ or simply ‘became sinners,’ falls in this sentence: ‘For as by the one man’s disobedience many were made [the verb is active, literally “many became sinners”] sinners, so by the one man’s obedience many will be made righteous.’ Paul is summarizing his doctrine of righteousness by our solidarity with Christ in His righteousness by paralleling it with our solidarity in Adam. The former is assumed as known to illustrate the latter. The way we become one with Christ is not the same as the way we became one with Adam but the onenesses do exist and are parallel. ‘Were made’ and ‘will be made’ are in each case one word, kathistēmi, which in these two cases means ‘make, cause’ (someone to become something) (Bauer, Gingrich, Danker, Lexicon). TDNT observes that the meaning of the Greek word in this context is about the same as ginomai (to become).

So we each became a sinner in Adam. When he sinned, we did. Paul does not explain the mode but simply that what he did constituted each of us a guilty sinner—‘condemned already’ (John 3:18) ‘by nature children of wrath’ (Eph. 2:3).

The fact that death is the universal destiny of everyone conceived in the womb is a melancholy note pervasive through Scripture, human history and personal reflections. It is this that gives the good news both its urgency and glory: ‘so that, as sin reigned in death, grace also might reign through righteousness leading to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord ... For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord’ (Rom. 5:21; 6:23).

The literature on Romans 5:12–21 is extensive, much of it focusing on verse 12. Every form of orthodox theology has a special interest in it. I shall leave the matter where it stands here. Those equipped to examine the critical commentaries may do so. They are (in my opinion) apt to emerge from their efforts with the necessity to return to the rather stark facts in the above summary.

¹ Norman Geisler, Chosen But Free (Minneapolis: Bethany House, 1999), pp. 232–234.

² Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint 1970), pp. 330, 331.

³ J. C. Ayer, Jr, A Source Book for Ancient Church History (New York: 1913), p. 461; as reported by Williston Walker, A History of the Christian Church (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1918), p. 186.

⁴ Henry Bettenson Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (London and New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 76.

Bettenson Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church

⁵ ibid., Section VI, pp. 73–88.

⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 597.

⁷ Henry Bettenson, Documents, note 1, p. 84; Richard Kyle in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 1000; Williston Walker, History of the Christian Church, p. 188.

⁸ Bettenson, Documents, pp. 84–88.

⁹ Richard Kyle, ‘Semi-Pelagianism’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 1000.

¹⁰ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics II (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), see footnotes 28, 29, 30, pp. 542, 543.

- ¹¹ Timothy Ware, The Orthodox Church (Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1963, 1972), pp. 226, 230.
- ¹² W. G. T. Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine II (New York: Scribner, 1872), pp. 26–42, summarized pp. 41, 42.
- ¹³ So agree A. M. Hunter, The Teaching of Calvin: A Modern Interpretation (Westwood NJ: Revell, 2nd ed., 1950), pp. 93–134; Wilhelm Niesel, The Theology of Calvin, trans. H. Knight (Phila: Westminster, 1956), pp. 159–181; Francois Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (New York: Harper & Row, 1950), pp. 263–284.
- ¹⁴ C. Hodge, Systematic Theology II, p. 316.
- Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes
- ¹⁵ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 772 and 778.
- ¹⁶ I devote an entire chapter to ‘the Extent of the Atonement’ in Christology.
- ¹⁷ James Arminius, The Works of Arminius II, trans. by James Nichols (Buffalo, NY: Derby, Miller and Orton 1853), p. 379.
- ¹⁸ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 602.
- ¹⁹ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 602.
- ²⁰ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 602.
- ²¹ Arminius, Works II, p. 498.
- ²² Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, pp. 186, 187.
- ²³ Williston Walker, History of the Christian Church, p. 330.
- ²⁴ Walker, History of the Christian Church, p. 330.
- ²⁵ H. Pope, ‘Socinianism’ in Catholic Encyclopedia XIV, pp. 113–115.
- ²⁶ Neve, Christian Thought, p. 85.
- ²⁷ Walker, History of the Christian Church, p. 456.
- ²⁸ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology III (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 190.
- ²⁹ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes II, ed. I. M. McClintock, 20th ed. (New York: Nelson &

Richard Watson, Theological Institutes II, ed. J. W. McCulloch, 2nd ed. (New York: Nelson & Phillips, 1850), pp. 43–48.

³⁰ ibid., p. 85.

³¹ ibid., p. 86.

³² Robert Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, first published in 1878, 1972), p. 339.

³³ David L. Smith, With Willful Intent: A Theology of Sin (Wheaton, IL: Victor Books, 1994), p. 371.

³⁴ Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, p. 17 ff.

³⁵ From Memoir of Emmons, See art. Samuel Hopkins in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia IV, p. 334.

³⁶ David L. Smith, With Willful Intent, p. 368.

³⁷ Smith, With Willful Intent, p. 366.

³⁸ Smith, With Willful Intent, p. 370, 371.

³⁹ J. L. Garrett, Systematic Theology: Biblical, Historical & Evangelical I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), pp. 483–493.

⁴⁰ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 353.

⁴¹ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers (Chicago: Moody Press, repr., n.d.), p. 881.

TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (385). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

Analysis of the Problem of Imputation of Sin and a Proposed Solution

Before attempting a brief summary of my own views of this particularly complicated subject we should bless the humility of the many truly devout scholars who have dared to explore this only partly revealed mystery of Scripture. In the heat of debate they may forget that we may not have sufficient capacity to understand all that God knows about it. The theologians—Roman, Orthodox, Calvinist,

Lutheran, Wesleyan—try to be respectful of one another and the unknown, but no statement I have read puts the matter better than does O. W. Heick. Speaking of the reluctance of a certain cast of mind to accept either imputation of Adam’s sin or Christ’s righteousness, he says:

Here all human analogies fail. To the replies which have been given concerning the position of the old Socinians we add this remark: there are certain mysterious truths which cannot and need not be proven by cold arguments. We all feel that death lies in sin (Rom. 6:23). If we could die not only the physical but also the eternal death of absolute separation from God and still live—then we could save ourselves. But we cannot, and therefore we need Christ as Savior. He, the God-man, was the only one who could die and still conquer death. It is in this consideration that we behold the mysterious philosophy of redemption. He who objects to this cannot be helped by rationalizing arguments; a capacity for the spiritual and for that which is truly religious is needed.¹

Three Common Approaches

No one can wonder why Adam, himself, should have been accounted guilty and worthy of punishment, but how, i.e. on what grounds in justice, all mankind since, as we have sufficiently noted, came justly to be accounted guilty is nowhere clearly stated in Scripture. This imputation of guilt for Adam’s sin to us all has been explained in different ways by those whose thinking is strictly Protestant and orthodox and concerned to be faithful to Scripture. I am in debt to many good authors for much of the following analysis.

(1) A not uncommon approach is to accept the revealed facts without attempting to explain or integrate into a theology of imputation. Our just guilt for Adam’s sin is accepted as truth revealed unmistakably by Scripture. No systematic attempt is made to explain it. Somehow we were all on probation in and with Adam. Just what the mode of union with him may be is not fully worked out. The fact that every human being including Eve (from Adam’s flesh) was ancestrally ‘in Adam’ (1 Cor. 1 5:22; cf. Gen. 5:3) points to some substantial unity in him. We know nothing at all of how God created the worlds but ‘by faith we understand’ it was ‘by the Word of God’ and we understand that ‘sin came into the world through one man ... because all sinned’ and ‘so death spread to all’ (Rom. 5:12–19). This is the reason why every descendant of Adam is by nature a child of wrath (Eph. 2:3). A preacher or theologian of this turn of mind trusts God’s Word to tell the truth and since God sent His Son to die for us ‘while we were yet sinners’ he can proclaim that God Himself must believe it and so should we.

The great exponent of orthodox Lutheranism in America, C. P. Krauth, says regarding this problem:

[O]ur Confession [at the Augsburg Diet] ... does not define how [his emphasis] THEORETICALLY, the sin of Adam is related to us; does not touch the question of imputation at all ... the doctrine of imputation, belongs to scientific theology.... We cannot recall a single passage in any of our Confessions, in which the imputation of Adam’s sin is alluded to ... as an Article of Faith.... These expressions ... do not exclude the doctrine of imputation.... It is a question of theology, as distinguished from the sphere of faith.²

J. A. Dörner traced the history of Lutheran views of original sin and its transmission. He showed that though discussed by earliest theologians there was no agreement beyond that having lost original righteousness, Adam 'could not bequeath it to his descendants; on the contrary, being himself corrupt, he could only transmit a corrupt nature.'³ In the scholastic period of Protestant theology (1600s) both immediate imputation (i.e. we directly share) and mediate (we indirectly share) in a corrupt nature found advocates. Then by degrees (through Quenstedt, Hollatz and Gerhard) and others the Federal (or representative view) entered Lutheran theology as it did also in Reformed.⁴

(2) Many others no less convinced of the doctrine of original sin in Adam as well as our guilt and depravity on account of it find sufficient explanation in our natural union with Adam. They observe that Eve was taken out of Adam; that Adam begat Seth in his own image; that Seth and all other offspring of our first parents surviving the Flood and onward through the generations were mediately created by God in and through natural generation by male and female parents. The doctrine that body and soul of infants are procreated by parents (Traducianism) must be assumed. Stated in somewhat more sophisticated language: 'Seminally [as seed] all Adam's progeny were present in him.' Reference is made to parallels such as 'Levi ... paid tithes through Abraham ... [when] still in the loins of his ancestor' (Abraham) (Heb. 7:9, 10).

The posterity were not vicariously represented ... because representation implies absence of the party represented ... and this first sin is deservedly imputed to them because in this generic [i.e. the whole human genus] manner it was committed by them.⁵

Guilt for Adam's sin, both in the sense of blameworthiness and of obligation to bear the punishment, is rightly deserved by all Adam's progeny inasmuch as in our common nature we were all actors. Shedd comments:

The imputation of Adam's sin [to all the race] upon this theory, differs from the imputation of Christ's righteousness [to all the elect], in being deserved. In support it can be said the Bible consistently says fallen men deserve eternal death whereas in Christ the believer has imputed to him the righteousness of Another and receives the blessedness Another earned.⁶

This is essentially the Augustinian theory found implicitly in many passages of Calvin's writings and explicitly in the early literature of Lutheranism, including the Formula of Concord.

(3) There is a third approach in which as in the views above described, guilt for Adam's sin is accepted as a fact. An explanation is attempted by the theory of representative (or forensic or Federal) union with Adam. As reduced to a bare-bones description by a moderate but convinced advocate:

The Federal View presupposes that natural relation. Adam stands before God [Eve is not involved] ... as a free, responsible, fallible moral agent, with an animal body and a generative nature [i.e. living fleshly body and power to beget offspring; the soul is not generated by parents]. Without a miracle his children must be carried along with him in his destinies.... God, therefore ... graciously constituted him the federal head and representative of his race as a whole, and promised him for himself and for all, eternal life of confirmed holiness and happiness, on condition of temporary obedience under favorable conditions, with the penalty for him and for them of death, or condemnation and desertion, on condition of disobedience.^{7 8}

The development of this theory came to full development among Calvinists about a century after Calvin wrote the Institutes. Correct or not, it had the good effect of eliminating Supralapsarianism (i.e. hyper-Calvinism) among Calvinists. It came to be widely accepted among Lutherans, Arminian groups and even among some Roman Catholic theologians. As later formulated under the aegis of theologians who employ ‘covenant’ as their main motif in biblical interpretation, ‘covenant’ became another common name for the representative or Federal theory.⁹ (John Murray is a model of scholarly reserve developing this theory in Imputation of Adam’s Sin.¹⁰) Buswell seems unfair in calling the realism of Shedd and Strong the ‘substantive view.’¹¹ It is very significant, I think, that the idea that God’s probationary arrangement for Adam was a ‘Covenant of Works’ (as advocates of this view have been saying for 300 years) has now been reconsidered by prominent Reformed theologians. John Murray set the reconsideration in motion with the following, posthumously published in 1977. Significantly entitling his chapter, ‘The Adamic Administration’ he said:

This administration has often been denoted ‘The Covenant of Works.’ There are two [really four] observations. (1) The term is not felicitous, for the reason that the elements of grace entering into the administration are not properly provided for by the term ‘works.’ (2) It is not designated a covenant in Scripture.... Besides [3] Scripture always uses the term covenant, when applied to God’s administration to men, in reference to a provision that is redemptive or closely related to redemptive design. Covenant in Scripture denotes the oath-bound confirmation of promise and involves a security the Adamic economy did not bestow. [4] It should never be confused with what Scripture calls the old covenant or first covenant.... The view that in the Mosaic covenant there was a repetition of the so-called covenant of works, current among covenant theologians is a grave misconception and ... fails to assess the uniqueness of the Adamic administration.¹²

Covenant and Covenants in the Westminster ‘Standards’

The Westminster Standards of the 1640s were composed at the very end of the ‘Reformation Era’ (Treaty of Westphalia ad 1648) when the theory of representative (Federal) headship had not yet been fully articulated. It was inevitable that in the heat of debate since that time between advocates of natural headship and advocates of representative headship, the support of the Standards should be claimed by each party, especially the party of covenant theology and the representative headship of Adam.

Perry Miller, a preeminent scholar of Puritan thought and author of many scholarly works on Puritanism (and English Calvinism) pointed out the greatly complicated theology of the Puritan Calvinism of the early 1600s as compared with the clear simplicity of Calvin’s Institutes. Miller had in mind in part the elaborate theology of covenants and dispensations, which arose partly in conflict with Anabaptists in defense of the practice of infant baptism.¹³ Both Luther and Zwingli at first thought they were ‘obliged to demand faith before baptism as indispensable, in opposition to external magic’ (i.e. baptismal regeneration).¹⁴ Some of the language of covenants of works and of grace is embodied in the Westminster Confession. J. Pelikan says all writers of that time employed ‘covenant’ in setting forth Christian doctrines¹⁵ much as today we throw around words formerly rare such as charismatic and existential. Sometimes they are employed in a specific sense, but more often in a broad general sense. It appears to many that the word ‘covenant’ is used in this broad sense in the Westminster Confession (chap. VII) and the Larger Catechism, viz.: ‘the covenant being made with Adam, as a public person, not for himself only but for his posterity’ (Q. 22). This language does not directly support ‘covenant theology’ with all its refinements; nor is it unacceptable for those who reject it. As for ‘Adam as a public person,’ etc., the Catechism goes on in a way fully acceptable to natural (seminal) headship, saying, ‘[A]ll mankind, descending from him by ordinary generation (Acts 17:26), sinned in him, and fell with him in that first transgression (Gen. 2:11; Rom. 5:12–20; 1 Cor. 15:21, 22).’ Later it says ‘Original sin is conveyed from our first parents unto their posterity by natural generation, so as all that proceed from them in that way, are conceived and born in sin’ (Q. 26). This language with its near implicit Traducianism is far less amenable to representative headship than to natural (seminal) headship. It seems to me no zealous advocate of covenant theology and/or representative headship would have written such answers as these, so unfavorable to their position. Advocates of natural (seminal) headship could ask for no better support in such a document than the third article of chapter VI of the Confession: our first parents ‘being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed, and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity descending from them by ordinary generation.’

It seems to me therefore inaccurate to say, as it is frequently affirmed, that the Federal headship theory of Cocceius was espoused by the Westminster Standards.¹⁶ Thousands of ministers who have sworn allegiance to the Standards have not thought so.

The language of Westminster is the language of Traducianism and the idea of ‘undistributed humanity’ in Adam (Shedd), very foreign to the doctrine that human bodies only are generated by human parents, the higher part, the soul, of each being created immediately by God.

Difficulties of Each View

There are difficulties with each of the three chief views just described. The first suffers from indecisiveness. Inquiring minds will not rest there. Earnest and informed thinking Christians will seek some explanation of how it is that the guilt of Adam’s sin is imputed to us. The theory of natural or seminal headship, sometimes called ‘realism,’ claiming a real seminal presence of us all in the total of human nature in Adam, is somewhat embarrassed by the question, asked even by Traducianists: How can a nature be guilty? Persons are guilty, not natures. And what is a nature?

The theory of representative, or Federal headship, especially as stated by Charles Hodge, its leading advocate, is embarrassed by different objections: 1) If our souls are not generated by our parents but directly created by God, how does it come that these souls are at no moment of their existence without evil tendency, i.e. depravity? It is unthinkable that God should create souls depraved from the first moment of existence. 2) One need not be a sophisticated scholar to sense intuitively that the Federal theory involving so-called covenants of this or of that is ‘extra-scriptural’ (A. H. Strong’s term). The lay reader of the Genesis accounts of creation and fall and Paul’s interpretation of the same (Rom. 5) finds nothing remotely like the word covenant and no one else seems to have done so until, as someone wrote, it was ‘made in Holland.’ Further, as good scholars point out, it seems to contradict the plain language of Romans 5:19 and 12. Verse 19 plainly says, ‘...’

by the one man's disobedience the many were made [constituted] sinners' and verse 12 declares death 'passed upon all men' (kjv) not because God imputed Adam's sin to them or regarded them as sinners but because 'all sinned.' The cause of their being sinners was something 'all' did, not something God did. The Federal view requires that just as the righteousness imputed, to the saved and the sin imputed to Christ are alien, i.e. not properly belonging to the persons, so the guilt and corruption imputed to all mankind are alien, i.e. not deserved. Yet Paul distinctly places the ground of the one in contrast to the other (Rom. 5:15–19). The one point of comparison in the passage (Rom. 5:12–19) is unity of the race in Adam on the one hand and in Christ on the other. But, says Paul, otherwise all is different. Robert Dabney, who incorporated representation into his view said: 'The imputation of Adam's sin was a transaction of strict, judicial righteousness, the other transaction was one of glorious, grace.'

3) Another point of contrast between imputation of Adam's sin to us and of ours to Christ has to do with consent. As again Dabney pointed out, 'Adam's infant children receive the imputation, when they are incapable of a rational option or assent about it.' But 'Christ's bearing our imputed guilt was conditional on His own previous voluntary consent. See John 10:18. All theologians, so far as I know, regard this as essential to a just imputation of [alien] sin directly to Him.'¹⁷ These are only the first and obvious questions.

Theories of 'Mediate Imputation'

The Reformed churches of France in the sixteenth century had an important theological school in the university town of Saumur. At this school a Scottish professor named John Cameron in a brief tenure (ad 1618–1624) influenced three of his students toward considerable modification of Reformed (or Augustinian) doctrines. Among the most influential of his students were Moses Amyraut, Joshua LaPlace and Louis Cappel. Each of these earnest men contributed greatly to Christian scholarship in his day. They developed a theory of original sin and race guilt for Adam's sin (i.e. of imputation of Adam's sin) known to history as 'Mediate Imputation.' The apparent motive in this theory is to relieve God of the appearance of injustice in assigning guilt for an act we had no personal part in and certainly no previous agreement to be associated with and to avoid problems with what has come to be called 'immediate' imputation as in both the 'natural' headship and 'representative' headship forms of Reformation doctrine. LaPlace taught that every member of the race derives a corrupt (depraved) nature from Adam and that we are condemned because we are guilty of corruption, not for any identity with Adam in his probation and fall. Depravity was not and is not part of the penalty we receive for Adam's sin. We receive it by natural generation and are condemned because each of us is personally bad. Our 'legal' status as guilty is based on our condition, not the other way around.

Over a period of decades the churches wrestled with the learned arguments propounded. LaPlace finally was threatened with ecclesiastical censure for obviously denying what his peers saw as the plain teaching of Romans 5:12–21, whereupon he retracted sufficiently to acknowledge race-wide guilt of Adam's first sin but had meant to assert that though all are guilty of Adam's sin, the guilt is dependent on our sharing his corrupt nature, not the act of apostasy by which he failed probation.

This view, not surprisingly, has had great appeal to many. Yet when one accepts, as Scripture compels us to do, and indeed historically, as most official Protestantism does, that spiritual death is only a different name for depravity, or estrangement from God, and that the spiritual death we share from conception onward was and is God's just punishment for Adam's sin, mediate imputation becomes utterly unacceptable.

Furthermore, the Scripture plainly declares that God's sentence of condemnation was imposed on every man for the specific sin of one man. Mediate imputation denies this and moves the cause of the sentence of death to the depravity of each man. In Scripture Adam's guilt was and is the cause of depravity while mediate imputation makes depravity, inherited from Adam (not imputed), the cause of guilt of Adam's sin.

Mediate imputation in effect denies any imputation of Adam's sin at all. LaPlace was justly charged with this denial and, rather than accept discipline of the French church, inconsistently affirmed guilt for Adam's sin—but insisted still that it is mediately applied. In this system Adam had probation but mankind did not.

Mediate imputation denies the parallel between Adam and Christ so prominent in Romans 5:12–21. Advocates of mediate imputation (as does also Dr David Smith referred to earlier) argue it is unjust ever, under any circumstances, even by God, to be punished for the sins of another and that this is sufficient reason to reject immediate imputation of Adam's sin. It seems apparent that all theories of indirect (or mediate imputation of the original sin of Adam or Adam and Eve) rest on the feeling that it is wrong for God to punish one person for the sins of another person. Those who think this way (and who does not at least have the thought cross the mind?) should correct their thinking by reading such passages of Scripture as the following: 'I the Lord ... am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity [punishment] of the fathers on the children to the third and the fourth generation' (Exod. 20:5). There were doubtless some believing Jews in Jerusalem in ad 70 but Jesus said 'all the righteous blood [of the prophets of the O.T.] ... will come upon this generation' (Matt. 23:35, 36). Think of all the personally 'innocent' children who perished in the divine wrath of the Flood as also at Sodom and Gomorrah, the Midianite and Canaanite exterminations. It would be equally unjust for God to visit upon the Son the 'iniquity of us all'—to make 'him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him' (2 Cor. 5:21 kjv).

I share the impatience of many orthodox Protestant writers who regret the amount of attention that apparently must be paid to refutation of the theory of mediate imputation, a view attractive to some.

A Proposed Resolution: Probationary Unity Based on Natural (Seminal) Solidarity

1. Let us make a fresh start by defining what imputation is and by clarifying what is meant by guilt for Adam's sin.

'Imputation' and 'impute' in legal, or forensic context, mean to assign responsibility for something, whether of evil to be punished or of good to be rewarded. Synonyms are reckon, think, regard, attribute, judge, charge. The Protestant English Bible (kjv) for nearly four centuries has pretty well fixed the sense of the word in theological discussion from the thirteen occurrences in the Bible. The Hebrew and Greek words receive many other translations in kjv. The Hebrew word ḥashav is rendered impute in Psalm 32:2; 'Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth [emphasis added] not iniquity.' The Greek translation quoted by Paul at Romans 4:8 says 'Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute [emphasis added] sin' employing logidzomai. Elsewhere in kjv and in more recent translations these words are rendered regard, account, esteem, reckon, think, suppose in both Testaments. The two words have a near equivalent range of meaning. The courtroom verdicts, 'guilty, as charged' and 'not guilty' convey the sense. When we read, 'He who justifies the wicked and he who condemns the righteous are both alike an abomination to the Lord' (Prov. 17:15), 'justifies' is imputation of innocence and 'condemns' is imputation of guilt, though in each case wrongfully.

Guilt has been defined earlier in these pages (a) In a non-legal, personal sense guilt is inherent demerit, blameworthiness. Some older theologians call this 'potential guilt'—the intrinsic, moral evil and ill desert of anything one is or does. It is said to be of the essence of sin, the permanent character of its moral evil. When the sun is cold, the moon is old and the leaves of the judgment book unfold it will ever be true that so and so did such and such an evil deed and was such and such a man at a particular time. This kind of guilt was Adam's and his alone as regards his first sin of disobedience. Since I did not then exist as a person, except in God's foreknowledge, Adam's personal guilt cannot be mine.

(b) The legal or forensic sense is something else. Legal guilt is what the court says it is, in what after due deliberation, the judicial authority (judge or jury) declares to be the case. Courts cannot decree or determine ethical character but they can declare the accused guilty or not guilty.

Neither God nor man has declared any of Adam's progeny guilty for what he did in the sense of personal wrong-doing. It is the second that concerns us. We have before showed we are guilty of Adam's sin in God's court. We proceed assuming that we are guilty, that God has justly determined we are guilty, corrupt and punishable. The question being addressed is not if we are justly guilty of Adam's sin but upon what ground does God hold us guilty?

2. The imputation of Adam's sin to his progeny through the generations has been declared unjust by critics of the teaching. An answer on rational grounds would take us far aside from present goals, though there is much to cite from Scripture as to parallels and precedents in God's dealings with men to demonstrate that God acts justly in such matters, as Lincoln was pleased to quote: 'the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether' (Ps. 19:9 kjv). This imputation has no strict parallels, being a unique event. We cannot be required to defend God's justice to unbelievers to their satisfaction at this juncture, though the effort has been made and is fruitful.¹⁸

We can, however, cite many biblical statements and precedents wherein God did hold family and others in solidarity with their progenitor or civil or legal head and thereby guilty and punishable.¹⁹

Let us look at some of them. One of the most impressive is Exodus 20:5 where in enforcing the command against idolatry God said He will visit 'the iniquity of the fathers on the children to the third and the fourth generation of those who hate me.' Similarly, Rahab's whole family was delivered by her own personal faith (Josh. 6:25); the utter destruction of the Amelekites in King Saul's time was on account of what their ancestors did centuries earlier (1 Sam. 15:2, 3 and following; cf. Exod. 17:8–16); the national judgment on the Israel of Jesus' time for the treatment of their Messiah by national leaders (Matt. 23:32–38; cf. 1 Thess. 2:14–16 'your house is left to you desolate'—Jesus; 'God's wrath has come upon them at last'—Paul). Theological writers cite many more with impressive comments in support of this principle, which they, I think somewhat inaccurately (and I shall explain), call ‘representative.’

These citations, especially the last one, wherein Paul declares God’s present judgment on the Jewish people, so offend current ‘correct’ sociological taste one hardly dare even mention them. Some who are a bit biblically literate cite Deuteronomy 24:16 against imputation of Adam’s guilt to any one except Adam himself: ‘Fathers shall not be put to death because of their children, nor shall children be put to death because of their fathers. Each one shall be put to death for his own sin.’ The text is, however, part of a large section of Mosaic instruction and exhortation on the subject of the administration of human (albeit divinely given) civil law. It had to do with a political constitution. In such a setting there must be no imputation of guilt except to the person of the transgressor. The same must be said of Ezekiel 18:20, cited I think mindlessly through the generations by opponents of the clear biblical affirmation of universal guilt, punished by spiritual death, for Adam’s sin, viz.: ‘The soul who sins shall die. The son shall not suffer for the iniquity of the father, nor the father suffer for the iniquity [Heb. lawon, guilt, punishment] of the son. The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon himself, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon himself.’ As I pointed out earlier the audience in Babylon whom the prophet was addressing had been complaining that they were unjustly suffering in a foreign land for the sins of their immediate ancestors in Israel only a few years before. Ezekiel reminded them they also deserved to die for their own sins and would do so except they repent. This is the meaning of Ezekiel 18:20 and context—like Jesus’ words to similar inquirers in the thirteenth chapter of Luke.

These texts are irrelevant to the subject of imputation of Adam’s guilt to us. All of us are worthy of death and unless united with Christ in regeneration and justified by faith, already dead in trespasses and sins. So though God is not unjust to take the lives of infants and the unborn by the millions, every discerning Christian is horrified to contemplate this being done by mothers and fathers or abortionists. Yet God is inflicting punishment for Adam’s sin (hardly their own personal sins) in each case. In the race of man, death at any age and by whatever cause or means is the curse put on Adam. If infants were not guilty in some true sense they would not die. God’s providence is not absent from even senseless wars, massacres and murders.

3. The human race, dead, living and yet unborn, are not simply an aggregate of individuals. We are an organic, substantial unity by natural descent from one man whose very name was Adam, man, mankind—not simply the male but the species. Eve was also out of the man Adam (Gen. 2:23). True we are all descended from Eve ‘the mother of all living’ (Gen. 3:20), but that is unimportant to the imputation of the sin of the head of our race, as pointed out in an earlier chapter of this book, Part 2.1, ‘The Origin and Unity of Man by Creation.’ This is acknowledged by all party to the debate over the basis of imputation. Though some who endorse a purely representative headship of Adam declare each human soul is directly created by God, de novo, they still regard the above as correct—even C. A. Hodge who is almost unique in insistence that ‘immediate imputation’ excludes any real presence of our generic human essence in Adam. It is the burden of Genesis 1–5 to highlight this natural unity (1:26–28, 30; 3:20; 4:1–3; 4:26 and all of chap. 5; 9:19 and 32). J. H. Thornwell, though committed to the scheme of covenants of works and grace acknowledged: ‘... I am free to confess that I cannot escape from the doctrine, however mysterious, of a generic unity in man as the true basis of the representative economy in the covenant of works’ and explains at length.²⁰

The Genesis narrative is the obvious ground of Paul's summary statements of our unity in Adam's sin in Romans 5; Acts 17; and 1 Corinthians 15.

4. This substantial unity includes both body and soul of every one of Adam's progeny. I shall not here repeat arguments in the anthropology section of this book that are presupposed here.

5. The Genesis narrative theology is equally plain that Adam and his descendants with him formed a unity in the probation of Eden. This in my judgment is no less certain than the natural, organic unity of the human race. Probationary unity rather than 'covenant unity' or 'representation' is the preferable term for several reasons.

None of these terms—covenant or probation—appears expressly in the narrative. The extensive and ingenious efforts of C. A. Hodge, Louis Berkhof, Robert Reymond and others to find all the elements of a covenant, as they understand a covenant of works in Eden, are not without merit.²¹ Yet the idea of covenant is not obvious in the passage. Proponents agree it is absent from pre-Reformation writings. It was a 'discovery' catalyzed by questions aroused by the immemorial, but hardly original practice of infant baptism. The Anabaptist martyrs made the problem acute.

Though I prefer not to call the probationary arrangement a covenant, I recognize one may call it a covenant in some general sense without adopting the system of 'covenant theology.' That this does not necessarily follow is evident in that Baptists such as John Gill—than whom no greater Baptist theologian ever lived, treated the probation as a 'covenant'²² but rejected much of what goes for covenant theology. Gill rejected notions of correspondence between ordinance (i.e. sacraments) of Old Testament dispensation and New Testament dispensation while holding to salvation by grace and a consistent Calvinistic outlook. (Gill was pre-millennial in eschatological outlook.²³)

The probationary arrangement was made specifically by God with Adam, not with Adam and Eve. This is clear in kjv of Genesis 2:15–17, 'the Lord God commanded the man' (v. 16). The verbs in Hebrew are all masculine, second person singular. The kjv preserves this distinction with 'thou [singular] mayest freely eat,' etc. (vv. 16, 17), obscured in niv and other recent Versions which do not employ the second person singular pronouns. Eve's creation was subsequent. 'Probation' need not be defended here, for all agree it is accurate. A 'covenant' is not obviously present.

The evidence is plain that all Adam's descendants (including Eve, 'for she was taken out of man,' Gen. 2:23 niv) were involved in the probation; that Adam acted as a public person, that the results were to apply to all, that what Adam won or lost for himself, he won or lost for us all. That all the human race through future history were in some manner parties to the probation in Adam is easily demonstrated by the very language of the narrative. Except that I would put 'probation' and 'probationary arrangement' for John Murray's 'Adamic Administration,' where Dabney employs 'federal' and 'covenant,' no one has put the matter more forcefully and succinctly than he. I quote at length. After citing Genesis 1:22, 28; 3:15–19; 9:3, Dabney states:

In the dominion assigned over the beasts, in the injunction to multiply, in the privilege of eating the fruits of the earth, in hallowing of the sabbath, God spoke seemingly only to the first pair; but his words indisputably applied as well to their posterity. So we infer, they were included in the threat of death for disobedience, and the implied promise of 2:17

[‘thou shalt surely die’]. To see the force of this inference, remember that it is the established style of Genesis. See 9:25–27; 15:7; 16:12; and 17:20. In each case the patriarch stands for himself and his posterity, in the meaning of the promise. But this is more manifest in Genesis 3:15–19 where God proceeds to pass sentence according to the threat of the broken Covenant [better, the breached probation]. The serpent is to be at war with the woman’s seed. The ground is cursed for Adam’s sin. Does not this curse affect his posterity? The woman has her peculiar punishment, shared equally by all her daughters. And in the closing sentence, death to death, we all read the doom of our mortality. So plain is all this, that even Pelagians have allowed that God acted here judicially. But Adam’s posterity [as Pelagians deny] is included in the judgment. No better description of imputation need be required.²⁴

So it seems apparent that in addition to the damage (corruption, depravity) to human nature in Adam and ours in him, we were judged collectively in him as guilty of what he did. Granted in the first sense of guilt, actual personal responsibility as actor in what he did, Adam was alone, yet in the second sense, legal liability, we were accounted in him in the condemnation.

There is a residual mystery, as all must admit, but that does not relieve the theologian of expressing in words what evidently appears to be true, as far as we now can see.

6. I have contended earlier for a Traducian origin of every soul of man, not special creation by God but natural generation by human parents. The complete natural unity of the race depends on this, if we regard soul as part of human nature. All agree that imputation of Adam’s guilt is more understandable and rationally defensible on the ground of Traducianism. It seems to me (and I shall not here repeat the scores of pages of Shedd’s *Dogmatic Theology II*²⁵ and Strong’s *Systematic Theology*²⁶ and many others, in support of Traducianism) Shedd was right in affirming: ‘There are difficulties attending either theory of the origin of man [i.e. of the soul], but fewer connected with traducianism than with creationism.’²⁷ In my mind it is near unassailable that the Bible, read simply to form and inform our system of theology, makes no distinction in origin between human bodies and souls with regard to parents. Both are created by God through second causes (parents). The Bible thus makes all life on earth God’s creations in this sense. But as far as this earth is concerned, as for primary and direct creation, God ceased from His labors on the seventh day and still completely enjoys His Sabbath. God is not presently creating new entities nor did He originally create a stockpile of souls to deliver as human parents procreated the physical bodies of babies.

7. Natural causes (‘like begets like’) do not account for our guilt and corruption. The special principle governing the probation accounts for the connection. God’s sovereign government related particularly to Adam’s probation and our connection with him in that probation alone. No parents since Adam have stood in probationary relation to succeeding generations of offspring. God does not ordinarily visit death upon people today specifically for the sins of their parents. The probation ended with the fall. We inherit much from all our ancestors, of course, but that is not why we are ‘dead in trespasses and sins.’

8. Adam was tempted in a way not unlike every temptation to sin. There are certain parallels between his temptation and ours. It begins with ‘lust,’ or ‘concupiscence,’ or ‘inordinate desire,’ viz.

‘... each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own evil desire’ (James 1:14). This must mean that evil desire (i. e. a corruption of heart) preceded the act of outward disobedience. How this could have happened in a holy being is unknown and cannot be known by us.

Logically, therefore, Adam became depraved before guilty, though it is not possible to affirm the presence of one without the other. In us, it is the other way around. Depravity as the corruption that is spiritual death (alienation from God, our wills captive to sin) follows the guilt. There is considerable confusion about this matter among authors owing to the fact that Jonathan Edwards asserted that depravity was before guilt without making clear he was referring to Adam himself rather than the human race, his progeny.

9. The guilt we share for Adam’s sin is a forensic (or legal) matter. This is what is meant by the term ‘imputation.’ It relates not to who or what we are personally, morally, spiritually, but to where we stand in God’s sight.

10. It is our natural solidarity with Adam in his sin that parallels our solidarity with Christ, but the ground of solidarity was different in each case. Paul goes to some length to make this plain. The fact that all of a certain group (all in Adam) are judged guilty in him, i.e. that guilt is imputed to them is the precise point of the parallel with the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to all in Christ. Scarcely any other aspect of justification in Christ and condemnation in Christ parallel (Dr Hodge and his disciples notwithstanding).

We are regarded as guilty because we deserve to be so regarded. There is nothing vicarious about it. Adam did not sin vicariously in our stead. Not a sentence in Scripture affirms it. It is the exact opposite in the case of Christ and our justification. We do not deserve righteous standing at all. He took what we deserve that we might have what He deserves. To borrow the language of certain theologians, the righteousness imputed to us in justification is an alien righteousness whereas the condemnation and depravity imputed to us in original sin is not alien at all. It all comes quite naturally. We were never at any moment of our personal existence apart from it. Paul is very careful in Romans 5 to make clear that our relation to Adam is very different from our relation to Christ except for the principle of solidarity. ‘But the gift is not like the trespass.... Again, the gift of God is not like the result of the one man’s sin: The judgment followed one sin [back in Adam’s time] and brought condemnation, but [in contrast] the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification’ (Rom. 5:15–17 niv).

It is important to note that something about Adam and those in solidarity with him is parallel to something about Christ and those in solidarity with Him, but not everything.

Further, Adam furnishes the illustration or analogy not the other way around. That in justification our solidarity with Christ is a forensic (legal) matter only, does not mean the same is true of our solidarity with Adam. It is correct to say Christ is our substitute; His punishment was vicarious, in our room, but it is grotesque to say Adam is our substitute, that he transgressed vicariously and was condemned vicariously for us.

11. Adam and Eve in Eden and in the probationary period—including pronouncements by God upon their apostasy—were archetypes of all male and female humanity since. This is not the same as saying God imputes everything about themselves and their acts of good or evil to the generations to follow, but it does serve to enforce our connection with them in God's plan and providence. An archetype is 'a primitive or standard pattern or a model' (Britannica) 'a model or first form' (American College Dictionary). To be an archetype is not the same as to be 'representative,' 'federal head' or in 'covenant relation'—which I find less than fully satisfactory ways of stating the relation.

But that Adam and Eve were 'primitive or standard patterns' of every man and woman in themselves is certain. God treated them that way from the beginning. Consider the command the pair received to multiply and fill the earth; the freedom to eat all the natural produce of earth (one tree excepted); the words about the nature of the conjugal married state, and so on similarly; after the fall the divine pronouncements about the serpent's seed and the woman's seed; the changes in Eve's relation to Adam (Gen. 3:16); the new relation of Adam to work, to nature, to Eve and to God. None of these, including the curse on the ground, was a state of affairs limited to their time only. What is said of Adam as man (that is, the race), of Adam as a man, of Eve as a woman, were and are to be true of mankind throughout all future generations. These arrangements were all wrought of God in His own mysterious way. They are not fully explicable on any purely rational or scientific ground. What God did to place us in solidarity with them besides (1) the declared probation and its results as above noted, and (2) the natural union by procreated descent from Adam we do not know for sure. But we ask questions about it and theologians do their best to avoid harmful wrong answers even while they acknowledge some reservations about answers that seem correct and wholesome.

12. Neither the representative (Federal, covenant) headship view nor the seminal (natural, real) headship view nor even both together is adequate fully to explain our acknowledged solidarity with Adam or how our relation to him furnishes adequate ground for imputation of Adam's sin. Both sustain the Augustinian (and Reformers') steadfast affirmation that we all do indeed stand guilty, corrupted in heart and condemned. Yet neither fully answers the objections of the other. The representative view acknowledges that the genetic connection is ground for representation.

We have already observed some partial analogies in Scripture. A thorough canvas of 'corporate personality' theories of recent decades would take us too far afield, but they would furnish many more evidences of group solidarities of various sorts in Scripture. But none I know of furnishes an exact parallel or analogy that would establish the ground of the imputation of Adam's sin to us.

My professor of theology, very well-read and articulate, systematic and logical almost to extremes, backed away from the question. My notes show he said 'Adam's fall brought condemnation upon all men,' and after citing Romans 5:16 and 18 added without further comment, 'The controversy is over how it did so.' That was all. Generally both Calvinistic and Baptist in outlook, he never raised the subject except in those two sentences. Another related question he asked was 'Does God really hold us responsible for Adam's sin? Yes, biblically we cannot deny it' and again cited Romans 5:16 and 18, but said no more.

Baptist scholars of yesterday tended to be forthright and positive in accepting the fact and explaining it, much as Luther, Calvin and Augustine long before. John Gill (ad 1697–1771) held that Adam's posterity, yet unborn, had a 'virtual and representative' being in Adam and were in him both seminally and Federally.²⁸ A. H. Strong rejecting representative headship, held firmly to seminal headship, or realistic connection. James Pedigru Boyce, long-time professor of theology at the Southern Baptist Seminary, was exceedingly clear on this matter.

‘The Scriptures plainly assume and declare that God righteously punishes all men, not only for what they do, but for what they are. Men are indeed represented as more guilty and sinful than they know themselves to be.... a corrupt nature makes a condition as truly sinful, and guilty, and liable to punishment as actual transgressions. Consequently at the very moment of birth, the presence and possession of such a nature shows that the infant sons of Adam are born under all the penalties which befell their ancestor in the day of his sin.’²⁹

Recently Baptists have tended to be less Augustinian and Calvinistic in the whole range of theology and no less here. David Smith, reported earlier in these pages, supports a non-Augustinian outlook with affinities both to Placean-Amyrauldian and Arminian teachings as do the several of his Baptist mentors whom he cites. Millard Erickson seems at first to adhere to an Augustinian view similar to Strong’s, but J. L. Garrett, another Baptist author, comments, ‘Millard Erickson has stated that he has “espoused” realism, or the theory of “natural headship, and ... has attributed this view singularly to Augustine” but “in conclusion, abandoned realism and instead opted for what we will later identify as the Placean theory of the imputation of depravity.” I do not find Dr Erickson, though somewhat indecisive, quite that confusing. In a different way I find Garrett’s treatment quite unsatisfactory. Protestant theology has not, as Garrett does, sought to relate “the sin” of Adam and Eve to our sin.’³⁰ Scripture nowhere traces the cause of our guilt to Eve: rather to and through Adam alone. This confusion may be the influence of the current fads of feminism. Must Eve and her daughters have their due even in original sin? Further, Garrett is almost unique in first rather fully covering the theories and then concluding with no commitment at all to any theory of imputation. He ends by urging us to ‘be aware of all that for which we are responsible’ but gives no hint as to how we should interpret the relation of ‘the sin of Adam and Eve to our sin.’³¹ He needs, it seems to me, to review the Adamic connection, rather than the ‘Adam and Eve relation.’

Lewis and Demarest of Denver Theological Seminary (Baptist) have produced competent and readable summaries of the views. There is a somewhat less than formal endorsement of seminal, substantial, natural headship, ‘a realistic solidarity of the race’ and, employing the niv, interpret Acts 17:26 (ex henos) as ‘from one man.’ They also say: ‘[T]hese verses (Rom. 5:16, 17, 18) teach the transfer of the legal guilt of one person to others he represents.’³² They report much that is true about suffering vicariously for sin and transfer of consequences. Yet, it seems to me, though endorsing a Calvinistic (or Augustinian) outlook in a general way, they decide not to recommend any of the competing views of Calvinists. They provide adequate analysis but less synthesis.

13. In my judgment there is a ‘more excellent way.’ 1) The human race was present in Adam in seminal substance. No one can deny it and all who believe the Scripture acknowledge it. Whatever human nature is, we are one in inheriting it from Adam. Adam had all the human nature there is and so does each of his progeny—call it ‘flesh’ (John 1:14) or ‘human form’ (Phil. 2:7) or ‘flesh and blood’ (Heb. 2:14) or whatever. 2) The probation of Adam was and is unique, never to be repeated. There are no very exact analogies or parallels, for there has been but one probation of all mankind in one man. That probation took place by virtue of God’s sovereign rule. ‘He doeth according to His will in the heavens and on the earth.’ As earlier I have asserted, Adam was archetype of every man in everything about the probation. 3) Our real presence in him both as nature, or seminal substance, and the forensic fact that he was archetype on probation for us all are grounds for the divine imputation of his guilt and corruption to his progeny. The natural relation and the probationary archetypal relation in the case of Adam cannot be separated.

‘Representative’ is not quite an adequate or precise term for that forensic connection, because it implies designation by the ones represented. Further, to say Adam was our representative implies we were not there really in any sense. Our language means that. Mr Gutknecht is our Minnesota district representative in the lower house of Congress at Washington. He represents me but is not my probationary archetype. As my representative he is really there and he acts for me but I am not really there. The relations between me and Mr Gutknecht are purely formal, as represented and representative. This manner of speaking by C. A. Hodge and other like-minded Federalists is correct for what I think they mean to say, for they reject any real presence of Adam’s progeny in the probation. By insisting all souls are immediately created by God, and likewise that the seat of depravity and prime bearer of guilt is not the body (for if any precedence in guilt exists it must be in the soul), these Federalists cut off any possibility at all of my or your real presence in Adam.

But in Adam my substance was indeed present—to what extent physical I do not know any more than of my immediate father, S. C. Culver, who begat me while the First World War was raging and who is now in heaven. In or by what mode my spiritual seed or substance was in him I do not know either, but as a convinced Traducianist I affirm, there it was. As certainly as God created Adam in His own image and that first archetypal man begat Seth and all his descendants on to Noah and his sons by whom the whole earth was overspread, I was generated by his seed in the image of his fallen nature. It does not seem to me my ‘nature’ per se albeit fallen was judged guilty, for only persons are guilty. But what Adam lost he, by divine arrangement, lost for all of us.

The difficulties with our solidarity with Adam in the fall are not as to the fact itself, but as to the how. ‘Does not the remaining mystery lose itself in that abyss which is opened by the fact of the permission of sin, before which all theists on this side of the veil must bow in silence.’³³

¹ O. W. Heick and J. L. Neve, History of Christian Thought II (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg Press, 1946), p. 86.

² C. P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1875), pp. 282, 283.

³ J. A. Dorner, History of Protestant Theology (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1871), p. 144.

⁴ ibid., pp. 144–146.

⁵ W. G. T. Shedd, A History of Christian Doctrine II (New York: Scribner, 1872), p. 14.

⁶ ibid., p. 3.

⁷ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 362.

⁸ See B. B. Warfield Studies in Tertullian & Augustine pp. 289–412. What Buswell calls

See D. D. Turner, Studies in Tertullian & Augustine, pp. 207–112. What Dabney calls substantive views others call realistic.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

9 J. O. Buswell, Jr, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), p. 307.

10 John Murray, Imputation of Adam's Sin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959).

11 J. O. Buswell, Jr, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I, pp. 300–307.

12 John Murray, Collected Writings II (Carlisle, PA and Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), pp. 49, 50.

13 Perry Miller, Errand into the Wilderness (Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard Univ. Press, 1956), p. 53. See Pelikan, The Christian Tradition V, p. 372.

14 J. A. Dorner, History of Protestant Theology I, trans. Robson & Taylor (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1871), p. 300.

15 Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition IV (Chicago: U. of Chicago Press, 1989), p. 372.

16 Gordon Lewis & Bruce Demarest, Integrative Theology II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), p. 193.

17 Robert L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1878, 1972), p. 343.

18 See Dabney, Lectures, pp. 338–340, 348–350; C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology II, p. 221; Thornwell, Collected Writings I, pp. 334–344.

19 C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology II, pp. 198–201.

20 James H. Thornwell, Collected Writings I (Carlisle, PA and Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1875, 1986), p. 349.

21 Hodge, Systematic Theology II, pp. 117–122; Dabney, Lectures, pp. 302–305; Gill, Body of Divinity I, pp. 444–451; Buswell, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I, pp. 307–320; Berkhof, Systematic Theology, pp. 211–218.

22 John Gill, Body of Divinity I (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1839, 1978), pp. 444–470.

23 Gill, Body of Divinity II, pp. 621–660.

24 Dabney, Lectures, pp. 329, 330.

²⁵ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology II, pp. 3–94.

²⁶ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 492–497.

²⁷ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology II, p. 19.

²⁸ Gill, Body of Divinity I, p. 469.

²⁹ James Pedigru Boyce, Abstract of Systematic Theology, Philadelphia, PA: American Baptist Publication Society, 1887, pp. 249, 250.

³⁰ J. L. Garrett, Systematic Theology: Biblical, Historical and Evangelical I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), p. 486.

³¹ Garrett, op. cit., p. 493.

³² Lewis & Demarest, Integrative Theology II, p. 223.

³³ A. A. Hodge in concluding his chapter on ‘Imputation of Adam’s First Sin,’ Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), p. 366.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (395). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

10

The Worldwide Reign of Sin

The Prevalence of Sin in the World

Sin in the person of ‘the tempter’ makes its first appearance in the first pages of the Bible and makes its departure (‘exiunt not smiling’) at the very end. (‘The last enemy to be destroyed is death’ and, of course, ‘the sting of death is sin.’) Every age between deals in one way or another, directly or indirectly, with sin, its prevalence, effects and salvation from it. Government by civil laws and authorities was ordained by God as only one of His measures for damage control of the devastation of society under the reign of sin. (If men were holy as are the angels we wouldn’t need courts, police, governors and legislatures. *Toward a Biblical View of Civil Government*¹ took me many years to write and ran to hundreds of pages—to speak of only one little-noticed evidence of sin’s universal domination.)

The Reign of Sin

At this point to prolong this study by an excursion through the Scripture in the manner of current biblical theology is neither very interesting nor necessary, for a very important reason, viz. the Bible furnishes its own integration of all the evidence, both biblical and experimental. I refer to Paul’s own ‘systematic theology of the Christian religion’ (Rom. 1:18–3:31; 5:12–21; and chap. 7). We do not need an inductive study of the prevalence of sin in the world through the whole Bible because Paul has provided the results of his own study for us.

Much of this section of Scripture has been cited and quoted at length previously in this book. Here our interest takes us to Paul’s summary of all his previous argument. In doing so, with both scriptural and apostolic authority, he addresses and answers every important question ever raised about how far the sin introduced at the beginning of human history has prevailed and with what consequences both immediate and ultimate. The specifics are laid out in Romans chapter 3, beginning mid-verse 9 and on to the end of verse 20. The great spokesman for Christ (Rom. 1:1) was never shy of asserting his apostolic authority among Christians (albeit diplomatically), yet here he is at pains to reinforce his own authority with that of Moses, the poets and the prophets of the Old Testament. He is employing the power of recognized authority in the most bitter and devastating denunciation of the moral character of every member of the human race. There is probably nothing comparable in literature anywhere in any language except possibly Jesus’ withering denunciations of official Jewry in Matthew 23.

The Entire World of Humanity Brought to the Court of Divine Law

The shadow of a court trial, almost subliminally, falls across the Epistle at this stage (Rom. 3:9–19). In one form or another, criminal court procedures are as old and as pervasive as society, already ancient then: in the litigious atmosphere of our times scarcely ever out of mind for a whole day. The tribunal has already heard opening charges, the prosecutor’s statements and evidences. He is now drawing up his summary. I shall quote the nkjv.

In this climax of the prosecution we shall hear:

1. The Prosecutor’s Statement (9b) ‘all under sin.’
2. The Prosecutor’s Summation (10–18) ‘sinful in heart, speech, deeds.’
3. The Defense’s Speechless Response (19b) ‘every mouth ... stopped.’
4. The Judge’s Verdict (19b, 20) ‘no flesh ... justified.’

1. The Prosecutor’s Statement

‘... we have previously charged both Jews and Greeks that they are all under sin’ (Rom. 3:9b). This has reference to the prosecutor’s case as previously developed (Rom. 1:18–3:8a). Having charged the entire race with lese majestie under divine wrath—ungodly, unrighteous, suppressing truth in unrighteousness (1:18)—he goes on (a) to show that the idolatrous, barbaric pagans suppress truth and insult the Creator. They do this by prostrating themselves before creatures far below their own dignity. They defile their own minds and bodies with grossest sins (1:19–32). Twice the prosecutor says God has given them up and concludes the bitter recital, saying, ‘[they] knowing the righteous judgment of God ... are deserving of death’ (1:32).

(b) Then the prosecutor turns his attention to the sophisticated heathen, the Greek and Roman legislators, moralists, and educators, and those who follow them (2:1–16). They have judged the unsophisticated pagan foolish in his brand of idolatry, but do the same things themselves, while claiming to know better. There is a law of God written on their hearts that they have knowingly and impenitently broken. They also are worthy of death according to four divine principles of judgment (2:2, 6, 11, 16). These principles, in the language of Paul (Greek text and kjv) are: i. ‘according to truth’, Gr., Kata alētheion (Rom. 2:2); ii. ‘according to ... deeds’, Gr., Kata ta erga (Rom. 2:6); iii. ‘no respect of persons,’ lit., acceptance of faces, Gr., ou ... prosōpolēmpsia (Rom. 2:11); iv. ‘the secrets of men’, Gr., ta krupta tōn anthrōpon (Rom. 2:16). A fifth might be added—all will be ‘by Jesus Christ’, Gr., dia lēsou Xristou (Rom. 2:16). These principles come in for enlargement in the chapter on Judgment in the section on Eschatology.

(c) Next, the prosecutor files his indictment of the Jewish people (2:17–3:9a). As more enlightened than any other people, being custodians of the Holy Scriptures, they are guilty, more deserving of judgment, because of sinning against greater light than any others.

This is a sketch of what Paul means by the claim, ‘we have previously charged both Jews and Greeks that they are all under sin’ (Rom. 3:9).

If we may put this, if possible, in divine perspective, God’s interest is to show that no matter what self-estimate we make of ourselves, whatever extenuations we claim, whatever excuses we offer, the fact of being guilty sinners under divine judgment remains. We are not to be let off for any excuse whatsoever. We may not plead innocent by reason of ignorance, insanity or lack of contrary choices.

Objections

But objections have been raised against such an interpretation of Paul’s language. Maybe, some say, Paul in saying ‘all the world’ is ‘guilty before God’ (v. 19) is only referring to some especially depraved section of society such as the male prostitutes of Corinth or the hypocritical scribes whom Jesus denounced (Matt. 23:15, etc.); or—as Moses Stuart, in his Commentary on Romans—perhaps Paul is thinking of groups such as Jews and Gentiles, among whom such sins occur, but not of every man. My memory is sharp of certain ‘holiness’ preachers who insisted no sanctified Christian ever does any of these things or has it in his heart to do them.

Let Jonathan Edwards, writing in the famous treatise, The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin, reply:

If the words which the Apostle uses, do not most fully and determinately signify universality, no words ever used in the bible are sufficient to it. I might challenge any man to produce any one paragraph in the Scripture, from the beginning to the end, where there is such a repetition and accumulation of terms, so strongly and emphatically, and carefully, to express the most perfect and absolute universality, or any place to be compared to it ... They are all—they are all—they are all—together—everyone—everyone; joined to multiplied negative terms, to show the universality to be without exception; saying, there is no flesh—there is none—there is none—there is none—there is none, four times over; besides the addition of no, not one—no, not one.... When the Apostle says, That every mouth may be stopped, must we suppose that he speaks only of those two [Jews and Gentiles] great collective bodies, figuratively ascribing to each of them a mouth, and means that those two mouths are stopped?²

2. The Prosecutor's Summation (Rom. 3:10–18)

He employs the very language and text of Old Testament Scripture, lending scriptural weight to apostolic authority.

(a) A general charge of unrighteousness (v. 10). ‘There is none righteous, no, not one’ (quoting Ps. 14:1 and 3).

The skeptical reader should be reminded that these specific sentences are in the inspired text of Scripture three times and are echoed in many other passages. Examples are: ‘for there is no one who does not sin’ (1 Kgs. 8:46 nkjv); ‘Who can say, “I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin” ’ (Ps. 20:9 nkjv).

(b) Men are sinful in their inmost part, the heart and mind, where are the springs of action (Rom. 3:11, 12). ‘As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.’ ‘There is none who understands’ (Rom. 3:11a citing Ps. 14:2, 3).

The problem with us is at the deepest level. Theologians refer to this as the noetic effect of sin on the mind and heart. (See the very important condensed summary in Shedd’s Dogmatic Theology II.³) The New Testament is very explicit, viz. ‘the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him’ (1 Cor. 2:14 nkjv); ‘having their understanding darkened’ (Eph. 4:18, cf. v. 19 nkjv); ‘the message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing’ (1 Cor. 1:18 nkjv; see also Matt. 13:19–23). In each case the context relates these startling denigrations of fallen man’s intellectual powers to spiritual and moral matters, though hardly without placing some doubt on the wholeness of all our noetic powers.

The possible impairment by sin of our powers to think straight has received much attention from apologists, philosophers and theologians, but the twentieth century with its unprecedented bloodlettings; ‘holocausts’; and waves of gratuitous wanton vice, crime and violence have convinced even the liberal theologians (e.g. R. Bultmann, The Presence of Eternity) and especially the neo-orthodox, of the depravity of man’s heart and consequent manifold impairment (see Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man and E. Brunner, Man in Revolt).⁴ Even secular journals have for fifty years, since the horrors of Nazi and Stalinist crimes against man came first to plain light, accepted the reality of universal moral impairment if not the biblical explanation of it.

‘There is none who seeks after God’ (Rom. 3:11b). From our first parents after the fall onward to the present we have been running away and except for persistent pursuit by The Hound of Heaven, would all be lost forever. God has done all the seeking. This is the message of prophets of the Old Testament, several parables of Jesus and special appeals throughout Scripture.

‘They have all turned aside’ (Rom. 3:12). Like sheep wandering or children lost in the rush of shopping mall traffic we are lost, irretrievably lost unless God’s Spirit finds us and the Father brings us to Christ.

‘They have together become unprofitable’ (Rom. 3:12b). We are more trouble than we are worth and would have been blotted out as a bad bargain long ago at the beginning of human history, except for God’s mercy, grace and love. We had become useless to God.

Before going on to particular supporting charges (vv. 13–18), Paul the prosecutor, still quoting Psalm 14:1–3, repeats the general charge.

‘There is none who does good, no, not one’ (Rom. 3:12c). Let us, following Paul’s method, introduce further evidence of the general charge of universal sinfulness by further scriptural evidence and emphasis. In the light of God’s holiness, and against the standard of totally pure motives as necessary quality of pure thought, word or deed, ‘all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.’ The holiest of men have said of themselves as Isaiah, ‘I am a man of unclean lips and dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips.’

Though many are by grace ‘called ... saints’ (1 Cor. 1:2) and ‘holy men’ (1 Peter 1:21) the best of them are guilty of sin of nature and sins of thought, word and deed. Moses and Samuel (Jer. 15:1) and Noah, Daniel and Job (Ezek. 14:14) are cited as examples of unusual spiritual power of advocacy before God. Yet each one of these if not convicted of sins on the pages of Scripture, at least confesses himself to be a sinner. Moses unrighteously lost his temper and assumed honors—however briefly—that cost him dearly (Num. 20:10–12; 27:14). Samuel failed as a parent, sinning against God and his sons by indulging the sins of his boys, even with the horrible example of Eli and his wicked sons before him as he grew up in that great man’s house (1 Sam. 8:1–5). Noah was guilty at least of careless indiscretion when he should have been discreet. Job, though commended in heaven as ‘perfect and upright’ (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3 kjv), confessed his sins and repented of them (Job 42:6).

Other famous holy people of the Bible are all really reclaimed backsliders, for example: Jacob, Abraham, Hezekiah and Peter. Ezra, of whom no faults are reported, joined himself with his people in confessing their enormous sins against light (Ezra 9:5–15) as is likewise true of Daniel (Dan. 9:1–18) signally addressed by Gabriel several times as ‘greatly beloved’ (of God) (Dan. 9:23; 10:11, 19 kjv).

The wisest people of Scripture, in their most solemn and reflective moments, say the same: Solomon at prayer, ‘there is no man that sinneth not’ (1 Kgs. 8:46; cf. Prov. 20:9), to which the greatest evangelical prophet agrees, ‘All we like sheep have gone astray’ (Isa. 53:6).

‘There is none righteous ... none who does good, no not, one’ is assumed by Jesus. Without that fact His ministry and work of redemption have no meaning. ‘Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.’ ‘God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son’ because it was in need of saving. He addresses His circle of disciples as sinful men (Luke 11:13; cf. v. 1). He announced the coming of the Holy Spirit as specially related to the world’s sin (John 16:8–11). Every New Testament book and writer assumes or affirms that all are ‘under sin.’ John speaks for all of them and all of us when he writes: ‘If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves ... If we say that we have not sinned, we make him [God] a liar’ (1 John 1:8, 10 kjv).

Every generation has its share of men with seared consciences and hardened hearts who though deep in sinful thoughts and deeds seem unaware of it. To this non-professional observer it seems that the modern secular mind in university sociology, anthropology, psychology and related disciplines has about given up grounds for moral distinctions except for social utility and individual autonomy (called freedom). Thus average behavior becomes normal. Sin as a Godward aspect of ‘anti-social’ behavior is lost. This is not new, for it is to be found full-blown in some of the ancient Greek philosophers.

But the Bible assumes even saints may be unaware of some of their most egregious failures and transgressions. The ceremonial law provided special offerings for these unknown, unconscious sins (e.g. Num. 15:22–41; and Lev. 5:17–19). The prayers of the Psalter (Heb. tehillim, prayers) more than once express concern for this sort of thing (e.g. Ps. 19:11) where ‘secret sins’ or ‘hidden’ faults are those hidden even from the man at prayer and are in contrast with open ‘presumptuous’ sins (Ps. 19:12). Psalm 90, the ‘Prayer of Moses the man of God,’ expresses the concern of ‘the meekest man of all the earth’ that God has ‘set ... our secret sins in the light of thy countenance’ (Ps. 90:8 kjv).

Every faithful preacher knows that the very sinners who trumpet their moral innocence most loudly are the ones farthest from God, whose ‘foolish hearts are darkened’ most deeply. Some of the world’s famous moral reprobates have been notoriously unconscious of any serious guilt feelings.⁵ Perhaps the most impudent man of letters in the history of modern Europe was J.J. Rousseau (ad 1712–1778), one of the Fathers of the French Revolution—though he died too soon to know it. In his Confessions he ‘confesses sin in a spirit that needs to be confessed’ that he was a thief, advocated and practiced adultery, and sent his many illegitimate offspring to foundling asylums.⁶ In elegant language he boasted, ‘No man can come to the throne of God and say: I am a better man than Rousseau.’ A few years ago Errol Flynn, one of Hollywood’s leading male actors, was notorious in life for his marriages and adulteries and at his death left his teenaged concubine a delinquent ward of the state of California. Near the end he wrote an autobiography in devil-may-care style entitled, ‘My Wicked, Wicked Ways.’ The deficiency of such people in self-understanding is due evidence of the truth of all we have just reviewed of Paul’s argument for universal sin.

(c) Men are especially sinful in speech, whereby their sinful hearts are given expression (Rom. 3:13, 14 nkjv). ‘With their tongues they have practiced deceit’ (quoting Ps. 5:9). ‘The poison of asps is under their lips’ (quoting Ps. 140:3). ‘Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness’ (quoting Ps. 18:7).

Paul takes note of all the organs of speech in man—throat, tongue, lips, mouth—and describes here the four principle vices of the tongue, viz.: Firstly, filthy language, the jargon of excited drunkards, cant of dregs of society and the angry accusations of the best at their worst moments. ‘Open tomb,’ which portrays the stench of rotting human flesh from an exposed corpse, is the startling figure. Secondly, deceit, attempting to get others to believe what is not true, flattery, hypocrisy, dissimulation. ‘With their tongues they have practiced deceit’ characterizes flattery, dissimulation, what goes for diplomacy so common to all social, business and government discourse. The Psalms complain endlessly of this. We tend to speak deceit wherever our own special interests are concerned. There are even special words for such speech: dissimulation, dissembling and hypocrisy. ‘The poison of asps is under their lips.’ As venomous reptiles slay with their bites ‘so ... slanderers ... destroy the character of their neighbors.’⁷ Though ‘A wholesome tongue is a tree of life’ (Prov. 15:4 nkjv) both ‘Death and life are in the power of the tongue’ (Prov. 18:21; cf. James 3:3–12). ‘Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.’ The name of Christ and of God may be used more frequently in the curses—both bitter and careless—of men (and increasingly women also) than in their prayers. All violent destructive language turns bitter and afflicting finally. The man after God's own heart feels, 'I lie among the sons of men Who are set on fire, Whose teeth are spears and arrows, And their tongue a sharp sword' (Ps. 57:4 nkjv), 'Who sharpen their tongue like a sword, And bend their bows to shoot their arrows—bitter words' (Ps. 64:3; cf. v. 4 nkjv), and Jeremiah's similar complaint, 'Their tongue is as an arrow shot out; it speaketh deceit: one speaketh peaceably to his neighbor ... but in heart he layeth his wait' (Jer. 9:8 kjv).

(d) Men's violent deeds match their wicked speech, both of which proceed from the sinful heart (Rom. 3:15–17, all quoted from Isa. 59:7–8 and Prov 1:16). Works follow words and words come 'out of the abundance of the heart.'

'Their feet are swift to shed blood.' He who will curse his neighbor, lie to him and deceive him will kill him, given opportunity and the right circumstances. Except where suppressed by strong moral restraints based on sound faith in God and accompanied by proper civil restraint, injustice and violence prevail. The books of Samuel and Kings illustrate this truth as the prophets denounce it. The god of this world is 'a murderer from the beginning,' his policies as anthrōpoktonos (man-killer) is reflected in all world history, especially in killing 'the Lord of glory' (John 8:29–44; and 1 Cor. 2:6–8).

'Destruction and misery are in their ways.' This is meant to say that wherever mankind go they perpetrate violent destruction of others and consequent misery for all.

'And the way of peace they have not known.' The twentieth century bears out the charge. Never has peace received more official propaganda. Those old enough to remember the post-World War I promotions of 'peace among all nations' may recall, as I do, being told in church and school that there would be no more war. I could fill a small book with anecdotes of this well-meant but self-deceiving propaganda. Throughout the twentieth century the seeds of conflict were sown with every great and famous agreement or treaty. Witness Versailles, Yalta, Potsdam and Teheran, etc.

Man's ferocity, which fills the world with animosities, quarrels, hatred in the private connexions of families and neighborhoods; and with revolutions, and wars, and murders among nations. The most savage animals do not destroy so many of their own species to appease their hunger, as man destroys of his fellow, to satiate his ambition, his revenge, or cupidity.⁸

(Violent force can, in a sinful world, only be restrained by force when other measures fail, hence the need for civil control of man by man, as first announced in the ninth chapter of Genesis.)

(e) The Proximate Cause, the source from which all this depravity of word, speech and work proceeds is stated: 'There is no fear of God before their eyes' (Rom. 3:18; Ps. 36:1).

The generation of the last quarter of the twentieth century may have been the one in which absence of reverential fear of God has been most fully absent from Western civilization. Some called it 'secularism.' In our own country all the vices of thought, word and deed described in these passages have inevitably followed. Whether there has been a formal human conspiracy of the university elite, the masters and servants of information and disinformation in news reporting and entertainment, the philosophy of courts and schools of law and public education is doubtful. Yet there is no doubt the devil and his minions are behind it. They have conspired. This world is indeed a Kosmos (cosmos), an arrangement.

Contrariwise, ‘The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge’ (Prov. 1:7). The fear of God in a population is the ground of public social order, as Abraham observed to Abimelech (Gen. 20:11). When witnesses in courts of justice have ‘no fear of God’ neither do they fear to swear false oaths. Hence, oaths made in court are no guarantee of the truthfulness of witnesses. The Bible was written in a long epoch in which even the pagan neighbors of Israel feared the oath as they feared their gods. This is one of the first impressions learned from study of the literature of ancient Canaan (Ugaritic) and Mesopotamia (Sumerian, Assyro-Babylonian). Cultivation of the fear of God is a precondition to the obedience of children, to the moral life, to sound social relationships. No wonder then that societies founded and developed on the ground of such fear of God are falling apart before our very eyes, now that the God of their Fathers has been renounced.

Paul moves on to the next theme of his greatest Epistle, justification by faith, at Romans 3:22. But before doing so he lightly touches, without further elaboration, two more features of the shadow trial. I have suggested as a structure of the passage the following: (1) the prosecutor’s statement (3:9) that all are under sin and (2) the prosecutor’s summation (3:10–18) that all are sinful in thought, word and deed. There now follows:

3. The Defense Speechless, Without Response

‘[T]hat every mouth may be stopped’ (Rom. 3:19a kjv). The language seems to be drawn from Job who observed that when God decides to move in on man either in judgment or blessing ‘iniquity stoppeth her mouth’ (Job 5:16 kjv). That patriarch ill-advisedly decided to speak in the ‘anguish’ of his ‘spirit’ to ‘complain’ to God about the slings and arrows of outrageous Providence (Job 7:11), filling his mouth ‘with arguments’ (Job 23:4). When God did finally respond it was with mouth-shutting persuasion. Said the repentant patriarch: ‘Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken; but I will not answer: yea, twice; but I will proceed no further’ (Job 40:4, 5 kjv). If such was the case with one whom God pronounced a blameless and upright man (Job 1:8; 2:3), what will the rest of mankind find to say to God?

‘Sir, you did not make yourself plain,’ Bertrand Russell claimed he would say if after death he should stand before God. What does he think about it now? Will not everyone stand before the great King, as the man without a proper garment in the Parable of the Wedding Feast? ‘[S]peechless’ (Matt. 22:12).

4. The Judge’s Verdict

‘[G]uilty before God’ (Rom. 3:19b kjv). See passages of Scripture relating to the Last Judgment for elaboration or consult your own conscience in moments of remorse.

St Paul might have gathered pages of passages from the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms to enforce his argument in Romans 3:10–18 that the human race in entirety is sinful in heart, thought, word and deed and that the source lies in man’s real (as opposed to professed religion) rejection of God's authority—true subversion of the majesty of God, Creator, Sustainer and Governor. Nothing is a more prevalent theme of the Old Testament than reproach of both Israelites and their pagan neighbors for their self-abandonment to sin. Men of every social and intellectual level and of material wealth are so reproved. But the great Apostle has cited sufficient to prove his point and I shall not burden this page with more than I have already cited.

It remains to be added that not every man, woman or child in one lifetime sinks to all the depths mentioned in Paul's summary or the preceding bill of particulars in 1:18–3:9. Nor have those who have been regenerated by the Word and Spirit and believe ever been so fully delivered, in this life, from the power of sin, that they have no remnant of it remaining in them. This Paul makes clear in subsequent chapters, as does the whole of the Bible and the record of even redeemed humanity in every age manifests. Sin, however, no longer 'reigns' in believer's lives.

Supposedly Contrary Scriptural Evidence

Several passages of Scripture have been interpreted to exempt at least a few from the corruption and guilt of sin. They are not understood sufficiently in context. They only seem on a superficial level so to teach. Few serious scholars build any such doctrine on them. Yet because expressions appearing in these texts puzzle some sincere readers of the Bible and are occasionally misused in various ways, I present some of them and furnish some explanatory remarks. Most discussion has centered on the King James Version.

Matthew 9:12 and 13 (kjv): 'They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.... I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance.' Jesus was answering self-righteous Pharisees who had already rejected His message of salvation. They did not feel 'lost' so He would not offer what they felt sure they did not need anyway. The statements are ironic.

Luke 10:30–37: nothing in the story (parable) of the Good Samaritan suggests that because that 'good' man practiced a superior love of neighbor as compared with the self-justifying lawyer (vv. 25–29), that he was free of sin or even perfect in his love of God and one's neighbor. Jesus rebuked the lawyer by showing there was a righteousness of Gentile sinners superior to that of upper-class Jewish sinners. Jesus' statement to another Samaritan—the woman at the well—is apropos: 'Ye worship ye know not what: we [Jews] know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews' (John 4:22 kjv).

Acts 10:35 (kjv): 'in every nation he that feareth him [God, cf. v. 34], and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.' In the developing revelation, Cornelius, a man already justified by faith in the Word of God, though a Gentile, is seen by Peter (who up to now did not see it) to be as much welcome in God's family as any Jew. Cornelius, of course, needed to be enlightened to this fact also. There is no support here for salvation by divine worship (fear of God) or good works, for by nature 'There is no fear of God before their eyes' and '... we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags' (Isa. 64:6 kjv).

Romans 2:11–14 (kjv): 'For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law,' etc., Paul is demonstrating the opposite of salvation or perfection by any inherent knowledge of God's law. He is showing that certain Gentiles do have a superior awareness of God's law and consciousness of keeping or breaking it. But he concludes with every mouth speechless in self-defense and all the world guilty (Rom. 3:19) and all under sin (3:9).

First Corinthians 2:6: Paul refers to mature Christians as 'them that are perfect' (kjv). esv and niv render this 'mature.' Paul—who was certainly a mature believer—thought of himself as chief of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15).

Philippians 3:15 (kjv): 'as many as be perfect.' In this context the same word (in the Greek text as well) appears and is apparently the same in sense as in 1 Corinthians 2:6 just cited. If, as is possible, ultimate sinless perfection is the Apostle's meaning, he has previously written (vv. 12–14) that such perfection is a goal he himself has not yet attained.

First John 3:6 and 9 present difficulties to Paul's insistence that no man alive is absolutely without sin—not even the Apostle himself (Rom. chap. 7; and 1 Tim. 1:15). Again because of the close adherence to the language of the Greek text I quote the two verses from kjv. 'Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him.... Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed [nature, rsv] remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.' Whatever John means to say in these verses must be interpreted in light of what he had said earlier in the same Epistle: 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.... If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us' (1 John 1:8, 10 kjv).

In a day when Greek was far more known by clergy and laymen than today Henry Alford (fl. 1850) was a preeminent exegete of the Greek New Testament. He vigorously rejected the then (and still) prevalent notions that John meant 'does not persist in sin' or 'does not allow sin to reign over him'—though either or both may be true. Alford, finding both Augustine and the Venerable Bede in agreement, asserted:

Against all such the plain words of the Apostle must be held fast, and explained by the analogy of his way of speaking throughout the Epistle of the ideal reality of the life of God and the life of sin as absolutely excluding one another.... The two are incompatible: and insofar as a man is found in the one, his is thereby separated from the other.... If the child of God falls into sin, it is an act against nature.... So that there is no real contradiction to chapter 1, verses 8–10, and chapter 2, verse 2, where this very falling into sin of the child of God is asserted and the remedy prescribed.⁹

Raymond Brown, whose massive volumes on the Johannine books enjoy the confidence of scholars far and wide, supplements the comments of Alford rather than disagreeing. He points out that in 1 John 3:6 John has been saying the adversaries whom he is resisting really never have 'seen' God; they are not even Christians because they have not seen that Jesus Christ is God. He is worried about propagandists who are attacking the assurance of the believers whom John addresses. John would have his readers know that the seed of God is in them permanently. Brown concludes: 'One is forced, then, to understand the claims to sinlessness and impeccability in 1 John 3:6, 9 in light of the statements in 3:1, 2.' He has much more to say, but he has led us back to the same point where Alford, 150 years earlier, led his readers.¹⁰

A. H. Strong, whose massive, condensed volume Systematic Theology has remained in print and wide use for a century, made lifelong research into non-specifically theological literature as it bears on Christian theology, publishing several volumes on the subject, in addition to remarks in the volume mentioned above. As examples of the truism that ‘the common judgment of mankind declares ... every man is prone to some form of sin and spontaneous “opposition to God and his law” ’, Strong quotes from such greats as Aristotle, Plato, Shakespeare, Pascal, and even Chinese and Hindu proverbs.^{11}

- ¹ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government, A Biblical View (Edmonton, Alberta: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 2000).
- ² Edwards, p. 425 as cited by Robert Haldane in Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, 1847, pp. 116, 117.
- ³ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology II (New York: Charles Scribners Sons, 1888), pp. 196–198.
- ⁴ See especially R. Bultmann, The Presence of Eternity, p. 102.
- ⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 576, 577.
- ⁶ ibid., p. 576.
- ⁷ Haldane, Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, p. 118.
- ⁸ Haldane, Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, p. 119.
- ⁹ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers (Chicago: Moody Press, n.d.), p. 1724.
- ¹⁰ Raymond E. Brown, The Epistles of John, Anchor Bible, vol. 30 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982), pp. 429–431.
- ¹¹ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 577–582.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (406). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

The Personal Consequences of Sin

I will not repeat discussion of the effects of the first sin in Paradise on Adam, his spouse and all their descendants. Here our interest is more particular and personal. What does sin do to me and my fellow man? Let us observe, with as much regret and reserve of language as possible, several classes of effect. These are each enormously devastating, productive of infinite distress throughout the world through all time since the beginning. They should be observed humbly and with frank acknowledgment that, as Daniel said in his prayer of confession (Dan. 9:3–19): ‘O Lord, to us belongs shame of face, to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, we have sinned against You. To the Lord our God belong mercy and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against Him’ (Dan. 9:8, 9 author’s trans.). I shall be direct and as brief as possible in setting forth each of seven categories in a single word with discussion conducted mainly in the language of the Version of 1611 on account of its homely, simple force, superior in this area of unwelcome truth about ourselves.

1. Defilement. We have lost holiness and become ‘unclean.’ When the prophet awoke to reality in the presence of the holy he exclaimed, ‘Woe is me ... for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips’ (Isa. 6:5). There is graphic variety of description.

Certain texts speak of defilement of our bodies, e.g. ‘There is no soundness in my flesh ... neither ... rest in my bones because of my sin ... My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness’ (Ps. 38:3–5 kjv, emphasis added). Others refer to defilement of speech (Ps. 58:3) and several others treated above in this chapter in connection with Romans 3:13, 14. Believers are admonished concerning ‘filthiness of the flesh and spirit’ while ‘perfecting holiness in the fear of God’ (2 Cor. 7:1 kjv, emphasis added). The ‘mind and conscience’ of the ‘unbelieving’ is defiled (Titus 1:15 kjv, emphasis added). In sum, the whole of man, to the very center of being is defiled, for ‘those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man’ (Matt. 15:17–20; cf. 7:17, 18 kjv).

2. Perversion. A perfectly normal man, acting out original concreated harmony of being, would regulate all his passions and acts according to the laws of God, freely submitting a holy nature to a holy God. But fallen man has lost full normalcy and in spiritual matters is not normal at all. Average man is not normal man.

Because it is not generally understood by Christian people that the character of their secular informers suffers from systemic defect, I will enlarge a bit. The verb twah and its derivatives are used hundreds of times for sin in the Old Testament. It means ‘bend, twist’ (BDB p. 730), to deviate.¹ Another word ‘aqal, ‘to bend or twist,’ and its derivatives appear only four times.² Significantly rendered ‘wrong’ (Hab. 1:4) is ‘crooked serpent’ (Isa. 27:1). I comment in the words of another:

Another remarkable fact about sin is that it is perversion or distortion (twah); it is a wrong or wrench, a twist to our nature (aqal), destroying the balance of our faculties, and making us prone to evil. Man is thrown out of his center and cannot recover himself, the consequence of which is that there is a jarring of the elements of his nature. Sin is not a new faculty or a new element introduced, but it is the confusion of the existing elements—which confusion the Son of God came to take away, and lead him once more to a loving and self-sacrificing trust in God.³

Instead, however, a carnal (fleshy, Gr. sarkikos) nature and appetites expressing it dominate what he thinks and does. It is enmity against God, is not and cannot be subject to the law of God, and hence cannot please God (Rom. 8:7). The ‘garden variety’ of homo sapiens, the natural (Gr. pseuchikos) man, cannot even understand spiritual truth on this account (1 Cor. 2:14). ‘By nature,’ as we say, he does that which Paul says is ‘against [created] nature’ even in ways animals do not ordinarily attempt (Rom. 1:26, 27 kjv). It is properly denominated sexual perversion—not alternate healthy lifestyle. Our affections, as sinners, are not well ordered. The young, in any well-ordered society, will ordinarily be guided in this regard by adults who should at least have gained some balance (see 2 Tim. 3:3 and innumerable sayings of Proverbs). Leaders in education, law, and even science and apostate religion may even have their moral-ethical system turned upside-down as Isaiah warned, ‘Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!’ (Isa. 5:20 kjv).

3. Paralysis. We have lost spiritual and moral power and become impotent in those respects,

‘when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly’ (Rom. 5:6 kjv). As the Bible and all its best interpreters take note, every man has the organs and natural facilities for genuine worship of God, love of neighbor and practice of holiness but they ‘do not work.’ Our spiritual and moral senses (and one wonders about recent developments in the aesthetical; witness what has happened to drama, literature and art) are only partially active at best until renewed by regeneration. Mankind are intellectually and morally ‘darkened ... hardened ... past feeling’ (Eph. 4:18, 19); ‘sometimes darkness’ (Eph. 5:8 kjv); their ‘consciences’ are ‘seared’ (1 Tim. 4:2). They are spiritually ‘blind’ and do not know it (Rev. 3:17) and ‘deceived’ by ‘sin’ (Heb. 3:13).

At this point the larger question arises: To what extent, if any, did the fall affect the intellectual faculties of mankind?—the ‘noetic effect of sin.’ We have already several times called attention to the doctrine of Rome that the ‘image of God’, man’s rational faculties, were left fully intact, but the ‘likeness,’ a superadded gift of righteousness and holiness, was lost.

Luther and his theological disciples to the present contend otherwise. I will let Lutheran authority Dr Francis Pieper speak to the point.

While natural man, after the Fall, still retains a certain amount of intelligence in natural things (Augustana, Art. XVII 1), he is utterly incapable of understanding spiritual matters. ... [then citing some of the texts I have cited on the paralysis of sin, he continues] Nor can any human schooling or culture remove this lack of intelligence.... The will of man gets the same rating. According to Scripture the will is not only opposed to the law of God, but cannot change its condition.... The intelligence of Adam suffered an eclipse, and his will is changed into an evil will. [Luther] Taking issue with Rome’s teaching to the loss of the divine image, merely a donum superadditum [superadded gift], left the natural powers of man essentially unimpaired ... ‘it is to be shunned as a deadly poison.’⁴

Similar quotations could be supplied from all the Reformers. The Protestant, evangelical creeds of the time all demonstrate the same doctrine and emphasis.

Noetic Wisdom in Ordinary Matters

Yet fierce as some of the denunciations of the position of Rome and however specific the portrayal of the spiritual darkness of the mind of natural man, it seems plain neither the Bible nor evangelical theology denigrate the powers of the human mind nor claims in ordinary worldly matters that regenerate people per se are ‘wiser’ than unregenerate. Did not Jesus Himself say: ‘the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light’ (Luke 16:8), and the learning of Moses ‘in all the wisdom of the Egyptians’ is connected with being ‘mighty in ... words and in deeds’ (Acts 7:22) and observed by Stephen with approval.

The problem of our logical competence or non-competence under the condition of sin arose early. Calvin commented that the Fathers before Augustine appeared to speak on both sides of the question because the issue had not yet been encountered squarely. ‘Nevertheless,’ said he, ‘it is not difficult to demonstrate that they, in the ambiguity of their teaching, held every human virtue in no or very slight esteem, but ascribed every good thing to the Holy Spirit.’⁵ Calvin assured his readers that his views are the same as Augustine’s.⁶ See Augustine on Nature and Grace.⁷ Calvin set in motion the Reformed doctrine of common grace in many passages of the Institutes, but laid it out in some detail in II.2.12–17.⁸

A master of the revived ‘humanities’ (i.e. classical learning) of the time, vividly displayed in everything he wrote, Calvin had a deep appreciation of what God, by what he called ‘general grace,’ had bestowed on all mankind. So what loss of general competence Adam as archetype in the fall lost for us all has been partially, sometimes in ‘special’ grace, restored. To sum up, he concludes at the beginning of a last page on the subject:

We see among all of mankind that reason is proper to our nature; it distinguishes us from brute beasts, just as they by possessing feeling, differ from inanimate things. Now, because some are born fools or stupid, that defect does not obscure the general grace of God. Rather, we are warmed by that spectacle that we ought to ascribe what is left in us to God’s kindness. For if he had not spared us, our fall would have entailed the destruction of our whole nature.⁹

I shall not attempt to improve on what I have quoted and cited. The one who reads the whole passage in the Institutes will be both blessed and humiliated by the knowledge of what being human is.

God’s Spirit continues to sustain us and prevent full paralysis; otherwise life in society would cease. Further, our faculties have not been equally affected. Those that have to do with man’s relationship with his Maker are inoperative. ‘[T]he message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing’ (1 Cor. 1:18 niv) and ‘The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them’ (1 Cor. 2:14 niv). ‘Accept’ (‘receive’ kjv) is Gr. dekomai to receive in sense of welcome (cf. Heb. 11:31). The disability is not merely that he cannot actively take—reach out and seize—but natural man does not leave the door of his heart open to God. He ‘cannot understand them’ because he lacks operative facility. He can understand worldly matters on an AM ‘receiver’ but he has no operative FM ‘receiver,’ so to speak, for spiritual matters. These facts have serious consequences for salvation. Clearly God must take the initiative in enlightening the mind before faith (to ‘receive,’ ‘accept’ Christ) can occur. Call it a special calling, illumination or regeneration; it has to come first. This, of course, leads to a strong doctrine of election (see 1 Cor. 12:3; Matt. 16:17; John 6:37, 39, 44, 45, 65). Nothing is more repulsive to unrenewed hearts and such an obstacle to worldly acceptance of Christianity and Christians. This theme is the burden of Martin Luther’s great book, The Bondage of the Will.

4. Bondage. Sin took away our liberty and reduced us to slavery. Jesus insisted, against the Pharisaic advocates of ‘free will’ in his day, that inborn, active depravity has made every man a bond-slave of sin. To commit sin—any sin at all—is to become a ‘bond-slave of sin’ (John 8:31–36, especially v. 34). According to ‘the Wise,’ our sins, each one, through habit become cords that bring us into bondage—‘His own iniquities shall take the wicked himself, and he shall be holden with the cords of his sins’ (Prov. 5:22 kjv). Even regenerate people (as Paul, himself, confesses) are, according to Romans 7:22–24, in such ‘captivity to the law of sin’ working in their bodily members that only Christ can save them from it. He asks, who ‘shall deliver me from the body of this death?.... Jesus Christ our Lord’ (Rom. 7:24, 25 kjv).

It is again precisely this fact that renders it important to distinguish between ‘free agency’ (i.e. self-determination of a sort), which without controversy every child of Adam has, and freedom of the human will, or even of human freedom of any kind in an absolute sense, which no one has. As indicated earlier, only the First Adam and the Last Adam had true moral freedom. The existentialist notion of authenticity as freedom (and of fulfillment) is really a hoax, no freedom at all but the nadir of despairing enslavement. Paul makes a strong point of being delivered into captivity to Christ, out of captivity to sin (2 Cor. 10:5).

5. Misery. Sin took away the joy of living and replaced it with the furtive existence of the fugitive and the vagabond before history passed the mile post of the fourth chapter of Genesis (Gen. 4:12, 13). Because of sins the circle of activity which constitutes life on this planet, originally intended to be blessed and the source of true pleasures, has always overtones of regret, pain, boredom, ennui: finally exhaustion and death. ‘You’ll never get out of here alive.’ Genesis 3 from verse 1 onward sets the archetypal tone. Sins undertaken in pursuit of pleasure unfailingly generate the opposite. ‘[Y]our sins have withheld good from you’ (Jer. 5:25 nkjv). Three times the prophet Isaiah points to restlessness as characteristic of the wicked; ‘no rest’ becomes the literary device for setting off the sections of chapters 40–66 into three equal parts, the first nine ending with ‘no rest’ (48:22), the second with the same (57:20, 21) and the third with the whole of chapter 66. Thus the misery of sin is woven into the very fabric of Scripture. ‘Even in laughter the heart may sorrow, And the end of mirth may be grief’ (Prov. 14:13; cf. v. 12 nkjv).

6. Guilt. Sin took away innocence and replaced it with guilt and depravity. Treated at length earlier, we are ‘by nature children of wrath’ (Eph. 2:3; cf. Rom. 3:19).

7. Death. Sin took away life and replaced it with death (also treated at length earlier). ‘[T]he wages of sin is death’ (Rom. 6:23)—death physical, spiritual and eternal.

Total Depravity?

Calvinistic theology, in controversy with Pelagians, Socinians, and some (not all) early followers of Arminius, called Remonstrants, employed the term ‘total depravity.’ By this they meant not that any person is as bad as he can be but that the perversion of normality and paralysis of spiritual powers consequent on original sin affect every aspect of every human being: (1) ‘that the inherent corruption extends to every part of man’s nature, to all the faculties and powers of both soul and body; and [2] that there is no spiritual good, that is in relation to God, in the sinner at all, but only perversion.’¹⁰ I seldom use the term, because, unless explained carefully, it is thought to mean there are no admirable traits, no benevolence, disinterested works or kindly thoughts except among genuine Christians. Lewis and Demarest are aware of this problem and helpfully suggest ‘holistic depravity.’ This conveys better than ‘total depravity’ the fact that all our abilities and best achievements are tainted by evil without implying that we all are as bad as we could possibly be. ‘No capacity of unrenewed nature escapes the taint of our sinful hearts.’¹¹ Quite to the contrary, the ‘heathen’ get some things right. As Paul says, the ‘Gentiles, who do not have the law, by nature do the things in the law ... who show the work of the law written in their hearts,’ whose consciences give them fairly reliable ‘witness’ (Rom. 2:14, 15 nkjv). Luke, the author of two long books of the New Testament, was quite aware that kindness exists in many human hearts who have never heard of Christ and that they are sometimes rewarded for their kindness in this life, if not in the next. When Paul and his shipmates were wrecked on the Island of Malta, says Luke (who was along on the voyage), ‘[T]he natives showed us unusual kindness; for they kindled a fire and made us all welcome, because of the rain that was falling and because of the cold’ (Acts 28:2 nkjv). They were shortly rewarded when ‘the rest of those on the island who had diseases also came and were healed’ (Acts 28:9 nkjv). Similarly, Publius: one ‘of the leading citizen[s] of the island ... received us and entertained us courteously for three days’ and was rewarded when Paul visited Publius’ sick father, prayed for him, laid his hands on him and healed him (Acts 28:7 nkjv).

Total Inability?

The same controversies of immediately post-Reformation times produced the term ‘total inability’ by which was meant (1) the unrenewed sinner cannot perform any work of righteousness that meets the standards that prevail in the kingdom of God. For example, even the upright Nicodemus, Jesus said, was not spiritually able even to see, much less enter the kingdom of God: ‘I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.... Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God’ (John 3:3, 5 kjv). In failing to love God and to fear Him in every act there is nothing the unrenewed person can do to please God—‘they that are in the flesh cannot please God’ (Rom. 8:8 kjv). (2) Further, the unrenewed sinner is without power to change his fundamental preference for self and sin to God and righteousness. The initiative for change must proceed from the Spirit of God (John 3:3, 5). The Bible provides no guide to procedures for obtaining this renewal, even though ‘God ... now commandeth all men every where to repent’ (Acts 17:30 kjv). ‘The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit’ (John 3:8 kjv). As Jesus also said, ‘No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him’ (John 6:44 kjv). This does not mean the ordinary unrenewed sinner may not have many elevating aspirations and strive for better things. This plain fact of Scripture must not be separated from the further teaching that the Holy Spirit of God is in the world graciously ‘striving’ and ‘convicting’ or ‘convincing’ the world in respect of sin, righteousness and judgment (John 16:8–11). Many a boy or girl—by Whose promptings only eternity can reveal—has vowed:

Build thee more stately mansions. O my soul, as the swift seasons roll!

Leave thy low vaulted past!

Let each new temple, nobler than the last,

Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,

Till thou at length art free,

Leaving thine outgrown shell by life’s unresting sea!¹²

Any such strivings which are ‘of faith’ are induced by the special life-imparting action of the Spirit, normally employing the means of grace—someone’s prayer, some communication of the gospel—for ‘Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.’ ‘How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? ... and how shall they hear without a preacher?... So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God’ (Rom. 10:14, 17).

Concluding Reflections

I close this section of the volume with some regretful reflections about sin’s irrational presence in a world ordered by a God whose name is holy and the unwelcome necessity of discussing such a monstrous thing. Who, in writing a volume like this one, would not prefer to confine the subject to an obscure footnote or a brief appendix? I have indeed confined it to a condensed treatment in the shortest section. G. C. H. Berkouwer, who has written numerous large volumes of theology, produced his book on sin rather late in his career. It is the largest (599 pages in English translation) of the series, but with the shortest title, simply, ‘Sin’. On the surface it seems strange the great Dutch scholar could say sin is ‘a riddle that is truly an “objective” and “essential” enigma ... an “ineffableness” that has no analogue in the ineffableness of God’s works (Berkouwer, Sin, p. 135) and then write 600 pages about it.

My choice has been to summarize what might be said. Almost every paragraph might be enlarged. Yet, it may rightly be claimed that from this point onward this entire volume focuses on the problem of sin. Christology, or the Provision of Salvation from Sin is next. Then comes Soteriology, or the Application of Redemption from Sin; after that Ecclesiology, or the Assembly of Redeemed Sinners saved from Sin and finally Eschatology, concerning the final destiny of Redeemed Sinners and the consummation in the City of God. Of that City it is said, ‘They will bring into it the glory and honor of the nations. But nothing unclean will ever enter it, nor any one who does what is detestable or false, but only those who are written in the Lamb’s book of life’.

BDB Brown, Driver and Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament

¹ See Carl Schultz in TWOT, p. 652.

² See Ronald Ballen in TWOT, p. 692.

³ McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature Vol. IX, p. 765.

⁴ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics I (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950), pp. 543–545.

⁵ Calvin, Institutes II, 2.9.

⁶ ibid., 2.12.

⁷ Augustine, On Nature and Grace iii.3; xix.21; xx.22 in NPNF vol V, pp. 122–127 ff.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

⁸ See pp. 270–277 in Battles Westminster Ed. of 1960.

⁹ Calvin, Institutes II, 2.17, p. 276.

¹⁰ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint, 1979), p. 247.

¹¹ Gordon R. Lewis and Bruce A. Demarest, Integrative Theology II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), p. 211.

¹² Oliver Wendell Holmes, ‘The Chambered Nautilus’, lines 30–35.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (413). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 4

CHRISTOLOGY

Person and Work of Christ

1

Introduction to Christology

An expression frequently encountered in Christian theology is ‘the person and work of Christ.’ It designates the subject matter of Christology, which might be stated as, Jesus Christ, who He was and what He came to do. It is to be observed that the frequency of occurrence of the full expression testifies that no understanding of the work of Jesus Christ is possible apart from an understanding of who He was and is.

The centrality of Jesus Christ’s Person and work in Christian belief is indicated in the ‘Apostles’ Creed,’ the earliest of the ‘ecumenical’ creeds, in continuous use in the church now for over 1,500 years. It is still today used in public worship, baptismal confession and instruction of the young in most of the branches of Christendom in all parts of the world. In the common English translation it reads:

I believe in God the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost; born of the virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead and buried; he descended into hell [a late addition]; the third day he rose again from the dead, he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. Amen.

There are 109 words in this creed: 69 of them relate to Jesus Christ directly and of these 21 relate to His Person while 48 relate to His work. This proportion is an accurate representation of the emphasis given in true Christianity.

The ancient creed cited is little more than a brief selection from and summary of the New Testament Scriptures. In these Scriptures there is constant focus on the fact that Jesus was destined, indeed, predestined, to accomplish His work by dying for the sins of men. Jesus did not say much about it, for He did not come to talk about dying, rather to die. Yet Jesus did make Himself plain, ‘... the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many’ (Matt. 20:28). Immediately after His announcement of purpose to build ‘my church’ (Matt. 16:13–18) it is reported, ‘From that time Jesus began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things from the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised’ (Matt. 16:21). To Peter, Jesus’ crucifixion was by the ‘definite plan and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23) and His sacrifice was 'precious blood ... of a lamb ... foreknown before the foundation of the world' (1 Peter 1:19, 20) and to John the Revelator He is 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' (Rev. 13:8 kjv). So central is a proper understanding of the death of Christ to biblical Christianity that the Apostle Paul could write to the churches where he preached, 'I decided [determined kjv] to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified' (1 Cor. 2:2). In keeping with this emphasis the cross has been almost the only universal symbol of their faith employed by Christians.

Theologians differ as to the proper name for this division of systematic theology. To avoid confusion as much as possible let us try to sort out these names. Some of them are used for more than one aspect—redemption and reconciliation for example can designate the whole of Christ's Person and work, or His work only, or even a specific aspect of Jesus' sacrifice for sin. The context wherein the word appears will determine what the author means. Salvation and soteriology are employed by some for Christ's Person, work and the application of the same to sinners (election, justification, faith, etc.). Objective soteriology means the same as the Person and work of Christ while subjective soteriology means what happens in and for sinners who are 'saved'—such as election, regeneration and justification.

To amplify, soteriology has two parts. The first part is summarized in Ephesians 1:7, 'In him we have redemption through his blood'—Christ, His Person and work on our behalf—the second in Romans 8:28–30, viz. foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justification, sanctification and glorification, that is to say, application of His work to us sinners. Our interest now is in the first part only, Christ, His Person and work.

Some authors restrict Christology to the doctrine of Christ's Person and soteriology to His work.¹

Throughout this book the plan of treatment stays as close as possible to the actual scriptural presentation of Jesus Christ but also with due respect to the immense amount of historical and traditional treatment of the Person of Jesus Christ and interpretation of His career of redemption. This approach incorporates the traditional 'person and work' but centers first on the Person of Christ through His redemptive career from beginning to consummation. In each stage of the study, facts, and interpretation of the facts, constitutes the doctrine. This, done in orderly fashion, constitutes systematic theology as opposed to speculative religious thought, which currently is in fashion, especially in liberal literature.

The first aspects of treatment relate to the Person of Jesus Christ, represented here by abbreviated chapter titles: 1) Preparation, 2) Preexistence, 3) Deity, Part One, 4) Deity, Part Two, 5) Humanity, 6) Virgin Birth, 7) Incarnation, 8) The Theopneustos. The eighth will of necessity make reference to the historical development of the Christology of orthodoxy and the Christological heresies that led to the formation of the ecumenical creeds.

All that follows, on to the end of the book relates to the redemptive work of Christ, what He came to do by virtue of what and who He is and was and ever shall be. These topics are 9) Topics, Terms, Issues, 10) Humiliation and Escalation, 11) Sinless Life, 12) Passion and Death, 13) The Revealed Mystery, 14) Vocabulary of Atonement, 15) Vicarious Satisfaction, 16) Extent of Atonement, 17) Further Benefits, 18) Before Anselm, 19) Resurrection I, 20) Resurrection II, 21) Ascension, 22)

Session, 23) Present Priestly Activity. Number 11, Sinless Life of Obedience, will include brief attention to the doctrine of the two states of humiliation and exaltation, as well as the offices of prophet, priest and king and number 12, the Death of Christ, of course, is where the doctrine of atonement will appear.

This scheme is not as different from traditional approaches as it might first appear. The nearest approach to a precedent for this structure of Christology is Body of Divinity by John Gill (first published 1769).² Though my emphasis on the declarative mode in teaching doctrine is more focused on meeting the student mind than Berkouwer's steady interaction with European theology, my ordering of the subject is similar to his as I found out when I was deep in a career of teaching theology. (See G. C. H. Berkouwer, The Person of Christ, 1954, 1973 and The Work of Christ, Eerdmans, 1965). The chief influences on my taking this route probably were Calvin (Institutes, Book II, 'The Knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, First Disclosed to the Fathers Under the Law, and Then to us In the Gospel') and A. J. McClain, my theology teacher during seminary training. His thought was in turn shaped by the orthodox faculty of theology at old Xenia (Presbyterian) Seminary in the days of its greatness, of which he often spoke.

The communicator's principle of selectivity in exposition must be rather severely applied. Christ is the theme of both Testaments, latent in the Old, patent in the New, but we must select and summarize. As to Christ in the Old Testament, E. W. A. Hengstenberg's still important Christology of the Old Testament runs to three large volumes. Yet, Oehler summarized 'Messiah, Messianic Prophecy' in five columns of the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia and Schaff entered only nine lines in his once famous article on 'Christology' in the same series. The same range of variety exists in recent volumes. Every decent volume of O.T. or N.T. theology treats Christology at some length and new volumes go to press on aspects of the subject every year. If someone desires to know everything in those books, let him read them. My treatment must be fiercely selective.

There are several questions, really more apologetical than strictly theological, that some think press for attention in introducing a book of Christology. First, shall we report the critical attacks on the truthfulness of the historic New Testament presentation of Jesus Christ onward from David Straus' book, The Life of Jesus, 1835, which used the new word 'myth' to characterize the Gospel reports of Jesus' supernatural character and miraculous works, to the 1977 symposium, The Myth of God Incarnate (ed. John Hick)? Second, shall we trace the search for the historical Jesus through its three main stages over the last 150 years? Third, shall we consider the question raised by Emil Brunner in The Mediator (1934) (my introduction to neo-orthodoxy in about 1943) whether Christology should start with the alleged kerygma,³ especially Paul's proclamation (true or not) or, with Pannenberg, should we start with historical inquiry into critical events in the life and career of Jesus the so-called Christology from below? Fourth, shall we occupy ourselves with New Testament criticism to decide what the scholars (form critics; redaction critics; literary, text and audience critics; etc.) have decided is authentic? And Fifth, shall we pursue the ballooning chatter about hermeneutics before we interpret testimony of the Gospels and Epistles about the Person and work of Christ?

Frankly, I know no way to include any of this growing mountain of critical literature without attention to all of it. I am grateful to have had time and opportunity to read much of this literature and the responses in books and articles by conservative scholars. I have even taught seminary courses on several of these questions. But for the purposes of this treatise, pursuit of these avenues is neither possible nor fruitful.

W. G. Kümmel, one of the clearest and cleverest writers among recent generations of critical writers, said no one should try to form a Christology until the critics decide what Jesus really said and did. I cite from an earlier writing of my own.⁴

Kümmel asserted ... that the gospel accounts were tendentious, that is, they were twisted to prove a point. In Kümmel's opinion, the various critics should sort out the layers until they learn what Jesus really said. Only then would they be able to construct a theology on the basis of the true message of Jesus, relieved of the overlay that reflected the biases of the church about ad 60 and of the writers and their sources—Mark, Q, M, and L. Kümmel said: 'In the oldest tradition of Jesus' message, to be ascertained by critical methods, we meet with the Jesus whose historical message alone confirms the correctness of the apostolic message. To set forth this oldest message is therefore not only a historical task, but one that is theologically indispensable, and no hermeneutic mistake.'⁵ In other words, we must all become committed adherents to and masters of Form Criticism before being qualified theologians.

Most debate on these questions continues quite apart from the churches, both laymen and pastors. Many participants are using academic clothing as a cloak for attack on historic Christianity. The discussion hardly illuminates divine revelation of God in Christ and it obscures the sublime simplicity of the eyewitnesses. The mighty volume of books, articles and seminars does provide a wonderful platform on which dilettantes may ply their trade, look and sound industrious and wise so as to maintain a respectable modus vivendi.

There are more practical questions to attend: How shall we package the biblical materials in manageable size? I follow four principles. First, keep the aspects of Christology distinct for discussion purposes one at a time and do not digress. Second, limit the discussion to what is necessary clearly to tie Christology in its every aspect to Scripture. Third, pay decent respect to the attainments of the first Christian centuries in formulating a doctrine in response to heresies and as light broke into their minds from individual study of Scripture, and to their ordering of logical statement and consensus in mutual counsel. I am referring to the writings of the church Fathers and the ancient creeds, confessions and definitions, especially the Nicene Creed and the Definition of Chalcedon. But let us not let the immensity of the history of doctrinal development distract from stating Christian doctrine for today's students, pastors, teachers and lay people. Fourth and perhaps definitively, Paul stated the sufficient rule in reflecting on his whole three-and-one-half years of indoctrinating the elders and people of the church at Ephesus, viz.: 'I did not shrink from declaring to you anything that was profitable, and teaching you ... faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.' Then he adds, 'I did not shrink from declaring to you the whole counsel of God [emphasis added]' (Acts 20:20, 21, 27). So, introduce as much as is profitable for the intended readers (or listeners) and to do so in the context of the whole of that system of thought we receive as biblical and Christian.

On this point Christology is not primarily a voyage of discovery. Godly people of long ago have already found the Messiah. As Philip must have blurted to Nathanael, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the Law and also the prophets wrote, Jesus of Nazareth' (John 1:45). Most readers of books like this one have already made up their minds to 'follow Jesus' and expect the treatise to expound historic, orthodox Christology. I hope my readers will be like Paul's audience in Acts 20 above, who when Paul closed his remarks 'knelt down and prayed' together (Acts 20:36). One of their number was no doubt Timothy, who at Ephesus in Paul's absence had already been fulfilling his instruction: 'Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine [emphasis added]' (1 Tim. 4:13 kjv). This 'profitable' doctrine of 'faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ,' which Paul 'received from the Lord Jesus' (Acts 20:21, 24) could be summarized, and adequately preached and mastered by teachers and their congregations. We are therefore not ploughing new ground here. We assume some degree of maturity in Christ among our readers as Paul did among the pastoral leadership of his time.

I cite the following to explain why our excursion into recent and contemporary Christologies will be a brief one.

In the last analysis contemporary Christology has in many respects confused rather than clarified the extended revelation of the Word of God. It is, therefore, more important to discover what Paul or John says about Jesus Christ than to follow the latest learned theological pronouncement.⁶

The same goes for the philosopher-theologians since the time of David Strauss, referred to earlier. Yet, the Christologies of neo-orthodox and existentialist theologians of the epoch since World War II are still being expounded, hence, teachers of the church today need to know something about them. They prepared the way for the current situation among the so-called mainline theologians and the fringes of orthodoxy.

Wolfhart Pannenberg proposes a contrast between 'Christology from above' (traditional) and 'from below' (liberal since Schliermacher).⁷ Regarding the 'from below' approach, David Wells has said:

Christology from 'below' produces only a larger-than-life religious figure, the perfection of what many others already experience. The common assumption of these Christologies is that different theological workers can build a tower the point of which will pierce heaven itself, if only they sweat and toil over it long enough. They will not succeed. Their towers, their Christologies from 'below,' are never more than pictures of the ideal religious person, pictures which all too often merely personify their fabricators. Their Christs might be admired, but they cannot be worshiped.⁸

Of continuing importance to Christology is existentialism. Existentialism is a name for philosophy that distinguishes between what being or essence of someone or something is in and of itself and what it is or becomes in history. For example man lives in 'existence' not 'essence.' Essence is a name for what something is in and of itself apart from what it is or becomes in the world. So an orthodox theologian might say what Adam was before the 'fall' was essence. What he became afterward was and is existence. Only before the fall were essence and existence the same. Afterward essence became only a goal to attain, something like authenticity. Existential is the opposite of detachment. Existentialists are not interested in metaphysical analysis but in personal involvement.

The distinction is, of course, a bit like Plato's ideas that attain real form only partially in this world and Aristotle's potentiality (essence) and actuality (existence). Essence is the opposite of non-being, i.e. being. Authentic existence is attainment of authentic being.

We cannot present here a complete description of the several philosophies of existentialism.

I think of the writings of Paul Tillich⁹ as the end point of any positive development of liberal (enlightenment) theology. Though more social philosopher than theologian, his work should be mentioned here for several reasons. First, he created an extensive vocabulary for dialectical (neo-orthodox, krisis) theology, a vocabulary which is now employed by many theological writers (ultimate concern, correlation, etc.). Secondly, he took existentialist theology as far as it could go in any positive direction. Thirdly, the seeds of the God-is-dead theology and subsequent post-modernism and even of New-Ageism (latent pantheism) are all in his writings, perhaps even process theology. Finally, in a positive way, many important social, historical and theological findings of Tillich's liberal predecessors (R. Otto, E. Troeltsch) were formative in his thought and passed on in his writings. Bibliographies of literature about him are of amazing length and continue to grow. There is even a Tillich Society, which meets regularly.

Our interest here must be limited to his Christology—the subject of the second of his three volumes.

Tillich erected a system of theology employing throughout the categories of existentialism. Though called neo-orthodox it is not really orthodox at all. Perhaps Barth and Brunner succeeded in attaching a semi-orthodoxy to a semi-existentialist framework but Tillich selectively preserved only the orthodox frame without any discernable orthodox content.

Other existentialists, with overtly humanistic, non-Christian outlooks, constructed respectable analyses of reality (Jaspers, Heidegger and Sartre). Dostoevski defined Greek orthodoxy in existentialist terms, Marcel with Roman Catholic-Thomist presuppositions, as Pascal with Augustinian, and Kierkegaard with Lutheran presuppositions. Each of these Christian existentialists had an approximately orthodox Christology but not Tillich. One can mouth his phrases and sound orthodox yet be as apostate as the atheist Marx himself. Tillich's theology is in part a grafting of the human-social analysis of depth psychology upon the skeleton frame of orthodox Christian theology. The fall and sin now reappear as ambiguity, abyss, estrangement, angst (anxiety), autonomy, etc.; justification and sanctification as authenticity, freedom, acceptance, theonomy and the like. God is ground of being, being in itself. Religion is simply a matter of 'ultimate concerns' and theology is statement of these concerns in whatever social, linguistic and philosophical climate the religious man finds himself, whether third-century Hellenism or eighteenth-century Enlightenment. Tillich himself is a 'dialectical' theologian with 'yes and no' borrowings from an admirably wide reading from ancient to recent times.

Of importance to this book is his existential 'Christology.' We can be brief. Existentialist salvation is to rise from inauthentic existence to authentic existence, which may be defined as attainment of essence or essential being. Essential being is to participate in 'new being.' The New Being is Tillich's name for Christ.

Christology is defined in terms of depth psychology and social analysis, not in relation to Christian sources but to Tillich's own vocabulary of social-psychological analysis.

He led toward some 'norm'¹⁰—toward which to relate what he calls the 'symbols' (form) of revelatory events (material) in stating theology.

He said, '[T]oday man experiences his present situation in terms of description, conflict, self-destruction, meaninglessness, and despair in all realms of life.' His name for the 'tragic structures' that 'actualize' the tragedy of the human situation is 'demonic.' In this desperate situation we cannot any longer employ the Reformation recourse to a 'merciful God and the forgiveness of sins' or, as in the ancient Greek church, by adjustment to 'finitude, death and error' or as in more recent efforts at improvement of 'personal religious life' (evangelical puritanism, revivalism), or 'christianization of culture and society' (liberal religion). It is by overcoming self-estrangement, reconciliation, reunion, creativity, meaning and hope. 'We shall call such a reality the New Being.' 'Where is this New Being manifest'? Tillich asks. He responds, 'Systematic theology answers ... "In Jesus the Christ!"'¹¹

'The New Being in Jesus as the Christ' is our 'ultimate concern.'¹² How distant Tillich's conception is from an orthodox Christ is apparent throughout, never more clearly than in his 'Spirit Christology' where the New Being, he says, may be experienced in many religions. He was in many ways the forerunner of New Ageism quite as much as of the God-is-dead movement. 'The faith of the Christ is the state of being grasped unambiguously by the Spiritual presence.'¹³ R. Allan Killen was correct in this disparaging comment after subjecting all Tillich's writings to a cool Calvinist critique: 'The Christ which Tillich produces is not the Christ of the Bible.'¹⁴

The emptiness of Tillich's 'Christology' is plain in J. L. Adams' comment: 'Tillich says that the Christ symbol cannot be separated from the historical figure. But nothing concrete is taken up by the Christ symbol from the historical reality except the symbol of the cross, which, as he himself says, is a symbol of self-immolation before the unconditional transcendent.'¹⁵ A quote from C. J. Armbruster is interesting, 'Tillich ... never uses 'Christ' as a personal name, but always as a title or symbol.'¹⁶

Even Reinhold Niebuhr criticized Tillich for his 'ontological speculations.' He went 'too far,' Niebuhr thought, in removing the 'Genesis myth' of man's creation and fall from the realm of real history. The story is about what man has always been from the moment he first evolved from irrational beast to rational man, interpreted in the new language of Tillichian speculative theology. It's really the story of man's existential estrangement from his essence and the ground of being as well as from other beings. It means that man as he exists is not what he essentially is and ought to be.¹⁷ Niebuhr rightly rejected this Tillichian way of relieving us of responsibility for our evil hearts and making us instead victims of fate.¹⁸

This speculation is preparatory for speculation about the correction of estrangement by the New Being, wherever it happens, which in Tillichian phraseology is Jesus the Christ.

Niebuhr and Macquarrie and other dialectical (paradoxical) neo-orthodox theologians are rarely as transparently unbound by scriptural norms as Tillich, but they partake of the same freedom from what the Bible really says. Brunner and Barth feel somewhat more bound to some degree of literalism.

Let us spare ourselves the Christology of current process theology. This brief excursion should be enough to show that thorough examination of recent and current Christologies that depart from orthodox norms will not help us form a truly biblical Christology.

The method of this study is to look back on the whole Bible in all its parts and from that outlook give systematic statement about our Lord Jesus Christ. We will frequently need to trace how an idea or fact developed in the N.T., but only to clarify something or to define it, not merely to provide historical information. Most of the inductive processes of biblical theology should be finished before the systematic synthesis begins.

Christology may rightly begin with Jesus' question asked of the disciples in the region of Caesarea: 'whom say ye that I am' (kjv), still more literally, 'Ye say me to be whom?' (Matt. 16:15). The question was addressed to all the disciples as the niv modern English 'you' instead of 'ye' somewhat obscures. The question is a rather uncommon infinitive clause that in Greek as well as English requires both subject and object in accusative (objective) case, viz.: 'me to be whom?' hence the 'whom' of kjv.

But only one of the ye answered, Peter, whose answer was not the work of a council of 12 Apostles or 315 Nicenes, but as must always be the case in saving belief, the individual believer's heartfelt Latin, 'Credo'—I believe. The answer had to be a theological statement. Despite objections from some New Testament theologians, Jesus must be understood as referring to Himself as the Son of Man, not some other third party as is clear from parallel Mark 8:27 where me is parallel with Son of Man in Matthew 16:13.

The answer had to be a theological statement of what we now call orthodox Christology, including our Lord's (1) heavenly origin (Son of Man, Dan. 7:14; cf. Mark 14:61–64), (2) essential deity (Son of the Living God) as well as (3) essential humanity (Son of Man, and presupposed known human lineage) and (4) Messiahship ('the Christ'). Paul Tillich would have us believe, 'Without this reception the Christ would not have been the Christ' interpreted as 'the manifestation of the New Being in time and space,' in Tillichian theology as being neither alienated from self or from God.¹⁹

Peter had gained the right impressions and had come to a believing conviction over a period of time beginning with his call to discipleship. The culminating event was the miraculous feeding of the 5,000 shortly before Jesus resorted to regions about Philippi, according to Matthew. It was now time for the Twelve to decide the right answer to the Baptist's inquiry (Matt. 11:3).

There is no hint that any of the others yet fully shared Peter's conviction. Our Lord's 'Blessed art thou' was addressed to one only, Simon Bar Jonas. Why only Peter? The others saw the same things and heard the same words over the same period of time. Some who heard and saw called Him a sinner, a blasphemer, an agent of Beelzebub. Their hearts were hardened, their eyes blinded (see Matt. 13:11–16; John 12:37–40). Peter's heart had been enlightened and softened by the Word and the Spirit of the Father. No human agency (v. 17), rather the Spirit, had brought him to that 'blessed' condition (1 Cor. 12:1–3) and the Spirit works sovereignly (John 3:8). (See Part 5: Soteriology: Salvation Applied).

Peter's confession, being a divinely inspired answer to 'Who is the Son of Man?' must be accepted as an adequate seminal statement of a true ‘Christology.’

Though challenged by certain N.T. critics, there is no doubt that by ‘Son of Man’ Jesus was referring to Himself (cf. the parallel Mark 8:27). ‘Son of Man’ signifies many things. (1) His heavenly origin (Dan. 7:14; John 3:13), (2) His humanity (so the words mean when Ezekiel is called ‘son of man’) and so the expression is employed in the Old Testament and (3) our Lord’s incarnation. The expression ‘Son of Man’ in contemporary Jewish understanding meant (4) deity as the high priest’s reaction to Jesus’ admission shows (Mark 14:61–64; cf. Dan. 7:14).²⁰

‘The Christ’ refers to the promised messiah of O.T. expectation. This is not immediately clear because transmission of an idea through archaic custom and five languages is involved. The ancient Hebrews inducted their kings and priests (sometimes prophets also) to office by a ceremony of pouring oil on the head of the candidate (anointing). The Hebrew word for anoint is mashaḥ and meshiaḥ (Messiah) means anointed. The Aramaic of Palestine spoken by Peter was similar to the Hebrew. Hence by loose transliteration we have messiah in English. But Greek for anoint is chrío; for anointed, christos (of a male), in Latin the nominative masculine us ending for nouns gives christus. Our English word Christ is the Latin word with the case ending removed. (Greeks sometimes name children Christos. Our Greek lady guide in Corinth, calling Christos, our Greek bus driver, from a distance, shouted the vocative CHRISTO-O-O-O.)

‘Son of the living God.’ This means that Peter had already seen far more in Jesus than the usual Jewish expectation that their messiah would be merely one of their own selected by God for His eminent ability and devotion, as for example, David. Peter had seen Jesus in action, had taken note of His amazing claims and drew the proper inference that Jesus was divine in a sense no other being on earth could be. This is not the only hint of acknowledgment of deity in Peter’s confession, but it is the plainest. (See John 5:18; 10:30–33.)

Though it is customary to call Peter’s statement a confession, it really is more than that. It is a statement of faith more like a bit of dogma or doctrinal formula than a credo (‘I believe’). It is quite proper to call it dogma or doctrine. Here is the beginning of Christology, not inductive ‘biblical theology’ as now understood, but systematic theology, informed by biblical theology.

Peter’s confession is sufficient explanation why the first Christians were understood to be a people who worshipped a Person called ‘Jesus’—and very soon ‘Christ,’ employed as a name more than a title. They actually prayed to Jesus. This is, of course, anticipating the doctrine of the triune God and of the two natures of Christ, the theanthropic Person.

That Peter when he uttered the words, understood by them in detail all that we now understand, is not of course asserted; but that they were his testimony to the true Humanity and true Divinity of the Lord, in that sense of deep truth and reliance, out of which springs the Christian life of the Church.²¹

Further comment on Peter’s discernment is appropriate. In saying ‘Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona’ (Matt. 16:17 kjv) on this occasion Jesus is not speaking casually but making a solemn pronouncement. Very clearly, in the language of Matthew 11:25–27, God had revealed Himself in the Son, the Son had willed to reveal the Father to Peter. This later occurred again when in a special manner, reserved for Paul, God in Christ chose to reveal Himself to the Apostle ‘as to one untimely born’ (1 Cor. 15:8).

This is not to say that the revelation to Peter in its seminal stage was clear in every respect. The full ‘truth’ became clear only with the completeness of ‘all the truth’ (John 16:13) that came to the Apostles, after the coming of the Holy Spirit and was enscripturated in the completed New Testament.

Over twenty-five times beginning with Matthew 13:11 and on to the book of Revelation 17:5 certain facts of revelation are called mysteries. Some of them are the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13), the future salvation of natural Israel (Rom. 11:25), the openness of the church to Gentile and Jew (Eph. 3:3–9), of the union of the church with Christ (Eph. 5:32), and of the theanthropic Person of Christ—the incarnation itself (1 Tim. 3:16). The last mystery is the one made known to Peter and ‘confessed’ by him at Caesarea Philippi.

A revealed mystery (mysterion), being supernaturally made known, is not necessarily open to empirical investigation or capable of rational explanation. Mystery should be distinguished from paradox in its proper sense, which is seeming contradiction capable of being adjusted to univocal statement when all facts are known. Dialectical theology, which loves paradox, sometimes (especially Barth) seems to mean real contradiction by paradox and appears to ask us to believe real contradiction. Such might better be called antinomy. There are no antinomies, as such, in a real world, though there may seem to be. Paul’s disparagement of worldly wisdom in the early chapters of 1 Corinthians did not prevent him from employing the law of non-contradiction in Romans 11:6. There are no Pauline oxymorons. God does not equivocate, which means to use the same word with shifted meaning without indicating the shift. It is to deceive. God’s Word, however paradoxical (seemingly contradictory) it may be, is always univocal, never equivocal, for He is a ‘God, that cannot lie’ (Titus 1:2; cf. Heb. 6:18).

The divine mysteries are addressed to faith before understanding. Understanding can wait till God gives further information, which may be forever. Theology that tries to explore the mysteries without faith, as in this long extended ‘age of reason,’ or ‘enlightenment,’ has done little for real theology and much to harm it. Anselm of Canterbury’s idea of ‘faith in search of understanding’ in his Proslogion gave classical expression to this outlook, now being recovered somewhat in liberal circles.²² They also err who reject rational analysis and arrangement as in all who give little place to revelation as imparting facts, data, propositions of objective truth (neo-orthodoxy and post-modern theologies). The divinely revealed mysteries together with every datum of biblical historical truth can be placed in logically conceived order. The seemingly random facts of nature, whether of inorganic things (geology, chemistry, physics) or of organic (biology, botany, zoology), perhaps even of human thought-life and emotion (psychology, sociology), have been organized into learned disciplines. Otherwise we would have no civilization. The same is true of the Bible and its truths. Systematic theology, including Christology, is a necessary enterprise, someone has said, to keep thoughtful Christians from going crazy!

I must excuse myself and readers at this stage of our study from pursuing the negative course of that variety of New Testament ‘research’ which, coming to climax in W. Wrede and A. Schweitzer over a century ago, moved through their successors to the ‘Jesus Seminar.’ It has indirectly born some good fruit by stimulating careful reexamination of assumptions about the texts employed to support the church’s creeds, confessions and orthodox Christology but little by way of direct contributions. The Christ who emerges from these authors looks more like themselves than the Christ of Gospels, Epistles and the Apocalypse. Who are they to tell us out of their own modern cultural prejudices how the only sources came to be or what they mean? I cite Anthony Bertocci, a competent contemporary orthodox writer to the same effect. After sketching these ‘broad tendencies in New Testament scholarship’ he asks:

Why is it that only now, two thousand years after the event, we are at last beginning to understand what Christianity is all about? But, of course, by the word we what is in view is only an elite coterie of scholars. There are masses of Christians all over the world, who have no ability to pick their way through the layers of literary tradition in Scripture and are quite incapable of digressing on the differences between Historie and Geschichte. Are we to suppose that the real interpretation of Jesus is alone accessible only to a tiny minority in the church—its learned scholars—and that the remainder of Christian believers is excluded from such knowledge? To suppose such a thing is to subject the meaning of Scripture to a far more restrictive ‘tradition’ than anything proposed by Rome in the sixteenth century [Reformation era] and to invest our new magisterium [Roman Catholic teaching authority]—the coterie of learned scholars—with an authority more stifling and far-reaching than the Roman Catholic magisterium ever exercised ... The Scriptures must be returned to the Church.²³

¹ Philip Schaff, ‘Christology,’ in Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, or A Religious Encyclopaedia: or Dictionary of Biblical, Historical, Doctrinal and Practical Theology i, based on the Real-Encyclopaedia of Herzog, Plitt and Hauck, ed. Schaff (New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co., 1891), p. 451. See also R. A. Cole, ‘Christology,’ Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible i, ed. Tenney (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1975), p. 805.

² John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity i (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978 repr. of 1839 edition), see the ‘Contents of vol. i,’ p. xxxiii and Book iv, ‘Manifestation of the Covenant of Grace,’ pp. 491–644.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

³ Emil Brunner, Jesus—God and Man (1968) and Dogmatics Theology ii (1952).

⁴ R. D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984), pp. 157, 158.

⁵ W. G. Küemmel, Promise and Fulfillment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus (Naperville: Alec R. Allenson, 1957), p. 105.

⁶ John Walvoord, Jesus Christ our Lord (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), p. 9.

⁷ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology vol. ii, trans. G. W. Bromily (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), pp. 278 ff.

⁸ David F. Wells, The Person of Christ: A Biblical and Historical Analysis of the Incarnation (Westchester: Crossway Books, 1984), p. 172.

⁹ The summaries to follow are drawn mainly from Tillich's volume of 'Christology,' Systematic Theology ii (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957).

¹⁰ Tillich, Systematic Theology i, p. 28.

¹¹ ibid., p. 49.

¹² ibid., p. 50.

¹³ ibid., iii, p. 46.

¹⁴ R. Allan Killen, The Ontological Theology of Paul Tillich, (Kampen: J. H. Kok, 1956), p. 240.

¹⁵ J. L. Adams, Paul Tillich's Philosophy of Culture, Science and Religion (New York: Harper & Row, 1965), p. 273.

¹⁶ C. J. Armbruster, The Vision of Paul Tillich (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1967), p. 290

¹⁷ Tillich, Systematic Theology ii, p. 45.

¹⁸ Reinhold Niebuhr, 'Biblical Thought and Ontological Speculation,' in The Theology of Paul Tillich, ed. Kegley and Bretall (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1952, 1961), pp. 216, 217.

¹⁹ Tillich, Systematic Theology ii, pp. 97–99.

²⁰ C. W. Carter. 'The Son of Man,' in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible v, pp. 485–487.

²¹ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers, repr. (Chicago: Moody Press, n.d.), p. 119.

²² J. C. Pugh, 'Fides Quaerens Intellectum: Anselm as Contemporary,' in Theology Today, 55.1, pp. 35–45.

²³ Documentation of this quotation has been lost and at publication time still unrecovered.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (419). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Preparation for the Coming of Christ

The distinct character of ordered providential history of mankind before the Advent of Christ as divine preparation for the Advent can be clearly seen in two biblical statements, each part of a verse. The one points to preparation for Christ in the history of Israel and says: ‘in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed’ (from Gen. 12:3, part of the initial form of the Abrahamic Covenant). The other is central to the New Testament—‘But when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son’ (Gal. 4:4).

The Old Testament tells of the preparation for the coming blessing in the history of Abram’s descendants within a succession of covenants. It tells us that God ruled the nations by elevating certain rulers, and by chastisements of various sorts, but does not give details. Let us look first at the Old Testament, especially as the New Testament itself relates it to the Advent of the Savior.

Preparation Among the ‘Chosen People’

The Jews prepared the way for Christianity by ... expecting what Christianity offered, a divine Savior. The hope of a Messiah was cherished by all Jews as their dearest possession. To be sure it was held by them in gross and worldly forms. But in all its forms there was the essential thing, the ardent expectation of one sent of God to redeem his people.... Christianity found all its first adherents among the Jews ... and the one thing that qualified them to receive [Christianity] was the Jewish hope of a divine Savior.¹

The Old Testament²

Matthew’s Gospel alone directly cites or alludes to the Old Testament at least 129 times, 89 of these references being preceded by the phrase, ‘in order that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet,’ or some similar expression. There are approximately 63 such clear references in Mark and about 100 in Luke. As for the Fourth Gospel, scholars agree that it is an insoluble mystery without the Old Testament because it is saturated with Old Testament thoughts, imagery and language. More than ‘literary dependence’ is involved. An examination of the hundreds of references in the four Gospels will show that the four authors regarded the events of the New Testament as the consummation of a redemptive history that began where the Old Testament narrative begins. Jesus Christ of the New Testament is indeed both the Messiah of Israel and the hope of the nations whom the Old Testament prophesies.

In addition to numerous brief statements in the Gospels connecting this or that item of Jesus’ career with the Old Testament, there are comprehensive, definitive texts which do the same, especially in Luke and Acts, the two books written by Paul’s physician-companion, Luke. He reports that on the very day of His resurrection Jesus joined two of the disconsolate disciples on the way to their home at Emmaus and upbraided them for failing to see His career predicted ‘in all the Scriptures’ (Luke 24:25–27). In the evening of the same day Jesus appeared to the same Cleopas and his friend, now at the meeting place of the Eleven at Jerusalem, and in different words connected His entire career, including even its issue in the church among all nations, with prophecies in the Law of Moses, the Psalms and the Prophets. To correct their misunderstandings He specially ‘opened their minds to understand the Scriptures ...' (Luke 24:45). Thus the Old Testament, on the authority of Jesus Himself, is a Christian book, no more distinctly Jewish than the church itself, even though both began among Jews. It was decades after Jesus had enlightened their understanding that the Gospels writers, by His enablement, drew those hundreds of connections between Old Testament preparation and prophecy and their fulfillment in Jesus. In the same spirit the sermons of the Apostles in Acts almost invariably demonstrate that Jesus is the Christ of God by resort to the prophecy-fulfillment technique. Evangelists and apologists still do the same today.

At this point an important matter must be clarified. Jesus and the Apostles regarded all the Old Testament as preparatory and predictive, not just a few selected 'messianic' (i.e. Christological) passages. This can be demonstrated beyond serious doubt. First observe the innumerable connections drawn by the Gospel writers. Then concentrate on Jesus' remarks cited above about 'Moses and all the Prophets ... in all the Scriptures ... everything written about me in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled ... to understand the Scriptures' (Luke 24:24–27, 44–47). After that observe that all the Old Testament is regarded as written by prophets (Heb. 1:1, 2), and then turn to the four times that Peter, in sermons recorded in the book of Acts, claimed that prophecy of Christ and of the Apostles' gospel ministry is found in 'all the prophets' (Acts 3:18, 21, 24; 10:43). Paul charged that the Jerusalem Jews who condemned Jesus did so because 'they did not ... understand the utterances of the prophets, which are read every Sabbath' and that they 'fulfilled them by condemning him' (Acts 13:27). A few minutes with the Bible, letting these texts, in context, speak their message, will deliver the reader from the much-abused approach to Old Testament Messianic prophecy of simple Old Testament 'proof-texting.' Paul felt that any day in which a Jew attended synagogue services he would hear prophecy of Messiah read (see also Acts 24:14). Thus any list of so-called Messianic texts out of the Old Testament, useful as it may be for certain purposes, may be misleading. The entire Old Testament is preparatory for Christ's coming and in many parts predictive. This accounts for the frequent N.T. references to Christ as 'the one who is to come' (Gr. ho erchomenos) as for example in Matthew 11:3.

How else can we who affirm our only hope is in Christ understand Paul's words at Romans 15:4? 'Whatever was written in former days (with obvious reference to the Hebrew Bible, the canonical OT) was written for our instruction, that we through endurance and through the encouragement of the Scriptures might have hope.' Perhaps the finest treatment on this subject in English is R. Payne Smith's Bampton Lectures of 1869.³ The above quoted words are the text for the first of his nine lectures (nearly 400 pages!). Let his opening remarks open up the theme for us.

St. Paul claims in these words for the Scriptures of the Old Testament a special quality distinct from ... ordinary books ... not for temporary use, ... for one age and one people, but for all time; and yet for a limited purpose ... [T]hey were written 'that ye might have hope.'⁴

He calls attention to 'the hope' as better translation and calls attention to Vaticanus reading, 'the hope of the consolation' and comments:

The added words are probably an explanatory gloss, but they give the right sense. 'The consolation of Israel' emphatically was the advent of Messiah; and what Paul affirms of the Old Testament Scriptures generally ... is that directly or indirectly they were all prophetic [predictive], all looked forward to and prepared for Christ.⁵

R. Payne Smith brought the sense of Romans 15:4 forward to the believers of this dispensation who find their ‘hope’ in the Scriptures of both Testaments, in words to be pondered.

St. Paul’s words are applicable to the Christian Scriptures [N.T.] ... for they also are for our learning, that we by the exercise of patience, necessarily implied in the fact that we have not as yet the full possession of the promise, and by the comfort given us by the strong conviction that Christ will come again, we may have hope—the hope—that as Christ has come once to open the way of salvation for man, so he will come again to perfect His work.⁶

This understanding of the Old Testament, while not specifically rejected by evangelical scholars today has been submerged by interest in background studies, cultural history, archaeology and with the efforts of a certain number somehow to read New Testament revelation and the church back into the Old Testament. Delitzsch, Fairbairn, Edershein and other nineteenth-century giants of scholarship could be cited at length in harmony with Smith, above and my own vision; but one must search for such an outlook in current literature.

The Old Testament is not, however, all preparatory or predictive in exactly the same way. Discerning scholars have detected differing levels of precision in prediction. To these we now direct attention.

1. Every word of the Old Testament is certainly Christological by way of preparation for the coming of Christ. The first eleven chapters of the Old Testament tell of the need for a savior of men, while all the rest—Genesis 12 through Malachi 4—traces the history of the chosen people who produced the Savior-Messiah. When He was born into the degraded and corrupt heathen world of antiquity, Jesus’ childhood home was an island of relative purity produced by Old Testament religion. His parents were not defiled by any of ‘the diseases of Egypt’. His mother was a pure Jewish virgin when she came to her husband; his earthly ‘father’, a true son of Abraham, understood righteous discretion; the cleanliness of the Jewish people, prescribed in the central part of the Pentateuch and famous then as now, guaranteed that clean food be placed on the family table and that He sleep in a clean bed. As Deuteronomy 23:13 required (when God walks the streets He wants human excreta underground) the community of Nazareth understood the value of a latrine (something missing in many country villages of the Near East today). This came about because God had taught a pagan named Abram to worship God Most High. Later that man’s descendants, grown numerous in Egypt, learned law and discipline in the wilderness. They then as a nation lived out hundreds of years of history in the ‘land of promise.’ During those centuries (Joshua–Nehemiah) a righteous remnant of them lived out both the letter and the spirit of their divinely revealed religion. That remnant, encouraged by mutual support and nourished by the Scriptures, was on hand—as the early chapters of Matthew and Luke relate with great delicacy. (See especially in the reported character of Jesus’ mother and earthly father [Matt. 1:18–25; Luke 1:26–56; 2:19–24], the parents of John the Baptist [Luke 1:3–80] and Simeon and Anna [Luke 2:25–38]. This small group (Mal. 4:5, 6; Isa. 6:13; Dan. 12:3, 10) produced, welcomed and nestled the Messiah when He came.

This readying of a society as home for Jesus during the ‘days of His flesh’ through Old Testament revelatory history constitutes that entire Book Messianic by preparation and justifies in part, at least, the frequent gospel formula, ‘that the Scripture might be fulfilled,’ and Paul’s ‘according to the Scriptures.’ It is part of the function of the law as paidagogos (conductor of children) to lead the nation to Christ (Gal. 3:24 and 4:5).

2. Another way the Old Testament is both preparatory and Christological is in its prescription of moral perfection, that is, it is Messianic by extension. Let me explain. Jesus claimed to fulfill the Law and the Prophets—i.e. the entire Old Testament. One important way in which He did this was simply for the first time in history to exemplify every one of its moral excellencies. The Psalmist, for example, could pronounce blessed the man who neither walks nor stands nor sits with evil in any way (Ps. 1:1), and meditates on God’s holy law day and night (Ps. 1:2). Yet these ideals were never truly realized until Jesus did so. By calling for human perfection the Old Testament calls for the Son of Man from heaven whose mission it was to produce just such human perfection. The practical wisdom of Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon and other practical-morality sections are in a clear and definite sense deposits of Messianic information and a call for Messiah’s coming. In this way, Proverbs is quite as truly Messianic as some often cited verses about Immanuel (e.g. Isa. 7–9) or the Son of David (Isa. 11:15) in the great specific predictions of the Old Testament.

3. Another numerous class of texts are sometimes called divine parousia (personal presence) prophecies. Numerous texts connect the coming salvation with the coming of God Himself to deal in a direct and final way with the world’s problems. ‘For behold, the Lord is coming out of his place, and will come down ...’ (Micah 1:3; Pss. 93; 94; 50:3; cf. Mal. 3:1). These constitute predictions of the deity of the coming Christ, a fact which the Jews never fully understood and which renders a large part of the Old Testament distinctly Messianic and, in a certain sense, exclusively Christian.

4. What certain contemporary writers call royal messianic prophecy is by an older generation called indirect messianic prophecy. This important class of material in the Old Testament is chiefly ‘Psalms in which in keeping with the circumstances of the time at which they were composed, Messianic hopes were centered on a contemporary king, without, however, having been fulfilled in Him; so that in the mouth of the Church, which was still waiting for their fulfillment, they have become eschatological hymns, and we are perfectly justified in interpreting them as such, as well as in their bearing upon their own time.’⁷ The royal Psalms have been the subject of quite a large body of literature, especially among Scandinavian writers.

5. Another variety of preparatory texts of the O.T. is sometimes called indirectly Messianic. Perhaps they might better be called Messianic by hyperbole, i.e. by literary exaggeration. Commentators often point out this feature of passages wherein a Psalmist, or other author, described his feelings and experiences in such a way that he was ‘raised above his own individuality and time, and uses regarding himself hyperbolic [i.e. legitimately exaggerated] expressions, which were not to become full historical truth until they became so in Christ.’⁸ Examples cited are usually related to persons who themselves are already typical of Christ (as David or Solomon). The ‘why have you forsaken me?’ of Psalm 22 is an example. David felt forsaken, even though elsewhere he wrote, ‘Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me ...’ (Ps. 23:4). Yet, though David was never forsaken by his Creator and Redeemer, our Savior who made these His dying words was truly forsaken of God.

6. Typical Messianic prophecy is a valid traditional category with which most Bible readers are fairly familiar. A steady feature of Christian use of the Old Testament from the beginning, which has sometimes been overdone, has been the tracing of divinely intended typical connection (and, in that sense, predictive connection) between certain offices, institutions, persons, events, etc. in the Old Testament, and important features of the Lord's earthly career.

This feature of Old Testament history and the Mosaic institutions is fully validated by New Testament employment of typology, especially in the book of Hebrews, chapters 3 to 10. It is pervasively employed in veiled ways, as scholars of every shade of opinion recognize, even though they may not agree on the validity of it. It is not doubted by believing scholars. This feature of the Old Testament receives several different names in the New Testament—'shadow,' skia (Heb. 10:1; Col. 2:16, 17); 'figure,' parabole (Heb. 9:9); 'type' or 'figure,' typos (Rom. 9:14); 'pattern,' hypodeigma (Heb. 9:23); 'pattern' or 'example,' antitypon (Heb. 9:24). On this account the book of Leviticus, large sections of Exodus and Numbers, even certain persons and events of Old Testament history (in the view of many) as well as portions of the books of poetry have specific Messianic (predictive of Christ) types. The literature of the subject is enormous. The 1852 edition of The Typology of Scripture, two volumes by Patrick Fairbairn (more than 900 pages), has left little for subsequent authors to say on the subject, though every text of biblical hermeneutics discusses it and most acknowledge debt to Fairbairn's exhaustive work.

John F. Walvoord's Jesus Christ our Lord, contains a much more complete discussion in chapter 4, 'Christ in Old Testament Typology.'⁹ He discusses typical persons (e.g. Abel), events (e.g. the Exodus), things (e.g. brazen serpent), institutions and ceremonies (e.g. sacrifices and festivals).

7. On the very highest and most distinct level is direct Messianic prophecy. The traditional Christmas texts employed in the great oratorios fall in this category (Gen. 3:15; 12:1–3; 49:10; Micah 5:2; and many more). But so also does Isaiah 53, a chapter that so specifies the details of our Lord's Passion and death that even enemies of Christianity can scarcely miss it. It has even been claimed that Jesus read the passage and deliberately—if morbidly—planned His last days on the basis of it.

At the very opening of His ministry, Jesus could say, 'Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them' (Matt. 5:17); and at the very end of His earthly career He could say with reference to that program of fulfillment, 'It is finished' (John 19:30).

It is possible to treat these matters in a rigid, schematic, mechanical manner, as if Jesus, at every juncture from the dawn of human consciousness until death, consulted the Bible to see what move He should make next. A simple reading of the Gospels shows that, quite to the contrary, Jesus was the freest and most relaxed and natural of men. He was fully aware of the prophecies, but we are to understand that the same Providence which rules our lives ruled His and thereby brought 'prediction and fulfillment' together.

Above all, as observed earlier, Old Testament preparation and prediction explain the fervent expectation for the Messiah so prominent in the circle of devout persons at the time of His Advent—the quiet obedience of Joseph and Mary; the believing response of Zacharias and Elizabeth, parents of the forerunner, to the angelic announcements; the worship of the Magi, of shepherds, and of saints like Simeon and Anna. It also explains the frantic fears of the monstrous Herod.

The more we learn about the milieu of Palestine in the time of our Lord's first appearance at Bethlehem and Nazareth—as well as at His baptism and during His official ministry—the more important the prophecy becomes. The discoveries commonly associated together as 'the Dead Sea Scrolls,' considered against a deepening understanding of other extra-biblical and secular literature from early times, show there was great interest in Jewry and Judaism of all grades and varieties in the prophesies of Messiah at the time He did, in veritable flesh, appear upon the scene.

John J. Collin's studies of the Qumran and related literature demonstrate that expectations were not uniform; but he argues, 'however, that the variation was limited, and that some forms of messianic expectation were widely shared.... It is possible ... to show that some ideas had wide distribution and were current across sectarian lines.... [T]he expectation of a Davidic Messiah was surely part of it.'¹⁰ 'We shall find,' says Collins, 'four basic messianic paradigms (King, prophet, priest and heavenly Messiah).'¹¹ See also the same author's discussion of 'The Apocalypticism of the Scrolls in Context.'¹²

Not long after the early discoveries of the 'Dead Sea Scrolls' in the late 1940s reports began to appear in journals of archaeology. My early source was the Biblical Archaeologist, published by the American Schools of Oriental Research. Then translations, evaluations and interpretations came along. One enthusiastic Jewish Christian (Ph.D. under Albright) told our faculty (Wheaton College) we would now have to rewrite ecclesiology—which proved unnecessary. Many significant additions were, however, made to understanding of what we read in the New Testament relating to the first Christian community at Jerusalem and there are lesser connections with all the New Testament. Millar Burrows was among the first to bring balance to discussion of the meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the New Testament and early Christianity. I read his works eagerly as a new professor of Old Testament.¹³ I note that an eminent authority in these matters shares my high esteem for Burrows' early works. He quotes Burrows as follows:

For myself I must ... confess that, after studying the Dead Sea Scrolls for seven years, I do not find my understanding of the New Testament substantially affected. Its Jewish background is clearer and better understood, but its meaning has neither been changed nor significantly clarified.¹⁴

This flurry of effort produced a large and still growing literature. For present purposes the best non-technical summary for the subject as the 'scrolls' relate to the whole New Testament is by Jack Finegan, Light From the Ancient Past, ch. V, Part 4, 'The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Qumran Community,' especially pp. 288–293, 'Relations With Early Christianity.'¹⁵ A larger semi-popular work by F. F. Bruce (Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts) early on captured the light of the earliest finds edited and published on expectation of Messiah among Jews of the time.¹⁶ This 1960 work is still valuable. Bruce shows in the very reserved manner of a polished, evangelical, British scholar that Jews of the holy land were excited about the expected soon-coming of Messiah. The much older work of R. Payne Smith, cited earlier, shows the same expectation of Messiah in rabbinical literature, apocrypha and pseudepigrapha, in possession of scholars for a long time.

More recent publication (1992) of text, translation and interpretation of fifty key documents, sequestered away from scholars for thirty-five years has served to show that interest in Messiah's coming (perhaps two or even more Messiahs) was intense among Palestinian Jews just before Jesus came and for a generation or two (up to the fall of Jerusalem and onward to the Jewish commonwealth) thereafter. Archaeological journals have reported this only in small part. I recommend chapter 1, 'Messianic and Visionary Recitals,' of The Dead Sea Scrolls Uncovered by Eisenman and Wise.¹⁷

Preparation Among the Nations of Antiquity

'It has often been shown how politically, intellectually, morally, everything in the Graeco-Roman world was ready for such a universal religion as Jesus brought into it.'¹⁸ The nineteenth century was very productive of such studies. Early in the twentieth century A. H. Strong provided a brief but very valuable treatment of the subject for theological students.¹⁹

The first words in my college text on church history, a book authorized by the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. that went through several editions, opened with these words:

One of the things that make the study of church history inspiring is that by it we are made to realize that God is actually at work for the salvation of mankind in the world....

Nowhere do we see this working of God more clearly than in the strange and wonderful way in which the world was made ready for the coming of Jesus.²⁰

The first chapter went on to speak of the 'contributions' (positive) of Romans, Greeks and Jews, then (negatively) of religious conditions, intellectual conditions and moral conditions.

Emil Brunner offers an excellent assessment near the end of an essay on this subject. He says:

Jesus Christ cannot be understood from the point of view of world history, but world history is to be understood in the light of Jesus Christ.... But if [previous] world history is to be understood in the light of Jesus Christ, then it is understood as the time of promise and preparation ... [and] specially in the history which is close to the Coming of Jesus in space and time, we can perceive something of this preparatory character, as we have tried to do.²¹

Brunner observes that not only Pharaoh and Cyrus 'but also Plato and Alexander, Cicero and Julius Caesar must serve God in order to prepare the way for Christ.'²²

The kings of Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, Greece and Rome, plus all the rulers of Israel's nearest neighbors did not know it, but they were subject to God's chastening hand for their own good until 'the desire of nations' should come. Though these rambunctious people and their kings were sent as 'rod of mine anger,' says Jehovah, to execute divine wrath on 'a hypocritical nation' they were totally unaware of it. ('Why doesn't God kill Hitler?' a 1943 sermon title read. Answer in Sunday sermon: 'God is letting Hitler exercise on a leash to keep him healthy for execution.')

Most recent and current treatises on Christology have paid less attention to preparation for Christ's coming in the developments in the ancient heathen world than the importance of the subject deserves. (Older works on almost any subject employed the words Christendom and heathen. Hymn books did so, especially missionary hymns and Christmas hymns—even Rudyard Kipling’s and Whittier’s poetry did so. Now multiculturalism has crowded these words out of common use. Lest readers be offended I also use them sparingly, ‘until the time be changed.’) God’s providential rule over the nations is usually noted in detail in the doctrine of providence, but somehow that divine providence as leading up to the coming and career of the Jewish Messiah is not connected with His mission as the Savior of the world, just then ripe for it.

Consider what Paul told the idolatrous Athenians in Acts 17:22–31. He ends his message with announcement of the close of a long history of divine forbearance by the appearance of a Man who demonstrated divine authority to judge the world and to command ‘all people everywhere to repent.’ During previous ages He overlooked the deepening depravity of the race even though ‘he made ... every nation of mankind’ and determined the set time for them and exact places where they should live (Acts 17:26). This extended time of mercy, Paul declared, is now at an end (vv. 27, 30).

This does not mean that there were any saving revelations to the heathen even though we must credit them with many accomplishments and attainments in art, science, literature, and even ethics and religion. Their altars and sacrifices were rooted in normal instincts for religious expression even though their philosophy, art and science did not improve their morals as the depravity of the lives of the best examples (the homosexuality rampant among the philosophers of the greatest age of Greek philosophy) show. Their attainments aroused impulses and cravings that could not be supplied and raised standards they could not meet (Rom. 2:1–6).

The cross could not be set up at the gates of Eden (Strong) nor could Eve be the immaculate mother of the promised ‘seed’ that would crush the serpent’s head. Ages must pass to prepare for the first parousia (arrival) of the promised seed ‘in the fullness of time.’

I. In two ways the passing of time leading up to the Advent of Christ had demonstrated the need for a Savior rather than merely better sages, rulers and philosophers.

1. It showed the depth of human depravity—a depravity which, by the admission of friendly ancient and modern historians had sharply deepened in the Roman world immediately before the birth of Jesus. This may well be part of what Paul was denouncing in the brilliant summation of Romans 1:18–3:20. ‘In past generations he allowed all the nations to walk in their own ways’ even while God’s goodness in sustaining their lives was a witness against them (Acts 14:16, 17). Long before Rome was more than a small muddy village on the banks of a small river, Isaiah pointed out that while the light of saving revelation was present in Zion and would someday result in the removal of ‘the covering that is cast over all peoples.’ In Isaiah’s time there was a ‘veil that is spread over all nations’ (Isa. 25:6–8). The Apostle speaks of a similar veil of ignorance, blindness and hardness of heart which kept Jews from understanding the true sense of their own Scriptures (2 Cor. 3:13–15; John 9:39) making them no less than Gentiles in deep need of the ‘light of the world’ (John 1:4; 8:12; 9:5).

2. It showed the utter moral inability of human nature either to preserve or regain saving knowledge of God once it had been lost. We do not know much about the godly Gentiles who appear in Old Testament story. There is Melchizedek, the ‘priest’ and ‘king of Salem’ to whom Abram paid tithes and who ‘blessed him,’ and said, ‘Blessed be Abram by God Most High, Possessor of heaven and earth' (Gen. 14:18–20; cf. Heb. 5:6, 10) and Jethro, Moses' father-in-law (Exod. 2:16–3:1; 18:1–27) and Job who was commended as 'blameless and upright,' one who 'feared God and turned away from evil' (Job 1:1, 3). Yes, we are sometimes amazed at the moral insights of the heathen, both the ones we know from ancient secular literature—Pythagoras, Pindar, Sophocles, Epimenides, Plato, Socrates—and from biblical sources—Abimelech (Gen. 26), Pharaoh (Gen. 12), even Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 4) and others. We do not know, however, that any were able to lead their contemporaries to 'the truth' and a genuine righteousness, nor so far as we know did any one ever claim they were.

One may think of the Graeco-Roman world of the time as inarticulately crying out for a Savior from the sin-burden of ages, much as Peter Anthony Bertocci describes individuals in utter soul need:

[W]hen the doctor says he has done all he can or when one is forced to watch his loved ones make moves which will both decrease the good in their lives and increase his own sorrow, or, ... when one sees the very meaning of his life in the balance, without his being able to do a solitary thing about the outcome, then he finds himself reaching spiritual arms out to the universe. Gone, in these circumstances, is the composed self-reliance; gone is the earlier determination to outgrow 'primitive' beliefs. Here one implores that something be done—yes, something that might be an exception to the rules. ... We have all been in our psychological foxholes.... Having in all conscience done our best, we call to some agency beyond ourselves.... It is when the conceived good is at stake, when our towers of value seem to totter that we realize our lives and our values are without purpose if there is no aid beyond ourselves.²³

II. Christ was first made known and widely received in the lands circling the Mediterranean Sea ruled by Rome, and thoroughly penetrated by Greek language and culture. The Empire was also host to numerous Jewish families and Jewish communities sprinkled throughout, with concentrations in several urban centers. Upper classes everywhere admired, absorbed and imitated the Greeks while Jewish enclaves in the cities made their own impression on many. We cannot relate here how this came about but let us just trace some of the results of this Diaspora (dispersion) as they affected the appearance of Christ and the success of the early missionizing efforts.

1. A world civilization arose in place of the political and social fragmentation of previous epochs. This unprecedented development began with the conquests of Alexander in the second third of the fourth century bc, giving a large measure of political unity and a growing prevalence of the Greek language and culture. The 'world' (oikoumenē, Luke 2:1) was extended to the farthest points of northern Africa and western Europe by Rome, coming to a climax in the conquests and consolidation by Julius Caesar in the mid first century bc. Caesar also moved the political basis of Roman world rule from Republic to Empire. When about a century later the process of forming one Roman world was complete it could be said, as Edward Gibbon wrote:

The empire of the Romans filled the world, and when that empire fell into the hands of a single person, the world became a safe and dreary prison for his enemies ... To resist was fatal, and it was impossible to fly.... Beyond the frontiers, his anxious view could discover nothing, except the ocean, inhospitable deserts, hostile tribes of barbarians, of fierce manners and unknown language, or dependent kings, who would gladly purchase the emperor's protection by the sacrifice of an obnoxious fugitive. 'Wherever you are,'

said Cicero to the exiled Marcellus, ‘remember that you are equally within the power of the conqueror.’²⁴

‘[T]he Father sent his Son to be the Savior of the world.’ (1 John 4:14; 1 Tim. 4:10). People were made aware of the existence of a ‘world’ by the development of the Roman Empire that included a large part of all mankind. Paul could appeal to this concept in his preaching (Acts 17:26) and Luke, the Greek-minded writer of New Testament histories, assumed it in reporting ‘In those days a decree went out from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be registered’ (Luke 2:1). The niv ‘Roman world’ somewhat betrays the Gr. oikoumenē, inhabited or civilized world. For an acculturated Roman, the world ended at the borders of the Empire. Anything beyond did not count.

2. The messengers of the gospel were to take the message of salvation in Christ to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). The national governments before Alexander’s conquests really enforced the natural prejudice of tribes and clans against foreigners. A foreigner could be suspected as an enemy. But the ‘Peace of Rome’ broke that down. Paul needed no passport to travel from Tarsus to Jerusalem or to Antioch or to Spain. As a free (non-slave) Roman citizen he could go anywhere. It is significant that Paul, who spoke to so many national groups, did not seem to have been even minimally aware of cultural bridges to cross or a new education for himself and party in order to proclaim the news ‘from Jerusalem ... to Illyricum’ (Yugoslavia) and on to Rome and Spain (Rom. 15:19, 24). He could call upon Roman police to protect him from harm everywhere and did so more than once. A Jew in Corinth preaching a new religion in the days of Pericles five centuries earlier might have found those civilized Greeks quite unwilling to protect him, as the Roman Gallio, proconsul of Achaia did at the Greek city of Corinth (Acts 18:12–17).

3. Never before had the entire area had a common language understood by literate people everywhere. Alexander and his successors made their conquests as part of a larger mission to Hellenize the world, to spread the benefits, as Greeks understood them, of Greek language and culture everywhere. The wars of the Jewish Maccabees in the second century bc, came from the collision of that effort with Jewish resistance. The Romans themselves, not very literate or sophisticated, admired the Greek culture and adopted it unreservedly, even equating the Pantheon of Rome with that of the Greek classics. When Jesus was born, Greek was read and spoken, even by Jews, throughout the Empire. Hence the New Testament came to be composed in the Greek language mainly by Jews who had accepted that much of Hellenism. Greek was the language of the synagogue no less than of civil courts, marketplace and lecture hall. Thus was created, in the times immediately before Jesus, the linguistic vehicle that carried the gospel of Christ to the world of the first centuries of the Christian epoch.

4. Rome built the roads by which Christian disciples like the Ethiopian eunuch could take the message from Gaza to Ethiopia and Barnabas could fetch Saul from Tarsus. Later Paul and Silas could travel about Cilicia and the provinces of Asia, as well as Macedonia, Achaia and Illyria in Europe. The travels of Christians in commercial enterprises or about the business of living was then and for centuries the chief means of disseminating the message of Christ as He Himself had indicated in Acts 1:8. ‘Sent’ missionaries needed policed highways to get where the peoples of the world were. Rome made such unrestricted travel possible with roads to the very extremities of their world. Such access never existed until Rome created it.

5. Recent changes of that day in the religious temper made the population ready to hear something new and better. Deep faith in the official gods had about perished. Strange exotic cults were sweeping in from the Orient (Cybele, Mithraism). Age-old pagan superstitions were gaining strength. Mystery religions—offering dramatic ceremonies for cleansing from sin, hope of eternal life and the joys of group fellowship—were enjoying growing popularity.

The Greco-Roman world was full of restless, discontented, spiritual yearning. In view of what Christianity brought, it should be noticed that three things were prominent (for the first time) in the prevailing religious temper: a growing belief in one universal God, a widespread sense of sin and desire for purification from it, and a great interest in the question of what comes after death.²⁵

6. In many ways, though the great attainments of Greek philosophy had been achieved centuries before the Christian era, its lingering and growing effects were very helpful to acceptance of Christianity and to its later exposition. Acts chapter 17 brings together Athens, capital city of Greek higher education, Stoic and Epicurean philosophers (vv. 16, 17), and Paul, the chief exponent of Christianity of the time. Both of these Greek philosophies could rightly claim some success at analysis of the human condition (as also modern psychology and sociology) but were almost utterly impotent to do anything truly remedial about it. And for the same reasons they could not address ultimate problems like man's innate depravity, death and questions about eternal goodness, beauty and truth with certainty. In a few decades, however, real Christians who were as versed in the learning and jargon of the philosophies as any denizens of Athenian academia were preaching and writing persuasively in advocacy of faith in Christ. They showed Christ to be the answer to the philosophers' quest. They furnished what Socrates, Plato and Aristotle could not. They spoke with the authority of Christ Himself backed up by 'assurance to all' (Acts 17:31). And they supplied adequate answers rather than more insightful questions. One of the pagan elite, at the death of his daughter, wrote to a friend: 'Give me some fresh comfort, great and strong, such as I have never yet heard or read. Everything that I have read or heard comes back now to my memory, but my sorrow is too deep to be reached by it' (Pliny the Younger).

7. The dispersion of the Jews throughout the Roman world and beyond provided a core of listeners for the Christian witness far and wide. 'The preaching of the gospel was preceded and prepared for by the dispersion of the Jews.'²⁶ Josephus said 'the habitable earth is full of Jews' and quotes Strabo: 'these Jews ... it is hard to find a place in the habitable earth that hath not admitted this tribe of men' (Antiquities, 14.7.2). ('Habitable earth' here translates oikoumenē rendered 'all the world' in Luke 2:1.) The sad exiles of Daniel's and Ezekiel's time could not have dreamed that the circumstances of the Jews' apostasy and resultant Diaspora—graphically exposed by the sermons and lessons of the prophets—would be a very valuable instrument for the growth of a body of Messiah's spiritual seed among the very Gentiles who were the means of divine chastisement. The story of Paul's missionary journeys, always beginning a new ministry at a local synagogue, illustrates this point.

8. To a limited degree the Judaism of the Diaspora was a missionary religion. The rabbis interpreted Old Testament prophecies of the extension of divine salvation to Gentiles as authority for proclaiming conversion to Judaism and even acceptance, as Jews, through instruction and certain initiatory rites. Those who went through circumcision and other prescribed rites were 'Proselytes.' Those who accepted Judaism but stopped short of the rites were called 'God-fearers.' The latter are the ones whom we meet in the book of Acts as ‘men who feared God’ (e.g. Cornelius) and those who ‘gathered for prayer’ such as Lydia and other God-fearing ladies at the river-side in Philippi to whom Paul witnessed. These God-fearers and proselytes were a fertile field in which to plant the gospel as it moved away from Jerusalem, for example the eunuch of Ethiopia (Acts 8:27), Cornelius and his household (Acts 10:1), Lydia and her friends (Acts 16:13, 14), and the proselytes of Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:16, 26, 50) and of Thessalonica (Acts 17:4, 17) and Justus, a Gentile worshipper of the true God in whose house the church at Corinth began (Acts 18:7). It is noticeable that the ones who stopped short of circumcision and other rites (baptism and offering sacrifice), the ‘God-fearers,’ were numerous—especially women—and the converts to Christianity came chiefly from these God-fearers. Perhaps the full proselytes were as fanatically anti-Christian as the born Jews.

9. May it not be true that when moral decline had bottomed out, or, to use another figure, when the pendulum had swung to the end of its arc toward the wrong, a turnaround toward the right was both likely and timely? I do not press the point, but many movements of the Spirit of God in Christian history support the notion. Then as now, the upper classes were no doubt horribly corrupt, the scandals reported by biographers of emperors and aristocracy abundantly show this. There were, of course, virtuous people also or orderly civilized life would have stopped. Yet until the spread of Christianity brought news of the Savior to that decadent age no strong force making for reformation and renewal existed—even though several emperors saw the need of it and sought to do something to enforce improvement.

¹ R. Hastings Nichols, The Growth of the Christian Church (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1932), pp. 7, 8.

² Much that appears under this heading here is drawn from my book, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1976, 1991). It has been revised and re-issued as The Earthly Career of Jesus, the Christ (Ross-shire, Scotland: Christian Focus Publications, 2002).

³ R. Payne Smith, Prophecy a Preparation for Christ (Boston: Gould & Lincoln, 1870).

⁴ ibid., p. 29.

⁵ ibid., p. 30.

⁶ ibid.

⁷ F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Psalms, 3 vols. (Edinburgh: Clarke, 1871, 1893), vol. 1, p. 93.

⁸ ibid.

⁹ John F. Walvoord, Jesus Christ our Lord (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 62–79.

¹⁰ John J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), p. 12.

¹¹ ibid.

¹² John J. Collins, Apocalypticism In the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Routledge, 1997), pp. 156–163.

¹³ Millar Burrows, The Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Viking, 1955) and More Light on the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Viking, 1958).

¹⁴ James C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), p. 162.

¹⁵ J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1969), pp. 288–293.

¹⁶ F. F. Bruce, Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts (London: Tyndale Press, 1960).

¹⁷ R. Eisenman and Michael Wise, The Dead Sea Scrolls Uncovered (New York: Penguin, 1993), pp. 17–50.

¹⁸ James Orr, art. ‘Jesus Christ,’ ISBE ii (Grand Rapids, 1943), p. 1027.

¹⁹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 665–668.

²⁰ Nichols, Growth of Christian Church, p. 1.

²¹ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption, Dogmatics: vol. ii (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1952), p. 337.

²² ibid., pp. 337, 338.

²³ Peter Anthony Bertocci, Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1951, 1961), pp. 24, 25.

²⁴ Edward Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, abridged by F. C. Bourne (New York: Dell Publishing Co., 1963, 1970), pp. 74–75.

²⁵ Nichols, Growth of Christian Church, p. 11.

²⁶ P. Levertoff, art. ‘Proselyte,’ ISBE. iv. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1943), p. 2468.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (428). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

3

The Preexistence of Christ

The word ‘preexistence’ summarizes the point of a question Jesus once asked His disciples, viz.: ‘Then what if you were to see the Son of Man ascending to where he was before?’ (John 6:62). Likewise Jesus’ mysterious reference to Himself as ‘he who descended from heaven’ (John 3:13). There was a ‘before’ Jesus’ conception in the virgin and a ‘descended’ when conception took place.

Theologians refer to this New Testament teaching as the preexistence of Christ. But the word ‘does not fit comfortably in the vocabulary of Western man.... It seems a fugitive word escaped from a séance.’¹ Yet the idea has already met the minds of those who know about Plato’s doctrine of preexistence of souls, echoed in Browning’s ‘Ode on Intimations of Immortality’ where ‘the Soul ... hath had elsewhere its setting ... trailing clouds of glory’ as we ‘come from God.’ So though employed to name a false idea (preexistence of souls of mankind) in Platonic doctrine, the idea of preexistence (not necessarily the word) has an ancient and continuing home among informed Christians. The notion of the preexistence of souls also had a place in both ancient and medieval Judaism, though there is little evidence of it among biblically orthodox Jews of the time of our Lord.²

That Jesus was aware He had a preexistence ‘with God’ (John 1:1) is indicated by His favorite self-designation as ‘the Son of Man.’ The name borrows not from the prophet Ezekiel (who is addressed as ‘son of man’ throughout his book) but from Daniel 7:13, 14 where it is said ‘with the clouds of heaven there came one like a son of man.’ This Son of Man is a Being of heavenly origin, as distinguished from an earthly origin. That the Jews thought Daniel referred to a preexistent, divine Being comes out clearly when Jesus pointedly claimed the reference for Himself in the high priest’s presence and was accused of blasphemy (Matt. 26:64, 65). Though as far as I know the Daniel passage was not used as support for expectation of a human messiah by the Jews of Jesus’ time, we know that some Jews hoped for the coming of ‘a preexistent, heavenly monarch who is to judge the world in righteousness.’ B. B. Warfield documents this well.³

The deity of Christ is not necessary to His preexistence but preexistence is necessary to deity, one of whose attributes is eternity. It is therefore important to establish our Lord’s preexistence in the mind before the deity of Christ, which we shall treat next. This was very important to the early church in firmly shaping what became the Christology of Nicea and Chalcedon. Further, inasmuch as most accounts of the life of Christ start the story with Bethlehem, wisdom dictates that we insist on special attention to our Lord's identity as 'the Lord from Heaven' (1 Cor. 15:47). Experience confirms the need. After one of my earliest Christmas sermons—the text being Philippians 2:5–8—an aged lady shook my hand and thanked me for the sermon, earnestly declaring, 'I never knew till this morning that Joseph was not the father of Jesus.' Like many others, I suppose the word 'virgin' had meant no more to her than 'girl' or 'young woman.'

The New Testament Testimony to the Fact of the Preexistence of Jesus

B. B. Warfield in his essay, 'The Person of Christ According to the New Testament' points out that the writings of the New Testament were completed within a very short period of time, most of them in a period of twenty years. It is 'all the product of a single movement, at a single stage of its development, and therefore presents in its fundamental teaching [emphasis added] a common character. There is small trace of developing ideas as much recent so-called biblical research seeks out. Of course Jesus, John the Baptist, the Synoptics, Paul, Peter and Hebrews do not present doctrine in exactly the same way, but they do support exactly the same set of historical and revealed truths.' I agree that, as Warfield goes on to say, 'In its fundamental teaching, the New Testament lends itself ... more readily to what is called dogmatic [systematic] than to what is called genetic treatment.'⁴

Among these truths is the preexistence of the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ. Already in the New Testament, long before any council or synod formulated any formal, written creed or definition, the eternal preexistence of the Word made flesh (John 1:14) was a dogma (in the best sense of that word) in the church of the apostolic age. The teaching always appears incidentally 'as a thing understood by all, needing to be alluded to rather than formally expounded.'⁵

Some of Jesus' parables show that the preexistence of Christ is assumed by the text. In the parable (i.e. allegory) of the wicked husbandman, the owner of the vineyard (God), in addition to other servants (the O.T. prophets), 'had one more to send, a beloved son; he sent him last' (Mark 12:6 nasb). In the allegorical symbolism of the Parable of the Pounds (Luke 19:11–27) the nobleman 'went [emphasis added] into a far country.' The nobleman of course is Jesus Himself and the kingdom He was to 'receive' is 'his own' (John 1:11), the Jewish people who 'did not receive him.' Afterward He was 'to return.' Whence He came and whither return are obviously heaven.

