tradition is rather that this is the theme of the whole Gospel narrative as an account of Jesus, the whole of the Gospel narrative as an account of Jesus necessarily being an account of the birth of the Christian community, of the development, corresponding to and consummating the unification of the twelve tribes of Israel in the exodus from Egypt, of the people of God of the last time which has been inaugurated with the coming of Jesus Christ.’ Written in opposition to the background of a continental theology which held Jesus never founded or intended to found an ekklēsia, this complicated sentence is helpful. Yet in all his lengthy chapter,³⁸ I find no awareness of any connection with the nature and founding of the church in John’s promise of a baptism in the Spirit and the events of Acts 2. Barth found paradoxes in every aspect of theology, and ecclesiology was no exception.

Note #2

Views of the nature of the church vary so widely in many details that a modest-sized book would be necessary to present them. The largest section of my files on ecclesiology is under ‘The Essential Nature of the church.’

¹ ‘Church’ is not in Acts 2:47 in better texts.

² George Florovsky, ‘The church: Her Nature and Task,’ Man’s Disorder and God’s Design in the Amsterdam Assembly Series prepared for first World Council of Churches Assembly 1948 (New York: Harper, n.d.). Four books bound in one volume—Book i, p. 43.

³ ibid.

⁴ ibid., p. 44.

⁵ T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries (Minneapolis: James Family Publ. repr., 1977, original in early twentieth century), p. 18.

⁶ Florovsky, op. cit., pp. 44, 45.

⁷ ibid., pp. 46, 47.

⁸ op. cit., pp. 48, 49. He cites Matt. 3:11 and Luke 3:16.

⁹ op. cit., pp. 50, 51.

¹⁰ op. cit., p. 51.

¹¹ op. cit., p. 54.

¹² The New Catechism (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1994) see para. 1096, p. 280.

¹³ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Rockford, IL: TAN, 1960, 1974), p. 274, first complete para.

- ¹⁴ Lindsay, op. cit., p. 7.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 10.
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 13.
- ¹⁷ ibid., pp. 13, 14.
- ¹⁸ ibid., pp. 14, 15.
- ¹⁹ ibid., pp. 21–37.
- ²⁰ W. O. Carver, What is the Church? ed. by Duke McCall (Nashville, TN: Broadman, 1958) p. 5.
- ²¹ G. E. Ladd, The Gospel of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959), p. 117.
- ²² Gustaf Aulen, ‘The Church in the Light of the New Testament’ in Man’s Disorder and God’s Design: The Amsterdam Assembly Series, Vol. I (New York: Harper & Bros., n.d.), p. 19.
- ²³ Barth, Church Dogmatics IV, Part 2, pp. 600–604.
- ²⁴ Robert Saucy, ‘Evangelicals, Catholics and Orthodox Together: Is the church the Extensions of the Incarnation?’ Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, Vol. 43, no. 2, June 2000, pp. 193, 194.
- ²⁵ Ratzinger, Dulles, von Balthasar and others, popularized by Richard John Neuhaus.
- ²⁶ This is not to neglect the fact that preparation for these events is, in part, what the Old Testament was all about. We treated this idea earlier in connection with the chapter on the Old Testament Foundation for the Church.
- ²⁷ Presumably unrepentant and unbelieving people are to be baptized in judging fire in connection with the Second Advent; believers on the other hand, in connection with the First Advent are to be baptized in the Holy Spirit. This, of course, was not apparent to the Baptist and his audience.
- ²⁸ B. B. Warfield, ‘The Spirit of God in the Old Testament,’ Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia: Presbyterian Reformed, 1952), pp. 129–130. Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, repr. 1970), p. 477.
- ²⁹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 317.
- ³⁰ ‘Church,’ ed. H. B. Hackett Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible I (New York: Hurd & Houghton), pp. 453, 454.
- ³¹ Zerwick & Grosvenor Grammatical Analysis of the Greek New Testament (Rome: Biblical

³² R. D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1985), p. 140.

³³ Adapted from my A Greater Commission, pp. 139, 140.

³⁴ B. F. Westcott, The Holy Bible ... Commentary, NT, Vol. II, p. 295.

³⁵ Karl Barth, Christian Dogmatics, iv, 3, Second Half (Edinburgh: T and T Clark), p. 726.

³⁶ References in Scripture to the above will be found, in order at Eph. 2:20, 21; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:26–33; cf. Rev. 21:9; Rev. 21:9, 10; cf. Rev. 22:1; Titus 2:14; 1 Peter 5:2–4; Eph. 2:10; cf. Col. 1:18; Eph. 2:15; 1 Peter 2:9; cf. 1 Cor. 15:45–48; 1 Peter 2:9; cf. Heb. 4:14; Eph. 4:18.

³⁷ Paul Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960).

³⁸ Karl Barth, op. cit., ‘The Holy Spirit and the Sending of the Christian Community’.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (869). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

The Unity of the Church

As we have noticed several times, much New Testament teaching about the church is by means of metaphors, parables and various other figures. This is true also of the unity of the church. In much recent and current treatment of the church’s unity, however, the body figure has been overworked to the neglect of other New Testament approaches. The unity of the church is not the first thrust of the body figure (1 Cor. 12), but rather diversity of gifts.

The Unity in Ephesians 2 and 4:4–6

At Ephesians 4:4–6 (again in the passage where gifts of Christ to the church are going to be discussed) Paul announces the oneness of the church in a series of strictly prepositional statements. The nature of the church, her gifts and her unity are aspects of one subject.

In this opening of the practical section of his Epistle Paul brings to bear the meaning for life of the fact of the reconciliation of Jew to Gentile ‘through the cross’ (Eph. 2:16) and mutual ‘access by one Spirit unto the Father’ (v. 18 kjv). Christ has made ‘both one’ (v. 14), creating ‘one new man’ (v. 15). This oneness is something that never existed before. Whatever continuities exist between the old dispensation and the new, the ‘new man’ or ‘one body’ is a fresh creation. Israel had a national unity, with a plethora of divine benefits, but never had there been a unity in spiritual life and inward religion. The Old Testament story plainly shows that the majority of Old Testament Israelites were unbelieving and disobedient throughout most of their national history. Jesus pointed this out vividly on several occasions. Stephen was murdered for doing the same. Up to 3 million disobedient and unbelieving Israelites still lie in the dust of the forty-year trek through the wilderness. In verses 19–22 Paul says the people of this new entity are fellow citizens with holy beings and are of the household of God—two very understandable human analogies.¹

This new establishment has precedent and preparation in Moses and the Old Testament prophets, though Paul does not mention that here as he does elsewhere. Rather the new household has a new foundation—Apostles and prophets of the New Testament epoch, both present in the ekklēsia in its formative years. They not only planted the churches but were its resident, spiritual authorities and produced the canon of Scripture.

In Ephesians 4 the Apostle employs the newly created essential unity as ground for Christian lives of humility, meekness, long-suffering and mutual love among members of the ekklēsia. This unity is sevenfold, as we shall try to expound in a moment, but first take note that ‘body’ here has almost escaped from figure to literal—as when we today speak of any group of people with some important commonality as a body, for instance the upper body (or house) of congress. No real vital community is implied. This sort of ambiguity is inescapable and too much should not be made of it. Yet in many New Testament passages ‘the body’ comes close to being a synonym for hē ekklēsia, the church.

The translations obscure the fact that Paul introduced the seven unities of the church very abruptly and with the apparent assumption that the Ephesian church (or wherever else) would know why. ‘There is’ (v. 4) is not in the Greek text. It is as though he simply flashed a picture before the eyes of the church to remind them of something they well knew but must keep ever before their consciousness. Omitting the supplied words, the striking passage reads:

[O]ne body,

and one Spirit,

even as ye are called in one hope of your calling;

One Lord [Jesus],

one faith [once for all delivered],

one baptism,

One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all (Eph. 4:4–6 kjv, [emphasis added]).

In this passage the word ‘one’ is used seven times, probably with symbolical sense of fullness or completeness, as the sevenfold spiritual endowment of Messiah, ‘the Branch’ in Isaiah 11:2, and sevenfold description of God’s voice in Psalm 29.

Though Paul says something about gifts to every believer in Ephesians 4:7, the presentation of the unity moves immediately on to gift of specially endowed persons to the whole church (‘into the lower parts of the earth,’ v. 9) for its inward perfection and completion as the one ‘body of Christ’ (vv. 12, 16). The one body, Spirit, hope, faith, baptism, Lord and Father have organic connection from within, a true uni-verse: one-many which is a one. In the next chapter, on the gifts of God to the church, this will be discussed in some detail.

In an interesting way R. E. Brown, citing E. Käsemann, points out how the doctrine of the unity of the church seems to have special connection with the great church at Ephesus.² Besides the Epistle to the Ephesians there is the fact that Ephesus is the most likely site of the composition of the fourth Gospel where in chapters 15 and 17 in Jesus' last discourse and prayer He emphasized Christian unity. One might say the same of 1, 2 and 3 John. Did the youthful 'beloved disciple' John hear these things in the Upper Room and recall them at Ephesus fifty to seventy years later (John 14:22) to record them in these chapters? Further, the Ephesian congregation manifested some of the virtues which alone arise within the community of love (Rev. 2:1–7) and merited the risen Lord's praise (Rev. 2:2, 3). Further, the importance of 'the faith' and a common 'form of sound words' is central to the first two of Paul's pastoral letters, both addressed to Timothy, an 'interim' pastor at Ephesus. Both Apostles framed their messages on unity to encourage the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace as something already possessed and to be made manifest in conduct.

The Unity in the Allegory of the Vine and the Branches

The allegory (or metaphor: 'I am the vine; you are the branches') in John 15:1–16 stresses the connection of Christ the vine stock with the branches for Christian fruit-bearing.

Christ Himself in the metaphor is 'the true vine' (hē ampelos hē alēthinē). It can scarcely be doubted He intended to bring before these eleven orthodox Jews the many Old Testament passages which represented (metaphorically) Israel as a vine, God's vine, but in each case as faithless and disobedient, deserving of punishment (Ps. 81:8–16; Isa. 5:1–7; Jer. 3:21; Ezek. 15:1–8; Hos. 10:1). The disciples are not about to become the 'true vine,' as some would have it, in contrast to the old rebellious one, but if they abide in unity with Christ the vine they will be fruitful Christians.

Let us not try to empty the Lord's stern warnings of fearful consequences of breaking the unity: 'If anyone does not abide in me he is thrown away like a branch and withers; and the branches are gathered, thrown into the fire, and burned' (v. 6). The truth propounded relates to useful service for Christ's Father by the geōrgos (literally 'earth-worker'), farmer, husbandman (kjv) (v. 1). Good vineyarders know about 95 per cent of each year's growth must be cut away each winter. 'The fruit is always borne on fresh growth.' Those interpreters who point out that the thrust of the parable is good fruit-bearing not salvation are surely correct. The lesson is an exhortation to keep our personal communion and community with Christ vigorous: 'Abide in me, and I in you ... He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing' (John 15:4, 5 kjv). The 'you' and 'ye' of kjv in this passage translate second person plurals not singulars.

There is a connection between this allegory of unity in the coming ekklēsia imbedded in the Last Discourse (John 14–16) and the same theme in the High Priestly Prayer of John 17, especially verses 20–24.

The Unity in Jesus' Prayer for the Eleven Apostles and the Future *Ekklēsia*³

John likely composed his Gospel during the reign of Domitian (ad 81–96), ignoble brother of Titus, his noble predecessor. Persecutions by Nero (ad 54–68) were limited mainly to Rome itself and were sporadic. Domitian, ‘who was hungry for divine honours’ carried persecution to many parts of the empire including the province of Asia where John lived at the time he wrote, if traditions are correct. Here believers were first invited, then compelled on pain of severe sanctions, even death, to say ‘Caesar is Lord.’ Domitian, the then reigning Caesar, was king of the oikoumenē (‘civilized’ world) and chief magistrate of the kosmos (organized-by-Satan)—‘the world’ mentioned often by Jesus in John’s Gospel (about seventy-five times, only fifteen times in all the Synoptics). In John, Jesus says the world is wicked, ruled by Satan, against God, against His Son and out to kill Him; it hates the disciples and will do all it can to deceive them and to destroy them.

The solemnity, intimacy and depth of this chapter have made it a subject of intense study in all ages, beginning with the early Fathers and—sadly—the heretics. In recent generations every new kind of higher criticism, positive and negative, has worked it over. I have read everything immediately accessible to me from Bengel and Calvin from Reformation times on through Meyer, Alford, Westcott, Schaff and others of the nineteenth-century surge of evangelical scholarship; Hoskins, Schnackenburg, R. E. Brown, Morris, Barrett and other recent writers who usually employ the recent forms of criticism in a positive way. It has seemed apparent to me that nothing in these mountains of research and resulting decisions helps us understand the text except to call attention to the Gospel history (Synoptics and John 1–16), especially Jesus’ own previous discourse about the promised Paraclete, and the faith of the first Christians. I do not think the beliefs of any of the ‘Hellenistic church,’ ‘Jewish church,’ or any social or religious movement of late first century modified John’s language in reporting what Jesus said to His Father. I take special note that R. E. Brown (Anchor Bible, Vol. 29a, John), though he frequently opens the possibility that this or that phrase arose out of some contemporary Christian concern or current of opinion in some sector of Greco-Roman society, rarely commits himself to such and usually interprets the text as it stands, usually drawing quite orthodox (and sometimes non-Roman) conclusions.

Similarly C. K. Barrett⁴ and Leon Morris,⁵ like Alford and Westcott who wrote before the riot of twentieth-century Gospels criticism, both treat the text of John’s Gospel with respect for its authorial genuineness and for its textual integrity as a report of Jesus’ prayer. Sir Edwin Hoskins⁶ and Rudolph Schnackenburg⁷ follow about the same policy.

After all, Jesus laid great emphasis here on the integrity of the Father’s words (both hrēmata and logi are employed) which were given to Him and imparted by Him to the Apostles and they to us. Most people sense this as they read and reflect on the Gospel of John.

In His prayer of John 17, the only extended prayer of Jesus whose contents we know at length, Jesus reminds the Father that He had manifested God’s name to these eleven men ‘which thou gavest me [aor. tense, a past definite act] out of [ek] the world’ (v. 6 kjv). Now Jesus prays the Father to preserve their Christian integrity (against the ‘evil one’ as they go out into the world, vv. 15–17). He speaks of the ‘word’ and ‘the truth’ brought by the Son from the Father to the Eleven and them to the world.

John introduced the theme of the world’s ignorance of the Savior and rejection of Him at the beginning of the Gospel: ‘He was in the world, and ... the world did not know him’ says the author (John 1:10). Now, in these last seven verses of His prayer we hear Jesus explaining to us via a private petition to the Father how the world will come to ‘believe’ on Jesus and to ‘know’ Him and His Father. It is to be through manifest unity of the believers of the ekklēsia. Let us see what Jesus said about it. For some reason Jesus went over the ground twice—and few would regard this as a copyist’s mistake. It must have been His most earnest plea to the Father and thereby for us as well.

It is not feasible to discuss much not specifically related to our theme of unity though we cannot avoid very brief reference to issues related to the mysterious unity of the Godhead, the extent of the atonement and even the order of salvation (ordo salutis).

From the standpoint of the prayer (1) there is going to be a company of believers won by the apostolic ‘word.’ (2) Jesus prayed for this yet-to-be ekklēsia. (3) He prayed specifically for their manifest unity. (4) He spoke of a pattern for their manifest unity in the unity of the Father and the Son. (5) The manifest unity of the believers in the ekklēsia has brought some of the world to knowledge that the Son was sent by the Father and to know that God loves the ekklēsia.

1. There is going to be a company of believers won by the apostolic word. ‘I do not pray for these [the Eleven] only, but also for those who believe in me through their word’ (v. 20 rsv). ‘[T]hese’ are the eleven faithful Apostles, the subject of His prayer through verses 6–19. Earlier in the evening in His discourse on the vine and branches He had said that unity with Himself would glorify the Father in that ‘you bear much fruit, and so prove to be my disciples’ (John 15:8 rsv). That fruit is partly love, as our passage makes plain. That will have effect (vv. 20, 23) in the world. As Calvin discerningly noted, ‘“through their word” expresses admirably the power and nature of faith, and at the same time is a familiar confirmation to us that our faith is founded on the Gospel taught by the apostles.’⁸

2. Jesus prayed for this future ekklēsia.

‘[T]hose who will believe in me through their word’ (v. 20) looks to the future. The many present tenses in the prayer ‘I am coming to you’ (v. 11), ‘now I am coming to you’ (v. 13), are all futuristic presents. Every new believer from that moment on till Gabriel sounds his horn is included in His prayer. ‘All subsequent faith would take place through the Apostolic word [spoken or inscriptured]’ (Alford).

‘[T]heir word’ had been received from Christ both as hrēmata (meaningful sounds, v. 8) and logos (expression of idea, v. 14), as He had received the same from the Father (v. 14). This is an important connection for unity between sound words of doctrine (1, 2 Tim.) and the unity of the church, both visible unity and spiritual. This word of the Father, both the idea and the human words which expressed them, issued in formal statements and a true ‘apostolic succession’ of sound doctrine (2 Tim. 2:2), which have helped anchor the church to the Word down through the centuries.

A contentious problem arises in verse 9. Did Jesus ever pray for the people of the world, or did He not? Jesus had prayed for the Eleven: ‘I am praying for them. I am not praying for the world but for those whom you have given me’ (v. 9). Yet it is not clear that Jesus is here excluding the world from interest in His prayers. He did (as we shall see) pray for ‘the world’—several times in this case

‘the world’ as lost and against God is in His thoughts. His concern is the incipient church. The rsv rendering makes plain what most exegetical commentaries (Bengel to Father Brown) point out: Jesus is saying, in effect, ‘at this critical moment I am not praying for the world.’ His concern of the moment was the small group of disciples (seed of the church and the future Christian ekklēsia). Calvin, himself, does not quite come through as a Princetonian Calvinist in his comments on this passage. He adopts the language of the paradox of Isaiah 6:9, 10, quoted several times in the New Testament. In his comments on ‘that the world may believe that you have sent me’ (v. 21) and ‘that the world may know that you sent me’ (v. 23) he affirms the love of God even for the reprobate—quite unseemly for a ‘Calvinist’!⁹

It is this future company of ‘all his people’ who are the subject of verses 20–24. They are soon to emerge from the waiting little ‘flock’ (Acts 1:12–15; cf. Luke 12:32) as the ekklēsia to which first 3,000, then 2,000 more and millions on through the ages were gathered.

3. Jesus’ prayer for the future ekklēsia was for our unity, a oneness corresponding in some manner to the unity between the Father and the Son: ‘that they may all be one, just as you, Father, are in me, and I in you, that they also may be in us’ (v. 21). The request is repeated in similar language in verse 22, except that the second time ‘The glory,’ which the Father had given the Son, He in turn has given to the disciples as a means to their unity. I fail to see any connection between this glory and either His ‘Gloria Unitgeniti’ (uncreated glory),¹⁰ or the glory of the cross as such, rather ‘for them the true glory lay in the path of lowly service wherever it might lead them... The apostles are right with God. ... They have the true Glory’¹¹—in other words, His moral glory. In this path tangible, empirical, visible unity occurs.

In what respect is the unity of the ekklēsia parallel with the unity of Father in Son and Son in Father? There are opposite errors. E. L. Mascall in his Corpus Christi argued that as the Holy Spirit is the bond of unity in the ekklēsia, so is the bond that renders the holy Trinity a unity.¹² But the comparison is of ekklēsia to God, not the other way around. Ancient Arians made the same procedural error with opposite results when they claimed that, as the bond that unites believers is moral only, so the bond of Father and Son is moral only.

As Calvin points out, the Fathers went to ridiculous lengths in refuting the Arian view. He proposed modestly that the oneness of Father and Son was in the Son’s mission and message as Mediator. Throughout the chapter, Calvin says, ‘When Christ affirms that he is one with the Father, he does not speak simply of his Divine essence, but that he is called one, as regards his mediatorial office, and in so far as he is our head.’¹³

J. F. Randall wrote a long, technical book in an effort to explain the comparison and the unity.¹⁴ He cites the various opinions: unity of purpose; harmonious existence together; like husband and wife; achieved through the divine image in man; unity in the Eucharist; and the like. ‘Sooner or later,’ R. Brown correctly states, ‘most authors say that it is a union of love.’¹⁵

This unity has to be evident to the world, otherwise it could not help produce belief and knowledge among unbelievers. This points to the ‘fellowship’ (Gr. koinōnia) which characterized the Jerusalem ekklēsia and has characterized every healthy local church since that day and in an apparent degree in the world-wide ekklēsia, as we all feel when we meet true believers of any hue or culture or organized community. This is ably expressed and defended by Raymond Brown.¹⁶

4. The effect of the evident unity of the ekklēsia (both invisible and spiritual) by the Holy Spirit, visible to the world through their love upward to God as well as inward to one another and outward toward lost people, brings the world to knowledge that the Father sent the Son and that some would believe in the same: ‘that the world may believe that thou hast sent me’ (v. 21 rsv); ‘so that the world may know that thou hast sent me and hast loved them even as thou hast loved me’ (v. 23 rsv). There is a whole theology of mission and evangelism here and questions that ask for answers. For example, ‘hast loved them’—the believers or the world? Though most assume without comment that it is the believers, it is grammatically and syntactically possible that it is the world (as in John 3:16). At least one important modern author (J. H. Bernard in ICC, John) thought so.¹⁷ In context it is more likely the Father’s love for believers is intended. That Christian love for God, fellow believers and for lost mankind, in the koinōnia of the ekklēsia, is key to letting the world know and bring some to faith is a familiar theme in the New Testament. Wescott, after referring to the ultimate summation of ‘all things’ (= heaven and earth) in God (1 Cor. 15:28), and to ‘every knee’ bowed to the Son, relates this goal to the oneness of the church. He well says:

This end ... is to be brought about by the spectacle of the disciples.... The unity of disciples, therefore, while it springs out of a direct relation to Christ, must have some external expression that it may affect those outside the church.¹⁸

Its importance is overwhelming. The church is in retreat wherever apparent moral and spiritual unity are missing. (See 1 John 1:3, 6, 7; 2 Cor. 9:13; 1 Peter 2:12.) The vigor with which Roman Catholic author Raymond Brown elaborates and supports this truth is both refreshing and amazing.¹⁹

Unity a Mark of the True Church

Though the early Christians simply assumed the church and their incorporation in it, never attempting a definition as far as we know, they found it useful, perhaps necessary, to agree on four marks which are necessarily present in the true church. Of these the church’s unity is the first mark. They were given permanent statement in the Nicene Creed (ad 325, 381): ‘We believe ... in one, holy, catholic and apostolic church.’²⁰ This creed has been honored by continuous use in instruction and worship to the present. Whatever the church may be, as such (and there is some disagreement as we have seen), there is only one church, the mystical body of Christ, the bride, the household of God, that is, the universal church, not of all professors but all who are elect, true believers, whose ‘names are written in heaven.’

The ‘one’ church is not anything distinct from holy, catholic and apostolic. As understood by evangelical Protestants—and I think by the survivors of the late Roman persecutions who gave the creed its first form in ad 325—there is only one church both in the world below and in the world above, holy because it is in union with Christ who is holy, catholic in that it leaves no true disciple out anywhere in the whole wide world, and apostolic in that it teaches truly (if imperfectly) what the original Apostles passed down to the churches immediately through oral teaching and mediately through their inspired writings in the ministries of the ‘pastors and teachers’ of the ekklēsia everywhere.

The point of emphasis in this chapter is that the holy, catholic church in the world, in spite of our inherited patterns of thinking about Christian groups (sects, denominations, societies, customs, observances) other than the one we belong to—officially or only by folk custom—is truly a unity.

Defined and Expressed by Necessity in the First Centuries

The concept of unity was defined out of necessity imposed by heresies and schisms.²¹

In recent times the unity of the ekklēsia has been of great interest both to advocates of the so-called ecumenical movement and its opponents. The growth of heresies in the immediately pre-Nicene (325) period compelled the church to care for unity of doctrine. A millennium afterward, the Reformation seemed to shatter the unity. Efforts to restore formal communion between all evangelicals and ‘Papists’ in the first generation after 1517 were a dismal failure. The same must be reported of sixteenth-century efforts to secure formal communion if not organizational unity between Lutheran and Reformed.

The unity was expressed well in the late second century by Irenaeus of Lyons (130–200). I cite Danielou’s comment and translation of Against Heresies (v. 20.1):

The bond of unity in every sphere is given great emphasis in a passage such as the following: ‘For they (the Gnostics) are all very much later than the bishops to whom the Apostles handed over ... all the churches. Hence the aforesaid heretics, since they are blind to the truth, are bound to wander out of the way, taking now one road, now another; and for this reason the traces of their teachings are scattered abroad without any harmony or sequence [no systematic theology!]. But the path of those who are from the church, circling the whole world, and possessing a firm tradition from the apostles, enables us to see that all have one and the same faith, since all teach one and the same God and Father, and believe the same dispensation of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and know the same gift of the Spirit, and meditate on the same precepts, and preserve the same form of organization as regards the church, and look for the same coming of the Lord, and affirm the same salvation of the whole man, both soul and body.’²²

This describes in nuce the emphatic, real and felt spiritual and largely still-visible unity of the church of the early centuries. After Christianity became the state church both in the Byzantine east and the Roman west, though an awareness of unity in Christ, of sorts, remained, there were times when there was more faith among those called sectarians, heretics, schismatics and similar than in the hierarchy, the monasteries and the neglected lay members of the geographical parishes. The true whole church was visible only to God, even though we may be sure that the believers in and out of the official, legally recognized ‘church’ were drawn to one another as always in the Christian ekklēsia.

Christian Unity Degenerated to Christendom

In western Europe, Latin (Roman) Christianity became the folk religion of largely unconverted masses. Eastern Europe and large sections of the Near and Middle East and North Africa (before Islam) became nominally Christian (Eastern Orthodoxy as well as Armenian, Coptic Assyrian and other groups). There is, of course, no godly spirituality in mere nominal profession of Christianity.

This was Christendom and it remained so into modern times. During this period, while there was some awareness of unity in Christ among some, there was small effort toward union except as the ‘Christian’ secular states sought to conquer one another. There was little reflection on the doctrine of the church except as the Roman papacy sought to increase its hegemony and from time to time issued increasingly bold claims to be the una sancta. In his bull Unam Sanctam of 1299, Boniface VIII (pope, 1294–1303) declared that ‘it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff’ (Latourette, 487). And outside this church ‘there is no salvation nor remission of sin’ (Denzinger, 468, p. 186). The same claim was brought up to date on July 29, 1896, when Leo XIII issued an encyclical on ‘the Unity of the Church’ which declares: ‘When the divine Founder decreed that the church be one in faith, and in government, and in communion, He chose Peter and his successors [bishops of Rome] in whom should be the principle and as it were the center of unity.’²³

In Reformation Times

When the Reformers were expelled from the church, so-called, they were compelled to reflect on the doctrine of the church and her unity. What is the church and in what does the unity consist? They defined the unity of the church in response to the universal claim of the Roman Church and under the pressure of their circumstances when civil magistrates and ecclesiastical authorities were trying to kill them. They found it helpful to distinguish between the visible church and the invisible church. By this distinction they claimed no affinity with the notion that the church has no organization or buildings or special officers, rather with Paul’s comment about distinguishing true believers from false professors: ‘The Lord knows those who are his’ and ‘Let every one who names the name of the Lord depart from iniquity’ (2 Tim. 2:19 rsv).

In Post-Reformation Times

Protestantism broke up into many Christian ‘denominations,’ i.e. distinct Christian groups having a name and organization and perhaps some doctrines distinguishing themselves from others.²⁴ Some famous scholars (e.g. E. Troeltsch) like to refer to the main branches of Protestantism as ‘churches’ and to the rest of us as ‘sects.’ In the Reformation era earnest efforts to draw all the orthodox evangelicals together failed because centrifugal forces overcame centripetal and continued to do so until the rise of the ‘ecumenical movement.’ Whatever gain or loss for the cause of the kingdom of Christ was brought about by the dissolution of the medieval form of Christendom and subsequent rise of the denominations and recent parachurch movements, there are compelling reasons for recovering unity of some sort. No one has given this problem more serious thought with positive recommendations than the late Lesslie Newbigin.²⁵ In the four points now to follow I have incorporated some of Newbigin’s wisdom from several of his books.

Reasons for Recovering ‘Unity’

First, in the modern epoch came the breakdown of the medieval synthesis we call Christendom. Christianity had become the folk religion of western Europe—with the Bible story and events of Jesus’ life, death, resurrection and similar woven into the very texture of civil, educational, family, as well as religious life. The Reformation did not modify that much, except that the ‘denominations’ now defined unity in relation to diversity. But the Renaissance and Reformation set in motion secularizing forces which, gradually and consummating in recent memory of living people, placed the church again in a largely secular and newly semi-pagan world.

In the changed situation we Christians have been compelled by the non-Christian forces in government, law, education, business and competing social forces (psychology, which eliminates the psyche, for example) to ally ourselves with one another. We have been compelled to think again of our oneness in Christ and to act it out. We must realize that whatever comity between civil and religious community may have existed when our denominations and their creeds were formed, it no longer exists. In this changed atmosphere it is not only scriptural but rational to cease defining our denominations and local churches in contrast with other such groups but to discover how to express our acknowledged unity in Christ and to cultivate some humility.

Further, the atomizing of the stability and community of the older culture brought about by the industrial revolution and subsequent technical and communications advances means that the local churches individually and the world-wide community of believers have immensely greater opportunities.

It is natural that men should long for some sort of real community, for men cannot be human without it. It is especially natural that Christians should reach out after that part of Christian doctrine which speaks of the true, God-given community, [a word formed from Latin for with and one-ness], the church of Jesus Christ.²⁶

The second reason for recovering unity is that the experience of Western missionaries and the new churches established in parts of the world outside Christendom over the past two centuries has demonstrated acute need for Christian unity and community.

In our country, one's church membership may require only superficial contact with other members of our church between Sundays, for 'church' may be only one of several of one's associations. This, however, is not the case in Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist or primitive pagan cultures. There, publicly submitting to Christian baptism requires a radical break with the local culture, often even with immediate family. The new believer is not so much one who has joined a new club as born into a new community and a different family. That new community and family must provide the solidarity (unity) of a real family.

Further, the church in a culture foreign to its nature must provide for its people avenues for personal and corporate life extending beyond 'what goes on at church.' It may even need to provide the new believer with a new way to earn a living, a way to get education and medical attention. These are all to a great degree corporate, not individual, functions.

Third, the church in a totally non-Christian society must undertake the moral and social discipline of the new believers. This is a function of the church as a social unity. This takes time. We note that Paul did not always ordain elders and deacons immediately after a church was formed in a heathen (if we may still use that ancient Anglo-Saxon word) society (Titus 1).

The removal of the convert from the sphere of the traditional discipline of caste, community or tribe, puts on the church the responsibility of seeing to it that this is replaced by a new kind of social discipline ... because without this the church's witness to the non-Christian world becomes hopelessly compromised ... [hence] the sharpest necessity arises for rethinking traditional attitudes from the Christendom background.²⁷

In this regard, churches of the several denominations located in the same area have felt compelled to acknowledge and respect the disciplinary authority of churches of other missions. This of course ought to prevail in the sending churches also. Yet, as it is today, a person placed under censure in the local Baptist church may escape embarrassment simply by joining the Methodist church across town, or even a Baptist church of another association.

In the fourth place, as a by-product of the modern missionary movement, came the ecumenical movement. This is a misnomer because oikoumene is a Greek word for the inhabited earth or the 'civilized' part of it—in the New Testament, the Roman world (Luke 2:1). It has come to stand for the impulse in all branches of the Christian church toward friendly co-operation if not formal union.

As painfully pointed out by an 'ecumenist,' Dr E. O. Smith, in the Ecumenical Review,²⁸ most evangelical groups declined to participate in either the World Council of Churches or the National because of certain legitimate concerns.²⁹

Smith reminded his colleagues that the evangelicals have stayed out for legitimate reasons. I summarize:

1. They feel the 'ecumenical' churches have not maintained purity of doctrine and are therefore more to be shunned than joined in any sort of unity. 'The enemy of the church has no place within the church' (John 3:17; 2 John 9, 10).³⁰
2. They feel they should not join with churches which make no effort to insure genuine conversion among members.
3. They feel the parochial and sacramentarian orientation of some 'ecumenical' churches is inconsistent with biblical norms.
4. The indifference to discipline among 'main-line' Protestants and Roman Catholics manifests indifference to doctrine also, hence they suspect insincerity in the several orthodox-appearing statements issued by World and National Councils.
5. The emphasis of the ecumenical movement seems almost entirely on organizational unity having no basis in shared unity in the bonds of the Spirit, of the truth, and of new birth and faith.
6. The inclusivism of the World Council of Churches seems to imply a doctrine of universal salvation, especially since many of the ablest 'ecumenical' theologians past and present are Universalists.

7. And finally, a point Smith did not see, millions of biblically oriented evangelicals (and even some biblically oriented Roman Catholics) find an oppressive, false church organized on a world-scale under a final, personal pseudo-Christ predicted in many passages of the Bible. They therefore want no part of what in their opinion might be a large-scale foreshadowing, preparatory for that event.

During the period of the growing strength of World and National Councils many mergers of denominations took place. The Methodists and the Evangelical United Brethren denominations came together as the United Methodist church, for example. Three of the several Lutheran ‘churches’ are now one, and so on. COCU, Council on Church Union (frequently lampooned by C. F. H. Henry in the early years of Christianity Today magazine), promoted a merger of all denominations. But the wind went out of the bag in the period after about 1970. The latent unbelief of many of the leaders and lack of biblical-spiritual forces could not resist the rising tide of moral delinquency in an increasingly paganized society. The mainstream denominations in the WCC and NCC are the ones now no longer discussing church union but ordination of homosexuals and struggling for any sort of integrity as churches. The ecumenical movement, for now at least, is the mouse that first barked, then roared and now scarcely squeaks.

Evangelicals have produced their own brands of ‘ecumenicity,’ taking the form of innumerable trans-denominational church organizations and movements, as well as several not very inclusive organizations whose goal has been to show a united evangelical face to the world and to be mutually helpful. None is doing well at producing a ‘united’ ekklēsia at this writing, however well the oneness Jesus spoke of (John 17) persists.

Older standard orthodox works have had little to say about the unity of the church. I note A. H. Strong, for example, had little to say of the unity in his Systematic Theology yet had some fine ideas about it expressed in a sermon, ‘Christian Truth and Its Keepers,’ preached in 1868,³¹ in which he found denominational divisions helpful, no peril to the church’s unity, but rather as aids in fulfilling the diverse tasks of the church in evangelism and nurture of believers. There is no section on the unity in Charles Hodge’s three volume Systematic Theology, yet he eloquently defined and applied the doctrine in a sermon preached several times but not published till 1958.³²

The ecumenical movement produced more literature on the subject than any one could possibly read in a lifetime. Partly in response to that enterprise, now expiring, evangelical writing on the church is also paying attention to the first of the four ‘marks of the church’: unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity. Thomas Oden’s laudable passion to acquaint our generation of preachers with knowledge of Christian history has a fine section on the first mark. Says he: ‘Every particular expression of genuine faith in Christ participates in the one, holy, catholic church, the communion of Saints.’³³

Addendum

For various reasons over a period of years ending about 1985 there was a small burst of scholarly and popular writing on the problem of church unity, both of doctrines and of formal-informal fellowship. Robert Brindsmead in an outstanding article in an ephemeral journal (Verdict, A Journal of Theology) characterized the problem as ‘The Gospel versus the Sectarian Spirit.’³⁴ He pointed out, ‘In recent years, a number of scholars have challenged the myth of an ideal [unity] early church,’ citing Walter Bauer,³⁵ James D. Dunn,³⁶ Peter Toon³⁷ and Robert Wilken.³⁸ Brindsmead thanks the ecumenical movement for making us conscious of the ‘scandal of a divided Christian church.’ From the exasperatingly ‘brief and vague’ New Testament reports he says:

We could even speak of different theological or spiritual emphases in the primitive church ... authentic apocalyptic, enthusiastic and pietistic elements ... great diversity. Even Peter and Paul could not work harmoniously together.... Neither ... Paul and Barnabas.

The consultation of Acts 2:17–25 (Toon remarks) issued an acceptance of differences of culture among new and old groups of Christians with resultant styles of worship and congregational activity, and with common commitment to Scripture in general and the gospel in particular.³⁹

Brindsmead’s truly great article (now apparently lost from sight except for files like mine) cannot be fully summarized. He notes Lutherans in Reformation times needed the corrections of Calvinists (and vice versa), while both needed the corrections and contributions of Anabaptists for whom neither could speak a kind word. The great churches as zealous sects have now lost their zeal. According to Robert McAfee Brown:

There is an assurance in the faith of the sectarian that more sophisticated Protestants ... do not even begin to attain ... a willingness to go to the four corners of the earth and preach the sectarian gospel to every creature, that makes the missionary program of organized Protestantism look puny in proportion to the vaster resources [no longer true in the twenty-first century] available to it. Denominational Protestants [the ‘mainline’ now ‘sideline’] must be grateful that the sectarians [i.e. evangelical groups] are witnessing to these things.⁴⁰

Some other unusually helpful thoughts on Christian unity coming from that epoch will be found in a few paragraphs by Edward John Carnell⁴¹ and two early articles by Carl F. H. Henry, as editor of Christianity Today.⁴²

Church unity and church union were themes prevailing in both scholarly and popular journals for two or three decades following the inauguration of the World Council of Churches at Amsterdam in 1948.

The last year of the twentieth century brought ecumenist efforts to remarkable conclusions if not consummation. Pope John Paul II met with Eastern Orthodox Patriarch Teocist in Romania, May 7–9, 1999. Another first was the ‘Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification’ issued by the Vatican and the Lutheran World Federation. This was supposed to announce agreement. Apparently it set aside the Protestant Reformation and declared it all really a theological mistake. A similar accord was arrived at by ‘The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission’ which seems to acknowledge the primacy of the Roman pope. There was also in America an agreement between the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America with its 5.2 million members and the Episcopal Church with its 2.3 million members to enter into full communion. Nine Protestant denominations comprising the Consultation on Church Union agreed among themselves to deepen their relationship by the year 2002.

Multiculturalism and political correctness are acids eating away at the distinctive claims of Christianity within every orthodox, believing persuasion. There is also a deep and growing desire for a community of action and mutual recognition between Eastern Orthodox, conservative Roman Catholic and Evangelical Protestants. Several new, well-edited journals are promoting this enterprise. These folks find their unity in the ancient creeds and the authority of the Bible and necessity for sincere repentance and faith for salvation. These seemingly ineradicable doctrinal barriers which prevent formal ecclesiastical unions are proving no insuperable obstacle to mutual acceptance on the personal level. How far this friendly exchange will go is hard to say.

¹ Who are the ‘saints’ of fellow citizenship? Perhaps Abel and Enoch, pre-Israelites, for many of them lived before Abraham, as well as Abraham, Moses and others. Not because in an Abrahamic covenant which frequently gets overworked in relation to unity of the church, but because they had faith and were holy.

² R. E. Brown, Anchor Bible: The Gospel According to John, chaps. 13–21, Vol. 26a (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966, 1970), p. 778.

³ John 17:20–25.

⁴ Charles K. Barrett, The Gospel According to John (London: SPCK, 1962).

⁵ Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971).

⁶ Sir Edwin Hoskins, The Fourth Gospel (London, 1947).

⁷ Rudolph Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to John, 3 vols., English trans. (New York: Seabury, 1979).

⁸ Calvin, Commentary, John, Vol. II, trans. W. Pringle (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1847), p. 182.

⁹ ibid., pp. 183–186.

¹⁰ J. A. Bengel, Genomon Novi Testamenti (Tuebingen, 1850), p. 464.

¹¹ Morris, op. cit., p. 735.

¹² E. L. Mascall, Corpus Christi: Essays on the Church & the Eucharist (London: Longman’s, Green & Co., 1953, 1957), p. 9.

¹³ Calvin, op. cit., p. 183.

¹⁴ J. F. Randall, The Theme of the Unity in John 17:20–23 (Louvain Univ., 1962).

¹⁵ Raymond E. Brown, The Anchor Bible: The Gospel According to John, 2 vols. (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966, 1970), p. 776.

¹⁶ ibid., pp. 774–779.

¹⁶ ibid., pages 114–119.

¹⁷ Morris, op cit., p. 736.

¹⁸ B. F. Westcott, The Holy Bible ... Commentary, NT, Vol. II, p. 246.

¹⁹ Brown, op. cit.

²⁰ H. Denzinger, Sources of Catholic Dogma (St Louis: B. Herder Co., 1957), para. 36, p. 36; NPNF, 2nd Series, para. 14, p. 163 Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 37.

²¹ See Pelikan, The Christian Tradition i, pp. 69, 70, 117, 118, 159, 160, 309–312 for recent scholarly authority.

²² Jean Danielou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1973), pp. 150, 151. A slightly different rendering appears in ANF, i, pp. 547, 548.

Denzinger Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma

²³ Denzinger, op. cit., p. 495.

²⁴ Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ‘denomination’ and ‘denominational.’

²⁵ Lesslie Newbigin, The Household of God (New York: Friendship Press, 1964).

²⁶ ibid., p. 4.

²⁷ ibid., p. 7.

²⁸ E. O. Smith, Ecumenical Review (Vol. xv, no. 2, Jan. 1963).

²⁹ The nineteenth century beginnings of the ecumenical movement in mainly evangelical missionary circles, later the Faith and Order organization, did address important doctrinal matters. That history is too large a subject for us to tackle here. It is correct to say that the History of the Ecumenical Movement, Rouse and Neill (1954, 822 tightly packed pages, which took me a whole summer to digest) presents it fully in honest and usually favorable light. They do not omit the warts.

³⁰ This is the heart of the continuing fundamentalist-modernist controversy—by whatever name.

³¹ A. H. Strong, Philosophy and Religion (1888), pp. 238–244.

³² Charles Hodge, ‘The Unity of the church,’ Eternity magazine, June, 1958, pp. 20–28.

³³ Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology: Life in the Spirit iii (1992), p. 314.

- ³⁴ Robert Brindsmead, Verdict, Vol. 4, no. 3, March, 1981, pp. 8–16. Published at Fallbrook, CA.
- ³⁵ Walter Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1971), cited by Brindsmead.
- ³⁶ James D. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: an Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1977), cited by Brindsmead.
- ³⁷ Peter Toon, The Development of Doctrine in the Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978), cited by Brindsmead.
- ³⁸ Robert Wilken, The Myth of Christian Beginnings: History's Impact on Belief (Garden City, NY: Double Day & Co., 1972), cited by Brindsmead.
- ³⁹ Brindsmead, op. cit., pp. 10, 11.
- ⁴⁰ Robert McAfee Brown, The Spirit of Protestantism (Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1961), p. 212, as cited by Brindsmead, p. 12.
- ⁴¹ Edward J. Carnell, The Case for Biblical Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1967), pp. 14–17.
- ⁴² Carl F. H. Henry, 'The Perils of Independency,' Christianity Today, Nov. 12, 1956, pp. 20–23, and 'The Perils of Ecumenicity,' Nov. 16, 26, 1956, pp. 20–22. Both republished by Millard J. Erickson, ed., The New Life: Readings in Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1979), pp. 341–353.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (879). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

The Gifts of Christ to the Church

The church has received two sorts of divine gifts for her health and growth. Paul is our sole source of specific information about them. He discusses the first, gifts of ability to each member in Romans 12:3–8, and the second, gifts of specially authorized and qualified people in Ephesians 4:7–17. This chapter treats both.

I. Divine Gifts of Ability to People in the Church

Paul expressed deep concern in two Epistles regarding Christians living together in harmonious unity within each congregation, building (edifying) one another up in mutual service and manifesting all the Christian graces.

In Romans 12:3–8 he discusses this matter dear to his heart and essential to the well-being of the churches. Such health of the church, he says, is brought about by proper exercise of certain gifts of God, called charismata (sing. charisma), to every individual of the church. Charisma is obviously related to charis, Greek for grace. He uses this word sixteen times, often a name for special gifts (natural or supernatural) to Christians to use in service to one another. Recent secular journalism has pounced upon this ‘rare and late word’¹ and, knowing nothing of divine charisma, calls personal magnetism, leadership ability, charisma. In Paul’s Epistle charisma is a special ability imparted (naturally or supernaturally) to a Christian for service to others in the body of Christ, certainly not power to induce popularity. Paul mentions seven charismata, obviously not an exhaustive list, in verses 6–8: prophecy, service, teaching, exhorting, giving money, helping and acts of mercy. The gist of his exhortation is to get on with humble, but faithful, exercise of these and other gifts within the ‘one body in Christ.’

His instructions about gifts in a lengthy second passage (1 Cor. 12–14) is in response to a previous inquiry by the Corinth church. One cannot avoid noticing Paul’s concern about misuse of the opportunity provided by the recurring weekly assembly of plain Christian folk for people who only want opportunity to sound off before an audience or have some private idea or agenda to promote or mistake their own thoughts and feelings for the voice of God.

In their inquiry the Corinthians had called the more spectacular manifestations in their assembly ‘spirituals’ (pneumatikos, sing.), a term not learned from Paul but from pagan sources. It appears thousands of times in the literature of ancient Greece and has no necessary connection with the Holy Spirit, Third Person of the triune God.² Paul uses pneumatikos only twice with reference to ‘gifts’ (1 Cor. 12:1 and 14:1). For Paul the gifts are not of the Holy Spirit specifically, but of ‘God’ the Father (Rom. 12:3) or of Christ (Eph. 4:7 ff.). It may be that Paul only condescended to use the term ‘spirituals’ for gifts because the Corinthians had used it in their previous inquiry (cf. 7:1 with 12:1). We may be sure that whatever false pagan notions regarding ‘spirituals’ and spirituality the Corinthians had in mind in questioning Paul he corrected in his answer (1 Cor. 12–14). There were many there who liked to be seen and heard exercising what they only assumed were gifts of God. Paul conferred a judgment of charity in calling all these exercises ‘gifts,’ charismata, but used the occasion to instruct his readers on how to sort out the genuine from the inauthentic, the show-offs from earnest servants of Christ. Every exercise of alleged gifts should ‘edify’ (build up) the church (14:4, 5 niv): ‘Let all things be done for building up [edification]’ (14:26), ‘decently and in order’ (14:40).

Throughout these two sections (Rom. 12; 1 Cor. 12–14) the charismata are to individuals to use in service to one another to build up the church. Nowhere is there slightest suggestion that any particular charisma is attached to an office such as elder, bishop, pastor or deacon. Throughout Paul’s discussion the gifts are of abilities in the ‘spiritual’ realm to individual believers. Even when Paul mentions apostles, prophets and teachers ‘appointed in the church,’ and similar (1 Cor. 12:28), he does so in context of seeking the ‘higher gifts’ (12:31), a scale of values, not grades of honor or authority in the congregations.

II. Divine Gifts of People of Ability and Authority to the Church

We shall now examine at some length the passage, Ephesians 4:7–16, wherein the great planter of churches throughout the eastern half of the Roman Empire wrote of Christ's gift of certain people to the church at large and to the congregations individually. These specifically designated leaders (for want of a better term) were to enable the believers of the congregations to provide the services necessary for mutual help and building the whole body, internally among themselves and externally through mission to the lost world about them.

There are several problems of grammar and syntactical connection in the passage. Paul can argue like a Roman lawyer at times (Rom. 1–4, for example). Yet, here his Epistle reads like 'a rapid conversation' taken down in shorthand. Discontinuous clauses 'pour in full stream, sentence hurrying after sentence and phrase heaped upon phrase with an exuberance that bewilders us.'³ Scholars have come to a fair consensus on what the Apostle said and meant. I shall try to avoid the technicalities behind interpretation as much as possible.

Even in the abbreviated and simplified treatment to follow the argument will be trying to a reader unaccustomed to exegetical discourse. The general sense is 'perspicuous' but difficulties of interpretation, in which much variety of church polity, government and mission are rooted, loom in almost every word. The Summary and Conclusions at the close of this chapter may well be read before tackling the exegesis in pages 890–897 intervening.

In our passage (Eph. 4:7–16) gifts are designated neither by the rare word charisma nor by the exotic term pneumatika, but by the very common words dōrea and dōron, both rendered gift and apparently derived from didōmi, to give. Their quality as 'gifts' rather than native abilities or 'talents' is emphatic.

Verse 7 seems to introduce gifts as though another treatment of charismata to individuals were to follow. I do not think that is what the Apostle meant by his words: 'But grace was given to each one of us.' 'But' (de) connects the sentence to God's 'all and in all' in verse 6. 'The grace' (hē charis) 'was given' (edothē, first aorist passive)—not 'the graces' (charismata). To the contrary the '[one] grace was given' in some past incident. The text does not say that each one of us received an individual gift but 'the gift.' We each share the benefits of the one gift.

What was the incident? When 'the gift' was 'given'? This was the giving which took place at our Lord's Ascension, described generally in verses 8–10 and in detail in the very long sentence, verses 11–16—apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. The gift was comparable to the gift of Christ: 'according to the measure of Christ's gift.'

What is 'the gift of Christ'? There are three possibilities in the grammar: (1) the gift to Christ; (2) the gift Christ gave (or gives); or (3) the gift which is Christ Himself. Commentators mention the 'gift to Christ' as possible but reject it as not fitting the context or for other reasons. Most older commentators and theologians opt for the gift which Christ gave, subjective genitive—Alford, Meyer (Calvin is noncommittal, as also Bengel), Ellicott, et al. They connect this with charismata and pneumatika of Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 12–14. When reason is supplied they cite 'he [Christ] gave gifts to men' in verse 8. It may be that Christ's gifts are in Paul's mind, but if so I think not of abilities to each Christian (Rom. 12; 1 Cor. 12–14) but of the persons to follow in Ephesians 4:11–16. Among some recent writers the gift is Christ Himself, the Father's gift (2 Cor. 9:15, God's 'inexpressible gift'). 'The gift of Messiah is the measure' (M. Barth, II, xvii). In this case then the Father's generosity is the measure of the Son's generosity in His conferrals on the church which each member now enjoys. I shall not reproduce the convincing argument for this view of the verse to be found at length in Marcus Barth's, Ephesians.⁴ The chief supporting text cited is Romans 8:32. At any rate, in view of the fact that Paul introduces Christ's gift of men who have certain functions and prerogatives with dio legei, 'on this account,' 'it says' (or 'he says,' v. 8) tends to the conclusion that verse 7 has reference to the gifts of 11–16, not the gifts of Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 12–14.

The point of verses 8 and 9 is to provide scriptural precedent if not authority for the revelation (found nowhere else in the New Testament) that Christ endowed the church with an operating constitution at the time of His Ascension: 'When he ascended ... he gave gifts to men' (v. 8); 'He ... also ascended far above all the heavens.... And he gave,' etc. (vv. 10, 11).

Paul's ponderous and somewhat obscure language should not obscure the fact he is introducing a profound revelation—the operating constitution of the church for propagation and governance, no less, to be presented in verses 11–17.

1. The Time of Conferral of the Gifts

It was at the time of Christ's Ascension—and session. 'When he ascended ... he gave gifts to men.... And he gave ...' (Eph. 4:8 and 11). Verses 9 and 10 are parenthetical (Ellicott). The functioning leaders are not sent out by Christ from time to time. The language clearly says certain saints known and called from eternity were conferred upon the church from a throne in heaven at the beginning of the 'church age.' Paul, for example, plainly says he was called by Christ and the Father before he was born (Gal. 1:1, 15), to be an Apostle, the first in the list of gifts. According to Ephesians 4:10 this is no less the case with every evangelist, pastor or teacher. This casts an aura of great solemnity in the appointment, support and acceptance by the church of all those designated in this passage. Their charge came from God before the churches were formed in which they serve. The little band who witnessed the event of Christ's ascent from Olivet could not have been aware of this aspect of that event, but we are aware and, hence, there is laid on us enormous responsibility for discerning acknowledgment, godly response to and proper treatment of the evangelists, pastors and teachers who serve Christ in our churches.

2. The Author Who Conferred the Gifts

The emphatic (third pers. sing. pronoun autos) appears twice: 'He himself [and no other (Alford)] who descended is also the one who ascended' (v. 10), '... and he himself gave some,' etc. (v. 11). The names, number, function, purpose, etc., of these gifts comes on quickly. Again, however, the awful import of these gift-men of the ascended Lord's appointment must not be lost upon us. They are very special.

We search in vain to find these 'offices' in operation in the earliest chapters of Acts, except for the Apostles themselves. Years passed before one of the number of disciples, for example, became an evangelist (Acts 8:5; cf.; 21:8) and much later any pastor or teacher. The time for them to be fully recognized in the churches would be soon enough—later in the apostolic age, as seen in the Epistles. We do not know anything of how the Lord made this structure of affairs known but the Lord Jesus Christ who 'gave' also 'made known' as soon as the church moved out into the Gentile world and began founding churches.

It seems to be the clear assumption of the New Testament that the gifted men necessary for continued propagation and governance would appear among the churches, if not fully in each church. More on this later in Chapters 18 and 19.

3. The Number of the Gifts

‘And he gave the apostles, the prophets, the evangelists, the pastors and teachers’ (Eph. 4:11 esv). ‘And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers’ (Eph. 4:11 kjv). It is hard to be brief because the longest article I have ever written for an encyclopaedia was on ‘Apostle,’ and some extensive research has been on prophets and prophecy. Every item here is the subject of immense literature.⁵

As to the number of such ‘offices’, there is difference of opinion whether this list is exhaustive or not. A somewhat similar list in 1 Corinthians 12:28–30 does not distinguish carefully between gifts to men and men as gifts. That list also differs in omitting evangelists and pastors, so it probably does not bear on the question of the number of the gifts of Christ at His Ascension.

Pastors and teachers, as indicated by the grammar of the Greek text, are almost certainly one office (as shall appear). Reference to elders and bishops (or overseers) also relate to the same office. The gradations of ‘clergy’ as developed in the growing hierarchy of the third and fourth centuries are not founded on this passage.

The list does not include deacons and deaconesses as described in the pastoral Epistles (1, 2 Tim.; Titus) because the gifts are to the universal church. Apostles moved around in exercise of their office. Each one could say ‘The world is my parish.’ Some prophets moved about too as presumably also did most (missionary) evangelists. We have the example of Philip the Evangelist (Acts 8). As a matter of fact, most pastors also move from church to church over time. Each of these terms should be interpreted according to the limited meaning in the text. In this sense the list is intended to be exhaustive, as shall appear as we consider the names of the ‘offices’ and their functions.

4. The Names of ‘Offices’ and Their Functions

‘... the apostles, the prophets, the evangelists, the pastors and teachers.’ Each of these, whether four or five, has to do with proclamation of the word, usually publicly.

In short, the government of the church, by the ministry of the word, is not a contrivance of men, but by appointment made by the Son of God.... To Christ we owe it that we have ministers of the gospel, that they abound in necessary qualifications, that they execute the trust committed to them. All, all is his gift.⁶

In the same context Calvin correctly remarks:

When men are called by God [to a particular office], gifts are necessarily connected with offices. God does not confer on men the mere name of Apostles or Pastors, but also endows them with the gifts, without which they cannot properly discharge the office.⁷

Apostles. According to Ephesians 2:19–22, ‘the household of God,’ i.e. the church, is ‘built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets’ (v. 20). The Greek uses the article ‘the’ (Gr. tōn) before ‘apostles and prophets,’ showing that they are considered a unit, hence both had to do with the foundation of the church. As far as the book of Acts is concerned, God used an Apostle, Peter, first to take the gospel to Gentiles, and Paul, another Apostle, was the one who further led in founding congregations in eastern parts of the Empire. Early traditions trace founding of churches in other regions to other Apostles. This was the claim of orthodox Christians everywhere in a few decades. The ancient church assigned special prominence to apostolically founded congregations. Further, these twelve men were the ones upon whom Jesus laid the duty and promise of recollection and record of what He had taught them (John 14:25, 26; 15:26, 27; 16:13–15). Paul asserts earlier in Ephesians that revelations were made not only to him but to other ‘holy apostles and prophets’ (Eph. 3:5). The earliest test of authentic New Testament Scripture was apostolicity. The writing of Holy Scripture, the New Testament, was a major part of their founding ministry enduring until today. Apostles were chosen by Christ Himself (Matt. 10 and parallels) and ‘sent’ with His authority as ‘ministers plenipotentiary’ both in establishing churches and writing ‘Scripture’ (see 1 Peter 3:15, 16). It should be added that ‘apostles’ is used here in the narrow sense of those witnesses of the resurrection of Christ specially commissioned by Him (see 1 Cor. 9:1; 15:7). (See footnote.⁸)

Prophets. There is considerable evidence for the existence of prophets of a lesser sort of ‘inspired’ status than the ones Paul here designates Apostles (similarly in 1 Cor. 12:28). As seen above in Ephesians 3:5, prophets were associated with the Apostles in reception of important divine revelation of the sort to be incorporated into Scripture. Romans 16:25, 26 informs us that a certain mystery which had been kept secret through ‘times eternal’ (asv) ‘for long ages’ (rsv) is ‘manifest[ed]’ (phanerōthentos) now (nun, at this time) ‘by the scriptures of the prophets’ (kjv, so also asv). This seems to many interpreters to say that ‘now’ the ‘Scriptures’ of prophets of Paul’s time disclose some mystery unknown (or not fully known) previously. If so, Paul is designating the writings of certain contemporary prophets as ‘Scripture’ just as Peter (2 Peter 3:15, 16) called Paul’s writings ‘Scripture.’

Acts 11:2; 13:1; and 15:32 report the presence of ‘prophets’ (prophētai) in the Jerusalem congregation and the Antioch congregation. They are associated with ‘teachers,’ however, not Apostles. These prophets assisted local churches in seeking guidance from God in practical matters of life and mission. Acts 21:10 tells of Agabus who in the manner of some Old Testament prophets warned Paul of imminent dangers if he finished his journey to Jerusalem—which warning Paul ignored. These folk are in continuity with the saintly Anna (Luke 2:36) and other godly folk of pre-New Testament times—the disciples of Elijah and Elisha and Isaiah—who possessed superior piety and powers of insight and who advised God’s people. They were not channels of ‘the oracles of God’ for all time. Several Old Testament characters who made false claims to such powers and closeness to God are called prophets, as a matter of courtesy or perhaps simply to take note of their claims (e.g. Jer. 5:31; 14:14; 23:21). This class of prophets continued on for many decades into the future after the end of the apostolic age.⁹

But prophets associated with Apostles in writing Scripture—and we know not what else—were special, probably deriving their authority from the Apostles with whom they were, by apostolic choice, associated. Luke, associated with Paul and author of about 20 percent of the New Testament, would certainly qualify.

In 1883 a newly discovered copy in Greek of a very ancient Christian manual self-described as the ‘Teaching [didachē] of The Twelve Apostles to the Nations’ was published. Scholars assigned it to the late first or early second century, though in the century since a somewhat later date is preferred by many. It is a window on practices of Christians in the sub-apostolic period. This document clearly presupposes the distinction made here between the special apostles and prophets, authorized by Christ ‘himself’ (autos, Eph. 4:10, 11), and the presence among the churches of a lesser grade of spokesman for the gospel and biblical teaching. The lead sentence clearly designates ‘the twelve apostles to the nations,’ while sections 11–13 instruct how to test claims of itinerant ‘apostles and prophets,’ what credibility to assign them, and how to entertain them. The best brief assessment of the Didachē I have found is by Robert M. Grant.¹⁰ New translations and editions are available.

We may be sure that the Lord supplied the ‘gifts’ of founders as needed and ceased to do so when no longer needed. In the special sense that the Twelve and Paul were ‘apostles’ they were never replaced. The ‘gift’ was not withdrawn but because man is mortal they died and were not replaced. They wrote the New Testament Scriptures and launched the good ship ekklēsia. The same is true of New Testament founding prophets. Papal claims for perpetuation of apostolic powers, of Muslim and Mormons for ‘latter day’ reappearance of such powers, are unsupportable either in Scripture or in history.

Evangelists (Gr. Euangelistēs). It is difficult to know for certain exactly what is meant by an euangelistēs. He is obviously one who publishes the good news of Christ’s salvation; but in what capacity? Neither Scripture nor history furnishes a clear answer. In one New Testament passage, God is an evangelist who ‘preached the gospel beforehand to Abraham’ (Gal. 3:8 rsv). So also did angels at Christ’s birth (Luke 2:10), likewise Apostles; and so ought every Christian. Yet only three times does the apparently technical designation of the gift of evangelist to the whole church appear in the New Testament: (1) ‘Philip the evangelist’ (Acts 21:8); (2) Paul instructing Timothy to ‘do the work of an evangelist’ (2 Tim. 4:5); and (3) in our text, Ephesians 4:11. We know that Philip could preach and baptize (Acts 8) but was subject to Peter as Timothy likewise was subject to Paul. All the twelve Apostles were missionaries, of course.

In my judgment those scholars are correct who assert that in this passage the Apostle ‘desires to mention all the principal offices, whereby Christ had provided for the spiritual edification of the church universal ... (1) the evangelists were inferior to the apostles ... (2) they were travelling missionaries, preaching the Gospel to those unacquainted with it, yet sometimes with a settled place of abode, as Philip [Acts 21:8] at Caesarea, and Timothy at Ephesus. Thus they were officers acting for the whole Christian community, not for a single church.... (3) They were charismatically endowed.’¹¹ Massie calls attention to the charisma (special gift of the Lord) conferred on Timothy (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). Evangelists are not mentioned in the second century Didache or in any of the apostolic Fathers, which supports the opinion that in the sense intended here, they like Apostles and prophets, belonged to the founding era only. Later writers (Eusebius, fourth-century church historian) called the early missionaries ‘evangelists.’ Chrysostom omitted evangelists in comments on Ephesians 4:11. Eusebius called itinerant missionary preachers ‘evangelists’ and that custom prevails today. The Apostle Paul frequently called himself (and other itinerant missionary-proclaimers) a preacher (kēruux, 1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11), the gospel a preached message (kērygma, 1 Cor. 1:21; 2 Tim. 4:17), and what they did was to preach or proclaim as a herald (kērusso), used about sixty times in the New Testament, often of missionary proclamation. Romans 10:8–15 demonstrates that for Paul the ‘foreign missionary,’ sent from some ‘home base,’ was a kēruux, preacher, not an ‘euangelistes’ (evangelist).

Pastors and Teachers. In Greek, the words pastor (or shepherd), flock and feed are related, as in English pastor and pasture are related. J. Jeremias notes:

Only once in the New Testament are congregational leaders called shepherds, namely, in the list of officers in Ephesians 4:11. The absence of the article before didaskalous [teachers] which follows (tous de poimenas kai didaskalous) shows that the pastors and teachers form a single group, obviously because they both minister to the individual congregation.¹²

The congregation as a flock and leaders as shepherds is superbly treated by Jeremias.¹³ See Jeremias’ summary of the New Testament use of the work of leading the local church.

Paul’s Epistles never again use the word ‘pastor’ (poimen) but he exhorted the presbyters (elders) of the ekklēsia at Ephesus (Acts 20:28 kjv) to care for ‘the flock’.

In the Greek language the words for flock, feed a flock of sheep and shepherd are variations of the same root word. So though the New Testament never again calls the leaders of a church pastors (shepherds) it becomes clear that Paul attached the shepherding function to the local elders (presbuteroi) or overseers, bishops (episkopoi). In Acts 20:17 he called the presbyters of the ekklēsia of Ephesus to meet him at Miletus. There he declared these presbyters had been positioned as overseers of the flock and that it was their duty to feed (poimainō) the ekklēsia (20:27, 28 kjv). It seems clear therefore, pastor, presbyter and overseer are only one office. If, as suggested above, éangelistēs (evangelist), like apostle and prophet, was a temporary gift, the pastor-elder-overseer is the only ‘gift’ still in operation. This is not to say that we do not still have those who evangelize. (See also 1 Peter 5:2.)

In a later chapter on church offices and government this matter will be discussed further.

5. How the Gifts Function in the Church

The pertinent verse—Ephesians 4:12—is composed of three prepositional phrases, as follows: ‘for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ’ (kjv). In rsv and kjv, which are similar, in each phrase the preposition is ‘for,’ and each is preceded by a semi-colon or a comma. In such case the gifts function to do three things: ‘for the equipment of the saints, for the work of ministry, for building up the body of Christ’; and each is apparently a different effect of the functioning of the gifts, presently only the pastor-teacher. But this is not the best understanding of Ephesians 4:12.

The Greek text varies the prepositions, viz.: ‘pros (with accusative meaning, to or toward) the equipment of the saints’; ‘eis (unto, often indicating purpose, or goal) the work of ministry.’ In such case there should be no comma after ‘saints’ and now read ‘toward the equipment of the saints unto the work of ministry.’ The third phrase like the second begins with eis. So in one continuous progress from beginning to end we have a single purpose or telos, goal-directed construction (with or without a comma after ‘ministry’): ‘toward the equipment of the saints unto the work of ministry, unto the building up of the body of Christ.’ In this manner all the gifts were given by Christ (including pastors of churches) to equip ‘the saints’ to do the work of ministry, thereby to build up (‘edify’ kjv) the body of Christ. Meyer’s Commentary was one of the first of modern times to propose this understanding. It has become the prevailing scholarly consensus.¹⁴

Markus Barth discusses this problem at great length and concludes that ‘a decision on the two interpretations cannot be made by quibbling about such trifles as the changes of prepositions or the appropriateness of a comma. Rather the whole context and all parallels of [Eph.] 4:12 provide at least four reasons’ for the telic meaning (one purpose, not three). I summarize his ‘four reasons.’

1. The ‘grace’ given to saints (4:7) elsewhere in the New Testament (Eph. 3:2, 7; Rom. 1:5; 1 Cor. 15:10; Phil. 2:12, 13) ‘does not terminate and die in the recipient but makes him an active servant’ ... ‘Katartismos (“equipment”), denotes preparation for a job.’¹⁵

2. Throughout the passage (Eph. 4:7–16) all saints, ‘not only apostles, prophets, evangelists and teaching shepherds are called recipients of grace from on high ... interest is focused upon the mutual contact of all members.’

3. He argues (with less cogency, I think) that though Ephesians 4 has the universal church in mind, close parallels in 1 Corinthians 12, which relates to the local congregation, show ‘the common good’ must be present in Ephesians 4.

4. He seems here to say that a democratic structure of the church requires a telic interpretation.¹⁶

His third and fourth arguments I think are indecisive and he does not need them. In reaction against the hierarchical and mixed free and state church systems of Europe he seems to argue from assumptions of democracy in church and state rather than specifically scriptural truth.

6. The Ultimate Goals of the Gifts

These verses—Ephesians 4:13–14—conduct the reader to another of Paul’s high literary-doctrinal climaxes. The prepositions eis, five times, and mechri, leading off at the beginning, are forward-, goal-, destiny-related words; hina, the strongest term in the language for purpose, points to the goals for the gifts Christ gave the universal church, concretely desirable, even if not present in every local assembly. The goal in time is the parousia, the ‘appearing’ of Christ at His Second Advent. This Advent might not be such an obviously leading idea in Ephesians as in the Thessalonian Epistles, yet these verses point to that ‘one far off’ yet impending ‘event toward which the whole creation moves.’ In ‘until we all attain’ (rsv), the author chose a verb (katantaō) which signifies movement, usually toward a predetermined goal, ‘downhill’ with increasing momentum, arriving at a destination (Acts 16:1; 18:19, etc., eight times), ‘upon whom the ends of the world have come’ (1 Cor. 10:11 kjv; cf. Phil. 3:11). ‘[W]e all’—all Christians—are swept up, consciously or not, in this movement toward this ‘blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior, Jesus Christ.’ Meanwhile along the way we partially attain to the goal, we ‘follow after’ (Phil. 3:12–14 kjv). Moral excellency in mutual relations in unity of the one body was the ideal besought in introducing the subject of gifts of leaders to the church (4:1–6). Now in the denouement the goal is to be attained when we meet a ‘Man,’ ‘the Son of God,’ ‘the perfect man,’ ‘the Messiah’ (tou Christou) (Eph. 4:13).

For present purposes it is important and sufficient to summarize the goals as follows.

1. First, unity—‘until we all come to meet the unifying faith and knowledge of the Son of God’ (Eph. 4:13 M. Barth trans. in Anchor Bible).

In comment on John 17:21 (‘that they may all be one’) and here on Ephesians 4:13, ‘all attain to the unity of the faith,’ Calvin clearly sees the cosmic dimension both of alienation and of unity of mankind.

The ruin of the human race is, that having been alienated from God, is also broken and scattered in itself [he might have cited the tower of Babel confusion]. The restoration of it, therefore, on the contrary, consists in its being properly united in one body, as Paul declares the perfection of the church to consist in believers being joined together in one spirit, and says that apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastors were given that they might edify and restore the body of Christ, till it came to the unity of faith; and therefore he exhorts believers to to grow into Christ, who is the head, from whom the whole body [is] joined together ... to edification (Calvin’s emphasis throughout) (Eph. 4:3, 11–16).¹⁷

Calvin acknowledged the unity has been attained only imperfectly and why so, and commenting on ‘in the unity of the faith’ (Eph. 4:13) he explains:

The unity does reign, I acknowledge, among the sons of God, but not so perfectly as to make [even] them come together. Such is the weakness of our nature, that it is enough if every day brings some nearer to others. [That we shall] never really reach until this garment of flesh, which is always accompanied by some remains of ignorance and weakness shall have been laid aside.¹⁸

If there was an ‘ecumenist’ among the Reformers it was Calvin.¹⁹ Yet already in 1548, when the above was published, failure of his efforts at reconciliation of Lutherans and Reformed had convinced him it would not take place short of heaven.

2. Second, maturity—‘unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ’ (4:13 asv).

This ideal of maturity which the author states here as a goal he demands elsewhere. Paul’s Greek is quite ‘politically incorrect’: ‘Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong’ (1 Cor. 16:13 kjv). ‘[Q]uit you like men’ translates a single Greek word, andrizo, meaning simply to behave as an adult male should—with normally expected courage. ‘[B]e strong’ also is proper to adult male mankind (Liddell & Scott, Lexicon). The opposite is holigopseucheō, to be faint of heart. The ancients thought that an adult male should have control of his emotions, to be brave in face of threats, not given to hysteria (a Greek word for suffering in the womb, a female organ). This outlook is not absent from Scripture (Isa. 3:4, 12 compares civil rule by women to rule by children). When a woman of outstanding courage saw her seven brave sons brutally executed ‘she bore it bravely ... her woman’s thought fired by a manly spirit.’²⁰ The celebrated heroes of the inter-testamental centuries (Heb. 11:33 ff.) behaved like real men even though perhaps a majority of them may have been women, as likewise did the Christian martyrs of every age. The standard of such maturity, says Marcus Barth, is ‘the Perfect Man, the perfection of the Messiah, who is the standard of manhood.’ Barth adds: ‘The term anēr used here to denote the perfect “man” does not mean “mankind” (as Greek anthrōpos and Hebrew Adam often do) but “adult man” in contradistinction to woman and child.’²¹

3. Third, stability, ‘that we may no longer be children, tossed to and fro by the waves and carried about by every wind of doctrine, by human cunning, by craftiness in deceitful schemes’ (Eph. 4:14). Later in his career as Apostle Paul wrote to insure sound doctrine in the instruction of pastors (2 Tim. 2:2) and demanded of his pastoral assistant, ‘Keep a close watch on yourself and on the teaching’ (1 Tim. 4:16), ‘Until I come, devote yourself to the public reading of Scripture, to exhortation, to teaching [didaskalia]’ (1 Tim. 4:13). The only gift of God to the church in Ephesians 4:11 of which it can be said with certainty it is present today is the one called ‘pastors and teachers.’ We are of divine intention bound to acknowledge these gifts of God, our pastors and teachers as critical if not indispensable to stable lives of Christians and stable churches. This matter comes in for more extensive treatment in chapters 18 and 19 on ‘Church Offices and Ministry.’

Church history is inseparable from the history of doctrines—their definition, disputes about them, heresies and orthodoxy. Imperfectly expressed as it may be in our time, there is in truth a consensual core of orthodox Christian doctrine, as Thomas Oden has competently contended in the ‘Epilogue’ to his Systematic Theology.²² The people of the churches through the centuries have had a share in passing on ‘the teaching’ (1 Tim. 4:16), but especially before the printing of Bibles, and general literacy shortly thereafter, the doctrinal views of people of the churches have been dependent on the work of the ‘pastors and teachers’—God’s gifts for the ‘building up’ of the church.

4. Fourth, growth (Eph. 4:15, 16). The flight of rhetoric in this climactic of peroration about Christ’s gifts to the church exceeds any possibility of adequate exposition. Paul defines the mission of the church as to produce inward and outward growth: ‘but maintaining the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things; which is the head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly framed together and compacted by every joint of its supply, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the building thereof, in love.’²³

Paul made an art of mixing figures effectively in clarifying an idea. ‘This recurrence to the companion metaphor of building reminds us that the reality which St. Paul is endeavoring to illustrate is more than a physiological structure. The language derived from the body’s growth needs to be supplemented by the language derived from the building of the sacred shrine of God. The mingling of the metaphors helps us to rise above them.’²⁴

In verse 12 (kjv) he speaks of ‘the edifying of the body of Christ’ as the purpose of the four gifts. ‘Edify’ (related to edifice, a building) renders oikodomeō, to build a house. But it is a body, Christ’s body, the ekklesia that is to be ‘house built.’ The idea is that the body of Christ should be enlarged. Peter speaks of the church as a ‘spiritual house’ (1 Peter 2:5).

The mixed figure carries over into verse 15 and 16. '[G]row up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ.' This appears to mean simply that the 'unity of the Spirit' (v. 3), which we already have, must grow 'into Christ' with whom we are already united. A parallel with sanctification is suggested. Positional holiness should lead to growth in practical improvement in holy conduct, so the perfect 'unity of the Spirit' in Christ is something to 'keep' and to 'grow into.' If we are 'eager to maintain' (v. 3) and 'speaking the truth in love' (v. 15) we will each 'grow' into Christ—as a novice progressively feels more at home in his job and improves his performance as he conscientiously 'keeps on keeping on.' This is inward spiritual growth of the members of the body and is a primary mission of the church: to nourish her own.

Back in verse 12 the purpose of the gifts of 'pastors and teachers' is to equip the 'saints' for the work of ministering. As the passage proceeds it becomes clear that the ministering is to one another. Pastors who would like to find direct command to evangelism and mission here (I among them) must look elsewhere in Paul's Epistles—as we shall do in the next chapter. Yet any congregation functioning in the harmony and mutual edification described in Ephesians 4:7–16 is a 'city set on a hill' attractive to all around. The evident love of believers one for another in the centuries of Roman persecution did result in the external growth as the body 'builds itself up in love.'

Summary of Exegesis of Ephesians 4:7–16 and Conclusions

This passage of Holy Scripture furnishes the church knowledge of the necessary leadership and authority from her beginning to the second advent. At the time of His ascension Christ gave the church her workmen who would found the church throughout the world, provide authoritative guidance through the New Testament Scriptures which they wrote, and shepherd the flocks scattered through the world.

1. The gifts were not conferred from time to time as churches multiplied. Rather certain saints, qualified and authorized, known to God from all eternity, were conferred on the universal church at her beginning. They were to appear among the churches as the movement spread. It is the duty and privilege of the believers in the church to acknowledge and to respond to these apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. The churches accept and confirm this leadership and authority, but do not confer it.

2. Paul emphasizes that Jesus Himself appointed these agents of His and that they are bearers of His word. They are His agents in the work of equipping of saints for ministry resulting in growth of the body of Christ.

3. Two of the gifts, probably three—apostles, prophets and evangelists—are now a part of history, though their finished work is still with us. Apostles and prophets with the aid of missionary evangelists founded the churches in scattered corners and at the centers of the ancient world, the church universal being present in each assembly. They also gave the church her constitutional document, the New Testament. The pastors and teachers continue the work as they preach the gospel, feed their flocks on the true Word of Christ and take oversight of her corporate life. The pastor-teacher is also called minister, elder (presbyter) and overseer (bishop) in the New Testament.

4. Further, as to the names and functions of the four offices—Apostles had ambassadorial authority from Christ, unique to that group of twelve men, specifically authorized to found the church and provide the scriptures for that continuing household of God (Eph. 2:19–22). Certain prophets, such as Mark and Luke, not only assisted the apostles but received revelation and wrote scripture. Other lesser prophets, in an age before the New Testament was written and collected, exercised their gifts in local churches. Evangelists obviously proclaimed the good news. Like Philip (Acts 8:4–6; 21:8), they were pioneer missionaries. They are not mentioned after the apostolic age, though prophets are.

5. These agents and messengers function then and now to ‘edify’ (kjv) or ‘equip’ (esv) saints ‘for the work of ministry for the building up of the body of Christ’ so that when each part and member is operating properly, the whole body grows, building itself up in love.

6. The ultimate goals of Christ’s gifts of able, authorized leaders are the unity of the church, her maturity, stability and growth.

¹ Hans Conzelmann TDNT, IX, p. 402.

² Hauck and Kasch, TDNT, VII, pp. 332–451. One of the largest entries in nine volumes.

³ G. G. Findlay, Ephesians, Exposition of the Bible, Vol. vi (Hartford, CT: 1907), p. 63.

⁴ Marcus Barth, The Anchor Bible, Ephesians, II (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974), pp. 429, 430.

⁵ R. D. Culver, ‘Apostle and Apostate in the New Testament’ published fully in Bibliotheca Sacra (April–June, 1977, #534), pp. 131–143. Digested in Encyclopedia of the Bible, Vol. I (Baker), pp. 131–133.

⁶ Calvin, Commentary on Galatians and Ephesians (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1854), at Eph. 4:11, p. 278.

⁷ ibid., p. 277.

⁸ Culver, op. cit., pp. 131–143.

⁹ D. E. Aune reports modern scholarship on the subject of prophecy in early church and early centuries. My conclusions seem to be compatible with his findings. D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity & the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983), pp. 194–201.

¹⁰ Robert M. Grant, Twentieth Century Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, Vol. I (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1955), pp. 357, 358.

¹¹ J. Massie, ‘Evangelist,’ Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. I, pp. 795, 796.

¹² J. Jeremias, ‘poimēn,’ TDNT, VI, pp. 302–497.

¹³ ibid., p. 498.

¹⁴ H. A. W. Meyer, Critical & Exegetical Handbook to the Epistle to Ephesians, trans. M. J. Evans (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1884), pp. 454–460.

¹⁵ Markus Barth, op. cit., p. 480.

¹⁶ ibid., pp. 480–484.

¹⁷ Calvin, Vol. II, p. 183.

¹⁸ Calvin, Epistle to the Ephesians, p. 283.

¹⁹ See ‘Serving for Unity and the Ensuing Debate,’ chap. 7, The Writings of John Calvin, Wulfert de Greef, trans. Lyle D. Bierma (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993).

²⁰ 2 Macc. 7:20, 21 Revised English Bible with Apocrypha.

²¹ op. cit., p. 441.

²² Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 3 vols., 1994), vol. iii, pp. 473–502.

²³ Trans. of J. A. Robinson, St. Paul’s Epistle to the Ephesians, 1939, pp. 131, 132.

²⁴ J. Armitage Robinson, St. Paul’s Epistles to the Ephesians (London: Macmillan, 1939), pp. 144, 145.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (889). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

13

The Mission of the Church in the World

Students in theological seminary usually are required to take a course in mission(s), entitled something like ‘Philosophy of Christian Missions,’ ‘Theology of Missions’ or ‘Missiology.’ For many years of the twentieth century the usual textbook was The Progress of World Wide Missions by R. H. Glover, an historical survey, not a biblical or theological survey. More recently books such as G. W. Peter’s A Biblical Theology of Missions (1972) and J. H. Kane’s Christian Missions in Biblical Perspective (1976) have sought to bring the whole Bible to bear on the subject of world evangelism, greatly to the gain of the readers. A whole literature, academic departments and specialized schools have sprung up making ‘missiology’ a field of study as adjunct to the practice of evangelism at home and abroad.¹

In this chapter we shall limit our thought to (1) how the churches in the New Testament record came to understand their duty to evangelize the world; (2) how they and the church of the first three centuries carried out this duty; (3) the grounding of this mandate for ‘making disciples’ among all nations; (4) Paul’s understanding of the logical mandate for sending preachers of the Word (Rom. 10:13–17); (5) Paul’s understanding of the Old Testament mandate both for going and sending (Rom. 15:8–12); (6) principles for disciples in the mission of world evangelism (Matt. 13); and (7) practice for disciples in the mission of world evangelism.

1. How the Church in the New Testament Record Came to Understand Their Duty to Evangelize the World

Neither the twelve Apostles nor any disciples became missionaries either to Jews outside the neighborhood of Jerusalem or to the heathen world for several years after Jesus’ Ascension. Jesus had said early in His ministry that He was sent ‘only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Matt. 15:24). Paul called Jesus Himself ‘a servant to the circumcised’ (Rom. 15:8). In their first preaching mission Jesus commanded the Twelve, ‘Go nowhere among the Gentiles and enter no town of the Samaritans’ (Matt. 10:5).

Nothing Jesus said later seems to have modified the disciples’ acceptance of that limitation for their own lives and ministry. They defined their growing church in relation to Judaism. To outsiders they looked like a sect of Judaism (Acts 2–7). We today are puzzled at the reluctance of the group at Jerusalem to move out into the world to preach the good news and to establish new congregations. It seems to us that given the resurrection, the Ascension and Pentecost there should have been an immediate push outward. But Luke’s narrative in Acts is careful to show that something quite different happened.

Several years passed before the first expansion took place. Philip’s evangelistic foray into Samaria (Acts 8) was to ‘half Jews’ among whom Jesus once lodged (John 4), and the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8) was probably a proselyte Jew.

Several changes in the disciples themselves had to take place before missionary evangelism of the world could begin.

The first involved immense reversal of deeply held opinions. They had to become aware that the Lord’s redemptive work had been intended for the entire human race. It is obvious that they and their leader (Peter) interpreted Jesus’ sayings about being a ‘ransom for many’ (Matt. 20:28) and the ‘whoever believes in him may have eternal life’ (as in John 3) as promises to Jews and those who would become Jews (proselytes) first. In Acts 10 and 11 Luke carefully explains how that change began. Acts 15 and Galatians show how slowly full realization that Judaism was defunct took place.

The second change related to the church at Jerusalem, which was composed mainly of very provincial and parochially minded people—the Apostles not excepted—who needed a vast increase of intellectual perception of the meaning of revelation in Jesus’ words and a full understanding of His work of redemption. Jesus had said it would be so² and human psychic processes being what they are it could not happen in a moment.

The third change was that the disciples had to lose both their social dependence on one another and similar attachment for the familiar scenes of the Savior's short sojourn among them, and the fourth was that they were in acute need of inward power and inspiration to get them up and move them out. The meaning of the events of Pentecost were not then as clear to them as they are now to us.

These changes may have begun feebly as they reflected on Jesus' last words to them (Luke 24:45–47; Acts 1:8) about being His witnesses 'to the end of the earth.' Yet even after Pentecost Peter still thought their preaching was to be only to 'the people,' ho laos, the Jewish people.³

Acts 10 and 11 carefully narrates how the Lord miraculously explained the end of an old covenant and the beginning of a new one first to Peter and then through him to the reluctant leaders of the Jerusalem church.

Concurrently, or nearly so, the Lord Himself revealed to an obscure Jewish Christian, named Ananias, in Damascus that the name of Christ was now to be borne before Gentiles and that a presently dazed young Jewish aristocrat named Saul was to be the leading instrument in Gentile evangelism (Acts 9:15). Meanwhile other disciples became active evangelists in Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch of Syria, but at first only to Jews and then Greeks (Acts 11:19, 20). Not many months later Paul and Barnabas set off on the first formally commissioned campaign of Christian missionary evangelism (Acts 13:1 ff.).

It is important to recognize that Paul never refers to any command of Jesus to evangelize Gentiles. He drew his mandate from a different source. He never had been a part of the Jerusalem community of believers. Matthew, Mark and Luke may not have been written during his lifetime, hence it is entirely possible he never was informed of Jesus' so-called Great Commission sayings spoken during His post-resurrection ministry, however we interpret them.

Why then did Paul feel constrained to devote his life to evangelize the Gentile world? He clearly was not aware of any commission that commands, 'Go and preach the gospel in unevangelized places; if you cannot go send someone else.' The disciples at Jerusalem clearly did not interpret Jesus' sayings reported in Matthew 28:19, 20 and Acts 1:8 that way. Even those first scattered by persecution evangelized no Gentiles.

It is clear Paul recognized only two sources of his missionary mandate. The first part was a special revelation from God delivered by Ananias at Damascus (Acts 9:10–19): 'he is a chosen instrument of mine to carry my name before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel' (v. 15). Perhaps Paul received special direct revelations on the matter (Gal. 1:11–22). The second part he derived from the written Scriptures at the time, the Old Testament, as he and Barnabas explained to a large audience at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:14, 44–47), quoting Isaiah 49:6, 'For so the Lord has commanded us, saying, "I have made you a light for the Gentiles, that you may bring salvation to the ends of the earth." ' (Acts 13:47). Later he would enlarge that scriptural mandate (Rom. 15:3–9) and also argue from common-sense reason that missionary evangelists must be sent (Rom. 10:14–17). We shall look at these very important passages regarding the mission of the church to the Gentile world later in this chapter.

2. How the Church of the First Centuries Carried Out Their Mission of World Evangelism

Though, as we have seen, the first Christians were not quite aware that a new epoch in world-wide redemption and of universal offer of salvation had begun, once the true state of affairs struck home a zeal took over that had no precedent and has never been surpassed. The first three centuries lived up to Roland Allen's trenchant characterization of events as 'The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church.' Though not without specific missionary organization and propaganda, the church did not sponsor a missionary society; it was a missionary society. There was no limit on their ambitions, goals and zeal. Less than thirty years after the Ascension and only a little more than a decade into his formal mission in the eastern Mediterranean lands, Paul wrote to Rome in the west, 'from Jerusalem and all the way around to Illyricum [Albania] I have fulfilled the ministry of the gospel of Christ' (Rom. 15:19, 20).

Justin Martyr (ad 110–165) wrote:

There is no people, Greek or barbarian or any other race by whatsoever appellation or manner they may be distinguished, however ignorant of art or agriculture, whether they dwell in tents or wander about in covered wagons, among whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered, in the name of the crucified Jesus, to the Father and creator of all things.⁴

Tertullian (ad 160–240), North African preacher, churchman, and theologian, wrote many times of the spread of 'God's school,' reporting that the Christians were more numerous than the emperor's soldiers and if all were to resort to arms could defeat his armies! And, Tertullian claimed, this missionary success had occurred in a short time. Christians, he claimed, were 'a race that covers the whole world! We are but of yesterday, and we have filled ... cities, islands, forts, towns, exchanges, yes! and the [army] camps, tribes ... palace, senate, forum [Paul had converts in "Caesar's household"]'. All we have left to you is the [pagan] temples [which of course no Christian would enter].'⁵

Eusebius of Caesarea (ad 266–340), first great church historian, in one of his best paragraphs, traces this zeal and technique—that led to the Christianization of the Empire—back to the work of the Apostles.

Disciples of such men [the Apostles] built up churches where foundations had been previously laid in every place by the apostles. They augmented the means of promulgating the gospel more, spread the seeds of salvation far and wide.... Afterward leaving their country, they performed the office of evangelists to those who had not yet heard ... they also delivered to them ... the holy gospels.⁶

Eusebius goes on to say that these missionaries who immediately followed the Apostle-evangelists appointed pastors and arranged for the nurture of new believers.

3. The Grounding of the Mandate for Making Disciples of All Nations by Being Disciples in a Greater Commission

The only imperative in the Greek text of Matthew 28:19, 20 is 'make disciples' (mathēteusate, mistranslated 'teach' in kjv). 'Go ye therefore' (kjv) in the Greek text is poreuthentes oun, better rendered 'as ye go' or literally 'having gone' (not preferred by the learned). The passage assumes what had already actually taken place (see quotations of Paul, Justin Martyr, Tertullian and Eusebius in preceding paragraphs). Christians were scattered throughout the known world and there, both by life and death, both by discreet silence and winsome words, they made disciples, not neglecting to baptize and teach in the process.

As I seek to demonstrate elsewhere,⁷ the so-called ‘Great Commission’ of Matthew 28:19, 20 sets forth a program of disciples making disciples by being disciples. Neither going nor sending, but being disciple-makers wherever we are is the evangelistic program for each Christian. Every evidence from antiquity shows that it was the witness of the Christians to holiness, purity of life, love for one another (as seen in chap. 11) and for their neighbors which gave the church of the early centuries victory over satanic forces and brought Christianity to victory.

4. The Pauline Mandate for Special Sending of Missionary Evangelists

Paul’s mandate is in part based on common-sense argument. The logic of his argument is so transparently correct that it scarcely needs comment except to approve it as correct. No translation improves on the accurate, starkly literal kjv. The great Apostle of the Gentiles had been expounding on divine sovereignty in election (Rom. 9). Now in Romans 10 he is emphasizing ‘the word of faith that we proclaim’ (v. 8), and there follows the familiar words about confessing with the mouth, believing in the heart to salvation (Rom 10:9, 10). Then follows:

For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved [quoting Joel 2:32]. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? [Paul called himself a kerux, preacher not an evangelist.] And how shall they preach, except they be sent? (Rom. 10:13–15).

It is rare for Paul to use a purely logical (or common sense) argument to enjoin a practical Christian duty, but he does it here. If salvation comes by faith and faith is produced only by hearing the gospel then it is the duty of Christians to send preachers to proclaim the gospel to those who have never heard.

‘If the Gentiles could not believe in the Lord without hearing of him, unless he was declared to them, then it follows from the prophecy above quoted [Joel 2:32], that preachers must be sent to them. ... This quotation was ... calculated to produce the strongest conviction ... of the duty of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles.’⁸ There is no plainer statement of the mandate for mission in all of literature, biblical or otherwise. Some must go with the gospel to the people who have not heard it yet and others must send them.⁹

How did Paul lead into this argument? By showing his Jewish readers that their theological father, Moses, had taught that righteousness comes only by faith (vv. 5–9), then that the prophet Joel (2:32) had taught the same (Rom. 10:13).

How did he further defend the logical argument? By showing that the Old Testament, all three parts of it—Law, Prophets, Writings—teach salvation only by faith, a faith in response to hearing the Word of God (Rom. 10:16–21).

These five verses present the contrasting responses of hearers of the good news. There is another

Jew versus Gentile contrast: glad faith on the part of many Gentiles as opposed to increasingly sullen rejection by Jews. These verses also show how Paul unfailingly relied on the Old Testament to support Christian doctrines.¹⁰ F. Godet's comment is applicable:

Paul has done what we do or should do in every sermon: 1st. Disentangle from the temporary application, which is the strict sense of the text, the fundamental and universal principle which it contains; 2nd. Apply fully this general principle to the circumstances in which we are ourselves speaking.¹¹

5. The Mandate for Some to Go and Others to Send

The mandate is based squarely on Old Testament teachings. This is the form of argument Paul employed in persuading the believers at Rome to help send a missionary, in this case Paul himself, on his way to evangelize heathen Spain (Rom. 15:8–13).

First Paul disposed of the problem imposed by the fact Jesus Himself ministered directly only to Jews. With a bold stroke he simply declared that Jesus limited His ministry to Jews because truly the promise of salvation was first promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. 'For I say that Christ has become a servant to the circumcision on behalf of the truth of God to confirm the promises given to the fathers [Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, etc.]' (Rom 15:8 nasb).

The force of Romans 15:8 is to say there was an historic reason why Jesus' personal ministry was solely to Jews, and that it furnished no precedent.¹²

Then he proceeded again (as in Rom. 10) to quote from all three parts of the Hebrew Tanach—Torah (Law), Neviim (Prophets) and Kethuvim (Writings)—to show that the Old Testament Scriptures predicted a time when all the peoples of the world, both Jew and Gentile, would rejoice in Messianic salvation. Verse 9 quotes Psalm 18:49; verse 10, Deuteronomy 32:43; verse 11, Psalm 117:1; and verse 12, Isaiah 11:10.

He makes three points. The first (v. 8) is that although the presentation of Christ to Israel was the fulfillment of many promises—beginning at Genesis 12:1–3—extension of the benefit to Gentiles was a matter of sheer mercy: 'and in order that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. As it is written, "Therefore I will praise you among the Gentiles"' (Rom. 15:9, citing Ps. 18:49).

This does not quite fully explain why Providence withheld a saving gospel from the heathen world until the beginning of the Christian mission (see Acts 17:23–31). It does affirm that God had a merciful purpose in the delay. We are not allowed to suppose ourselves more wise or compassionate than God.

The second point is that it had been God's intention right along to receive praise from the majority section (Gentiles) of the race rather than from a small tribe (Israel). This is the thrust of each of the quoted texts. 'And again it is said, "Rejoice, O Gentiles, with his people [Rom. 15:10 quoting Deut. 32:43]." And again, "Praise the Lord, all you Gentiles, and let all the peoples extol him [Rom. 15:11 quoting Ps. 117:1]." ' The nations (Gentiles, heathen) are going to rejoice with Israel, God's people (v. 10). All the peoples (v. 11) shall praise God. Peoples, Gentiles, tribes, families must rejoice with Israel in praise of the one true God. This is why pioneer missionaries become linguists and have led in reducing hundreds of dialects to writing in order to produce Bibles in the languages of ‘the peoples.’ Jesus had this truth in mind when He predicted, ‘this gospel of the kingdom will be proclaimed throughout the whole world as a testimony to all nations [Gentiles, heathen], and then the end will come’ (Matt. 24:14).

The third point is that ‘the Gentiles’ shall have hope in Christ. ‘And again Isaiah says, “The root of Jesse will come, even he who arises to rule the Gentiles; in him will the Gentiles hope” ’ (Rom. 15:12 quoting Isa. 11:10). This hope arrived when ‘the Root of Jesse ... arises to rule the Gentiles’ (v. 12). They who formerly were ‘strangers to the covenant of promise, having no hope and without God’ (Eph. 2:12) have been ‘brought near by the blood of Christ’ (Eph. 2:13) and must be informed by preachers sent for that very purpose.

Thus Paul concludes his statements of the mandate for a Christian, world-wide mission of evangelism.

6. Principles for the Church’s Mission of World Evangelism

Jesus Himself expounded these principles in a lengthy discourse of eight parables (Matt. 13 and Mark 4:21–29) shortly before He sent the Twelve out on their first mission of preaching (Matt. 10).¹³ Two long chapters of the Bible predict the course of this age in the language of symbolism. Each begins with the time the spokesman lived and each ends with the consummation of the present age. The former, Daniel 2, predicts the course of dominant national succession under the figure of a statue with a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of bronze, legs of iron and feet of iron mixed with clay.

The coming judgment and establishment of the eternal reign of Messiah is represented by a stone that smashes the image. Jesus prophetically called this period of time ‘the times of the Gentiles’ (Luke 21:24).

Matthew 13 (with some supplementing from Mark 4 and Luke 8) is the other long chapter predicting the course of this age. In it Jesus refers to ‘the kingdom of heaven’ (Matt. 13:11 and throughout the chapter; in Mark 4; and Luke 8, ‘the kingdom of God’). That kingdom is plainly the sphere in which people would profess to be Christians, acknowledging Him at least with the lips as Lord and Christ. This is a matter of some controversy but, with variation in emphasis, most serious students agree that Jesus was speaking of the response people will make to the preached gospel (the kērygma) and what preachers should do about it after the disciples came to understand the world-wide intent of the gospel and began their world-wide mission.

In the latter part of the middle year of Jesus’ ministry of three years the shape of the future was falling into place. The disciples’ minds needed to be prepared for the disappointments of failed expectations of a visible kingdom restored to Israel (Acts 1:6, 7). Otherwise they would never be ready to be Apostles in the founding of an ekklēsia within a kingdom of grace in the age to follow. Matthew 13 furnishes a lengthy report of how Jesus began that preparation in a series of eight ‘parables of the kingdom’ (one reported only by Mark). Though Jesus provided some interpretation of the parables (vv. 10–23, 36–43)—enough that the disciples thought they understood them all (v. 51)

—yet it is certain these parables were among the words of Jesus the promised Spirit would call to their ‘remembrance’ and ‘show the meaning’ only in later years (John 14:26; 16:12–14).

Extended treatment of these eight parables will be found in many works of exposition and commentary. A summary of my own treatment in A Greater Commission now follows. Jesus spoke, in order:

1. Of four kinds of soil for the seed of the Word of God (Matt. 13:3–9, 18–23) showing how people will respond to the gospel in different ways, only a minority with hearty, enduring faith.

2. Of a man who sowed seed in a field and patiently waited for harvest, not interfering with growth (Mark 4:26–29; not in Luke or Matt. 13). It explains the utter dependence of the human messenger upon the inner working of the Word and Spirit to produce conversion of the evangelized. In the words of 1 Corinthians 3:7, ‘So neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but only God who gives the growth.’

3. Of a field sowed with wheat in which tares (a noxious weed that looks like wheat) were sown (Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43). The devil sows his own seed along with the good seed in the same field. The field is not the church but the world, where the tares must be left undisturbed by violence until the Judgment Day and when God’s own angels will make separation.

4. Of a very small seed, the mustard seed, and its phenomenal growth (Matt. 13:31, 32). There will be a surprising world-wide extension of the professing church with mixed results of good and bad.

5. Of leaven in a bowl of meal (Matt. 13:33). The gospel works quietly, unseen and with spectacular results. The mustard seed and the leaven teach us: do not despise the day of small things (Zech. 4:10).

The next two parables speak of two different ways in which people come to awareness of God’s truth in the gospel and acceptance of the message. Jesus spoke:

6. Of a hidden treasure (Matt. 13:44). Some people are overtaken by the truth—it comes with a flash—and are so overcome by it they are willing to give all for it.

7. Of a pearl of great price (Matt. 13:45, 46). Other people seem to find Christ and the meaning of His Word after painful searching.

8. Of a drag-type of fishnet that gathered both good and bad fish, which had to be sorted (Matt. 13:47–50). There will be many hypocrites among those who profess to believe the gospel preached by the messengers. They will stay in this sphere of Christian profession until the judgment at the end of this age; the bad fish (hypocrites) will be sorted out and severely judged.

There is a singular note of finality about Jesus’ discourse: ‘When Jesus had finished these parables, he went away from there’ (Matt. 13:53). Then He picked up his baggage and left the scene. He had said all the disciples were then prepared to hear about the progress of the kingdom in the world. These were the principles which should guide missionary evangelism, both revealed and concealed in eight vigorous parables. The church has ignored them to her defeat in aborted attempts at evangelism and violated them to her defeat in countless efforts at ‘church growth.’ Whatever else we think we learn about that subject it ought to be rigorously adjusted to our Lord’s own philosophy of mission, if we may use such an expression.

7. Practice in the Mission of World Evangelism

Earlier in this chapter we have paid attention to the missionary setting of Matthew’s Gospel, citing Irenaeus (ad 180, Against Heresies 3.1.1). In ancient oriental fashion Matthew states his missionary theme at (or near) the end of his book (28:19, 20)—like Ecclesiastes 12:13, 14 and John 20:30.

From the very beginning Matthew marshaled his materials toward the announcement of the mission of world evangelism. Believers are, so to speak, to take the gospel along and by it making disciples as they go out among ‘all nations.’ This they did, beginning with the persecutions after the martyrdom of Stephen (Acts 8:1). Several times Matthew quotes Jesus regarding the value of ‘souls.’ He reports the angel’s saying that Jesus ‘shall save his people from their sins’ (1:21). At least a dozen times apart from chapters 10 and 13 the ‘soul-winning,’ missionary theme is introduced, directly or subtly. On the very first day of public ministry after the temptation, Jesus’ invitation was, ‘Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men’ (4:19). A reading of the following partial listing shows that Matthew sustained the missionary theme throughout—5:29, 30; 8:11; 9:35–38; chapter 10; 11:25–30; 12:46–50; chapter 13; 18:9–14; 19:28–30; 21:42, 43; 24:13–14; 25:31–46; 26:13; 28:16–20.

Matthew 9:35–38 has no parallel in the other Gospels:

And Jesus went throughout all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues and proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom and healing every disease and every affliction. When he saw the crowds, he had compassion for them, because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd. Then he said to his disciples, ‘The harvest is plentiful, but the labourers are few; therefore pray earnestly to the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers into his harvest.’

These verses, mirroring Jesus’ tender concern to minister to the multitudes and to preach the good news to them, are a preface to the unique following chapter on the future of the Christian mission of evangelism. He speaks of the vast harvest field, ripe for harvest. We cannot doubt that all the mission fields of all the age then to follow, in which we all must live as responsible missionary disciples, were in the scope of His vision.¹⁴

Matthew 10, after introducing (by pairs) the names of the twelve Apostles (vv. 1–4), falls into three parts: (1) verses 5–15, practice by the Twelve in the mission from which they would return in a few weeks (compare Mark 6:30 and Luke 9:10); (2) verses 16–23, relates primarily to practice in the mission while it was still mainly Jewish and in the environs of Jerusalem; (3) verses 24–42 relate primarily to practice in the mission of world evangelism to the end of the age in which we live.

Older modern writers (e.g. Alford, Edersheim, Ellicott) agree with this structure of the chapter and bring evidence to support it. More recently W. Hendriksen stated, ‘A single reading of the charge shows that from verse 16 to the end the One who addresses the Twelve is predicting the future. He is describing what is going to happen when the church brings Christ's message to those lost in sin.'¹⁵ These authors call attention to how Jesus divided the sections with the emphatic 'Truly, I say to you' in verses 15 and 23.

What can we learn about true laborers in the harvest of souls from verses 1–4 about the twelve chosen first messengers? Briefly, there are four things. First, twelve is a very significant symbolic number, the usual numerical emblem for Israel of the Old Testament people of God. There were twelve sons of Jacob and twelve 'tribes of Israel,' twelve representative stones on the 'breastplate' of Aaron's 'ephod,' and much else (see Lev. 24:5; Num. 1:44; 7:3, 84; Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:30; James 1:1; Rev. 12:1). Twelve also is an emblem of the New Testament people of God. So it is not surprising to see the name of 'the twelve apostles of the Lamb' written on the twelve foundations of the coming city (Rev. 21:14) as well as the names of the twelve tribes of Israel on the twelve gates (Rev. 21:12, 13). It may be that when saints of both dispensations are represented together it is by twice twelve, the twenty-four elders of Revelation 4:4, 10, 11 and 5:8–10.

The fact that two pairs of the Twelve were brothers, they and others were fishermen, some were cousins of Jesus, two were friends, and all except one (Judas) lived in the same neighborhood (Galilee) shows that familial and community relationships foster Christian association in leadership.

The close association of the Twelve as disciples for several years in apprenticeship, testing and training as well as indoctrination shows the importance of some preparation for leadership. When the time came to serve they were no novices (cf. 1 Tim. 5:22).

The fact that Jesus chose twelve obscure, very ordinary common people suggests the significance of insignificance. No special mental cast, intellectual attainments, no splendid prizes of university scholarships or worldly advantage is necessary to be one of the fishers of men. They were all 'out of the loop' of the elite; all are unlettered men, like Jesus Himself.

I. The First Mission: Application Then and Now (Matt. 10:5–15)

The field for this first mission was restricted 'to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (v. 6). In addition to what might be called 'dispensational' reasons, there was the problem of the parochial and nationalistic (anti-Roman) state of the disciples' minds. These twelve Jewish Apostles-to-be were not ready for any ministry to despised 'sinners of the Gentiles.' Jesus sometimes spoke of 'other sheep' of a different fold (John 10:16) but the Apostles were not ready to understand that, much less accept it.

Several matters of strategy and message follow.

First, begin your missionary evangelism among those you are best fitted by personal history to communicate with—'Go nowhere among the Gentiles.'

Second, begin your witness where you are, near at hand. Any one who aspires to be a missionary to unknown people in a strange culture should be proven able among his own people in a culture he understands.

Third, the principle of grace—‘freely ye have received, freely give’ (v. 8 kjv). ‘[F]reely’ translates dorean, meaning as a gift, no charge. This is how the Spirit offers salvation (Rev. 22:17 kjv) and how justification of sinful people must take place (Rom. 3:24)—a revolutionary, utterly strange idea wherever the good news is preached, which requires the very most careful explanation and emphasis.

Fourth, to preach the kingdom demand (v. 7) of repentance and faith is essentially the demand the gospel makes in every age, including ours (Rom. 10:9, 10).

Fifth, the thrust of verses 9 and 10 is simply ‘Go as you are.’ New converts, at least initially, without going anywhere are usually very effective witnesses, according to points 1 and 2 above. Soul-winning effort can begin without any necessary material preparation.

Sixth (vv. 11–13), the gospel will be received for salvation only by prepared hearts. They manifest their preparation by hospitality (in many forms) to the messenger. This preparation is the Holy Spirit’s function, not ours.

Seventh, there will be some painful negative results even of competent faithful proclamation (vv. 14, 15). When overtly rejected by Jews, Paul and Barnabas did indeed shake off the dust of their feet and move on (Acts 13:50, 51). It is important to note, however, that these twelve preachers were addressing an already partially hardened Jewish population to whom ‘much’ had already been ‘given,’ likewise with Paul and Barnabas mentioned above. This is hardly true of every audience and it is worth noting that one of the two missionaries of Acts 13:50, 51 returned to preach again in the same area. The field was not permanently abandoned. They did not ‘dialogue’ with blaspheming Jews any more than Elijah did with the prophets of Baal (1 Kgs. 18:40).

II. Mission Practice After Pentecost but Before the Dispersion of the Apostolic Church at Jerusalem (Matt. 10:16–23)

As noted earlier, ‘Truly, I say’ in verses 15 and 23 sets this section apart from the first and third sections. There are no strict parallels to this passage in the other Gospels. Jesus’ statement that it is ‘the Spirit of your Father speaking through you’ (v. 20) suggests the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit will have occurred when these practices become applicable. Experiences of persecution by governors and kings mentioned here were mainly after ad 70. Good writers on this section propose three considerations which render it applicable to all Christian times. (1) Since the passage is predictive prophecy a feature of many biblical predictions becomes applicable, viz. such prediction usually lays emphasis more on kinds of events than on specific occurrences. The Olivet discourse is predictive of the whole age and there Jesus repeats much of this section—cf. Matthew 10:19–22 with Mark 13:9–13 and Luke 21:12–19. (2) Further, in the Bible, the past and present are often a figure (‘type’) of the future; and, (3) of special importance, Jesus required His Apostles to pass on His commandments as binding on future generations of believers (Matt. 28:20).

I devote a long chapter in A Greater Commission to this passage’s instructions on missionary evangelism for today. The emphases of the passage are as follows.

a. The sender of every true evangelist is Christ Himself (v. 16a). The sense of the Greek text is,

‘Beloved, I, myself, send you forth.’

b. The enemies of the witness will be wicked men ‘as sheep in the midst of wolves’ (v. 16b; cf. 17 ‘Beware of men’). The Lord’s enemies were also compared to animals—bulls, dogs, lions and similar (Ps. 22).

c. The evangelist’s approach will be nonviolent and wise: ‘be wise as serpents and innocent as doves’ (v. 16c).

d. The evangelists can expect both religious leaders and public government officials to oppose them, even to persecute them (vv. 17–18); they will go before councils and synagogues, governors and kings, for ‘a testimony’ both to Jews and Gentiles.

e. The chief resources of messengers of Christ under attack are all spiritual (vv. 19–20). Their defense is only God Himself.

f. The most crushing blows against the messengers will come from those unconverted among their own extended family groups (vv. 21, 22). Jesus Himself was opposed at first by His own brothers (John 7:1–6), and the congregation of His home town were the very first to attempt to assassinate Him (Luke 4:29). Jeremiah narrowly escaped a plot against his life mounted by his own village and family (Jer. 11:18–21). Ezekiel aroused only tolerance and amusement among his own (Ezek. 33:30, 31). Though family and kinship can be of great help to the messenger if they are converted, they may, if the messenger is the only believer, be his most dangerous enemies.

g. Sometimes the proper response to life-threatening persecution is flight: ‘When they persecute you in one town, flee to the next’ (v. 23a). Paul and his associates in missionary evangelism followed this plain advice frequently (Acts 13:14–14:21; Acts 16:12–18:18; Acts 19). So Jesus’ words were both instruction and prediction of what actually happens over and over.

Jesus’s puzzling comment, ‘you will not finish going through the cities of Israel until the Son of Man comes’ (v. 23 nasb), is interpreted variously. It may properly be regarded as Christ’s very first prediction to His Apostles that His coming as Prophet, Healer, Teacher and crucified Redeemer was to be followed by another coming in power and unveiled glory. He had hinted at such a thing earlier (Matt. 7:21–23). The very language of Jesus’ sentence seems to be shaped by Daniel 7:13, 14, which speaks of a coming in power and glory. Some propose that the whole section relates to the great tribulation after the rapture of the church. Many more propose that the coming of the Son of Man took place providentially, not personally, when Caesar’s armies came to Jerusalem and destroyed it. The evidence for the latter is impressive. (See Matt. 22:1–8, especially v. 7.) That the Roman ‘coming’ was an immediate fulfillment, a foreshadowing of ultimate fulfillment at the Second Advent, appeals to many.¹⁶ One can hardly avoid thinking of this passage’s fulfillment in Paul’s life as persecuted missionary (‘but the Lord stood by me’). The Lord comes again and again to stand by His own in the crises of life.¹⁷

III. The Age-long Mission: the Disciples’ Relation to Christ (Matt. 10:24–33)

There is a shift from Apostles to disciples suggesting a time after the Apostles’ decease.

a. Conflicts on the mission (vv. 24, 25). In a threefold relation to Christ the Christian missionary will serve and suffer. As (1) disciples of a Master, apprentices, they cannot be relieved of experiencing what He did, nor as (2) servants of a Lord. As (3) members of the household of Christ the House-Master they share His experiences.

b. Duties on the mission (vv. 26, 27). It is a shallow exegesis to refer to ‘covered’ as to sins and ‘revealed’ as to the judgment. In context Jesus is saying simply that what the disciples heard Him say in the privacy of their years of uninterrupted communion with Him and instruction by Him is to be preached as publicly as possible. It is their duty even if threatened by death. They should ‘Beware of men’ but ‘have no fear of them’ (v. 26; cf. 17). ‘[P]roclaim on the housetops’ (v. 27) means, give the gospel the widest possible distribution, as preachers from then till now, and as translators, printers and colporteurs from Ulfilas to Kenneth Pike, have understood.

c. The section continues with encouragements in mission (vv. 28–31) and warnings on mission (vv. 32, 33).

IV. The Age-long Mission: the Disciples’ Relation to Others in the Mission (10:34–42)

This long discourse of Jesus relates more specifically than any comparable section to the right practice of missionary evangelism by the church. Lamentably it has not figured largely in the literature of missiology.

Christians within the Roman Empire succeeded in evangelizing it in less than three centuries. This was not because they were organized to ‘go, and to send,’ but because they as Christians simply behaved as Christians as set forth in the Scriptures discussed in this chapter and followed examples of apostolic activity.

Slavic and Germanic Europe was still largely unreached by the gospel when the emperor convened the first Ecumenical Council at Nicea (ad 325). England did not embrace Christianity until ad 627 and the last of the Baltic regions late in the fourteenth century.

How Europe became the major part of ‘Christendom’ must remain an untold story here. Once civil government undertook to expand Christendom—the realm where people rest on Sunday and go to church as a matter of obedience to civil law—many atrocities against truly biblical-Christian evangelism took place. A fair history of what happened, as far as it can be determined, together with an evaluation, is in The Barbarian Conversion: From Paganism to Christianity by Richard Fletcher,¹⁸ a professor at the University of York in England.¹⁹

¹ I have referred frequently in this book to my own modest contribution to that development in several papers read at academic gatherings, articles and sermons and A Greater Commission: A Theology of Missions (Chicago: Moody, 1984), revised and reissued as A Greater Commission: The Broad Range of Scriptural Mandate for World Evangelism (Clayton, CA: Witness, Inc., 1996) also available from the author. I shall refer to it several times in this chapter.

² John 16:12–14; 14:25, 26; 15:26, 27.

³ See also the following: J. I. Packer, The Christian's Guide to the Bible (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1972), pp. 116–117.

³ See article on ‘Laos’ by Strathmann in TDNT, IV, pp. 29–31; H. R. Boer, Pentecost and Missions (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961), p. 39; Culver, A Greater Commission, chap. xv.

⁴ As quoted by Robert Hall Glover, The Progress of World-Wide Missions, rev. and enlarged by J. Herbert Kane (New York: Harper & Row, 1960), p. 21.

⁵ Tertullian, Apology 37.3–4, ANF, III, p. 44. See also 1.7 ANF III, pp. 23, 24.

⁶ Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3.37, trans. Isaac Boyle (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1850, 1969), p. 123.

⁷ Culver, ‘What is the church’s Commission?’, Bulletin of Evangelical Theological Society (#10, Spring 1967) and Bibliotheca Sacra, July 1968; A Greater Commission, pp. 149–154.

⁸ Robert Haldane, Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (first published in London, 1839, then Edinburgh through numerous printings and by Moody Press of Chicago repr. up to 1970). My copy is a New York printing of 1847, p. 524.

⁹ Culver, A Greater Commission, pp. 119–122.

¹⁰ See Culver, A Greater Commission, p. 120–122. The reader should compare v. 15 with Isaiah 52:7 and Nehemiah 8:15; verse 16 with Isaiah 53:1; verse 18 with Psalm 19:4; verse 19 with Deuteronomy 32:21; verse 20 with Isaiah 65:1 and 42:6, 7; verse 21 with Isaiah 65:2. The connections may seem obscure to us but not to Paul’s Jewish readers, who had heard the Hebrew Bible and its Targums read at synagogue and in the home and were acquainted with Jewish lore.

¹¹ F. Godet, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, trans. T. W. Chambers (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1956) p. 582.

¹² I discuss that matter at length in my two books, A Greater Commission, pp. 123, 124 and The Life of Christ, pp. 103–105.

¹³ The actual chronology supplied by Mark 3:13–19; 4:1–34; and 6:7–13 as well as Luke 6:12–16; 8:4–18; and 9:1–6 shows that chronologically Matthew 13 falls before Matthew 10.

¹⁴ Culver, A Greater Commission. pp. 3, 4.

¹⁵ Wm. Hendriksen, Matthew: The New Testament Commentary Series (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1973), p. 446.

¹⁶ Alford, New Testament for English Readers, p. 71.

¹⁷ Culver, A Greater Commission, pp. 27–29.

¹⁸ Richard Fletcher, The Barbarian Conversion: From Paganism to Christianity (New York: Henry Holt & Co., 1998), 562 pages.

¹⁹ This chapter organizes and summarizes my volume, A Greater Commission: The Broad Range of the Scriptural Mandate for World Evangelism, 176 pages, available from the author. Formerly published as A Greater Commission: A Theology for World Missions (Moody Press, 1984).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (898). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

14

The Present Purposes of God for the Church and Her Destiny

I. The Present Purposes of God for the Church

In his exposition of Revelation 2 and 3, John Stott says:

The New Testament supplies us with much information concerning our Lord's purposes for His church. We may glean from some of His own words as recorded in the Gospels, from description of the primitive church given us in the Acts, and from the epistles to various churches in the rest of the New Testament just what is His plan for the church which is His body.¹

Though Stott does not put it just this way, the purposes might be summed up as sanctification of believers in love, suffering, truth, holiness, reality, opportunity and wholeheartedness—as revealed in the messages of Christ to the seven churches (Rev. 2, 3). The church is designed to be the vehicle in which they are developed and expressed.

Calvin put it another way: '[W]e need outward helps to beget and increase faith within us, and advance it to its goal, God has added ... aids.... And in order that the preaching of the gospel might flourish, he deposited this treasure in the church.'² He goes on to explain that he is speaking of the church in the world. It is invisible in the sense that the church of true believers is spiritual, 'a church beyond our ken. For here we are not bidden to distinguish between reprobate and elect—that is for God alone, not for us to do' (Institutes IV. 1.3). The church is also often invisible to the wicked in times of persecution, able to survive only in a hidden state: 'God miraculously keeps his church as in hiding places'—he cites the 'seven thousand in Israel' of 1 Kings 19:18. It is, of course, visible in the extent that believers are visible and known publicly, even if tares and wheat are not fully distinguishable. The 'possessing church' lies within the 'professing church.'

This church is always today. It is catholic. Its members are in every 'denomination' or no denomination. Yet they do constitute on earth a 'communion of saints,' the 'body of Christ on earth,' all being 'united in Christ' and 'dependent on one head.' This church in which we 'believe' is joined to the deceased saints now in heaven. This 'fact' therefore 'belongs to the realm of faith' but should be real to us by faith no less than if it were clearly visible. The presence of hypocrites in the church should be of concern but not dismay us.³ (We shall discuss church discipline a bit later.)

This understanding of the church in which God's purposes must be realized was shared by most early Protestants:

Wherever we see the Word of God purely preached and heard and the sacraments administered according to Christ's institution, there, it is not to be doubted, a church of God exists. For his promise cannot fail: 'Wherever two or three are gathered in my name, there I am in the midst of them.'⁴

The views of Luther and early Lutherans were not essentially different. Rouse and Neill demonstrate this.⁵ Article VII of the Augsburg Confession (German trans. of 1540) affirms: 'But the church is the assembly of all believers, in which the Gospel is purely preached and the Sacraments administered according to the Gospel.'⁶ For Calvin, discipline of open sin in the church was very important, though apparently he thought it was for the well-being of the church not an invariable mark of the church. Many early Anabaptists thought it was of the esse (Wendel, Calvin, Harper ed. of 1963, pp. 296–301). The 1560 Presbyterian First Scots Confession (art. XVIII) adds as a third mark of a church, 'Ecclesiastical discipline uprightly ministered as Goddis Worde prescribes, whereby vice is repressed and vertew nourished,'⁷ as does also the Reformed Belgic Confession (1561).⁸

This is the church for which Paul gave rules for appointment of bishops and deacons (1 Tim. 3:1–13) and told Timothy 'how thou oughtest to behave thyself' in 'the church [on earth as well as heaven] of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth' (1 Tim. 3:15 kjv) and which 'is our mother' (Gal. 4:26).

Let me emphasize that it is this continuing earthly body of saints (though their commonwealth is in heaven) for whom God has purposes and a destiny—we who preach sermons, teach Sunday School, listen, socialize, witness, rear our families, go to work and to school are the topic under consideration. At this point theology becomes hope and duty, practice and expectation. Every purpose of God for the church calls for some specific personal response from each believer and from every local congregation.

1. The First Divine Purpose Is Service

That is, the church is the paramount instrument through which our Lord accomplishes His designed work in the present world. This is a comprehensive category which includes all the rest.⁹

Christ Himself gave to the church the Apostles, prophets, evangelists of the past and the 'pastors and teachers' of today 'to equip the saints for the work of ministry' (Eph. 4:11, 12). Chrysostom's comments on the meaning and lessons of the church as 'the fulness of Him that filleth all in all' occupy about seven columns of tight print,¹⁰ relating it to 'riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints.'

In a way no expositor or exegete, from Jerome¹¹ and Chrysostom to the latest in the present flood of commentaries, has ever quite fully expounded, God the Father has a plan 'to unite all things in him [Christ], things in heaven and things on earth' (Eph. 1:10) and that plan has 'put all things under his [Christ's] feet and gave him as head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all' (Eph. 1:22, 23). J.A. Robinson captures the sense well:

In some mysterious sense the church is that without which the Christ is not complete, but with which He is or will be complete.... Even now in the imperfect stage ... the church is that through which Christ lives on and works on here below on earth.... His feet and hands no longer move and work in our midst.... But St. Paul affirms that He is not without feet and hands on earth: the church is His Body. Through the church, which St. Paul refuses to think of as something separate from Him, He still lives and moves among men ... as the church grows toward completion, the Christ grows toward completion ... if we may use the language of our own great poet [Tennyson]—[the Christ] ‘that is to be.’¹²

Let us note some specific practical ways in which the church in union with Christ does His work on earth today. I think the first of the two most important is that it is in the church, per se, where most sinners who are saved, come to be aware of their sins and receive forgiveness of their sins. So it was on the Day of Pentecost at the close of Peter’s sermon and likewise for most of us—remembering of course that the church sends missionaries and evangelists and that Christian fathers and mothers are associated with and strengthened in their local churches. The second most important way is that it is in the church, in its integral ministries of teaching, preaching, administering ordinances, providing the support of a praying fellowship, that sanctification of believers takes place. Jesus prayed, ‘Sanctify them in the truth; your word is truth.’ The church has preserved, printed, distributed, explained the Word. Jesus gave Himself for us that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word. Our spots and wrinkles (Eph. 5:27) are removed that Jesus may present ‘himself a glorious church.’ His church’s ministries are precisely engineered for that purpose.

Also, thirdly, it is only in the church as a public organism, that the consistent provision of apostolic doctrine, the special fellowship, the worship and the prayers essential for normal Christian life occur (Acts 2:41–47). Here the gifts of the Spirit act together for mutual betterment (1 Cor. 12:12 ff.) and in this union with Christ and believers we experience both the power to bear fruit and the pruning discipline if we do not (John 15:1 ff.).

Children of Lutheran parents are taught that God ‘calls, gathers, enlightens, and sanctifies the whole Christian church on earth, and keeps it ... in which Christian church He daily and richly forgives all sins to me and all believers.’¹³ A. H. Strong taught generations of Baptist preachers, ‘The church, like the family and the state is an institution of divine appointment ... its necessity is grounded in the social and religious nature of man.’¹⁴ He points out the community and ‘communion’ of the first congregation in Acts was not for the community of mankind in general, but only for the church, and approves the statement that it is ‘the duty of all good men to become identified with the visible church.’¹⁵

The Westminster Confession is outstandingly clear, ‘Unto this catholic visible church, Christ hath given the ministry [pastors and teachers], oracles [the Bible], and ordinances of God [baptism, the Lord’s supper], for the gathering and perfecting of the saints, in this life, to the end of the world: and doth by his own presence and Spirit, according to his promise make them effectual thereunto.’¹⁶

Perhaps the most thoroughly orthodox pronouncements of the World Council of Churches came from the Evanston 1954 Assembly. On the point of present topic at the close of a good discussion of the mission of the church is this summary: ‘All this means that the function of the church is, in the last analysis, to be both the instrument of God's purpose in history and also the first realization of the life of His kingdom on earth.'¹⁷

On the same point, but with his usual colorful flair, the late Lesslie Newbigin says of the local church in one of his last books that it is a 'hermeneutic of the gospel'; if 'true to its calling, it becomes the place where men and women and children find that the gospel gives them the framework of understanding, the "lenses" through which they are able to understand and cope with the world.'¹⁸ Such a 'community,' he says, will be one of 'praise, reverence, thanksgiving, involvement in neighborhood, priesthood in the world, a social order of mutual concern and of hope.'¹⁹

Thomas Oden, whose research in patristic literature has greatly enriched our recent theological literature, quotes Irenaeus (Against Heresies 8.24.1): 'Where the Spirit of God is, there is the church and every kind of grace,'²⁰ and comments himself, 'To elect to live without the grace offered in the church is like a neonate refusing nourishment from the mother's breast.'²¹ One might add, with Calvin, that the church in this sense is chief external support of our faith and 'mother of us all.' Calvin insisted on the indispensability of the church on earth as God's instrument for Christian sanctification. In developing this thought he quotes both Cyprian and Augustine and says that 'our weakness does not allow of our being withdrawn from school until we have been pupils [in the church] for the whole course of our lives.'²² Luther wrote similarly in his Large Catechism explanation of the third article of the creed.

Charles Colson, responding to the personal moral failure of the president of a conservative college which disclaims religious connection, concluded a short article²³ with the sentence: 'Without the help of the living Christ even the most powerful among us is potentially nothing more than the next moral embarrassment waiting to happen.' A former student advisee of mine, now for thirty-five years a pastor, published a reply propounding the proposition that 'no man can be good without a vital connection to that functioning biblical community called "a church."' ²⁴

2. A Second Divine Purpose Is for Manifestation of Christ's Glory

His moral glory was manifest to all with eyes to see when He was present on earth in the flesh (John 1:1, 14), even though His divine glory was then almost wholly veiled. Now the church is His body on earth—not an incarnation but a spiritual union of people in natural flesh, a spiritual body which manifests His moral excellencies on earth.

The universal church, chiefly visible in local churches, is not an end in itself, but as Strong says, it 'exists for the sake of the kingdom.' Its unity is 'that of the kingdom'—and is 'internal.' It 'is not coming with signs to be observed' (Luke 17:20), but consists in 'righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit' (Rom. 14:17).

Ephesians explicitly asserts that it was the 'counsel' of God's 'will' that those who hope in Christ 'have been destined and appointed to live for the praise of his glory' (Eph. 1:11, 12 rsv). In an earlier chapter we found in John 17 that a manifest spiritual unity is a sign to a lost world that God sent His Son and leads both to knowledge of Him and faith.

Jesus said, ‘As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world’ (John 9:5). Our Lord presently is seen only in heaven. During the long absence the ‘children of God without blemish [!] in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation ... shine as lights in the world, holding fast the word of life’ (Phil. 2:15, 16 rsv).

Jesus bids us shine

With a clear pure light,

Like a little candle

Burning in the night.

In this world of darkness

We must shine,

You in your small corner

And I in mine.²⁵

Paul said, ‘Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death’ (Phil. 1:20 kjv). The Greek megalunthēsetai (pass. fut.) literally means ‘shall be made great.’ The magnifying glass makes great to the eye of the observer whatever it is focused on. This very aptly suggests how Christ is to be made great in the eyes of an unbelieving world—by the lives and deaths of believers. The intense love of the ancient Christians for one another was what attracted the attention of the denizens of the Empire to Jesus, and their steadfast faith in face of death made Christ great in the eyes of millions. This is what brought victory: ‘this is the victory that has overcome the world’ (1 John 5:4); ‘The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.’

3. A Third Divine Purpose Is to Exhibit Both the Wisdom and Grace of God

A third divine purpose is to exhibit to heaven and earth both the wisdom of God in devising a plan to save fallen man and God’s grace. The doctrine is specifically developed in exalted Pauline prose, viz.:

To me, the very least of all saints, this grace was given, to preach to the Gentiles the unfathomable riches of Christ, and to bring to light what is the administration [dispensation, stewardship] of the mystery which for ages has been hidden in God who created all things; so that the manifold polupoikilos, varied beyond measure, [TDNT] wisdom of God might now be made known through the church to the rulers and the authorities in the heavenly places. This was in accordance with the eternal purpose which He carried out in Christ Jesus our Lord (Eph. 3:8–11 nasb, emphasis added).

In former times Gentiles knew a little about God, but only a little. Through Moses and the prophets of Israel God progressively made known much more, but not quite everything. The ‘principalities and powers’ of the heavenly regions knew more than men, but perhaps because of their knowledge had more questions. Proverbs praises the wisdom of God in creation and many other things but does not address the problem of why an omnipotent, omniscient and holy God allowed the entrance of sin into the world in the first place and apparently after the Great Flood had done nothing ‘cosmic’ to prevent a seeming repeated victory everywhere of sin and sinners over righteousness and the people of God. Further, Israel never got a handle on the reason(s) why the Lord out of pure grace had chosen them as His peculiar people. For a while even Jewish members of the nascent church (Acts 1:1–9) seemed unaware that ‘God sent his Son to be the Savior of the world.’ With hindsight we see more of God’s wise purpose in Old Testament times. (See earlier discussions of divine decrees, preservation and providence in the doctrine of God and such passages as Genesis 45:5; 50:19, 20; Psalm 73; Habakkuk; and even the book of Job.)

Nevertheless the Old Testament history was itself a mystery, seeming to end in failure, one which even Mosaic and prophetic revelation did not explain fully. God spoke in those times in bits and pieces (‘many parts,’ Heb. 1:1) and in many ways (‘many manners,’ Heb. 1:1), puzzling even to God-fearing people (Acts 8:30–34). But Christ ‘the wisdom of God’ (1 Cor. 1:24) created the church. Hence ‘now’ God’s wisdom has been made known to holy angels and other supernatural beings through the church.

‘The mystery is defined twice over. First, it consists in the fact that in Christ Jesus through the gospel, the Gentiles are co-heirs and co-incorporated and co-partners in the promise (v. 6); and secondly, it is the unsearchable riches of Christ (v. 8). The latter phrase gathers to a point what is diversely expressed in the former.’²⁶

In the passage ‘the mystery’ which the church makes known is something Paul preached to the Gentiles (Eph. 3:8), the unfathomable riches of Christ, that God invented and prepared by managing history since eternity past (v. 9) yet kept secret during those ages (v. 9). God’s purpose in this management of history was expressly so that the church might make known God’s wisdom by demonstration (v. 10). The church in Ephesians is the church universal, invisible to people in the sense only that ‘the Lord knows those who are his’ but visible to all in its teachings, institutions, assemblies and history.

The fact that in the church all this wisdom is ‘made known’ does not mean the sin-perverted world recognizes any wisdom in it. The world by its own wisdom does not know God (1 Cor. 1:21). The present post-Christian world has rejected both the church and her God as having anything specific to teach it. The Peace Corps, for example, gets far more favorable rating as an agency for world betterment than Christian missionaries; the ‘wisdom’ of the anthropologists berates the changes wrought by missions as harmful. At the present moment the mighty among worldly educators are seeking by any means available to direct the boys and girls away from any specific influence of the church. The state has competence (wisdom) but the church has none.

II. The Destiny of the Church

Simply and comprehensively stated, the destiny of Christ’s church on earth is to be presented to Christ at the time of His return from heaven. He said to the nascent ekklēsia of twelve Apostles, ‘And when I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and will take you to myself’ (John 14:3 rsv). The idea of taking the church, a bride, is only suggested here; it is explicit in the equally tender words of Ephesians 5:25–27:

Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her, that he might sanctify her, having cleansed her by the washing of water with the word, so that he might present the church to himself in splendor, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing, that she might be holy and without blemish.

The presentation of the church by Christ, to Himself, as a pure bride, not only loved by Him and pure but serviceable (if we may allow the word), prepared by useful habits to be a ‘good wife’—this is clearly implied by Jesus in His Parable of the Marriage Feast (Matt. 22:1–14) and Parable of the Ten Virgins (Matt. 25:1–13). The texts say that the virgins went out to meet the bridegroom (v. 1) not the groom and the bride.²⁷

The bride is the church in her collective unity, the contrasted characters (wise and foolish) of the members of the church are represented here by the virgins as [in the Parable of the Marriage Feast, Matt. 22:1–14] by the guests who were invited; and for this reason, probably, the bride herself is not introduced as part of the imagery of the parable [of chap. 22].²⁸

It is impossible to be sure to what extent earthly human customs reported in Jesus’ parables are emblems of heavenly events and truths. But the same language found in Paul’s exhortation (Eph. 5:25–28) and in Jesus’ Parable of the Wedding Feast and the Parable of the Ten Virgins is carried over in the book of Revelation. There is a connection between ‘the marriage supper of the Lamb’ for which ‘his Bride has made herself ready’ (Rev. 19:6–9) and the triumphant return of Christ (Rev. 19:11–21). The ‘supper’ evidently occurs immediately before the Second Advent of Christ though a strict succession of events is not supplied. Later in the book of Revelation the eternal home of the redeemed is described as ‘the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven [to earth] from God, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband’ (Rev. 21:2) while a few verses farther on the Revelator says that an angel invited him to see ‘the Bride’ now the ‘wife of the Lamb’ and again ‘showed me the holy city Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God’ (Rev. 21:9, 10).

Thus the Bible stimulates emotive and imaginative response to expectation of the Christian church as a collective body in which we will participate as individuals. The parables of Matthew 22 and 25 (and several others) enjoin spiritual watchfulness. The ‘postmillennium’ passages (Rev. 21, 22) stimulate joyful expectation, while the Revelation 19 passages remind us that while we as members of ‘the bride’ will be without spot and clean, our ‘outward garments’ will only be as adequate and resplendent as we by ‘righteous deeds’ prepare them here and now (Rev. 19:8 rsv). Our ‘underwear’ will be perfect, Christ’s imputed righteousness, our visible clothing only as good and as much as we industriously prepare before ‘that day.’ The judgment of believers at ‘the judgment seat of God’ (Rom. 14:10) and several other matters relating to the church’s future at the parousia belong to eschatology in systematic theology and will be treated in that connection.

Meanwhile further brief attention should be directed to how the ekklēsia should be advised as to its place in the world as the present eon of the cosmos (aiōn tou kosmou) moves toward the Advent of Christ and how we as members of Christ’s assembly on earth should think and act in view of the Advent.

The church will continue to be formed gradually until the last elect saint has been born spiritually into the kingdom of heaven. (See chap. 13, above, ‘The Mission of the Church in the World.’) Jesus’ last words to the disciples at the moment of His Ascension were not (as often supposed) a command, but a prediction: ‘you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the end of the earth’ (Acts 1:8). Six weeks before He had said, ‘And this gospel of the kingdom will be proclaimed throughout the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come’ (Matt. 24:14). Whatever expectations believers in every age have for the ‘imminent’ end of the age, the end is not scheduled until world evangelism—as God sees it—is complete.²⁹

It is to be a quiet procedure as far as the Lord is concerned. Just as the ancient temple was built of ‘stone prepared at the quarry, so that neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron was heard in the house while it was being built’ (1 Kgs. 6:7), so of all the ‘members’ of the ever enlarging unam sanctum it is said in Scripture, ‘you yourselves like living stones are being built up as a spiritual house’ (1 Peter 2:5). ‘How silently, how silently, the wondrous gift is given; when God imparts to human hearts, the glories of his heaven.’

¹ John Stott, What Christ Thinks of the Church (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1958), p. 9.

² Calvin, Institutes, trans. F. L Battles (Philadelphia: Westminster Press), iv, 1.1.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

³ Calvin’s treatment, Institutes, iv, chap 1 (pp. 1011–41) is unequalled.

⁴ iv., 1.9, first paragraph.

⁵ Rouse and Neill, History of Ecumenical Movement (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1954), pp. 27–35.

⁶ Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, III (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1966), pp. 11, 12.

⁷ ibid., p. 462.

⁸ ibid., p. 4.

⁹ The Roman Catholic Catechism of 1994 makes this point in para. 737 and 760 with citations from Hermas, Aristides, Justin, Tertullin, Epiphanius, Clement of Alexandria.

¹⁰ NPNF, Vol. xiii, pp. 62–64.

- ¹¹ I do not have easy access to Jerome's fine comments in a complete translation. Robertson (see note 11) fills a page (61) with quotation of Origen's excellent treatment, quite in harmony with the view that I have taken of the amazing last phrases of Ephesians 1:22, 23, 'the church, Which is ... fulness of him that filleth all in all.'
- ¹² J. Armitage Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians (London: MacMillan, 1939), pp. 57, 59.
- ¹³ Luther's Small Catechism Sect. I, art. 3.
- ¹⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), p. 892.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 894.
- ¹⁶ Chap. xvii, III.
- ¹⁷ Report of the Advisory Commission on the Main Theme of the Second Assembly of the WCC, 'Christ, the Hope of the World.' This appeared in the book The Christian Hope and Task of the Church, 1954, p. 19. Many of the reports at Evanston in 1954 were framed by orthodox evangelical believers, still a force in the new WCC. I attended several sessions.
- ¹⁸ Leslie Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralistic Society (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989), pp. 222, 227.
- ¹⁹ Developed on pp. 227–233.
- ²⁰ Thomas Oden, Life in the Spirit (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992, 1996), p. 281.
- ²¹ ibid., p. 281.
- ²² Institutes IV. 1.4. See F. Wendel, Calvin, p. 294.
- ²³ Winter 1999–2000.
- ²⁴ Rev. Michael Braun of Montvale, NJ 07645.
- ²⁵ An old children's hymn by Susan Warner.
- TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley
- ²⁶ G. A. Lindsay, Ephesians: Exposition of the Bible [Expositors Bible] (American Edition, 1907), p. 42.
- ²⁷ Some interpret the passage as though it said the virgins are 'the Jewish remnant' who will go out to meet 'the bride' (raptured church) and the groom (Christ) 'at the end of the Tribulation.' Home A.

Kent, Jr, Wycliffe Bible Commentary (Chicago: Moody Press, 1962), p. 974.

²⁸ C. J. Ellicott, Commentary, Vol. vi (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, repr. 1954), p. 152.

²⁹ We have already traced the process by which the Jerusalem church composed only of Jewish Christians came to realize that evangelization of the world, both Jews and Gentiles, is the Christian mission. The final stage in that process of education is the judicial decision of the conference of Acts 15:1–29. What James pronounced as ‘my sentence’ (kjv) or ‘my judgment’ (esv), translates krinō, to announce a judicial decision. This was James in his capacity of presiding officer of the assembled Apostles and elders announcing official consensus. The church knew already that the ends of the world were to be evangelized; now they must acknowledge that every man, woman and child was to be the object of evangelization.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (908). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

15

The Nature of the Local Church

I. The Distinction Between Universal and Local

An earlier chapter of this book established the presence, in the New Testament, of a clear distinction (but not separation) between the church universal and the church local. Most of that chapter, however, related to the basis in Scripture for a doctrine of the universal church and extended discussion of how the idea is entertained in the Roman Church and in churches of the Reformation as well as recent times.

Let us recall that out of the about 115 times the word ekklēsia appears in the New Testament at least ninety refer to the local church (or churches) and a few more to meetings of the local ekklēsia. Emphasis on the local ekklēsia is furthered by the fact that authors of several Epistles addressed a single local church or a geographical group of local churches¹ rather than the church at large directly or individuals indirectly. There is therefore no lack of biblical information regarding the local church, even though no passage expressly defines it.

A very small but significant minority of nineteenth-century Baptist leaders and their followers denied the present existence of the universal church (as we noted in chap. 5 above, p. 831). They thought the only church in the New Testament is the local church, usually explaining apparent universal references such as ‘Christ loved the church’ and similar’ (Eph. 5:29) as generic use of the word, as when say ‘the farmer tills the soil,’ where both farmer and soil are generic, not any particular tiller of the soil or piece of ground. In the twentieth century, H. E. Dana, an important Baptist scholar, competently if not successfully, wrote a book asserting that the idea of a universal church is foreign to the New Testament.²

More recently, R. V. Clearwaters, a Baptist pastor and seminary head, wrote that ‘the universal church’ has no present existence on earth or in heaven. It will come into existence when those believers yet to be born and others now dead receive glorified bodies and are assembled by Christ. The universal church ‘is a prospective church.’³

II. Definitions of the Local Church

It is more difficult than it seems at first glance to define what is meant by the generic term ‘the local church’ or a specific ‘local church.’ No one who has interest in the topic will deny that such exist; the problem is of including enough in the definition to distinguish a local church from some other religious society while not including elements which exclude genuine local churches. Thomas Oden, a Methodist, for example, defines ‘a local or individual church’ as ‘a company of those who are united in any given place in faith in Christ for worship, proclamation and worship.’⁴ The definition is true as far as it goes, but it would eliminate migratory people, who do not remain in one place, and it appears to say that a group of Christians on vacation at let us say Estes Park, Colorado for a day or a week might constitute themselves a ‘local or individual church.’

Richard Watson, the first and perhaps greatest systematizer of Methodist doctrines, would add visible and permanent and prefers society to company and adds to his definition ‘bound to observe certain rites and to obey certain rules,’ concluding, ‘the existence of government in it is necessarily supposed.’⁵ Earlier on the page Watson affirms, ‘The church of Christ ... consists of all who have been baptized in the name of Christ, and who thereby make a visible profession of faith in his Divine mission, and in all the doctrines taught by him and his apostles.’ Thus we have in the contemporary Methodist Oden, a minimal definition, and in the early Methodist Watson, a maximal definition. (All italic type is the present author’s emphasis.)

III. Denominational Distinctives in the Definition of the Local Church

Baptist A. H. Strong’s definition in more crisp language agrees with Watson’s but qualifies the definition with ‘according to Christ’s laws,’ under which he specifies what mode of baptism (immersion) and the form of government (congregational). Where either of the latter is missing, claims Strong, a Baptist should only out of courtesy call the society (say Episcopal) a church.⁶ Not all Baptist authorities agree.

Lutheran F. Pieper’s definition adds the Lutheran interpretation of the sacraments of baptism (not the form) and the real presence of Christ’s body and blood in the ‘sacrament of the altar’ and says non-Lutheran congregations are churches, to be sure, but ‘heterodox churches.’ He specifies ‘the Roman Catholic church, the Eastern Catholic church and the Reformed church with its many subdivisions’ as heterodox churches.⁷

The Westminster Larger Catechism of the Presbyterian Church adds its own distinctive. Reflecting this Catechism, The Book of Church Order of the Presbyterian Church in America (P.C.A.) says that ‘the visible church ... consists of all those who make profession of their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, together with their children’ and further, ‘It is according to Scriptural example that the church is divided into many individual churches.’ The Presbyterian Church in America acknowledges that ‘all of these [denominations] which maintain the Word and Sacraments in their fundamental integrity are to be recognized as true branches of the church of Jesus Christ.’⁸ Presbyterians have their own way of organizing each local congregation but they do not make these matters of the essence of a local church.

Another view, held by a small minority but prevalent and persistent through the centuries, is summarized by the titles of books on the subject of the church issued in the twentieth century: The Pilgrim Church,⁹ The Churches of God,¹⁰ The Believers’ Church.¹¹ A. F. Kuen (I Will Build My Church) does not embody the idea in the title, but quotes Tertullian’s definition as his own, ‘Where there are two or three people, even laymen, there is a church.’¹² The immense literature by modern advocates of the pilgrim church view is cited in these books. Students of church history will recognize the ‘restorationist impulse’ in nineteenth and twentieth-century forms.

The basic idea common to these restorationists is that Jesus provided a formal pattern for the local church in Matthew 18:20: that wherever there are two or three Christians gathered for worship a local expression of the church universal exists. Many would add that in every such local group all the gifts of the Spirit necessary to teach and lead the congregation are present. Broadbent is typical: ‘A church ... in the New Testament sense of the word, is, from the moment of its beginning, when two or three are gathered in the name of the Lord Jesus [alluding to Matt. 18:20 as definition of a local church], on the same foundation as the oldest established church, having the same Centre, the same principles ... and draws its supplies from the same source.’¹³ The Plymouth Brethren will be recognized in the above, yet many in several denominational circles subscribe in principle (see Broadbent’s and Kuen’s references). Actually I have seen this understanding of the nature of the local church innocently assumed by many among interdenominational groups, composed of members of denominations which reject it—InterVarsity gatherings, city-wide evangelistic ‘crusade’ meetings, seminary convocations, even a reunion of my own extended family at a mountain retreat.

Two hundred years ago, in the wake of the Great Awakening in Britain, John Wesley did not recognize the meetings of believers for prayer, testimony, instruction and mutual edification as proper churches, advising attendance at the local Anglican churches to receive communion, and so on. Many similar examples exist among Christianized immigrant folk in America who came to faith when evangelized in America and formed new assemblies rather than take communion in an atmosphere of what they felt was ‘dead orthodoxy.’ To these folk the definition of a local Christian ekklēsia became—and remains—important. These are some of the folk Ernst Troeltsch called founders of ‘sects’ rather than ‘churches.’ An example is the Evangelical Free Church of America.

Troeltsch did not express any disapproval of sects as opposed to churches. It was for him only a matter of definition. A church (as opposed to a sect) he said, is ‘conservative ... accepts the social order and dominates the masses ... desires to cover the whole of life of humanity.... The sects ... are comparatively small groups ... aspire after personal inward perfection ... and personal fellowship between members of each group.... they work upwards from below.’¹⁴

IV. What Constitutes a Local Church After the New Testament Pattern?

We all know that a church is a group of Christian people, that they meet together regularly for several purposes, that they observe certain rites and rituals (formal or informal), and that they have certain requirements (formal or informal) for membership and to some degree or other have standards of behavior (explicit or implicit). How much of this is the essence and how much simply universal human features of any limited society? In absence of direct statements we are compelled to rely on precedents set in the Acts and Epistles and inferences.

I propose to define a ‘particular’ or ‘individual’ church as a group of mutually acknowledged Christian believers in any place associated permanently together for purposes of doctrinal instruction, mutual vital communion (koinōnia), worship and for prayer. Though other features will be present, these constitute the necessary elements of a normal local church. Let us attend to the details.

1. ‘A group.’ How many are required to form a genuine ekklēsia? Are the ‘two or three’ of Matthew 18:20 sufficient? Probably not. Examination of the context indicates Jesus intended to argue from the lesser to the greater when He said, ‘Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.’ He had just been speaking of the discipline of delinquent members of ‘the church’ (vv. 15–19) and of the authority of the church to proceed against the delinquent in a manner recognized in heaven. In verse 18 Jesus is saying, to paraphrase as an argument—if I am present in the midst of a small meeting of two or three I am no less present in the larger meeting of the local ekklēsia. Long ago John Gill took note that the revered Tertullian thought that two or three might constitute a church, yet Gill firmly rejected the idea, arguing as follows: two or three are sufficient to meet, to pray together and to edify one another, but not to conduct a ‘church’ ‘judicial process’ such as described immediately before. There are an offended party and an offending party. That makes two. Then there are ‘one or two others’ (v. 16) taken into the process. That makes a possible four. Then, notes Dr Gill,

If reconciliation cannot be made, the matter must be brought before the church, which must consist of a greater number than the parties before concerned; and which it should seem cannot be less than six more, and in all ten; which was the number of a [synagogue] with the Jews and a church organically considered or as having proper officers, seems to require more; the church at Ephesus was begun with twelve men or thereabouts, Acts 19:7.¹⁵

As usual, the devout, amazingly learned, Baptist pastor, Dr John Gill (1697–1771) was correct.

It is objected that there were churches in Crete before the groups had officers (elders, Titus 1:5). Yet Paul indicates that until they had elders they were ‘defective’ churches (Titus 1:5). Paul seems to reserve for himself and Titus some authority less than apostolical to bring them up to the standard of being ‘full-fledged’ ekklēsiae. They were incipient churches yet without strength (or was it authority?), independent of outside help, to form themselves into a ‘standard’ church of the New Testament pattern. Hence it seems right to affirm that a meeting of two or three Christians cannot constitute a church and act with Christ’s authority. I have been present when a single female adult believer assumed authority by virtue of the presence of Christ in and with her to cure a relative of the ‘demon’ of a certain kind of psychic difficulty. It didn’t work out and I do not hesitate to affirm the lady had no such authority. She had been deceived by other self-deceived zealots.

2. ‘Mutually acknowledged professed Christian believers.’ A Christian church must be constituted of people who publicly acknowledge that Jesus Christ is Lord and all that implies. A Buddhist must renounce Buddhism and a Muslim, Islam. Syncretism has no home in Christianity. So before admission to a church one must confess that Jesus Christ, and He alone, is Lord and Savior. This he must do to the satisfaction of fellow believers in the ekklēsia. This, of course, is utterly inconsistent with the parish system whereby all the ‘christened’ residents of a specified geographical area constitute a local church. The Reformers struggled with this fact. Luther, much against his wishes, accepted the ‘reality’ of a true church within the parish church and even thought of organizing meetings for it; Calvin’s Geneva expelled from residence all in the parish who would not meet the standards for a public evangelical Christian. Luther’s policy persists in strict Lutheran parishes to the present hour, with slight modification. Among Calvinist churches both the parish (Reformed on the continent; Presbyterian in Great Britain) and gathered church came to exist rather quickly, especially in Britain and America (Congregational and Baptist).

3. ‘Associated permanently together.’ They are a society in the best sense of that word. When one purchases a ticket for a journey on an ocean liner he may find himself associated with frivolous pleasure seekers, immoral revelers and covetous thieves along with zealous evangelists and missionaries as well as quiet retirees and noisy children. But no one on the ship’s roster is committed to any common purpose except a comfortable ride to the destination and then it will all be over. In the church the ties last as long as life. A church is, to use Bonhoeffer’s phrase, ‘Life Together.’ Peter addressed the readers as ‘sojourners of the dispersion’ almost as if they were practitioners of Judaism in a local synagogue (1 Peter 1:1) but ends his letter referring to ‘elders’ of ‘the flock of God’ (1 Peter 5:1, 2 ff.; and to Jesus as chief Pastor, v. 4).

In the ancient world people associated themselves in all sorts of permanent organizations—burial and cemetery associations, traders and skilled workers, banking and finance. More to the point, the Jews in dispersion had formed local associations (synagogues) for carrying on their religion and for mutual encouragement as aliens in a pagan culture. The Jerusalem believers had this example before them and, as Jews, quite unconsciously, we may presume, carried the same sort of associations into their practice of Christianity. Modern scholarship, both Jewish and Christian, has thoroughly researched this matter.¹⁶ This is an ongoing matter among scholars.

There came to be a church at Samaria (Acts 8); after that among Gentiles at Antioch (Acts 13) and elsewhere. In somewhat less than forty years the Jerusalem congregation moved en masse to Pella in Transjordan to escape the impending destruction of their city. They were the same church as they migrated and after they settled in a new location.

4. ‘In any place.’ In New Testament times most people walked where they wished to go. This prevailed among those of limited means until the twentieth century was well advanced. It is three miles from Batavia, Illinois to Geneva, Illinois. In 1894 the Swedish Baptists of Geneva formed a separate congregation and constructed a small house of worship simply because they did not like to walk six miles in order to participate in the ‘assembly’—ekklēsia—at Batavia. So most congregations outside of towns until very recently were quite small. A group may form anywhere to create a Christian ekklēsia. It is evident from a casual reading of the last chapter of Romans that a large city might have numerous more or less permanent assemblies, each with its own elders (= bishops) and deacons (Phil. 1:1).

5. 'For purposes of doctrinal instruction, mutual vital communion, worship and for prayer.' This statement rests on the description of the constant practice of the first, apostolically led, assembly at Jerusalem (Acts 2:41, 42) and the correct assumption that if the Word is sufficient guide for Christian practice then the practices of the apostolic churches, especially the first one at Jerusalem, provide some guidance.

The immediately following verses suggest some additional functions of a normal, healthy congregation. They cared for one another's needs. The way they did it proved not to be practical, for they disposed not only of the financial income of their investments but the principal from which the income was derived and soon became so impoverished that collections were taken among Christians far and wide to aid them. Yet the example of mutual concern speaks loudly still. The succeeding chapters tell of their fervent witness to fellow Jews in the concourse which was the temple. Jews from the local province and of the Diaspora (see Acts 2:5–11) passed through the temple courts daily, so there the Jerusalem Christians gave their witness daily (Acts 2:44, 45).

V. Relation of Local and Universal and of Both to Christ

The Thousands of true local churches on our planet harbor many unconverted people, and are all too frequently tragically alienated from one another. They are nevertheless 'the external and visible form in which the universal church manifests itself on earth. There is no other way for this manifestation to come to pass' (A. J. McClain, unpublished notes). The local church may be distinguished from the universal, but not separated.

The universal church was fully contained in one local church at Jerusalem numerically for a short while. The local made the universal visible insofar as spiritual things are ever visible. The local, which was imperfect in ways soon evident in the behavior of some (Ananias and Sapphira, for example, and there were certainly others) did make the invisible visible in a limited way.

The two are distinguishable in thought and word, yet wherever the local church is there also is the universal. This accounts for Paul's statement at Galatians 1:13 where he said of his persecution of the Jerusalem believers and intended persecution of believers at Damascus, 'I persecuted the church of God.' This occurrence of ekklēsia seems clearly to refer to the universal (not generic) church which had members both in Jerusalem and Damascus (Acts 9:1–2).

These local churches are not swallowed up in the universal. The only 'offices' in the church universal on earth were the Apostles and prophets (probably also evangelists) of the first generation.¹⁷ Since then all the offices are local: bishops (= elders, pastors) and deacons as indicated. Researchers have convinced scholars even of churches which are formed into episcopal districts or dioceses and governed by the diocesan bishop (or other prelate) that this is what the New Testament reflects in every reference to these offices. Roman Catholic dogma does not acknowledge this but many scholars of the Roman Church do. Rome defends both the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the hierarchical structure and the doctrinal jurisdiction of the magisterium, or teaching office of the hierarchy.

The only ‘officers’ of the church universal are the members of the Trinity and they are directly accessible without mediation to each local congregation. The congregations everywhere are ‘the churches of Christ’ (Rom. 16:16) and ‘the churches of God’ (1 Thess. 2:14) and are supervised not by provincial prelates or district superintendents but by the Holy Spirit (Acts 13:1–3). The Antioch church did not consult any prelate at Jerusalem before deciding the unique (to that time) project of formally launching an ‘overseas’ mission project. This does not mean that the churches were not connected, for they were, and even united in many respects, but it does mean that they were independent of one another in governance.

This means that the emphasis of the New Testament on the local church is vital, that is, essential to the very life (Lat. vita) of Christianity. The local church is not merely a branch of a world organization; it is not a man-made affair of little consequence. It is of such value to God and so essential to His work on earth that when a local congregation compromises truth (Rev. 2:14–16) or degenerates into immorality (Rev. 2:20–23) or lapses into indifference (Rev. 3:15–17) God will repudiate the group as a genuine ekklēsia, even though they continue ‘to hold services’ (Rev. 2:5; 3:16).

VI. Membership in the Church

While the New Testament never declares that local church membership is mandatory for every believer in Christ, it assumes so. If, for example, Aquilla and Priscilla were Christians and lived in Ephesus they were members of an ekklēsia there and when they moved back to Rome they had a church in their own house. At the beginning, to become a baptized believer was to be added to the church (Acts 2:38, 41, 47; cf. 5:11; 7:38; 8:1 and 3)—in the context of the first eight chapters of Acts, the church local as well as universal.

The early chapters of Acts make no mention of a weekly meeting of the local ekklēsia: ‘Every day they continued to meet together in the temple courts. They broke bread in their homes and ate together’ is a correct interpretive rendering of the Greek (Acts 2:46 niv). Soon, however, like post-exilic Jews everywhere, they met weekly for worship and other religious exercises, but on the first day of the week (1 Cor. 16:1, 2; Acts 20:7; Rev. 1:10) not on the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath. Jewish Christians may also have attended Sabbath synagogue meetings.¹⁸ That they assembled weekly for worship distinguished Christians from all their neighbors except Jews, for the heathen, then and now, approached their temples singly or by families. That they met on the first day distinguished the ekklēsia from the Jewish synagogue though the Greek words could apply to either gathering. Regular gathering for worship is an essential sine qua non for the church by definition.

Attendance at the weekly meeting (and other meetings), however, did not completely distinguish a believer and member of the local ekklēsia from an unbeliever, for non-believers were sometimes present in their weekly gathering (1 Cor. 14:23, 24), and there were false believers as well. As we all know, today, members in a crowd at a given church on Sunday morning may be outnumbered by regular attendees who are not local members. In the ancient church it was not attendance but submission to public water-baptism in the name of Christ which made a local believer a member of that local congregation. As far as the church was concerned, baptism had to be preceded by repentance and faith (Acts 2:38; 16:30–33; 9:1–19; cf. 22:16). Baptism remains today, in lands outside the range of historic Christendom, frequently the signal for persecution as one who has chosen to move spiritually from natural family to a Christian association.

VII. Did the Churches Have Membership Rolls?

Was membership in a local church informal, simply the number of Christians who in a locality met regularly as an assembly? Or was membership formal with a roll of particular names—preserved orally or written? After development of the geographical parish system everyone born in the parish, of professed Christian parents, was automatically enrolled.

In any case it is clear that the first church (or its leaders) knew who were and were not members. Even during the first days of waiting for the promised visitation of the Spirit (Acts 1:4, 5) the number of local believers was known to be ‘about 120’ (Acts 1:15). There was a ‘list’—whether written down on parchment or not. Justus and Matthias were known to be on the list (Acts 12:23). Years later Luke knew from some permanent source there were added around 3,000 new believers (Acts 2:41) and later ‘the number of the men came to be about five thousand’ (Acts 4:4). In the latter case ‘men’ is andrōn, grown males, in typical Old Testament biblical fashion omitting women and children in a census or numbering of a group of people (e.g. Exod. 12: where ‘men’ renders ragli haggibborim, i.e. male foot soldiers). Luke knew how many and what sex. The instruction to ‘the multitude’ as ‘brethren’ to search out seven men of good reputation to serve the neglected widows (Acts 6:1–3) clearly implies certain knowledge of who ‘belonged’ to the ‘multitude’ and who did not (Acts 6:1–5). Among a non-literate society this would not imply a written list, but these people were literate Jews and a roll is therefore not excluded.

This was a congregation of Jews who from very ancient times were familiar with formal registers of membership—especially membership in the priestly family of Aaron. The first eight chapters of 1 Chronicles consists of family registers necessary to reinstate Levites and Priests in the restored system of worship. In the close of this register of names, the author tells the readers where he got the information for the new register. He says ‘these are written in the Book of the Kings of Israel. And Judah’ (1 Chron. 9:1). Ezra 2:59 says some returning from exile could not establish their membership in Israel even though they had returned. Further, certain who claimed to be of priestly families ‘sought their registration among those enrolled in the genealogies, but they were not found there, and so they were excluded from the priesthood as unclean.’ In view of this it seems likely that a congregation of literate Jews under Jewish leadership would have made an official list of their members.

A clearer indication of a roll with names of members is 1 Timothy 5:9 where regarding indigent widows Paul instructs, ‘Let a widow be enrolled,’ etc. If a catalog of widows was kept then surely also one for all members. ‘Be enrolled’ translates katalegesthō, from katalego, a word which usually means to write in a list or catalog, according to standard lexicons.¹⁹ But the Ephesian congregation to which the instruction first applied was a very large one, mainly Gentile. It is doubtful such people would have relied on anything less than a written list.

We also know that written messages and names of messengers were passed between apostolically founded churches.²⁰ These men had been authenticated as members of local congregations. Paul knew Epaphras was ‘one of you’ (Col. 4:12).²¹ Paul’s way of writing things down partially accounts for the fact we have fourteen of His epistles in the Bible. It is doubtful that names of Pauline church members would not have been kept in a list. The utter flexibility of membership averred by Quakers and several groups of ‘Brethren’ does not seem to fit.

VIII. Duties of Membership

Recent books of theology usually either ignore this topic or devote less than a paragraph to it. The likely reason is that the task of describing and defining is thought to be the task of the pulpit not the theology professor’s chair. It is certainly true that all of theology has direct bearing on conduct. Yet rules for conduct are part of theology in Scripture. The first published textbook of systematic theology was a set of ten duties of membership in the commonwealth of Israel—the Ten Commandments engraved on two tablets of stone. The summaries of doctrine in most Reformation creeds and catechisms include the Decalogue. The first great work of evangelical systematic theology, Calvin’s Institutes,²² devotes many pages to theological explanation and specific exposition of the Ten Commandments. Let us observe that the doctrine of God in the first commandment is followed by three stating duties to God, followed by six stating duties in relation to mankind. These duties are part of doctrine. But Calvin considered the Decalogue under the locus of God, theology proper, not of the church.

Some separation and placement of topics must be made. Members of Adam’s race have certain duties simply as beings created by God, for God and in His image. All human beings are God’s servants. Their chief end is to glorify Him. The fact they are disobedient servants does not cancel the obligations. This is not formally an aspect of ecclesiology as such.

Christians take upon themselves the individual obligation to learn the commands of Christ and to do them (Matt. 28:20). It is a responsibility directly between the believing saint and his Lord (Rom. 10:9, 10). This is a lifelong project, never completed.

Further, each believer is also a member of the whole body of Christ, the church universal and, properly, of a local church. It is only one’s duties as a part of the body of Christ, and of the local ekklēsia in particular, which are of concern to ecclesiology.

The earliest post-New Testament writings, called The Apostolic Fathers (about ad 95–100), were deeply concerned about duties of believers as believers and as members of the ekklēsia. The chief burden of Clement to the Corinthians (ca. ad 95) was proper recognition of elders and rebuke of rebellion against them. The whole Epistle (twenty-eight tight columns in ANF) rebukes envy of leaders, demands repentance, and encourages humility and submission to their presbyters. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians (ca. ad 130), addressed to a church as a church, consists simply of a series of exhortation to virtue and attendance to duties—as deacons, youth, virgins, presbyters and similar. As he is winding down Polycarp makes plain his main concern for conduct of believers in their relations within the church:

Stand fast, therefore, in these things, and follow the example of the Lord, being firm and unchangeable in the faith, loving the brotherhood [1 Peter 2:17], and being attached to one another, joined together in the truth, exhibiting the meekness of the Lord in your intercourse with one another and despising no one. When you can do good, defer it not, because ‘alms delivers from death’ [from the apocryphal Book of Tobit 4:10; 12:9]. Be all of you subject to one another [1 Peter 5:5].²³

In a time of revival this aspect of ecclesiology accompanies renewal of the churches. The eighteenth-century ‘Awakenings’ in Britain and America exemplify this partnership of a theology of duties of churchmen with expansion and revived health of the church. I cite three examples.

Wesley thought of his works as within the realm of the Church of England. He was an highly educated, ordained Anglican clergyman and regarded the Methodist ‘societies’ of the Wesleyan movement raised up throughout Britain as within that church; even though they did, even in his lifetime (in America), evolve into congregations of a separate denomination. Wesley rightly thought that these congregations of regenerate people needed a doctrine of the Christian life to guide development of personal holiness toward perfection and the health of each congregation. Entrance to a ‘society’ did not require any religious rite, for most Britons were christened already with the record already inscribed in a parish roll somewhere. Wesley’s ‘general rules’ for the societies were thirty-three in number. The Ten Commandments, the Sermon on the Mount and the ethics of the Epistles are ‘indexed’ under three heads: (1) ‘By doing no harm by avoiding evil of every kind’; 2) ‘by doing good’; 3) ‘by attending on all the ordinances of God.’²⁴

Contemporary with Wesley and the rise of Methodism was John Gill, perhaps the most-learned Baptist, historical, linguistic and theological scholar who ever lived, also a London pastor, honored by the University of Aberdeen with a doctor’s degree in a time when Baptists were excluded from English universities. Though freshly published in a new printing by Baker Book House (1978), Gill’s Body of Divinity (1,400 pages) is lamentably not widely read in this hasty age. His ecclesiology has a section ‘Of the Duties of Members of a Church to Each Other.’²⁵ Though different in form it is similar to Wesley’s ‘Rules.’ I close this chapter with some of Gill’s best thoughts.

Since a church is united by mutual agreement certain duties necessary for the effectiveness of the agreement and the glory of God follow.

1. The principal duty is ‘to love one another.’ This is (1) the royal command of Christ as King in His church (John 13:34; 15:12, 17); and (2) Christ’s example (John 13:34; 15:12; 1 John 3:16). (3) As a brotherhood they should love one another (1 Peter 2:17; 3:8) as ‘members one of another’ (1 Cor. 12:13–27). (4) Mutual love is evidence of discipleship (John 13:35); and (5) makes being a Christian in a ‘church-state’ ‘pleasant’ and ‘comfortable.’ He cites Psalm 133; Galatians 5:15; 1 Peter 4:8 and 1:22.

2. ‘It is incumbent on church-members’ to ‘keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace’ (Eph. 4:3–6) with regard to affection (Phil. 2:2), opinions (1 Cor. 1:10, 11) and doctrines (Eph. 4:5, 13; Phil. 1:27). He emphasizes zeal for wisdom. We should with one consent and one mind glorify God—Gill cites numerous passages.²⁶

3. ‘It is a duty of church members to sympathize with one another’—there is half a page on this with citation of the example of Job’s three friends who called to comfort him when he was sick, also 1 Corinthians 12:26; 1 Thessalonians 4:14; and Galatians 6:2. Members should sympathize with one another in all conditions and circumstances. For all the rather spare language (Gill never rhapsodizes or even decorates with adjectives), one sees the heart of a loving pastor here.

4. They should share with one another in all their natural needs. It is a proof of genuine love for one another (Rom. 12:13; Gal. 6:10; 1 Cor. 16:1, 2; 1 John 3:17). They should also share in spiritual comfort, praying, teaching and admonishing. The last is necessary and obligatory, however reluctant one may be to correct the conduct of a brother or a sister.

5. They should watch over one another (Heb. 12:15), and bear with one another.

6. They should pray for one another (Eph. 6:12).

7. On the delicate matter of mixing with the world and worldly people Gill puts up a strong argument (as Wesley did also) for separation. Alluding to several Old Testament and New Testament passages he says:

It becomes church-members to separate themselves from the men of the world, and not to touch things which are defiling; they are in a church state, which is a garden enclosed; they are a separated people and should dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations, or the vain people of a carnal world; they ... should not be unequally with men if ... ignorant, lawless, disobedient, dead, profane ... with whom they can have no profitable communion; and indeed from all such in their own societies [Wesley's word also] who walk disorderly they are directed to withdraw themselves.²⁷

Dr Gill goes on to explain this does not mean that 'they are to have no commerce nor correspondence ... in civil things' but not 'to keep up' familiar or intimate relations with them.

If church members are to separate themselves from the men of the world they are to associate themselves closely and regularly with one another as they did in the very first church (Acts 2:42) and were admonished later to do, not to forsake the assembling of themselves together (Heb. 10:25). In their assemblies there must be no respect of persons; they are in honor to prefer one another and 'condescend to men of low estate' (Matt. 20:26, 27; Rom. 12:10, 16). They should be careful to keep the ordinances 'as they were delivered' (an allusion to 1 Cor. 11) and to be examples to one another.

The concerns of this sobering evangelical Protestant theology of the eighteenth century are strikingly similar to the 'theology of the congregation' we found in the apostolic Fathers cited earlier. Though hardly a description of the average Protestant congregation today it remains an ideal—modified by the history of the congregation and their teachers. These ideals prevailed through evangelical Protestant America until radio and television, now the Internet, brought the world into almost all our homes.

One of the greatest historians of the church in America was the late William Warren Sweet, a Methodist scholar of the University of Chicago and Garrett Biblical Institute (Methodist theological seminary in Evanston, Ill.). Over a period of fifteen years (1931–1946) he researched the minutes of business meetings of very early Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists, and published results in four volumes of Documents of Early American Church History and as Religion on the American Frontier. I read several of these volumes when my daughter, Lorraine, brought them home for assignments in church history at Bethel College. Sweet demonstrates by actual quotation of hundreds of pages from those eighteenth and nineteenth-century congregational minutes that the most common topic of business was maintenance of standards of behavior through discipline of members:

not putting others down, but doing exactly what Gill, as reported above, sets forth as duties of church members, including the duty to admonish one another.

Present preoccupation with church growth and pandering (I fear) to tell people what they want to hear, makes this sort of theologizing hardly popular. Perhaps soon God will raise up a popular and forceful exponent of this dreadfully needed theology.

¹ Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians (probably), Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, even the book of Revelation.

² H. E. Dana, The Christian Ecclesia (Nashville: Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, 1956).

³ R. V. Clearwaters, The Local Church in the New Testament (Minneapolis: Central C. B. Press, 1954), pp. 4, 5.

⁴ Thomas Oden, Life in the Spirit (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 282.

⁵ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes, Vol. II, ed. J. McClintock (New York: Nelson and Phillips, 1850), p. 572.

⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, 29th Printing, pp. 890, 891.

⁷ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, III (St Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1953), pp. 422, 423.

⁸ Part I, chap. 2 of Committee for Christian Education of the Presbyterian Church in America (1020 Monticello Ct., Montgomery, Alabama, 1976), pp. 4, 5.

⁹ E. H. Broadbent, The Pilgrim Church (London: Pickering & Inglis, 2nd ed. 1935).

¹⁰ G. H. Lang, The Churches of God, English trans., (London: Paternoster, 1959).

¹¹ D. F. Durnbaugh, The Believers' Church (London: Macmillan, 1970).

¹² A. F. Kuen, I Will Build My Church, trans. from French, Ruby Lindblad (Chicago: Moody Press, 1971), p. 51.

¹³ Broadbent, op. cit., pp. 397, 398.

¹⁴ Ernst Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Churches, trans. O. Wyon, Introduction by Richard Niebuhr (New York: Harper & Row, 1911, 1961), p. 331. See pp. 331–372.

¹⁵ John Gill, Complete Body of Divinity, vol. II (repr. Grand Rapids: Baker Book, 1978), p. 562.

¹⁶ As guide see Commentary on Acts by F. F. Bruce in New International Commentary as well as the Strack-Billerbeck Commentar Zum Neuen Testamentum Vol. II.

¹⁷ A case may be made that churches seem to regard pastors also as ‘officers’ of the church universal.

¹⁸ Philip Schaff, History of the Christian Church Vol. I (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 478.

¹⁹ The word occurs only here in the New Testament.

²⁰ Acts 18:27; Rom. 16:1, 2; 1 Cor. 16:10, 17; 2 Cor. 12:17, 18; Eph. 6:21, 22; Phil. 4:18 et al.

²¹ See Gill, II, p. 617.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

²² Calvin, Institutes II, chap. 8.

ANF The Ante-Nicene Fathers, 10 volumes

²³ Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, Chap. x, ANF I, p. 35.

²⁴ The Commemorative Edition of the Book of Discipline of the United Methodist Church (Nashville, 1984), pp. 68–71.

²⁵ John Gill, op. cit., pp. 568–573.

²⁶ Zech. 3:9; Rom. 15:6; Prov. 17:14; Phil. 2:3; 1 Cor. 11:16; Phil. 2:1, 2; and 2 Cor. 13:11.

²⁷ John Gill, op. cit., p. 572.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (914). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

16

The Form of the Church: Organization and Governance

Most people who attend the meetings of a church unquestioningly accept the organization on the local level about the same way they accepted the organization of the family of which they were a part, first as infants. The theory of government is not apparent. Differences in ‘style’ of worship seem independent of theoretical types of organization. This, of course, suggests that however we think we are organized, some deeper-than-visible principle (superintendency of the Holy Spirit?) may be operating in spite of defective organization rather than because of biblically sound organization, assuming there is a prescribed form.

No statement anywhere in the New Testament provides specific instructions on how the church local should be organized and governed. If there is an ‘apostolic’ pattern it will be discovered in the precedents set by the apostolic missionaries who founded and organized churches and in inferences drawn from apostolic (chiefly by Paul) instructions to their official representatives. In addition, inferences may be drawn from certain incidents such as the conference between the Jerusalem and the Antioch church (Acts 15) and Paul’s address to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20), and incidental expressions such as ‘those who ... are over you’ (1 Thess. 5:12) and ‘them that have the rule over you’ (Heb. 13:17 kjv), and others (see 1 Peter 5:1–5).

At different junctures of history earnest Christians, often persecuted and at risk of life and limb, have interpreted these data differently, as the names (1) ‘Episcopal,’ (2) ‘Congregational,’ (3) ‘Presbyterian’ and (4) ‘Brethren,’ with some qualifying adjective, indicate. Episcopal means government of congregations of a geographical area (diocese) from top down by bishops; Congregational means government of congregations independent of any authority outside the local members; Presbyterian, though recognizing congregational authority, delegates that authority to a plurality of elders who are ‘connected’ to elders of a district or presbytery and the presbytery to a synod and the synod to a General Assembly; Brethren is the commonest name for several groups who are independent, as in Congregationalism, and sometimes governed by elders as Presbyterians, but have (or so intend) no elder or minister who is chief officer as the rector or vicar (Episcopal) or minister, pastor (Presbyterian and Congregational). Baptists are presently the most well-known practitioners of congregational government. There has been a significant number of zealous, evangelical believers who, theoretically at least, reject any local organization except the existence of elders. They reject any organizational connections between congregations altogether.

These facts render it advisable to devote serious prime attention to organization of a local church and its government in apostolic churches.

That the churches of the New Testament had connection with one another and communications is evident from the story of the expansion from Jerusalem to Samaria and Antioch and elsewhere in Acts 8–12. Some sort of cooperation and connection is explicit in the mutuality of all the churches of Pauline establishment as seen in Paul’s Epistles to them—as well as with churches of unknown origin (Romans). The General Epistles (Hebrews; James, 1; 2, 3 John) are addressed to every church in the world. Yet there is not even the glimmer of world-wide (universal) organization or any headquarters of government. Scholars of about every denomination, including many highly placed scholars of denominations who might wish it were otherwise, acknowledge this state of evidence.

I. The Fact of Organization

Though Jesus never provided any ‘organizational chart,’ or even named any officer of the church except Apostles—who were not really local officers or functionaries as such—His words about settling disputes (Matt. 18:15–20) suppose some rudimentary local organization at least. Though no New Testament passage commands organization, evidence of its presence is convincing. A. H. Strong found fourteen kinds of evidence for organization¹ and my seminary professor, who greatly appreciated Strong’s ecclesiology, found two or three more. Organization is implied in the New Testament presence of (1) stated meetings (Acts 20:7; Heb. 10:25); (2) choosing of officers (Acts 6:5; 6:3); (3) the presence of officers—bishops and deacons—with ordinary ‘saints’ (Phil. 1:1); (4) leaders whose authority was to be obeyed (1 Thess. 5:12; Heb. 13:17); (5) the presence of elder-pastors (1 Peter 5:2); (6) instructions for corporate (the whole ekklēsia) discipline of members (1 Cor. 5:4–13); (7) instructions for systematic collection of moneys (1 Cor. 16:1, 2; Rom. 15:26); (8) letters of recommendation (Acts 18:27; 2 Cor. 2:3, 9); (9) uniform ‘rites’ and ‘ordinances’ (1 Cor. 11); (10) uniform qualifications for offices (1 Tim. 3; Titus 2)—and more.

These features of organization developed over a period of several years among churches which were instructed by the authority of Christ and the Spirit through the Apostles. The learned and devout Baptist John Gill, who wrote over two centuries ago, was one of several who have argued as follows. Jesus specified that the promised Holy Spirit would guide the Apostles into all the truth (John 16:13). That truth would certainly include how Jesus, who loved the church and died for her, wanted her to be organized and governed.² Similar statements appear in writings of other denominations. But, did those original Apostles ever provide an inspired, written manual of church government? Most certainly they did not. Though the Pastoral Epistles have much to say about the church office of elder or bishop and of deacon, what they say relates to a form of government already in operation in churches established by the Apostle Paul and his assistants and converts. Acts and Revelation also have something to say about messengers (or angels) of the churches and heavenly ‘elders.’ If we accept all the New Testament books as genuine, originating in the apostolic age, we can draw inferences as to the forms of government which emerged during that period, but not everyone draws the same inferences. We have reason to know that the sub-apostolic Christians esteemed the spoken work of those who heard the Apostles speak more than written documents. They did not everywhere in every area of the world have all the New Testament canon, though by Irenaeus’ time (late second century) in Gaul that vigorous writer was citing every book of the New Testament except Hebrews, Philemon, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. He may have known them too. He simply had no reason to quote them in Writings, which have come known to us. Earlier, in the time of transition to the sub-apostolic age (ad 85–125, which includes the writings of Ignatius, first-known patristic advocate of local government centered in a bishop and elders), the Pastoral Epistles may not have been sufficiently dispersed to be read in every church.

The Jerusalem church quickly grew to enormous proportions, including Gentiles unacquainted with any previous form of biblical religion and numerous indigent people. These thousands of people formed a distinct community, not merely a segment of the population who meet regularly for worship. Their religious concerns are described quickly in Acts 2:42 ff. But in addition there was work to be done: (1) the special instruction of new believers; (2) the gathering of funds and their administration to care for the poor and perhaps to support some of the leaders; (3) general guidance of the community in a time of persecution and the stress of poverty; and (4) discipline of erring members. We see all this happening in Acts 1–9. And though we find evidence of the same in all the churches, the way the Jerusalem church did these things was only in a limited degree a pattern for all churches everywhere.

II. The Apostolic Pattern of Church Organization

There was an element present in the Jerusalem church that somewhat distorts the picture—the presence of Apostles. We would have to know how the Jerusalem church was governed after there were no Apostles remaining there to get a clear picture of polity in that apostolically founded church. Peter exercised discipline (Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5) on his own authority. Apostles told the church to choose seven men (deacons?) to ‘serve tables’ and care for ‘business’ (Acts 6:1–5 kjv) and Apostles ‘prayed and laid their hands on them’ (v. 6). Nothing like that happened again in the New Testament record. We must consult what apostolically founded churches did, as reported in the New Testament. We also desire to know how the Apostles (specifically Paul) set up the government of local churches and what indirect and directly stated information can be gathered from the Epistles and Revelation.

That the Apostles did not control all the inner workings of the early Jerusalem church in detail is suggested by the fact that even Peter had to give account of his actions at Caesarea (Acts 10) to ‘brethren’ who had been opposed to what he had done (Acts 11:1–4, 18 kjv), not only to the other Apostles. Shortly after, ‘the church which was in Jerusalem’ (not just its Apostles or other officers) ‘sent forth Barnabas’ on an investigative mission to Antioch (Acts 11:22 kjv). It is not said to be a disciplinary mission. And only a little later we first are informed there were ‘presbyters’ (or elders) in the Jerusalem church who received the charitable gifts of the church from Antioch (Acts 11:30). After that at the new ekklēsia at Antioch, ‘the Spirit,’ probably through one of the prophets present (Acts 13:1), said ‘Separate me Barnabas and Saul’ (v. 2 kjv). The message was to the church not from it. The church obeyed by renewed fasting and prayer and then laid hands on them and ‘they [the church] sent them away’ (vv. 2, 3).

Barnabas and Saul (also briefly Mark) began their ‘work’ at Cyprus, but though there were some victories for the gospel, apparently no church was founded in Cyprus. Back on the mainland to the north at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:14–50) they preached the gospel, making some disciples, and then moved on to Iconium, Lystra, Derbe and environs.

The two missionaries, with their new disciples, suffered severe persecution by Jews and then by Gentiles also in Iconium and Antioch. So they moved on to Derbe where they worked and waited (14:20) until, as W. M. Ramsay suggests, there was a change in officers in the cities where they had been.³

At this point something of great importance for our understanding of apostolic church organization occurred. Paul and Barnabas returned to the places (Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, Acts 14:21–24) where they had made numerous disciples in the preceding months for the purpose of confirming ‘disciples’ (13:52; 14:20, 22) and organizing the churches. To this point the Acts record has informed us about elders, perhaps deacons (Acts 6), of messengers sent by churches, meetings for prayer, preaching, and business but nothing else of congregationally organized structure for governance.

Sir W. M. Ramsay, after thorough preparation in the necessary languages and thorough geographical, archaeological and literary research, wrote a corpus of literature on Paul’s life and work—still valued today, though ignored by present reigning critical scholarship. He showed that Luke in writing Acts regularly followed certain principles, which Ramsay sets forth.⁴ (1) Luke was acquainted with Paul's letters—'he was in Paul's company when he wrote them—and consciously provided historical background for them' (p. 16 passim). (2) 'Luke's style is compressed,' providing only an 'uncolored recital of important facts in briefest possible terms' (p. 20). He leaves out any detail not necessary to his purpose (p. 17). (3) 'Luke had studied the sequence of events carefully, and observes it in his arrangement minutely,' but after carrying one thread of the narration forward he 'goes back in time to pick up another thread' without saying he is doing so (p. 18). (4) He lets facts speak for themselves (p. 21). (5) He employs 'first case' of each feature of the mission work to indicate what was normal procedure in all subsequent cases (p. 21).

These principles bear directly on the meaning of Acts 14:21–23. First, Luke does indeed let the facts speak for themselves (v. 21); second, his style is compressed, with little or no interpretation, 'uncolored recital of important facts in briefest possible terms' (p. 20); third, his narrative is chronological, though he will carry one thread to a point and return to pick up another (v. 18); fourth, of supreme importance, when he reports what Paul did in the 'first case is intended to be typical of the way ... of all later cases' (p. 121).

Let us hold in mind as we read the critical passage that this is the first and only place in all the New Testament that we are told how an Apostle organized a church. Its very brevity tells us much. It was not complicated.

They returned to Lystra and to Iconium, and to Antioch, confirming the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God. And when they had appointed for them elders in every church (kat' ekklēsia), and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord on whom they had believed (Acts 14:21–23 rv, rsv).

Let the following be noted.

1. There was a sizeable group of 'disciples' in each place. (See Acts 13:42, 48, 52; 14:20.) There was no mere two or three gathered in the name of the Lord. Evidently in Cyprus, where the two missionaries made only a very few disciples, they apparently organized no church.

2. The fundamental element in organization of a church is the installation of elders. Paul instructed Titus to 'set in order the things that are lacking,' specifically to 'appoint elders in every city.' Evidently this was not a novel procedure, but a settled policy, for it was 'as I [previously] commanded you' (Titus 1:5 nkjv). Paul does not say, 'In every ekklēsia appoint elders,' but 'in every city' (kata polin). The group of believers in a city were not an ekklēsia until they had properly installed elders. William Ramsay sagely observed:

It is probable that in [Paul's] estimation, some definite organization was implied in the idea of a church; and until the brotherhood in a city was organized, it was not in the strictest sense a church. In this passage [Acts 14:21–23] we see that the fundamental part of church organization lay in the appointment of Elders (presbuteroi). In [Acts] 13:1 we found there were prophets and teachers in the Antiochian [i.e. of Syria] church ... nothing is said about appointing them, but the reason indubitably is that prophets and teachers required divine grace, and could not be appointed by men: they were accepted when grace was found to have been given them.⁵

3. How elders were selected is a matter of some uncertainty. Authorities⁶ show ‘appointed’ (v. 23) could mean either election by the group or designation by Barnabas and Paul.

The term (cheirotonesantēs, from cheirotoneō) is by no means certain in meaning; for, though originally it meant to elect by popular vote (show of hands), yet it came to be used in the sense to appoint or designate (e.g. Acts 10:41). But it is not in keeping with our [Ramsay’s] conception of the precise and pragmatically accurate [mode of] expression of Luke, that he should in this passage have used the term ... unless he intended its strict sense.... It must, I think, be allowed that the votes and choice of each congregation were considered; and the term is obviously used in that way by Paul, 2 Corinthians 8:19.⁷

It remains to be said (1) that Paul’s instructions to Titus make certain that elder (presbyter) and bishop (overseer) designate the same office, the former the title of office and the latter the duties or functions (Titus 1:5 and 7, where the words are used interchangeably). Further, (2) Luke supplies no details about how ‘candidates’ were brought forward, neither does Titus 1:5 ff. It appears that one could present himself for the office (1 Tim. 3:1) and, in Paul’s exhortation at Miletus (Acts 20:28), it also appears that the Holy Spirit makes men bishops. Probably the process of choosing candidates was informally conducted, even as in small churches today. The missionaries emphasized that ‘through many tribulations [such as Paul and Barnabas had endured in their towns] we must enter into the kingdom of God’ (Acts 14:22). It certainly would have crossed people’s minds that local church leaders would become marked for persecution, hence seekers for power and attention would hardly have applied for election to office. The same qualifications Paul later set forth in 1 Timothy 3 and Titus 1 would have been applied in securing candidates for the office.

III. Source of the Apostolic Pattern

An acknowledgment is in order: what most call ‘the apostolic pattern’—and I have concurred up to this point—is by a few scholars called ‘the pattern in Pauline churches,’ i.e. not necessarily in every church. Bruce L. Shelley reflects this outlook, when he writes:

The churches in Asia Minor [also Greece], under Paul’s oversight, probably adopted a style of leadership based on a plurality of elders (Acts 14:23).

Jerusalem retained a loyalty to the family of Jesus and looked to Christ’s half brother, James, as a Christian counterpart of the ruler of the synagogue (Acts 15:13). James was succeeded by another half brother, Simeon.

We also know that Titus and Timothy, while not Apostles, assumed a kind of superintendent’s role toward some of the congregations under Paul’s oversight (Titus 1:5 and Philippians 2:19–24). Church history, as well as the New Testament, teaches us that the church can and has survived changing times and cultures by adapting its basic message and mission to changing forms [of government].⁸

Dr Shelley, who is a church historian and an evangelical Baptist, goes on to say that the nature of the church and its mission are revealed in the New Testament, but not a ‘rigid pattern of government for all local churches,’ adding: ‘But the Gospel of Christ and the Spirit’s presence are more important than the particular forms in which they find expression.’⁹

Furthermore, as many good scholars have noted, the Pastoral Epistles do not announce a formal constitution according to which every church must be governed. Rather, Paul is writing about an already existing reality. The fact of organized churches precedes the regulations Paul sets forth.

Lindsay, who contended the Pauline pattern was practically universal, wrote in a similar spirit:

Without any apostolic sanction, in virtue of the power lying within the community and given to it by the Master, the church of the second century effected a change in its ministry quite as radical, if not more so, as that made by the Reformed church in the sixteenth century, when it swept away medieval excrescences, restored the bishops to their ancient position of pastors of congregations, and vested the power of oversight in councils of greater and lesser spheres of authority [Presbyterian pattern]. What was within the power of the Christian people of the second century belongs to it always when providential circumstances seem to demand a change in the organization, for the ministry depends upon the church and not the church on the ministry.¹⁰

Paul asserted more than once that the union of Gentiles and Jews as ‘fellow heirs’ and ‘fellow members’ of the body was a ‘mystery’ revealed first in time to him and other ‘holy apostles and prophets’ of that time (Eph. 3:4, 5). But the New Testament has no record of any similar special revelation of exactly what form the assemblies (ekklēsiae) were to take, how to be organized and governed as societies. The form evidently was in large part derived from the inheritance of custom in which every orthodox Jew of the time grew up—the synagogue.

Perhaps beginning as early as the exile of Ezra, certainly for several centuries before Christ, Jews of Palestine and the Diaspora had formed local societies for worship; instruction of youth; and other social, civil and religious purposes. Both the assembly and the building where it met were called by the Greek word, a sunagōgē (synagogue), though primary reference at first was to the assembled people—from Greek sun (with, together) and agō (to lead or bring). (Sunagō is used at Matthew 2:4 and more than forty times in the New Testament for ‘assemble, bring together.’) Ekklēsia has the meaning of ‘called out.’ Hence the two words, like repentance and faith, represent two aspects of one thing, one negative, the other positive. Once in the New Testament (James 2:2) a Christian assembly is called a synagogue. In the Greek Old Testament ekklēsia often refers to gatherings of representatives of ‘all Israel,’ but seldom, if ever, of the nation itself or of local gatherings.

So it is very likely that Paul used the term ekklēsia for a gathering together (sunagōgē) consistently for the new entity, the local Christian assembly, thus avoiding confusion with the assemblies of Judaism by making a distinction in nomenclature. Paul himself may have been chief influence in giving this name to the church. Luke, author of Acts, uses the word ekklēsia in his history down to Acts 14:22 but never in the speech of any Christian. Ekklēsia is always Luke, the historian’s, word. Matthew is the only Gospel writer to use ekklēsia (Matt. 16:18 and 18:17). He does so twice but only in Jesus’ speech. But we do not know what the Aramaic word He employed was—perhaps kenishta, related to keneseth, a good Hebrew word for Old Testament gatherings and the word modern Israelis use for their national parliament.

Three-fourths of the about 110 times ekklēsia is used in the New Testament it is by Paul or Luke, his friend and biographer. All the others (except James 5:14) wrote after Paul had done his work. And James also called the Christian assemblies a sunagōgē.

These facts are well known to scholars and most scholars competent to have an opinion think it more than likely, close to a certainty, that Paul, an upper-class Jew, raised in the synagogue at Tarsus and educated in the system of the synagogue at Jerusalem, carried useful and appropriate features of synagogue governance and worship into the Christian ekklēsia.

It is, of course, possible that Paul and other Christians collaborated in deciding whether ekklēsia, sunagōgē or some other should be adopted. If so, reasons suggested by Wolfgang Schrage in the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament might have been decisive.

Schrage says that the word ‘synagogue’ in New Testament times had come to mean the building more than the Jewish congregation and was hence unsuitable for the fledging churches, but he asserts:

Above all ... the synagogue was very closely bound up with the nomos [law] and paradosis [rabbinical tradition].... This alone makes it easy to see why sunagōgē could not be used in self-designation by a community to which the central position of the Law expressed in the name sunagōgē had become suspect because it [the people of the church] knew it was constituted not by Moses and observance of the Law, but by the eschatological Christ event.¹¹

In a similar way Protestants in general and evangelicals in particular prefer terms like ‘world-wide church’ or simply ‘the church’ to either ‘catholic’ or ‘ecumenical,’ either of which is technically applicable for the whole visible church.

Further, each of the Twelve was a Palestinian Jew. Post-biblical Jewish sources about Judaism in the time of Jesus and the book of Acts are not contemporary, while the Gospel’s accounts are contemporary. From the Gospels we know that many Jewish communities, probably all, in Palestine had synagogues (buildings), synagogue organization and government and regular services for worship, instruction in the Law and the Prophets, education of children and other social purposes. Many scholars today think it likely that the Palestinian synagogues developed from the ma amadoth, (literally places of standing). These ‘were divisions of the people ... which were intended to correspond to the twenty-four courses of the priests.’¹² Each ma amad (singular) assembled to hear reading of Scripture passages being synchronously read by its priests at the temple. Jewish tradition in the Mishna (Taanith IV. 2) traces the custom back to Moses’ command at Numbers 28:2, as Bowker explains.¹³ It seems therefore quite inevitable that some synagogue custom and practice should be deeply ingrained into these twelve orthodox ‘children of the synagogue’ (including Mathias) and should have been carried by them into the Christian ekklēsia.

In stark contrast, none of the personnel (Levites, priests and similar) or ritual practices appears at all in the primitive Christianity of the New Testament. They sang the Psalms, not because some of them were part of the developed temple ritual, but because they were in their Bible and were a part of the synagogue worship to which they were accustomed and—it is right to say—socialized.

But the first Christians finally were cut loose from the theology and fellowship of the synagogue by the events of Acts 10 and 11 and onward to the conference between Antioch and Jerusalem (Acts 15:6–32). The leading members were still all Jewish and former members of the synagogues and preserved synagogue learning and many of its social practices. It was inevitable that the ekklēsia should preserve the best of the synagogue.¹⁴

When the Dead Sea Scrolls first came to public attention in 1947 and for more than fifteen years thereafter, there was great interest in discovering what effect their contents might have on our understanding of Christian origins and the early church. The excitement of the time—in which I participated as a young professor of Old Testament and theology—produced a number of very radical theories: too much to report here. In the decades since, however, scholarship—has not found direct connections between Qumran and its literature with the New Testament literature and the church. They do, however, find that many forms of expression of Jewish piety at Qumran paralleled Jewish-Christian forms of expression in the churches at Jerusalem and elsewhere. Citing Millar Burrows of Yale—one of the first to examine the scrolls and who gave years to their study—James C. VanderKam observes:

[T]he more convincing resemblances were to be seen in matters such as communal structure (12 nonpriests in the Qumran council parallel the 12 apostles) forms of worship (baptism, [sacramental] meal), practices (community of goods), doctrines (dualism of light and darkness, a righteousness conferred by grace),¹⁵ etc. ...¹⁶

VanderKam continues, directly quoting Burrows:

For myself I must go further and confess that after studying the Dead Sea Scrolls for Seven years [he wrote in the late 50s] I do not find my understanding of the New Testament substantially affected. Its Jewish background is clearer and better understood, but its meaning has neither been changed nor significantly clarified.¹⁷

William White, Jr, trained at Westminster Seminary and holding a doctorate from a great Jewish university, summarizes in an important article, entitled Synagogue: ‘The most important legacy of the first century synagogue was the form and organization of the apostolic church.’¹⁸ Prof. James Hadley of Yale similarly, in another thorough article, said, ‘The synagogue ... was the order with which the first Christian believers were most familiar, from which they were most likely to take the outlines or even the details, of the worship, organization, government of their own society.’¹⁹ J. L. Drumwright, Jr, writes, ‘It was required that any community that contained ten males above 12 years of age support a synagogue.’²⁰

There is supreme importance to this fact, for each synagogue (assembly) was an independent unit, not created or sponsored or governed by a central authority, though there was a commonly held understood constitution, both written and customary. It was governed by its own elders chosen by the people themselves. The elders had powers derived from custom and delegated by the people.

IV. Church Organization and Government Onward from Apostolic Times

Summary of the Apostolic Age

Government in the churches of the apostolic age was by a college of elders—always plural, though we do not know how many. The people themselves decided who was qualified according to the stiff qualifications (1 Tim. 3:1–7; Titus 1:5–9) and installed them. After being installed these elders were those that ‘are over you’ and ‘them that have the rule over you.’ The people who chose them were obliged to ‘respect’ them, ‘to esteem them very highly,’ ‘Obey ... and submit to them’ (1 Thess. 5:12; Heb. 13:17 kjv). These elders are also called overseers (or bishops) and pastors. Their authority, in the New Testament, is always held jointly, though there was a division of labor among them. Deacons had no ruling authority.

This pattern was already in retreat at the beginning of the second century. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, martyred at Rome ad 110, wrote letters to his own congregation and to many others in seven presently acknowledged genuine Epistles. These letters clearly indicate that Ignatius was fully aware he was urging a change, owing to the exigencies produced by heresies and persecution. Careful reading of the letters shows that some of the churches addressed had a single bishop and a college of elders while others had the older college of bishops (=elders) and no president. ‘[E]very Christian community ought to have at its head a bishop, a ... session of elders, and a body of deacons ... to whom, jointly and severally obedience is due.’²¹ That this soon became katholikos (i.e. catholic) is conceded by scholarly writers generally. Lindsay, quoted here, goes on to say, ‘There is not a trace of sacerdotalism in the sense that the Christian ministry is a special priesthood set apart to offer a special sacrifice.’²² He adds, ‘There is no apostolic succession in any form whatsoever,’ and ‘there is no trace of diocesan rule’ (Lindsay, 197). Again, this is a near unanimous consensus among scholars who hold to the genuineness of the New Testament books, and whether advocates of government by bishops of territorial dioceses or not.²³

It is plain to be seen that some variety of the threefold ministry (pastor, elders, deacons) is what prevails today in Protestant churches—with varieties everywhere. The one designated ‘the pastor’ or ‘senior pastor’ has a board of advisors or associates (Baptist deacons, Presbyterians elders, Episcopal wardens and vestrymen) and a third layer of lay officials who care for property, superintend ‘alms’ or charities, finances, and similar. There are many varieties.

The essence of the change was simply that in a church of the apostolic age the ruling body in every congregation was a session of elders without a ‘president’ or ‘superior,’ while by mid-second century the ruling body became a session with a president.²⁴ Without retreating from his ‘Brethren’ insistence on perpetuating the New Testament pattern, Alexander Strauch has published a very helpful book both on the New Testament pattern and how-approximation can be achieved within existing polities.²⁵

A. H. Strong produced what is perhaps the most persuasive ‘modern’ defense of strict independency and congregational government. He expresses preference for a single elder, or pastor, rather than plurality, arguing that the only reason for more than one in apostolic times was the large size of a congregation—in spite of the fact that most New Testament references to local church elders are in plural number: ‘a plural eldership is natural and advantageous only where the church is very numerous and the pastor needs assistants in his work: and only in such cases can we say that New Testament example favors it.’ James, he thinks, was ‘pastor’ of the Jerusalem church. He finds direct scriptural support for one elder or bishop for each congregation in the fact that several passages refer to ‘the bishop’ in singular number (1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:7) but to ‘deacons’ in plural number (1 Tim. 3:8, 10, 12). So too, each of the seven churches of Revelation 2 and 3 had but one ‘angel,’ interpreted as pastor.²⁶ So this Baptist did not think that the threefold ministry (pastor-bishop, elders, deacons) was a change from the New Testament pattern. He evidently had not carefully read the scholarly sources he cites. There was indeed a change from practice in the apostolic age, fully effected by the end of the second century.

Modern Anglicans, not all of whom readily accept that there was a change, explain it as a natural development in absence of any direct dominical or apostolic commandment to the contrary. Ignatius’ ‘earnestness implies apostolic sanction. Episcopacy must have originated before the apostles had all passed away; and its strength in Asia cannot be explained without some encouragement from St. John,’ according to Gwatkin.²⁷ He goes on to propose, among other things, that perhaps several ‘vicars—apostolic’ like Timothy might have remained at their posts after their apostolic superiors died.

Good scholars have suggested four reasons why churches enacted the change.

First, J. B. Lightfoot (an Anglican bishop) suggested in his famous *Commentary on Philippians*²⁸ that it first appeared in Asia Minor in order to have a single voice in each congregation to speak for all. In a society already accustomed to one-man rule in secular affairs, this arrangement helped to stand up to the temptations of persecution and false teaching very prevalent in the East, according to Lindsay.²⁹

Second, W. M. Ramsay suggested that perhaps when an elder was assigned oversight as a supervisor (Gr. episkopos=bishop) of any special duty and did well, he might continue permanently and come to represent the church to outsiders.³⁰

Third, Lindsay points out that (as at the Last Supper) only one should preside and that one, if he presided repeatedly, would easily become the bishop. He who presided at this highest position of worship would be regarded with special respect.³¹

Fourth, my own opinion regarding the modification is as follows.

1. We know from evidence of Acts and the Epistles that organization and governance in the first congregation were not invariably followed in other New Testament churches. To give an example, Peter by his own authority denounced and judged Ananias and Sapphira, but Paul enjoined the churches as such to take charge of discipline.

2. The Pauline instructions regarding plurality of elders (‘elders in every city,’ and the like) neither forbid nor prescribe that one should preside and lead.

3. The presence of a ‘chief executive officer,’ subject to the will and authority of the body of people whom he leads develops in almost every group as a natural (in the good sense) tendency. Thus there was ‘the ruler of the synagogue’ (ho archi-sunagōgos, Luke 13:14; Acts 18:8).

4. To be ‘pastors and teachers’ was and is a special gift of Christ to the church (Eph. 4:11). But some elders were ‘teachers of the Word and doctrine’ and some were not.

5. We also know that in early post-apostolic times the presiding elder-bishop-pastor might not be a teacher of the congregation.

It seems, therefore, that in developing the threefold ministry the churches acted not only obediently but probably wisely. They modified the form of local church organization within the parameters of New Testament precedent and instruction.

It is beyond the present project to trace how local church independence with co-operation within the church according-to-the-whole (katholikos, catholic) devolved into territorial episcopal dioceses and thence to primacy and jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese of Rome. (‘Diocese’ is derived from dia plus oikeo ‘to manage all the house ... to conduct the affairs of a state,’ Liddell and Scott, Lexicon.) The whole idea was borrowed from imperial Roman government administration, and after legal establishment was imposed upon the churches of the Roman Empire.

Standard works on ecclesiology usually dismiss the ‘Plymouth Brethren’ and other earlier and later groups who have sought to perpetuate the most primitive apostolic pattern. Current leaders and writers of the ‘Brethren’ and related authors insist that wherever a group of believers come into being the gifts of pastor-teacher will be present among them, along with other gifts as needed, but that there should be no single person (pastor, minister) who heads the congregation and who wields any special authority. Ordination to ‘the Ministry’ is said not to exist.³² The similar views of Watchman Nee and Witness Lee of ‘The Little Flock,’ important among Chinese Christians everywhere, are available in the thesis of James Cheung at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School library where the literature of the movement is listed and summarized, as noted earlier.³³

These authors all seek to demonstrate from the New Testament the same picture of apostolic church order set forth earlier in this chapter and now widely acknowledged. They also argue that (1) the primitive order was uniform through all the ancient churches; (2) that it was designed to be permanent, operative in every culture; and (3) that departure from strict independence to any formal organized ‘connectionalism’ is both wrong and damaging to the church. There is no room for Christ-approved development or expediency in determining the form of church organization and government after the death of the Apostles.

History provides numerous examples of groups disgusted with the rigid and sterile structure of the church who have withdrawn and claimed to worship and serve God without any structure save the Bible and impulses of the Holy Spirit.

Shelley remarks: ‘History shows how rapidly these movements developed their own forms, their own distinctive customs, beliefs, and organizational structure and forms of government.’

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology.

² John Gill, Complete Body of Divinity II (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, repr., 1978), p. 559 ff.

³ W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen (New York: Putmans, 1897, and many reprints), p. 120.

⁴ ibid., pp. 14–20.

⁵ ibid., pp. 120, 121.

⁶ TDNT; Liddell and Scott; Bauer, Arndt & Gingrich.

- ⁷ Ramsay, op. cit., p. 122.
- ⁸ Bruce Shelley, The Church: God's People (Wheaton, IL: Victor Books, 1978), pp. 50, 51.
- ⁹ ibid.
- ¹⁰ T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries (Minneapolis: The James Family, repr. 1977), p. 210.
- ¹¹ Wolfgang Schrage, TDNT, Vol. vii. p. 829.
- ¹² John Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1969), p. 9.
- ¹³ ibid., note 1, p. 10.
- ¹⁴ The synagogue developed as a way for the Jewish people to continue their worship of God in want of the temple—either by reason of distance from it while the temple remained standing or because it had been destroyed (as for several generations after 586 bc and perpetually since ad 70). In New Testament times there were synagogues wherever there were Jews.
- ¹⁵ I disagree with VanderKam here. The Qumran people thought they made atonement without propitiating sacrifice through their acts of meritorious piety.
- ¹⁶ James C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), pp. 161, 162.
- ¹⁷ ibid., see also John J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995) p. 270. Adela Yarbro Collins, Cosmology and Eschatology in Jewish and Christian Apocalypticism (London: E. J. Brill, 1996), p. 261. John J. Collins, Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls (London & New York: Routledge, 1997), p. 187.
- ¹⁸ Wm. White, Jr, Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, p. 556.
- ¹⁹ James Hadley, 'Synagogue' in Smith Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. iv, p. 3133.
- ²⁰ J. L. Drumwright, Jr, 'Synagogue' in Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia, Vol. II, p. 63.
- ²¹ T. M. Lindsay, op. cit., p. 196.
- ²² op. cit., p. 196.
- ²³ Perhaps the best summary of supporting historical evidence for this consensus was written by Philip Schaff in his History of the Christian Church, Vol. I, 488 ff. T. M. Lindsay's The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, cited frequently here has convincingly summarized the evidence of Scripture and history. Alexander Strauch, Biblical Eldership: An Urgent Call to Restore Biblical Church Leadership (Littleton, CO: Lewis and Roth, 1988, 288 pages) practically exhausts the subject, including useful practical suggestions for implementing the restoration of the New Testament order in churches of any evangelical denomination.

²⁴ See Lindsay, 205.

²⁵ Strauch, ibid.

²⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 915, 916.

²⁷ H. W. Gwatkin, a Cambridge professor of Ecclesiastical History, ‘Church Government in the Apostolic Age,’ Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. I, p. 441.

²⁸ J. B. Lightfoot, Commentary on Philippians, 1881, 6th ed., p. 206.

²⁹ Lindsay, op. cit., pp. 206, 207.

³⁰ Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 367 ff.

³¹ Lindsay, op. cit., p. 208.

Liddell and Scott A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

³² See The Pilgrim Church by E. H. Broadbent (London: Pickering and Inglis, 1935); A. Strauch, Biblical Eldership, 2nd ed. (Littleton, CO: Lewis & Roth, 1988); D. L. Norbie, New Testament Church Organization (Chicago: Letters of Interest n.d.); and A. F. Kuen, I Will Build My Church, trans. Rudy Lindblad (Chicago: Moody Press, 1971).

³³ Mr Cheung’s book was suppressed after threats of legal action from some leaders of the movement.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (923). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Presbyterian and Congregational. In practice, however, presently and through the centuries, there has been both a moderation of the differences with borrowing of one from another and elevation of some distinct feature or mutation to a point the name no longer applies exactly. And one sort, say of episcopal government, may be utterly unlike any other of the category.

Episcopal

Very early, the prevalent episcopal system in the eastern portion of the church in the Roman Empire, the organized church became closely attached to the government of the emperor (the current Caesar). This form of church government has been called Caesaro-Papism, though nominally episcopal. Similarly, but in a different way, the western (Latin, Roman) part of the Empire became subject to the bishop of the diocese of Rome. This developed over many centuries. The system is rightly called Papal or Papist (formerly the standard word among Protestants), i.e. subject to the supreme authority of the Papa (Father) or universal bishop of Rome. And there came to be two Roman theories: Gallicanism and Ultramontanist views. The latter ascribes the pope's power to direct authority from Christ and from the pope to the bishops. The former holds that the bishops get their authority directly from Christ, the same as the pope does. Gallicanism has lost badly in modern times.

When the papal church of England cut loose from the papal court and became a national, English, episcopally governed church three or more theories developed within the system. (1) Erastianism, in which the king of England is head of the church in the same way the Roman pontiff is head of the papal church. (2) The high church, which maintains the divine right of episcopacy and that such is of the esse, very existence, of the church. (3) The low church party treat episcopacy as a matter of usefulness, not required by Scripture as necessary to the being of the church. In Methodism the bishops and district superintendents are each merely one presbyter-pastor who has been selected for a fixed term to supervise the churches of an area. In Methodism, episcopacy 'is neither diocesan nor hierarchical, but itinerant and presbyterial.'¹

It is therefore reasonable to say what is called episcopal is not one theory and practice but several (episcopacies). It is also true that in recent times, especially in North America, popular democratic sentiment has penetrated every system to the degree that both presbyterian and congregational features appear in the government of most denominations, not least Anglicans and Episcopalians and not excluding the Roman Church, for good or ill.

When Anglican-Episcopalian scholars explain the origin of their system several explanations come forth.

1. The 'high church' explanation goes like this. The order of bishops is a continuation of the apostolate. When Jesus remained on earth He was governor of the church. He kept them near Himself to teach them how to teach and govern others, so to be qualified as bishops of the church later. In the interval between His resurrection and Ascension He explained their future duties as bishops and imparted special authority to them as apostle-bishops to discharge duties implied. Matthew 28:19, 20 and John 20:21, 22 are said to be directed to Apostles only. Soon after the Ascension they received extraordinary gifts, as Jesus promised, and they began to employ those powers not only as teachers but rulers over those gathered by their preaching. They ordered the inauguration of the diaconate (Acts 6) and ordained deacons by laying hands on the men chosen. Later Paul ordained presbyters. He also ordained Timothy and Titus in the office of ‘jurisdiction’ as well as of teaching (2 Tim. 1:6), thus imparting the apostolic powers of jurisdiction. These men were set over the presbyters whom they, with Paul, ordained to the ministry. Titus in Crete, as an archetypical bishop, had authority over all orders of Christians in Crete, including power to reject and expel heretics. Through these words and acts of Paul we are made ‘aware that there would be continual occasion . . . for the exercise of that authority over pastors and teachers which the apostles had derived from the Lord Jesus.’²

2. There is no official ‘other’ explanation, but some Episcopalian authors, with a more contextual and historical interpretation of relevant materials of Scripture and history, assert (as pointed out earlier here) that the earliest ‘constitution’ of the church was modeled after the religious community from which the believers came, the synagogue. The synagogue order was modified to conform to the spirit and nature of the new community—the Christian Ekklēsia. The ‘rulers’ of the synagogue were elders (presbuteroi) and subsequently also in the new Ekklēsia. The theory of these writers is that in Gentile churches the more applicable and familiar name episcopos (bishop) was employed. Not in New Testament record but in New Testament times—when John at least was still active and influential—the threefold ministry of bishop, elders and deacons was adopted. Ignatius pled for it and he was contemporary with John, it is said. From this, in order to meet exigencies of the third and fourth centuries, the church rightly and almost universally adopted the episcopal system of local churches governed by presbyters (nowadays called priests), supervised in their diocese by a bishop. This understanding leans heavily on the principle of expediency in absence of direct scriptural command.

3. Anglican confidence in episcopal government by diocesan bishops in apostolic succession was badly shaken by some research of its own best scholars in the nineteenth century.³

4. Interestingly in the great Lange’s Commentary (ten vols. on the New Testament), the German author of the volume on 1 Timothy argues that Timothy and Titus were diocesan bishops, and the elders they ordained were local presbyters. The American translator (E. A. Washburn, an Episcopal rector) inserted a rebuttal, saying as follows. (1) The situation reflected in the New Testament was a plastic stage when church government was forming. (2) The episcopal government was a development, a legitimate change from the college of elders or bishops, strictly local. (3) Diocesan episcopacy is not described in the New Testament but it began in the time of the apostles and must have had their sanction. (4) There is utter silence about how the change came in patristic writing: it came without opposition, silently (contradicted, says Lindsay, by the controversial, strident tone of Ignatius’ Epistles, advocating episcopacy). (5) There is acknowledgment that it is wrong to import the ‘fixed order of a later age’ to interpretation of the situation when 1 Timothy was written.⁴

Presbyterian

Presbyterian church government, of course, means government by elders. This we have seen was the prevalent system in the apostolic churches on display in the New Testament. The system now known as presbyterian is similar but, with important differences. It arose in well-defined form among Calvinist groups in Reformation times. In Scotland it developed in opposition to both the papal form of episcopacy and Erastian Anglican government by bishops backed up by the king’s army. The story is heroic but out of place here. In the presbyterian government of churches in the British Isles and English-speaking nations, also in the Netherlands and France and lesser districts of Europe, government of each local church is by a college of elders called a session (or consistory) and their 'teaching elder' or pastor. The elders are elected by the people, the minister-pastor, also an elder (presbyter), is chosen by the session and confirmed by the presbytery.

The persecuted evangelical Waldenses maintained many evangelical doctrines through late medieval times and on into Reformation times. Some were enlisted by G. Farel, Calvin's predecessor at Geneva. They readily accepted the Reformed outlook in polity, having employed a three-office polity (bishop, presbyters, deacons) among their local churches. So in the Waldenseans this sort of presbyterial polity continued from antiquity through the middle ages.⁵

In presbyterianism the pastor is not a member of the local church but of the presbytery, composed of a lay elder and the pastor from each church in a presbytery (district). Actions of the local church session are subject to review of the presbytery. Above the presbytery is the synod made up of an equal number of ministers and lay elders chosen by each presbytery (or classis). The presbyteries (not the synods) also send equal numbers of ministers and lay elders to the highest level government, the General Assembly.

The General Assembly is not considered as of the essence of this form of government. In America, for example, up to 1788 there was only the Synod of New York and Philadelphia. This gave place to four synods and 'the General Assembly,' which met for the first time in 1789.⁶

The duties, prerogatives and procedures to carry them out for each office and 'court' are set forth in some detail in a constitution for the denomination, called The Book of Church Order.

This method of linking local congregations to a presbytery and presbyteries to synods and to a General Assembly is called 'connectionalism.' It is employed to distinguish it from the congregational theory, which endorses 'independency.' It is held, 'The principle of mutual accountability, dependency and submission among the churches is taught at several places in Scripture.'⁷ Connectionalism is also characteristic of Methodist polity, though a much larger supervision of local churches and districts by superintendents and bishops takes place among Methodists than among Presbyterians. There is enough similarity, however, that, in spite of some serious differences between Presbyterianism, Calvinism and the Wesleyan Arminianism of Methodism, a single pastor may serve two churches, one a Methodist church in one town and a Presbyterian church in another.

As shall appear shortly, Baptist advocates of congregational polity make statements about mutual accountability, dependence of one Christian group upon another, and submission that imply informal, spiritual 'connectionalism.' In practice, Baptist churches frequently connect themselves together in 'association' with more solidarity than most modern Presbyterians (or Reformed) ever dreamed of. The same can be said of Lutheran churches, which in America are not state-connected and have local congregational government.

In former times the presbytery held title to local church properties but in some of the newer evangelical Presbyterian denominations in America the congregation, whether incorporated or not, owns the local church properties.⁸ The local churches have full control over the disbursement of their moneys and ‘The superior courts of the church may receive moneys or properties from a local church only by free and voluntary action of the latter.’⁹ Discussions go on at the various Presbyterian Church of America levels moving further in congregational directions, and there are ‘Independent Presbyterian Churches’ (perhaps an oxymoron?) as well as large congregations which do not submit to normal Presbyterian jurisdiction. These modifications, of course, have evolved out of disputes within the several mainline Presbyterians and withdrawals of congregations to form new presbyteries, synods and general assemblies—in effect new Presbyterian denominations.

Though Presbyterians of Reformation times thought they were restoring the New Testament pattern quite exactly, this is not the case today, though they hold their system to be closer to the New Testament than episcopacy or Congregationalism.¹⁰

There is another presbyterian, ‘small p,’ development. Some congregations in many denominations nominally congregational-independent have adopted government by local elders and their pastor. The motives seem to be chiefly two—to suppress the rising and endemic strife in American local churches and to give pastors some protection against rising levels of dissidence in our churches. I myself wrote the new constitution of a congregationally governed church which moved to government by elders and the pastor—a long time ago. At that time the motive was to conform the church to what was esteemed to be the New Testament pattern. We really became more like a late second-century church with threefold ministry (local bishop, college of elders, and deacons) than the strictly Pauline pattern.

Official documents of American Presbyterianism are quite modest in their statements about their form of government. Even before there was a General Assembly, the Synod of New York and Philadelphia drew up ‘the Preliminary Principles of the Presbyterian Form of Government.’¹¹ There are eight of them, which I summarize.

1. God alone is Lord of the conscience, hence no religious or civil authorities may rightly coerce ‘private judgment ... in all matters that respect religion.’
2. Every ‘particular church’ or union of churches ‘is entitled to declare’ terms of admission and systems of internal government.
3. The ‘blessed Savior ... hath appointed officers ... and it is incumbent upon these officers, and upon the whole church to exercise discipline ... observing ... the rules contained in the Word of God.’
4. ‘[T]ruth is in order to goodness ... there is an inseparable connection between faith and practice, truth and duty.’
5. ‘[A]ll who are admitted as teachers [must] be sound in faith.’ They acknowledge that ‘there are truths and forms with respect to which men of good character and principle may differ.’¹²
6. Scripture provides the sole authority of officers and of rules of government; yet the individual ‘society’ must elect the ones who hold the offices and enforce the rules.

7. All church power is ‘by delegated authority, [and] is only ministerial and declarative ... The Holy Scriptures are the only rule of faith and manners.’ All synods and councils may err. Councils really must not make laws but as ‘fallible men’ carry out scriptural laws already made.

8. No civil authority should ever be called upon to enforce ecclesiastical decisions and discipline.

I present this to expose readers convinced of congregational polity, and who may not realize in how many points historic Presbyterianism—in America, purged from any dependence on or union with any form of civil government—is similar to their own. Baptists rightly make much of the necessity of a ‘regenerate membership’ to make congregational government operate aright, yet the same is true of Presbyterianism, implied in the above eight ‘principles.’ Presbyterians, in deference to the Westminster Confession, include children of believers in the church membership but do not claim that they are yet regenerate and of course children do not vote in electing elders.

Congregational

Congregational polity means two things: (1) independency or autonomy of each local church as opposed to being part of a bishop’s diocese (episcopal); and (2) democracy, wherein each member of voting age has a share in government. Advocates are quick to point out independency is in no manner opposed to co-operation and mutual fellowship with other congregations and genuine Christians everywhere. Further, democracy does not mean that no delegation of authority to representatives takes place; rather that all persons and small groups (committees) to whom authority is committed are agents of the congregation, responsible to the congregation.

A local church thus cannot be controlled by any authority outside itself. It may and should associate itself freely with other congregations, conferences and similar. Yet in such associations it must retain power to withdraw and cannot, in Congregationalism, give up its own sovereign independence.

Advocates hold that all prerogatives, duties and functions directed to the local church in the New Testament require congregational independency and democracy. What follows is the heart of the evidence.

1. Admonitions to preserve unity of behavior and action are addressed to local churches, not districts or dioceses and the like.¹³ Passages in 1 Corinthians, for example, relate to breaches of unity in Corinth and not between Corinth and Athens or Thessalonica, or in the church universal. All the passages relate to people who live close to one another in a village or town, not to dispersed churches in a district or diocese. The address at the beginning of the Epistle shows that Paul designed the instruction for any congregation in any place (1 Cor. 1:2).

2. Similarly, charges to preserve pure doctrine and practice are addressed to local churches. This is particularly the case in the words of Christ, by John, to the ‘angels’ of the ‘Seven Churches of Asia’ (Rev. 2–3). These words come in each case to a whole local church and imply the duty of each person in it to respond appropriately and to take personal responsibility within the church to bring the entire congregation to appropriate obedience.

3. The first church was charged by all the Apostles present to choose and install its own officers (Acts 6:1–6).

As noted about Presbyterianism, godly advocates wish to be strictly scriptural in their form of government, ‘Holy Scripture the only rule of faith and manners’ (Form of Government of 1789, paragraph 7).¹⁴ Congregationalists agree, but add that church government, directed by Scripture, is a monarchy of Christ through the Spirit who indwells each member equally. ‘In ascertaining the will of Christ ... and in applying his commands ... the Holy Spirit enlightens one member through the counsel of another, and as the result of combined deliberation, guides the whole body to right conclusions ... unity ... intelligent and willing’ (Strong, 903).¹⁵

Advocates of congregational polity assert that when it functions properly, each member not only is ‘indwelt’ by the Spirit but ‘filled’ by Him, hence church government is a spiritual function. It is not as in American political elections an expression of each voter’s private opinion, but of the ‘mind of the Spirit’ (Rom. 8:27; 11:34), ‘the same mind and the same judgment’ (1 Cor. 1:10; 2 Cor. 13:11), ‘the mind of Christ’ (1 Cor. 2:16).

This is because from the beginning they were ‘all filled with the Holy Spirit’ (Acts 2:1–4). As they continued the first church formed ‘their own company’ (kjv) and were ‘all filled with the Holy Spirit’ (Acts 4:23, 31). In the Antioch church half a generation later the Holy Spirit through the congregation separated Barnabas and Saul for their work through congregational action (Acts 13:2, 3). The activities of a well-ordered church according to 1 Corinthians 12 are all expressions of the power of the Spirit working through gifted people.¹⁶

4. The local church at Corinth had the duty to observe and to guard the ordinance of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–34). Paul addresses the church as a whole (‘in giving you this charge,’ v. 17 asv), not its leaders. See also verse 2: ‘I praise you ... even as I delivered them to you.’ There is no evidence here that serving communion or performing a baptism was wholly at the discretion of the pastor, even though history furnishes many examples where pastors rightly refused to serve communion to the unworthy and paid the price of dismissal. Calvin himself is a well-known example. Jonathan Edwards is another.

5. The local church—not a district, presbytery or officer—has the duty and authority to judge its own members. In 1 Corinthians 5:1 ff., Paul directed the Corinthian congregation to deal decisively in a case of scandalous immorality and he enlarges on the same in chapter 6.

6. The local church has the duty and authority to settle quarrels among its own members. In 1 Corinthians 6, Paul addresses the congregation as a whole: ‘Dare any of you’ (asv) ‘do you not know,’ etc. The only ecclesiastical court evidently is the local church itself. Paul did not himself appoint a judge or discipline committee but he did direct the church itself, not an outside court of inquiry to look after matters.

This does not mean, advocates of Congregationalism point out, that the church, by its authority, may not appoint a small committee or even one man to deal with a problem of discipline. In some cases known to me the problem is so severe the church felt helpless to solve its own problems, and so called in a committee from 'conference' to help. (This reveals a connectionalism, in fact, if not theory.) In each case the move did not prevent disaster.

It should be said that Presbyterians have time-tested rules for dealing with such crises and seem to use them effectively. Baptists and other congregational groups usually do not. When they improvise within the crisis situation the results are often unsatisfactory to the desperate folk who try to deal with it and may call for help. They have no rules or precedents.

7. Finally, the one New Testament case involving one congregation's relations with another (Acts 15:1–35) seems to imply voluntary consultation and co-operation not a pre-established organized 'connection.'

Some advocates of episcopacy find evidence for episcopal authority in the action of James of Jerusalem, half brother of Jesus, who seems to them to make the decision: 'Brothers ... my judgment is ...' (Acts 15:13, 19). Also they propose that the decisions of James as a bishop were rendered not only to the delegation from Antioch but to churches elsewhere as rules to be obeyed because they were issued from a sort of inter-diocesan conference.

The instance, however, is not one of a general gathering of pastors around a bishop or anything of the sort, but of a problem which arose in the Antioch congregation because 'some men' from Judea, presumably the Jerusalem church, came to Antioch and taught the Antioch 'brothers' (Acts 15:1) that circumcision of Gentiles was necessary for their salvation. This was contrary to the teaching and practice of the Antioch church and their missionaries, Paul and Barnabas. So 'the brothers' sent a delegation headed by Paul and Barnabas to go up to Jerusalem 'to the apostles and the elders' about this question. When they arrived, however, it was 'the church and the apostles and elders' who received them. Though the Apostles and the elders 'considered this matter' in session (v. 6), Peter addressed the 'brothers' (v. 7) and 'the assembly,' i.e. the whole church were present and listened (v. 12).

James rendered an opinion. 'My judgment is' (v. 9) translates krinō, for which the first meaning is 'separate, distinguish, then select, prefer' (Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, who cite Rom. 14:5, 'prefers one day,' etc), and even to make a judicial decision (Liddell and Scott, Lexicon). James' opinion was accepted as correct by 'the apostles and the elders, with the whole church [at Jerusalem]' (v. 22) who as a group (by what means we are not told) composed a letter. It began, 'The brothers, both the apostles and the elders, to the brothers,' etc. (v. 23). The letter was carried back to Antioch (v. 30) where it was read in the church who 'rejoiced because of its encouragement' (not orders or bull or decree, v. 31).

This decision set a precedent, of course, and it is clear that apostolic authority stood behind it, but the occasion was a matter of difference between certain members of two local churches, not an ecumenical gathering of bishops or even of ruling and lay elders. Even the Apostles appear as members of the Jerusalem church, respected, but not in charge of a local assemblage. Paul and Barnabas had been the focus of the controversy to start with (Acts 15:1, 2). After being vindicated, Paul set off again, at Derbe, joined by Timothy whose 'father was a Greek'! So as they went on their way they 'gave over' (paredidosan) the 'decisions' (dogmata) of the Apostles and elders (Acts 16:4). These decisions, of course, confirmed for the church catholic what Paul had already established in every church he founded.

Restorationist Views

Restorationist is the usual designation for numerous groups, beginning in early Reformation times, who claim to restore precisely what they deem to have been the New Testament or Pauline pattern. Some groups have sought and thought they found a form of association, and organization in the Bible, and sought with some success to imitate it in detail. Most of these groups would be classified by Ernst Troeltsch as sects rather than churches. In their beginnings they rejected the authenticity of the professing church, which they regarded as ‘fallen.’

In America, however, there are so many groups, denominations and independent churches which fall into this category (whether they are aware of it or not), and their members so numerous, that it would be a serious mistake to omit them in a treatment of church polity.

Systematic theology commonly neglects this category of views, partly because restorationists are characteristically anti-creed and disinterested in formal theology, hence they have not been publicized in the mainstream religious press. Yet in America and around the world at the present time, millions of Christians including, we hope, many readers of this book, belong to groups who hold this view.

Under this rubric may be included many who are referred to by scholars as Free Church, Believers’ Church, Gathered Church, or even more narrowly self-designated as The Christian Church, The Church of God, Church of The Nazarene, or simply Friends or Brethren, and similar. I include them under the umbrella of restorationist because each began consciously in withdrawal from the prevalent form of the church existing where the founders lived to form a community of believers committed to a form of church organization and government which they thought to be the New Testament pattern. Some were also fugitive from oppressive ecclesiastical regimes. An early example is ‘the Unity of the Brethren’ (Hussites of late 1400s in Bohemia); earlier examples are Waldensians and Albigensians.

From the first stages of the Reformation in continental Europe there were those whom R. Bainton called the left wing of the Reformation and G. H. Williams the Radical Reformation, but whose enemies labeled them Anabaptists. They style themselves Brethren, Mennonites, Hutterites, Amish and the like. These people came to notice initially at Zurich. At first they accepted the leadership there of Zwingli, but because the government of the church was an aspect of local civil government, regarding every christened person (which included everybody) as a church member, these brave souls withdrew to form their own (unlawful) assemblies of ‘believers only.’ These brave folk recently had been baptized as confessed believers. As the movement developed they consciously sought to reestablish the New Testament pattern and did succeed in a measure. They and their defenders among mainline Protestant scholars have produced a very large literature in recent generations. Their distinctive doctrines and practices are adequately discussed in the writings of Franklin Littell, Roland Bainton, G. H. Williams in the United States; E. A. Payne and P.T. Forsyth of Great Britain; as well as J. H. Yoder (Mennonite), D. F. Durnbaugh (Dunker or Church of the Brethren) and others.

In the Britain of the seventeenth century, restorationism is usually called non-conformity or simply the Puritan revolt. The relevant point here is that out of the Puritan movement came English

Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, Congregationalists and others. At first their objective was mainly to separate their churches from government control and episcopally required architecture, furniture, priesthood and liturgy. All thought of themselves as determined to restore church worship and government to the pattern perceived to be discovered in the New Testament. What came out of it all was exported to America as Presbyterian, Quaker, Baptist, Congregational and (to a degree) even early Episcopal denominations. Recent scholarship has recovered the fact that colonists in America before 1775 were as much fearful that King George III would be coaxed into appointing a bishop to control the churches in America as they were offended by the encroachments of parliament on their liberties as Englishmen. This has been thoroughly researched and reported by Carl Bridenbaugh.¹⁷

Restorationist efforts of early nineteenth-century America gave the country such diverse ecclesiastical phenomena as the Mormons, who are governed by ‘Apostles,’ and ‘Disciples of Christ’ or ‘Church of Christ.’ The latter began as a movement to restore New Testament simplicity of doctrine, life and government to Presbyterian churches and then to Baptist churches. This movement, which grew to a large ‘denomination’ (though they reject the term), was founded by Alexander Campbell (1788–1866).

During the same period in Britain two important contradictory Restorationist movements developed. ‘One was the Tractarian or Oxford movement led by John Keble, Edward Peese, and John Henry Newman,’ who assayed to call Anglicanism back to its pre-Reformation heritage and the writings of the early church Fathers. They were determined to rescue their church from state-sponsored interference. This movement persists to the present day.¹⁸

In another direction, in early nineteenth-century Britain, reaction against restrictive Acts of Parliament against dissenters and Roman Catholics, produced (at first) some small groups of members of the established church who met at hours when there were no services in the state church to study the Bible for prayer and instruction. Some were clergymen.

Among them were those who came to be known as Plymouth Brethren. They deserve more than a footnote in a chapter on church government. Many of the Brethren would be recognized as outstanding Christians in any age: George Mueller of Bristol, founder of orphanages and famous example of the principle of faith in mission; S. P. Tregelles, Hebrew scholar, exegete, translator of Gesenius’ Lexicon; G. W. Wigram, creator of concordances of Scripture in Hebrew and Greek; Sir Robert Anderson of Scotland Yard, and keen writer and evangelical scholar; F. F. Bruce, professor, scholar and commentator; H. A. Ironside; C. H. Mackintosh; and many other preachers, pastors, scholars. To this number might be added the name of Watchman Nee, founder of the very similar ‘Little Flock’ of China.

No man prescribes polity for ‘the Brethren’ but there are several treatments of church constitution and ministry by their best authors. Of these the best in my estimation is G. H. Lang.¹⁹

The early history of the movement revolves in major part around the lives of four English citizens—A. N. Groves, George Mueller, Robert Chapman and John Nelson Darby. Their story as told in some detail by E. H. Broadbent²⁰ starts off with this paragraph:

In the early part of the 19th century a number of people were impressed by the importance as well as by the possibility of a return to the teachings of Scripture, not only in respect of questions of personal salvation and conduct, but also as regards the order and testimony of the churches [emphasis added].²¹

Most recently the ‘Brethren’ have taken note of their own history and ecclesiological views in a symposium, Understanding the Church,²² and another symposium, New Horizons in Mission.²³

Durnbaugh (Dunker, or Church of the Brethren) asserts of these English Brethren, ‘they were the most rigorously consistent in their primitivism, the most evangelistic, and have certainly had the most influence upon modern life of all these [nineteenth-century British Restorationist] bodies.’

Time fails to sketch their history. They have always worked quietly; never promoting their ‘non-organization’ (the term seems correct), yet missionaries of these Brethren have served inostentaciously but effectively in about every corner of the planet up to now. Many of them make a point of keeping no lists, rolls or statistics, but informed sources indicate there are about 500,000 Brethren in Britain, Germany, America, Canada, New Zealand, Belgium and the Netherlands.²⁴

Two incidents illustrate why they almost defy identification to most people. I once asked Walter Liefeld (a ‘P.B.’) when we were fellow teachers at a seminary, ‘How do you choose elders in your assemblies?’ He paused, pursed his lips, then cautiously answered only this much, ‘My elder may not be the same man as your elder.’ Again, in a two-weeks tour group were a middle-aged farm couple, members of an ‘assembly’ in a rural Iowa town. The husband simply could not explain what church ‘denomination’ they were a part of. If he knew the term ‘Plymouth Brethren’ he would not use it. The Lutherans, Baptists and Presbyterians in our party could not figure them out, though obviously devout, godly church people. When I interposed a brief, friendly explanation the brother seemed much pleased, but I think it was the first time he had ever heard his own ‘denomination’ explained.

Another personal contribution: the brother who preached to us in the small community, pioneer church (central Washington state) was publicly only identified as Mr Elder from ‘the assembly’ in Yakima. Yet, when as a college sophomore I attended a Plymouth Brethren ‘Gospel Hall’ the brother who seemed to be in charge invited me to preach at the evening service several times, though not at the morning service where the Lord’s Supper was observed.

These Brethren (at least some of them) seem to teach that the only real, permanent ekklēsia is the universal one, of which every true believer is a member. Whenever believers meet for worship there is an ekklēsia. Wherever a somewhat permanent group of believers meet regularly—even if all are new believers—God has already supplied to that continuing ekklēsia all the gifted people they need to function as a true New Testament church, including ‘pastors and teachers.’ Broadbent emphasizes this over and over. Several ‘members’ (there is no ‘roll’) may preach at a single service and no one is ‘the’ pastor. Reading in recent journals of the Brethren manifests several evidences of a change in thinking. (1) An awareness that pastoral care has been missing because no one knows precisely to whom to go for pastoral care. ‘Pastor’ is a gift and dissociated from the ‘elder,’ as office, not a gift. Are elders pastors or rulers? There is uncertainty. (2) They are coming to draw inferences from the fact their founders were almost all former clergymen trained in theology and disciplined scholars, hence they were able to give form and content to the movement and to lead it. (3) A felt need of trained leadership has brought about some acceptance of the presence of a designated preacher-teacher in the assembly. (4) Regrets over a lost generation or two of young people has led many to wonder if their 'present distress' does not call for drastic change. Not all accept D. L. Norbie's confident affirmation: 'Today throughout the world there are thousands of assemblies where the individuals are fervent, where there is exercise of spiritual gifts [in sufficient power to provide pastoral leadership and care] ... and where the apostolic assembly government is followed in detail.'²⁵

Conclusions and Suggestions

1. The New Testament provides no specific command or teaching providing details of how the Christian ekklēsia should be governed.

2. There is, however, what appears to be a consistent precedent: a polity in which elders, without a single president, rule and deacons serve the congregation.

3. During the second century many assemblies adopted the plan of government by elders who chose a president. Even earlier there were elders who gave much time to teaching the Word and who were at least partially supported by the church. This appears in Paul's letters.

T.M. Lindsay observes, 'During the last decades of the second and throughout the third century ... [almost] every Christian community had at its head a single president who is almost always called the bishop. He presided over the session of elders, over the body of deacons, and over the congregation.'²⁶ Most aspects of the church's life revolved about the local pastor-bishop, as in a Presbyterian congregation when the pastor presides over elders, or a Baptist church where he presides over deacons who 'share in the spiritual oversight' (as very many local constitutions say). There are similarities within the local Episcopal parish in America.

4. Most local church government today is similar to the pattern described above in point 3.

5. No present system precisely reproduces the New Testament pattern—whatever it may have been.

6. The reason is that all our present forms of organization and governance are historically conditioned. We tend to interpret every Scripture passage about rule, pastor, elder, bishop, deacon, deaconess and the like out of our cultural horizon. Read the qualification for elder to a Baptist and it describes for him his pastor, to a Presbyterian, one of the members of the session, to an Episcopalian, one of the clergy who are in charge, to a Roman Catholic, his parish priest.

7. A common form of congregational government among American churches is by a board composed of deacons, trustees, Sunday School superintendent and perhaps some others, presided over perhaps by the pastor, or perhaps by an elected 'moderator.' Of these the only office besides pastor subject to the spiritual qualifications enumerated by Paul in 1 Timothy 3 and Titus 1 is that of the deacon. The trustees may have no spiritual attainments at all, but are esteemed to be capable handlers of money and properties; the moderator may be one esteemed simply to have ability to stand before a body of people with dignity, and so on. He may be a pushy type who has promoted himself successfully. The result in this case is rule by the spiritually incompetent.

Sometimes country church government tends to be somewhat in charge of a strong-minded lady or two who settle important matters on the telephone with calls to other women in the church before the congregational meeting takes place.

8. Hence ideas about church government have tended to reflect ideas current in the time and place (cultural environment) where the church is located. This is true whatever the theory: government of a church in China will reflect the Chineseness reverence for elders and ancestors; a congregational church in a working-class district may have features of government that look like a local unit of a labor union; in an old-fashioned rural district of independent-minded farmers the government will reflect the dead-level democratic feeling of such people—whatever the pastor, the presbytery, the bishop or the district superintendent may think.

9. The mind of the Spirit may be in charge under any of the historical systems—as history demonstrates. Likewise His mind may also be unknown, submerged or overwhelmed in any such system. Correction toward the normal and right is possible where a ‘settled minister’ or pastor of wisdom can lead, and a session, consistory, board of elders (by whatever name)—who meet the qualifications of Titus 1 and 1 Timothy 3—work things out and then present decisions with reasons for them to a well-instructed congregation.

10. These matters will be considered from a somewhat different perspective when we discuss the offices of the church, its ordinances (sacraments) of baptism and the Lord’s Supper, and its worship in following chapters.

¹ D. S. Schaff, ‘Episcopal church,’ Schaff-Horzog Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, Vol ii, p. 746.

² McClintock and Strong, Vol III, art. ‘Episcopacy,’ pp. 262, 263.

³ F. J. A. Hort’s Bampton Lectures, The Christian Ecclesia; J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians; Edwin Hatch’s Bampton Lectures, Organization of Early Christian Churches.

⁴ E. A. Washburn on The Two Epistles to Timothy, trans. of Van Oortzee in Vol. VIII of Lange’s Commentary, 1870, pp. 36, 37.

⁵ See McClintock & Strong, Vol. x, p. 855 and Vol. viii, p. 513.

⁶ Presbyterian Law for the Local church, published by United Presbyterian Church, 6th ed., p. 15.

⁷ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998) on ‘Presbyterian Connectionalism,’ p. 901.

⁸ Book of Church Order of the Presbyterian Church in America, 1976, pp. 40, 41, paras. 26–6 through 26–8.

⁹ ibid.

¹⁰ R. Reymond, op. cit., pp. 896–906.

¹¹ My source is Presbyterian Law for the Local Church, 6th ed., rev. 1960, ed. Eugene Carson Blake, pp. 16–18.

¹² A charitable outlook on denominational differences on church government!

¹³ Rom. 12:16; 1 Cor. 1:10; 2 Cor. 13:11; Eph. 4:3; Phil. 1:27; Phil. 2:2–4; 1 Peter 3:8.

¹⁴ op. cit., 17.1

¹⁵ Comment on epi to auto in Acts 1:15; 2:1, 44, 47.

¹⁶ Advocates of governance by elders, however, might point out that one of the gifts of the Spirit is ‘governments’ (1 Cor. 12:28 asv, ‘administrators,’ rsv) the Greek kubernēseis is derived from kubernaō to steer a ship. Hence kubernēsis, ‘in general, a guiding, directing, government [of a polis, city]’ (Liddell and Scott. Lexicon). So, perhaps the Spirit’s government may be through elders that rule after all (1 Tim. 5:17), with the delegated authority of ‘the whole church.’

Bauer, Arndt, Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

Liddell and A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

¹⁷ Carl Bridenbaugh, Mitre and Scepter, Transatlantic Faiths, Ideas, Personalities, and Politics, 1689–1775 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962).

¹⁸ D. F. Durnbaugh, The Believers’ Church (London: Macmillan, 1970), p. 161.

¹⁹ G. H. Lang, The Churches of God: Their Constitution, Government and Ministry (London: Paternoster, 1959), p. 190.

²⁰ E. H. Broadbent, The Pilgrim Church (London: Pickering and Inglis, 2nd ed., 1935), pp. 347–385.

²¹ ibid., p. 347.

²² Compiled and ed. J. M. Vogl and J. H. Fish III (Neptune, NJ: Loizeau, 1999), 235 pages.

²³ Edited by Farez Marzoni, Union Cristiana Edizioni Bibliche, Casella Postale 45-04022-LT Italy.

²⁴ Durnbaugh cites sources, p. 172 note 37.

²⁵ New Testament Church Organization (Chicago: Letters of Interest. n.d.). p. 73 (Open Plvmouth Brethren).

²⁶ T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries (Minneapolis: The James Family, repr. 1977), p. 204.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (932). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

18

Church Offices and Ministry (I): Preliminary Matters

1. Extraordinary and Ordinary

Theology distinguishes between extraordinary and ordinary officers of the church. The extraordinary are the Apostles, strictly defined, directly empowered by Christ as His ministers plenipotentiary; prophets of the New Testament (possibly also the sub-apostolic era); and evangelists such as Philip, Mark, Timothy and Titus, special missionary agents of Apostles. It is doubtful if the evangelist, mentioned three times in the New Testament—prominently in Ephesians 4—refers to the missionary or evangelist of today.

2. Office, Function, Ministry

It is doubtful if any New Testament Greek word corresponds exactly to a present-day understanding of ‘office.’ Two Greek words are so translated in the kjv: diakonia (Rom. 11:3 once only), praxis (Rom. 12:4 once only). The former is normally rendered service, ministry, ministrations, administration, and the latter deed or work (in the sense of acting). These are words for what people do, not their ‘official’ position. The word which covers all people do in and for the church is diakonia, ministry. There is no term in the Greek New Testament corresponding exactly to our idea and word ‘office.’ As ‘the apostle of the Gentiles,’ said Paul, ‘I magnify mine office’ (Rom. 11:13 kjv); but the newer translations rightly correct office to ministry (diakonia)—again what Paul did, not a position he held.

Nevertheless the New Testament does provide specific qualifications or requirements for being Apostles, elders and deacons and specifies their duties and functions. Prophets and evangelists are also mentioned though no New Testament qualifications are supplied. Also certain honors and prerogatives are mentioned. The Old Testament has much to say about requirements to be a true prophet of God. In modern conception all so designated are ‘officers’ of the church and we shall herein employ the term without defending it further—even though strictly speaking an equivalent term for ‘office’ does not seem to occur in the Greek New Testament. In constructing a doctrine of church office, therefore, ‘the only course ... is to find out what the New Testament teaches respecting persons endowed with particular gifts and discharging the corresponding functions in virtue of which they are set apart and distinguished from others ... distinguished by specific functions.’¹

3. Temporary and Permanent Offices

At this point we should be reminded that the New Testament enumerates ‘functions, and persons exercising them, which no longer obtain in the church of Christ’ (Murray, p. 358). This is the case with Apostles and prophets, upon whom the foundation of the church was laid² (Eph. 2:20), and probably also with the ‘evangelists’ of Ephesians 4:11, for (to repeat) it is doubtful if that word has direct reference to those who now carry out special ‘crusades’ (now ‘missions’), ‘campaigns’ or ‘festivals’ of evangelism. It seems likely that the word euaggelistēs, applied only to Philip (Acts 21:8) and Timothy (2 Tim. 4:5) and said to be a ‘gift’ (Eph. 4:11), also belonged to the epoch of revelation and founding of the church (Murray, Berkhof). They, like Apostles and prophets, were ‘gifts’ to the whole church, even though Timothy did for a time serve as a sort of presiding local elder at Ephesus. In the case of Philip, after he ‘evangelized’ Samaria and, in effect, Ethiopia (Acts 8), he apparently settled down in Caesarea to raise a large family (Acts 21:8).³

We may then join the tradition of Protestant theologians in speaking of the New Testament offices of Apostles, prophets and evangelists as Extraordinary Offices and the offices of elder and deacon as Ordinary Offices, normally present in every local church.⁴

Questions arise as to the number of offices in the apostolic churches. Were all elders also teachers? Were there some teachers who were not elders? Was it required that all elders be ‘apt to teach’? More importantly, was the office of presbyter (elder) only a ruling office or did it imply pastoral work as well? Was one episkopos (bishop), or elder, designated as the president of the college of elders (presbuteroi) already in the churches of Timothy and Titus—apostolic churches? Or was there strictly plural leadership?

4. Biblical Sources

Some of these questions and others will be addressed in the discussions of this chapter. The precise form of the ‘primitive Christian ministry’ was a subject of intense study for several decades beginning in the mid-nineteenth century. The nineteenth-century discovery of the ad 100 (plus or minus) Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles stimulated renewed attention to previously known pieces of Christian writing (Epistles of Ignatius, Shepherd of Hermas, Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians and others) coming from earliest times. As noted in the previous chapter we know that by about ad 175 there was usually a bishop in each local ekklēsia, a college of elders and a college of deacons—a threefold ministry. Most now agree that there were only two offices—elders (also called presbyters and pastors) and deacons—in the first century. Literary evidence is still lacking as to how the change came. Jerome (fourth century) made the bold and startling assertion, that though diocesan bishops were by then in charge everywhere, that bishops and elders were originally the same.⁵

It is a fact now generally (though not unanimously) recognized by theologians of all shades of opinion, that in the language of the New Testament the same office in the church is called indifferently ‘bishop’ (episkopos) and ‘elder,’ or ‘presbyter’ (presbyteros).⁶

Respected evangelical scholars who are convinced there were three offices in the time covered by the New Testament (to ad 95) argue as follows.⁷

(1) ‘It is certain that the church had officers who discharged functions not discharged by ordinary Christians ... [hence] a distinction ... between clergy and laity.’ First Thessalonians, probably the first book of the New Testament to be written, distinguishes three functions ‘exercised by a few with regard to the many’—[1] ‘them which labor among you,’ [2] ‘and are over you in the Lord,’ [3] ‘and admonish you’ whom the believers were told to ‘esteem ... very highly in love for their work’s sake’ (1 Thess 5:12, 13 kjv).

(2) Late in the New Testament era, 3 John 9, the incident about Diotrophes, ‘seems to show that [there was] not only ecclesiastical government but ecclesiastical government by a single official.’

(3) In-between 1 Thessalonians and 3 John, Hebrews 13:17 exhorts, ‘Obey your leaders and submit to them.’

(4) First Clement, from about the last decade of the first century, seems to describe the same situation. Further in 1 Clement, ‘three things come out very clearly.’ [1] There is ‘a clear distinction between clergy and laity.’ [2] ‘This distinction is not temporary agreement but is the basis of a permanent organization.’ [3] A person who has been duly promoted to the ranks of the clergy as a presbyter or bishop (the two titles being here synonymous, as in the Epistle to Titus) holds that position for life. Unless he is guilty of some serious offense, to depose him is no light sin.

(5) To these three ‘certainties’ may be added the following. [1] There is a regularly organized clergy with gradation of rank. [2] ‘Each local church is constitutionally governed by one chief officer ... who received the title of bishop.’ [3] ‘There is no trace of belief or even suspicion, that the constitution of these local churches had ever been anything else.’ In the time of, say, ad 180–200 ‘Christians were fully persuaded that the episcopal [without dioceses] form of government had prevailed ... from the Apostles’ time to their own.’ They were as convinced of this as that there were only four authentic Gospels.

The Pastoral Epistles became very important in the restoration of the churches of Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Church reforms of offices and ministry received their first boost in England during the short reign (1547–1553) of the pious boy known to history as Edward VI. During this period (1548) Calvin wrote his commentary on the Epistles to Timothy. Reformed people on the continent had high hope for reform of the church in England. Calvin, therefore, dedicated the commentary to Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, guardian and regent for the boy king. In a few lines of the dedication Calvin showed how important the Pastorals were then thought to be to decent church order:

Now since in order to restore the English church, which ... had been miserably corrupted by the shocking wickedness of Popery, you employ your strenuous efforts under the direction of your king, and for that purpose have many Timothys under your charge, neither they nor you can direct your holy translations in a more profitable manner than by taking the rule laid down by Paul for your pattern. For there is nothing in them that is not highly applicable to our times, and hardly anything that is necessary in the building of the church that may not likewise be drawn from them.⁸

Then, referring to the Commentary, Calvin added, ‘I trust that my labour will, at least, afford some assistance.’

In employing the Pastoral Epistles as authoritative guidance for a doctrine of church offices, a serious matter of interpretation sometimes arises in unexpected ways. To whom do the charges to Timothy apply?⁹

As long as ordination sermons have been preached and charges to ordinands have been given the charges of Paul to Timothy as a public person have been read as charges to pastors rather than to a board of elders or of deacons on the one hand or to Timothy alone as apostolic legate or archetypal diocesan bishop. Context shows which charges were intended to be strictly personal—e.g. ‘Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me’ (2 Tim 4:9 kjv); ‘Let no one despise you for your youth’ (1 Tim. 4:12)—though there are applications to pastors and people in each text. My memory is green of the moment when a solemn, white-haired minister took me by the right hand, looked me straight in the eye and recited, ‘Take thou authority in the church of God ... preach the word,’ etc. (see 2 Tim. 4:1–5). It happened at my ordination many years ago but it still rings in my ears.

We are not without guidance in this matter from the author himself in 1 Timothy 3:14 and 15. The author says he may or may not soon get back to Ephesus where Timothy is standing in for him; but if delayed, ‘I write so that you will know how one ought to conduct himself in the household of God ... the pillar and support of truth’ (v. 15 nasb). The marginal reading—‘how one ought to conduct himself’—agrees with the King James Version: ‘how thou oughtest to behave thyself.’ The Greek form of the verb for ‘conduct yourself’ is an infinitive and is amenable to either rendering. The niv has, ‘how people ought to conduct themselves.’ A literal rendering would be like the kjv—‘I write in order that thou [second person singular] may know how it is necessary [dei, strong necessity] in the house of God to behave one’s self.’ Behave one’s self is a reflexive present participle. The ‘people’ of niv is not in the Greek text at all.

Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, Beza and most commentators to the present have understood Paul to be instructing ‘thee’ (Gr. soi dat. sing.), that is, Timothy, pastor and overseer of the ekklēsia at Ephesus. Paul in 1 and 2 Timothy is telling that timid leader how he ought to behave in the ekklēsia. Calvin is representative: ‘By this mode of expression he commends the weight and dignity of the office; because pastors may be regarded as stewards, to whom God has committed the charge of governing his house.’¹⁰ This includes specific charges (like 2 Tim. 4:1 ff.) and rules for elders, deacons, which Paul directed Timothy to pass on to the ekklēsia. I think older Versions and interpreters are correct and the new Versions very mistaken. If we accept the new translations (how ‘people,’ niv, ‘ought to behave in the church,’ etc. or how ‘one,’ rsv, etc.), the force of the thought of the Pastorals (1 and 2 Tim. especially) as specifically about the pastoral office is thereby weakened though not destroyed.

How thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God (kjv), then, applies to Timothy in particular. ‘The explanatory soi [Gr. to thee] has this degree of weight’ (Van Oosterzie, en loc, Lange’s Commentary) though ‘the expression has a general sense also’ (ibid.). The infinitival verb ‘anastrephesthai [to behave one’s self] means not Christian life in general, but the life of the Christian officer, which belongs to Timothy and his fellow-episcopoi [overseers]. The scene ... of this [behavior] is the Christian community at Ephesus and elsewhere' (ibid.). On this understanding of the whole Pastoral corpus the rest of this chapter proceeds.

'[I]n the household of God, which is the church of the living God, a pillar and buttress of truth' (1 Tim. 3:15): relates the behavior of church officers, described in the Pastorals, both to the local church which Timothy served, and in the church as a whole (catholic). Locally, at Ephesus, for the 'living God' is a contrast with the heathen worship of the famous statue of Diana at Ephesus.¹¹

The grand language, 'pillar and foundation of truth,' indicates the whole church in the world, the only realm on earth where 'the truth' as opposed to 'truths' of every sort is preserved and propagated. (Jesus Himself is 'the truth,' John 14:16.) This is one of the several passages in the New Testament where reference to church catholic and church local cannot be sharply distinguished.

5. The Relation of Offices to Spiritual Gifts

The 'gifts' of special abilities to members of the local ekklēsia (1 Cor. 12:4–11, 27, 28 and Rom. 12:3–8) and 'offices' of the local church are not exactly the same, but neither are they unrelated. Among those gifts are 'helping' (antilēmpseis), and 'administrators' (kubernēseis) (1 Cor. 12:28 rsv). The first word, 'helping' refers to helping others, works of mercy which elsewhere in the New Testament are done for the body corporate by 'the seven' of Acts 6, deacons, deaconesses and widows. The second word referred originally to steering a ship, but in common use later to 'guiding, directing, government,'¹² and is often translated 'rule.' The cognate kubernētēs is rendered 'the pilot' (of a ship, Acts 27:11 niv) and 'captain' (of a ship, Rev. 18:17 niv). This certainly is a gift necessary for the office of elder as set forth in the Pastorals at length.¹³

It bears repetition that though the Apostles, prophets and evangelists of Ephesians 4:11 are no longer with us, the pastor-teachers are. Important to this discussion is that the pastor-teachers are men whom Christ at the time of His Ascension 'gave' to the church down through all its history. The Pastorals connect the office of elder-bishop with the 'gift' of pastor-teacher. Hence, as we shall see, pastoral authority does not flow entirely from the church which chooses the pastor as their leader. His appointment is from Christ, 'he [Christ Himself (autos)] gave' (Eph. 4:11).

Further, in the Ephesian passage, the pastor-teacher is a gift to the whole church. This suggests that men who hold the pastoral office, though they have authority in only one local ekklēsia at a time, may be accepted as pastors anywhere in the diaspora as Peter describes the whole church in the world (1 Peter 1:1). This is indeed the way matters have stood throughout church history. This group is a gift to the whole church. We can't get along very long without them.

Scholars have noted that in the list of gifts in 1 Corinthians 12:28 Paul thinks of 'teachers' as persons God gave to 'the church' (universal) along with apostles and prophets and enumerates teachers as 'thirdly.' 'After this' (epeita) indicates a separation from the ability-gifts following. The inference has been drawn (rightly it seems to me) that some teachers have a catholic (whole-church-in-the-world) function, if not office. Throughout church history, there have been itinerant teachers (didaskaloi) who traveled about from church to church. The didachē and other early Christian literature refer to these men with approval and appreciation. T. M. Lindsay points out that these men were not necessarily the pastor-teacher, but ‘wise men and scribes’, whom Jesus promised (Matt. 23:34), and that Paul was emphasizing their presence at Romans 12:7 and 1 Corinthians 12:28. They were very important to the catholicity of the church’s doctrine, for they were itinerants and traveled from church to church, being honored and heeded.¹⁴

It is evident, at least when we get beyond the apostolic period, that many gifted men, whose services were appreciated, went from church to church teaching and preaching, and that without any pretension to the prophetic gift. Justin Martyr and Tatian, well known apologists of the second century, were wandering teachers of this kind.¹⁵

There was a time in living memory, before mothers came home at day’s end from working somewhere else, and the members of our churches became so over-scheduled that there is no time to attend meetings such as ‘Bible Conferences,’ when traveling teachers had a very great influence for good. I myself was guided toward the pastoral ministry by such men and engaged in such ministry up until the present disinterest set in. We now use recorded (CD, cassette) lectures of assorted types for various local church settings.

There have also been teachers (examples: Augustine, Anselm, Aquinas, Calvin, Luther, Owen, Gill, Watson, Baxter) whose shadows lengthen on to the present hour. These teachers have been given to the whole church. There have been hundreds of scholarly and saintly men who in their time may or may not have held a presbyter’s office in a local church but who shaped orthodox, evangelical theology enduringly far and wide for the whole church, the pillar and ground of truth. There might not have been an enduring church except for this kind of teaching of the whole church. In the sense we use ‘office’ in ecclesiology there are only two church offices—elder or bishop and deacon. There are, however, several special ‘ministries’ which will call for some attention here.

The Office of Elder

Elders Among Ancient People

The Greek word presbuteros (Eng. presbyter, elder) meant either an aged person or a ruling officer in some unit of society. Equivalent words exist in every language of antiquity related to the Bible—indeed in most languages to the present. Elders were important civic and religious figures in Israel of the Old Testament period and on to Jesus’ time. Günther Bernkamm has provided a very complete survey and discussion from beginning in Israel and in the church to the time of Hippolytus (ad 170–236).¹⁶

A College With President?

In the preceding chapter we set forth the view that the churches of the New Testament were governed by a college of elders, of whom some labored in ‘the word and doctrine’ and some did not. We repeat here that all elders should be ‘apt to teach’ at least their own families. Deacons do not share in government except as members of the assembly. They are not required to be teachers (1 Tim. 3:8–10). As pointed out, it is certain that in Ignatius’ time (the end of the first century) in many churches, one elder was chairman of the college of elders. It is possible that the arrangement began in apostolic times. By the late second century only the presiding elder of the local college of elders was called bishop (episcopos, overseer). This bishop had authority only in his own local congregation, though it should be borne in mind that likely all the congregations in a city and immediate area were one church. The New Testament reflects such an arrangement (Rom. 1:7 and chap. 16; Phil. 1:1; and the address of Christ to seven cities in the Roman province of Asia in Rev. 2–3). This arrangement has been pretty much standard throughout Christendom outside papal and episcopal denominations and to a degree in even those denominations to the present. Groups such as the (Plymouth) Brethren, who have thought of themselves as having no single person as overseer or pastor, have implicitly in practice had the same structure. (See the preceding chapter.) This development seems almost inevitable, as history shows. ‘Everybody’s business is nobody’s business.’ ‘Who’s in charge here?’

Special Duties of Church Elders

Duties As Indicated by Names

The several names assigned this office say much.

(1) From time immemorial elders in civil society have had representative capacity as legislators and judges. They do not always do much outside their collective work in conferring with one another on matters brought before them. Such apparently was the case with elders in Israel from Egypt onward.

(2) Bishop, Greek episcopos, meaning overseer (Anglo-Saxon), supervisor (Latin), plainly suggests the man in charge, who sees that things get done. Once Jesus is called ‘Bishop of your souls’ (1 Peter 2:25 kjv).

(3) Pastor is another defining name. Peter, as a presbyter himself, wrote that presbyters should ‘tend the flock of God’ (1 Peter 5:1, 2 asv). When Paul called the Ephesian elders (presbuterous, Acts 20:17) to meet him at Miletus he exhorted them to ‘Pay careful attention to ... all the flock [poimniō], of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers [episkopous], to care for [poimainein, take to pasture] the church [ekklēsia] of God, which he obtained with his own blood’ (Acts 20:28).

This makes plain that the elder is a pastor, a form of the Greek word for shepherd. In the Greek Version of Psalm 23:1 shepherd is a form of this same word. Hence we know that ‘pastor’ is a very important name for this office, derived from Scripture. Of the four gifts of the ascended Christ ‘For the perfecting of the saints’ the shepherd (pastor)-teacher is the only one still in the church today (Eph. 4:11, 12 kjv), as we have frequently noted.

Having myself grown up on a ranch where I herded sheep I recommend what Robert Reymond well says, ‘I have often thought that pastors would benefit greatly from reading some books on what sheep are like, what their needs are, and what is involved in feeding them.’¹⁷

There are false shepherds who seek to harm the flock (Jude 12). Perhaps they do less damage in aggregate than lazy shepherds!

(4) Paul addressed pastor Timothy as a man of God (1 Tim. 5:11) (an honor shared with the prophet Daniel).

(5) He also called Timothy a minister of Christ (1 Tim. 4:6).

Presbyter, Supervisor, Minister, Pastor, Man of God are all biblical designations of this office in the church. What are the duties of such men? Many of the duties are defined by the names. As presbyters they are to weigh affairs of church administration with wisdom, as overseers to tend to details of operation or see to it that someone else does so. There are many different models of how elders can truly ‘oversee’ in modern churches. As pastor the elder’s chief task as indicated by ‘pastor-teacher’ in Ephesians 4:11 and to ‘Feed the flock of God’ (1 Peter 5:1, 2 kjv) is to instruct the church. As ministers of Christ they serve as He served, not themselves but Christ, as present in His people. ‘In as much as ye did it unto these, ye did it unto me.’ As men of God (1 Tim. 6:11), elders are to measure up to the qualifications of office set forth in passages under the next heading, ‘being examples to the flock’ (1 Peter 5:3 kjv).

Duties as Indicated by Commands and Exhortations

Thinking specifically of the whole college of elders seen in Acts and the Pastorals, 1 Thessalonians 5:12, 13 sets forth three ways in which elders ministered in a Pauline church. ‘But we request of you, brethren, that you appreciate those who diligently labor among you, and have charge over you in the Lord and give you instruction, and that you esteem them very highly in love because of their work’ (1 Thess. 5:12, 13 nasb, emphasis added).

1. The elders ‘diligently labor’ (1 Thess. 5:12 nasb) among the assembly; ‘diligently labor’ (kopiaō) means to work hard and it can be ‘physical, mental or spiritual to the point of weariness’ (Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Lexicon). A. Strauch devotes a whole chapter to discuss elders as ‘hard working men.’¹⁸

2. Elders ‘have charge over’ the ekklēsia; in the language of 1 Thessalonians 5:12 (nasb), ‘are over you’ (niv). The Greek word is proistamēnoi. In the Second Vision of the Shepherd of Hermas, about ad 160,¹⁹ the author refers to ‘the presbyters who preside over the ekklēsia’ (hoi presbuteroi hoi proistamēnoi tēs ekklēsias). The word for ‘over you’ or ‘have charge over’ is the same in Hermas as in 1 Thessalonians 5:12.²⁰ So evidently for the first 100 years of the church, elders were in charge of the church’s meetings and superintended their public affairs.

3. They ‘give you instruction’ (nasb). The kjv ‘admonish’ is closer to the Greek noutheteo, frequently rendered warn, something different from teaching, for Colossians 1:28 speaks of warning (noutheteō) and teaching. There is a negative quality. It has a sharp edge, something which the self-assertive and super-democratic atmosphere of our times pastors scarcely dare to do today (see 2 Tim. 4:2, ‘reprove, rebuke, and exhort’).

4. According to Hebrews 13:17 the same elders ‘watch over your souls’ and are accountable to God to do it well. It is implicit that they also watch against harm to the flock by insiders or outsiders who teach false doctrine or seduce morals (Acts 20:17, 28–31). This suggests prayer for the flock as well as attention to the ‘souls’ of members of every time of life, including the aged and children. James clearly says ‘elders,’ not ‘the elder,’ may be called upon to pray for the sick (James 5:14).

5. ‘Let him call for the elders of the church’ (James 5:14) suggests the proper procedure in observance of the rites and ordinances of the church and its worship. ‘This ... does not imply any exclusive authority in the elder. All believers are priests and can therefore lead in such matters if the need should arise. But since God is a God of order, and He has ordained the office of the eldership, the presiding function should be committed to the elders in all ordinary cases where that is possible. The church, however, is never dependent upon any official clerical class in its functions. The church is always greater than any office it creates.’

These remarks by A. J. McClain in lectures I attended as a student echo the thinking of the founders of the churches of the sixteenth-century Reformation. Luther’s views are to be found summarized with full documentation from Luther’s writings by P. Althouse.²¹ Calvin had much to say about the validity of a special ministry of presbyter, bishop, pastor, minister, but also said, ‘[I]t is clear that every member of the church is charged with the responsibility of public edification according to the measure of [God’s] grace, provided he perform it decently and in order.’²² Like Luther he based this teaching on the universal priesthood of believers.

Gradual Development of the Office

The New Testament writings come from different stages in the development of the New Testament church. The above sources cited for duties of elders (1 Thess. and James) are probably from about the end of the sixth decade of the first century, Hebrews possibly before ad 64. Acts, cited for the origin of the offices of deacon and elder, describes very early government of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6 onward). If the angels (or messengers) of the seven churches in Revelation 2 and 3 were elder-pastors or ‘ministers’ of those churches, they reflect a situation at the very end of the apostolic age—according to late dating of Revelation. It is reasonable to assume that there was some development during that time. What prevailed in the Jerusalem church in the forties or even Antioch in the fifties or Ephesus in the sixties were not quite the same and certainly not the same as thirty years later when Revelation was written on a prison island and Clement of Rome wrote his famous epistle to the Corinthians. L. Berkhof has very helpful suggestions on this subject from which this paragraph has profited.²³

In the early days at Jerusalem there was no place for the ‘pastors-and-teachers’ of Ephesians 4:11 because Apostles, prophets and evangelists were their ministers. By the time (before ad 46) of the visit of Barnabas and Saul, bearing financial assistance from Antioch, the Jerusalem church had elders (Acts 11:30) who administered the aid but most likely neither governed nor taught since the Apostles, prophets and evangelists were still there. They may have ‘ruled’ the church in the sense of conducting its business. Their work at that time seems to overlap that of deacons. With the passing of time the teaching of doctrines came to be the particular duty of elders who were teachers, hence ‘pastors’ in the sense used by 1 Peter 5:1, 2. There were elders, 1 Timothy 5:17 tells us, who specialized in ‘word and doctrine’ and were to receive monetary support (v. 18). Near the close of Paul’s life (perhaps ad 67) he directed the creation of schools for the training of ministers for teaching of the doctrines Paul had disseminated in the church at Ephesus (2 Tim. 2:2). He thereby created a class of official teachers of the church as well as teachers of teachers which surely meant they were among those elders we meet in Titus and 1 and 2 Timothy.

Forces Working for Change

Already in late apostolic times there were present other forces which gradually in the next century brought about the development of the college of presbyters with a president to whom later the title episcopos (bishop) was reserved. T. M. Lindsay in a justly praised magisterial work reported four suggestions of scholars as to what those forces were.

The first was that rising temptations from multiplying heresies and trials from persecution ‘probably’ led to the feeling that resistance to both would be strengthened by a more thorough unity. ‘One man can take a firmer grip on things.... What is the business of many is often the work of none.’²⁴

Secondly, he cites W. M. Ramsay,²⁵ who proposed that the ‘overseer = presbyter’ who did his work well would likely become permanent in that work. ‘The elder who had oversight’ of ‘correspondence with other ... churches and the reception and entertainment of delegates [which was a feature of ekklēsia already in New Testament times] ... naturally became a very important man ... thus gradually one of the ... elders came to stand forth as the episcopos par excellence’ (Lindsay, pp. 207, 208).

Thirdly, he highlights Justin Martyr,²⁶ who describes a typical weekly meeting for worship. At this service there was a ‘president who verbally instructs’ and who at the time of distribution of the elements of the communion (Eucharist) ‘offers prayers and thanksgivings.’²⁷ ‘This man,’ says Lindsay,²⁸ ‘is clearly the anticipation of the later [local] bishop.’²⁹

Fourthly, ‘[T]he need for one authority in doctrinal matters led to the selection of one man, and to placing on him the responsibility of seeing that the members of the congregation were not tempted away from the true faith by irresponsible teachers, who offered themselves to instruct the community.’³⁰

To these suggested causes for the prevalence of the office of a single ‘pastor’ or ‘bishop,’ in the sense that we find it in writings of second and third centuries and generally up till Nicea, I add some possible reasons why the development, if it was a development, took place.

1. Timothy himself was the pastor with unique authority in the Ephesian church. True, this was in part because he was a special emissary of an Apostle there. Yet the church through history has regarded instructions to him in his public capacity as instruction for all pastors. It is doubtful if after he ceased to serve there (he left at least briefly to be with Paul in his last days, 2 Tim. 4) there was no successor in his office. There evidently was no such person at Philippi as yet at about the same time but, if I am correct, a precedent had been set which became widely accepted before long.

2. There seems to be no express biblical reason why each elder should have an equal share of authority in plural eldership. It is within the power of any local congregation to designate one elder as leader, the pastor, or the senior pastor, as has become the fashion, and the others to ‘assist him in spiritual oversight of the church.’

3. There is an irresistible impulse in every group to desire and to have a chief officer of some sort. This existed in ancient Israel before King Saul when elders ruled. True, it was a ‘natural’ impulse, not a godly consensus that asked for a king for a C.E.O., but they already had such an officer of a different kind, Samuel by name, and before him a variegated succession of ‘judges.’ Does history furnish clear proof of exception to this state of affairs?³¹

4. Groups such as the Plymouth Brethren, and Little Flock of China, at first desired to have no local chief officer, preacher or pastor. They seemed to be unconscious of the fact that even at early stages of development they had just such local leaders, whose names we know. Among these 'Brethren' were Darby, Mueller, Groves, B.W. Newton and many more; among the 'Little Flock' Watchman Nee himself and several others. This was pointed out in a research paper presented to me in 1970 by a student in my class at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School.³² Among the many assemblies of the Brethren today a local single-man-preacher-overseer, with a college of elders, exists. There has been 'felt need,' that is to say, an 'impulse' for change. 'Open Brethren' in a recent international consultation gave recognition to this 'new' arrangement.

5. The New Testament does not say how many elders a church should have. It is common for seminal churches to exist for awhile, as in Crete (Titus 1:5), without any elders. Paul directed Titus to 'appoint elders in every town'—not every church. Does this mean that the groups of Christians in these towns were not full-fledged churches? Evidently so. Some churches in every time may have only one male adult member. I have served as interim pastor where there was not a single person who met the qualifications for eldership set forth in Titus 1 and 1 Timothy 3.³³

- ¹ John Murray, Collected Writings, Vol. II (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), p. 357.
- ² See chapter 6, above. ‘Foundation for the church.’
- ³ J. Massie, ‘Evangelist,’ Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. I, pp. 795–797.
- ⁴ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 585; H. Harvey, The Church: Its Polity and Ordinances (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1879), pp. 66, 69.
- ⁵ W. A. Jürgens, ed. and trans., The Faith of the Early Fathers, 3 vols. (Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1979), Vol. II, p. 194.
- ⁶ J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians, 4th ed., repr. ed. (New York: Macmillan and Co., 1894), p. 95.
- ⁷ This has been condensed from Alfred Plummer’s treatment of The Pastoral Epistles in An Exposition of the Bible, Vol. vi, Hartford, Conn.: 1908, pp. 412–416.
- ⁸ Calvin, Commentary on the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, English trans. 1866, the ‘Dedication,’ p. xi. See Wulfert DeGreef, The Writings of John Calvin, trans. L. D. Bierma (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1993), p. 97.
- ⁹ I came in to visit an adult Bible class in a church I recently served—a class taught by rotation among five or six members of the class. On this day they were trying to figure out how to apply 1 Timothy 4:11 ff. (‘Command and teach these things,’ etc.) to themselves and no one seemed to know. They should have taken a cue from ‘let no one despise you for your youth’ (v. 12). I spoke up and pointed out that 1 Timothy is primarily a private letter to an ‘interim pastor’ about his duties in that capacity and that the text should tell them what to expect of a good pastor rather than of a Bible class of farmers, business men, their wives and the high school teacher who was presiding that Sunday morning. There were scattered exclamations of ‘Oh!’ Everyone seemed relieved that each was not obliged to command and exhort and teach doctrine as well as to read.
- ¹⁰ Calvin, The Epistles to Timothy, Titus and Philemon (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1856), p. 89.
- ¹¹ ‘Ecclesia Dei viventis opponitur fano Dianae Ephesiorum Vita Dei, fundamentum spei nostrae’ (‘the church of the living God is in contrast to the sanctuary of Diana of the Ephesians’). ‘The Life of God, the foundation of our hope,’ J. A. Bengel, Novi Testamenti, 3rd Latin ed., Vol. II (Tuebingen, 1850), p. 354.
- ¹² Liddell and Scott, Lexicon.
- ¹³ How this particular Greek word migrated into computer jargon as ‘cybernetics,’ I would like to know.

- ¹⁴ T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, repr. (Minneapolis: The James Family, 1977), pp. 103–109.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 105.
- ¹⁶ Günter Bernkamm, TDNT, Vol. vi, pp. 651–683.
- ¹⁷ Robert Reymond, Systematic Theology (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998), p. 898.
- ^{Bauer, Arndt} Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.
- ¹⁸ Alexander Strauch, Biblical Eldership (Littleton, CO: Lewis & Roth, 1988), pp. 101–110
- ¹⁹ Visions of the Pastor of Hermas II. 4, 1 ANF, Vol. II, p. 12.
- ²⁰ Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Lexicon sub proistemi, p. 714.
- ²¹ P. Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz, 1966, ‘The Office of the Ministry,’ pp. 323–328. See also F. Pieper’s comments, ‘The Relation of the Public Ministry to the Spiritual Priesthood of All Christians,’ in Francis Pieper, Systematic Theology (St Louis: Concordia Publishing, 1950), pp. 440–443.
- ²² Calvin, Institutes, IV. I.12 and note 22.
- ²³ L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology, p. 586.
- ²⁴ Lindsay, op. cit., pp. 206–207.
- ²⁵ W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 5th ed. (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1893), p. 307 ff.
- ²⁶ Justin Martyr, Apology I, p. 67.
- ²⁷ I am citing ANF, Vol. I, pp. 185, 186.
- ²⁸ Lindsay, op. cit., p. 208.
- ²⁹ To which I add, a rather plain picture of Protestant pastors of every denomination from 1517 onward.
- ³⁰ Lindsay, op. cit., pp. 209, 210. Though T. M. Lindsay wrote almost a hundred years ago, he wrote after historical and biblical scholars of high competence had thoroughly investigated the evidence recovered from antiquity and summarized it.

³¹ Shophet, the Hebrew word translated ‘judge,’ and dun [doon] refer to rule, governance, not simply rendering judicial decision.

³² The Concept of Pastor in Brethren Thought by O. Rex Major. Dr Major has recently put in my hands new literature of the Brethren and a tape of Ken Fleming’s address at an international conclave of Brethren church leaders at Rome in 1996 and a book, New Horizons in Mission, which contains the papers read at that gathering. The address by Ken Fleming reports that presently there are ‘Four Types of Leadership’ (New Horizons, p. 134) among ‘Open Brethren.’ There is acceptance of government by a board of elders of which one is a salaried full-time ‘pastoral worker’ (New Horizons, p. 135).

³³ Very early in my ministry as a pastor I became intensely interested in a biblical ‘job description’ of my duties as a pastor, because I had come to the conviction that simply to preside over the local consensus, in a denomination where rather uninformed American rural traditions prevailed, was not the right thing to do. My duties as a pastor, stated clearly in ordination vows, were not matched with adequate support from a college of mature, qualified elders and deacons elected to be my support. The church board consisting of all the chief elected officers—including deacons and deaconesses—rarely if ever came up to the biblical standards either for deacons or elders, certainly not to be episcopoi (overseers) and presbuteroi (mature judges).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (941). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

19

Church Offices and Ministry (II)

Choice, Installation, Term of Service of Elders

1. The office may be sought by any ‘man.’ ‘[I]f any man aspires to the office of overseer [bishop], it is a fine work he desires to do’ (1 Tim. 3:1 nasb). If we may paraphrase what follows immediately, ‘All right, but these are the stiff requirements’ (vv. 2–7). ‘Aspire’ implies ‘diligently seek’ (Heb. 11:6 kjv). This encourages a young man who aspires to pastoral ministry to present himself to his church and to ask the church’s direction in educational preparation, or for a mature, prepared man to submit an application, as is common.

2. The precedent set by Paul’s instruction to Titus (1:5) and the actions he and Barnabas took at Lystra, Iconium and Antioch (Acts 14:21–23) in appointing elders (perhaps by securing elections in each church) suggests that the initiative may come from the church itself, the missionary who established the congregation, or even the congregation or mission organization who sponsored the missionary. This also is common in both denominational and independent missions.

3. In the case of established churches, in any case, the church itself should do its best to be sure that the candidate meets the qualifications. At this point the custom arises of having ministers—recognized as such by other churches and groups—share in examining the candidate for ordination.

4. Mutual recognition of ‘ordained’ ministers is both a fact and a necessity. Official lists formed by ministerial associations, presbyteries, dioceses and the like may or may not be involved. Baptists in general, for example, recognize Methodist or Presbyterian ‘ordination’ and the converse is true. In congregational government the ordaining church cannot legislate for another, nor can a conference or denominational authority legislate for the church. Baptist and Congregationalist custom is to call for examination of the candidate’s fitness, usually by a committee of pastors, or pastors and laymen of neighboring churches invited by the ordaining church. Then ministers of other churches should share in the act of ordination if the ordination is to be recognized in those churches. There are various denominational ways of securing this approval.

5. The usual way of choosing an elder is by vote of the congregation. We know ‘the whole multitude’ chose the ‘seven’—usually regarded as deacons (Acts 6:1–6 kjv). If deacons should be elected by the congregation where they serve, certainly elders should be also. As noted earlier, the Greek word translated ‘appointed’ or ‘ordained’ in Titus 1:5 and Acts 14:23 in usage came to mean to designate, by whatever method, but originally probably to elect by show of hands. It seems not inconsistent with Luke’s and Paul’s language to assume that newly planted churches might initially have an elder, or elders, appointed by some sponsoring church agency or missionary founder(s).¹

Nothing is said in Scripture about length of term of the office. ‘Apostles’ were a gift to the universal church for the lifetime of the bearer of the office. Why then should not ‘pastors and teachers’ also be such for their lifetimes? This can be said: up until recent times (when society has become very mobile) pastors frequently held office in the same local church for life.² Ambrose was bishop (pastor) of Milan for twenty-three years—till his death in ad 397 at about fifty-seven years of age. In 1720, at the age of about twenty-three, John Gill became pastor at Horsleydown, near London, and remained there as pastor till his death fifty-one years later. Augustine remained bishop of Hippo from the moment the people seized him at a regular worship service and elected him to succeed the aged and not very competent Valerius. He remained at his post to the end of his life thirty-five years later.

Of course an ordained minister is pastor of a church only if installed after accepting a proper invitation. If for any reason he leaves that position, by custom he retains the title of ‘elder’ or ‘pastor’ and in the denominational group is regarded as an elder without office and without authority in any congregation until invited and installed again—not unlike military titles and titles of office in legislatures and the judicial system of most countries.

Not everyone who has one of the spiritual gifts suitable for public ministry is installed as an elder or other official person in a church. All, of course, should and many do exercise their ‘gift’ to the limit, without let or hindrance as long as they do not claim officially to represent a local church. Many modern missionary enterprises, for example, are staffed largely by unordained but highly trained people—Campus Crusade, Wycliffe Translators and New Tribes Mission are examples. Would Bill Bright have been more effective as facilitator and promoter of campus evangelism if he had been recruited at a theological seminary and ordained by a Presbyterian or Baptist church instead of moving from the world of business into a tremendously important evangelistic missionary movement? Not likely. I suspect the intelligent and pious farmer's wife, teacher of the class of adolescent boys and girls in my home church, and who first pointed me toward a lifetime in ordained ministry, might have been spoiled by three years in a seminary followed by formal ordination!

The Authority of Elders, Pastors and Teachers

As set forth above in chapter 12, 'The Gifts of Christ to the Church' (Eph. 4:7–17), the pastor-teacher (along with Apostles, prophets and evangelists at the first age of the church) is a person given to the church. He performs his work locally, but receives his authority from Christ for the building up of the church. His authority to teach the local assembly is a 'given,' as we say in mathematics and logic, which the churches are bound to recognize and accept if they elevate him to the office. The assembly is exhorted to weigh his worthiness and competence carefully (1 Tim. 3:1–10; Titus 1:5–11) and instructed to provide adequate material support for him and his family as far as they are able (1 Tim. 5:17, 18; Gal. 6:6–8).

We have seen that pastoral authority proceeds from Christ, not a church. A church which calls a man to be their pastor is not obligated to install any particular candidate for the office of pastor-teacher. Though they should check the prospective minister's doctrinal beliefs against their received doctrine, and both against Scripture, the people of a church should not ordinarily attempt to tell their pastor how and what to preach. The wise pastor, on the other hand will adjust his teaching, his manners and strategy to meet his people where they are as he brings them where they ought to be, being careful to separate his own cultural-familial baggage from the faith once for all delivered.

Spiritual authority of pastors, as both a 'gift' of the ascended Christ to the church (Eph. 4:7 ff.), and as one to whom authority has been delegated by a church, was considered seriously by the Reformers. Luther saw the two sources clearly, but thought that times, customs and circumstances rightly could affect the form of church government and the offices.³ His views spread widely through his writings and have been worked out by Paul Althaus⁴ and Francis Pieper.⁵ Calvin also saw the two sources of ecclesiastical power. His understanding of the form of government, the number of offices, and their powers, was modified somewhat, as he revised his writings, though to the end he sought to discover biblical precedents and directives. During his 'exile' at Strasburg he learned much about church order from Bucer. The ultimate source of authority, whether of pastors, teachers or the 'lay' ekklēsia, is from Christ, drawn from Scripture, through the local church's election, and by the Holy Spirit: about the same as Luther's views.⁶ I recommend Calvin's summary of his own views as both ponderable and wholesome.

I approve only those human constitutions which are founded upon God's authority, drawn from Scripture, and, therefore, wholly divine.... I mean that the Lord in his sacred oracles faithfully embraced and clearly expressed both the whole sum of true righteousness, and all aspects of the worship of his majesty ... therefore, in these matters the Master alone is to be heard. But because he did not will in outward discipline and ceremonies to prescribe in detail what we ought to do (because he foresaw that this depended upon the state of the times, and he did not esteem one form suitable for all ages) [emphasis added], here we must take refuge in those general rules which he has given, that whatever the necessity of the church will require for order and decorum should be tested against these. Lastly, because he has taught nothing specifically, and because these things are not necessary to salvation, and for the upbuilding of the church these things ought to be variously accommodated to the customs of each nation and age, it will be fitting (as the advantage of the church will require) to change and abrogate traditional practices and to establish new ones ... not rashly.... But love will best judge.⁷

There is a small measure of truth in the common pronouncement of speakers at seminars that authority of office and respect for office must be earned. This certainly is true for retention of authority and respect. Under the church's biblical constitution, the church at Ephesus has 'tested those who call themselves apostles and are not, and found them to be false' (Rev. 2:2) and we all are to 'test the spirits' of those who claim to be spokesmen for God (1 John 4:1 ff.; see also Acts 20:28 ff.; 2 Cor. 11:10–15). Yet, he who deliberately challenges a faithful pastor's right to do his job, solemnly conferred at his ordination, and accepted at his installation, has much to answer for in the last day.

Dignity, Responsibilities, Rewards of Elders

As to dignity: Jesus, Himself, is 'Shepherd [pastor] and Bishop [overseer] of your souls' (1 Peter 2:25 kjv). Peter, leader of the Apostles, referred to himself in addressing elders as a 'fellow elder' (1 Peter 5:1) and John similarly (2 John 2). Church members are exhorted to recognize the dignity of the office and therefore of holders of this office.⁸

As to responsibilities: an elder is a 'steward of God' (Titus 1:7 kjv). Stewards work under the shadow of the coming of the Lord, when account must be given (1 Cor. 4:1–5) and when they shall each receive appropriate praise or blame. One should be cautious therefore in seeking or accepting this office in the church.

As to compensations: the New Testament has much to say of rewards for each Christian as a steward of all God has provided, but special promises of rewards for good stewards of the 'manifold grace of God' (1 Peter 4:10 kjv), for elders as well as every 'Paul or Apollos or Cephas' (1 Cor. 3:21–23; 4:1–5). In all these passages the subject is the public ministers of the gospel and shepherds of the flock of God. Peter sets up a doctrine of a special 'unfading crown of glory' as reward for faithful pastors and how to earn it—not as money-grabbers or attention-seekers but as humble and cheerful examples to the 'charge allotted' to them (1 Peter 5:1–4).⁹

Qualifications for the Office of Elder or Bishop

Elder designates office or position in a local church; bishop (overseer) designates function, what an elder is supposed to do. Hence qualifications for office must be defined as corresponding to the duties of office. Let it be repeated that functions and duties more than position are involved in New Testament terms for what we have come to call 'office.' No Greek word for 'office' is ever in the New Testament used to designate an elder or deacon and only once of an Apostle (hupēretēs, 1 Cor. 4:1) where it is rendered 'minister(a)' in kjv, 'servant(a)' in esv.

As far as the New Testament is concerned, we qualify for church membership by repenting of our sins and confessing Christ as Lord in Christian baptism. We thereby set out on the journey toward perfection. The candidate for eldership must have demonstrated to the church a high degree of attainment on that journey, as set forth in 1 Timothy 3:1–7; Titus 1:5–9; and, by inference, in 1 Peter 5:1–4. Commenting on these passages a revered authority says:

In taking a general view of ministerial qualifications ... if the ministry is a spiritual work a corresponding spiritual character seems to be required in its administrators.... The Scripture justly insists that ministers should be ‘holy’—in a peculiar sense men of God.¹⁰

Titus 1:5–9 relates that Titus was left behind by Paul, at the end of some unreported mission of evangelism in Crete, to organize churches there, appointing elders in each ‘city.’ It would have taken Titus an extended period of time. The newly formed Christian groups had only recently escaped the moral ravages of an admittedly extraordinarily corrupt society (Titus 1:12, 13). Yet Titus was instructed to appoint as an elder only a man who ‘hold[s] firm to the trustworthy word as taught, so that he may be able to give instruction in sound doctrine and also to rebuke those who contradict it’ (Titus 1:9). The new elder must be ‘able to teach’ (1 Tim. 3:2) and ‘not be a recent convert’ (1 Tim. 3:6). Furthermore he was to ‘Lay hands hastily on no man’ (1 Tim. 5:22 asv), that is, take time to review the man’s record and character. At least a cursory acquaintance with Christian doctrinal and ethical standards plus maturity are biblical requirements for this office. Titus must have toured the Island of Crete systematically to produce such a corps of church elders—parallel in every particular with the situation in the recent mission fields of the past two centuries.

Thus the existence of a valid ministry of pastors and teachers cannot be apart from some program of education for ‘the ministry’—under whatever cultural, political and physical situations exist where the churches are located. Churches would therefore seem to have a right in lands like our own to require educational preparation for a candidate for the ministry. Further it seems proper that students aspiring for ministry should be subject to proof of moral competence before admission to schools for ministers. Where possible their churches should aid them financially on their long way to election, ordination and installation. A newly appointed young pastor should not be hobbled with heavy debts incurred in many years of post-high school studies.

Many of the moral qualifications and traits of leadership can be developed by the proper kind of education. For example, the fine sermons my family hear from week to week are by a middle-aged pastor who had to receive special education to overcome stammering. Not all elders are pastors. More are simply local church leaders (in some churches called ‘ruling elders’). A. R. Hay writes, ‘Let us note what is not required of an Elder. It is not stated that he must have the gift of preaching.’ First Timothy 5:17 is cited.¹¹

I leave for other venues a full discussion of the qualifications set forth in the texts at the head of this section. Commentaries treat them fully.

At the present time enormous changes are taking place among the churches in regard to ‘the ministry’ and the pastorate. That there should be no ‘ordained’ pastors at all is a vague idea circulating along with conflict over ordination of women and even of practicing homosexuals. I have been called upon to teach pastoral theology several times of late. My preparations have made me acquainted with some interesting literature of the subject—old and new. Thomas Oden—as is his fashion and unique contribution—supplies thirty-four pages of bibliography of the subject from the earliest Fathers to the present.¹² Richard J. Neuhaus, while still a Lutheran minister, wrote a book which, as supplementary reading, shook up my class of anti-liturgical but very conservative evangelicals with arguments from an historic liturgical outlook.¹³ If, however, the same logic-chopping, Scripture-wresting hermeneutics Oden uses in his chapter, ‘Women in the Pastoral Office,’ had been the norm through the rest of his book it would be useless for instruction of evangelical pastors. From the perspective of the Plymouth Brethren, Alexander Strauch provides a cogent, scholarly ‘Urgent Call to Restore Biblical church Leadership’ in Biblical Eldership.¹⁴ Strauch makes good use of the best scholarly research. Geoffrey Bromiley treats Christian ministry with due regard for scriptural norms and historical perspectives.¹⁵ Special mention should be made of two chapters: ‘Theology as Aptitude’ and ‘The Attainment of Theological Aptitude’ by F. Pieper;¹⁶ *The Christian Ministry*¹⁷ and *The Reformed [regenerated] Pastor*¹⁸ are classics every pastor should know. Any Baptist seeking an older Baptist authority for government of the local church by a plurality of elders should read The Church by H. Harvey¹⁹

The Office of Deacon

It is hard to say how the custom arose among Baptists and similar groups of Protestant believers of making the diaconate a ‘ruling office’—in other words, to make them elders in fact. Innumerable local church constitutions have a line which says ‘the deacons shall assist the pastor in spiritual oversight of the church.’ Unhappily, A. H. Strong, (outstanding and very competent) defends that arrangement in the face of all the historical evidence (especially the Didachē) coming to light in his time (Hatch, Harnak, Lindsay, et al) and contrary results of biblical studies (J. B. Lightfoot, Commentary on Philippians). Harm is mitigated if the deacons chosen truly meet the requirements of 1 Timothy 3:8–13; yet there is distortion of the pastoral office when the descriptions of the elder’s office are applied to the pastor only and thereby the pastor is expected to wield all the authority of the elder’s office and perform all the tasks. This has led to prevalent congregational anarchy in many churches of our time as well as to pastoral dictatorship in others. It helps explain Strong’s rueful comment that ‘Every pastor is a potential pope.’

A Baptist contemporary of Strong, Professor H. Harvey of the Baptist seminary at Hamilton, New York—very competently, from the evidence of Scripture, history and archaeology—was demonstrating that the church of the New Testament and of antiquity, at least till Nicea (325), was ruled by a college of local elders, a true presbytery, with their pastor (or pastor-teacher), now called the bishop, and that deacons performed what he called ‘secular duties.’²⁰ Harvey discovered and explained how Baptists had abandoned the primitive ruling presbytery. He notes:

The earlier Baptist confessions of faith—those of 1643 and 1689—recognize the plural eldership. The discipline adopted by the Philadelphia Association in 1743 presents it in the modified form of a ruling eldership, in which form it still exists in the English churches.²¹

Then after noting the change to ‘spiritual oversight’ by pastor and deacons he says of government of elders:

There is serious reason to doubt whether an institution which rests on what seems the uniform example of the apostles can rightfully be set aside; as also whether, in the absence of such a guiding and conserving body within it, our church organization is not essentially weakened, alike in the purity and power of its church-life and in the wisdom and steadiness of its evangelizing efforts.²²

He goes on to say that ruling elders are adapted to provide continuity ‘in worship and ordinances amidst pastoral changes.’²³ The present writer can attest from both happy and painful experiences that the matter is precisely as Harvey says.

The qualifications for serving in the deacon’s office are set forth only in one passage—1 Timothy 3:8–13. If we regard the Seven of Acts 6:1–6 as deacons then we are instructed that deacons do not occupy themselves with ‘the word of God and prayer’ but ‘serve tables’ and take charge of the needy members such as ‘widows.’ Further, at verse 11 of 1 Timothy 3, in the midst of a paragraph apparently wholly relating to the diaconate, Paul says, ‘Women must likewise be dignified, not malicious gossips, but temperate, faithful in all things’ (asb). If intended to refer to Christian women in general, the sentence is extraneous to the subject of the paragraph. The Greek gunaikas (acc. plu of gunē), apart from context, would be translated simply ‘women’; in context it cannot easily be so understood. So the nasb margin comments ‘either deacons’ wives or deaconesses.’ This is moot in theological literature. For several reasons I, with many, assert that Paul is referring to female servants (deaconesses) of the church.

1. The qualifications both for elders and deacons in 1 Timothy 3 include ‘husband of one wife’ (3:2, 12) but say nothing about elders’ wives as such. Why should this be brought up in the case of deacons if not in the case of elders?

2. Paul, who just previously had said ‘I do not permit a woman to teach or to exercise [or usurp, kjv] authority over a man’ (1 Tim. 2:12), would have had no reason not to include females in the deacon’s office, where many of the duties require the sensibilities and abilities which most women have more than men do.

3. There is elsewhere a reference to a female servant (or deaconess)—‘I commend to you our sister Phoebe, a servant of the church at Cenchreae’ (Rom. 16:1). Sister is the feminine form of the word for brother; servant is the word in 1 Timothy 3:8 rendered deacon, in accusative singular form here either masculine or feminine. Hence it would be fully justified to translate diakonon, in Romans 16:1, as deaconess. It is therefore possible that ‘gunaikas,’ women (1 Tim. 3:11), should be understood as referring to ‘female-deacons,’ or better deaconesses.

4. The mention of ‘husband of one wife’ (v. 12) after gunaikos in verse 11 as a kind of separate entry indicates that the subject is not the same in each case.

5. Among the earliest parts of Apostolic Constitutions, the ‘deaconess’ (hē diakonos) appears as one who, after deacons, should be honored.²⁴ Says Beyer, whatever construction we place on the reference to Phoebe (Rom. 16:1) and ‘women’ in 1 Timothy 3:11, ‘It is indisputable ... that an order of deaconesses did quickly arise in the church.’²⁵

Here again all passages relating to the organization, government and officers of the New Testament ekklēsia relate to a system (probably not in fixed form) already in operation. No passage describes or prescribes the system. We are a bit like curious neighbors looking in on a party at a neighbor's house. We learn much in parts and pieces but the whole escapes us. For this reason it behooves theologians to be modest in making pronouncements in this area of the doctrine of the church.

¹ Per contra, as we have earlier noted, some restorationists insist that God plants in every new ekklēsia all the gifts necessary to be a fully operating ekklēsia immediately.

² My seven-times great-grandfather Culver. I discovered recently, helped found the first Baptist church in Connecticut in the year 1709. A visit to that church's cemetery near Old Mystic discovered a monument to three successive generations of Wightmans who successively led that congregation as pastors for 120 years—pastorates of forty years each.

³ Francois Wendel, Calvin 'Sacraments' trans. P. Mairet (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), p. 302, note 24.

⁴ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1966), pp. 312–318.

⁵ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, Vol. III (St Louis: Concordia Publishing, 1950) pp. 439–462.

⁶ See Institutes IV.8.8–11 and all of IV.I–II, IV.10.30 and especially IV.3. 1–9. The last should be required reading for every church constitution committee!

⁷ Calvin, Institutes, IV. 10.30.

⁸ 1 Thess. 5:12, 13; Heb. 13:7, 17, 24; Gal. 6:6, 7; et al.

⁹ Material and financial support of pastors and missionaries is discussed in the next chapter.

¹⁰ Charles Bridges, The Christian Ministry (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1830, 1976), p. 26.

¹¹ A. R. Hay, The New Testament Order for Church and Missionary (256 Oak St, Audubon NJ: New Testament Missionary Union, n.d.), p. 237.

¹² Thomas Oden, Pastoral Theology (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983).

¹³ R. J. Neuhaus, Freedom for Ministry (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984).

¹⁴ Alexander Strauch, Biblical Leadership (Littleton, CO: Lewis & Roth, 1988).

¹⁵ George Bromiley, The Christian Ministry (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960).

¹⁶ Systematic Theology I, pp. 46–51, 186–190.

¹⁷ Charles Bridges, Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1830, 1976.

¹⁸ Richard Baxter, Carlisle, PA: Banner of Truth Trust, 1656, 1979.

¹⁹ H. Harvey, The Church (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1879), p. 74 ff.

²⁰ ibid., pp. 66–104.

²¹ ibid., p. 76.

²² ibid., p. 77.

²³ op. cit., p. 77.

²⁴ The Apostolic Constitutions II.26, ANF VII, p. 388.

²⁵ ‘Diakonos’ TDNT, II, p. 93.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (950). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

20

Church Discipline

Positive discipline of Christian believers by instruction and nurture was a major reason for the very existence of local New Testament churches. Discipline as action to correct wrong behavior was a lesser but important concern. The latter stands out in all records of the church in the first three centuries—a time when the church endured the pervasive tug of heathenism’s morals and manners, but in vital struggle against that tug and tow. The purity of the lives of the Christians impressed their pagan neighbours and, in the opinion of scholars—favorable to Christianity and unfavorable, ancient and modern—was one strong factor in winning multitudes for Christ in the centuries leading up to the legalization of Christianity.

Leaders of the sixteenth-century Reformation clearly saw restoration of church discipline as a sine qua non for raising the level of morality among their people, likewise good order in the churches as a means to well-ordered individual Christian lives. Though they distinguished imputed righteousness (justification) from sanctification (personal holiness) they knew that the two stand together, not in opposition. Luther was very concerned to correct the morals of the German people and was himself a model of balanced behavior—as he saw it from his somewhat acculturated perspective. As the evangelical movement gained strength, forces of history, which cannot be separated from divine providence, placed what Krauth called *The Conservative Reformation*¹ under partial control of the various civil governments of Germany and Scandinavia. Thereby the church lost power to do as much as its best leaders wished to do in calling professed Christians to account for bad behavior. This began rather early in Luther’s career as a Reformer.

Calvin's leadership was always directed toward improvement of moral life of the church—often, as in his Geneva—limited by the inability of the church completely to act without interference from the civil authorities. Calvin was forced to leave his pastoral charge at Geneva and the city for three years because, in part, of government meddling in control of access to the Lord's Supper. After refinement of views during his stay 'in exile' at Strasbourg he returned as convinced as ever of the need for church discipline. He felt 'whatever might produce disorder in the church and be a scandal to its members thus reflected upon and affronted Christ' (Wendel, p. 298). Hence, he thought, 'discipline is indispensable if a church has any desire to preserve its character as the church of Christ' (Wendel, p. 299). Neither Calvin nor the Calvinist wing of the Reformation has thought discipline to be of the essence of the church but as necessary for its well-being—not the esse but the bene esse.

The Reformation folk who came to be called Anabaptists rather fiercely defended the integrity of the local church by severe ecclesiastical discipline of members.

As for early American churches, examination of congregational records reveals intense concern about the moral life of members and their scandal-free reputation among neighbors. This is evident in congregational records—Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational—less so among Anglicans.²

Discipline such as the church of the first centuries practiced did not arise first in the 'churches' (à la Troeltsch) but in the 'sects'—the unity of the Brethren, Anabaptists, Quakers, Baptists, Separatist Puritans. Donald F. Durnbaugh remarks:

It is known that the Reformed tradition added to the marks the church maintained by the Lutherans—the word truly proclaimed and the sacraments truly administered—the mark of discipline. John Knox ... likened the exercise of church discipline to the quarantine of a disease.... A somewhat different attitude was expressed by the Anabaptists, who saw the practice of discipline as a means of restoration of the wayward brother.³

Durnbaugh has a superb section on 'church discipline' (pp 220–225). A church is of course a place where justified sinners meet en route to entire sanctification, not having yet attained it. There is no place in a biblically constituted assembly for the hopeless statement of the United Church of Canada:

Like most of the larger Protestant churches it follows a middle way.... It makes little attempt ... to discriminate between true believer and nominal Christian.... The church, like the children of Israel, is a mixed multitude (Exod. 12:38).⁴

Discipline, of course, is related to the noun disciple—one who learns. To repeat: positive discipline as teaching and nurture (Acts 2:42 ff.) is a major reason for the very existence of local churches. Discipline as measures taken to correct wrong behavior is a lesser, but important concern. The latter is necessary to the former.

Duty to Discipline

The New Testament enjoins corrective discipline as a solemn duty of the local church with strong language in five books, in at least seven passages.⁵ Elders figure prominently in the Matthew passage and Timothy (the pastor in the last reference), but the other five are addressed to the congregations. It is everyone's duty to act.⁶

The language in each passage is severe, insisting that some kinds of behavior cannot be tolerated in a Christian assembly and commanding that the church as such take notice of it and take due action to eliminate it. To carry out these commands is always disagreeable. Even where procedures are defined by church constitutions and bylaws or a denominational Book of Order, discipline tends to be neglected so long as it fails its biblically intended purposes and even sets the members to quarreling amongst themselves. Pastors who run away from facing their duty in this regard simply run into more trouble farther along.

The Necessity of Discipline

The word urgency might be more appropriate today than necessity, for contemporary congregations are doing little to reintroduce serious church discipline. Considering our Lord's words both of threat for neglect of discipline and praise for attending to it (Rev. 2–3), the urgent tone of Daniel E. Wray is justified:

Today, the church faces a moral crisis.... Her failure to take a strong stance against evil (even in her own midst), and her tendency to be more concerned about what is right, has robbed the church of biblical integrity and power ... the church has sometimes erred in this matter of discipline, but today, the problem is one of outright neglect.⁷

When a congregation moves with biblically informed procedures and with right motives—‘doing nothing from partiality’ (1 Tim. 5:21; James 3:17), and ‘without respect of persons’ (1 Peter 1:17 kjv; James 2:1, 3, 9)—good results may be expected. When we offer conversion to Christ with no cost of discipleship we offer cheap grace—a travesty on ‘pure religion and undefiled,’ however large a crowd of shallow professors of religion may regularly assemble for stated services. The severities of discipline are necessary for:

1. The purity of the church where the impure conduct arises. Paul rebuked the evident ‘glorying’ of the Corinth church over their tolerance of a fornicator among their members (1 Cor. 6:2, 6). His rebuke took the form of a simple similitude where the church is compared to a lump of dough wholly leavened by a tiny amount of yeast (leaven). Continuing the figure, he urged discipline: ‘Cleanse out the old leaven that you may be a new lump’ (1 Cor. 5:7).

2. The personal salvation of the disciplined member. Discipline is applied in order ‘that he may be ashamed’ (2 Thess. 3:14) and ‘that his spirit [that of the disciplined man] may be saved in the day of the Lord’ (1 Cor. 5:5; see 3:15).

Discipline of flagrant sins of immorality among church members in the form of rebuke, correction, and even severance from the church (excommunication) and shunning is present or implied on about every page of the two Epistles to the Corinthians. Paul's entreaties become mixed with threats near the end of the second letter. He informs them he is about to visit them to set things straight. He fears he will find ‘quarreling, jealousy, anger, hostility, slander, gossip, conceit, and disorder’ (2 Cor. 12:20). And he rather expects to be affronted by ‘impurity, sexual sin and debauchery’ (2 Cor. 12:21 niv). If these fears are justified, he warns, ‘On my return I will not spare those who sinned earlier’ (2

Cor. 13:2 niv). In other words, Paul will hold court and bring up to date any discipline neglected by the church and its leaders between his second and third visits (2 Cor. 13:1).

We today are not threatened by a personal scolding and visitation by an outraged apostle but we shall be held to account of our stewardship in respect to apostolic—that is scriptural-discipline of the sins of wicked talk (2 Cor. 12:20 above) and sinful acts (2 Cor. 12:21 above).

Offenses that Call for Discipline

What are the offenses which call for disciplinary action by church officers and people? Most of them fall into three categories in the passages cited above.

1. Two (Matt. 18:15–17 and 1 Cor. 6:5–6) relate to difficulties between members. In the one case the offense is a ‘trespass,’ kjv (‘sins,’ rsv), of one brother against another (Matt. 18:15)—not simply a disagreement, but a real wrong, as calling of witnesses (Matt. 18:16) implies and the language of verse 15 requires. The other case is one of disagreement between two members about some moot matter.

2. A second kind of offense is simple failure to conform to reasonable standards of social behavior in any society, such as living off the generosity of other believers instead of working for a living (2 Thess. 3:6–14). This particular offense is also mentioned and severely condemned in non-biblical early church literature (the Didache. 5).⁸ The church is to be no haven for trashy people who will not work.

3. Gross sins and crimes against any high standard of morality such as incest, fornication, greed (covetousness), idolatry, corrupt speech, drunkenness, robbery—some subject to civil penalties—are to be judged in the church by the church (1 Cor. 5:1–13; 2 Cor. 12:21).

4. There are oblique references to other types of cases with which Paul and others dealt in unique ways. He speaks of two men (Hymenaeus and Alexander) who have renounced good conscience and whom he had delivered to Satan, ‘that they may learn not to blaspheme’ (1 Tim. 1:20). Paul denounces one who likely is one of the same men—a certain Alexander the coppersmith who did Paul ‘great harm,’ adding that ‘the Lord will repay him according to his deeds ... he strongly opposed our message’ (2 Tim. 4:14, 15).

These men appear to have been associated somehow with the congregation at Ephesus. In some unspecified way, in opposing Paul’s message, they ‘blasphemed,’ i.e. spoke against the dignity of truth or against God Himself. These offenses were not simply bad thoughts but public scorn of the truth of the Word of God and personal attacks against the integrity of Paul the messenger. Many pastors have suffered from such outrages. Paul does not demand that the church at Ephesus come to his defense but he pointedly called it to the pastor’s (Timothy’s) attention.

5. Foolish troublemaking is another type of offense calling for disciplinary action by the congregation. The people who behave this way are misguided fools who must not divert the church from the ‘good ... excellent and profitable’ to the ‘unprofitable ... worthless’ and divisive (Titus 3:8–11). They must be compelled to keep quiet (v. 10).

6. Purveyors of false doctrines are to be dealt with harshly. The entire Epistle of Jude in vivid language, unparalleled elsewhere in the New Testament, makes the point.

Procedures in Discipline

1. Where applicable, each Christian has a duty to his brother to call the offender's attention to his offense and lovingly seek change for the better. This is to say, notice and report of offending behavior or a wrong state of affairs should begin with someone who is suffering from the bad behavior or noticing the wrong. This, of course, can lead to tattling and other childish acts which are in themselves wrong. If the accuser is required to face the accused then there will be a few frivolous charges. Yet, as all 'whistle blowers' know, a degree of courage is required to initiate investigative and corrective action of a social group. 'Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one ... lest thou [singular number] also be tempted' (Gal. 6:1 kjv). '[G]o and tell him his fault between thee [singular] and him alone' (Matt. 18:15 kjv).

Some contend that the aggrieved person is obliged to start this proceeding and 'becomes an offender if he fails to do so.' Harvey cites Leviticus 19:17, 'Thou shalt not in any wise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him.'⁹ This is very difficult to do, but where carried out in love has great possibility of success. 'Faithful are the wounds of a friend; profuse are the kisses of an enemy' (Prov. 27:6). 'Oil and perfume make the heart glad, and the sweetness of a friend comes from his earnest counsel' (Prov. 27:9).

2. When personal attempts at correcting a brother fail one has not completed responsibility, for the Lord went on to say, 'if he will not hear thee [again singular], then take with thee one or two more. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church' (Matt. 18:16, 17 kjv). This was spoken before a single church had been organized after the usual pattern. Later, such a matter would have been presented to the elders of the church. As in sickness, one calls for prayers of friends and family and then if the illness is life threatening 'Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him' (James 5:14), so in cases where one cannot get a personal wrong righted or knows of grievous behavior, let him present the matter to the elders of the church. Not every congregation has competent elders, nor can every wrong be righted. If the elders cannot solve the problem either they or the complainant should take the matter 'to the church.'

3. The next step is for the church (or the elders, it would seem) to make a careful investigation to establish the facts. If charges are made or serious questions of conduct alleged or suspected, clear proof is necessary. The severe case of 'sexual immorality' at Corinth (1 Cor. 5:1) was apparently already a public scandal that could not be denied. Action, not investigation, was in order. In case of serious charges against an elder (in this case an elderly man or woman, 1 Tim. 5:19), no charge was to be accepted as true, 'except' (ektos ei mē, a very strong adversative connective) 'on the evidence of two or three witnesses,' quoted from Deuteronomy 19:15. This brings to bear the legal requirements of Mosaic civil law. For Paul this provision was of great importance in church courts—for courts they really are. He cites Deuteronomy 19:15 again at 2 Corinthians 9:9 in a specific case. Jesus Himself cited the same law in His only recorded reference to church disputes (Matt. 18:16). Nothing should be received in evidence in a church court that would not stand up in a Mosaic court of law: 'The judges shall inquire diligently, and if the witness is a false witness and has accused his brother falsely, then you shall do to him as he had meant to do to his brother. So you shall [emphasis added] purge the evil from your midst' (Deut. 19:18–19).

4. The evidence must be brought before the whole church acting in official session 'with the power of our Lord Jesus' (1 Cor. 5:4) to declare the 'punishment, which was inflicted of many' (2 Cor. 2:6 kjv). Punishment is to 'deliver ... to Satan' (1 Cor. 5:5 and 1 Tim. 5:20). The realm of Satan is apparently the pagan world ('let him be to you as a Gentile,' Matt. 18:17). Excommunication—cut off from fellowship—is the way this has come to be understood.

5. Repentance and restoration with renewed fellowship is the last stage of successful discipline of erring brethren. Whether 2 Corinthians 2:6–11 refers to the disciplined fornicator of 1 Corinthians 5:1 ff. or not, the procedure of repentance, restoration and renewal set forth there applies.

The church during the centuries of Roman persecution was more than vigorous in applying discipline and stern in providing restoration only after lengthy probation. The Montanist, Novatian and Donatist 'heresies' arose because rigorists opposed restoration without extremely long, extensive probation before even partial restoration. These controversies ran on for centuries. Sad to say, in medieval times a legalistic discipline became a matter of regular private confession to a priest and prescribed formal acts of contrition. There is an enormous literature on the subject.¹⁰

The principle of salvation by grace through faith without works (Rom. 4:4, 5; 11:6) was obscured in almost all patristic thought. After the sub-apostolic age this lamentably happened nowhere more than in discipline. Penance, came to be thought of as a means of merit, the key to salvation, especially in the East. I cite the following for the benefit of contemporary churchmen who may feel 'queezy' about severe church discipline. It is from a letter of Gregory of Neo-Caesarea to another pastor in Pontus (northern Asia Minor) about ad 260. There were four grades of penitents who by five stages attained restoration and admission to the communion: 'the "weepers" ... stand outside the door of the church, beseeching the faithful to intercede for them; the "hearers" are placed in the narthex [vestibule]; the "kneelers" kneel within the nave amid the standing congregation; the "costanders" join normally ... with others except that they cannot take communion.'¹¹ After many years in this graded process the penitent is fully restored and can take communion. This system of public penance spread through Anatolia (now called Asia Minor) and was practiced in parts of the West as late as ad 488.¹²

Biblical discipline calls for excommunication only in severe cases where folk are unreponsive to lesser measures. Paul directed the Thessalonian church to 'keep away from any lazy brother who refused to work and to keep accepted rules' (2 Thess. 3:6), especially the specific instructions 'in this letter' (2 Thess. 3:14 rsv). In 1 Corinthians 5:11 the instruction is to refuse even to eat with a professed Christian who engaged in gross sins. The believers are not to cut such people off from communication—complete social ostracism—for Paul goes on to say, 'Do not regard him as an enemy, but warn him as a brother' (2 Thess. 3:15). With delinquent but not totally alienated folk such treatment effected in a loving way is a powerful instrument for good.

Notes and Cautions Regarding Biblical Discipline in the Church

1. The need arises quickly in a new church if it has been formed of recent converts from the surrounding culture, and very difficult to effect without a substantial core of biblically and doctrinally informed members. This accounts for the severe need at Corinth when the church moved out and away from evangelizing the Jews and God-fearers of the synagogue and began to draw Gentile people, who brought with them into the new fellowship only a partially formed biblical, ethical and world view.¹³ An independent missionary who established a chain of churches across the Island of Hispaniola (Haiti and Dominican Republic) reports in his autobiography that before long he had to preside at the discipline of every single pastor on account of sexual immorality.¹⁴ There are innumerable examples. The same remarks hold true of great influxes of members in mass revivals. In some ways every new convert from the surrounding culture is a new problem of discipline unless he is quickly and thoroughly instructed.

2. Proper discipline cannot take place unless the congregation are both regenerate and instructed to a high degree. If they are not the members will neither understand nor approve of proper action—whether undertaken by deacons, elders, a board or the pastor. The effort will fail. A wise pastor’s strategy will begin with careful instruction in general biblical standards and on the subject of biblical discipline. This will require a long-term, quiet but skillfully conducted program of instruction in Christian conduct and biblical discipline by the pastor and other teachers (see Titus 2:1–15; 2 Tim. 4:1–5).

3. A successful strategy is not to wait until a crisis arises—above all, not to precipitate a crisis until the congregation is ready to do the right thing without disruption of the unity of the church (if possible). We are enjoined to be ‘wise as serpents, harmless as doves,’ and to lead a ‘quiet and peaceable’ life as far as possible. After a pastor has preached on 1 Corinthians, a chapter a week, then likewise the Thessalonian Epistles, discipline will come to be seen as a part of the whole scheme of biblical truth about the beliefs and life of a healthy church. There is then hope of doing the right thing without disruption.

4. There is much else that can be done from the pulpit to head off crises of discipline before they arise. Most children can be convinced that parental discipline is for their own benefit and the same may be said of church discipline if the pastor is supported at all by elders or other acknowledged teachers and leaders.

Consider what these passages prescribe and promise. ‘Till I come [wrote Paul to the pastor at Ephesus], give attendance to [public] reading [of the Scriptures], to exhortation, to doctrine’ (1 Tim. 4:13 kjv). The kjv here translates paraklēsis correctly as exhortation. The sense is to stand beside—literally in private, figuratively from the pulpit—encouraging the people to keep the commands of Christ. Note the connection with Bible-reading and doctrinal instruction. A more severe form of pulpit and pew discipline follows.

‘I did not cease night or day to admonish everyone with tears’ (Acts 20:31, Paul to the elders of Ephesus). ‘[W]e proclaim, warning everyone and teaching everyone’ (Paul, Col. 1:28)—noutheteo (warn) sometimes gets translated ‘admonish,’ as in 2 Thess. 3:15 kjv, ‘admonish him [the delinquent man] as a brother.’ Warnings and admonitions delivered many times by many people besides the pulpit preacher over a long period will have good effect.

‘[R]ebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith’ (Titus, the organizer of the churches of Crete, Titus 1:13). See also 2 Timothy 4:2: ‘in season and out of season; reprove, rebuke.’ In context the latter passage is rightly characterized as preventive discipline.

D. F. Durnbaugh's section on 'Church Discipline' in Free Churches is helpful for churches of any tradition outside the State Churches of the Old World. He tells how discipline has been exercised peacefully and effectively in the past, how it can be done and ought to be done today.¹⁵

John Gill, though not fully in agreement with conclusions in this chapter on church discipline, has an excellent, full treatment from a Baptist perspective, 'Of the Discipline of a Church of Christ.'¹⁶

W. W. Sweet's several works on early American church history, especially Documents of Early American Church History, also entitled Religion on the American Frontier, decisively demonstrate that discipline of members was a major concern of the churches of America in the first generations.¹⁷

¹ The Conservative Reformation and its Theology as represented by the Augsburg Confession and in the History and Literature of the Evangelical Lutheran church (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1875), 840 pages, is still the most thorough polemic for orthodox Lutheranism in America.

² W. W. Sweet, Documents of Early American History and Religion on the American Frontier. Also C. E. Hambrick-Stowe, The Practice of Piety: Puritan Devotional Disciplines in 17th Century New England (Chapel Hill: U. of NC Press, 1982, 1988).

³ Donald F. Durnbaugh, The Believers' Church (New York: Macmillan, 1970), p. 221.

⁴ ibid. pp. 220, 221.

⁵ Matt. 18:15–18; 1 Cor. 5:1–13; 6:1–10; 2 Cor. 2:5–7; 7:8–12; 2 Thess. 3:6–15; 1 Tim. 5:19–24.

⁶ In a parallel way when, after due legal process, someone of the nation of Israel was convicted of the sin of absolute apostasy, it was the duty of the entire community in which he lived to stone him (Deut. 13:10; Lev. 20:2; 24:16).

⁷ Daniel E. Wray, Church Discipline (Carlisle, PA: Banner of Truth Tract, 1978), p. 1.

⁸ 'Let every apostle, when he cometh to you, be received as the Lord; but he shall not abide more than a single day, or if there is need, a second likewise; but if he abide three days he is a false prophet,' Didache. 11, J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (New York: Macmillan, 1898), p. 233.

⁹ H. Harvey, The Church: Its Polity and Ordinances (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publishing Society, 1879), p. 89.

¹⁰ J. T. McNeill, A History of the Cure of Souls (New York: Harper & Row, 1951), Chap. V, 'Discipline and Consolation in the Age of the church Fathers'; K. S. Latourette, A History of Christianity, first ed. (New York: Harper and Brothers., 1953), Chap. VII, 'Admission, Worship and Discipline in the Community,' pp. 193–220.

¹¹ McNeill, p. 96.

¹² McNeill, p. 96.

¹³ See Acts 18:1–11 and compare 1 Corinthians 5 and 6.

¹⁴ Florent D. Toirac, A Pioneer Missionary in the Twentieth Century (Nappanee, IN: Evangel Press, 1988), an autobiography.

¹⁵ Durnbaugh, op. cit., pp. 220–225.

¹⁶ John Gill, A Complete Body of Divinity, Vol. II, repr. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), pp. 607–620.

¹⁷ See also Durnbaugh, pp. 17, 223.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (956). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

21

Public Meetings for Worship in the Church

A timeless characterization, if not definition of public worship, appears in David's psalm at the inauguration of services at the newly set up 'tent' for the recently returned ark (1 Chron. 16:28–30).

Ascribe to the Lord, O families of the peoples, ascribe to the Lord glory and strength!

Ascribe to the Lord the glory due his name;

bring an offering, and come before him!

Worship the Lord in holy array [i.e. proper garments]; tremble before him, all the earth (rsv).

These three couplets are central to a poetic ritual delivered to 'Asaph and his brethren' to employ in public services at the inauguration of the new tent sanctuary. The Mosaic and Davidic ritual forms became defunct when the temple veil was rent, the earth quaked and darkness came over the land as Jesus was dying. Yet the essence and meaning of all public worship of the one true God remain intact, as David the prophet-king set them forth here.

1. Public worship is duty and privilege of all mankind—‘O families [plural] of the peoples’ (v. 28)—not people (singular), and ‘all the earth’ (v. 30). ‘Messianic hopes’ explain this language.¹ The three couplets are partially, for that reason, timeless.
2. Group worship is the subject. The occasion (16:1–6) and plural form of all the imperative verbs so indicate. Similarly, of the central event of church worship, the communion of cup and loaf, and citing 1 Corinthians 10:17, Dom Gregory Dix says, ‘All Eucharistic worship is of necessity and by intention a corporate action—“Do this” ’ (poieite, plural). The blessed bread is broken that it may be shared.’²
3. The Lord (Jehovah, kjv), the God of Revelation, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is the only proper object of worship (Deut. 5:6, 7; 6:4–9; 1 Cor. 8:4–6).
4. Worship is ascribing (Heb. yadah, give, set, place) to God, Himself.
5. Worship is ascribing to God honor (kavodh, weight, heaviness, as the Latin gravitas, dignity, importance, seriousness—Freund-Andrews, Lexicon). This means levity will be absent from our most worshipful moments.
6. Worship is to set on God the importance, honor, weight due to His name (v. 29). As usual in the Old Testament, ‘name’ stands for character and attribute.
7. Worship is accompanied by an offering (Heb. minḥah). This was not a bloody offering for atonement but a grain offering, a gift or tribute. Such offerings will be something of value when they ‘cost’ the offerer something (see Jesus’ comments on ‘the widow’s mite,’ Mark 12:41–43).
8. Worshippers properly ‘come before’ God (v. 29) in public worship with bodies clothed appropriately for the occasion (‘in holy attire,’ v. 29 reb). This would have been special vestments for Asaph and the singers. For us it should be as we think proper to stand before the Supreme Dignity, Creator and Redeemer. Attire will vary with times and culture but special occasions call for special attire.
9. The element of fear, in the usual sense, is not absent in true worship: ‘tremble before him, all the earth’ (v. 30)—‘let us offer to God acceptable worship, with reverence and awe, for our God is a consuming fire’ (Heb. 12:28). It is not abnormal for fear of the consequences of refusing God the ‘glory due his name’ (v. 29) to move one to rise early on Sunday morning!

Worship of the living God is the duty and privilege of every rational being. Ordinary people know in their heart that God exists. And, if God exists, He must be worshipped. The principle appears first in Genesis 4 in the worship of Cain and Abel. The Bible is a book for mankind; it addresses our awareness of God from ‘In the beginning, God created’ (Gen. 1:1) to ‘Amen’ (Rev. 22:21). The normal response of our awareness is in English called worship (contracted from worth-ship). Fallen creatures that we are, we may deny, suppress or pervert our awareness as in atheism, secularism, and various forms of idolatry of the self or of a created object (Rom. 1:18–32). When, however, the Scriptures represent the best example of a pious worshipper, he is not one of the covenant people but a Gentile, God’s ‘servant Job,’ of whom God says ‘that there is none like him on the earth, a blameless and upright man, who fears God and turns away from evil' (Job 1:8 and 1:1). God adds later that 'He still holds fast his integrity' (Job 2:3).

To be one who fears God is the technical language of the Old Testament for a true worshipper of the one true God, and to be a servant of God is to be at God's beck and call. A God-fearing servant is not necessarily someone under the Mosaic covenant or the Abrahamic, for Job is a Gentile and so were all the pious friends who visited him. As God's uniquely exemplary worshipper Job is 'perfect' (tam, complete, mature), 'upright' (yashar, straightforward), he persists in 'integrity' (tummah). This is acknowledged by Job's wife (2:9), by God (2:3) and claimed by Job himself, calling God to witness to it (Job 27:5 and 31:6).

These moral qualities accompanying true worship are ideals in the New Testament as well. See for examples of the same the aged Simeon (Luke 2:25) and Anna (Luke 2:36–38).

Ancient paganisms did not connect eusebeia (piety toward the gods) with moral purity, for the gods, themselves, were conceived to engage in immoral thoughts and deeds. Nevertheless, all the New Testament terms for piety, religion and worship of the true God are from the language of Greek paganism, via the Greek translation of the Old Testament (LXX). This is even true of the words for attitudes of the heart such as fear (Gr. eulabeia, Heb. 12:28) and awe (deos, Heb. 12:28). Worshippers of God are 'devout' (eulabēs), as the aged Simeon (Luke 2:25), the thousands of Jews who came from all the world to observe Pentecost (Acts 2:5) and the men of the first church who bore the martyred Stephen to his burial (Acts 8:2).

Whether called pious, God-fearing or devout, the foregoing characterizes the kind of people to be found in honest Christian public worship in local churches and the general character of biblical worship in any age. These terms per se, however, have only indirect reference to the forms which the worship of the local worship should take. The forms should be friendly to piety, fear of God and devotion. It is not uncommon to read or hear that the New Testament provides no specific guidance to forms of worship. I think otherwise. There is no command such as 'see that you make' all 'after the pattern for them, which is being shown you on the mountain' (Exod. 25:40). Yet examples are found in the New Testament; data are furnished and detailed instructions both general and specific. They are spread throughout. In addition to this, we know of some of the synagogue patterns which the first 5,000 believers, every one a child of the synagogue, carried over into the newly formed ekklēsia.

The Forms of Public Worship in Apostolic Times

1. Group worship follows some agreed-upon 'order' (see 1 Cor. 11:34 kjv) or 'traditions' (1 Cor. 11:2), otherwise disorder, for which another name is chaos, prevails. A problem of order in worship was one of the reasons Paul wrote the first letter to the Corinthians (see all of 1 Cor. 11 and 14). Though free church folk tend to depreciate ritual, for which another word is 'liturgy,' every regular group observance from family meals to the crowning of kings falls quickly into a recurring order of observances. This is quite as much the case with Mennonites and Pentecostalists as with Lutherans and Episcopalians. The order of service may or may not be printed on paper. It may simply be a habit of procedure as it was before mimeograph machines gave us the Sunday bulletin. A few of us still remember.

2. The common good must be served in group worship not individual preference—‘for the common good’ (1 Cor. 12:7 niv). An individual at church may wish to sound off in an unknown tongue a hymn he has composed, a revelation or interpretation he thinks important, but for good order ‘Let all things be done for building up’ of the church (1 Cor. 14:26).

3. Rituals must be vehicles for the expression of true sentiments, thoughts and feelings of common people at worship. They should not be fad-driven. They may be led by ‘experts,’ but the aged and very young, the weak as well as the strong, must be included. Psalm 23 and the Lord’s Prayer have stood the test of time in every kind of public Christian meeting precisely because they met this test.

4. Liturgy—a fixed order—may become so habitual that there is a tendency for form to replace feeling. The Old Testament prophets denounced and bewailed this in their day as Jesus did in His. ‘[H]aving the appearance of godliness, but denying its power’ (2 Tim. 3:5).

5. The form of the liturgy itself is not sacred, though Roman and Eastern Orthodox churches call the Mass (really the liturgy of the Lord’s Supper) ‘the sacred liturgy.’

Within the limits of dignity worthy of the presence of God ... we should be free at any time to set aside or change our stated ritual under the leadership of the Holy Spirit. Table manners, yes; but not the rigid type that stifles the intimate fellowship of the family of God.³

As late as Paul’s last journey to Jerusalem Jewish Christians observed some customs associated with the temple (Acts 20:16; 21:23, 26 ff.), and the first believers made use of the temple courts for fellowship and testimony (Acts 2:46; 3:1 ff.). Yet as W. D. Maxwell, a widely acknowledged Reformed liturgical scholar, says:

The Temple worship left little [permanent] mark upon Christian worship, and this principally for two reasons. First, the great majority of the Jews of the Dispersion had never seen the worship of the Temple, and, even in Palestine the real home of Jewish worship ... was in the synagogues; while to the Gentile Christians the Temple and its worship meant little. Secondly, forty years after the death of our Lord, the Temple was destroyed by the Romans and never rebuilt; the synagogues remained.⁴

To this should be added: the Christians knew that the specific ritual forms associated with the ‘old’ Mosaic covenant were now defunct—as Acts 15 and the whole of Hebrews make plain. There was therefore no inclination among the first generations of Christians to introduce any elaborate permanent rituals, observances, postures and set forms. There had to be forms, of course, but not temple forms where God was conceived as specially present in a building (John 4:24). When Christianity developed the forms we associate with the Roman Mass (what Gregory Dix calls ‘The Liturgy’), some of the forms were drawn from pagan examples with which the then nominally Christian public was familiar and from the architecture, priesthood, actions and paraphernalia described in connection with the Mosaic ritual law and the elaborate functions of Davidic invention described in 2 Samuel, 1 Chronicles and the Psalms. Recent defenders of organs, drums, dance and similar in Christian worship do not quote precedents in Acts or the Pastorals but in the Psalms.⁵

I have already stated that in my view there is no New Testament demand that government of the local church must in every particular exactly mirror the patterns we discover or think we discover in the New Testament. Yet those patterns harmonize with principles which we also must observe. The same is true of the content of worship to a degree. Once we see the Pastorals as addressed to pastors who lead the church, there are significant instructions on the form and content of the churches' public 'worship—i.e. meetings of the ekklēsia as the church of the living God.'

I. A Recurring Weekly Assembly on 'the Lord's Day'

'[L]et us consider how to stir up one another to love and good works, not neglecting to meet together, as is the habit of some' (Heb. 10:24, 25 rsv). 'The Bible attributes the origin of the Sabbath to God's example in creation.'⁶ The custom of every seventh day (Sabbath is Hebrew for a rest) did not occur in any other nation of antiquity. Though in Old Testament law the Sabbath was not a day of assembly but of cessation of labor and family observances, after the destruction of the temple (586 bc) it was natural that devout people used it for group religious observances, that is, the synagogue. The Jewish Christians continued the custom of weekly gathering for religious observances. 'The prayers' (tais proseuchais), to which they gave 'constant attention' (proskaterountes, Acts 2:42), is the word used regularly for group prayer in synagogue meetings. Perhaps they thought of themselves as forming a new synagogue (see Acts 6:9).⁷ Ancient pagans had recurring gatherings in connection with seasonal festivals but no frequent regularly recurring gatherings like the Jewish Sabbath observance. In ancient paganisms a man or woman (or possibly a family) went alone to the shrine of the god with a gift or sacrifice. At the entrance this was presented to a priest who conveyed it to the presence of the image of the deity. To this day some Chinese bring their cooked pork to the local temple on festive occasions and then return home to eat it. We find the first Christians meeting daily (Acts 2:46) but when Paul wrote 1 Corinthians the chief meeting was on 'the first day of every week' (1 Cor. 16:2). John's reference to 'the Lord's day' (Rev. 1:10, kuriakē hēmera, 'a day belong to the Lord') is likely to the first day of the week. The eschatological term, 'the day of the Lord' (hēmera tou kupiou), is quite different in the Greek. In a very thorough treatment Paul Jewett concludes:

In all subsequent Patristic usage the term 'Lord's Day' refers to Sunday, and there is no reason to suppose that Revelation 1:10 is an exception to this rule.... it is hard to conceive how the author of the Apocalypse could look upon his vision as pertaining exclusively to the final 'day of the Lord' in light of the epistolary portion with which the work begins, anchoring it clearly in the historical situation in which he was writing.⁸

George L. Gibson points out how Jewish believers not only took note of the resurrection of the Lord on Sunday but that 'Christ appeared five times to disciples, and after an interval of a week appeared again,' that 'the Pentecost of Christian significance fell on Sunday.' Paul at Troas met those who came together 'On the first day of the week ... to break bread' (Acts 20:7): took collection on 'the first day of every week' (1 Cor. 16:2). He goes on to say that 'the evidence pours in from all sides that Sunday was the main Christian Day for prayer, teaching, and the Lord's Supper.'⁹

II. Public Reading of Scripture

'Till I come, attend to the public reading of scripture' (1 Tim. 4:13 rsv). This was the central feature of the synagogue service. It was followed by an oral translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into the common language of those present (a Targum) and, if someone competent to provide it was present, also by an exposition of the portion read from the prophets. Jesus performed the reading on the occasion described in Luke 4:21 ff. at Nazareth and Paul later at Antioch (Acts 13:15 ff.). Paul charged Pastor Timothy, ‘Until I come, devote yourself to ... reading’ and to be diligent in the matter (1 Tim. 4:13, 15). The only clear verbal picture of a Christian assembly at worship presents a single ‘blessed’ reader before a group who are equally ‘blessed’ in hearing and keeping ‘the words ... written’ and read (Rev. 1:3). At first, when there was as yet no written apostolic literature, recitation of the words of Jesus or of His Apostles by those who ‘heard him’ (Heb. 2:3 kjv) was a feature of the service, but before long, apostolic letters were read as Scripture (Col. 4:16; 2 Peter 3:15, 16; Rev. 1:3). Then came Gospels, Acts and all the rest of a story belonging to the growth of the New Testament canon.

In many modern churches this essential aspect of a complete worship service is scandalously neglected because ‘liturgy’ has crowded it out of the service by what current fancy deems important. The synagogue always read the Law and Prophets. Traditional liturgy, official or only customary for 1,500 years, has included readings from the Psalms, other Old Testament passages, an Epistle and a Gospel—sometimes special reverence for the Gospel-reading marked by the worshippers’ standing. In many ages of the church, the members’ only exposure to Scripture was through the public readings at church worship, for Bibles were scarce and the members illiterate. Nowadays ignorance of Scripture prevails because for many reasons reading of the Bible has simply fallen out of fashion for multitudes of believers—all the more reason for recovering this part of ancient liturgical practice.

III. Designated Leaders

‘I write so that you may know how to conduct yourself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God’ (1 Tim. 3:15 nab margin).

One would have to assume each local church about the Empire had designated people to lead their services. Paul addressed Timothy as one presiding at meetings for worship, charged him as to how he ought to ‘behave thyself’ (kjv)—in the house of God, which is the church. Archippus was evidently the man in charge at Colosse (Col. 4:17). This does not mean that in government of the churches before the second century the threefold system (bishop, elders, deacons) prevailed, but that when churches met in worship there would ordinarily be one of the elders who directed the service. We have little record of the age from the last decade of the first century on to the mid-second century except Pliny’s letter (to Emperor Trajan ad 112), the letter of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (ad 96) and the Didachē (ad 130–140?). None of the three speaks of any single man who regularly presided at meetings of worship. However, as Justin Martyr is ‘writing from Rome some seventy years after the death of St. Paul, we may be sure that the worship he describes is not far removed from Apostolic practice.’¹⁰ At the time of the Lord’s Supper, states Justin: ‘Having ended the prayers we salute one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the president of the brethren bread and a cup,’ and so on.¹¹ Says the editor of the translation: ‘This expression may quite literally be translated, ‘to the one of the brethren who was presiding.’

IV. Corporate Prayers and Praise

‘[T]hey devoted themselves to ... the prayers’ (Acts 2:42). See also 1 Timothy 2:1–8 where the public meeting seems to be Paul’s intention. Heaven’s Praise of God (Rev. 5:9, 10; 7:11, 12) is mirrored in the meeting of the churches.

The Gospels furnish no examples of the Lord leading the group of disciples in prayer or instructing them in the art of group prayers. He frequently prayed alone with the disciples attending or looking on from some distance. John had instructed his disciples in the art of prayer (Luke 11:1). Nevertheless one day, after Jesus had ended a prayer of His own, one of the disciples asked: ‘Lord, teach us [not me] to pray’ (Luke 11:1).

Jesus responded, ‘When you [not ‘thou,’ singular] pray, say: “Our Father,” etc. (Luke 11:1–4; cf. Matt. 6:7–13). In the accounts (you [plural]), us, our, we, etc.) group prayer is assumed. It was a true instinct that for most of the church’s history the principles of this prayer has been used for all true Christian prayer, private or public, and the actual words used as a form to be participated in orally by all believers present in a service of Christian worship. The setting in Matthew 6 is how to pray in the synagogue or other occasion of corporate worship (Matt. 6:1–6).

The prayer which Jesus gave to His disciples is not designed for the individual but for the corporate worship of the community (Matt. 6:9 ff; Luke 11:2 ff). It is a prayer not of an individual but of a people, whose sense of peoplehood is expressed in the plural pronouns ‘our’ and ‘us.’ It is the corporate prayer of a people whose first concern is not for themselves but for the political [in a specially defined sense] leadership of God in the world.¹²

The book of Acts reports that ‘the prayers’ were an essential element in the first worship along with ‘the apostles’ teaching and fellowship’ and ‘the breaking of bread’ (Acts 2:42; cf. 1:14).

The first recorded meeting of a local church for prayer took place when Peter and John were released from detention by the Jerusalem synagogue (Acts 4:23–30). Let us take note of features of that narrative pertinent to prayer as an aspect of worship. There was a special note of urgency not usually present and the meeting was not an ordinary worship service, yet, it is instructive for worship in the koinōnia as assembled for worship.

1. The prayer was public in the sense that the ‘many’ (Acts 13:48; Rom 8:14) believers were present, but private in the sense that only believers were there, all sympathetic with the purposes of the ekklēsia. Peter and John had returned to idios (Gr.), ‘their own company’ (Acts 4:23 kjv). The phrase captures the sense quite exactly. They were by profession and, in fact, genuinely of ‘the fellowship,’ for persecution would have sifted out mere sympathizers and uncommitted converts from bare, rocky or thorny soil (Matt. 13:18–22). The collective church is, as such, most truly itself on such occasions. Some churches of the first centuries came to exclude all except baptized, confessing believers from the chamber where the Eucharist, high point of worship, occurs. Prayer in connection with the Lord’s Supper will be treated further in a following chapter.

2. They addressed their prayers, collectively, directly to ‘God,’ the ‘Lord.’ Though the word ‘Father’ does not appear, He is the ‘God and Father,’ for in this prayer Jesus is the ‘his Christ’ and ‘holy child’ (or servant). There are both the ‘tremendum’ of Isaiah 6 and John 17 and the ‘fascinans’ (to employ R. Otto’s language in The Idea of the Holy). Yet there is also an implicit awareness of Christ’s full deity as anointed and ascended King, as the allusions to Psalm 2 show.

3. The near-complete burden of the prayer is to praise God in His works of creation (Acts 4:24b), revelation (vv. 25–27), providence and decrees (v. 28).

4. Their petitions are few and short, first simply that God would take notice of their plight, secondly that the believers would be enabled to speak ‘your word’ boldly, and that God would act to promote the interests of Jesus and His people with manifest power.

Prayer and praise, corporate and private, is a major theme in the New Testament too large for further development here. Ralph Martin adequately develops the subject, incorporating the findings of twentieth-century scholarly literature.¹³

V. Urgent Preaching

‘Till I come, attend ... to preaching’ (1 Tim 4:13 rsv).

‘[P]reaching’ or ‘exhortation’ (kjv) are the renderings most English Versions give paraklēsis. If there is a word for the Protestant Sunday morning sermon in the New Testament this is it. Like the word sōtēria, salvation, which often has such a very ordinary meaning as rescue from a shipwreck, so ‘ordinary usage ... of parakalein [verbal form] in Acts 28:20 simply means “to call for,” “to summon” in 28:14, “to invite” in 16:39 ... to exhort ... to beseech ... to ask.’¹⁴ But with reference to ‘the New Testament event of salvation’ this word ‘occurs ... for exhortation by the Word proclaimed in the power of the Holy Ghost.... [T]he address does not proceed from the person who seeks help but from one who speaks with almighty power in the name of God. Thus parakalein is used for the wooing proclamation of salvation in the apostolic preaching.’¹⁵

This word is used of missionary preaching (2 Cor. 6:1; 1 Thess. 2:3). ‘We are reminded of Acts 9:31 where the Palestinian community is increased by hē paraklēsei tou hagiou pneumatos [the exhortation of the Holy Ghost].’¹⁶

Parakalein in the sense of urgent preaching is used for Peter’s sermon at Pentecost (Acts 2:40) and John the Baptist’s preaching (Luke 3:18) and teaching (Luke 3:10–14). ‘The same term is used in Hebrews for the “word of exhortation” (13:22) to men of long standing in the faith, though in danger of growing weary.’¹⁷

The preaching (niv, rsv) or exhortation (kjv) Paul had in mind in his charge to pastors (1 Tim. 4:13) is not mere moralizing, for it has reference to Christ’s saving work on the cross and the urgent necessity for the hearers to make decisions on the spot. This quality of urgency in appeal is fully consistent with pastoral comfort and encouragement. Through Barnabas (‘son of consolation’) ‘much people was added unto the Lord’ at Antioch (Acts 11:24 kjv) where this partner with Paul ‘exhorted [parekalei] them all’ (Acts 11:23) and ‘taught a great many people’ (Acts 11:26). Two early ‘prophets’ in the church, Judas and Silas by name (Acts 15:22), imparted ‘consolation,’ and ‘exhorted [parakalēsan] the brethren ... and confirmed them’ (Acts 15:32 kjv). People who can do this are a gift to the church (Rom. 12:8). Not every person who attends a service is articulate enough or sufficiently informed in divine things to give public exhortation.

Among the features of the public services of worship in the ekklēsia the sermon, therefore, is of great importance. During the dark ages of the Western churches of Europe parish priests were so prevalingly ignorant of the Scriptures that the memorized liturgy of the Mass was about all they could produce. The evangelical Reformation restored the Bible to the people and put it again at the center of worship by way of public reading and urgent preaching by a competent preacher.

VI. Offerings

The Lord Himself had much to say about proper stewardship. Present purposes limit our treatment to that subject as related to worship in public meetings of the Christian assembly.

We know from indirect evidence in the Epistles that the believers brought gifts of food to the assemblies. Part of the food was eaten in connection with the agapē or love feast, a meal of fellowship, and in the Eucharist, which accompanied the agapē. The food was deposited outside the room for worship and brought to the room by a deacon (minister) with some ceremony at the appropriate time. We also know from earliest reports that the amounts of food gathered were deliberately in excess of the amount consumed. The overplus was distributed to elders and others whose services to God in the church were rewarded somewhat in this way (Gal. 6:6, 7).

Offerings of money also were brought to the weekly meetings for worship, and to that we direct our attention.

The first churches—and onward for over 150 years—owned no buildings specially dedicated to Christian worship. Nor was there at first a ‘clergy’ whose livings were fully supported by the church, as came to be the case later. Hence New Testament instructions and precedents, though applicable today, are more so in principle than practice.

Paul argued for support of ministers like himself, his party of helpers and ministers of the Word (Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors) everywhere in several ways.

1. Paul argues on principle and Scripture that though he and Barnabas are partially self-supported,¹⁸ it is proper to provide financial support to the ministry (1 Cor. 9:6); ‘If we have sown spiritual things among you, is it too much if we reap material things from you?’ (v. 11). He argues by analogy with the financial support of the Old Testament priests—‘Do you not know that those ... who serve at the altar share in the sacrificial offerings?’ (v. 13). He cites some otherwise unknown saying of Jesus: ‘the Lord commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel’ (v. 14). Perhaps he is thinking of Jesus’ instructions to the twelve apostles on the brink of their first preaching mission (Matt. 10:9–15). Those who are ‘taught the word’ should share their wealth with those who teach—for their own sakes (Gal. 6:6, 7).

2. It is fair to conclude from these passages and 1 Timothy 5:17, 18 that in Paul’s time some local pastors (elders, bishops) were supported in whole or part by their churches. Paul, in other places, sets forth the principle that established churches should raise money to support missionary evangelism and church-planting. In the Philippian Epistle it is clear that the Philippians sent special messengers carrying funds to him as he pioneered the gospel at Thessalonica (Phil. 4:14–19). We know the messenger’s name (Epaphroditus). He gives religious significance to their ‘gifts’ as parallel to Old Testament ‘fragrant offering[s]’ and ‘sacrifice’ acceptable to God (Phil. 4:18).

3. Missionaries and those who were their emissaries and assistants, Paul said, should be fully supported—at least while engaged in their missionary tasks: ‘Do your best to speed Zenas ... and Apollos on their way; see that they lack nothing’ (Titus 3:13). This will teach the Cretan Christians to be ‘fruitful’ (Titus 3:14). John much later urgently recommended the same, inasmuch as such people are wholly dependent for livelihood on the church. Further he said that it enables the church people to be ‘fellow workers for the truth’ (3 John 5–8). Paul did not hesitate to instruct Philemon, a wealthy Christian, to ‘prepare a guest room for me’ in his own house where the church also met (Philemon 1, 2, 22).

4. Members of the churches who were of necessity in a state of chronic need—widows and others—were supported in whole or part by their churches. First Timothy 5:5–16 presumes such a custom and regulates it.

5. The churches also engaged in what today is called Christian philanthropy—financial aid to support believers in other places. The first evidence is emergency relief raised by the church at Syrian Antioch for the Jerusalem church in time of famine (Acts 11:27–30). Paul’s efforts to raise money throughout the area of his work to relieve the poverty of the Jerusalem congregation is evidenced in several letters (Rom. 15:26; 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 9:12). This liberality was to be extended not only to fellow believers but ‘to everyone’ as they were able (Gal. 6:10).

In the oikoumenē (inhabited world) of the New Testament a money-economy prevailed. Christians, as everyone else, rightly worked in that world to earn money to buy food, clothing, shelter and other needs of civilized living. They brought some of the fruit of their labor in the form of money to the recurring weekly service of Christian worship (1 Cor. 16:1–4). The Gospels as well as the Epistles have much to say about that stewardship. As for weekly offerings at the service of worship the giving was to be regular and systematic.

The current competitive solicitation of contributions from every Christian household in North America through the mail for every good cause is a recent development. This new development is part of the junk-mail phenomenon. It completely bypasses the churches. This situation has rendered necessary that first the biblical claim of the church (1 Cor. 16:2) be kept in mind as we Christians decide what to do with the Lord’s money placed at our personal disposal.

VII. Doctrine: Teaching it and Confessing it

As observed very early in this book of theology, doctrines interpret redemptive events. Christian lives and the church itself express commitments to those doctrines. Constant attention to the Apostles’ doctrine (Acts 2:42) is one of the main features of the very essence of the local church. Doctrine, then, of inner necessity becomes from the beginning a major feature of authentic worship in the local church, essential to the integrity of the local assembly as an ekklēsia of Jesus Christ, its preservation as such, and its extension into the world about it as well. Congregations are never more truly at worship than when their souls are captured by the depth of meaning of redemption or of God’s holiness, as those truths are effectively conveyed from the pulpit. Earlier in this chapter, in discussion of paraklēsis—exhortation, urgent preaching, in connection with 1 Timothy 4:13—these thoughts were broached. But more should be noted at least briefly.

1. Doctrine is a part of an evangelistic proclamation of truth. When Paul met pagan Greek minds at the Areopagus in Athens he did not trace the points of the usual evangelistic tract—‘four things’ of some sort. He announced a doctrine of God: one true, supreme, personal deity who decreed all, created all, sustains and rules all, by decrees, creation, preservation and providence (Acts 17:23–28). He added some Christology, ‘Jesus and the resurrection’ (Acts 17:18), soteriology (demand for repentance, v. 30), and some eschatology—the coming Judgment Day and resurrection of the dead (v. 31). When he addressed heathen audiences anywhere (Acts 14) he made similar proclamations. When he addressed Jewish audiences it was no different—apostolic doctrine (teaching) was the bill of fare. Relying on the basic doctrines of Christianity as distinct from Judaism ‘as was his custom’ (Acts 17:2), Paul preached biblical doctrine on three successive Sabbaths at ‘a synagogue of the Jews’ at Thessalonica; ‘he reasoned with them from the Scriptures, explaining and proving that it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead, and saying, “This Jesus, whom I proclaim to you, is the Christ.”’ So it was at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:14–52), at Corinth (Acts 18:4, 5, 11) and at Ephesus, where his broad doctrinal thrust was ‘the kingdom of God’ (Acts 19:8). Later, in the summary of his preached doctrines that he provided for the elders gathered at Miletus, he particularized the doctrines taught: repentance and faith (Acts 20:21); the gospel of grace (Acts 20:24); the kingdom of God (Acts 20:25); and ‘the whole counsel of God’ (Acts 20:27). These were the themes taught for over two years in a rented hall (Acts 19:9, 10), which drew them to Christ and which melded them into the great church of Ephesus. Christian pulpit proclamation anywhere at any period of history should ever include the same.

2. It is the task of the overseers (bishops), teaching elders and pastors of the churches, at all the gatherings of the whole local ekklēsia, vigorously and carefully to proclaim tē didachē (the doctrine, Acts 2:42 kjv), tē didaskalia (the teaching, what is taught, 1 Tim. 4:13). The elders of the church must ‘feed [poimainein] the church’ (ekklēsia) which the Lord purchased with His own blood (Acts 20:28 kjv). The content of ‘the doctrine’ was uniform in content among all the Apostles and spread from Rome to Cappadocia (Rom. 1:7; 1 Peter 1:1; 2 Peter 3:14, 15). The basic theology of Paul, Peter, John, James, the author of Hebrews is one theology; whatever the emphasis or occasion of each might be, it was uniform through all the churches (1 Cor. 11:16). When a few years later the term ‘catholic’ (katholikos, according to the whole, universal) and still later ‘orthodox’ came to be employed, this uniform set of teachings (or beliefs) is what was meant. In the New Testament it is said to be ‘the standard of teaching’ (Rom. 6:17 rsv), ‘the words of the faith and of the good doctrine’ (1 Tim. 4:6) and ‘the pattern of the sound words’ (2 Tim. 1:13). These Pauline expressions are matched by ‘the faith that was once for all delivered to the saints’ (Jude 3), ‘the truth that you have’ (2 Peter 1:12), ‘salvation ... declared at first by the Lord ... attested to us by those who heard’ (Heb. 2:3). It was in large part to preserve the integrity and limits of this sacred deposit that the Epistles and Gospels were written.

A revival of emphasis in preaching doctrine as indispensable truth is perhaps the most acute need of the churches of our time. Several recent widely publicized events are only a minute part of evidence that present-day evangelical Christians, including seminary professors, pastors and people, are not only ignorant of some of the basic moral teachings which distinguish Christianity from any other faith or confession, but also somewhat resentful of efforts to correct the ignorance. Discussion of causes of this declension would take us far afield, but these remarks seem necessary. (1) The state of denial in schools and churches must be resisted and corrected; (2) the replacement of Bible and theology (doctrines of Christianity) in schools for the ministry by so-called practical, how-to-feel and how-to-do-it courses must be reversed; and (3) the surge of denial of realities by fixation on perceptions must be reversed.

So important to Paul was the saturation of the church with doctrine that he spoke of it in line after line of the Epistles to Timothy under such titles as doctrine, the commandment, sound doctrine (opposed to vain jangling), the faith, the truth, the mystery of the faith, the words of the faith, a pattern of sound words, good doctrine and the doctrine. He opposes the same to fables, vain jangling, no understanding, being contrary to sound doctrine, doctrines of demons, lies and hypocrisy, profane and old wives' fables, questions and strifes about words, perverse disputings, opposition of science falsely so-called, erring concerning the truth, and resisting the truth. Christian pastors must teach, preach and exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine, to hold faith, to teach no other doctrine. The doctrine is a treasure to be guarded against perversion, neglect and denial as well as a deposit or treasure to be guarded. Let all earnest Christians pray to God that He raise up, as of old—as I have treated at length earlier in this book—a generation of teachers who will train up another generation of teachers in order that they be able to pass on the treasure (2 Tim. 2:1, 2).

VIII. Recital of Beliefs in a Creed?

Recital of a creed, as also of the Lord's Prayer, implies at least some rudimentary formal liturgy. Hence, I have placed this rubric in this text with a question mark. 'It is fashionable at present for students [i.e. scholarly writers of the New Testament] to find liturgy everywhere.'¹⁹ To explore whether certain passages in Paul's letters were first creeds recited or sung in public worship in a stage before the Epistles and Gospels were written would take us far beyond the scope of this chapter. It seems to me that clear evidence is lacking. Yet it is hard for me to doubt, recalling Paul's reference to 'the form of sound words' and the like, that repetition of teachings about divine acts of redemption, and the like, in prescribed forms, would have been employed, as now, to combining pedagogy with worship among people who knew none of Old Testament background of the biblical world-view.²⁰

IX. Music

'A priori, we would and should expect that a movement which released so much emotion, and loyalty, and enthusiasm, would find expression in song.'²¹ This statement seems correct, yet the New Testament is almost completely silent as to the use of music in the public worship of the ekklēsia. The Revelation speaks of songs of worship in heaven (Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3). Paul in parallel sections of Ephesians and Colossians recommends 'addressing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody to the Lord with all your heart' (Eph. 5:19 cf.; Col. 3:16). In context, however, such singing expresses one's being filled with the Spirit, personally. The subject of the chapter is personal Christian life. The singing indicated seems like what farmers used to do when following a team of horses across the otherwise silent fields and children playing—before radio and television taught mankind to listen to music rather than to make some of their own, as Paul advises. The one mention of music 'in the church' (1 Cor. 14:19, 34) seems to be at 1 Corinthians 14:26 where he rebukes excesses in bringing too many individually composed psalms, doctrines, tongues, revelations and interpretations to the assembly gathered for worship.

The Jewish believers probably brought the singing or chanting of Psalms from synagogue to church, but this helps us little as to whether or how Psalms may or may not have been sung in the New Testament services of worship. The scholar who has exceeded all others in research and readable writing on this matter has said:

The Jewish synagogue service, which was the root from which the apostolic synapsis [gathering before the Lord's Supper] sprang, consisted of public readings from the scripture, the singing of Psalms, a sermon and a number of set prayers. Rabbinic scholars are in disagreement as to whether the prayers came first or last in the synagogue of the first century ad.²²

The earliest description, by a Christian, of the 'order of service,' is Justin's First Apology (about ad 155). Justin describes in some detail the weekly meeting 'on the day called Sunday.' He mentions, in order, reading 'memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets, then the president verbally instructs [pastor's sermon] ... then we all rise together and pray ... bread and wine mixed with water are brought'²³ and the Eucharist follows. Strangely, it seems to us, Justin mentions no music. The evident reason for no mention may have been that there was no music and for good reason. In those times of persecution the Christians might not have wished to call attention to themselves by enthusiastic singing of Psalms or hymns or spiritual songs. Later when public practice of Christianity was lawful and prevalent, various kinds of music were interspersed throughout.

These facts may account for the difficulties in every period of substantial change with regard to church music. We simply are left without direct scriptural guidance. It appears to be possible to worship God with His approval with vocal music or without it, accompaniment by musical instruments or without them. No one has produced convincing evidence that any music except the human voice was employed in church worship of apostolic times. If music is to be an aspect of worship one rule will prevail: like all else in the liturgy of worship, the design is to thank God, to praise and glorify Him, not merely to please our culturally determined habits of listening or undisciplined personal preferences. Music in services of the church has always been a matter of question. In times of rapid cultural change like our own, music in church is both a question and a whole bundle of problems—none of them of easy solution and certainly beyond this writer's competence.

Excursus: Church Architecture and Furniture As a Reflection of Doctrine

The next four chapters relate to observance of the ordinances of baptism in water and of the Lord's Supper at the Lord's table, both of which should take place in the midst of the assembled believers. They are part, therefore, of public services of worship. They will be observed usually in connection with the features of worship treated in this chapter: weekly assembly; the public reading of Scripture; corporate prayer and praise; preaching; offerings; teaching of doctrine and confessing the same; and perhaps music, vocal and instrumental.

All of these functions have been wonderfully well conducted in architectural settings of the crudest sort—caves, barns, warehouses and small residences. Yet the churches in certain periods of history constructed houses of worship which were antithetical to the formula of 'when you come together' in Paul's instruction for the 'eucharistic' observance and all else that takes place in corporate worship.

Church architecture and arrangement of furniture for the congregation at worship are therefore indirectly important aspects of a sound doctrine of the church.

The house a man builds for himself makes a statement about the man himself and what he thinks is important to him. The house a Christian congregation builds ought to make a statement about their theology of worship—especially the place of ‘the public reading of Scripture’ (1 Tim. 4:13), of preaching the Word and of sharing together at the Lord’s table.

The Tabernacle in the wilderness and the temple of Solomon and the second temple which succeeded it were entered only by priests. The inner chamber where the LORD dwelt and where the shekinah ḥavodh appeared was forbidden to any except the high priest, who made several entrances and exits on the Day of Atonement. The people (laity) could bring gifts and sacrifices to the Great Altar but that was completely out of doors in a court before the sanctuary (holy building). ‘Coming together’ came to be a part of synagogue worship but was never regularly a part of temple worship.

The first Christian congregations usually met in the homes of believers. There is little information as to the part of the house used. Authorities differ. It must have varied greatly. In times of persecution it would have been conducted as quietly as possible, probably in an inner room. The synagogue, with which the Jewish Christian converts were familiar, was essentially a place for reading the Hebrew Scriptures and hearing the same with accompanying translation (Talmud) and prayers, plus comments by those esteemed competent to so speak. The room was usually a wide rectangle with a reading desk near the center. There were seats for some but folk in the East knew then as now how to sit comfortably on the floor and to rise without difficulty.

Hence some of the earliest structures for Christian worship provided a large round, octagonal or square room. The foundations of the Church of the Ascension (fourth century) atop the Mount of Olives show an octagonal building and the earliest part of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem (fourth century) is a circle. In each, the table for the Lord’s Supper was in the center, around which the people gathered and from which the Word was read, the sermon preached and the elements of the Supper received by the people.

The figures are representations not exact plans.

Figure 1 is of the main room of a typical ancient synagogue. The first Christians, being Jews, were familiar with it and, as we have seen, carried over much they remembered from it into Christian worship. They gathered around the reading desk, standing or likely seated on the floor as Eastern people do yet today at home and (Muslim) in Mosques. When Jesus ‘stood up to read’ in the Nazareth synagogue, ‘and there was given to him the book of the prophet Isaiah’ (Luke 4:16, 17 rsv), this likely would have happened at the desk and he would have likely risen, not from a chair, but from the floor. When ‘the eyes of all in the synagogue were fixed on him’ (v. 20) that would have been from four directions. The male Jews of Nazareth were not in front of Him but all around Him with perhaps the females looking down on Him from galleries.

The early Christians met in homes and rented halls as well as synagogues (e.g. Acts 8:7, 8; 19:8–10). We do not know if worship was conducted in the courtyard of the homes of wealthy believers or in rooms of houses. Archaeologists and other scholars have no uniform opinion.

When free to construct buildings specially for Christian worship, sometimes under government auspices and at government expense, it is noteworthy that the shape of the main room was more like the Jewish synagogue than either a Roman-Greek pagan temple or the Jerusalem temple. The central room of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (dedicated ad 335) at Jerusalem, Figure 2, was circular.²⁴

The Church of the Ascension (about ad 373) on top of the Mount of Olives is octagonal (Figure 3).25 This was carefully pointed out by the Arab guide when I first saw the foundation in 1960.26

Beginning in the fourth century, external form and inside arrangements evolved differently—especially between the Orthodox East and the Latin Catholic West. In the West, the Roman basilicas (Figure 4)—that is, government buildings—were adapted for Christian worship. Some of the buildings had formerly been used for the worship of the emperor and pagan deities (before Constantine). The church made some changes in the furniture and arrangement of it but the basilica style persisted until modern times in the West. The place of the judge in the civil court was replaced by the bishop's chair. Only clergy were to step up on the platform. To the right and left of the bishop's chair were rows of seats for the elders (presbyters). The communion table became an altar and was set in various places in the building. Later the main altar replaced the bishop's chair. Roman theology called for many Masses, so as cruciform buildings (Figure 5) developed, altars were placed in the transepts and elsewhere.

When the Reformed congregations took over these buildings, they tended to leave the west (entrance) end of the nave empty as well as the apse and choir and to set the pulpit desk high in a central part of the nave or transept and the communion table in the center or near the center with pews arranged to face the pulpit—where the Word is read and preached—from three directions. The changes at Geneva where Farel, then Calvin, and associates and successors ministered, serve as an example (Figure 6).

They set an elevated pulpit near the intersection of nave and transept and at the front of the nave, all around the preacher. Most of the nave was left empty. A table was set in a central position only when the Eucharist was to be observed.

When the Reformed constructed buildings of their own, they tried to let their evangelical theology dictate their architecture. An early Reformed congregation in Amsterdam worshipped in a wide rectangular room with the pulpit centered against a long wall (Figure 7).

The Reformation impulses in theology and corresponding church architecture were not sustained. Andre Bieler (of the faculty of the University of Geneva) wrote of the eighteenth century:

Reason prevailed over faith and secular culture triumphed. During the following century Christian sanctuaries [sic. Chapels] were turned into concert halls with vast organs and galleries and into lecture halls with a podium.²⁷

Bieler is speaking particularly of the situation in Europe, but there was more than an echo on the west side of the North Atlantic. In new structures a platform was placed across one end of the room with choir seats and chairs in imitation of a concert hall, the pulpit center in front on the platform and communion table below in front (Figure 8). This style presently exists in thousands of older church buildings and many new ones. Some have the ‘divided chancel’ (Figure 9) variation. We make them work, but I must somewhat cynically remark, that if there is a center aisle, it is great for fancy church weddings, but less than best for communicating the Word and observing ‘communion’ as ‘when ye come together therefore into one place’ (1 Cor. 11:20 kjv).

During the seventeenth century in Britain, Anglicans and the Puritan denominations wrestled together for control of the existing church buildings. Only after 1689 were dissenting groups free to follow their own course in constructing houses of worship. In various forms, the Puritan denominations (including Presbyterians) built to have the pulpit and communion table centrally located with seats as close to pulpit and table as possible and often with ranks of pews facing one another from opposite sides of the room.

After the London fire of 1666 Sir Christopher Wren, architect for reconstructing public buildings, ‘wrote of the necessity “in our reformed Religion ... that all who are present can both hear and see. In contrast with the churches of the Roman Catholics ours are to be fitted for Auditories” thus enabling “all to hear the Service, and both to hear distinctly, and see the Preacher.”’²⁸ Wren was successful, for the chapel of the usual Anglican (Episcopal in U.S.A.) church provides somewhat friendly facilities for hearing the preacher and receiving the communion (as ‘when you come together’) if employed correctly together with the liturgy of the Book of Common Prayer. I supply the following drawing of a cross section of a small Anglican church (Figure 10). Absent is the centrality and visibility of the communion table.²⁹

Though I am no authority on church architecture, my experience in helping to guide several congregations in construction of new houses of worship, and my studies as teacher of ecclesiology and pastoral duties, have driven me to consult those who have written on the subject. Most helpful are the writings of James F. White, especially his Protestant Worship and Church Architecture: Theological and Historical Considerations. He provides eleven pages of bibliography covering all historical periods and most denominations. There are pages of diagrams of architecture and furnishings. Crisp and condensed is Architecture in Worship by Andre Bieler. He traces the origins of the medieval structures which excluded the laity from real participation, shows how the Reformation adapted to those buildings and built better ones, and addresses the current ‘architectural problems’ of the present—as of 1965. A third which adds a different dimension is by George L. Gibson, The Story of the Christian Year, with illustrations by the author,³⁰ as does a fourth, Ecclesiastical Terms, Frederick L. Eckert.³¹

- ¹ J. K. F. Keil, Chronicles (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, repr. 1875), p. 212, see John 4:22, 23.
- ² Dom Gregory Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy (London: Dacre Press, 1978 [repr. of 2nd ed. Of 1945]), p. 1.
- ³ Bruce L. Shelley, The Church: God's People (Wheaton, IL: Victor Books, SP Publications, 1978), p. 75.
- ⁴ W. D. Maxwell, An Outline of Christian Worship (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1936, 1958).
- ⁵ Dix on developments to ad 125, p. 736, and on Thomas Cranmer's Reformed interpretation of the Supper, p. 649. Dom Gregory Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, 1978.
- ⁶ C. C. Ryrie, 'Sabbath' in Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia, Vol. II, p. 1493.
- ⁷ Ralph P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church (Westwood, NJ: Fleming H. Revell C., 1964), pp. 18, 19.
- ⁸ Paul Jewett, The Lord's Day (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), p. 59.

- ⁹ George L. Gibson, The Story of the Christian Year (Nashville: Abingdon, 1945), p. 71.
- ¹⁰ Maxwell, op. cit., p. 11.
- ¹¹ Justin, ANF, Vol. I, p. 185.
- ¹² M. C. Lind, Biblical Foundations for Christian Worship (Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1973), pp. 39, 40, citing G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament, 1963, p. 29 ff.
- ¹³ Ralph Martin, Worship in the Early Church (Westwood, NJ: Fleming H. Revell Co., 1964), pp. 28–38.
- ¹⁴ Schmitz, Macological Dictionary of the New Testament, Vol. v, p. 793.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 793, 794, 795.
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 795.
- ¹⁷ ibid., p. 795.
- ¹⁸ 1 Cor. 9:6; cf. 1 Thess. 2:9; 2 Thess. 3:6–10; Acts 18:2, 3.
- ¹⁹ C. F. D. Moule, Worship in the New Testament (Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, p. 1961, 1967), p. 7.
- ²⁰ I recommend R. Martin, Chap. 5, ‘Early Creeds and Confessions of Faith,’ Worship in the Early Church, pp. 53–65 for a balanced treatment of the question and evaluation of scholarly writing on the subject. The literature is extensive.
- ²¹ A. B. McDonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church (Edinburgh: 1934), p. 112, as cited by Martin, p. 40.
- ²² Dom Gregory Dix, op. cit., p. 37.
- ²³ ANF, Vol. I, p. 186.
- ²⁴ Jack Finegan, Light From the Ancient Past, Vol. I, 2nd ed., 1969, pp. 526–531.
- ²⁵ Figures 2 and 3 are adapted from Andre Bieler, Architecture in Worship, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1965, p. 11.
- ²⁶ See Finegan, pp. 535–537.
- ²⁷ Andre Bieler, Architecture in Worship (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1965), p. 71.

²⁸ Christopher Wren, London: 1950, p. 320, as quoted by James F. White, Protestant Worship and Church Architecture: Theological and Historical Considerations (New York: Oxford U. Press, 1964), p. 95.

²⁹ Cross Section of a church from Frederick L. Eckel, Jr, A Concise Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Terms (Boston, MA: Whittemore Associates, Inc., 1960), pp. 32, 33. Communion Table, Eckel, p. 20; Altar, Eckel, p. 5.

³⁰ New York, Nashville: Abington Press, 1945.

³¹ Boston: Whittemore Associates.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (974). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

22

The Ordinance of Baptism: the Church's Rite of Initiation (I)

There are only two religious rites observed, almost without exception, in every group of churches—baptism and the Lord's Supper. We shall discuss the initiatory rite, baptism, by which normally one is initiated into the visible church, and the continuing rite of the Lord's Supper, observed normally in Christian assemblies at recurring intervals.¹

We have already used the words rite and ordinance and suggested observance as names or categories for baptism and the Lord's Supper. In the Western part of Christendom the usual name is sacrament. In the Eastern churches mystery is more common. A very few dislike ordinance because they think it suggests legalism (they cite Col. 2:14, 20; Heb. 9:1, 19). A large number reject sacrament because for some it seems to indicate sacramentalism, or salvation by religious rites. The early Christians frequently called these rites 'mysteries.' Even though the word 'mystery' is used in the Bible, evangelical Protestants are largely unacquainted with this ecclesiastical usage, and it seems both misleading and inappropriate. Baptists and most non-liturgical groups prefer 'ordinance,' since the Lord 'ordained' the rites.² Presbyterians use both sacrament and *ordinance*³ but seem to prefer sacrament.⁴ It is generally agreed that though, like 'Trinity,' none of these words is used of baptism or the Lord's Supper in the New Testament, under proper controls any of them is a proper designation of these two sacred rites (a non-specific term). In using the commonest, sacrament, 'we have to be sure to give it a scriptural reference rather than merely give it a vague and loose definition, or feed into it our own conception of what a sacrament ought to be.'⁵

Only by degrees through the centuries did 'sacraments' come to be distinguished exactly from the many ritual observances in various provinces of the church. In the twelfth century Hugh of St Victor counted thirty 'sacraments.' In 1437 a decision of the Council of Florence for the first time gave the authority of the church to a suggestion of Peter Lombard (twelfth century) that the number of sacraments should be fixed at seven, viz.: baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders and matrimony.⁶ How two simple rites commanded by Christ came to be called sacraments and mysterics and multiplied to seven and corrupted by superstitious magical ideas is too long to report further here.⁷

Definition of an Ordinance, or Sacrament

James Montgomery Boice provides a summary of how ordinance and sacrament relate by defining ‘sacraments’ as ‘ordinances instituted by Christ’ and proceeds to define sacraments as ‘divine ordinances instituted by Christ ... in which material elements are used as visible signs of God’s blessing ... are means of grace ... by reminding the believer of what they signify⁸ ... [and] are seals, certifications or confirmations of the grace they signify.’ John Murray adds, ‘to be observed perpetually.’⁹ The father of them all is Calvin, who provides two somewhat tentative definitions.¹⁰ Like Luther and Zwingli his emphasis was on limiting the number to the two truly set forth in the New Testament rather than the seven of tradition and Roman dogma.

The Roman Church never clearly defined the criteria by which they came to the number of seven. The record shows that they held the sacraments were all commanded by Christ, though in different ways. He Himself was baptized and commanded His ‘stewards of the mysteries’ (1 Cor. 4:1), i.e. the Apostles, to baptize. He participated in the Eucharist and commanded its continuing observance. The power of the keys being imparted to Peter, the apostolic college and thereby the church, had power to institute the rest with guidance and power of the promised Paraclete.¹¹ A standard textbook of Roman Catholic theology states: ‘Holy Scripture attests that Christ immediately instituted ... Baptism, Eucharist, Penance and Consecration [ordination]. The other Sacraments “were in existence in apostolic times,” being instituted by apostles as “ministers of Christ and dispensers of the mysteries of God” (1 Cor. 4:1) cf. 1 Corinthians 3:5.’¹² The Catechism of 1994 confirms this teaching.¹³ The Council of Trent pronounced anathema on any one who says that there are less or more than seven or that Christ did not institute all seven.¹⁴

Though they do not agree in all particulars of form and meaning of the church’s sacraments there are few if any evangelical Protestant theologians who would quarrel seriously with the following proposed criteria by which a sacrament (ordinance) should be defined. A sacrament is (1) a sensible physical action or use of materials; (2) performed with formal spiritual intent; (3) commanded clearly and personally by Christ while on earth in His flesh; and (4) of universal and perpetual obligation in the church. I add that (5) each of these qualifications must be plainly derived from plain statement in the New Testament and no other precedent or authority. (6) Further, the New Testament must define their purposes and meanings. As we proceed it will be seen each of these points is applicable and important.

1. A sacrament, or ordinance, is a sensible physical action or use of materials. If it is a sacrament you can see it, hear, smell, taste or touch it. The most real facts do not fall in this category. The God revealed in nature is invisible (Rom. 1:20). ‘What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man imagined ... God has prepared for those who love him’ (1 Cor. 2:9). Contrariwise, baptism is a spectacle which attracts viewers; the water is cold or warm; the one baptized comfortable or uncomfortable; the bread of communion is leavened or unleavened; and the wine either sweet or fermented. There are specified actions and manipulated objects essential to the ordinance. Wine is not used in baptism nor plain water in the Eucharist.

Because these ordinances are sensible physical acts it is possible for thoughtless and unbelieving—even superstitious people—to participate in them. Unlike the temple rites of old, God does not strike the ministering priest dead for carelessness in the ritual as He did Nadab and Abihu in the old dispensation.

2. The ordinances are performed with formal, spiritual intent. Baths are administered to people unable to bathe themselves; bread is broken and wine consumed all the time; but since no specific formal religious intent is involved, bathing and eating meals are not, as such, of spiritual value nor are they so intended. In the first Christian baptisms on record there were certain specific events—repentance (Acts 2:38) and belief (Acts 8:12, 37). In the first ‘Lord’s Supper’ there was first a special prayer, then special instruction—symbolic action and explanation of the symbolism (Luke 22:17–20). Bathing the baby is sometimes called a ‘ritual’ and precious family meals at special occasions ‘sacramental,’ but this is hyperbole. Because of the formal, spiritual intent the ordinances should be guarded carefully against misuse, misunderstanding and pollution by disorder or hypocrisy (1 Cor. 10, 11).

3. An essential characteristic of a church ordinance is that it be sovereignly authorized, personally and directly by our Lord Himself. Since Christ ‘is the head of the body, the church’ (Col. 1:18), it ‘follows logically that from the day of Pentecost when the church was formed ... the church should obey her sovereign Lord. It is therefore fitting that the Lord of the church should not have delegated to any other, even to an apostle, the sacred task of instituting ordinances for the church.’¹⁵

Jesus did therefore deliberately and with great solemnity introduce both the Lord’s Supper and the ordinance of baptism, each in a unique way. There is surprisingly little reference to baptisms by Jesus and His disciples before the Day of Pentecost. Instructions for the apostolic mission of Matthew 10 do not include baptizing converts. The only reference to their baptizing is at John 3:22 ff. and 4:1. We do not know if Jesus baptized again those of His Apostles who had been John’s disciples. It seems very unlikely. Nor do we know if any members of the Jerusalem church of Acts 2:1 ff. had previously been baptized by Jesus or an Apostle during their pre-Calvary ministries. Inferences based on this ‘non-information’ are risky. We do know that when Jesus in His resurrection body was with His followers in Galilee He solemnly announced, ‘All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me,’ following which He commanded the disciples to take the gospel of salvation with them wherever they might go among ‘all nations’ and that they should make disciples by baptizing and teaching (Matt. 28:18–20).¹⁶

As for the Lord’s Supper He chose the solemn occasion of His last meal with the Twelve, probably a last Passover Feast, to institute the ordinance. Of the eating of the bread He commanded, ‘Do this in remembrance of me’ (Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:24). Of the cup, He said, ‘Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me’ (1 Cor. 11:25).

4. The church was obligated by the Lord’s command to observe His ordinances everywhere (universally) and always (perpetually): among ‘all nations’ ‘to the end of the age’ and ‘until he comes' (Matt. 28:19, 20; 1 Cor. 11:26). The churches initially understood this. There were no unbaptized, full members in the churches until many decades had passed—not until legalism and sacramentalism had interfered with the plain gospel of grace and changed perception of baptism from a symbol of regeneration and renewal to a means of the same, and the Eucharist to continuation of that work. Then many postponed baptism to near the end of life, supposing baptism secured the forgiveness of all past sins.

5. Each of these qualifications of an ordinance must be derived from plain statements of the New Testament and no other precedent or authority. This we have already noted is true of baptism and the Eucharist. Such is not the case for any of the five extra rites of the Roman and Eastern Orthodox churches—confirmation, penance, ordination (orders), extreme unction and matrimony. The Reformers of the sixteenth century heartily rejected them all as ordinances, per se. The Council of Trent responded with 'anathema' to any one who 'shall say that the sacraments of the New Law were not all instituted by Christ ... or that there are more or less than seven.'¹⁷ Ludwig Ott, 'The Institution and Seven-fold Nature of the Sacraments,'¹⁸ and The Catechism of 1994,¹⁹ steadfastly reaffirm the claim, asserting unrecorded sayings of Christ preserved in tradition, the inspiration of the Paraclete, the divine authority of the hierarchy, and adding inferences based on 1 Corinthians 4:1 and 3:5.

6. Though it might not at first be thought necessary to say it, it does remain to be emphasized: the purpose, effects, authority, and meanings of baptism and the Eucharist must be defined by the New Testament. Anything more or less than Scripture plainly says will obstruct the intentions of our Lord to some degree or even pervert the ordinance to something harmful to faith and salvation. One should not therefore assert as dogma that baptism removes the effects of original sin or that it effects regeneration either of adults or infants. By building a chain of irrelevant texts about water, children, baptism, the washing of regeneration and the like, the New Testament can be construed to say such things; but when the texts which truly relate directly to baptism are consulted no such interpretation springs forth naturally. There is, of course, room for some difference of opinion as to how the truly relevant texts should be interpreted.

Views of the Ordinance of Christian Baptism

A reader of the present generation is not likely to be as well acquainted with the different views of the mode, meaning and proper subjects of baptism as previous generations of Protestants. Yet the differences persist even though the polemical exchanges are now less strident. Even so, my reading of a considerable amount of Protestant debate over the past three centuries left the impression of courtesy between most contestants—except where decimation of congregations was involved (as in the Campbellite incursions to Baptist and Presbyterian congregations from 1827 onward for forty years).

Points of Agreement

There are many points of agreement by almost all. Baptism consists in the application of water to the ordinand's body—at least to the head. It is a mode of confessing Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord and was commanded by Him as a mark of discipleship. The obvious symbolism has some reference to cleansing from sin. To a degree this agreement extends to views of the apostolic mode of baptism. Though himself a defender of sprinkling and pouring, Anglican G. D. Bromiley acknowledges that ‘Immersion was fairly certainly the original practice and continued in general use up to the [late] Middle Ages. The Reformers agreed that this best brought out the meaning of baptism as a death and resurrection.’²⁰ It is a simple matter to document this assertion.

Luther at first affirmed immersion as the original mode. Zwingli did likewise. Calvin’s concession on the matter is well known, but it bears repeating:

But whether the person being baptized should be wholly immersed, and whether thrice or once, whether he should only be sprinkled with poured water—these details are of no importance, but ought to be optional to churches according to the diversity of countries. Yet the word ‘baptize’ means to immerse, and it is clear that the rite of immersion was observed in the ancient church.²¹

Lumpkin observes, ‘Lutheran and Reformed confessions condemned the Anabaptists both for rejecting infant baptism and for what they called rebaptism, not for practicing immersion, which all accepted.’²²

Yet all three also strenuously affirmed that other modes were proper. The movements they began still largely practice aspersion or affusion. The churches of the Reformation, Lutheran and Reformed, including Anglican, Presbyterian and offshoots of the English Reformation (Congregationalists, Methodists) prevalingly practice sprinkling (aspersion) or pouring (affusion). Sprinkling had become the practice of the Roman Church from which the Reformation churches were separated and they did not change the form of baptism they received. In the lands of the Reformation every person born was christened as an infant. He was registered in the local church as a member of the community, both civil and religious, no distinction being made. When Europe divided into Roman Catholic and Protestant states the principle prevailed that the religion of ‘the prince’ (ruler) was to be the religion of his subjects. All the princes had been christened as infants, knew nothing else and approved nothing else.

Opposition arose contemporarily with Zwingli and Luther among people (later called Anabaptists) who thought that the Reformation principle of sola scriptura (the Bible alone) required baptism of believers only. They were persecuted unmercifully by the rulers of Europe—Roman Catholic, Lutheran and Reformed. A century later in Britain (probably independently of the continental advocates of believers-only baptism), in the independent wing of the English Puritan Revolution, similar views arose leading to the formation of the Baptists who baptize only by immersion and believers only—i.e. no infants.²³

Several scholarly treatments follow a similar approach, akin to the method of ‘biblical theology.’ I shall follow the analytic method in order to come quickly to conclusions. I would like to lead the reader to consider: (1) the origins of baptism (how it came to be practiced universally in the church); (2) its place in the life of the believer and the church; (3) its symbolism and theological meaning; (4) the effects of baptism (what does it do?); (5) its proper subjects (i.e. who should be baptized); and (6) the preferred mode—dipping, pouring, sprinkling or moistening.

The Origins of Baptism: How it Came to Be Practiced Universally in the Church

C. F. D. Moule expresses common scholarly agreement among those who address the practice in the apostolic period.

In the New Testament it is fair to say, Baptism is assumed as the way of entry into the Christian church. It is taken as a matter of course in (to cite only some of the passages) Acts 2:38, 41; 9:18; 10:47; 19:3; Rom. 6:13; 1 Cor. 6:11 (apparently); 12:13; Gal. 3:27; Eph. 4:5; Col. 2:12; Titus 3:5; Heb. 6:2 (perhaps), 4 (probably); 1 Peter 3:21.... In some of the passages just addressed, it is simply assumed that Christians, as such, must have been baptized; and the same is at least implied in others.^{24}

Old Testament Background

The Bible first introduces ritual washing in water in connection with priestly preparation for ministration at the Tabernacle. The story starts with the ‘pattern’ of the brazen ‘laver’ or tank of water shown to Moses ‘in the mount’ (Exod. 30:17–21; cf. 25:9). Does any one doubt the ritual washing of the priest’s hands spoke to them symbolically of the holiness of God and of both ritual purity and moral purity of the priests who conducted His service (see Exod. 40:12–15; Lev. 8:5 ff.; Num. 8:5–8)? Other passages command vigorous washing of lay people in water (see especially Exod. 19:10), their offerings, their dwellings and similar in connection with solemn worship. In the Psalms (51:7; 24:3, 4) and the Prophets (Isa. 1:16; Ezek. 36:25; Zech. 13:1) the marks of spiritual cleansing are symbolized by washings in water. Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel made much of washing with water in their metaphors of Israel’s future cleansing, renewal and restoration (Isa. 4:2–6; Ezek. 36:37; Jer. 33). These passages must have been in Jesus’ mind when He reminded Nicodemus that as a teacher in Israel he ought to know what it means to be born of ‘water and the Spirit’ (John 3:5–10).

We do not know where dipping spiritually renewed people in a pool or stream as a sign of repentance and with reference to sin’s cleansing began. ‘We may safely assert there is no mention of proselyte baptism in Old Testament or in the Apocrypha.’^{25} There is no clear evidence that proselytes to Judaism were baptized in pre-Christian times.^{26} R. Martin seems to assume proselyte baptism was practiced ‘in the first centuries bc and ad’ and cites two British authors, but no proof.^{27} This is the usual unproven assumption.

Emil Schürer shows that earliest written Jewish sources say full proselytes took a bath of purification upon embracing Judaism. If it was a self-washing as his citations indicate, this illustration is hardly specifically a ‘baptism’ as in the New Testament and Christian practice.^{28}

Since discovery of the first seven Dead Sea Scrolls and their publication some scholars have proposed that the stepped pools at Qumran were for ceremonial purifications, i.e. self-immersions, and that John the Baptist derived his practice from Qumran. Further that Christian practice was derived from John’s. But the purification (baptism) at Qumran was a recurring ritual for the spiritually elite who shared a special meal, not a once for all rite and in both John’s and Christian baptism the candidate is immersed by a minister, not by self-immersion. Earlier scholars, as noted above, traced the baptism of John to earlier and contemporary proselyte baptism. Research of Douglas J. Culver, Ph.D. in Hebrew studies finds no solid proof of proselyte baptism before the rise of Christianity. He cites Baron: ‘The problem is inextricably complicated by uncertainty in dating’—

i.e. of ‘early [Jewish] baptist sects’ and the practice of ritual immersions. (See George Ladd²⁹ and Adela Warbro Collins.³⁰) Collins concludes:

Christian and rabbinic baptism both have their ultimate roots in the ritual washings of Leviticus. Both came to function as rituals of initiation. The major difference is the relation of this ritual to eschatology [i.e. Is Jesus the promised Messiah?].³¹

There are pools for water storage at Qumran that look like baptistries, but not every competent archaeologist agrees they were used for baptism. Josephus in a famous passage says the Essenes in times of Pharisees and Sadducees ‘when they have clothed themselves in white veils, they then bathe their bodies in cold water. And after their purification is over they meet together,’ etc. (Wars of the Jews, II, 8.5). In this case each bathed himself. There is quite a large literature about proselyte baptism in Judaism and Oepke thinks ‘it is hardly conceivable that the Jewish ritual should be adopted at a time when baptism had become an established religious practice in Christianity.’³² Yet the record suggests that late Judaism might have copied Christianity in this regard, rather than the other way around. The frequent assertion that sectarian baptism was established practice before John appeared on the scene seems far less than certain. The amount of literature seems more weighty than the evidence.³³

John’s Practice and Jesus’ Example and Approval

Where the earliest Gospel opens there is John, the son of Zacharias, baptizing ‘in the wilderness’ and preaching ‘a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins’ (Mark 1:4). Five verses farther on Jesus Himself ‘came from Nazareth of Galilee and was baptized by John in the Jordan’—not ‘for the forgiveness of sins’ but to fulfill all righteous requirements any ordinary human servant of God should meet (Mark 1:8).³⁴ On any basis of judgment, therefore, baptism is an important component of Jesus’ entrance into public life and inauguration of His work of redemption. There is no doubt whatsoever that in taking the place of a sinner in an ordinance that came later clearly to symbolize His death (Matt. 20:22; Luke 12:50), Jesus had already set His face to go to Jerusalem to accomplish His ‘departure’ (Gr. exodos) there (Luke 9:31, 53). It is therefore correct to say that just as our Lord’s public baptism marked the moment of public embarking on His public career of redemption so public baptism marks the beginning of the believer’s public career as a member of Christ’s body on earth.

The other Gospels have no strict parallel to the command to baptize of Matthew 28:19. Yet Luke, in his narrative, goes right on from the Ascension and the disciples’ continuing in Jerusalem to report the baptisms which took place a few days later. It seems obvious that Jesus all the while was observing and approving baptisms by His disciples. This is supported by the fact that in preparing the disciples for His coming Passion He referred to it figuratively as a baptism (Mark 10:38, 39; Luke 12:50). Perhaps these baptizers and the people they baptized—including the 120 (Acts 1:15)—performed the baptisms on the Day of Pentecost.

The Command of Jesus

As noted earlier, the Gospels of Mark and Luke nowhere say that Jesus commanded any one either to baptize or to be baptized. The Gospel of John almost incidentally reports that though Jesus Himself performed no baptisms (John 4:1, 2), His disciples baptized many (John 3:25, 26). Yet at His meeting with a crowd of many disciples in Galilee (Matt. 28:1 ff.) after the resurrection He commanded those disciples to make public Christians of all nations (disciples) by baptizing and teaching them (Matt. 28:19, 20 rsv, niv). Carrying out the command to baptize began on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:38, 41). It seems a correct judgment that the Apostles (including Matthias, Acts 1:22–26) and many others previously baptized by John the Baptist and Jesus’ disciples would have performed those baptisms. There is no hint that any ‘rebaptisms’ took place. From that day to this, even the world has come to understand that baptism in a public display of repentance from sin and faith in Christ is the normal way believing sinners take their public stand forever with Him.

Church Practice in the New Testament and Beyond

The practice of administering baptism to every new believer continued onward throughout the expansion of the church, as seen in Acts.³⁵ When Paul, freshly converted en route to Damascus, arrived at that city he was promptly instructed (‘teaching them’ Matt. 28:20), and after that baptized and then instructed some more. Throughout the rest of the New Testament the general silence on the subject—except by way of reflection on the matter (1 Cor. 1:13, 14, 16; 10:2), or building upon it (1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:27), or arguing from it (1 Cor. 15:29), or interpreting it (Eph. 4:5; 1 Peter 3:21)—simply assumes that every member of the body, baptized ‘into one spirit’ within the body of Christ, has also been properly baptized in water in ‘the name of the Lord,’ or in ‘the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.’ The use of ‘in the name of the Lord’ rather than the Trinitarian formula has many proposed explanations. It probably means ‘by the Lord’s authority’ as opposed to pagan gods or Jewish formulas.³⁶

¹ A minority of evangelical Christian groups regard the washing of ‘the saint’s feet’ (John 13:14, 15; 1 Tim. 5:10) as commanded by Christ to be an adjunct to the ordinance of the bread and wine. Some of them regard the Lord’s Supper (the Last Supper cf. 1 Cor. 11:20–22, or love feast of Jude 12) as being a full meal also to be perpetuated. So among these folk—more numerous than might be supposed—some accept ‘eucharist’ (= thanksgiving, 1 Cor. 11:24; Luke 22:17, 19) as the proper name for the rite of the bread and wine and ‘the Lord’s Supper’ (love feast) as a full meal. Eucharist is unambiguous and through the remainder of this discussion I shall use it frequently as a proper name for the ordinance of loaf and cup.

² Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), p. 1094; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), p. 930; Harvey, The Church (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publ., 1879), p. 105; G. W. Bromiley, Sacramental Teaching and Practice in the Reformation Churches (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1951), p. 11.

³ Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q 92.

⁴ The subject is adequately discussed in Smith’s Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities (London, 1882), pp. 659–663 sub Jusjurandum; also McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, vol. ix, p. 212.

⁵ Geoffrey W. Bromiley, Sacramental Teaching and Practice in the Reformation Churches (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), p. 12.

- ⁷ D. P. Ridder ‘Sacrament,’ McClintock & Strong, Cyclopedia, Vol. ix, pp. 212–218.
- ⁸ James M. Boice, Foundations of the Christian Faith (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986), pp. 495–497. Similar statements by modern Reformed or Presbyterians will be found in Buswell, the Hodges and Berkhof.
- ⁹ John Murray, Collected Writings, Vol. II (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977 onward) pp. 366, 367.
- ¹⁰ Calvin, Institutes, IV 14.1.
- ¹¹ F. C. Coneybear, ‘Sacrament,’ Britannica, 11th ed., Vol. xxiii, p. 977.
- ¹² Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, 4th ed., trans. Patrick Lynch (New York: Herder and Herder, 1960), p. 337.
- ¹³ Paras. 113, 1117, 1210.
- ¹⁴ Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma (St Louis, MO: Herder Book Co., 1954, 1957), para. 844, p. 262.
- ¹⁵ Herman A. Hoyt, ‘How Can One Determine a church Ordinance,’ Brethren Missionary Herald magazine, April 15, 1961.
- ¹⁶ See Chap. 13 above, ‘The Mission of the Church in the World.’
- ¹⁷ Denzinger, op. cit., para. 844, p. 262.
- ¹⁸ Ott, op. cit., pp. 336–341.
- ¹⁹ Paras. 113, 1117, 1210.
- ²⁰ G. W. Bromiley, ‘Baptism,’ Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 113.
- ²¹ Calvin, Institutes, IV. 15, 19. See documentation in William Lumpkin, A History of Immersion (Nashville: Broadman, 1963), pp. 21, 22. For Luther see The Holy and Blessed Sacrament of Baptism, 1519 (Works of Martin Luther, I., 56). For Zwingli, S. M. Jackson (ed.), The Latin Works and the Correspondence of Huldreich Zwingli, ‘Commentary on Epistle to the Romans’ (New York: G. P. Putman’s Sons 1912–29, iv, 420.
- ²² Wm. Lumpkin, A History of Immersion (Nashville: Broadman, 1963), p. 24.
- ²³ Baptism has been grossly neglected in recent decades. Three times I have served congregations for a lengthy interim pastorate and one five-year pastorate where many who professed to be Christians—even large numbers of them—had never been baptized at any age by any form or mode. To lead them to meaningful baptism I have offered a weekly class taking them simply first to John's practice, then to the baptism of Jesus by John, thence to Jesus' command, after that, to apostolic practice, and finally to the meaning of baptism as explained by Paul and Peter. Finally we also discussed references to 'born of water and the Spirit,' 'washing of regeneration' and the like. The first time I did this I baptized twenty-seven members of the congregation in the baptistry of the neighboring Baptist church.

²⁴ C. F. D. Moule, Worship in the New Testament (Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1961, 1967), p. 47.

²⁵ A. Plummer, 'Baptism,' Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. I, p. 239.

²⁶ ibid.

²⁷ Ralph Martin, Worship in the Early Church (Westwood, NJ: Revell, 1964), pp. 90, 91.

²⁸ Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, 2nd div., Vol. II (repr. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publ., 1998), pp. 319–324.

²⁹ George Ladd, The Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974, 1991), pp. 40, 41.

³⁰ Adela W. Collins, 'The Origin of Christian Baptism,' chap. 7, Cosmology and Eschatology in Jewish and Christian Apocalypticism (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996), pp. 219–238.

³¹ Collins, op. cit., p. 238.

³² Oepke, 'Bapto,' TDNT, Vol. I, p. 535.

³³ per contra see Martin, op. cit., pp. 89, 90 and references.

³⁴ I discuss this more at length in The Life of Christ, Baker, 1987, pp. 67–69.

³⁵ See Acts 8:12, 13, 16, 36, 38; 9:18; 10:47, 48; 16:15, 33; 18:8; 19:3, 5.

³⁶ See note by R. L. Saucy, The Church in God's Program (Chicago: Moody Press, 1972), p. 193.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (976). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

I. The Proper Subjects of Baptism

The question of the proper subjects is not unrelated to the meaning and the mode of baptism. We shall, however, at this stage simply consult the New Testament as to who was baptized and with what requirements. Robert Reymond has recently approached the topic, conveniently listing in textual order every one of the eleven 'actual baptisms' in the New Testament.¹ We shall briefly examine each reference in search of an answer.

Acts 2:37–41

On the Day of Pentecost Peter addressed 'Jews, devout men from every nation' (Acts 2:5). '[M]en' in this case translates andres, plural of the regular noun for the male of our race—not boys or females. At the conclusion of the sermon 'they were cut to the heart, and said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, "Brothers, what shall we do?" And Peter said to them [to these adult males], "Repent and be baptized".... So those [adult males] who received his [Peter's] word were baptized.... And they [adult males] devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching ...' and so on. Can any one doubt that the people baptized that day—"three thousand souls"—were male adults? It would be precarious to say absolutely that there were no women present, but worship at the stated festivals three times a year was a male duty. The Old Testament is very specific about this (Exod. 23:17; Deut. 16:16). True, sometimes for Passover at least (1 Sam. 1:3, 21) in the land of Israel, the whole family went along and also probably to the Feast of Tabernacles (see John 7:17). At any rate the only ones within the sweep of the text's attention are adult male Jews. The reference 'to you and your children' means their descendants, not offspring present on the occasion.

These men were already 'devout' believers in the one true God. As believers they needed to repent of their disbelief in 'Jesus of Nazareth' (v. 22) and publicly to acknowledge their adherence to Jesus as Messiah by baptism. In this case baptism was an act of confessing faith—parallel to 'confess with your mouth' (Rom. 10:9).

Acts 8:12–17

This describes the results of the first preaching of the good news of Christ away from Jerusalem: at Samaria in central Palestine, where a clan of mixed Jewish-Gentile ancestry and an heretical form of Judaism lived. The significant reference to baptism says, 'But when they believed Philip as he preached good news about the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men [andres, adult males] and women [gunaiques, adult females]' (v. 12 rsv). The passage goes on to say that one of those who believed was a sorcerer named Simon, 'Even Simon himself believed, and after being baptized he continued with Philip' (v. 13 rsv). The passage is a fertile one for many doctrines, but in relation to the question of the proper candidates for baptism it is clear that Philip baptized only those adults, of either sex, who believed and were prepared publicly to confess the same in water baptism. This was all in response to the fact that 'Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and proclaimed to them the Christ,' with accompanying evidence of authority (Acts 8:4–8 rsv).

This passage shows that adults who believe in God and were prepared publicly to declare their faith in Christ are proper subjects of baptism.

Acts 8:35–38

The scene is on the road which descends from Jerusalem southwest to Gaza—part way through a ‘wilderness’ (uninhabited) area (v. 26). The same Philip has explained to a traveling, royal officer of Jewish faith the reference of Isaiah 53:7, 8 to Christ. Philip ‘told him the good news,’ evidently also raising the possibility of baptism. The Western text of Acts preserves a valid report of what we shall see was already standard baptismal procedure, as reported in Acts 8:37 (kjv). The question was, ‘what doth hinder me to be baptized?’ The answer: ‘If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest.’ Again the subject was a person of the age of mental competence who voluntarily requested baptism after having been persuaded by the truth of the Word. So ‘they both went down into the water, Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him.’

We shall return to this passage in discussing the apostolic mode of baptism.

Acts 9:18 and 22:16

After his marvelous conversion from persecution of Christ to deep faith in Christ on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1–9) the Apostle-to-be was led on to that city. After three days, still blind from the meeting with Christ on the road and still fasting, Ananias, ‘a disciple,’ visited him, ‘And laying his hands on him he said, “Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus who appeared to you on the road by which you came, has sent me that you may regain your sight and be filled with the Holy Spirit.” And immediately something like scales fell from his eyes and he regained his sight. Then he rose and was baptized, and took food and was strengthened’ (Acts 9:17–19 rsv). Later, reflecting on these events, Paul filled out the narrative. After receiving his sight back Ananias urged, ‘And now why do you wait? Rise and be baptized, and wash away your sins, calling on his name’ (Acts 22:16 rsv). Again, much here cries for comment on many topics of doctrine, but as regards the proper candidate for baptism, here is a young adult Jew who first received the truth about Jesus as Savior and himself as sinner, who repented his past behavior of persecuting Jesus, committed himself without reserve to Jesus, and when invited to do so, confessed his new faith in baptism—here described as washing away his sins. We shall return to this text also when considering the meaning of baptism.

Up to this point advocates of ‘believers’ baptism’ and of ‘infant baptism’ find only a little to disagree about. The normal pattern is to hear the gospel, then to believe it, then to confess faith in Christ in baptism. In the next three instances—the households of Cornelius of Caesarea (Acts 10:44–48), of Lydia at Philippi (Acts 16:13–15), and the Roman jailor of the same city (Acts 16:30–34)—advocates of infant baptism think that they find ground for the baptism of the infant offspring of believing parents. All readily agree that in the case of adult members of the three groups the procedure was the same as above: first hearing the gospel, then believing, and after that baptism. When faith only is mentioned repentance is implied and when repentance only, faith is implied. They are the negative and positive aspects of one movement of the soul. They are two sides of one thing.

Acts 10:44–48

The interested reader may examine the cited passages. Let us take note only of the aspects related to the subject of baptism. In the case of Cornelius, the centurion of Caesarea, he ‘was expecting’ Peter and his party ‘and had called together his relatives and close friends’ (Acts 10:24). Shortly after he arrived ‘Peter opened his mouth’ and spoke what scholars like to call ‘the primitive kērygma,’ or preached gospel (Acts 10:34–43). While Peter was still speaking ‘the Holy Spirit fell on all who heard the word’ (Acts 10:44) astounding the believing Jews in Peter’s party of travelers that Gentiles had received the Holy Spirit—which they knew to be the ‘sign’ or ‘seal’ of their redemption. In view of the fact they had already witnessed the sign or seal² of the Spirit’s effusion, Peter declared that baptism, the public rite of initiation into the church, could not be withheld from them. He therefore ‘commanded them’ (who heard the Word) and on whom ‘the Holy Spirit fell’ ‘to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ’ (v. 48). It seems clear that those baptized were a group of adults gathered from several families for this occasion (cf. 10:27), all competent to hear the Word with understanding and to respond in faith.³

Acts 16:13–15

This passage presents the same succession of events in connection with baptism—hearing the Word, believing, confessing in baptism.⁴

Many advocates of infant baptism have argued, inasmuch as the ‘woman named Lydia, from the city of Thyatira, a seller of purple goods’ and ‘a worshiper of God’ (a proselyte, or, one convinced of Judaism) ‘was baptized, and her household as well’ that, if not infant children of her own, then children of her servants (slaves), would have been baptized. In such case the faith would have been that of Lydia or of the slave parents, not of the infants. The text, however, makes no mention of children (infants). No mention is made of a husband; even in a patriarchal society where there is no husband she speaks as head of the house; hence, no offspring of Lydia is present. The narrative is very condensed, so though ‘she was baptized, and her household as well’ (v. 15), it is to be expected that, as in the case of the jailor, later in the chapter, Paul and Silas first ‘spoke the word of the Lord to him and to all who were in his house’ (Acts 16:32), and all the household believed.

Acts 16:30–34

The jailor gave the two missionaries opportunity to speak ‘the word of the Lord to him and to all who were in his house.’ He had already been told he should ‘Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved, you and your household’ (v. 31). No one will likely claim that the jailor’s faith would save any one else apart from that person’s own belief in ‘the Lord Jesus.’ Paul and Silas obviously meant that the household had the same privilege of access that the jailor had, and that is why the household, ‘all who were in his house,’ was apparently gathered together to hear ‘the word of the Lord.’ Whether ‘house’ in each case means a building or the people—jailor, his family and retainers—makes little difference. As most scholars agree, whether they advocate infant baptism or not, the narrative assumes that all the persons involved are of responsible age, probably adults.

The next three texts relate to baptisms at Corinth when Paul and Silas had their next extended ministry.

Acts 18:8; 1 Corinthians 1:14; and 1:16

The first text speaks of another household who became Christians: ‘Crispus ... believed in the Lord, together with his entire household. And many of the Corinthians hearing Paul believed and were baptized.’ Does it not seem here again that a man, his household and many neighbors were first evangelized by the gospel messengers, then they believed and confessed the Lord in baptism? By theologizing from Old Testament analogies to circumcision, and the covenant which circumcision sealed, some find ground for infant baptism in this passage—as in the jailor, and Lydia and Cornelius stories. Robert Reymond, a firm believer in infant baptism on the basis of this analogy and covenant, warns:

I would counsel that the paedobaptist should not put much weight on these ‘household baptisms,’ for even if he could convince the antipaedobaptist that in these cases the believer’s household was baptized on the basis of the believer’s faith ... he cannot prove that any of these households had infants or small children in them.⁵

The baptism of certain disciples early in Paul’s time at Ephesus (Acts 19:5) furnishes no evidence for this part of our inquiry into the subject of baptism.

Perhaps the most important work to promote the legitimacy of infant baptism in a hundred years was Joachim Jeremias’, translated and published in English in 1960 as Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries.⁶ A famous scholar, he sought to employ the historical sources to vindicate infant baptism. He derived his evidence from the New Testament, documents of history of the first four centuries and surviving inscriptions—especially inscriptions of Christian burials. Earlier, Oscar Cullmann had written in defense of infant baptism. Though himself an advocate of the present practice of infant baptism, Kurt Aland, of the German University of Münster, produced a point-by-point refutation of Jeremias.⁷ At about the same time G. R. Beasley-Murray produced a very comprehensive volume.⁸ Karl Barth may have done most to stir up this new scholarly literature on an old subject by, as the world’s most famous Reformed theologian, writing in fierce repudiation of infant baptism.⁹ The same wave of interest produced Anglican C. F. D. Moule’s statement ‘that there is no direct evidence’ for infant baptism ‘in the New Testament,’ that inferences based on household baptism and Jesus’ blessing of little children are quite inadequate. He used these conclusions to propose anew that in the case of baptized infants the laying on of hands (confirmation) ‘was integral to baptism’ (Acts 19:5)—in connection, of course, with preparatory instruction.¹⁰

Defense of Infant Baptism by Protestant Non-Lutheran Evangelicals

About all that can ever be said on this matter was said by the first generations of Reformed theologians—Zwingli, Bucer and contemporaries and stated shortly thereafter by Calvin in the fourth book of the Institutes, chapters 14–16.

All the Reformers, beginning with Luther, struggled with two things. First, they knew from the evangelical promises of Scripture that justification is wholly by faith. They knew that baptism is an act of faith, a confession of faith. Each of the Reformers had been baptized as an infant before he could exercise his own faith. All the adherents of the Reformation had similarly been christened, and as pastors they baptized the infant offspring of their adherents. The apparent disconnection with faith had to be explained somehow. Second, beginning immediately, growing numbers of Christians renounced infant baptism and brought persuasive arguments against it. They were called Anabaptists —‘again-baptizers.’

Calvin’s doctrine of baptism was thoroughly free of sacramentalism. To be sure, some of his language seems to assign to the act of baptism what rightly belongs to faith. But the suspicious reader should grant to Calvin the same consideration he grants to Ananias who urged Paul, ‘Rise and be baptized and wash away your sins’ (Acts 22:16). Here Ananias simply merged the symbol with the fact symbolized, as is not infrequent in discourse of any kind.

It seemed obvious to opponents of infant baptism (as Calvin stated) that ‘infant baptism has arisen not so much from a clear mandate of Scripture as from a decree of the church.’¹¹ He promised to show that ‘the fact is far otherwise.’¹² He did not in his mature teaching claim that in some way infants can have faith (as Luther did), or that parents’ or sponsors’ faith suffices, or that baptism is required in view of future faith (as some others of the time were saying).¹³ Early on, he had been content to say that God could call the elect to ‘enter by faith into eternal life’ at whatever age God chooses, but felt unsure of that argument, as shown by immediate appeal to another route of proof, namely Jesus’ saying that it is the will of God that ‘little children’ should ‘come’ to him (Matt. 19:14).¹⁴

In the final edition of Institutes, Calvin strove mightily to prove—against persistent Anabaptist attacks at Geneva—that God had instituted infant baptism. He rather grandly introduces the argument.¹⁵ The editors of the Westminster edition of 1960 summarize Calvin’s argument through the next six paragraphs: ‘Infant baptism, considered in relation to what it typifies, corresponds to circumcision and is authorized in the covenant with Abraham.’¹⁶ The covenant is the same. The promised salvation is the same. Only the symbols—i.e. the outward ceremonies, circumcision and baptism—are different. The chief arguments of Charles Hodge (nineteenth-century Presbyterian), Berkhof (Systematic Theology), Buswell (A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion), John Murray (Christian Baptism), Francis Schaeffer (Baptism) and Robert Reymond (A New Systematic Theology), are essentially the same. Calvin buttresses the main argument by appeal to Jesus’ receiving and blessing little children (Matt. 19:13–15).¹⁷ He bristles at the obvious question, ‘What is the connection with baptism?’ and answers in a way satisfactory, I think, only to those who wish him to be correct.

He devotes many pages to answering objections to the supposed analogy between baptism and circumcision¹⁸ and dealing with other problems raised (17–31). At the end of this discussion he proposes one final reason for perpetuating the custom of infant baptism. The baptism of their own children (and presumably of others from time to time) serves to keep before parents the duty of training them in godliness and enables small children (if I get it right) to feel at home as members of the church.¹⁹

Reformed dogma and polemics have not expanded this core of teaching much in 400 years. Perhaps the last argument—an appeal to the utility of the practice, however it may have originated and by whatever authority—is the best one. Wendel thought so—he failed in extracting proof of infant baptism from ‘texts of scripture.’ I close on the topic with a quotation of perhaps the most friendly and highly regarded of the interpreters of Calvin to the modern world.

Calvin has been reproached for the weakness of his reasoning, in such contrast to the more rigorous exegetical methods he usually employed ... and he himself seems to have been aware of the defects of his exegesis upon this point. He was debarred however, from using any other, from the moment when he undertook to defend on scriptural grounds an institution of later date than the New Testament writings, and to justify an ecclesiastical tradition after having proclaimed that all tradition, to be valid, must be based upon certain scriptural proof.²⁰

I have a measure of sympathy, if not agreement, with Wendel's conclusion on the matter which immediately follows. It is essentially the position of Aland, who, though an advocate of infant baptism, assailed (see p. 985) J. Jeremias' attempts to prove infant baptism in history and Scripture.

By his having allowed for a degree of independence in the domain of external discipline in ceremonies Calvin had, moreover pointed to a way in which we may regret he did not go farther. For that would have enabled him to come to the conclusion that infant baptism was useful to the church and for the piety of the faithful, while frankly acknowledging that one cannot find an acceptable basis for it in the Scriptures.²¹

II. The Mode of Baptism

Three modes of baptism have existed in the church for a very long time, all still practiced by sizeable sectors at the present hour. The Eastern Orthodox churches in all branches immerse the candidate, whether infant or adult, in that the whole body is covered by water. This comes as a surprise to most present Western Christians, where at least till recently other modes prevail. In Lutheran churches the prevailing mode is to pour a copious amount of water from a spouted vessel or pitcher on the head (affusion) in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. In Methodist and Presbyterian churches some variety of aspersion (sprinkling) is prevalent—sometimes trine action, i.e. at the pronouncement of each of the three names within the Trinity.

Except for the churches which immerse, the mode is not usually held to be important—though I have in my library a book entitled Biblical Baptism Not Immersion. The official position even of the Roman Church is tolerant of any application of water in the name of the three Persons with intent to baptize. The following from The Catholic Encyclopedia will come as a surprise to many evangelical Protestants.

The very word 'baptize' ... means a washing. Three forms of ablution have prevailed among Christians, and the church holds these all to be valid because they fulfil the requisite significance of the baptismal laving. These forms are immersion, infusion [pouring] and aspersion. The most ancient form usually employed was unquestionably immersion. This is not only evident from the writings of the Fathers and the rituals of both the Latin [Roman] and Oriental churches, but it can be gathered from the Epistles of St. Paul, who speaks of baptism as a bath (Eph. 5:26; Rom. 6:4; Titus, 3:5). In the Latin church, immersion seems to have prevailed until the twelfth century. After that it is found in some places even as late as the sixteenth century. Infusion and aspersion, however, were growing common in the thirteenth century and gradually prevailed in the Western church.²²

The same article goes on to say: ‘The threefold immersion is unquestionably very ancient in the Church and apparently of Apostolic origin.’²³

The earliest post-biblical Christian statement about Christian baptism confirms the above assertions about the earliest mode of baptism. It is from the Didachē, known to the modern world only since 1875.²⁴ The seventh paragraph instructs:

Baptize ... in living [running] water. But if thou hast not living water, then baptize in other water; and if thou art not able in cold, then warm. But if thou hast neither, then pour water on the head thrice in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.²⁵

This document is dated by some authorities between ad 80 and 120 though by some a decade or two later.²⁶

I have earlier taken notice how both Calvin and Luther acknowledged that the practice of affusion or aspersion of their times were modifications of immersion (dipping).²⁷

In my judgment the question of mode ought to be decided on the evidences of Scripture and history which relate specifically to the subject of baptism. To rest one’s decision on inferences drawn from doctrines of covenant, family solidarity, the concerns of Jesus for children, on the one hand, or the symbolism involved in relation to cleansing (Titus 3:5) or union with Christ in death, burial and resurrection, and the like is to retreat from the controls of a court to the unregulated opinions of the parties in dispute. It is, of course, correct to think that the symbolism of baptism is likely better to be represented by full adherence to the apostolic mode—since Apostles wrote the Scriptures.

A venerable defense of immersion using every scrap of evidence available at the time is Baptism: Its Mode and Its Subjects by Alexander Carson, a former Presbyterian educated at the University of Glasgow.²⁸ Many older Baptist works rely heavily on Carson.

A good recent defence of immersion, being both modest and irenic, as well as precise and thorough, is R. L. Saucy’s book.²⁹ I recommend, with slight reservation, Saucy’s last words on the topic:

So it would seem that the basic significance of baptism, namely identification with Christ and His saving work, might, if necessary, be signified through a mode other than immersion, even as the early church provided [He is, I suppose, referring to the Didachē, para. #7]. The evidence points, however, to immersion [even nine immersion] as the standard practice of the New Testament church and the mode which most fully signifies Christian salvation.³⁰

There is broad agreement among all parties that baptism by immersion provides more precise and vivid representation of the truths symbolized than either pouring or sprinkling. I close the subject with an important early witness to baptismal practice in the first centuries. In a discussion of many Christian practices at about the end of the second century Tertullian reports the following about general baptismal practice among all churches.

When we are going to enter the water, but a little before, in the presence of the congregation and under the hand of the president, we solemnly profess that we disown the devil, and his pomp, and his angels. Here upon we are thrice immersed, making a somewhat ampler pledge than the Lord has appointed in the gospel. Then we are taken up (as new-born) etc.³¹

It is important to note that Tertullian previously makes a point of saying that this is old tradition among Christians.

III. Meaning, Symbolism, Effects of Baptism

The meaning of baptism can hardly be separated from its symbolism and effects as regards the one baptized, the church, the world and God. All are well subsumed under what are sometimes called the blessings of baptism.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Europe had been blighted for centuries by the utterly false dogma that baptism is only the first of seven sacraments which actually confer salvation or some aspect of it and that the only agency from whom to receive these sacraments is the Church of Rome.

Having learned anew that salvation is by faith alone, the sixteenth-century evangelicals understood the blessings of baptism are the very blessings of that faith in Christ which baptism confesses. Further, even the ‘magisterial’ Reformers (we now say ‘mainline’), though they granted the legitimacy of infant baptism against the protestations of Anabaptists, were compelled to think of baptism as it is spread on the pages of the Bible which everyone now was reading. The New Testament was written by the very apostolic evangelists (Peter, Paul, John) whose preaching had produced the believers whose baptisms these writers administered and explained on those New Testament pages. Let us leap backward before the centuries of Protestant controversy for an introduction to the subject of the blessings of Christian baptism. The quoted words in the next paragraphs are from John Calvin.

1. Baptism formally initiates us ‘into the society of the church.’³² This is clearly indicated by the sequence of events in the reports of baptisms in Acts. At the end of Peter’s first sermon, and presumably over the next hours, ‘they that gladly received his word [i.e. they believed it] were baptized and the same day were added [obviously to the group who earlier in the day were baptized by the Spirit into a body] about three thousand souls.’ At Caesarea, baptism of Cornelius and his company certified publicly that they had ‘received the Holy Spirit just as we have’ (Acts 10:47, 48). Further, the command to baptize at Matthew 28:19, 20 specified that making a disciple is by baptizing and teaching. Early generations accepted this without question. Baptism is the public ‘certificate,’ so to speak, that one is by religious profession a Christian, a member of the church of his locality with all the benefits appertaining—and, of course, in a sinful world, all the risks as well.

2. ‘Baptism was given us by God primarily to strengthen our faith in him.’³³ This should be coupled with the fact that when we receive baptism faith is strengthened thereby. The very act of submitting one’s body to the hands of the minister to submerge us in water and draw one out again is an exercise in faith of a sort. Baptism in the ancient stone baptistries was of necessity, because of the short length of the pool, in kneeling posture as the head was bowed and moved forward into the water—the classic oriental posture of reverent worship or of submission.³⁴ Going through the motions of submission or of its opposite is, from a purely psychological point of view, strengthening to the state of mind it intended to mirror.

3. ‘Baptism ... was given by God ... to serve as our confession before men.’³⁵ Calvin said that was true of the sacrament of Eucharist also, for when we walk into the place of assembly and publicly receive the elements in the company of the believers who have ‘come together’ in the church (1 Cor. 11:17, 18, 20), we tell the world to whom we belong—to Christ and ‘the church, which is his body’ (Eph. 1:22, 23).

4. More important for the new believer, his baptism is an experiential certificate that his sins are forgiven. ‘The first thing that the Lord sets out for us is that baptism should be a token and proof of our cleansing ... like a sealed document to confirm to us that all our sins are so abolished, remitted and effaced that they can never come to his sight, be recalled, or charged against us. For he wills that all who believe be baptized for the remission of sins.’³⁶ The Reformers generally—against the doctrine of the Mass, of penance and of purgatory—held before their people that the forgiveness certified in baptism covered not only sins of the past but all sins present or future: as Luther declared in his early work The Babylonian Captivity of the Church (see Wendel, p. 320) and as Calvin goes on to say.

We are not to think that baptism was conferred upon us only for past time so that for newly committed sins committed after baptism we must seek new remedies of expiation in some other sacraments.... [He then refers to the error of some early church people in this regard who postponed baptism till death was imminent and goes on to say:] We are once for all washed and purged for our whole life [not by water but by the blood of Christ]. Therefore, as often as we fall away we ought to recall the memory of our baptism and fortify our mind with it.³⁷

5. Baptism furnishes the believer with an object-lesson affirming our union with Christ in His death and resurrection. It must not be construed merely to admonish us to follow Jesus’ example of self-denial, or death to sinful desire, but that, as we go under the water, we symbolize Jesus’ death and our union with Him in it. In emerging from the water we picture to ourselves our union with Him in resurrection and His divine life (see Institutes, IV.15.5). Sometimes here the language of Calvin seems to suggest that baptism effects this union but elsewhere it is clear that he means that just as we are justified by faith in Christ, so by faith we know that we are united with Christ in death and resurrection, that ‘to live is Christ’ (Phil. 1:21).

6. We must also point out that baptism reminds us that in union with Christ we are presently guaranteed a share in all the good things He gained by death and resurrection. Somehow medieval theology, as well as the perennial drift toward salvation by human merit and accomplishment, have hidden this plain truth of Romans 5 and 6 and of Philippians 2. My memory is fresh of the first time I heard it unfolded to me at a Bible conference when at the age of fourteen I was already a baptized believer. I have found that when preaching to audiences in mid-America, where various strains of legalism and sacramentalism have taken hold, much care should be taken to explain what baptism is and is not, what baptism does effect and does not effect. It sometimes seems impossible to eradicate the ancient error of Christendom that sinners can be saved by a ceremony, even one instituted by Jesus our Lord. This problem is about as acute in Baptist and similar groups as among those which practice infant baptism. I remember all too well a question asked by a young woman named Marian in our church at Fremont, Ohio. I had just conducted a ceremony of dedication of a newborn infant at the Sunday morning worship service. I had explained that we were not conferring salvation in part or whole on the baby. ‘But pastor, would Norma’s baby go to heaven if she died even if it hadn’t been blest?’ Errors old, deep and prevalent the hard!

A Postscript

With regret I close this brief treatment of the subjects of baptism and the mode of administration. Denominational works of systematic theology usually devote large space to these matters. In past generations great public debates over the subjects and mode of baptism were attended by crowds. Many of these debates were recorded by a stenographer and published. These books sit on back shelves of church and school libraries today. More recently, with less heat and more research, a scholarly debate has risen in books and journals. I have for many reasons (chiefly to avoid enlarging this book) determined not to proceed further into this world of controversy here.

¹ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998), p. 193.

² 2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30, cf. 2 Tim. 2:19.

³ On ‘in the name of Jesus’ see Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith, 1998, pp. 926–927.

⁴ See Reymond, p. 942.

⁵ ibid., p. 943.

⁶ Joachim Jeremias, Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries (London: SCM Press, 1960).

⁷ Kurt Aland, Did the Early Church Baptize Infants?, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray (London: SCM Press, 1963).

⁸ G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (London: Macmillan, 1963).

⁹ Karl Barth, The Teaching of the Church Regarding Baptism, trans. E. A. Payne (London: SCM Press, 1965).

¹⁰ C. F. D. Moule, Worship in the New Testament (Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1961, 1967), p. 50.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹¹ Calvin, Institutes, IV. 8.16.

¹² ibid.

- ¹³ Francois Wendel, Calvin: His Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (New York: Harper and Row, 1950, 1963), p. 324.
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 384.
- ¹⁵ Calvin, op. cit., 16.1.
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 1324.
- ¹⁷ Calvin, Institutes, IV. 16, 7–9.
- ¹⁸ ibid., 16.10–16.
- ¹⁹ ibid., 16.32. A brief but comprehensive treatment of Calvin’s views appears in A. M. Hunter’s The Teaching of Calvin: A Modern Interpretation, 2nd rev. ed. (Westwood, NJ: Revell 1950), pp. 166–190.
- ²⁰ Wendel, op. cit., p. 328.
- ²¹ Wendel, op. cit., pp. 328, 329.
- Catholic Encyclopedia The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes
- ²² W. H. W. Fanning, ‘Baptism,’ The Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. II, pp. 216, 262.
- ²³ ibid.
- ²⁴ Published eight years later and then in the original Greek and English translation by J. B. Lightfoot in The Apostolic Fathers (1891).
- ²⁵ Lightfoot. p. 232, also ANF, Vol. I, p. 379.
- ²⁶ See also J. N. D. Kelley, Early Christian Doctrines, text and notes, pp. 193–195.
- ²⁷ Perhaps the most weighty objections to infant baptism have come from scholars whose churches practice it. See the introduction to Aland’s Did the Early Church Baptize Infants?—‘Introduction’ by Beasley-Murray pp. 18–22. Among well-known names are D. T. Forsyth, H. R. Mackintosh, Robert Nelson, Charles Gore, Gregory Dix—Lutheran, Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Anglicans—even N. P. Williams’ Bampton Lectures.
- ²⁸ The standard edition is the 5th (Philadelphia, 1857) which is the prototype of Jay Green’s 1969 reprint.
- ²⁹ D. I. Scaev, The Church in God’s Program (Moody Press, 1972), pp. 208, 213

³⁰ ibid., pp. 212, 213.

³¹ Tertullian, The Chaplet or Concerning the Crown, ANF, Vol. III, p. 94.

³² Calvin, Institutes, IV, 15.1.

³³ ibid., 14.1., trans. Wendel, p. 318.

³⁴ These relics of antiquity are spread all over the world of ancient Christendom. The one perhaps most frequently seen by tourists is at the site of the basilica of Mt. Nebo—visited by Pope John Paul II in 2000. I examined it in 1962 and again in 1976. Harvey, op. cit., pp 152–162, provides details of measurements, examples of ancient baptistries, mosaics and catacombs.

³⁵ Calvin, op. cit., 14.1.

³⁶ ibid., p. 1304.

³⁷ ibid., IV.15.3.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (983). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

24

Worship at the Lord's Table (I)

Chapter 21, on 'Public Meetings for Worship in the church,' said little about the ordinance of 'the Lord's Supper,' reserving that important topic for special treatment. Baptism normally occurs but once in a believer's lifetime; the Lord's Supper is a continuing ordinance which Jesus clearly indicated should be observed frequently. Furthermore, in this ordinance, worship of God in Christ reaches a depth and height not ordinarily equaled elsewhere at any other time. Thus we first associated the Supper rather than baptism with worship even though these two are the only Christian rites properly called ordinances or sacraments.

Late in the Reformation era The Westminster Confession (chap. 31, Arts. 1–4) and The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion (Arts. 28–31) formulated a basic Protestant-evangelical theology of the Eucharist for English-speaking evangelicals. Neither refers specifically to the Lutheran doctrine of the Supper, though Westminster specifically denies the Lutheran doctrine that wicked people actually receive 'the thing signified' in the bread and wine. Both reject the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. Though both call the Supper a 'sacrament' they do so without any idea that the elements confer saving grace. The discussion to follow here is rather fully oriented to the few biblical materials on the subject, but does not reject these important historic documents of primitive evangelical theology. They rendered permanent until this day important gains of the Reformation of the sixteenth century.

Names and Other Designations of the Ordinance

Not everyone agrees that the ordinance is properly called ‘The Lord’s Supper,’ for many think the one occurrence (1 Cor. 11:22) designates the meal (‘love feast,’ Jude 12) at which the churches of ancient times observed the Eucharist. Yet, in most present-day circles, the Lord’s Supper is the commonest name and it is not likely to be dislodged. Paul also called it ‘the communion’ (koinōnia, 1 Cor. 10:16 kjv) probably because it is the most meaningful ritual act of the church, which is itself the koinōnia (a word which means mutual participation, Acts 2:42). The ‘Supper’ was understood to be received from the Lord Himself as host, hence ‘the Lord’s table’ and ‘the cup of the Lord’ (1 Cor. 10:21 niv). The earliest designation was ‘breaking of bread’ (Acts 2:42; 20:7). This Supper is opposed to the koinōnia of devils (1 Cor. 10:20). Further, it is the ‘communion [koinōnia] of the body of Christ’ (1 Cor. 10:16 kjv). Another common name has always been ‘eucharist’ (Gr. he eucharistia, ‘the thanksgiving’) echoing Luke 20:19 and 1 Corinthians 11:23, 24, where it is said that at the Last Passover ‘Jesus ... took bread, and ... [gave] thanks,’ and so on. Though some are uncomfortable using the word ‘eucharist’ because it is perceived to have overtones of the Roman Catholic Mass and of sacramentalism, Eucharist (thanksgiving) is a perfectly unambiguous term as far as the scriptural setting is concerned. This term clearly designates the bread and cup as distinct from the then customary meal, or love feast. Moreover, in this rite, believers do communally give thanks to God for His ‘inexpressible gift’ of Jesus our Lord (2 Cor. 9:15).

Origin and Institution by Christ

Not the Supper itself but the interpretation of it by Paul has been traced by certain historians to heathen, Hellenist memorial feasts familiar to the Gentile believers and to Paul.¹ Other critical writers reject this view.² Yet form criticism and historical studies have produced no convincing evidence that Paul, our chief source of a theology of the Lord’s Supper, drew any of his ideas about it from any source except the Lord, either through other Apostles or direct revelation of Christ Himself. He did not, of course, have the Gospel’s reports, because at least in present form they had not yet been written.

Modern scholarship has gone through waves of opinion as to whether the occasion of the institution was indeed ‘the last passover’ or a last Jewish supper of a different kind, perhaps a kiddush or a chaburah. The former was a supper-ceremony held by a family or brotherhood in preparation for a larger celebration, the latter a fellowship-meal frequently held.³

Such theories really raise as many problems as they try to solve. There are real problems with the Gospel accounts as to the day of the Supper and the crucifixion a few hours later, not particularly relevant to the institution of the Eucharist. Christian tradition fixes attention to the fact that the Passover is the feast mentioned. Joachim Jeremias supplies perhaps the most decisive word and he favors the Passover.⁴ Whatever the case may be, we know that Jesus took elements of Old Testament ritual familiar to twelve Jews and transformed their meaning. On the other hand it can be truly said that He took the commonest elements of any Near East meal and employed them as the most holy emblems of the central message of the gospel, namely: ‘Christ Jesus died to save sinners.’

There are five accounts of the Supper—each Gospel and Paul (1 Cor. 11), though John does not mention the institution of the Eucharistic rite. Writing about twenty-five years after that evening Paul said: ‘the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken [broken is not in the best Gr. texts] for you: this do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me’ (1 Cor. 11:23–25 kjv). I remark:

1. Paul’s discourse, just quoted, is the fullest scriptural account, containing most elements of the other accounts of the actions of our Lord and the actual words of institution (Luke 22:19, 20; Mark 14:22, 23; Matt. 26:26, 27).

2. Jesus’ actions and words were deliberate, intended to model a rite to be regularly observed among His disciples (if not quite fully yet a church) until the future return of Christ in His kingdom: ‘until it is fulfilled in the kingdom of God... until the kingdom of God comes’ (Luke 22:16, 18; cf. Mark 14:25; Matt. 25:29). Further, ‘Do this, as often as you drink it’ (1 Cor. 11:25 and parallels) uses the present imperative of poieo, to do, the appropriate mood and tense for repeated future action. ‘[A]s often... as often’ (1 Cor. 11:25, 26) indicates many future observances of the rite.

The writers of the Gospels present the story of the Last Supper as the setting for the Eucharistic rite which Christians everywhere were then, at least a generation later, observing. This rite already had been continuously observed at Corinth from the beginning of the church in that city but needed an historical explanation to give meaning. If the tradition had not received authentic written form in the apostolic age the church Fathers later would not have been able to say, as they did, that the church had the same teaching and rites everywhere—that is, it was kat’holikos, Catholic, according to a whole.

To define and enlarge the meaning of the Eucharistic rite and of the events of the day of crucifixion was an apostolical function not a dominical function. Doctrinal explanation was to take place only after the Lord’s Ascension and the affusion of the Spirit—as we have had occasion frequently to note (John 14:25, 26; 15:26, 27; 16:12–15). Paul is the only Apostle who put in canonical writing what the Spirit taught in regard to the meaning of Eucharistic acts and words of Jesus at the Last Supper. Treatment of that subject here will therefore mainly take the form of exposition of what Paul had to say, with some references to the Synoptic texts and John 13–16.

Let us attend preliminarily to the following.

1. Paul founded the church at Corinth, continuing there long enough (eighteen months, Acts 18:11) with some of his best assistants (Aquila, Priscilla, Silas, Timothy) to ground the church in authentic doctrine and practice, leaving behind an active (hyperactive? 1 Cor. 14) congregation. He claimed no originality for the form and texture of his ‘ecclesiology.’ His doctrine was ‘what I also received’ (1 Cor. 15:3 rsv). Conduct and procedures instituted were the deposit of the same tradition which he had received and which were prevalent in all the churches (1 Cor. 11:2; cf. 14:34; 11:16).

2. He wielded full authority from the same Christ who instituted the church and its practice to command obedience to His rules (1 Cor. 14:37, 38). He therefore wrote to confirm old instructions, to clarify and to apply them as well as to institute new ones. He did not hesitate lovingly to assert his authority as above texts and the tenor of both Corinthian Epistles clearly manifest. They bristle with Paul's awareness of responsibility to set things 'in order' (1 Cor. 15:40; 11:33).

3. First Corinthians 10 and 11 supplement Eucharistic practices and interpretation already given. The Lord's Supper had no doubt been observed at Corinth from the founding of that ekklēsia by Paul several years earlier. The instructions of the chapters are also corrective. We do not know precisely what liturgical procedures Paul introduced. In 11:23 he says he 'received' the words of institution 'from the Lord' and 'delivered to you.' This is careful language. He claims no originality whatsoever. He probably is not, however, claiming a special revelation. Presumably it was what he saw as a new Christian being practiced at Damascus, Antioch and Jerusalem. There was an apostolic tradition about such things to which he refers in a special way in introducing the rules about modest attire for presence at communion (1 Cor. 11:13). He uses the technical term for teachings passed down from earlier authority. '[Y]ou ... maintain the traditions [Gr. paradosis] even as I have delivered [Gr. paredōka] them to you' (1 Cor. 11:2 rsv). At the end he says he will later 'set in order' (Gr. diataxomai) (1 Cor. 11:34 kjv). Paul was insistent on 'order' and 'decency' (1 Cor. 14:40) in public worship.

Buechsel's brief remarks⁵ sum up: 'For Paul Christian teaching is tradition (1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Thess. 2:15; 3:6 cf. 1 Cor. 11:23; 15:1–11), and he demands the churches should keep to it, since salvation depends on it (1 Cor. 15:2). He sees no antithesis between pneumatic [spiritual] piety and the high estimation of tradition. The essential point for Paul is that it has been handed down (1 Cor. 15:3), and that it derives from the Lord (11:23). A tradition initiated merely by human authority is without validity.'

4. Modern criticism—source, literary, form, redaction and the like—has been busy for several generations, seeking to establish which parts of the Synoptic and Pauline reports of the words of institution and interpretation are genuinely 'the eucharistic, words of Jesus,' and exploring the related question whether the Last Supper was a Passover supper or something else. Jeremias' bibliography of the latter topic starts with a book by John Lightfoot in the year 1686 and seven densely packed pages later takes us up to the publication of his own book, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus of 1955. There has been a blizzard of papers and books as spin-offs from The Jesus Seminar. In the midst of chaff some of this literature is serious, fruitful scholarship. And I for one have profited from reading some of it—see my *A Greater Commission*⁶ and *The Life of Christ*⁷ and 'Rhetorical Allegories Among the Parables of Jesus?' in New Testament Essays, ed. G. T. Meadors.⁸ Yet all our doctrines must be derived from the canonical Scriptures as the text has come to us from antiquity. In this, textual criticism has been of some direct aid in establishing an authentic text and it is that text with which the exegetes and theologians must work, not the waves of scholarly opinion as to sources, redactions, trajectories, genre and similar which hypothetically produced the Gospels' text.

The Order of the Lord's Supper and its Meaning

There is an 'order' for the continuing memorial rite to which both Scripture and custom have given the name the Lord's Supper. As we have noted, the rite is conducted at 'the Lord's table' (1 Cor. 10:21 niv) indicating that He owns the table. It is conducted in the spiritual precincts of the 'churches of Christ' (Rom. 16:16) whose angels 'testify ... for the churches' (Rev. 22:16) and which meets to worship on 'the Lord's day' (Rev. 1:10; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). There is still great liberty within the customary table etiquette of every ethnic, tribal or family group for the serving of food and drink, but only with due respect for the table etiquette and ceremony of the Lord whose Supper it is, i.e. the prescribed 'order' of the scriptural sources. Paul, as we have seen, received the order for the Supper from 'the Lord' via those Apostles which were 'before me' (Gal. 1:17) and the practice (tradition) of churches founded by them. We do not need to know why of all these custodians of 'the tradition' none except Paul gave specific instructions and interpretation in canonical New Testament writings. Nor do we know why Paul did so, only to rebuke the undiscerning error of Christians eating at the 'table of demons' (1 Cor. 10:14–33) and to correct disorder at 'the table of the Lord' (1 Cor. 10:21; 11:17–34). In either case, whether lack of discernment or the disorder, the results were 'not for the better but for the worse' (1 Cor. 11:17).

We shall consider first, What the Ordinance of the Lord Supper is (1 Cor. 11:17–23), secondly, What It Means (vv. 24–26a), and thirdly, How the Ordinance Should be Observed (vv. 26b–30).

I. What the Ordinance is (1 Cor. 11:17–23)

A Coming Together of the Local ekklēsia

The Lord's Supper is a coming together of the local ekklēsia. The Supper also occasions the coming together, the reason for gathering. This is the sense of verses 17–20, viz.: 'when you come together' (v. 17); 'when you assemble as a church [ekklēsia]' (v. 18 rsv); 'When you meet together' (v. 20 rsv).

In these verses ekklēsia refers to the gathering, a gathering of the church specifically to observe 'the Lord's supper' (v. 20).⁹

1. This is a unique feature of Christianity. Even in the Judaism of Paul's time and to the present the chief ordinances and rituals took place in family and home, though synagogue meetings were important. Meetings at the Tabernacle-temple were required only of adult males three times a year. Neither did the pagans of antiquity gather together for worship in their idol temples. Rather, people came to the porch or portal of the building with their offerings and requests and were met there by a priest or servant of the place. He then took their gift or sacrifice within and performed prescribed rituals within. The people who came to the door then went away. There were religious aspects of public gatherings for civic purposes but they were not usually designed specially for worship of the god or for mutual encouragement or expression of religious feelings, as in a gathering of the Christian ekklēsia. The ancient Roman world took notice of the strange 'come[ing] together' (v. 18) and 'meet[ing] together' (v. 20 rsv) of the Christians and wondered what was going on—nothing good, it was said. On account of this 'peculiarity', the Christians became suspects of conspiracy and sedition, leading rather quickly to severe persecution. It is our identifying characteristic. Even today the population as a whole seems to regard Christians simply as people who go to church on Sunday.

The efforts of Christians before the 'edict of toleration' (ad 313) to find places to meet for fellowship, instruction and worship at the Lord's table without interference required great ingenuity. Latourette places this in perspective.¹⁰ See the source of this information in Eusebius.¹¹ This testifies to the importance of this indispensable feature of the church's worship.

2. Since it is a 'come[ing] together' of all the ekklēsia the 'clergy' cannot observe the Eucharist by themselves. The practice of celebrating 'mass' by a priest, who himself eats the Eucharistic bread and drinks the wine, with no participants, is a travesty of 'communion.' Throughout Roman Catholic history to the present, Masses are performed for various purposes—to accumulate merit for the dead so to release their souls from purgatory, and similar, and may be paid for by concerned relatives of the dead. This custom resulted in endowed altars which produced regular income for the church. Before he renounced the stipend, the young John Calvin was supported in his studies by the income generated by Masses said at several altars.¹² The same 'come[ing] together' discourages—if it does not prohibit—private communion.

3. In such a 'come[ing] together,' at its best, there will be participation by all those assembled. First Corinthians 14 does not seem to describe a meeting to observe the Eucharist, but the obvious congregational participation by attending believers should not be uncharacteristic of the solemnity of the Eucharist. The scholarly consensus on 'Do not quench the Spirit. Do not despise prophecies' (1 Thess. 5:19, 20) seems to be that the subject of the verses is the church's meetings for worship. In any case, wholesome worship should strike a balance (certainly not the same in every assembly nor always at exactly the same level) between 'decently and in order' (1 Cor. 14:40) on the one hand and, on the other, 'Do not quench the Spirit. Do not despise prophecies'—spontaneous unrehearsed expressions (1 Thess. 5:19, 20).

4. As a coming together for koinōnia (mutual participation, 1 Cor. 10:16; 11:17, 20) the Eucharist at its best requires certain features of church architecture once the house church is outgrown. Church architecture should promote mutuality of participation by having all 'liturgical' actions (reading of Scripture; breaking bread; pouring wine; speaking words of prayer, blessing and benediction) in full view of all attendants. Also participants should not be isolated from one another by seating arrangements.

The ancient Roman 'court house' or basilica-style of edifice adopted in the early centuries promoted all the errors of communal worship possible, ending up with a partially physical spectacle hidden in mysterious, almost unseen, ritual. Activities of the leaders (priests) came to be centered at an 'altar' hidden behind a screen in a small extension of the building called an apse. The Roman Church is presently engaged in controversy about moving the 'altar' (for 'the sacrifice of the mass') to somewhere near the worshippers and in plain view. The Reformed-Presbyterian-Puritan people brought the 'communion table' out into the 'nave' (main room) of the church edifices they inherited and arranged the pews or chairs about in various configurations. Under the influence of the Enlightenment (eighteenth-century) and later Revivalist impulses the familiar Protestant 'concert stage' appeared with table, chairs, pulpit, lectern, choir and baptistry all in plain view straight ahead, but farther and farther from 'the back row' of the assembled church (gathering).

There is no way yet discovered whereby a room adapted specifically for worship within biblical lines can be quite what modern people seem to want for weddings, drama, Christmas programs, and the like. The diagrams at the end section of chapter 21 above illustrate both good and bad arrangement. There is no conflict between a room set up for speaking and hearing the preached Word (1 Cor. 1:21) and worship at the Lord's table, but the same is not true of that form of modern drama known as the church wedding—which ought to tell us something about this late twentieth-century development and about how the popular culture affects the tastes and the real interests of many 'modern' Christians.

Leaders in public worship should be able to have eye contact with the assembled people and the worshippers should not be able to isolate themselves in the pew, looking vaguely far ahead to preacher and choir. Public address (electric) systems can promote this architectural delinquency so that worshippers have little more 'come[ing] together' than if they were listening to a religious broadcast at home. Some churches have, with some success, put the 'co' (which means with) back in 'communion' by setting the service around tables in a fellowship hall.

To sum up, church architecture both reflects and teaches theology. It either facilitates preaching and hearing the Word and promotes Eucharistic worship at its biblical best or hinders it. The figures at the end of chapter 21 illustrate these points.¹³

It should be added that the physical setting of valid worship is of only relative importance. I cite with approval two trenchant statements—the first from theoretically the least formal in worship of modern Christian groups.

Nor is any building required for [worship] though such may be of great convenience to a company of believers in bad weather. The size, cost and architectural design of such a building has nothing whatever to do with the worth, or otherwise of worship.¹⁴

Mr. Gibbs is associated with the Plymouth Brethren.

The second was a representative of the ecumenical movement when that movement was strong, inspiring serious study of worship theory, style, setting and the like in an effort to find a common denominator for everyone.

A Protestant missionary points out that 'Catholic' worship, whether Roman or Anglo-Catholic, has great attraction for the primitive African, and for Christians of the first generation. The services in the churches founded by 'Evangelical' or non-episcopal churches in the West, usually reflect affairs in the Home church, only on a 'simpler' level. The revivalist fire which once gave this kind of worship its real power has died out, and in too many places the result is respectability—and dullness. 'Is it any wonder' writes a missionary from West Africa, 'that our Christians say, under their breath, or openly "what a weariness it is"!' ¹⁵

A 'Supper' Peculiarly 'the Lord's.'

The Eucharist is a 'supper' peculiarly 'the Lord's' (1 Cor. 11:20). The God of Israel spoke of the Sabbath as 'my Sabbaths' (Exod. 31:13; Lev. 19:3, 30; 26:2) and 'the LORD's Sabbaths' (Lev. 23:38). The Sabbath was given by God even though 'for man' (Mark 2:27). He is 'lord of the Sabbath' (Luke 6:5). Though the first day of the week (1 Cor. 16:2) is not called the Sabbath, it is specially designated ‘the Lord’s day’ (Rev. 1:10). In the latter case ‘Lord’s’ is not the usual possessive form of the noun kurios, but the adjective kuriakos, ‘belong to the Lord.’ This word is used only twice in the New Testament (as discussed in chapter 4 of this section)—of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:20) and the Lord’s day (Rev. 1:10). Both are His and precious but, like the Sabbath, designed also for mankind’s benefit.

Jesus, then, is the host at the supper. The table is ‘the Lord’s table.’ The elements of the Supper—common foods of common people—have been given to the Lord by the Lord’s people for the Lord’s use. In the beginning, these were large contributions of food for a common meal, the excess food being distributed to needy folk.

This, then, is not at all like pagan worship, in which the god lived in his naos (sanctuary) deep within the temple (hieron) where his (or her) statue stood and where only priests could enter.

So the problem of the proper name for the ‘meeting place’ arises. Is the building where ‘the Lord’s people’ eat ‘the Lord’s supper’ properly ‘the Lord’s house,’ i.e. a sanctuary? Our English Protestant ancestors said, No! ‘Sanctuary’ properly designates the place where the god of a heathen temple lives or, as in the Old Testament house of God, the place where God was specially manifest. ‘[T]he Lord is in his holy temple’ says Habakkuk (2:20). The Greek Old Testament renders the word ‘temple’ as naos—‘place of God’s residence.’ But did not Jesus lay all that aside (John 4:24)? God’s place of special residence on earth is now in the hearts of the people who worship Him, not in a house of wood or stone. The Roman Church claims that the leftover bread from last Sunday’s Mass, reserved in the ‘tabernacle’ over the ‘altar’ of the ‘sacrifice of the mass,’ is God incarnate. One should genuflect before ‘it.’ So the name ‘sanctuary’ fits the part of the building where the ‘altar’ is situated in the place where the god is.

‘Sanctuary’ does seem to express the reverence which devout Christians feel for the place where they regularly meet for worship. Yet, if our church’s architecture should reflect and teach sound theology, so also should our vocabulary of church architecture. Hence a question arises: What is the appropriate name for the room in which ‘the Lord’s people’ gather as guests at ‘the Lord’s table’ to eat ‘the Lord’s Supper,’ the same room where other acts of corporate worship take place? It has become customary (and church architects uniformly employ it) to call it ‘the sanctuary.’ Is this desirable? Again, our English-speaking Protestant ancestors said, No! Why?

Frederick L. Eckel defines sanctuary for Anglicans as ‘holy place,’¹⁶ writing, ‘The area around an altar or portion of the chancel behind the altar rail; the main room for worship in evangelical [i.e. now liturgical] churches.’ Elsewhere he notes that the evangelicals do not have a solid-sided ‘altar’ in the style of the ancient stone altars where fire burned on the top, but a ‘communion table’ with legs and ‘In Remembrance of Me’ inscribed on the front apron.

Objection to ‘sanctuary’ is that it is a relic of ancient pagan temples, where the god dwelt in the eastern end in a recession called an apse (in basilican style) and where real blood sacrifice took place on an altar. For the ancient Athenian worshipper of the parthenos (virgin) Athena at the Parthenon (residence of the virgin), the east chamber where she dwelt was indeed a ‘holy place’ (that is, sanctuary, Gr. naos). The Tabernacle of the Old Testament and the various temples which replaced it were properly called sanctuaries (holy places) because the God of Israel did indeed choose to dwell there (2 Chron. 6:1; Hab. 2:18–20; cf. Heb. 8:1 ff.). At the present time there is said to be such a ‘sanctuary ... the true tabernacle’ in heaven (Heb. 8:2 kjv), but none on earth except the believers (singly and collectively) themselves.

‘Sanctuary’ also helps perpetuate the utterly false notion that a real sacrifice takes place in the Eucharist. In such case it is proper to call the communion table an altar. The substance of bread and wine are ‘transubstantiated’ into Christ’s flesh and blood. When leftover portions are kept over the altar in a small cupboard (‘tabernacle’ of His presence) the incarnate God is present in the area. Hence worship is properly directed toward it by genuflection (a rather intricate partial bow and kneeling motion). In this sphere of thought, the area about the ‘altar’ in the depths of the chancel is indeed a ‘sanctuary,’ for God does dwell there in the flesh of the sacrament.

A sounder theology holds that the assembly of Christians constitutes a sanctuary where God dwells (1 Cor. 3:16, 17)—whether the believers be assembled or dispersed to work, play, school or home. Paul tells us that God will avenge with destruction any who desecrate (the opposite of consecrate) this sacred place, saying: ‘Anyone who destroys [harms] God’s temple will himself be destroyed [harmed] by God, because the temple of God is holy; and you are that temple’ (1 Cor. 3:17 reb).

The church meets in a ‘meeting house’ or ‘chapel,’ or even a ‘church,’ for that word, in a Christian setting, was first used of the meetinghouse—a kuriakon, the house belonging to the Lord (see chap. 4 above). ‘Church house’ also has good precedent. Every one of these terms sadly may at present sound quaint or queer to ears accustomed to ‘sanctuary.’ Yet, of them all ‘chapel’ is apparently the one most historically and doctrinally correct for the room where the local church regularly meets for worship.

This extended discussion is important chiefly to stimulate reflection on what is truly the holy place where on earth God dwells in special residency—the Christian ekklēsia.

I am particularly indebted to several authors in these remarks about church architecture and Christian worship. Among them are James F. White,¹⁷ Andre Bieler,¹⁸ F. L. Eckel, Jr,¹⁹ J. D. Robertson,²⁰ James F. White,²¹ Richard Spielmann,²² and T. A. Stafford.²³ A large literature of worship is currently being published. I have not found it related to issues treated in this section.

The Church Itself, Uniquely at Worship

The ordinance of the Lord’s Supper is the church itself, uniquely at worship (1 Cor. 11:22). Paul says that to think lightly of the Eucharist and to humiliate the poor who are attending is to ‘despise the church of God [emphasis added].’ The local church gathered about the Lord’s table, worshipping her Lord, is in a special way never more fully an organic fellowship (koinōnia) than in these moments. Is it truly a church when dispersed to their homes? Yes, but uniquely so in the moments of Eucharistic observance. They are never more a communion of saints in a most heightened level of communion. There is a vertical communion with the Lord as ‘in remembrance’ of Him we partake of the symbols of His body and blood, a horizontal communion with the other members of His body—communion not to be described but felt. We are truly a new kind of people. Formerly estranged Jews and heathen—strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God—now all brought near together ‘by the blood of Christ.’ In Him we are ‘one new man’ (Eph. 2:11–22). This is deeply felt in the solemn moments when we share the emblems of our Lord’s dying in our place to create this blessed, worshipping community. There can be little doubt that godly folk feel in their hearts this nearly ‘unspeakable’ feature of their worship. This partially explains the exceeding sinfulness of casual participation, ‘not discerning the Lord’s body’—the literal one, the corporate one, the Eucharistic one, each in one way or another a feature of the ordinance.

A very helpful presentation of this aspect of the Eucharistic observance clearly written and fully researched is the chapter ‘The Lord’s Supper as Communion,’ by Fred D. Howard.²⁴

Finally, the Eucharist is a unique participation in something tangible and which Jesus gave us before He departed from us and left us behind. It allows us, in a manner of speaking, to be in the Upper Room with Him and the Twelve to receive something from the visible, personal presence of Jesus. The powers of imagination must be employed to make this true for each worshipper; and, like all such measures, must be controlled by ‘the understanding’ (1 Cor. 14:13–19 kjv). If certain sacerdotalists have made too much of this feature, perhaps some unbending, no nonsense, rationalistic brethren have made too little. This concept collides squarely with twelve o’clock boredom and hungry haste to hear the last ‘amen’ before we rush home for dinner after church on ‘Communion Sunday.’ In the next chapter we consider what the Eucharist means and how it should be observed, concluding with historical views in both pre-Reformation times onward to the present.

¹ Hans Lietzmann, Mass and Lord’s Supper, 1926 and others since.

² Ernst Käsemann, Essays On New Testament Themes (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1942), p. 120 ff.

³ The best discussion of the problem I know of is in The Shape of the Liturgy by Dom Gregory Dix, the chapter on ‘Eucharist and Lord’s Supper’ (London: Dacre Press, 1945, 1978), pp. 48–102, conclusions stated p. 95. Dix on p. 95 favors the chaburah but in a note 1, p. 50 acknowledges that ‘the question is not yet finally settled,’ as Jeremias notes (p. 31). Wm. D. Maxwell, in his widely read book (An Outline of Christian Worship, Its Development and Forms, 1936, 1958) disseminated the kiddush view through several generations. It went through at least seven printings.

⁴ Joachim Jeremias, The Eucharist Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1955), pp. 1–60.

⁵ TDNT, Vol. II, pp. 172, 173.

⁶ Moody Press, 1984, pp. 153–163.

⁷ Baker Books, 1976, 1991, ‘passim.’

⁸ Winona Lake, IN: BMH Books, 1991, pp. 103–124.

⁹ In chapter 3 above we saw that this gathering of the members into one place is one of the meanings of ekklēsia, as in 1 Corinthians 14:28, 33, 34.

¹⁰ Kenneth S. Latourette, A History of Christianity (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953, 1971), p. 92.

- ¹¹ Eusebius, Church History IX, pp. 9, 10; NPNF, Vol. I, pp. 363–367.
- ¹² Francois Wendel, Calvin, trans. P. Mairet (New York: Harper & Row, 1950, 1963), p. 17 and documentation.
- ¹³ A surge of studies in styles and content of worship took place mid-twentieth century as an aspect of the ecumenical movement—at first quite strong among mission-minded evangelicals.
- ¹⁴ A. P. Gibbs, Worship, The Christian's Highest Occupation, 2nd ed. (Kansas City: Walterick, n.d.), p. 239.
- ¹⁵ Olive Wyon, 'Evidences of New Life in the Church Universal,' Man's Disorder and God's Design (The Amsterdam Assembly Series, 1948, i), p. 113.
- ¹⁶ F. L. Eckel, Jr, A Concise Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Terms (Boston: Whittemore Assoc., 1960), p. 53.
- ¹⁷ James F. White, Protestant Worship and Church Architecture: Theological and Historical Considerations (New York: Oxford Press, 1964).
- ¹⁸ Andre Bieler, Architecture in Worship, trans. D. & O. Elliott (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1965).
- ¹⁹ Eckel, op. cit.
- ²⁰ J. D. Robertson, Minister's Worship Handbook (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1974).
- ²¹ James F. White, New Forms of Worship (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971).
- ²² Richard Spielmann, History of Christian Worship (New York: Seabury Press, 1966).
- ²³ T. A. Stafford, Christian Symbolism in the Evangelical Churches (Nashville: Abingdon, 1842).
- ²⁴ Fred D. Howard, Interpreting the Lord's Supper (Nashville: Broadman, 1966), pp. 45–69.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (991). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

II. What the Ordinance Means (1 Cor. 11:24–26)

The meaning of our Lord's words, 'This is my body' and 'the new covenant in my blood,' has not been absent in foregoing discussion of the Eucharist. Now we focus on what these terse sentences mean—not emphasizing the divisive controversies about the meaning over the past five centuries. We shall train our attention on four of Paul's expressions, together with a part of Luke's report of Jesus' instructions.

Mutual Participation in Christ Himself

The Eucharist symbolizes mutual participation in Christ Himself. Mutuality and participation are both suggested. '[W]hen he had given thanks, he broke it [the loaf], and said, "This is my body which is for you"' (1 Cor. 11:24). '[A]nd they all drank of it' (Mark 14:23 kjv). The best texts do not include 'broken.' Though one naturally is reminded of the bruises, cuts and piercing of His body on the cross this is not the point to be made. Rather it was that the redemption was for His people (Matt. 1:21). 'It is finished!' 'By his stripes we have been healed.'

Luke reports: 'And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks he said, "Take this, and divide it among yourselves"' (Luke 22:17). The received text of Luke 22:19, 20 adds, 'divide it among yourselves' and 'my body which is given for you.' Matthew says, 'Drink of it, all of you' (Matt. 26:27), and Mark, 'and they all drank of it' (Mark 14:23). However the textual problem be explained, a common participation of everyone—presumably even Judas—is as emphatic as anything in the passages which describe incidents at the Last Supper. Mutuality with one another in participation—for which the usual word is 'communion' in our language—is the first significance.

There is no extension of the incarnation to the disciples' bodies or the church—an idea promoted vigorously in ecumenical circles. A few years ago at a time the scholars of the World Council were promoting this idea, Lesslie Newbigin—one of their best scholars—emphasized the reality of the church as the body of Christ but stressed that it is not scripturally correct to speak of the mystical body of the Lord, the church, as the extension of the incarnation.¹ As a metaphor, the 'extended incarnation' figure is useful in childrens' songs such as 'Christ has no hand but ours to do his work today,' but without metaphysical overtones.

Commemoration of Jesus Christ

The Eucharist signifies commemoration of Jesus Christ. Luke, alone (among the Gospels) includes, 'Do this in remembrance of me' (Luke 22:19) in connection with the cup, while Paul has it in connection with both cup and loaf. At this point, connection with the Passover symbolism emerges. Howard cites the following from Edward Beckersteth's Treatise on the Lord's Supper:²

One was instituted the night before the deliverance from Egypt; the other the night before our deliverance from our iniquities. One commemorated redemption from the bondage of sin. One pre-figured, by shedding of blood, the redemption of Christ: the other would exhibit, by striking emblems, a redemption already [after the crucifixion] accomplished.³

We should recall that just as the Passover was a joyous feast—a thanksgiving festival—so is the Eucharist. It is quite normal for both solemnity and joy to be present at the peak when important rites are observed. Ask the bride's mother after the wedding.

The Inauguration of a New Covenant

The Eucharist signifies the inauguration of a new covenant to take precedence over the Mosaic covenant. This is patent in the Lord's words: 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood' (1 Cor. 11:25). Luke says nothing of a new covenant; Mark reports, 'This is my blood of the covenant' (14:24); Matthew's report connects the shed blood with 'the covenant' and both with the 'many' and 'the forgiveness of sin' (Matt. 26:28). Jeremias argues convincingly—from (1) the abundant evidence of Isaiah 53:11, 12 and Zechariah 9:11; (2) Jewish Targums; and (3) the history of interpretation—that Jesus is referring to Isaiah's prophecy of the atoning death of the Servant, and that Jesus thought His death would have atoning effect.⁴ The 'old' covenant with which the 'new' is in contrast is the Mosaic covenant. That covenant, though gracious in ultimate purpose, was strictly a legal covenant, as Galatians and Hebrews explicate. If Passover produces joy, how much more the communion of the bread and cup!

The contrast between 'old' covenant and 'new' in Galatians is not between two administrations of one covenant of grace, nor between two administrations of an Adamic or Abrahamic covenant. I agree with the following excerpt from a book by John G. Reisinger:

God had a gracious purpose in putting the nation of Israel under the law as a covenant, but that fact cannot change the law covenant into a covenant of grace. The law, as a covenant, was intended to be the 'needle that pierced the conscience so that the thread of the gospel could follow and heal.' However, to be able to accomplish that ministry the law had to have the teeth of a true legal covenant with the power of life and death. If the Decalogue could not make men feel lost in sin and condemned by God, then how could it 'prepare the sinner for the gospel.'⁵

An Impressive Preachment of the Gospel

The Eucharist presents an impressive preachment of the gospel. '[Y]e proclaim the Lord's death' (1 Cor. 11:26). It is tied to the memorial aspect: 'It is a dynamic declaration of the gospel by an object lesson.'⁶

During His ministry Jesus executed more than one acted parable—the cursing of the unfruitful fig tree as an example (Luke 19:45–48).⁷ The broken bread and poured-out wine serve as a commentary on Isaiah 53:5, 'he was wounded for our transgressions; he was crushed for our iniquities; upon him was the chastisement that brought us peace, and with his stripes we are healed.' Only as understood as memorial and preachment, rather than as 'medicine of immortality' or somehow ex opere operato (automatically conferring some grace), does it preach the gospel. Here, as in baptism, nothing good comes of the ordinance without being accompanied by the word of proclamation. The presiding churchman, whether Brethren elder, Presbyterian minister, Baptist pastor or Anglican priest, has the duty to explain to the participating congregation, and the seeking or unbelieving, what is taking place.

A Mutual Expression of the Church's Hope and Christ's Glorious Second Advent

The church at communion mutually express their ‘blessed hope and the glorious appearing’ of the Savior at the Second Advent: ‘ye do shew the Lord’s death till he come’ (1 Cor. 11:26 kjv—the conditional sense of ‘come,’ rather than ‘comes,’ preserved in kjv, is unfortunately lost in recent Versions). The Lord also spoke of how the memorial rite expressed His own hope for that event when He would again for the first time in the coming, manifest kingdom of God again drink the fruit of the vine (Mark 14:25; Luke 22:16; Matt. 26:29); ‘therefore,’ says the Messiah, ‘my heart was glad, and my tongue rejoiced; my [entombed] flesh also will dwell in hope’ (Acts 2:26).

Actually Jesus’ expectation of a feast in the coming kingdom is based squarely on the ‘Little Apocalypse’ (Delitzsch) of Isaiah 24 and 25 (and 65:13), specifically 25:6–8: ‘On this mountain the Lord of hosts will make for all peoples a feast of rich food, a feast of well-aged wine ... of aged wine well refined.’ The prophet goes on to predict that in this ‘mountain’ (kingdom) the veil of sin will be universally removed, death ‘swallow[ed] up’ forever, all tears wiped away and ‘the reproach of his people’ taken away.

The ‘eschatological’ reference of the Supper only picks up where the Old Testament literature leaves off.

Throughout this discussion I have omitted the background in the Passover Feast and other New Testament ‘suppers’ lest the chapter become a book. There are at least six other biblical ‘suppers’ with symbolic significance. Alfred P. Gibbs calls them the suppers of ‘gospel proclamation’ (Luke 14:16–24); ‘of spiritual fellowship’ (Rev. 3:20); ‘of believers’ appreciation’ (John 12:1–8); ‘of nuptial celebration’ (Rev. 19:9); ‘of just retribution’ (Rev. 19:17); and the Last Passover itself as ‘of typical consummation’ (Luke 22:7–18).⁸

Says Eduard Schweizer, ‘The Lord’s Supper ... is the anticipation of the messianic banquet which is to come and therefore should be celebrated in eschatological jubilation.’⁹ After citing the above Isaiah passages, as well as 1 Enoch 62:145; 2 Enoch; Apocalypse of Baruch 42:5 (pseudepigraphal Jewish literature), Schweizer concludes:

Thus it is certainly the Jewish background which shaped the early Christian Lord’s Supper. The use, in Acts 2:46 [‘with glad ... hearts’] of the typical concept of eschatological ‘bliss’ to describe the frame of mind of the early church at the breaking of bread makes clear how strong this ... motif was. It is unrestrained joy and songs of praise which characterized the Lord’s Supper, and not under any circumstances a funeral sobriety clothed in penitence and remorse.¹⁰

The passages cited above and Schweizer’s remarks give us, both those who lead communion services and those of the joyful communion, something to aim for.

III. How the Ordinance Should Be Observed (1 Cor. 11:26b–30)

Let us take brief notice of five points which Paul makes.

1. Observe the Eucharist Expectantly (v. 26 kjv), ‘till he come’

The future prospect of the Second Advent, prominent in every aspect of our salvation, should save observance of this ordinance from a maudlin preoccupation with details of the Passion. The note of good cheer (John 16:33; Acts 23:11) should help us as we consider the next point.¹¹

2. Observe the Eucharist in a Worthy Manner (v. 27)

What does ‘an unworthy manner,’ and ‘guilty of profaning the body and blood of the Lord,’ mean? Many authors rightly point out that no one is personally worthy and no forgiven sinner is guilty of the shed blood of Christ. Rather, the faults of the Corinthians pointed out earlier, and again in verses 33 and 34, were firstly in lack of consideration of other believers at the table and flippant regard for the meal (love feast) at which the observance of the Eucharist took place. Secondly, there was a ‘failure to recognize practically the symbolism of the elements, and hence the treatment of the supper as a common meal.’¹² To bring unrepented-of sins of various seriousness to the Lord’s table, as it were, is to partake in an unworthy manner, says Calvin, and will result in various degrees of divine chastisement. No particular sin, repented of, excludes one from the fellowship of the Lord’s table.¹³

3. Observe the Ordinance with Self-examination (v. 28)

‘Let a person examine himself.’ It is a right impulse and wholesome that the service book of Lutheran churches schedules the responsive reading of Psalm 51 early in the liturgy for the Lord’s Supper. The same right judgment: has put Psalm 51 among the responsive readings of most standard hymn books, available for use where (as in my own case) there is no prescribed liturgy. It speaks to the heart by way of self-examination, leading to repentance and confession to God. This is not, in my opinion, as widely observed as it should be in ‘free’ churches.

All the Reformation churches gave proper emphasis to self-judgment before communion. It is not even today neglected in evangelical groups descended from those churches. The Christian Reformed in their Psalter Hymnal of 1976 has two suggested forms for ‘celebration of the Lord’s supper.’ Immediately following the reading of 1 Corinthians 11:23–29, the minister’s suggested sermon expounds the ‘Let a person examine [or prove] himself’ clause—five columns of very penetrating exposition and application to specific sins of thought, word and deed. The sermon may be delivered a week before the observance.¹⁴

The sermon begins: ‘In fellowship with these words and in fellowship with the church universal ... let each of us, therefore, consider his sin and guilt, against which the wrath of God is so great that He has punished it in His beloved son,’ and so on. I add: let us pray that the church named here never loses this treasure of faithful adherence to this word and that all will learn to do better!

In the earliest post-New Testament reports of communion gatherings, after extensive reading of appropriate Scriptures from all parts of the Bible, a deacon or bishop exhorted the assembly to bring their lives up to standard. There was, sadly, a developing legalism accompanying this emphasis. Standards were high and rigidly enforced in times of persecution, but tended to be relaxed in time of peace with secular authorities.

At this point in the text of 1 Corinthians 11 a question arises: Did Paul also teach us Christians to submit to one another’s judgment (or of church elders or deacons) as to fitness to receive the Supper? He says, ‘But if we [plural] judged ourselves truly, we would not be judged. But when we are judged by the Lord, we are disciplined so that we [plural] may not be condemned along with the world' (1 Cor. 11:31, 32). Verses 28 and 30 use singular verbs, indicating self-examination. It is tempting to suppose mutual judgment of believers by believers in a formal way is indicated, but there is not sufficient basis for that in this verse. However, believers are encouraged (as we noted in our chapter on discipline) to recognize 'faults' and to take discreet action (see Gal. 6:1, 2). In any case, the first generations of Christians made attendance at the Lord's table more a privilege than a right. Very early in Christian history a liturgy for the weekly observance developed and in it this element was faithfully observed. As early as the Didache any non-baptized (in times of persecution baptism was a dangerous step to take) were excluded (Didache IX. 5); confessing transgressions came before breaking bread (XIV. 1). Before communion all not yet baptized were excluded from the room: 'but let the door be watched, lest any unbeliever, or one not yet initiated, come in.'¹⁵ The Christians of the first centuries were people of their time, hence some of this 'fencing of the table' was overdone and some of their reasons were partially superstitious.

'Fencing the table' is the old ecclesiastical term for protecting the table fellowship of the Lord's Supper from disturbance by unbelieving and wicked people engaging falsely in communion. Some groups of earnest believers conduct visitation of all families by elders to prepare and qualify them for communion. Some Lutheran pastors issue written tickets of eligibility. It now consists usually simply in issuing Paul's warnings (1 Cor. 11:27–32) from the pulpit or by the presiding elder at the table. Most deem this sufficient. There have been occasions, however, when a minister or group publicly excluded wantonly immoral people from the Lord's Supper. There is a long history among the Reformed churches, beginning with the Strasbourg pastors in the 1530s, of admitting no one to communion except the faithful who have previously presented themselves to the pastor or his 'vicar.' They also made instruction in a catechism obligatory for children, who were not allowed to come to communion until instructed specifically.¹⁶

Concluding Questions

1. The Doctrine of the Mass—How Did it Develop?

At the time of the Reformation, observance of the Eucharist was understood as an occasion for solemn worship of the body and blood of Christ present in the elements. The Mass did not usually provide opportunity for lay people to 'eat ... this bread' and to 'drink ye all of it.' Mass was not a communion between the saints present. The service was not even called a communion, but a Mass. The Lord's table was called an altar. The enactment was not regarded primarily as a memorial but as a sacrifice of blood and flesh, and the official of the church who pronounced the words of 'transubstantiation' and who himself consumed a portion of the elements was named and regarded as a sacrificing priest—not primarily a minister of the Word.

In response to the Protestant Reformation the Roman Church assembled the Council of Trent (1545–1563) which in its thirteenth Session made dogma of accumulated beliefs and practices of previous centuries of evolution of Mass and related doctrines. Denzinger's 'Systematic Index' (The Sources of Catholic Dogma) devotes three fine print, double columns of 'Systematic Index' to the topics 'The Real Presence; the Sacrament, Communion; the Sacrifice of the Mass' (39–41). The index itself summarizes the doctrine.

Louis Berkhof summarizes Trent's decrees about the Eucharist briefly:

Jesus Christ is truly, really, and substantially present in the holy sacrament.... seated at the right hand of God does not exclude the possibility of His substantial presence in several places simultaneously. By the words of consecration the substance of bread and wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ. [Transubstantiation is the accepted name for this doctrine. The origin is obscure, but it was adopted in documents of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215.] The entire Christ is present under each species [bread, wine] and under each particle of each species. Each one who receives a particle of the host receives the whole Christ. He is present in the elements even before the communicant receives them. In view of this presence, the adoration of the host [Latin, hostia, sacrificial victim] is but natural. The sacrament effects 'an increase of sanctifying grace, special actual graces, remission of venial sins, preservation from grievous [mortal] sin, and the confident hope of eternal salvation.'¹⁷

How did this dogma that the Eucharistic rite is a sacrifice of the blood and body of Christ arise in the soil of the apostolic Christianity of the Gospels and Epistles? Though the notion arose in seminal form at least as early as the fourth century it was not to become dogma for several centuries.

Historical and theological scholars have proposed at least six causes, some rooted in the mindset of all ancient peoples where the church first took root and some events in the first five centuries of our era.

The first cause is the acknowledged ancient habit of sometimes referring to a rite or other symbol as though it were the truth or divine act signified. Paul himself puts such words in the mouth of Ananias: 'Rise and be baptized and wash away your sins' (Acts 22:16). Paul knew he had been regenerated, released from sin's penalties and declared righteous days before when he was met by the glorified Christ, and presumably so did Ananias. Of a piece with the same is the way New Testament authors refer to Christian dedication as a 'living sacrifice' (thusia) as opposed to a slain sacrifice (Rom. 12:1); evangelistic labor as being 'offered' (spendomai, offer a libation) upon the sacrifice (thusia) and as service (leiturgia), service as a priest (Phil 2:17); a gift for support for a missionary as 'a fragrant offering, a sacrifice' (Phil. 4:18). They also exhort to 'offer' (anapherō, to bring a sacrifice) the 'sacrifice [thusian] of praise to God' (Heb. 13:15). Untaught and ignorant people (unknowingly) as well as the informed and perverse (knowingly) could use such sacrificial language of the gifts brought to the Agapē feast and the Eucharist which accompanied it. Ignatius of Antioch, en route to a martyr's death, wrote, 'The eucharist is the flesh of our Savior,' and of the 'breaking of the one bread, which is the medicine of immortality.'¹⁸ Tertullian and Cyprian agreed, though Clement of Alexandria and Origen thought that the Lord's Supper fed the soul with the divine Word. They did not see it as essentially an act of worship.

About the middle of the second century several Christian authors (the 'apologists') sought (1) to defend Christianity against misrepresentation by heathen writers and current rumors which attacked the church and (2) also tried to address the Roman government in a way to deflect persecution. In doing so, the apologists accommodated their language to the understanding of their opponents enough to somewhat undermine their own biblical bases. Thus they 'set a bad example for succeeding generations.'¹⁹ Sadly, they also represent the early drift away from the plain gospel of grace toward moralism and legalism as well as sacramentalism.

A second cause is that the church took to its bosom a few, then a majority, of people still heathen at heart. This happened during long periods free from persecution and particularly after Christianity became tolerated, then legal, then required of everyone on pain of severe punishment (fourth century). They were accustomed to religion whose center was an impressive sanctuary on whose altars sacrificial rites were effected by officially designated priests with elaborate vestments. It was natural for these unconverted and untaught people to nudge interpretation in the direction it went.²⁰

A third cause is that Christians were already denizens of an advanced heathen civilization. Many of them were technically trained in its religious theories and vocabulary. This constantly nudged the church toward ideas of priesthood and sacrificial interpretations. ‘The idea that a priestly mediation between sinful men and a gracious [or malevolent] deity had been so deeply implanted in the religious consciousness of pre-Christian antiquity, pagan as well as Jewish, that a form of public worship without a priesthood seemed almost as inconceivable as a religion without a god.’²¹ This frame of mind led to ‘the idea ... not sharply and clearly defined ... yet widespread and profound conviction that the Lord’s Supper was a supremely holy mystery, spiritual food indispensable to eternal life, that the body and blood of the Lord entered into some mystical connection with the bread and wine, and placed the believing partaker of them in true and essential fellowship with Christ.... Gradually ... the theory prevailed of a sacramental memorial celebration of the sacrifice of Christ²² ... [as] that of an unbloody but actual repetition of the same.’²³

Gregory of Nyssa exemplifies the results of this tendency. He was thoroughly educated in pagan philosophy and one of the most prolific writers among the Fathers. As G. W. Bromiley points out, Gregory argued that Jesus used bread and wine in daily nourishment. They became His flesh-and-blood body in which God dwelt, in a sense identical with them. When believers consume the Eucharist God enters into them and thereby humanity shares in deity and immortality.²⁴

The fourth cause is the heresy of docetism, denial of the authentic existence of material things, which brought about orthodox reaction, lending support to materialists’ views of the Eucharist. Without introducing details about docetism, we observe that it was so widely spread, and both aggressive and persuasive in prevalent Neo-platonism, that fears of docetism and its twin dualisms (both metaphysical and ethical) ruled out for many any possibility of a spiritual feeding on Christ in worship at the Eucharist which was not also feeding on real body and blood—even if not clearly defined. It remains to be said that Gregory’s doctrine was a seed of the later standard Eastern Orthodox understanding of salvation as enosis, union with God.

The fifth cause is that, from another quarter, ‘the Old Testament Bible of Jesus and the Apostles’ came a pattern—albeit misused—for the rise of a sacerdotal class and worship through sacrifice. I do not refer to Judaism, from which the church quickly separated itself. Until the books of the New Testament were collected and widely distributed as Scripture, the Scriptures read in all the public services (1 Tim. 4:13) and for private devotion (2 Tim. 3:14–17) were ‘the Law, the Prophets and the Writings,’ the same as in synagogue worship. They treasured the ‘tradition’ of Jesus’ ‘words’ (1 Tim. 6:3) and of the apostles (2 Peter 3:14–16) but they did not have all of it yet in written form in the days of the apostolic Fathers (to ad 150). They found Christ ‘in all the scriptures,’ but they also read there of a system of ritual religion with priests, sacrifices and sacred festivals. Much of this—especially before Augustine wrote on distinguishing the covenants—was brought over also in a day before Christians had leisure to develop theological acuity. Anders Nygren points out that ‘primitive Christianity succeeded only with the help of the Old Testament in making any sense of ... the Agapē of the cross.... It involved a risk’—the risk of legalism and sacerdotalism.²⁵ Other writers point out that, even though the New Testament expressly taught that the Old Testament institutions of sacrifice and priesthood had been abolished and replaced by a spiritual priesthood of every believer (Heb. 4:16; 1 Peter 2:5, 9; Rev. 1:6), sacerdotal ideas prevailed and very early the churches ‘relapsed’ into ‘the Old Testament standpoint.’²⁶

A sixth cause was that the leaders of the church, after the apostles disappeared from the scene—we may theorize also before the Epistles to Romans and Galatians were universally distributed and read—quickly lost a keen sense of the doctrine of salvation by grace alone, faith alone, Christ alone, apart from any human merit or any religious rite of God or man.

Anders Nygren traced these two antagonistic movements in Christian thought Christian history under the motifs of Agapē (salvation is wholly from God who reaches down and rescues sinners) and eros (salvation is attained by mankind’s striving upward to God). Of the sub-apostolic age he summarizes: ‘The center of gravity has changed; love is no longer [as in the New Testament] God’s way to man, but man’s way to God.’²⁷

Anders Nygren traces through Christian theological history the doctrine of divine love (agapē, saving mankind by grace alone) as opposed to salvation by mankind’s aspiration for God (eros) and keeping rules (nomos). Regarding the apostolic Fathers, first writers after the Apostles, Nygren makes several points. As early as the Didachē and 1 Clement the sayings of Jesus about love have become the way to be saved. However, ‘it is not,’ Nygren says, ‘the Way of Agape, whereby the Divine love in its groundless compassion finds a way to the sinner and freely gives him salvation, but the directly opposite way, by which man, through exercising so sublime a love finally reaches perfection.’²⁸ He continues, ‘This is not to deny that there are passages where the full message of Agapē [grace alone] appears.’²⁹ He cites Ignatius, II Clement, Shepherd of Hermas.³⁰ He adds, ‘such observations in no way alter the impression of legalistic modification in the Apostolic Fathers.’³¹

These same Fathers, as L. Berkhof observes,³² used the language of then current religious philosophy to defend Christianity against heresies and government intrusion. Nygren shows that in calling the Christian way ‘the true philosophy’ and ‘the new law’ these Fathers meant ‘the true faith and a new covenant,’ with proper biblical connotations. But the terms came to be used in ways which borrowed the notion of mystical ascent to God by human striving from the prevalent Neo-platonism and idea of Christianity as a ‘nomism’—salvation by law-keeping.

These seeds grew like the mustard seed of Jesus’ parable, in the mouths and pens of lesser churchmen, into the utterly perverted doctrines of ‘transubstantiation’ and ‘the sacrifice of the mass.’ By gradual stages—but not without some resistance—in common opinion and clerical ritual practice, material change in the elements to Christ’s body and blood, and the Eucharist as a sacrifice, came to be accepted. These teachings became official dogma first in the Canon of the Mass issued by Pope Gregory I (ca. ad 600). It was an age of naive realism.³³ In the following four centuries fierce controversies over the ‘real presence’ developed among a few theologians (Radbertus, Hrabanus and Ratramus in the ninth century; Berengar in the eleventh century resisted Transubstantiation).³⁴ All sought a patristic consensus but could find none. The age of scholasticism generally accepted Transubstantiation and sought to explain it in harmony with clashing metaphysical theories of the time. All the niceties of the scholastic distinctions were firmly and universally rejected by the Protestant Reformers.

2. Post-Reformation Views of the Manner of Christ’s Presence in the Eucharist³⁵

Before Rome gave formal statement of all the accumulated errors of Eucharistic doctrine at Trent, the Reformers repudiated the most egregious—transubstantiation and sacrifice. They pointed out that the latter plainly contradicts the New Testament insistence on the all-sufficiency of Christ’s single, once-for-all, unrepeatable sacrifice.

Rome insists that when the priest pronounces, ‘This is my body’ in the liturgy of the Mass, the bread and wine miraculously become the body and blood of Christ. The elements, they must and do acknowledge, look, feel, taste and smell the same as before, but the ‘substance’ (or essence) is changed.³⁶

But let the following be noted. (1) In intimate discourse with His disciples Jesus made many statements similar to this one, of clear symbolical intent—saying, ‘I am’ the ‘way,’ ‘truth,’ ‘life,’ ‘light of the world,’ ‘the vine,’ ‘the door,’ and similar (John 14:6; 8:12; 15:1; 10:7). This is another such. (2) The Romish view has Jesus in His living body say that the bread is His (slain) body, the wine His (shed) blood, many hours before the crucifixion, a strange contradiction. Scripture gives no authority for saying that the words pronounced will signal a miracle of Transubstantiation. (4) The procedure denies the same testimony of the senses which verified the resurrection of Jesus’ body from the dead. What looks, tastes, smells, feels like bread is bread, the same as a body which looks, feels, sounds and behaves like Jesus is Jesus. (5) Supposed proof from John 6:54 ff. about the necessity of eating Jesus’ flesh and drinking His blood to gain eternal life misses the point of the passage. The benefits of Messiah’s coming are primarily spiritual, not material. The audience was a crowd who had already rejected that message. He therefore used a familiar Jewish rabbinical figure for receiving the teachings of a teacher or even of Messiah.³⁷ Is it reasonable to suppose that Jesus was explaining a Christian rite (Eucharist) to a hostile audience who had already rejected Him and would later join in demand for His crucifixion?

Martin Luther and the Lutheran View

There is no sacrifice and no change in substance of the elements. Nevertheless, in some unexplained, miraculous way the whole Christ, divine and human, spirit and body, flesh and body is present with, in, under the elements. So the communicants, whether true believers or false Christians, masticate the body and blood. Jesus’ body is at the right hand of God—which has no local presence anywhere. Lutheran scholars (Krauth, The Conservative Reformation) affirm that the right hand of God is as much ‘in this room’ as anywhere. This doctrine of the ‘ubiquity’ of Christ’s body led Luther to make statements which deny any materiality to the glorified body either of Christ or of the saints. Berkhof comments, ‘It really makes the words of Jesus mean, “this accompanies my body.”’³⁸ Not all orthodox Lutherans are particularly enthusiastic about this teaching. It is an improvement on the Romish view of the matter. Lutherans are not taught to worship the sacraments.

Reformed Views

Protestants of the sixteenth century defined this doctrine against the Roman institution and teachings. This sometimes resulted in extreme statements by some of the Reformers—a subject too complicated to treat here. Calvin, commenting on 1 Corinthians 11:23–25, says ‘Would to God ... we could bury ... in perpetual oblivion the unhappy contests that have tried the church in our time as to the meaning of these words [“This is my body,” etc.].’ On that phrase in verse 24 he concludes, ‘I lay it down, then, as a settled point, that there is here what is usual in connection with Sacraments, in which the Lord gives to the sign the name of the thing signified.’³⁹ This is about as close to Zwingli’s view as words can speak. In the Institutes Calvin hedges toward some obscure participation of communicant with the body and blood. In my judgment, the present body of Christ is not intended. In the only reference to the ‘material substance’ of His resurrection body Jesus spoke of it as ‘flesh and bones as you see that I have.’ So the resurrection body of the Lord was composed still of ‘flesh and bones’—whether of blood also we have no evidence.

Let us bury the volumes of wearisome debate from that era (I see them grinning from my library shelves)—Lutheran, Reformed, Roman Catholic, and later Anglican and Puritan—in the ‘perpetual oblivion’ Calvin spoke of—if only temporarily. How is that for an oxymoron!?

¹ Leslie Newbigin, The Household of God (New York: Friendship Press, 1964), p. 298.

² Edward Bickersteth, Treatise on the Lord’s Supper (New York: Thos. Stanford, 1815), p. 17.

³ Fred D. Howard, Interpreting the Lord’s Supper (Nashville: Broadman Press, 1966), p. 39.

⁴ Jeremias, op. cit., pp. 146–152.

⁵ Appendix No. 3, Covenant Theology’s ‘Two Administrations Of One Covenant’ in Abraham’s Four Seeds (Sound of Grace. POB #185, Webster, NY: 14580), p. 81.

⁶ Howard, op. cit., p. 44.

⁷ Culver, Life of Christ, pp. 217, 218; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus II, pp. 374, 375.

⁸ Alfred P. Gibbs, The Lord’s Supper (Kansas City: Walterich, 1963).

⁹ Eduard Schweizer, The Lord’s Supper According to the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967), p. 3.

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 960.

¹² ibid., p. 951.

¹³ Calvin, Commentary, Corinthians ad loc cit.

¹⁴ Liturgy of the Christian Reformed Church (Grand Rapids: Board of Publications of the Christian Reformed Church, 1941, 1976), pp. 143–148.

¹⁵ Apostolic Constitution, ii. 57, ANF, VII, p. 57.

¹⁶ Francois Wendel, Calvin (New York: Harper & Row, 1950, 1963), p. 61.

¹⁷ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1939, 1979), pp. 646, 647.

¹⁸ Ignatius, To the Ephesians, XX.2 ANF, i, p. 57; see also Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeasn, VII, ANF, Vol. I, p. 89; J. Kurtz, Church History, Vol. I, #36.4, p. 205.

¹⁹ Jürgen Neve, A History of Christian Thought, Vol. II (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1946), p. 49.

- ²⁰ Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. 27 on the Age of Theodosius; Kenneth Latourette, History of Christianity (New York: Harper, 1953), p. 201.
- ²¹ J. H. Kurtz, Church History, vol. 1 (New York: Funk and Wagnall Co., n.d.) #34.4, p. 192.
- ²² Kurtz, #36.5, p. 209.
- ²³ Kurtz, #38.3, p. 368.
- ²⁴ Geoffrey Bromiley, Historical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978), pp. 144, 145.
- ²⁵ Anders Nygren, Agape and Eros, trans. P. S. Watson (New York: Harper & Row, 1953), pp. 254, 255.
- ²⁶ Kurtz, I, p. 193; see also Latourette, op. cit., J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, rev. ed. (New York: Harper & Row, 1978), pp. 193–199.
- ²⁷ Nygren, op. cit., p. 259.
- ²⁸ ibid., p. 259.
- ²⁹ ibid., p. 261.
- ³⁰ ibid., pp. 260, 261.
- ³¹ ibid., p. 262.
- ³² Berkhof, op. cit., p. 645.
- ³³ Neve, op. cit. I, p. 159.
- ³⁴ Neve, op. cit. I, pp. 156–164; Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, Vol. III (Chicago: U. of Chicago Press, 1978), pp. 184–229.
- ³⁵ As noted earlier, Paul called this ordinance not only the Lord’s Supper but also Eucharist (thanksgiving), koinōnia (communion) and eulogia (blessing).
- ³⁶ Biblical ground is found in literal sense of ‘It is ...’ and the several statements of Jesus in John 6:51–58 about the necessity of eating His flesh and drinking His blood to receive eternal life.
- ³⁷ See Strack-Billerbeck, KZNTT, II, p. 485 and J. Lightfoot, Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica, Vol. III, Hendrickson, 1997, pp. 304–309.
- ³⁸ Berkhof, op. cit., p. 653.

² Page 377 coalesced with footnote #2 of Calvin's Commentary, Corinthians 1 (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1848).

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (999). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 7

ESCHATOLOGY

Last Things, Personal and Universal

1

Introduction to Eschatology

1. The Word ‘Eschatology’

‘Eschatology’ has an interesting sound. After theology students hear the word they like to use it. It rolls off the tongue easily.¹ It is a modern word invented by theologians which apparently wasn’t even in our language until about 160 years ago.²

It is a fortuitous choice, created no doubt by some scholars who noticed that the word eschatos occurs about fifty times in the New Testament for such finalities as the resurrection of the dead (John 6:39, 40, 44, 54; 11:24), the judgment of the ‘last day’ (John 12:48), and the ‘last day’ of history (John 11:24, 28) as well as ‘last days’ or ‘times’ of the present age (2 Tim. 3:1; James 5:3; 1 Peter 1:5, 20; 2 Peter 3:3). Scholars point out that in Jewish literature read by Jews in Jesus’ time ‘the eschaton’ (Gr. ton eschaton) was very commonly used for death. In Ecclesiasticus, or The Wisdom of Sirach, very widely read, for example: ‘Whoso feareth the Lord, it shall go well with him at the last [ep’ eschaton] and shall find favour in the day of his death’ (Eccles. 1:13; and many times more). So also in classical Greek.³

It should be of great comfort to Christian believers that Jesus, Himself, is ‘the last one.’ So Christian eschatology ends with Christ in His glorious return. He likewise is the first One. This was pointed out to John the Revelator more than once by Jesus Himself. The eighth verse of the Prologue to Revelation reads: ‘“I am the Alpha and the Omega [first letter to last letter],” says the Lord God, “who is and who was and who is to come, the Almighty.”’ So there is an eschatos, last One, to meet us, not just an eschaton, last thing. The coming is not merely of a time, but of a Person (see John 1:1–14; and cf. Rev. 22:13, where Jesus interprets Rev. 1:8). As Job put the matter, ‘Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another’ (Job 19:27 kjv).

2. Eschatology and ‘the Theology of Hope’

In the 1950s several ‘new’ eschatologies emanating from previous decades belatedly burst into the attention of many evangelical centers of learning. Among these ‘realized’ and ‘inaugurated’ theology in New Testament interpretation. The ministry and redemptive career of Jesus brought ‘the powers of the world to come’ to events now in progress. This is realized eschatology. The kingdom of heaven (of God) was inaugurated in the mission of Jesus and the seminal church he created. These have caught on among evangelicals.

Similarly ‘the Theology of Hope’ swept through liberal centers of theological learning in the 1960s. Jürgen Moltmann⁴ (usually acknowledged founder) sees the Christian as one who hopes, the Church a disquieting factor, confronting fallen society with hope of the coming city of God. Wolfhart Pannenberg finds the organizing principle and certifying element in the Resurrection of Jesus. The theology of hope, however, owes more to Marxist sources than to any roots in any past epochs of Christian thought. In this theology, eschatology is not the last chapter but the first, through which every department of Christian life and doctrine is to be given meaning.⁵ The Bible, lamentably, does not speak with authority and finality to these theologians, many of whom were associated with ‘liberation theology,’ a doctrine of civil revolution along ‘christianized’ Marxist (Communist) lines.

3. The Antithetical Structure of the Biblical Doctrine of Last Things

By ‘antithetical’ I mean this as opposed to that, or cold as opposed to heat. With reference to ‘last things’—a phrase we have to learn—we usually think in terms of antithesis and speak of ‘here and hereafter.’ Paul was thinking in this non-technical way of last things when he wrote, ‘For now we see in a mirror dimly, but then face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I have been fully known’ (1 Cor. 13:12). This is the language of all of us before we study theology and it is quite in touch with reality, both human and divine. It turns out this is also quite in keeping with several uniquely biblical ways of presenting last things in antithetical relation to the present life.⁶ Important aspects of a true biblical view of the earthly, natural ambience of our present lives as contrasted with the heavenly, super-natural character of the future life are exposed in several striking expressions.

We see it in ‘now in this time’ versus ‘in the world [age] to come’ as in Mark 10:30 kjv: ‘he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time ... and in the world to come eternal life’ (see also Luke 18:30). Similar is ‘in this world [age]’ versus ‘in the world [age] to come’ as in Matthew 12:32 kjv: ‘Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.’ The author of Hebrews, addressing Jewish minds, steeped in Old Testament ways of thinking, assumes this same contrast when he speaks of how his believing readers now ‘have [already] tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, And have tasted the good word of God [i.e. the gospel],’ and have also tasted ‘the powers of the world [age] to come’ (Heb. 6:4, 5 kjv).

This way of contrasting the now age with the coming age was not derived directly from the Old Testament but from inter-testamental times and the Jewish apocryphal and pseudepigraphal⁷ literature it produced. As we have seen, Jesus employed this outlook. The Old Testament, of course, had other ways of representing the last things, as we shall see.

4. The Contrast Between the Present Age and the Age to Come Partly Broken

One way of making this point is to observe that when the promised Messiah of Israel arrived in the person of the God-man, God was now ‘with flesh.’ As the King James Version of Hebrews 2:11 has it, both the sanctifier (God) and the sanctified (we sinners) are ‘all of one.’ But we are only on the way to becoming fully ‘sanctified,’ and as far as the invisible world is concerned, we ‘walk by faith, not by sight’ and ‘endure as seeing him who is invisible.’

Another way of taking note of this is to observe that when the Messianic King arrived, the kingdom became present and remains so in the regenerate and in the other Comforter, the Holy Spirit.

Still another is to appreciate that ‘whoever believes in the Son of God has eternal life.’ We have ‘passed from death to life’ eternal—partakers of the powers of the world to come (John 3:36; 5:24; Heb. 6:5).

There are forms of New Testament interpretation which seem to say that this ‘realized’ or ‘inaugurated’ eschatology is all or nearly all that the New Testament doctrine of last things means. This, of course, is possible only by distorting some statements of Jesus about Satan’s fall from heaven (Luke 10:18), and the judgment as having taken place ‘already’ (John 3:19), and ignoring threats and promises of a future parousia (coming, presence) of Christ with all His holy angels, resurrection of all the dead and judgments according to works. To borrow an overworked phrase, this theology magnifies ‘already’ while it nullifies ‘not yet.’

Emil Brunner’s comment on this interpretation of the New Testament gives a sort of dogmatic form and immense notice among scholars to this proposal of C. H. Dodd (The Parables of the Kingdom, 1936). Brunner correctly comments:

The conception of ‘realized eschatology’ is right inasmuch as it correctly apprehends where the centre of gravity of primitive Christian faith lies, in the events which have already happened in Jesus, in the grace of God’s presence in the Holy Spirit already bestowed.... But it is wrong in not doing sufficient justice to the messianic character of the existence of the believing Ecclesia, which is shown also in its expectation of the fulness of revelation in the coming of the Lord in glory.⁸

5. Prediction and Fulfillment

The subject of last things in the New Testament must be understood, as indeed the Jewish authors of the New Testament did understand it, as enlargement of and fulfillment of both prophecy and history in the Old Testament. The expression ‘that it might be fulfilled,’ which was spoken by such and such a prophet, or ‘as the scripture says,’ is frequent in the Gospels when they explain the meaning of Jesus’ life and work. Jesus Himself trained them to think that way by His own explanations of His mission. In two episodes with His disciples He explained that all His work and program had been predicted throughout the Old Testament (Luke 24:25–27, 44–47). As I have indicated, several times earlier in these studies, Jesus discerned these prophecies in all parts of the Hebrew Bible. He saw not only His sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension and present reign in heaven ‘written in Moses, and in the prophets and in the Psalms’ but also the preaching of ‘repentance and forgiveness of sins and in his name among all nations’ in the present age. He also saw His coming kingdom and visible glory written there. Readers should check this out against the passages cited above from Luke 24 if not already convinced of these facts.

Throughout His ministry, but especially at the last, Jesus spoke, sometimes plainly, sometimes obliquely, of features of His future coming predicted or foreshadowed in the Old Testament. Scholars have not to the present day organized all these materials into a ‘system’ demonstrable to every interested believer, and I shall not attempt to do so here, but it is feasible in a few paragraphs to come to terms with some leading ideas, i.e. verbal vehicles by which Old Testament revelation spoke of ‘the last things.’

The Bible of the first Christians was the Old Testament. They saw their own ‘religion’ as in continuity, under a new covenant, with Old Testament religion. They, of course, saw the Hebrew Bible from a new perspective supplied by Jesus’ life, work and teaching. Hence they did not hesitate to interpret from the standpoint of fulfillment, partially already in Christ, and to await further fulfillment more fully in ‘the latter days’ and ultimately in ‘the day of the Lord.’

To state this important matter differently: when Jesus spoke of ‘eternal life,’ ‘the last days,’ ‘the day of the Lord’ and other topics of eschatology He was using terms familiar to devout Jews such as the Apostles were. They understood these and other such terms and teaching within the framework of Jewish religion of the time. The paradigm, to borrow a grammatical term, had been furnished, within which such language was relevant. The chief source both of the ideas and the patterns was the Old Testament books of prophecy (our Major and Minor Prophets). Among the most important eschatological terms and revelant ideas were ‘the latter days’ and ‘the day of the Lord.’ We must therefore know what Isaiah, Joel and company meant when using such language to learn what Jesus and the apostolic writers meant by them and how we should understand Christian eschatology.

6. The Latter (or Last) Days

The first Christian sermon was by Peter on the Day of Pentecost when early in the day the effusion of the Spirit took place. To explain the day’s events Peter took as his text an Old Testament prophecy of ‘the last days’ found in Joel 2:28, 29, one of the early Minor Prophets: ‘And in the last days it shall be, God declares, that I will pour out my Spirit on all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; even on my male servants and female servants in those days I will pour out my Spirit, and they shall prophesy’ (Acts 2:17, 18). Peter went on to cite Joel’s prophecy of events connected with ‘the day of the Lord,’ but as Gurdon C. Oxtoby says, in a book on prediction and fulfillment in the Bible:

The original prophecy of Joel was a poetic description of the Day of the Lord.... But Peter, picking up the phrase ‘pour out my Spirit,’ finds the Pentecost experience involves exactly that.... Peter does not claim that now is the Day of the Lord. He makes no parallel with the part of the passage that mentions wonders and signs.... The pouring out of God’s Spirit is sufficient for him to claim what the prophet stated has now been realized.⁹

It is apparent Peter thought that some aspect of ‘the latter days’ of Joel had set in. It is also evident that he thought the day of the Lord to be in the future (2 Peter 3:10 ff.).

It is important therefore to examine the Old Testament meaning of this striking, recurring phrase, ‘in the last [or latter] days’ as it relates to last things. As we shall see, ‘latter’ interprets the Hebrew acharith as well as translates the word, because ‘latter’ tends to indicate not only the absolute end or full consummation, but also many events leading up to it—precursors to the final ‘Coming of God,’ the last act of ‘He that cometh.’¹⁰

This expression ‘latter [last] days’ appears fourteen times in the Old Testament, scattered from the first book (Gen. 49:1) through Deuteronomy, Numbers, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea and

In the first passage, Jacob as a prophet, is calling his sons together, ‘that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days’ (Gen. 49:1 kjv). Most of the twelve following oracles, one for each of the twelve sons, relates to their future settlement in Canaan, but the prophet’s vision reaches to the times of Messiah, as in verse 10: ‘The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler’s staff from between his feet, until tribute comes to him [‘until Shiloh come,’ kjv]; and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples.’

A diversion seems important. The word ‘Shiloh’ in Genesis 49:10 is one of the most mysterious words in the Bible. Not only is the meaning obscure, but there is a real question whether the original Hebrew is one word or three.

It could be explained as three words as follows: the Hebrew relative pronoun (who, which, whose, etc.) is sometimes one simple ‘sh’ symbol; the sign of possession is sometimes the ‘I’ symbol; and the pronoun ‘him’ is symbolized by ‘oh.’ So, Shi-l-oh could possibly mean ‘that which is his,’ or ‘whose it is.’

The word ‘Shiloh’ could also possibly be simply the name of the ancient city of Israel of that name, so often mentioned, and for many centuries a seat of government and worship.

Also, it might be a word derived from a relative of shalom, peace. In such a case the word could probably mean ‘peacemaker’ or ‘tranquilizer,’ a reference to the Messiah (see Isa. 9:6, ‘Prince of Peace’). At an earlier time this was the most common view of the word, but it has no specific support in the Scripture, even though there are some feasible reasons for adopting it.

The view outlined above—that it means ‘whose it is’—makes sense in the context. It was adopted in an asv marginal translation, viz. ‘The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler’s staff from between his feet, till he come whose it is,’ etc. and supported in esv quoted above.

This rendering, supported by a similar Hebrew construction at Ezekiel 21:27, gives the passage a rich Messianic interpretation to the effect that Judah would produce the line of kings in Israel, and that this line of kings would finally present the sovereignty to the One whose it properly is, our Lord Jesus Christ.

The rulership of Israel, and the whole universe also, is His properly for several reasons. It is His by right of creation (John 1:3), by right of redemption (Rev. 5:9) and by right of inheritance (as the last of the line of David, Luke 1:31, 32; 2 Sam. 7:12–16). It is His as the first-born of all creation by the Father’s appointment (Heb. 1:4–13).

Gabriel seems to relate this prophecy to the first parousia of Christ when he announced to the virgin of Nazareth: ‘And the Lord God will give to him the throne of his father David, and he will reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there will be no end’ (Luke 1:32–33). The whole section on Judah (Gen. 49:7–9) for the first time in biblical history and prophecy announced (albeit obliquely) the future-anointed dynasty of David, greatly to be enlarged in an extensive revelation to King David (2 Sam. 7) as well as in the Major and Minor Prophets. The significance reaches even to the future beyond Judgment Day. ‘Forever’ is a long time in the future, as David did not fail to comment on: ‘for a great while to come’ (2 Sam. 7:19).¹²

Onward through most of the Old Testament oracles about ‘the latter days’ both the near and the farthest earthly future are explicitly within the range of the prophet’s vision, and when not explicit, implicit. Gustav F. Oehler is correct to say: ‘But in prophetic diction, properly so called, acharith [latter, last] is ... the time of the consummation of redemption (Hos. 3:5; Isa. 2; 3, with Mic. 4:1; Jer. 48:47; Ezek. 38:16).’¹³ In each of these passages the word acharith is used for ‘last’ or ‘latter.’

In prophecies of ‘the latter days’ two major themes presume a prior condition, chronic in ancient Israel and her kings, of guilt for disobedience to the terms of their several covenants.¹⁴ The two themes (1) of future judgment both of Israel and the nations and (2) future redemption ‘are repeated and interwoven as highly charged eschatological warnings and promises that often refer to historical events just past or soon to come, as well as to the long-range messianic age.’¹⁵

Judgment and redemption, sometimes in the period of time when the prophet spoke, but always with eschatological overtones, sometimes with greater emphasis on the eschaton, are chief themes in prophecies of the latter days. Hosea, contemporary with Isaiah (cf. Hos. 1:1 with Isa. 1:1), foresaw Israel’s guilty idolatry bringing on ‘many days,’ now stretching out into almost 2,000 years without either a valid Jewish civil government (‘without king or prince’) or a valid, biblical worship (‘without sacrifice or pillar, without ephod or household gods,’ Hos. 3:4)—no king, no priest or temple. Yet this is not to be permanent, for ‘in the latter days’ there will be repentance, recovery and redemption, for ‘Afterwards the children of Israel shall return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king [in the Person of the Messiah], and they shall come in fear to the Lord and to his goodness in the latter days’ (Hos. 3:5).

Some insist that we must find fulfillment of these prophecies in the small remnant of Israel who became the first Christians, or the church of both Gentiles and Jews. There is no doubt that the prophecies of the latter days began to be fulfilled with the Advent of Christ. This is apparent not only in Peter’s sermon at Pentecost, noted above, for Hebrews 1:1, 2 places God’s speaking through ‘a Son’ (as opposed to through prophets as of old) in the epoch of ‘these last days’. Yet the theology of the author of Romans 9–11 does not say merely some Jews are going to become Christian believers and thereby a part of the church; rather, ‘God has not rejected his people whom he foreknew’ (Rom. 11:2); ‘And in this way all Israel will be saved’ (Rom. 11:26). If, as some insist, by ‘Israel’ Paul here simply meant all saved people, the sentence conveys no information; it would be a nonsense tautology: ‘and in this way all saved people will be saved.’ I, with many, am convinced that Israel will yet again en masse seek the Lord and David their king in the latter days as many chapters in the Old Testament Prophets declare.¹⁶

I do not doubt that these prophecies find germinal fulfillment in past and present but await fulfillment in the eschaton. The rule, as I see it, is: ‘Prophecies with comprehensive future reference will have manifold fulfillment.’

Sometimes writers on this feature of biblical prediction and fulfillment define it as double fulfillment. If, however, the prediction had comprehensive reference to more than one future, similar event, then there is not double fulfillment but only one full, i.e. complete, fulfillment. Many informed devout interpreters of every age of the church have struggled with this problem, none more earnestly than the English Puritans of the early seventeenth century, in their struggles with the monarchy and the established church. Robert Manton, whose life spanned those turbulent years, in 1642 wrote the following about fulfillment of Joel's prophecy of the effusion of the Spirit on the Jews in the latter days and what Peter meant in relating it to the events of Pentecost. It is, Manton wrote, as if he had said, My brethren, these are not the effects of wine, but of the Spirit of God, which is now poured out on the first fruits of the Jews, as a pledge and assurance of that bountifull effusion of it, which (as Joel hath said) shall one day happen to the whole Nation. And this is what S. Peter meant, it may thus appear: first because the chief and most remarkable effect of the Spirit in the Apostles, at this time, was the gift of tongues, of which the Prophet makes no mention: and secondly, because as the Prophet revealed, so he repeats this pouring out of the Spirit, as a contemporary event with the wonders which shall be shown, in the heavens and in the earth before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes. Which day can no way be referr'd to the first coming of Christ, when he came to save sinners, not to destroy them.¹⁷

7. The Day of the Lord

The day of the Lord has attracted the interest and attention of every teacher or writer of Old Testament theology and serious exegesis. Every serious Bible dictionary or encyclopaedia of theology has a scholarly article on the day of the Lord. Let us take note that it appears apparently as a fully developed idea on the pages of the Old Testament, but only in the Prophets. Yet they employ it as a widely held, apparently well-defined expectation. The prophets only purified and clarified this hope of Israel. Among the many theories of the origin of the idea I cite as likely that of Walter Eichrodt, as summarized by John Bright:

For the future, Israel trusted in the coming of the Day of Yahweh. The origin of this concept, first mentioned in Amos 5:18–20 but already an entrenched popular hope in the eighth century is obscure and debated. The probability is that as Israel recalled in the cult the great days of Yahweh's victories in the past ... the expectation grew of a coming day par excellence when Yahweh would intervene in Israel's behalf and make his promises to the patriarchs actual. Though all the fundamentals of Israel's faith ... were still held, all were prostituted.¹⁸ Later on Amos and Isaiah, while retaining the idea changed it radically, making it a messianic hope.¹⁹

These views, now widely endorsed, are approved here, as following treatment shows.

The word, 'day,' among ancient Hebrews sometimes had a special meaning. Decisive events in one's own history may be called 'the day of ... trouble' (Ps. 77:2; and twelve more times in the Old Testament); the time of Jerusalem's siege and demolition, 'the day of Jerusalem.' '[T]he day of Midian' (Isa. 9:4) was the battle where Gideon and reassembled hosts of Ephraim slaughtered the hordes of the threatening Midianites and brought the severed heads of Oreb and Zeeb, the two 'princes of Midian,' 'to Gideon across the Jordan' (Judg. 7:24, 25; cf. Isa. 10:26). This essentially Hebraic manner of speaking has come over to us in 'the Lord's day,' the recurring weekly hours which for Christians belong to the worship of the Lord Jesus. 'The Lord's Supper' reflects the same manner of thinking. The sacrament is not for our nourishment but 'to show forth the Lord's death,' i.e. to honor Him, 'till he come.'

The most characteristic verbal designation of the whole of the wind-up of human history is 'the day of the Lord'. The ancient Hebrews and their Semitic neighbors (Arabs, Syrians, Assyrians) to this day employ graphic, frequently physical, images in ordinary conversation. The greatest battle is 'mother of all battles,' a great mountain is a 'mountain of God,' and similar.

As in the case of 'the latter days' which meets us in the first Christian sermon, so 'the day of the Lord' appears in the New Testament as a conception already familiar to the Jewish readers of the letters of the Apostles. Paul reminds readers of this Old Testament expectation at the end of the present age in 1 Corinthians 5:5; 2 Corinthians 1:14; 1 Thessalonians 5:7; and 2 Thessalonians 2:2 (asb, rsv, niv). It will be, said he, their time of meeting Christ and giving final account. Peter says that the day of the Lord will introduce a renovation of the world, resulting in a new heaven (2 Peter 3:10–13).

So the day of the Lord comes into the New Testament as an exclusively eschatological expression, and so it is regularly in the Old Testament, though not exclusively so in the Old Testament. Delling reminds us that 'from time to time the possibility has to be considered that expectation of a day of Yahweh applies to an event in Israel's history which though it is of supreme importance does not imply the inauguration of the last time.'²⁰ He cites as examples Ezekiel 34:12. So the greatest of all events in the future, bringing history to consummation, is 'the day of the Lord.'²¹

This formula, 'the day of the Lord' appears at least twenty times in the Old Testament—always and only in the Major and Minor Prophets. 'In that day', also a frequent term in these prophetic writings, often refers to the same—a time when God vindicates Himself by judging or defending His people through great works, which even the heathen must recognize as divine in cause, 'the day of the Lord.' Since it was a breaking through of the invisible, supernatural order into the visible world it partook of eternity and was an anticipation of the consummation.

An examination of 'that day,' 'day of God,' 'day of the Lord' passages in any exhaustive concordance abundantly justifies characterization it as the day of the Lord's vindication. The good people longed for such a day as this because in that day they saw vindication of their own steadfastness in face of oppression and as both judgment of their tormentors and as vindication of God's honor. This explains some of David's outbursts, as for example: 'Do I not hate those who hate you, O Lord?' (Ps. 139:21; cf. 22–24).

This 'day' has regard to the fact God created all things according to His pleasure and for His own glory. 'All things' includes all mankind, whether they are now good or evil. 'The chief end of man is to glorify God, and enjoy him forever.' This being the case, certain Israelites of the prophet Amos's time had it all wrong when they thought the day of the Lord was solely for their advancement. They had supposed the day was coming because 'God is on our side.' Amos set them right as follows: 'Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light [i.e. 'to you,' though not for everyone]. As if a man did flee from a lion ... and a serpent bit him ...' (Amos 5:18, 19 kjv). God declares Himself fed up with their religiosity and noisy rituals (Amos 5:21–24). And because they had mixed their proper Jewish observances with pagan ones they will go into captivity—which brings us to observe that the day of the Lord in its usual eschatological dimension included divine settling up of accounts with both Israelites and Gentiles and had three dimensions, as now follow.

I. Discrimination

In spite of the distortion of the word and its meaning in public thinking currently and for half a century, there is a proper place for discrimination both by God and man.

1. God will ‘in that day’ discriminate between the righteous and unrighteous in Israel. We have already seen this in Amos 5:18–24. Malachi’s brief prophecy focuses on this theme throughout the four chapters. Though he takes special umbrage at their religious functionaries, the Levites and priests (Mal. 1:1–2:17), no one of any class escapes notice (3:1–12). But God will not paint all with the same brush, for of those ‘who feared the Lord and esteemed his name.... “They shall be mine, says the Lord of hosts” ’ (3:16–17). ‘[T]he sun of righteousness shall rise with healing in its wings’ (4:2) and Elijah shall come again to convert many (4:5, 6). Such are the last words of Old Testament Scripture.

2. In the eschatological ‘day of the Lord’ God will discriminate between Israel and the nations. ‘And in that day ... Egypt shall become a desolation and Edom a desolate wilderness, for the violence done to the people of Judah, because they have shed innocent blood in their land. But Judah shall be inhabited for ever, and Jerusalem to all generations. I will avenge their blood, and I will not clear the guilty, for the Lord dwells in Zion’ (Joel 3:18a, 19–21 rsv). This divine notice of Israel’s persecution by her neighbors and settling up in judgment is not a small part of the day of the Lord or of any other day, for that matter (Isa. 14:1; and especially Obad. 15–21). The severe language of Isaiah 34:1–17 is unmatched with respect to God’s ‘day of vengeance, a year of recompense for the cause of Zion’ (v. 8). God will discriminate between righteousness and unrighteousness through the whole earth. Malachi 4:1 seems to have such a universal reference. Isaiah 13:6–16 twice threatens a looming ‘day of the Lord’ (vv. 6 and 9) ‘to make the land a desolation and to destroy its sinners from it’ (v. 9). Presumably ‘sinners’ in this passage means unrepentant sinners. The poetic character of this passage (shaking heaven, darkened celestial lights, a quaking earth and the like) is notice that not quite everything is to be taken literally.²²

As a result of discrimination between every appearance of righteousness and unrighteousness, two further features are characteristic of ‘that day’.

II. Salvation

Though this salvation for the whole earth is promised, salvation for Israel and their Land is prominent in most texts. The ‘salvation’ includes perfection not only of the saved but thorough ‘regeneration’ of the natural order (to use Jesus’ term, Matt. 19:28; ‘new world’ in rsv). Let the reader turn to Isaiah chapter 2 or 11 or 35:1–10 and gather one’s own impressions and apply them as widely or as narrowly to converted Israel or all the redeemed (as Rev. 21, 22 seem to do). ‘And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with singing; everlasting joy shall be upon their heads; they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away’ (Isa. 35:10). With this paean of joy, Isaiah concluded the first ‘book’ of his great volume of sixty-six chapters.

III. Judgment

Retributive judgment—though with chastening effects for some, not all—is prominent. Perhaps this corrective element is due to the historical situation then prevailing. For the writing prophets were always called to serve when moral conditions were generally low and political situations precarious. So ‘in wrath’ God would ‘remember mercy’ (Hab. 3:2). Three statements seem to characterize what judgment will be like in the day of the Lord.

1. The retributive element is most prominent, especially as it relates to ‘all the nations’ (Obad. 15 rsv), but which in the more spiritually accurate, though now less politically correct, kjv is, ‘For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen: as thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head.’ The retributive element is present every time the judgments of the day of the Lord is mentioned. Eschatological judgment will not improve people’s souls: ‘The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations [heathen] that forget God’ (Ps. 9:17 kjv).²³

2. The judgments of the day of the Lord will be universal in scope. As seen from the particular perspective of Joel they will rest chiefly on ‘all you surrounding nations’ (Joel 3:11). Yet he reports: ‘the Lord has spoken’ and follows with this address: ‘Proclaim this among the nations,’ and then follows what reads like a world-wide summons to a final showdown in ‘the Valley of Jehoshaphat’ (Jehovah judges) near Jerusalem. This theme is picked up in Revelation and connected with a final battle of Antichrist’s world-order against Christ and His world-order (Rev. 14 and 19). Isaiah says ‘the day of the Lord is near’ (Isa. 13:6) ‘to make the land a desolation’ (v. 9) and promises to ‘punish the world for its evil’ (Isa. 13:11). Earlier in a so-called ‘little apocalypse’ (Isa. 24, 25) there is a longer formal announcement of a final, universal judgment ‘On that day’ (24:21).

At this juncture let us advert to the previous point, that the day of the Lord introduces an eternal state of perfect human and earthly felicity. The judgment is to be followed by a new and perfect day when ‘on this mountain [new kingdom] the Lord of hosts will make for all peoples a feast of rich food, a feast of well-aged wine, of rich food.... And he will swallow up ... the covering that is cast over all peoples, the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death for ever; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces’ (Isa. 25:6–8). In these two chapters (Isa. 24, 25) there is a miniature of everything in the Apocalypse, where the voice of divine revelation reaches its highest point and leaves off.

When Will the Eschaton, or the Day of the Lord, Come?

This Old Testament question translates to a serious continuing present question, debated, sometimes bitterly, among schools of theology—even in recent denominational statements of faith. It is a complex question. Is the parousia, the Second Advent of Christ, something to be expected at any moment? How should signs of His coming figure in our expectation? I propose that the situation of devout believers awaiting the First Advent is quite parallel, if not quite identical, with our situation regarding the Second Advent.

The day of the Lord did not arrive with the Advent of Jesus the Messiah and the events of Pentecost, though, as we have seen, certain aspects of ‘the last days’ did. Our Lord’s second parousia which introduces the day of the Lord is still future. There are two facts about the time of the coming day of the Lord usually explicitly present in the prophecies.

1. The day of the Lord is future. It is future the first time the expression appears in the Bible (Isa. 2:12). Over and over again Isaiah uses the phrase, ‘in that day,’ to identify a future day. Isaiah 12 is a song to be sung when the perfect redemption of mankind and their earthly environs shall have been effected. Let us examine a short passage from Isaiah’s Immanuel oracle (Isa. 7–12).

In that day the root of Jesse shall stand as an ensign to the peoples [not Israel alone]; him shall the nations seek, and his dwellings shall be glorious. In that day the Lord will extend his hand yet a second time to recover ... his people, from Assyria, from Egypt, from Pathros, from Ethiopia, from Elam, from Shinar, from Hamath ... from the four corners of the earth (Isa. 11:10–12 rsv).

This seems to be a future ‘latter days’ day of the Lord, of regathering and salvation (see chap. 12, below), then far in the future, as it is still today. The ‘second time’ implies the return from Babylon, as the ‘first time.’ The Exodus was not a ‘time to recover his people’ from ‘Assyria ... Egypt ... Pathros’ and similar. The sons of Israel became a ‘people’ first in Egypt, hence the Exodus was not a ‘recovery’ but an ‘escape.’²⁴ Isaiah telescopes the near future (the doom of Babylon) with the remote eschatological future, in the prophecy of Isaiah 13. Here, though ‘the day of the Lord is near’, it is not present but future, as the prophet goes on to say: ‘as destruction from the Almighty it will come’ (Isa. 13:6). Joel likewise sees no dimension of depth in his picture of the day of the Lord, but there is remote future, then as now in his oracle.²⁵ It is to be admitted that sometimes a ‘day of the Lord’ seems to be in what is now long ago, but close examination of such passages will show the prophet sees elements of the near action of God in judgment and salvation similar to the final showdown of history. To my Old Testament students I say when we come to these passages—as professors and previous scholars have said to me—‘The prophets frequently associate future events similar in kind but widely separated in time. The dimension of depth is absent from the prophets’ vision of the future.’ So Joel saw in the plague of locusts already devastating the country, a harbinger of the day of the Lord (Joel 1:15) as well as a threatening army of foreign invaders (2:20) close at hand, the effusion of the Spirit ‘afterward’ (2:28, cited by Peter in Acts 2), a final judgment of Israel’s heathen enemies (Joel 3:1–16) and everlasting blessing in the final future (3:17–21). The best-known example of this element of depth (hidden to contemporaries) in Old Testament prediction is Isaiah’s prophecy of the virgin (Isa. 7:14) which, as most modern, conservative scholars agree, had a partial, initial fulfillment in the prophet’s own child (cf. Isa. 7:14–17 with 8:1–4; and Matt. 1:18–24).

2. The day of the Lord is always presumed to be drawing near, in some sense impending or imminent. Let Ezekiel furnish an example, where the prophet says that the day of the Lord or the time of Messiah is drawing near or has drawn near: ‘Thus says the Lord God: ‘Wail, “Alas for the day!” For the day is near, the day of the Lord is near’ (Ezek. 30:2, 3 twice in verse 3). The prophet goes on to speak of the coming conquests of Nebuchadnezzar in language which has eschatological color. Zephaniah, contemporary of Jeremiah, uses the same language (‘is near’) in his first chapter, twice in one verse: ‘Be silent before the Lord God! For the day of the Lord is near’ (Zeph. 1:7); ‘The great day of the Lord is near, near and hastening fast’ (v. 14). The Hebrew word qaruv (a passive participle of the ordinary word for drawing near and bringing near in other forms) is rendered ‘near’

in each case. ‘Hastening fast’ employs the strongest language available for swift movement. They are all threatening expressions in context of judgment. This word is used ten times in the Old Testament, including the above quoted passage, ascribed to the day of the Lord—Joel 1:15; 2:1; 3:14; Obadiah 15; Zephaniah 1:7, 14 (twice); Isaiah 13:6; Ezekiel 30:3 (twice).

It seems to me that the saints of Luke 2—Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, Joseph and Mary, and others ‘looking for the consolation of Israel’—saw the bright (salvation) side of this situation. Though amazed by what happened when angels announced the Messiah’s arrival, or when they actually met Him, as Simeon and Anna (and later Philip and Nathanael, Peter, James, and John), they were not surprised.

So, it seems, as believers throughout the Christian dispensation have witnessed conditions or events which they thought might be harbingers of the parousia, they would have been amazed but not surprised if Jesus had returned in glory. His coming has not been unexpected in any generation. We shall have more to say about this matter in later chapters.

Now, after personally surviving the ‘experts’ on prophecy and their mutual criticisms, their ‘lo heres’ and ‘lo theres,’ I know no more than Philip did, before Jesus actually appeared in his presence with marks of the anointing, which one must have to be ‘the anointed’—which is what Christos or Messiah means. I shall later describe what Paul and others seem to say are precursors of the parousia (coming) or day of the Lord. Paul distinctly describes them as such, when, in 2 Thessalonians 2:1 ff., he strongly denounces unjustified propaganda that the day of the Lord has arrived, or is about to arrive. Yet, we must avoid any denial that He might come ‘soon,’ or ‘quickly’ (see Rev. 1:1, 3; 22:20). We shall know for certain soon enough and plainly enough—as obvious as a flash of lightning from horizon to horizon. We should be watching in the sense of tending to godly business every day and all day long, for the ‘master of the house’ may ‘come in the evening, or at midnight, or at cockcrow, or in the morning.’

¹ The ch sound in eschatology does not quite correspond to any sound in ordinary English, so we use the k sound as in character, Christmas, etc.

² The Oxford English Dictionary, Vol. E, p. 793 finds it first in the writings of a certain G[eorge?] Bush in the year 1844!

³ Herodotus, Histories, VII, 107, Liddell & Scott, Lexicon sub eschatos.

⁴ Das Kommen Gottes, Jürgen Moltmann, 1995, English trans. by Margaret Kohl, The Coming of God (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1996), 390 pages.

⁵ See S. M. Smith’s article ‘Theology of Hope’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, pp. 532–534, ‘New Theology,’ No. 5 and Moltmann’s The Coming of God.

⁶ I am partially indebted to Studies in Eschatology, classroom lectures of John Murray (1898–1975) at Westminster Theological Seminary, printed but not published, n.d.

⁷ These two words, in order, mean ‘hidden’ and ‘falsely assigned authorship.’ After the last canonical

Old Testament book was written, beginning about 200 bc, devout Jews produced a number of writings on religious subjects. Some of these are among the thirteen (or fourteen) books included in some printed English Bibles between Malachi and Matthew. Some are not. They tell us much about the religious ideas current among Jews in Jesus' time, ideas from the first and second centuries bc.

⁸ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of the Church, Faith and the Consummation. Dogmatics, vol. iii, trans. David Cairns (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962), pp. 399, 400.

⁹ Gurdon C. Oxtoby, Prediction and Fulfillment in the Bible (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966), pp. 33, 34.

¹⁰ There are volumes of literature usually categorized as Old Testament theology which trace these ideas through the Hebrew Scriptures. This does not seem to be the place to lengthen this discussion by introducing the history and present state of the subject.

¹¹ Deut. 4:30; 31:29; Num. 24:14; Isa. 2:2; Jer. 23:20; 30:24; 48:47; 49:39; Ezek. 38:16; Dan. 2:28; 10:14; Hos. 3:5; and Mic. 4:1.

¹² See Jer. 17:25; 23:5; 33:15, 17; 36:30; Isa. 55:3; cf. Acts 13:34.

¹³ Gustav F. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. George E. Day (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1883), p. 489.

¹⁴ ibid.

¹⁵ R. G. Gruenler, 'Last Days, Day' in EDT, p. 619.

¹⁶ I have devoted many pages to this matter in Daniel and the Latter Days and its successor The Earthly Reign of our Lord with His People with many pages of documentation and bibliography, but do not press the matter at this juncture.

¹⁷ Robert Manton, Israel's Redemption or The Prophetical History of Our Saviour's Kingdom on Earth, etc., London, 1642. R. Manton was a minister, M.A., Wadham College in Oxford. The research of Douglas J. Culver for his doctoral thesis at New York University, published as Albion and Ariel, British Puritanism and the Birth of Political Zionism, New York: Peter Lang, 1995, turned up Manton's book, of which I have a University microfilm copy.

¹⁸ John Bright, A History of Israel (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1959), pp. 243, 244.

¹⁹ ibid., pp. 244, 245, 281.

²⁰ Delling, hemera, TDNT, II, p. 944.

²¹ As always in this book I have avoided both the artificial transliteration of Jehovah, the four letters of the name of Israel's national God, and the very uncertain, scholars' attempt to recreate the name as Yahweh. The ‘h’ represents a sound not ordinarily vocalized in English and both the ‘a’ and the ‘e’ are uncertain for we do not know if the word had a causative verbal inflection or a simple, nor if it was pronounced after an Arabic manner or according to the manner of the Massorites of seventh to ninth centuries ad. It seems best to follow the precedent of the kjv and rsv which uniformly render the ‘tetragrammaton’ the Lord, all capital letters.

²² Early in study of this subject, I became convinced that such language, carried over into 2 Peter 3:10 ff.—fervent heat, dissolving elements—has to do with something far short of annihilation of the natural order. ‘Briefly, as I have considered the possibilities, it seems that the cosmic disturbances in 2 Peter 3:10 [and elsewhere in Scripture] shall consist of a limited renovation involving ... such changes in the realms of inanimate material, of vegetable, animal, and human life as are necessary to produce conditions which the prophets declare shall prevail during the coming kingdom age’ (from my book Daniel and the Latter Days, p. 194). It also seems to me the evidence is that this occurs immediately with the Second Advent (parousia). ‘Appendix I, The Time and Extent of the Coming World Dissolution,’ in the book, pp. 188–200.

²³ The Hebrew word goi (plu. goim) has four translations in kjv—nation, heathen, people, Gentile. (1) When God promised Hagar regarding her son, Ishmael, ‘I will make him a great nation’—a group united by a common ancestry is obviously correct. ‘Nation’ is related to Latin natus, born. (2) When (much rarer) in Leviticus 25:44 and 26:33, 38 and 45 the neighbor worshippers of false gods are called goi, the kjv is correct to render ‘heathen’—people commonly distinguished by false worship, usually idolatry and accompanying immorality. (3) Rarely as at Joshua 3:17; 4:1; 5:6, 8; and 10:13 the kjv renders goi as ‘people,’ with regard to the fact they were simply a band of folk crossing a river, forming an army and the like having in common a civil-religious social connection. (4) ‘Gentiles’ alternates with nation(s) in kjv renderings in the Major Prophets. (eg. Isa. 42:1, 6 where Messiah will ‘bring forth judgment ... and ... light to the Gentiles’). ‘Gentiles’ is always spelled with initial capital. The root of the English word (Latin, gentiles) means races or nations. ‘The threat of contamination by paganism in the Greek period led the Jews to adopt a rigorous exclusive attitude toward non-Jews’ (R. K. Harrison, ‘Gentiles’ in ZPBE II, p. 697, Harrison’s article is highly recommended).

²⁴ Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977), or The Earthly Reign of Our Lord with His People (by author, 1998), pp. 80–82.

²⁵ Too much must not be made of the ‘tense’ (or state) of the verb, but in Isaiah 13:6 as in Joel 1:15, where there is similar lack of depth and telescoping of the future, the word is ‘shall come’ yabho’ (kal imperfect), first masculine singular from bo’, to come.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1007). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Death, Mortality and Immortality

Quite understandably, death and its sequels are of pervasive and timeless interest. About everything that could possibly be derived from Scripture, from philosophy and from experience has been said many times over. Of course science—some of it ‘falsely so-called’—continues its efforts to solve the mystery of death. There is a Protestant form of the Christian view of death and the intermediate state. Let those with interest in the history of it read Charles Hodge.¹ A. H. Strong has digested and summarized the arguments for the Protestant view—rational, teleological, ethical and historical.² I am looking at about fifty books arranged on or near my desk, all related to this subject. In order adequately to treat the doctrine of death and not too briefly I shall follow fairly closely the outline of the subject furnished by my professor, Alva J. McClain, whose careful biblical approach served me well all those years before I became acquainted with more recent essays, symposiums, and monographs, as well as some very old ones, not least Calvin’s exposé of the soul-sleep error of Reformation times (Psychopannychia, available in English in the Beveridge translation of Calvin’s Tracts).³

A scriptural understanding of the nature of death in mankind depends in part upon a scriptural understanding of the nature of mankind. The converse also is true. In treatment of the doctrine of mankind (Anthropology) we devoted chapter 4 to ‘The Non-Physical Aspects of Man’s Nature,’ and as subtitle, ‘The Soul, Its Distinct Features and Functions’ and early in the chapter promised, ‘When these studies reach Eschatology, in connection with the doctrine of death and the intermediate state, a fuller account must be given.’ I also cited J. O. Buswell’s affirmation of ‘Man’s two-fold Being’ and quoted his cautiously stated definition of the same, here repeated in part. He says, it is ‘obvious’ (and I add that the wearisome volumes and columns of so-called biblical theology of recent generations to the contrary, will never erase the obvious) that according to the Bible man is both a material and non-material entity, both body and soul, and that these two aspects of man are not only logically distinguishable, but separable, so that at death the non-material man goes into the realm of the unseen ...⁴

This is the plain assumption of the Bible throughout and has been the near unanimous opinion of every branch of the church and its orthodox theologians. Augustine was not quoting his Platonist professors when he equated ‘the death of the body’ with ‘the separation of the soul from the body’ and characterized death as ‘violent sundering of the two elements, which are conjoined and interwoven in a living being ... bound to be a harsh and unnatural experience.’⁵ He was expressing what Jesus Himself believed when He in the words of Psalm 31:5 made His last prayer to God, ‘Father, into your hands I commit my spirit!’ (Luke 23:46).

Thomas Oden is right when he remarks:

What was being committed and received? Surely not the body only, for it was soon to die. Nor was it merely his breath in a literal sense, for what difference could that last portion of air make? Rather it was the living spirit (pneuma) as distinct from the body that was being committed to God in death (Luke 23:46). James assumed that ‘the body without the spirit is dead’ (James 2:26).⁶

We shall say more about these matters later.

At the present moment, however, we observe the professional, elite theologians of the European university faculties, along with many leading lights of the biblical theology movement, have said the exact opposite. Perhaps among these scholars the most nearly orthodox and one whose interest in eschatology and ‘a theology of hope’ qualifies him to speak, is Jürgen Moltmann. In a chapter on ‘Cosmic Eschatology, The Future of Creation,’ he says:

The world of the living, of the earth, the solar system, our galaxy and the cosmos is the condition for our human world too, for it is in this world that our human world is imbedded. Because there is no such thing as a soul separate from the body [emphasis added], and no humanity detached from nature—from life, the earth and the cosmos—there is no redemption for human beings either without the redemption of nature.⁷

For these theologians, soul (mind, consciousness, memory) is a function of the nervous system only. Moltmann holds that at death, though a believer sleeps in Jesus, he goes out of existence until resurrection in a restored newly-created body—into a new heaven and earth. This is an improvement, of course, on the evolutionary theology of liberalism and fits neatly both into post-Freud psychology and neo-orthodox theology. These theologians regard the Bible as valuable testimony to the religious insights and experiences of those who wrote the Bible. They then bring their own educated competence (as they understand it) to the theological task and seek to confirm only as much of the Christian theological consensus (historical orthodoxy) as passes muster with the educated consensus of the Enlightenment and the succeeding post-enlightenment of today. They find some evidence of belief in the separable existence of human souls in the beliefs of some people in the Bible, but deny that the existence of souls is a matter of divine revelation which speaks with authority.⁸ What are the biblical grounds for believing in the existence of a human soul in each member of our race? I shall try to be brief. We make no claim for a natural immortality of the soul. As the church Fathers and Reformers explained, the soul along with all else of creation is a contingent thing, dependent at each moment on the providence and preservation of God, specifically of Christ, in whom all things hold together. We do assert, however, that for good reason the Old Testament somewhat obscurely and the New Testament very plainly teach that ‘after God had made all other creatures, he created man, male and female, with reasonable and immortal souls.’⁹

It is well known that the ancient Egyptians believed in the existence of the soul which exits the body at death, appears before deity in judgment, and is assigned to a ‘heaven’ or a ‘hell.’ It was a national obsession. Their best minds as well as the resources of the realm were devoted to this perception of human existence. Moses, author of the first five books of the Bible, ‘was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and he was mighty in his words and deeds’ (Acts 7:22). It would therefore be surprising if no evidence of belief in an immaterial ‘substance’ or ‘entity’—the soul as an aspect of human nature—would appear in the first five books (Pentateuch) of the Bible. Archaeology of the nineteenth century poured a flood of light on ancient Egypt’s preoccupation with the survival of souls. It is therefore ‘inconceivable that the people of Israel should have lived so long among the Egyptians, and observed their elaborate Ritual of the Dead, and not to some extent become possessed of the idea of immortality, or that ... Moses should have left them ignorant of a doctrine which he knew so well.’¹⁰ Joseph, son of Jacob (longtime prime minister of Egypt) had his father’s body embalmed in accordance with Egyptian custom (Gen. 50:1, 2). Whatever his reasons may have been, Joseph (and his eleven brothers) would not have been ignorant of the reasons for the Egyptian customs they carried out. It was expected the Ka or soul would become associated with supreme gods and perhaps return from time to time to inhabit the mummified corpse.

Christian exegesis has always found the doctrine of a ‘future life’ of an immortal soul affirmed in the Psalms. In the late twentieth century, however, discovery of the Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) tablets on a headland of the North Syrian coast has vastly enlarged our understanding of the literary form and vocabulary of the Psalms. The reader is directed to the introductory chapters of the three volumes of The Anchor Bible on the Psalms, written by Mitchell Dahood, Professor of Ugaritic at the Pontifical Institute in Rome. I visited the site of Ugarit in 1962 and had a brief conversation with Father Dahood in about 1970 shortly after he finished his work on the Hebrew Psalms. He found a clear doctrine of immortality of the soul and future resurrection of the body in more than forty texts.

Traditional Christian interpretation has always found belief in immortality and resurrection in Psalm 16:10; 17:15; 49:14, 15; 73:25, 26; as well as in Hosea 12:14; Isaiah 36:19; Ezekiel 37; Job 19:25–26; and Daniel 12:2.

2 Maccabees 7 witnesses the firm faith of the Maccabean martyrs in immortality and the first five chapters of the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon are entirely devoted to the subject of rewards and punishments in an after-death existence of immortal souls.

These beliefs were not new when they appear so prominently in these later records, but, as Dahood and other writers now show, such beliefs were already present among the Canaanites of Ugarit long before the Israelites settled in among them in the southern reaches of Canaanite culture and religion. The texts in the Psalms and a few other Old Testament books where Dahood (now deceased) found everlasting life beyond the grave are listed and quoted on pages XLV to LII of The Anchor Bible: Psalms, Vol. III.¹¹

Old Testament scholarship has been slow in accepting the obvious in Dahood’s (and more recent authors’) work. Jürgen Moltmann either ignores or is unaware of the sweeping change that has come, for his The Coming of God cited above in this chapter takes no notice whatsoever of it. Evangelical scholars as well have been tardy in gaining this awareness.

The subject of this chapter is never absent from human consciousness or sub-consciousness. This fact is specifically recognized in the Scripture text which says the Son of God partook of our ‘flesh’—human nature—‘that through death he might ... deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong slavery’ (Heb. 2:14, 15). Even believers are not delivered from fear of death, only delivered from bondage to that fear. Among mankind in general this angst is inseparably connected with accusations of conscience and responsibility to God for moral conduct, inasmuch ‘as it is appointed for man to die once, and after that comes judgment’ (Heb. 9:27).

Whether we think of death as the last event (eschaton) of the present life or as first event (novissimum) of existence beyond the event itself, physical death raises many more questions. My sister Eleanor, a retired teacher of children, who knew she was soon to die of cancer, asked me for a Christian book about heaven; Job wanted to know ‘If a man die, shall he live again?’ ‘Will we know one another in heaven?’ is a frequent inquiry. I do not recall any anxious persons asking for information about hell.

The word ‘death’ and the idea of it are not always employed in a literal theological sense in Scripture. In a plain metaphor for poison the prophets of Gilgal exclaimed, ‘there is death in the pot’ (2 Kgs. 4:40), and of physical dangers Paul wrote that he was ‘in deaths oft[en]’ (2 Cor. 11:23 kjv). Death is personified: ‘Death and Hades were thrown into the lake of fire’ (Rev. 20:14; cf. v. 13; and 1 Cor. 15:54, 55). ‘[P]ut to death’ the first time it appears (Gen. 26:11) and nearly forty times in Old and New Testaments, is the judicial expression for capital punishment.

After we have discussed the nature and causes of physical death, which is the main focus of this chapter, we shall reflect on its meaning and what one’s response should be to the dread fact that ‘it is appointed for man to die once’ (Heb. 9:27).

Theologically, in relation to the experience of human beings, death (as also the verb ‘die’ and the adjective ‘dead’) designates three related but nevertheless distinct experiences or states.

The first is a condition, the condition of everyone by (fallen) nature, i.e., by reason of descent from the natural head of our race, who lost life for all of us. This is spiritual death, and is the specific teaching of Romans 5:12–19, elaborated at Ephesians 2:1, 5, 12 and 4:17–19. It consists essentially in alienation from the life of God. The remedy for this condition is to become united with the life of God through union with His Son (Eph. 2:5, 6). This matter has been treated at length in several earlier parts of this study.

The second is an event, the event which terminates physical life in the human body, physical death. ‘[I]t is appointed for man to die once’ (Heb. 9:27). Both in Scripture and in all human verbal expression, death, die and dead usually mean physical death. This is the subject of the present study. James 2:26 defines the event: ‘the body apart from the spirit is dead.’ It introduces each one who dies into a state called ‘death’—the essence of which is separation of body and spirit, for which the universal remedy will be resurrection of all (1 Cor. 15:20; Rev. 20:12, 13).

The third is an event and state called the second death, mentioned only ‘by name’ in Revelation 20:14 and 21:8 where it is set in contrast with the life eternal (Rev. 21:9–22:5). This topic will be considered later in connection with the eternal destiny of the unsaved. Second death apparently will involve perpetuation of spiritual death (alienation from God) as well as a repetition of physical death after the ‘resurrection of ... the unjust’ (Acts 24:15), also called by Jesus ‘the resurrection of judgment’ (John 5:29). It is without remedy—a truly inmedicable woe.

Observe further that in Scripture death of any kind is not essentially annihilation (see later on eternal punishment) but (1) separation, (2) cessation of normal activity and (3) destruction (the rendering inoperative) of normal capacity.

I. The Nature of Physical Death

1. Constitutionally, as a human being, normally existing as an ensouled body or stated otherwise (either is correct) an embodied soul, death is a radical rupture—a parturition of body from soul (or spirit). It should be noted that, though no doubt phrased in the customary idiom of the ancient Hebrews, more than folk opinion is involved in the first biblical description of the event of death—of Rachel in childbirth—the Scripture says, literally as in kjv, ‘and it came to pass, as her soul was in departing, (for she died) ...’ (Gen. 35:18). The text is straightforward Hebrew narrative—wayehi betse’th naphshah ki methah. The word for soul here is nephesh (life, soul, mind, person), not ruach (breath, wind, spirit). Nephesh never means breath—hence, it is erroneous to translate, in twentieth-century idiom, ‘as she breathed her last’ (as niv and others). This misfired ‘dynamic equivalence’ utterly misrepresents what Scripture says.

In a psalm of trust in his God to be his Savior both here and hereafter, David prayed to the Lord, ‘Into your hand I commit my spirit [ruach, also breath or wind]’ (Ps. 31:5; cf. v. 1). Ruach is the word for the divine Spirit (Gen. 6:3), known in the New Testament as Third Person of the Godhead. The human spirit departs the body when one dies, though in this case the more usual word would be nephesh, soul (Ps. 78:39).¹² It is the word Job used for a ‘ghost,’ a ‘disembodied being.’¹³

Robert Martin-Achard, in a remarkably complete work on this subject, says of the Old Testament theological assumptions about death:

When a Israelite dies, his breath or spirit, ruach, is withdrawn. It is not in fact a possession freely and eternally at man’s disposal, it has only been lent to him, it belongs to God and so it is quite natural that, in the hour of death it should revert to its owner, Gen. 2:7; Ps. 104:29; Job 34:14 f.¹⁴

In our Lord’s final prayer to the Father, as He was about to pronounce, ‘It is finished,’ He expressed Himself in David’s phraseology: ‘Father, into your hands I commit my spirit’ (Luke 23:46). Matthew says, ‘Jesus cried out again with a loud voice and yielded up his spirit’ (Matt. 27:50), and John, ‘he bowed his head and gave up his spirit’ (John 19:30). Stephen later, at the moment of death, saw Jesus and said, ‘Lord Jesus, receive my spirit’ (Acts 7:59).

All these considerations furnish prima facie support for the assertion that death in human beings is not simply a permanent shutting down of functions of the body, with resulting dissolution, but, as noted above, a radical rupture, a parturition of body from soul (or spirit). James puts the same this way, ‘the body apart from the spirit is dead’ (James 2:26).

2. As to the physical side of mankind, death is an event, the cessation of life (indefinable but marked by activity) in the body (marked by recognizable signs) ushering the soul into a new state of existence. Everyone is familiar to some degree with signs of death, varying in degree by the amount of acquaintance with death in others. Common knowledge, medical science and law have different standards of judgment as to how and when death has certainly occurred. The body ceases to move, rigor mortis stiffens the joints and flesh after a few hours and, rather quickly, except for the undertaker’s intervention with embalming, the corpse becomes corrupt and repulsive to any in its neighborhood. As Martha, ‘the sister of the dead man,’ said to Jesus, ‘Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead for four days’ (John 11:39 kjv). Yet that is not the only reason for prompt burial. The presence of an exposed corpse is very depressing inasmuch as it reminds us starkly of our own mortality.

Scripture has two ways of expressing the fact of physical death. James says, ‘the body ... is dead.’ Jesus said in His famous exchange with the Sadduces, ‘And as for the resurrection of the dead, have you not read what was said to you by God: “I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob”? He is not God of the dead, but of the living’ (Matt. 22:31, 32), that is, they live as spirits with God. Following Jewish custom He even referred to paradise, the ‘third heaven’ where God is specially present (2 Cor. 12:1–4), as ‘Abraham’s Bosom’ (Luke 16:23). In such a case one may say biblically that the body is dead, but the spirit of the deceased is alive. On the other hand, though Jesus obliquely referred to Lazarus’ death as ‘Our friend Lazarus has fallen asleep,’ He went on to say ‘plainly, “Lazarus has died” ’ (John 11:11, 14). In such case it is not the body that is said to be dead, but the person. In the Old Testament the latter is the invariable manner of speaking, for revelation regarding the future life was obscure. It was Christ ‘who ... brought life and immortality to light through the gospel’ (2 Tim. 1:10).

3. Comprehensively considered, physical death is something which happens to the entire person, the whole man.¹⁵ Though, as we have just noticed, some texts speaking from a limited point of view refer to the body’s dying, other passages speaking more comprehensively say the man, the whole man, dies. ‘The beggar died.... the rich man also died.’ Rachel ‘died.’ God told Adam, ‘You shall surely die.’ Eight times in Genesis 5 it is written, ‘and he died.’ ‘You are dust, and to dust you shall return’ (Gen. 3:19), and from all appearances to his sons, who (we may assume) buried Adam, the whole of Adam was placed in the ground. Yet the same Bible, no longer speaking the language of appearances, sometimes views the deceased as dead in body, but consciously existing (‘alive’) in soul/spirit. Thus Peter says of the Lord as ‘being put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit’ (1 Peter 3:18), and Paul says that ‘our outer nature is wasting away [already], our inner nature is being renewed day by day ...’ (2 Cor. 4:16).

More about the state of body and soul after death will follow in connection with the ‘intermediate state.’

II. The Causes of Physical Death

1. Physical death, of course, is brought about by a multitude of material events and physical causes. These may be natural or otherwise, i.e. brought about by homicide. The medical profession, the keepers of public records of population and the news media, analyze and report the natural causes. The Bible takes cognizance of the same. Some passages cite human frailty as a cause, as Psalm 103:15, 16. Others speak of old age (e.g. Ps. 90:9, 10). Physical hazards are mentioned, such as the tower of Siloam which ‘fell and killed’ eighteen people (Luke 13:4) and how Ahaziah fell through a second-story lattice, causing fatal injury (2 Kgs. 1:2 ff.). Disease is also frequently the cause of death on the pages of Bible history: a King Herod died of one disease (Acts 9:37) and Abjah, son of King Jeroboam, of another (1 Kgs. 14:1–18). Plagues, famines, wars causing multiple deaths are part of all history, including biblical. The first physical death reported in Scripture was a homicide (Gen. 4:8). Foolish risk-taking is another frequent cause of death—‘the wicked ... dies for lack of discipline, and because of his great folly he is led astray’ (Prov. 5:22–23). The harlot’s ‘house is the way to Sheol, going down to the chambers of death’ (Prov. 7:27).

2. The primary, i.e. originating cause, of physical death is sin—both original sin and personal sin. The former is taught explicitly in Romans 5:12–21, ‘Therefore, just as sin came into the world through one man, and death through sin, and so death spread to all men because all sinned’ (v. 12), stated in similar language later in the passage: ‘many died through one man’s trespass’ (v. 15); ‘For the judgment following one trespass brought condemnation’ (v. 16); ‘because of one man’s trespass, death reigned through that one man’ (v. 17); ‘one trespass led to condemnation for all men’ (v. 18); ‘by the one man’s disobedience the many were made sinners’ (v. 19); ‘sin reigned in death’ (v. 21).

In a particular case Jesus almost spoofed the notion that a man’s affliction by blindness was punishment for his own or his parent’s sin (John 9:1–3). It is nevertheless true that ‘the wages of sin is death’ (Rom. 6:23) and every sin increases mortal danger: wisdom cries, ‘he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death’ (Prov. 8:3, 36 kjv). Sexual license is the way to death and hell (Prov. 7:1–27).

Every major Christian group—Roman Catholic, Protestant, Eastern Orthodox—has taught that in some sense ‘the fall of Adam, as the divinely appointed head of the race ... brought this evil [when he first sinned] not only upon himself but upon all his posterity.’¹⁶

Repeatedly the Bible drives this truth home—every human death, either physical or spiritual, is punishment, the penalty applied by God for sin. Genesis 2:17 makes this plain. The Old Testament does not say much more about it but the New Testament makes much of the Adamic connection. The imputation of guilt for Adam’s sin applies to everyone, infants to elders. Infants, of course, cannot suffer death for personal sins—only for original sin. On the one hand, ‘sin when it is fully grown brings forth death’ (James 1:15); on the other hand we are born ‘dead in the trespasses and sins’ (Eph. 2:1).

Pelagians of Augustine’s time asserted that Adam was mortal at his creation, that like all earthly, created living things he was liable to death whether he sinned or not. Socinians of Reformation times and later Unitarians and liberalism generally since Schleiermacher—who reinterpreted most Christian doctrines to accommodate the age of reason—have agreed. Herman Bavinck wrote:

When Pelagius, Socinus, Schleiermacher, Ritschl and a number of other theologians and philosophers separate death from its connection with sin, they are led by a defective insight between ethos [Gr. the customary, usual] and physis [Gr. nature]. Misery and death are not absolutely always consequences of punishment of great personal transgression (Luke 13:2; John 9:3); but that they are connected with sin, we learn every day. Who can number the victims of mammonism, alcoholism and licentiousness? Even spiritual sins exercise their influence on corporal life; envy is a rottenness of the bones (Prov. 14:30). This connection is taught us in a great measure, when it placed the not yet fallen man in Paradise, where death had not yet entered, and eternal life was not yet possessed and enjoyed; when it sends fallen man, who, however, is destined for redemption, into a world full of misery and death; and at last assigns to the wholly renewed man a new heaven and a new earth, where death, sorrow, crying, or pain shall no longer exist (Rev. 21:4).¹⁷

3. Satan, whom Jesus labeled a ‘murderer [man-killer] from the beginning’ (John 8:44), is an agent of death among mankind, in some not fully understood way. Hebrews 2, in a unique discussion of the divine purpose of the incarnation, says that it was ‘that through death he might destroy the one who has the power of death, that is, the devil’ (Heb. 2:14). Perhaps the book of Job explains this in part. Behind the natural agents which killed Job’s children was the devil, who with God’s permission destroyed them (Job 1:12, 18–19). It was Satan who accused (slandered) Job in God’s presence and ‘incited me [God] against him to destroy him without reason’ (Job 2:3). Satan has the ‘power of death’ (Heb. 2:14) only within divine providence, though he is a very dangerous being—as a roaring lion seeking to devour (1 Peter 5:8).¹⁸

4. Ultimately God Himself is the cause of death inasmuch as He imposed it on humankind as the only fitting penalty for sin. It is for this reason that limits must be placed on expectations of lengthening human lives indefinitely. The scriptural and national evidence for death as the judicial penalty for sin, rather than simply the way nature gets rid of one generation to make room for succeeding generations, is overwhelming, as assembled by A. H. Strong.¹⁹ with modification. I refer the reader to these pages, though I have here abbreviated Strong’s summary.

The original threat, ‘you shall surely die’ (Gen. 2:17) and ‘to dust you shall return’ (Gen. 3:19), is introduced obviously as punishment. Allusions to the threat confirm its penal quality, e.g. Numbers 16:29—concerning the punishment of Korah’s rebellion—speaks of common deaths as the visitation of ‘the fate of all mankind,’ where paqadh (visitation) means judicial, penal visitation or punishment. Caleb, though a godly man, was esteemed by his daughters as one who ‘died for his own sin’ (Num. 27:3). This shows that ancient Israelites understood the connection of physical death with punishment for sin. The prayer of Moses (Ps. 90:7–9, 11 kjv) shows that he understood death to be a punishment for sin, for the Psalm declares that in dying we are ‘consumed’ by God’s ‘anger,’ ‘troubled’ by divine ‘wrath’ in view of ‘our iniquities’ and are passing away ‘in’ divine ‘wrath.’ Hezekiah’s praise to God for a brief extension of life acknowledges that in such extension God had ‘cast all my sins behind your [his] back’ (Isa. 38:17).

The most significant human death is of course the death of Jesus, the ‘man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief’ (Isa. 53:3). Though Isaiah’s prophecy predicted that Jesus would die at the hands of those who esteemed Him to be worthy of execution for His own sins (sabbath-breaking and blasphemy), the prophecy says, ‘Yet it was the will of the Lord to crush him; he has put him to grief’ (Isa. 53:10).

In cosmic perspective of the divine counsels, it is not incorrect to say that God killed Jesus, just as He does every other human being—not because Jesus was a sinner but because ‘For our sake he [God] made him to be sin’ (2 Cor. 5:21).

The New Testament is more specific, tracing all death of mankind to Adam’s transgressions, as we have seen earlier (Rom. 5:12–21), and even says that people everywhere know at least certain sins deserve the punishment of death—‘they know God’s decree that those who practice such things deserve to die’ (Rom. 1:32). See also 1 Peter 4:6; 1 Corinthians 15:21, 22; and Romans 8 which draws the connection of death with divine punishment several times (8:3, 10, 11). The doctrine of redemption (atonement) specifically presupposes the same throughout the New Testament.

A Question

If physical death is punishment for sin why do believing, forgiven sinners die like everyone else? If death is a penal evil why does God inflict it on those He has absolutely justified?

Let us start by reminding ourselves that ‘for those who love God all things work together for good’ (Rom. 8:28) and that nothing ‘will be able to separate us from the love of God’ including ‘death’ (Rom 8:38, 39). This means death is a means of our complete sanctification. It is not an invariably necessary means, because Enoch and Elijah were taken to God’s presence without death and all believers who survive until Jesus comes at the parousia will be translated and completely sanctified without experiencing physical death. Further, death and a supposed subsequent purgatory in order to complete satisfaction for sins—either venial or mortal, as in the Roman eschatology—is a wholly unscriptural notion. It is certain that death of believers is compatible with God’s work of vicarious redemption. For reasons of His own God sees fit not to give His people every benefit until the right time, on a schedule for our best interest, as ‘wholesome and sanctifying chastisement.’²⁰ What are these benefits?

Let Robert Dabney explain. ‘From the earliest day’ the prospect of death ‘begins to stir the sinner’s conscience,’ and serves ‘to humble the proud soul, to mortify carnality, to check pride, to foster spiritual mindedness.’²¹ He adds:

It is the fact that sicknesses are premonitions of death, which makes them active means of sanctification. Bereavements through the death of friends form another class of disciplinary sufferings.... And, when the closing scene approaches, no doubt in every case where the believer is conscious, the pains of its approach, the solemn thoughts and emotions it suggests, are all used to ripen the soul rapidly for heaven.... we shall see that all other chastisements put together, are far less efficacious in checking inordinate affection and sanctifying the soul.... A race of sinners must be a race of mortals; Death is the only check ... potent enough to prevent depravity from breaking out with a power which would make the state of the world perfectly intolerable.²²

This is strong language about the moral restraint of death on evil in general and chastisement of believers for their sanctification, but it finds support in the words of Peter: ‘Beloved, do not be surprised at the fiery trial when it comes upon you to test you, as though something strange were happening to you. But rejoice insofar as you share Christ’s sufferings, that you may also rejoice and be glad when his glory is revealed’ (1 Peter 4:12, 13; see also 14–19 and Phil. 3:7–10).

III. The Meaning of Death

As I write, the news magazines and popular television and newspapers are recounting the deaths of June 6, 1944, on the beaches of Normandy, as well as memorializing the deaths in New York City, September 11, 2001. Hence, aside from Scripture, the question arises, what does death mean to mankind in general?

In the first place, it is the ultimate sacrifice for one’s kin or nation. Though forgotten or even despised as false idealism by a few cynics or professed elite thinkers, this is so obvious to all who love life and place and admire courage, that nothing further needs to be said. Exemplified in the famous speech of Patrick Henry—‘Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains of slavery?’—it is also scriptural (John 15:13): ‘Greater love has no one than this, that someone lays down his life for his friends.’ Secondly, it is an extreme tragedy. Whether the grim reaper arrive in one’s infancy, youth, maturity or extreme old age, death is a tragic end. As philosophers have been wont to say, it takes a long life to learn how to live, hence to take away life just when one is prepared to perform well seems wrong. Death is associated with tears, mourning, earth, dust and ashes, as Job reflected at great length.

The Scriptures assert death’s tragedy to be an inevitability (Eccles. 2:15, 16; 3:1, 2, 19; 9:5). When one puts down an unwanted kitten or slaughters a sheep or chicken one is reminded that we must die too: ‘For the fate of the sons of men and the fate of beasts is the same; as one dies, so dies the other. They all have the same breath, and man has no advantage over the beasts’ (Ecc. 3:19 rsv). On a summer day I put down a sick kitten with a blow to the back of the head in the sight of my late wife. She wept profusely. In a few weeks she also died and I wept. In a short time you and I shall shut down all operations and leave behind all our possessions. The place that knew us shall know us no more. Those who love us shall weep. Tragic, is it not?

Considered in view of its tragic aspect, death is both a curse—which of course is primary (Gen. 3:17–19)—and a dreadful enemy, the last to be destroyed, as Paul said (1 Cor. 15:25, 26).

Aside from the Christian hope, death remains also a mystery—even more mysterious, however, in pre-Christian times. Though Job was confident he would ‘see God ... on my side’ (Job 19:26, 27 asv; ‘for myself’ kjv) after death, resurrection of the body was not revealed to him. Job 19:26 probably should be rendered ‘yet without my flesh’ (mibesari, the m prefix is ambiguous, either ‘out from’ or ‘away from’). Earlier he raised the question, ‘If a man dies, shall he live again?’ (Job 14:14), followed by an eagerly embraced glimmer of hope that he might live again. There is more sure hope for a tree, that ‘cut down’ sometimes sprouts again, than for a man who ‘lies down and rises not again; till the heavens are no more he will not awake’ (v. 12). Yet he asks God to remember him in the grave at some future time (v. 13). It was Christ Himself, who for us has ‘brought light and immortality to light through the gospel’ (2 Tim. 1:10).

Perhaps the most severe sadness about death, both for those about to die and family and friends who survive them, is the consequent complete exclusion from all social connections which have given meaning to life. A standard Old Testament expression, which often means death by execution, is to be ‘cut off from people’ (see many examples in Lev. 7, 17, 19, 20). It meant this for the Lord’s Servant-Messiah who was ‘cut off out of the land of the living [people]’ (Isa. 53:8 kjv), as leprous King Uzziah was excluded from the temple premises—‘excluded from the house of the Lord’ (2 Chron. 26:21). The Sweet Singer observed sadly, ‘As for man, his days are like grass ... for the wind passes over it ... and its place knows it no more’ (Ps. 103:15–16, see Job 20:9; 24:20).

To the unsaved, ‘having no hope and without God in the world’ (Eph. 2:12), death takes on many different faces. Obviously not all view it in exactly the same way. Paul, assuming momentarily a hedonist outlook, exclaimed, ‘Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die’ (1 Cor. 15:32). Qoheleth (‘the preacher’) says the same in various ways (e.g. Eccles. 3:16–22): this life is the only one you have so enjoy it to the full. But it is also, for those without a sure hope, a complete and final deprivation, making this life an unprofitable enterprise. You came into the world naked and so shall you leave it. 'This also is a sore evil.... Life is a striving for wind.' Many people of a more stoic (i.e., ancient stoic) outlook thought of death as a welcome escape from life, i.e. life not of joy and happiness but of intolerable evils and hardships. There are situations in which death as an end to excruciating pain is viewed as welcome relief (see Rev. 9:1–6). In one of his moods Job thought this way (Job 3:20–22). Believers under stress (like Job) may speak in this vein, though the Apostle also under great stress was ambivalent on the point (Phil. 1:23–26). For the person who does not have assurance of hope in Christ, the 'fear of death' is a 'bondage' (Heb. 2:15) from which few are ever quite delivered, because whatever one's profession one cannot evade an innate conviction that death is only a precursor to divine judgment (Heb. 9:27; cf. Rom. 2:3).

As for the Christian, even one who has grown in grace and has counted his blessings, there is a lingering 'fear of death' even though 'delivered' from 'bondage' to the fear of death (Heb. 2:14, 15), and 'free ... from the law of sin and death' (Rom 8:2). Satan's power has been nullified (Heb. 2:14, 15), but faith must embrace the announcement of the same each day. '[W]e walk by faith, not by sight' (2 Cor. 5:7) and for now we 'see in a mirror dimly' (1 Cor. 13:12). Yet faith, even though it does not fail, is stronger at some times than others, otherwise we would not be advised to exhort one another in faith (Heb. 3:13). '[L]ife and immortality' have truly been 'brought ... to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. 1:10) and we are encouraged to walk in the light. That light has robbed death of some of its mystery. We are free to enter fully into assurance and certainty from our natural feelings of horror of death, for as Paul assured the wavering Corinthian believers, 'all things are yours, whether ... life or death or the present or the future, all are yours; and you are Christ's; and Christ is God's' (1 Cor. 3:21–23 rsv). He has assured us today that nothing will ever separate us in death or life from God and His love (Rom. 8:1, 2, 38, 39).

The Outlook of Old Testament Believers on Death and the Future Beyond the Grave

The inter-testamental literature and other Jewish sources have indirect but not decisive bearing on this question, just as their bearing on New Testament faith is indirect. The apocryphal book known as The Wisdom of Solomon, for example, has immortality, judgment, future rewards and punishments as major themes, and the Gospels as well as other Jewish sources demonstrate there was general acceptance of the teachings we have been reviewing, among Jews of Jesus' time. No Old Testament passage, however, plainly teaches such beliefs, though they might be assumed by the writers.

The principle of progressive revelation would lead us to infer that special revelation (or revelation as opposed to what used to be called 'natural light') began with Abraham's very special call, and further that his faith responded to much less revealed truth than subsequent generations. Moses would have known more than Abraham, David more than Moses and Isaiah, and Daniel more than David.

Israel's history and religious beliefs, as reconstructed in the mold of modern criticism, imposes an evolutionary literary growth of the Old Testament, before attempting a history of Israel's religious beliefs. Gerhard Von Rad, a prestigious representative of the liberal critical approach, is typical and explicit on this matter.²³ He is not sure there ever was an Abraham; and even if we were certain, we do not really know for certain what his beliefs were. Rather, we read in the Genesis account what the priestly (P) writer, or the 'Yahwist historian' writing over a thousand years later, wished to project back into Abraham's (or Moses' or Gideon's or Samuel's) time.

According to the usual portrayal, the early Hebrews had no individual expectation of a soul's existence after death, only at most a shadowy presence of some sort in an equally shadowy sheol (translated grave, hell, pit, etc., in English Bibles). Their interest was only in long life, a prosperous, mature age, and a numerous and prosperous line of descendants. In very recent times this critical orthodoxy has been modified somewhat by the supposed concept of 'corporate personality,' by which the following verdict on the Hebrew mindset on death emerged. I am citing the summary of Milton McC. Gatch, an Episcopalian scholar whose book has been widely read among students and clergy. I quote at length: 'It is not possible,' he says, to speak in individual terms of Abraham, for the Hebraic mind does not conceive of the situation as we do. There is no way to separate Abraham from the clan he produces. Even his personality is indistinct from that of the tribe. Thus, one can only speak anachronistically of his death as an end since, even dead, Abraham continues to be an important aspect of the corporate personality. Such is the meaning of ... 'he was gathered to his kin' [Gen. 25:8].... The man who dies becomes ... a name in the genealogical list; and as such he never ceases to be a part of the continuing story of the People.

This frame of mind made quite inconceivable the question of an afterlife and probably contributed to the fact that Hebrew thought never developed a notion of a soul or life-force which is separable from historical man.... Personality and identity are terms which attach not to persons but to the People; thus, when one dies, personality and identity are not disrupted, for the People continues. Only the possibility that one's line [of descendants] may not be fruitful gives rise to anxiety in the face of death.²⁴

A few pages later Dr Gatch asserts that when the early church Fathers assumed 'a doctrine of the soul' they were 'unlike the biblical writings.'²⁵

This outlook, though common among critical writers, has met many strong challenges—as we have suggested in chapter 1, above, where this subject was preliminarily raised. The corpus of liberal-critical literature which has arisen on this subject is too large to report here, except for a striking repartee between Oscar Cullman, an eminent New Testament scholar of the University of Basil, and Harry A. Wolfson, a Professor of Hebrew Literature and Philosophy at Harvard University. Cullman, in a lecture, 'The Immortality of the Soul or the Resurrection of the Dead' (Ingersoll Lecture, Harvard University for 1955),²⁶ strenuously asserted that the Bible has no doctrine of immortality of the soul. The Bible has only the doctrine of bodily resurrection after an interim of nothingness. The whole man goes out of existence at death: 'The soul can be killed. There must be resurrection for both; for since the Fall the whole man is "sown corruptible".'²⁷ Jesus was so thoroughly afraid to be alone in Gethsemane because He shrank from the nothingness of death. This, Cullman contrasts with Socrates' serene confidence in the hour of his death—serene and hopeful because he had a Greek doctrine of immortality of the soul.

A year later Harry A. Wolfson gave the Ingersoll lecture. He easily demonstrated that Cullman not only had the facts wrong but had misconstrued them. The Jews of Jesus' time believed in immortality and resurrection. The early church Fathers were of the same mind. I quote a few lines and press on to other matters.

With regard to immortality ... the Fathers knew that the Platonic conception of immortality is not exactly the same as the scriptural conception of it... This distinction between the Platonic and the scriptural conception of immortality is constantly stressed by the Fathers. One of the first ... Justin Martyr ... says, 'I pay no regard to Plato,' and ... argues, evidently against Plato's conception of immortality, that, if the soul lives, 'it lives not as being itself life, but as partaking of life,' and this because 'God wills it to live, and hence it will cease to live whenever he may please that it shall live no longer, for it is not the property of the soul to have life in itself as it is the property of God.'²⁸

He adds, with documentation, that 'the same view is expressed also by Irenaeus, Tatian, Theophilus, Arnobius, Lactantius and others.'²⁹ Though he gives a rather derogatory explanation of every view taken by the Fathers regarding the origin of human souls, Wolfson correctly agreed:

However the nature of the soul is described by us, whether as corporeal or as incorporeal, and however the origin of the soul conceived of by us, whether as created with the body or as pre-existent or as inherited, the soul is unlike the body and is not an inseparable part of the body. It can therefore survive the body.³⁰

The Old Testament does not have much to say by way of positive statement about death, 'the afterlife' and the state of the soul when life in the body ends. In the next chapter, 'The Intermediate State,' we shall attempt a synthesis of the materials. At this point, however, some conclusions should be made. In drawing conclusions we acknowledge that there are no positive statements in the Old Testament such as James and Paul make on the subject. Most of the biblical data express only the thoughts of ordinary people and customary expressions; some are mere expressions of feeling. Hence not all should be interpreted as revealed truth. Ecclesiastes is in a special class of texts, for the author through most of the book assumes a skeptical, sometimes cynical, 'under the sun' philosophy, though in the final chapter he speaks straightforwardly, about death and its issues.³¹

Sometimes a poet expresses dread (almost like a post-enlightenment existentialist's 'concept of dread') of death as he laments over his backslidden state or mourns in repentance; for no Old Testament believer had sufficient revelation on the forgiveness of sin in the future redemptive work of Christ. The author of Psalm 88, for example, did not understand Isaiah 53:4–6 as Philip explained it to the eunuch (Acts 8:27–39) and as we deeply appreciate. Some of the Psalms seem almost to find no hope for now or the future. Though one Psalmist knows of God's present unfailing forgiveness and trusts to dwell in the house of the Lord forever, another questions God's faithfulness after destruction of the body or if God's loving kindness will be declared in the grave (Ps. 88:11). Perhaps the author, his conscience awakened by God's law, was not equally assured by atoning sacrifice of animals 'which,' as he must have sensed, 'can never take away sin.' Those sacrifices really made 'remembrance again of sins every year.' The 'remission of sins' in those times 'through the forbearance of God' was validated when 'God ... put forward' Christ Jesus 'as a propitiation' (Rom. 3:24–26) but that was dimly known, if at all, beyond the future's horizon. Sometimes, it seems clear, the poet is thinking that one's praise of God proclaimed in one's living body will cease when once the body is still in death. This is David's lament in Psalm 6:4, 5 (5, 6 in Hebrew): 'Turn, O Lord, deliver my life; save me for the sake of your steadfast love. For in death there is no remembrance [made] of you; in Sheol who will give you praise?' Even with the light of the New Testament revelation we believers sometimes share these gloomy feelings. And poetry, even biblical poetry at its best, is by definition ‘literature, emotional and concrete in content, rhythmical in form.’ We read these Psalms today (sometimes in united worship) with some of the ancients’ fervor and feeling; and many struggling with severe, life-threatening disease or injury are no less fervent than good King Hezekiah when he pled with God for a few more years.

For reasons we do not know and have no right to demand, the Old Testament does not provide full information on the saints’ expectations. We are not, however, dependent either on the critical biblical theologians or speculation, because the New Testament has its own biblical theology of the Old Testament. It is first of all Christological. We must not be ‘foolish ones, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken’ for it was ‘necessary that the Christ should suffer ... and enter into his glory’ as Jesus explained to the wondering pedestrians of the Emmaus road (Luke 24:23–27). Once we see the Old Testament this way our hearts will burn as Jesus opens to us the Scriptures (Luke 24:32).

The patriarchs had a ‘theology of hope’ far brighter than the current theologians of that school suppose. Theirs was a sure expectation of life with God in an intimate fellowship with Him—though not yet restoration of their bodies. These remarks are not dependent on indistinct or tenuous inductions from obscure texts, for they rest on the inspired comments of the holy author of the book of Hebrews. Let the author of Hebrews explain. Abraham and Sara, as Noah, Enoch and Abel before them, ‘all died in faith, not having received the things promised, but having seen them and greeted them from afar, and having acknowledged that they were strangers and exiles on the earth. For people who speak thus make it clear that they are seeking a homeland. If they had been thinking of that land from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return. But as it is, they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly one’ (Heb. 11:13–16).

Their ‘hope’ was not only earthly but also heavenly. They knew that their eternal destiny was not the grave nor was their only immortality in survival of family or nation. Hebrews goes on to say that Abraham ‘considered that God was able even to raise ... from the dead’ and that Moses believed in an ‘invisible’ realm (Heb. 11:19, 23–27). He traces the belief of others from Abel to the martyrs of the second century BC that they had a future beyond death—in heaven as well as earth—and permanent survival of personal self-consciousness in a place near God in heaven.

It must be acknowledged that there are few passages in the Hebrew Bible relating directly either to immortality or the ‘resurrection of the flesh’ as in the ancient creeds. One wonders, Why? Perhaps, as Jesus explained about another matter, they were not yet ready to receive it. Having been saturated with the utterly false preoccupation of their Egyptian rulers with death for 430 years and living alongside the Canaanite culture, with its elaborate mythology of gods and deified men, the topic would have led to more severe backsliding and apostasy than did occur. There is a parallel in the gospel age: the New Testament says nothing directly about the salvation of infants in general or specifically of those who die in infancy. How many Christian mothers in desperate circumstances, or seeing their young likely to be seduced by home or community circumstances, might have slain their babies if some verse of the New Testament were plainly to say, ‘All infants who die are saved and go immediately to heaven.’

The episode of Jesus’ exchange with the Sadducees during His last week (Matt. 22:23–33; cf. Acts 23:8) demonstrates that denial of the permanent existence (not the sort of natural immortality which only God has, 1 Tim. 6:16) of the human soul after death of the body was exceptional in the Israel of Jesus' time. The same inference may be drawn from Jesus' earlier Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. It also manifests a common belief in some sort of separation of the wicked from the righteous in the world of the dead immediately following death.

Resurrection of the body will be treated here shortly, but at this point it is relevant to note that the bodily translation of Enoch and of Elijah imply enduring human life in an invisible realm. First Samuel 2:6 says that 'The Lord kills and brings to life; he brings down to Sheol and raises up' and Daniel 12:2 specifically predicts a bodily resurrection of the righteous dead (at least). Psalm 16:8–11 expresses David's faith in deliverance of his soul from Sheol (perhaps the grave). Passages such as Hosea 13:14; Isaiah 25:6–8; and 26:19–21 relate the prophets' expectation of resurrection of the body after an 'interim' (perhaps millennium) not described. The great thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel prophesies about Israel's future national resurrection as the resurrection to physical life of a 'valley of dry bones.' This has bearing on faith in personal resurrection, as J. A. Schep has said:

Although this passage does not refer to resurrection of the dead ... the question arises, is this symbolic language not inexplicable unless one assumes that the prophet and his people were familiar with the conception of a bodily resurrection of the dead as an eschatological event.³²

Our attention next turns to the question of the present condition of those who have passed through death into that invisible world. Resurrection of their bodies is an event still future. Where are they now and in what condition?

¹ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology III (Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1970), pp. 713–733.

² A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 982–991.

³ Tracts Relating to the Reformation, Volume III, Edinburgh, 1851.

⁴ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion I (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962), p. 237.

⁵ Augustine, City of God, XIII, 6, trans. Henry Bettenson (Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1972), p. 515.

⁶ Thomas Oden, Life in the Spirit (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 381.

⁷ Jürgen Moltmann, The Coming of God: Christian Eschatology, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996), p. 260.

⁸ Though I shall not review it here, any one who has kept up on recent 'biblical theology' has been thoroughly exposed to this 'monism' as regards human nature. See the volumes Grave to Glory and Raised Immortal by Murray Harris, for example.

⁹ Westminster Confession of 1647.

¹⁰ Westminster Confession of Faith (London: Banner of Truth, 1962), p. 25.

↵ William Wright, Life and Immortality (London: Religious Tract Society, n.d.), p. 33.

- ¹¹ Mitchell Dahood, The Anchor Bible: Psalms Vol. III (New York: Doubleday & Co., 1970).
- ¹² Calvin translated ‘and he remembered that they were flesh: a spirit that passeth, and returneth not.’ Calvin’s translator argues: ‘Dr Adam Clarke translates, “the spirit goeth away, and it doth not return.”... He considers the translation ... “a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again [kjv]” to be a bad one, and that it may be productive of error; as if when a man dies, his being were ended, and death an eternal sleep.’ John Calvin, Commentary on the Book of Psalms, Vol. III (Edinburgh, 1847), p. 254.
- ¹³ BDB, sub ruach, p. 925.
- ¹⁴ Robert Martin-Achard, From Death to Life: A Study of the Doctrine of the Resurrection in the Old Testament, trans. J. P. Smith (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1960), p. 31.
- ¹⁵ The view that man is wholly and only a material being with a supremely complicated neuro-physical system whose functions account for consciousness, memory, character and the like is now often called physicalism. Those who also deny any creative intelligence (God) in bringing such marvelously complex beings as we are and any permanence beyond death (Denis Diderot of the ‘Age of Reason,’ Richard Dawkins, contemporary, and many others) are sometimes now called reductionist physicalists. Those who attempt to merge biblical Christian commitment with physicalism may call their view non-reductive physicalism. Whatever Happened to the Soul: Scientific and Theological Portraits of Human Nature (3 eds., 9 authors, Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1998) seeks to explain why physicalism—i.e. materialistic monism—is the correct view of human nature, as opposed to dualism, body-soul, a physical substance and an immaterial substance. The editors’ summary finds eternal life only in the re-created resurrection body. It is a serious book, setting forth ‘Christian’ monism of human nature in up-to-date scientific language. It is friendly to ‘faith’ but, as the editor acknowledges, hard to harmonize with the New Testament.
- ¹⁶ Lorraine Boettner, Immortality (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956, 1973), p. 13.
- ¹⁷ Herman Bavinck, ‘Death,’ International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, Vol. ii, ed. James Orr (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1943), p. 813.
- ¹⁸ Compare 1 Chron. 21:1 with 2 Sam. 24:1.
- ¹⁹ A. H. Strong, op. cit., pp. 656–658.
- ²⁰ R. L. Dabney, Lectures on Systematic Theology, first published, 1878 (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1972), p. 819.
- ²¹ ibid., p. 819.
- ²² ibid., p. 819.
- ²³ Gerhard Von Rad, Old Testament Theology, 2 vols, trans. D. M. G. Slatker (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1962, 1965). Though Gerhard Von Rad published Theologie des Alten Testaments in 1957 and the English translation in 1962 it seems still to be the leader in its field outside strictly evangelical orthodox circles. When I last taught Old Testament theology—a special course at Bethel Theological Seminary in 1977—it was dominant. He wrote under the immediate influence of Barth and in the tense atmosphere of the decade following World War II in Germany, favorable to the paradoxes and dialectic of Krisis (neo-orthodox) theology. As W. Brueggemann says in his introduction to the 1962 edition, ‘Von Rad is not free of nineteenth century positivism’ (v.i. p. xxvi). He tried to reconstruct the history of Israel’s religious traditions, with his own ‘fix’ of layers and strands in the ‘Hexateuch’ (Genesis–Joshua), on the basic JEDP documentation structure of nineteenth-century criticism, modified by ‘form criticism’ and a Barth-like resort to paradox. The ‘evangelical’ element is his emphasis on the ‘witness’ or ‘credo recitals’ of Deuteronomy 1:20–24 and Joshua 24:1–13, together with rightful recognition of the ‘mighty acts of God’ in the Exodus from Egypt and settlement in the promised land. I make this too brief diversion because every reader should be aware of both the errors and great values, as textual commentator, of G. Von Rad. Post-moderns, multiculturalists and pluralists are said to resort to his pronouncements too.

²⁴ Milton McC. Gatch, Death: Meaning and Mortality in Christian Thought and Contemporary Culture (New York: Seabury Press, 1969), pp. 37, 38.

²⁵ ibid., p. 52.

²⁶ Oscar Cullman, Harry A. Wolfson, Werner Jaeger and Henry J. Cadbury, ed. Krister Stendahl, Immortality and Resurrection, Death in the Western World: Two Conflicting Currents of Thought (New York: Macmillan Co., 1965), pp. 9–53.

²⁷ ibid., p. 28.

²⁸ Harry Wolfson, ibid., p. 57.

²⁹ op. cit., p. 57.

³⁰ op. cit., p. 76.

³¹ Ecclesiastes is an inspired account, in part, of a cynical outlook on life.

³² J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964), pp. 56, 57.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1018). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Where Are the Dead Now and What Is Their Condition?: the Doctrine of the Intermediate State

Christians have always believed that after death there will be resurrection of all the dead followed by judgment and heaven for the saved as well as hell for the lost—to put the matter starkly. The sequence between death and resurrection is plain enough in Scripture, but much mystery exists with regard to the time, place and condition of the soul between death and resurrection. We have seen that despite intense attack in the last several generations against the existence of the soul and its permanent, conscious existence after death, it remains the conviction of almost everyone. So widespread, enduring and strong is this conviction among pagans, Jews, Christians and secularists—to say nothing of the major non-Christian religions—that some say ‘it is so knitted into human consciousness that it cannot be repressed without denying our fundamental humanity.’¹ If so, it has the forensic force of a consensus gentium, i.e., common consent of the (human) race.

In such a case it is no wonder that in the presence of death—particularly of kin or friend—we have urgent questions about where the souls of the dead are, what might be their condition and for how long. If death is looming and one sees the grim reaper coming near, the question may occupy frantic attention. Several of Jesus’ parables build on that fact.

‘Intermediate state’ is not a biblical expression, but it is a good name for the biblical doctrine, designating the state of the soul (or spirit) between the events of death and resurrection. We know that people die. We know that there is a resurrection coming for all the dead (John 5:28) and that it will be in connection with the future, Second Advent of the Lord. The interval between, when the bodies of the dead have ‘returned to their dust’ and their spirits are somewhere else, is an intermediate period. Hence theology has appropriately coined the term, ‘the intermediate state.’ Those who affirm future resurrection but deny existence of a soul separate from the body deny also, of course, such an ‘intermediate’ state. In such a case, nothing is nothing. There is no state at all except non-existence.

Before proceeding, some humble acknowledgments and cautions are appropriate. The first is that the subject is wrapped in much mystery. Revelation has provided so little that the theologian has few resources to consult. ‘The New Testament places emphasis on the eschatological developments at the end, and leaves many things connected with the intermediate state in darkness.’² The poets have responded to the mystery in two ways: the imaginative, with elaborate geography of the places of the dead as Dante’s Purgatorio, Inferno and Paradiso; and the reflective, with sad-hopeful lyrics such as John Donne’s, Death be not proud, though some have called thee ...

One short sleep past, we wake eternally,

And Death shall be no more, Death, thou shalt die!³

Such meager information as the Bible furnishes must be interpreted with great caution. Among the cautions the interpreter should observe are these:

1. A sharp distinction should be made between the expressed opinions of the people who appear on the pages and in the narratives on the one hand and revealed biblical truth on the other. Not everything they say is ‘gospel truth’ or revelation of any kind. A New Testament example is the disciples’ belief in ghosts. The fact that ten disciples in an upper room ‘were startled and frightened and thought they saw a spirit’ (Luke 24:37) or that when ‘they saw [Jesus] walking on the sea they thought it was a ghost’ does not mean that souls of the departed really walk about. I found that all my class of Chinese students at a seminary in China assumed as a matter of course that souls prowl around cemeteries for awhile after burial of their bodies. Beliefs of this kind are hard to shake, for they are rooted deep in the subconscious. Death is such a rude and implacable intruder that strong group-opinion about death, long held, of whatever origin (let the psychologists of the subconscious have their field day!), are not fully erased by Christian revelation. The superstitions of pagan Europe did not disappear when Christianity replaced the heathen religions. They are still alive and well even in sophisticated circles.

It seems to me therefore that Job’s opinions about Sheol—whether the grave or some postmortem residence of the soul—do not necessarily relate to reality. It is certain that the ancient Near and Middle East had an elaborate mythology about an unseen world, peopled by quarrelsome gods, who exercised some control over the destiny of human souls and where elite men and women were assigned to places of joy or torment.

The beliefs of faithful adherents of the Lord, in the Old Testament, express much bewilderment in the face of death yet have confidence that they will not be separated from God’s care and love in the realm of death. The learned and pious G. F. Oehler surveyed all evidences of beliefs about the life of the soul after death among the Psalms. He found many possible expressions of optimistic expectations of something like ‘The Father’s House’ of John 14 (Ps. 16:10; 17:15; 48:14; 49:15; 68:20; 73:24, 26; among others). Especially impressive is the use of the same verb laqach, ‘he will receive me’ (Ps. 49:15), also used in Genesis 5:24 for the translation of Enoch. Yet Oehler’s closing sentences on personal eschatological hope in this part of the Bible show how little doctrine can confidently be constructed on expressions either of despair or of confident hope by Old Testament people. After quoting ‘My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever’ (Ps. 73:26), Oehler goes on to say that these words express the confidence of the Psalmist that even if his heart fails in death, his communion with God cannot be dissolved. Still, even in these passages we have (as Delitzsch well observes) no direct word from God for this hope to lean on; they do but express the postulate of faith, that for the just, existence must issue in glory and in the permanent possession of communion with God. How this is to be realized cannot, however, be shown. Hence the triumph of faith over death and the grave is accompanied by the complaint, so strongly and incisively expressed in Psalm 88 [e.g. ‘Is your steadfast love declared in the grave, or your faithfulness in Abaddon? Are your wonders known in the darkness, or your righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?’ vv. 11, 12] that the seals of death and Sheol remain as yet unbroken.⁴

Dr Oehler found nothing more of specific revelation about life of the soul beyond the grave in the rest of the Old Testament though he pointed out that the believers are assured that God’s justice would prevail there. He found in Job 19:25–27 a conviction that after death God will manifest Himself to

Job and continue in communion with Him.⁵

I am in agreement. I do not regard much of anything said of Sheol, in the narrative and poetry of the Old Testament, as specifically revelational in character.⁶ Further, as regards the references to Hades (the Greek translation of Sheol in the LXX and New Testament) even as employed by Jesus in Luke 16:23—‘in Hades, being in torment, he lifted up his eyes’—no one knows what Aramaic word Jesus used. The Greek word Luke used, ‘Hades,’ literally means ‘the unseen.’ Let us take it to mean just that, the unseen world, wherever the souls of the wicked dead are in God’s universe. I agree with the learned and faithful theologian, W. G. T. Shedd, that a compartmented underworld, where both righteous and wicked go at death, has, as Paul said of the ‘many “gods” and many “lords” ’ of the Greeks, ‘no real existence’ (1 Cor. 8:4–6). I do not think we should bring any of that Greek and Near-Eastern mythology to our theology of the intermediate state. If we were to do so we would have to organize ‘the other world’ like the civil society of ancient Babylon into tribes, and according to Babylonian court protocol. See also Isaiah chapter 14 and Ezekiel 32:17–32.

2. Several New Testament passages (such as Heb. 11:16) inform us that Old Testament saints desired a ‘heavenly’ country, a ‘better’ place, a ‘city’ (Gr. polis, a civil community), and one of them at least (Moses) understood that both present afflictions and sinful pleasures are temporary; that there is ‘reward’ and ‘recompense’ in the future (Heb. 11:23–26); and that they understood there would be a resurrection (Heb. 11:35; cf. v. 19). This all means that the Old Testament does not tell us all of what the believers of the time knew from God and believed, any more than we know everything Jesus said to the Apostles which is unrecorded. C. H. Hodge’s remarks are very helpful:

We have in the New Testament an inspired, and, therefore, an infallible commentary on the Old Testament scriptures.... We have then in the New Testament the most explicit declarations, not only that the doctrine of a future state was revealed in the Old Testament, but that from the beginning it was part of the faith of the people of God.⁷

3. The Old Testament is now a Christian book, made so by the fulfillment of its prophecies and completion of its narratives. Jesus declared it so (Luke 24:25–27, 44–47). It is proper to read it in the light of New Testament revelation and history, but not to read the New Testament into the Old Testament.

4. Jesus by His life, death, teaching, resurrection and Ascension has ‘brought life and immortality to light’ but as far as factual information in literal, descriptive language is concerned, the New Testament reveals only a little more than the Old Testament. David knew he would ‘dwell in the house of the Lord forever’ after traveling through ‘the valley of the shadow of death.’ We know more about that ‘house of the Lord’ because Jesus said ‘many rooms’ are being prepared there for us (John 14). We expect to be met by the Lord when we pass through the door but we know only a few things about the ambience and furnishings of God’s world beyond that door. It is incorrect to apply descriptions of the eternal future state to the present heaven. We know who is there—the living God, angels, the church triumphant, the Judge of all and Jesus (Heb. 12:21–23).

Alfred, Lord Tennyson, Britain’s poet laureate, put it this way in the fourth stanza of his memorable ‘Crossing the Bar’, where I hope ‘I hope’ means I confidently expect::

For though from out our bourne of time and place

The floods may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Several Views of the Intermediate State

Roman Catholic Teaching of Different Destinations

Roman dogma insists there are (or have been) five different immediate destinations for the souls of mankind at death: limbus patrum, limbus infantum (or puerorum), purgatory, heaven and hell. Three of these were rejected wholly by the Reformers, and Protestants still vigorously reject them to this day. The three rejected by all Protestants should at least be understood as Roman Catholics are taught to believe.

1. Limbus Patrum, according to a standard Roman Catholic authority, is ‘The Limbo of the Fathers; a place and state of rest wherein the souls of the just who died before Christ’s ascension were detained until he opened Heaven to them: referred to as “Abraham’s bosom” (Luke 16:22) and “Paradise” (Luke 23:43).’⁸ The article cites also Ephesians 4:9 and 1 Peter 3:18–20. As explained by Ludwig Ott, ‘the heart of the earth’ (Matt. 12:40), where he says Jesus’ soul was during the ‘three days’, is the location of Limbus Patrum. Acts 2:24 is said to refer to Jesus’ deliverance (resurrection) from hell (= Hades = limbus patrum). Paul’s reference to a descent of the Lord to ‘the lower parts of the earth’ (Eph. 4:9) and a preaching by Christ ‘to the spirits in prison’ and the testimony of ancient ‘tradition’ are cited. ‘The purpose of the descent into Hell, according to the general teaching of the theologians, was freeing of the just in Limbo by the application of the fruits of Redemption.’⁹ Views of some modern evangelicals are similar—as for example the footnotes in the Scofield Bible to which we will advert shortly.

2. Limbus Infantum (or limbus puerorum)—‘the Limbo of children.’ ‘It is of faith that all, children and adults, who leave the world without the Baptism of water, blood or desire, and therefore in original sin, are excluded from the vision of God in heaven. The great majority of theologians teach that such children and unbaptized adults, free from grievous actual sin, enjoy eternally a state of perfect natural happiness, knowing and loving God by the use of their natural powers.’¹⁰ This doctrine meshes with the Roman view that original sin did not deprave (vitate) ‘the image of God’ (defined as rational faculties) but is intact without being affected by sin. Taken according to the above quotation, the heathen are not really ‘lost’ and John 3:36 does not really mean what it says. Non-faith is implicit faith if one has not sinned egregiously.

3. Purgatory. The doctrine of purgatory, together with the ‘sacrament’ of penance (confessional) and ‘sacrifice of the mass,’ is the economic engine which for centuries financially supported the vast hierarchical structure and the institutions of the papal church. Rome’s teaching regarding purgatory is not in every respect uniform. First dogmatically shaped by Gregory the Great (c. ad 600), the twenty-fifth Session of Trent asserted: ‘that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls there detained are helped by the suffrages [prayers for the souls of the departed] of the faithful, but principally by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar [special, designated, private Masses, by priests paid to perform these Masses].’ Though the Roman doctors find a vague connection of this doctrine with Matthew 5:26; Matthew 12:32; and 1 Corinthians 3:12–15, ‘The main proof for the existence of the cleansing fire lies in the testimony of the Fathers.’¹¹ Also citing the Apocrypha, ‘according to 2 Maccabees 12:42–45, the Jews prayed for their fallen on whom had been found donaries of the idols, that their sins might be forgiven them. Then they sent twelve thousand drachmas of silver to Jerusalem for sacrifice to be offered in expiation.’¹²

This complicated doctrine has been a modern embarrassment, and is stated in very vague language in recent dogmatic deliverances on the subject. The Catechism of 1994 does not even speak of a place called purgatory, affirming only that ‘The Church gives the name PURGATORY to this final purification of the elect, which is entirely different from the punishment of the damned.’¹³

John McClintock and James Strong comment that ‘it is well known that Roman Catholic principles are of great elasticity in their application, so that there is always some way for the Church of getting out of difficulties.’¹⁴

Rome believes that ‘those souls gathered round Jesus and Mary in Paradise ... share with the holy angels in the exercise of divine power ... when they intercede for us.’¹⁵

We must however rejoice that bishops of a Synod of Rome, on May 11, 1979, issued the following in an important elaboration of the last statement of the Apostles’ Creed, ‘I believe in the life everlasting.’ It is third of seven paragraphs.

The Church affirms that a spiritual element survives and subsists after death, an element endowed with consciousness and will, so that the human self subsists. To designate this element the Church uses the word ‘soul,’ the accepted term in the usage of Scripture and tradition. Although not unaware that this term has various meanings in the Bible, the Church thinks that there is no valid reason for rejecting it; moreover, she considers that the use of some word as a vehicle is absolutely indispensable in order to support the faith of Christians.¹⁶

4. Believers who have attained a state of perfection go immediately to heaven. There are classes among these. Some are ‘beatified’ and some not. The Medieval Schoolmen distinguished three classes of ‘the blessed.’¹⁷

5. All unbaptized (though there is a ‘baptism of desire’ in lieu of water baptism), and those who subsequent to baptism lose the grace of baptism through mortal sin and die unreconciled to the church, go immediately to hell.

Doctrine of Soul Sleep

I have referred in an earlier chapter to some of the forms the doctrine of Soul Sleep takes in a number of modern advocates.¹⁸ Oscar Cullmann asserted non-existence of the person between death and resurrection and thought he had proved it.¹⁹ Henry Wolfson thought that Cullmann was grievously in error, that Jesus ‘believed his soul was immortal’ and that, beginning with Justin Martyr, the Fathers

—against Plato’s conception of natural, intrinsic immortality—believed the soul lives on because (quoting Justin Martyr) ‘God wills it to live ... for it is not the property of the soul to have life in itself as it is the property of God.’²⁰ Jaeger’s article is almost wholly without reference to Scripture and operates on non-theistic principles, and Cadbury makes no commitments.²¹

Seventh Day Adventists and other biblically oriented but not strictly orthodox believers have their own brand of ‘Soul Sleep’ doctrine. They were comforted greatly by Cullmann’s essay (and many similar by activists of the biblical theology ‘movement’). In Calvin’s day the doctrine of Soul Sleep (psychopannychia) was strong in some Anabaptist circles. His first major evangelical writing was to examine everything the Bible says on the matter. There have been few advances on Calvin’s survey and apologetic for orthodox doctrine.²² I regard the positive treatment to follow as sufficient response to this error.

Immortality and Resurrection As Evolved Doctrine

A third view I call, for want of a better name, immortality and resurrection as evolved doctrine. I have in mind a sort of half-believing acceptance of the survival of personality and identity with memory. There are beliefs precious to the heart of all Christians supported by biblical scholars who, taking a low view of Scripture, nevertheless give some credence to the historic teaching. All scholars in the symposium above fall in this category.²³

The ‘Waiting Chamber’

Before my own version of how Protestant orthodox theology has interpreted the scriptural evidence we should look at an ancient view popularized by the Scofield Reference Bible, graphically illustrated by the chart lectures of numerous teachers, and presented in eclectic but systematic form by Herman A. Hoyt²⁴ and in summary fashion by H. C. Thiessen of Wheaton Graduate School of Theology.²⁵ This scheme (unawares, I think) borrowed from two sources: the Roman Catholic limbus patrum dogma and eighteenth and nineteenth century Semitic scholarship.

J. O. Buswell describes the view simply as ‘a persistent notion, rather definitely coupled with Greek Mythology on the one hand and leading into the Roman Catholic doctrine of purgatory on the other, that before the time of Christ the saints who died were not admitted to the blessed presence of God in heaven, but were kept in a ... waiting chamber, and that only since the time of Christ [i.e. His Ascension] has it been true that those who die in the faith go immediately to heaven.’²⁶

Sheol, it is said, lies at the center of the earth,²⁷ citing Matthew 12:40, ‘three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.’ It is divided into two compartments, one not specifically named (though perhaps Gehenna) but a place of punishment, and another called Abraham’s bosom or paradise. Luke 16:23–31 and 23:43 are said to demonstrate this and to explain why Sheol-Hades must have been every soul’s destination at death. Between the compartment there was ‘a great gulf fixed,’ visualized horizontally.

Christ is said to have delivered paradise to heaven at the time of His Ascension (Eph. 4:8, 9 is so interpreted). At this time there was a ‘reorganization of the intermediate state.’²⁸ While in Hades

Jesus literally ‘preached even to those who are dead’ (1 Peter 4:6), pronouncing doom to the lost, and deliverance for the saved (1 Peter 3:18, 19; Luke 4:18).²⁹ Henceforth the souls of saints go immediately to be with Christ in heaven—‘The gates of Sheol-Hades were barred to entrance of any saved soul thereafter³⁰.... The wicked ... still go to Sheol-Hades at the time of physical death and are there kept “under punishment unto the day of judgment” (2 Peter 2:9).’³¹ It should be observed that for convenience I have cited Dr Herman Hoyt. This view, however, with variations, has a long history and is still widely held. In extreme form advocates find no less than six destinations for spirits, wicked and good, human or demons or angels.

Clarence Larkin, a draftsman who graphically expounded the system, had in addition to heaven: (1) Tartarus for fallen angels only (he cites 2 Peter 2:4 and Jude 6); (2) the underworld abyss (‘bottomless pit’) where certain demons are kept and Satan shall be imprisoned for a thousand years (Rev. 9:1, 2; 20:1 ff.); (3) paradise, for Old Testament saints (now empty); (4) hell or Hades, the present abode of souls of wicked dead; and (5) the lake of fire or Gehenna, the final hell (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14, 15).³²

This view was very familiar to many early twentieth-century evangelicals, however bizarre it may seem to most current Bible students.

Though very ancient and persistent, both in the Roman form of limbus patrum and in the Protestant form, orthodox Protestant theology among almost all writers (many of whom we cite with reverence) thoroughly reject it. It was never the doctrine of Calvinist evangelical orthodoxy.³³

Shedd is plain: ‘A pagan underworld containing both Paradise and Hades, both the happy and the miserable, like the pagan idol is “nothing in this world.” There is no such place.’³⁴ Again Shedd says:

The creeds, Lutheran and Reformed rejected the ‘compartments in the underworld’ idea. It was reintroduced by 18th and 19th century writers like Lowth in England and Herder in Germany. [Both pioneered modern research into Hebrew poetry.] They contend the Old Testament prophets like surrounding nations regarded metaphysical separation of body and soul as impossible and thought of dead men as being in the grave wholly.³⁵

If Hades, which means ‘the unseen,’ is understood without mythological baggage, it rightly stands for ‘that mysterious realm where each [good and bad] shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death’³⁶ and rightly translates Sheol in the Hebrew Old Testament. In the New Testament, however, as R. C. H. Lenski (Lutheran) rightly points out in comment on Revelation 20 and 21:

Revelation uses ho ha-i-dēs as a name for the place into which ‘the death’ delivers the souls of human beings who are damned. Until the judgment day hell functions only for the souls of the damned and is termed ‘hades’ the unseen place. When hell is mentioned as receiving both the souls and bodies of the damned, Jesus calls hell, ‘the Gehenna’ and ‘the Gehenna of fire,’ and in Revelation 20:14, 15, the lake of fire, in 21:8 ‘the lake, the one burning with fire and brimstone, which is death the second.’³⁷

The approach which now follows, though perhaps new and strange to some, is by no means original with me. It is essentially the much neglected (now less so) historic Protestant doctrine (with some Lutheran exceptions). I have presented the same, with the preceding discussion over many years to ministerial students with about unanimous acceptance and apparent relief. Much of the following will be by way of expository comment on passages of Scripture. I owe a special debt of gratitude to many theologians of the past, especially W. G. T. Shedd and to Robert Martin-Achard who have been helpful in the exegesis. I offer a series of propositions. There will be some unavoidable repetition.

First Proposition

Both Old Testament and New Testament represent the state of mankind after death to be a disembodied state—that the human body and soul are normally in union, but not indissoluble union (see chap. 2, above), for the radical parturition of physical death separates them. Everything to follow in this chapter supports this as a uniform assumption of Scripture. Eschatology completes anthropology. A biblical doctrine of mankind anticipates a biblical doctrine of death.

One prominent Old Testament text says, ‘The dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns to God who gave it’ (Eccles. 12:7). Job, in spite of wavering in exercise of faith, made public his confidence that ‘after my skin has been thus destroyed, then from [whether ‘away from,’ i.e. disembodied or ‘out from’ i.e. in a resurrected body] my flesh I shall see God’ (Job 19:26 rsv). Many more passages will be introduced later.

A few from the New Testament follow. ‘Jesus ... yielded up spirit’ (Matt. 27:50); ‘Jesus ... said, “Father, into your hands I commit my spirit” ’ (Luke 23:46). Stephen’s dying words were, ‘Lord Jesus, receive my spirit' (Acts 7:59). Paul faced death with 'good courage' because he would 'rather be away from the body and at home with the Lord' (2 Cor. 5:8). His body was an earthly 'tent' to live in, to be replaced with a 'house ... in the heavens' (2 Cor. 5:1, 2) and he knew that it was possible to be a conscious person 'in the body or out of the body' (2 Cor. 12:2). John the Revelator saw martyr souls in heaven, under divine protection (Rev. 6:9–11). This is not a complete list.

Further indirect but decisive evidence (some cited earlier) is as follows.

1. The prohibition of necromancy in several parts of the Old Testament. Whatever the Israelites of Moses' time thought about Sheol, where only the 'shade' of the deceased was supposed to go at death, they were forbidden to seek contact with departed spirits precisely because they did believe that the person endured as a soul after death separated it from the body. Otherwise the 'necromancer' (Deut. 18:11, literally, 'one who seeks after dead ones') would not have been forbidden. There would have been no temptation to seek after the dead. In King Ahaz's time (eighth century bc) the population of Jerusalem were warned against 'mediums' who 'enquire of the dead on behalf of the living' (Isa. 8:19).

2. As we have seen earlier, the mythologies of Israel's remote and near neighbors were peopled by disembodied souls (e.g. the Gilgamesh Epic of Mesopotamia and the Baal myths of Ugarit).

3. Many Old Testament expressions of good hope for the future and of faith are inexplicable apart from belief in a future life of the soul with God. Abraham's faith, which was 'counted as righteous' (Gen. 12:3; 15:6) according to Hebrews, was meaningless if he was not expecting in the future to see and participate in the blessing of all families of the earth: 'These all died in faith ... having acknowledged that they were strangers and exiles on the earth' (Heb. 11:13). The several Psalmists' prayers and aspirations are inexplicable in people who expected to end their existence with their last breath. David prayed, 'My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever' (Ps. 73:26), and 'my hope is in thy ordinances. I will keep thy law continually, for ever and ever' (Ps. 119:43, 44 rsv; see also Ps. 31:5). At the moment of death Jacob reported in to God, saying, 'I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord' (Gen. 49:17, 18 kjv). At that moment he was hardly concerned about further rescue from perils of this world.

In this connection scholars have pointed out that Old Testament covenants with God and His promises do not provide anything to excite much joy if there is no future with God after death. God promised to be a 'God to you, and to your descendants after you. And I will give to you [emphasis added], and to your descendants after you,' etc. (Gen. 17:7, 8; cf. Exod. 6:7; Deut 33:3, 29 rsv). Calvin makes the point that these sentiments, promises and the like require belief in everlasting life and divine mercy to make sense.³⁸

Second Proposition

Both Testaments of Scripture teach that the intermediate state for the believer is one of conscious blessedness. At the Old Testament level this hope rested on unfinished revelation—especially regarding the remission of sins (see Rom. 3:21–26; Heb. 2:14–17). Only Jesus 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. 1:10).

Some of the Old Testament expressions of this expectation follow. The mysterious Gentile Balaam of Pethor understood this, full of hope prophesying: ‘Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my end be like his!’ (Num. 23:10 rsv).

In addition to Psalm 16:9–10, cited several times earlier, Psalm 17:13–15 first prays for deliverance from the wicked ‘whose portion is in this life,’ then expresses confidence for life after death: ‘As for me, I shall behold your face in righteousness; when I awake, I shall be satisfied with your likeness.’ Psalm 49:10–15 deserves pondering clause by clause. The Sons of Korah observe wise and foolish both die and leave their wealth behind and ‘Their graves are their homes for ever’—then this contrast: ‘But God will ransom my soul from the power of Sheol [a context where, I think, Sheol means ‘grave’], for he will receive me.’ In Psalm 49 the psalmist, like the prophet Habakkuk, expresses unwavering faith that God is and will always be his salvation (see Hab. 3, especially v. 17). Asaph, in contrasting his own prospects with that of the wicked who are to be ‘destroyed in a moment, swept away utterly by terrors’ (Ps. 73:19 rsv), knows of himself that God does ‘hold my right hand ...’ and will ‘guide me ... and afterward ... receive me to glory. Whom have I in heaven but thee.... My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever’ (Ps. 73:23–26 rsv).

Job 19:25–27 is in a class by itself. The Authorized Version (kjv) plainly has Job say ‘Yet in my flesh shall I see God.’ The Hebrew, mibbesari, can be translated that way, though literally it reads ‘Yet from my flesh....’ As often as not mi (abbr. of min) means the opposite, ‘away from’ or ‘more than,’ and similar. Barton Payne devotes several pages of his excellent volume of Old Testament theology to an extended and careful survey of development of the doctrine of the future life after death. In my judgment he is incorrect in saying that evangelicals insist on ‘from my flesh’—implying resurrection of the body. In Job 14:12 ff. Job does express such a hope. Dahood translates Psalm 73:26, ‘My flesh and my heart may waste away, O Mountain, but my heart and my body, God, will be eternal’³⁹ and in a note⁴⁰ translates the clause ‘Refreshed by him, I will gaze upon God.’ If confirmed by more study, this is an enormous breakthrough for the doctrine of the blessedness of the righteous dead in the Old Testament. In any case, Job will see God ‘on my side,’ vindicating his righteousness in the judgment when at last God ‘stands upon the earth.’

The doctrine of resurrection, first latent and then specific, is taught in the Old Testament, and, while related, does not prove a doctrine of conscious personal blessedness after death for the Old Testament saints.

On that point let me cite the work of a respected Reformed scholar. Geerhardus Vos, in his influential work, The Pauline Eschatology, appends an important chapter on ‘Eschatology of the Psalter.’ Early he comments on Old Testament religion: ‘A redemptive religion without eschatological interest would be a contradiction in terms. The orthodox interpretation of Scripture has always recognized this.’⁴¹ Vos does not concede that the Psalmist’s eschatological hope of ‘enjoyment of Jehovah, the beatific vision of his face, the pleasures at his right hand, the perpetual dwelling with him in his sanctuary,’ and similar was intended in any collective sense for the future of the nation of Israel as such.⁴² He is convinced that these ‘familiar passages’ quoted from Psalms 16, 17, 49 and 73, ‘where the confidence of uninterrupted fellowship with Jehovah is expressed, are based on the belief in a future blessed life after death.’⁴³

Furthermore, says Vos, 'It is only through the gateway of eschatology that universalism [i.e., world-wide offer of salvation] and the missionary idea come in.'⁴⁴ The desire of the Psalmists projects itself into the future and breaks out into a direct missionary appeal conceived as addressed to Gentiles. Vos cites many Psalms.⁴⁵

H. R. Mackintosh, R. H. Charles and many others, who accept the 'higher critical' late dating of the Psalms and the 'higher theology' of the Pentateuch, think that belief in personal immortality and a post-death blessed vision of God was a late development.⁴⁶ They would credit 'Yahwism' with gradually 'destroying the belief in the false life in Sheol and replacing it with hope for individual future post-mortem life springing from present fellowship with God.'⁴⁷

As earlier noted, the New Testament explicitly discovers the doctrine of an intermediate state of conscious 'life' in the Old Testament. '[T]he Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, nor angel, nor spirit' (Acts 23:8) but Jesus—arguing from 'I am ... the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob' (Exod. 3:6, 16) and that 'He is not God of the dead, but of the living'—reasoned that the Sadducees were 'wrong, because you know neither the Scriptures nor the power of God' (Matt. 22:29–33). The Sadducees believed the Mosaic Pentateuch but had not discovered a conscious future of the soul after death there. Jesus did not find (at least He did not quote) a direct statement of the same.

What is only latent there and somewhat clearer in later Old Testament Scripture in the New Testament is 'taught with more or less distinctness in many passages.'⁴⁸ Among distinct references, first mention should go to Revelation 6:9–11, where, at the breaking of the fifth of the seven seals, John is showed the souls of the martyrs in heaven 'under the altar,' where they pray to God and 'rest,' each clothed in 'a white robe.' Revelation 7:9–17 pictures a multitude of those who endured great tribulation, of every nation, people, kindred and tongue, praising God in heaven. At Revelation 14:13 the Revelator 'heard a voice from heaven saying, "Write this: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on." "Blessed indeed," says the Spirit, "that they may rest from their labors, for their deeds follow them!"' In Jesus' Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, He says 'The beggar died and was carried to Abraham's bosom,' implying immediate migration of the soul to heaven. Accordingly Jesus promised the repentant thief, 'Truly, I say to you, today you will be with me in Paradise' (Luke 23:43). Two other New Testament texts locate paradise in heaven (Rev. 2:7; cf. Rev. 12:12; and 2 Cor. 12:4). Though, of course, paradise was a place on earth (the Garden of Eden), in Jesus' time, and in His and Paul's language, it is where Christ is—and with Him the believers 'in the heavenly places' (Eph. 2:6). There is a 'house not made with hands,' 'a building from God,' awaiting the believer 'eternal in the heavens' at death (2 Cor. 5:1), which Paul held forth as a motive for steady service at the present time. To 'be away from the body and at home with the Lord' reduces the doctrine to a formula (2 Cor. 5:8, 9). There is difference of opinion as to whether the house or 'tabernacle' is (1) heaven itself (cf. John 14:1 ff.), or (2) a temporary body of some sort, appropriate to residence in heaven until the resurrection of the body presently in the grave; or (3) a 'proleptical' reference to the resurrection body of the future. Some have even gone so far as to hold that after writing 1 Thessalonians 4:13 ff. and 1 Corinthians 15:51 ff.—wherein Paul definitely, as in common Jewish expectation, placed the resurrection at 'the last day,' i.e. the parousia, the Second Advent (John 11:13, 24; cf. Acts 24:15)—he changed his mind, and thought the moment of death to be the moment of resurrection—not, of course, of the dead body, but a non-material body.

Another explicit reference to departure of the believer's soul for heaven, at death, is Paul's poignant, but happy, problem as a prisoner of the Empire: 'For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.... I am hard pressed between the two. My desire is to depart and be with Christ, for that is far better' (Phil. 1:21, 23; cf. 22 and 24).

Other New Testament facts bear on the question. Throughout John's Gospel, to believe on Christ is to have eternal life here and now. Can this eternal life be suspended or go out of existence during a 'soul-sleep' or 'soul-annihilation' between death and the future day of resurrection?

Third Proposition

The Bible teaches that the intermediate state of the impenitent and unbelieving is one of misery in hell (or Hades). In the Old Testament Sheol, the pit or lowest sheol, is a place (or condition) to which the wicked, in distinction from the righteous, are sent at death. The texts involved would be meaningless if Sheol were 'merely a promiscuous underworld for all souls ... no more a menace for the sinner than for the saint, and consequently a menace for neither.'⁴⁹ Against the person who 'forsook God which made him,' God says, 'a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell [Sheol]' (Deut. 32:15, 22 kjv). The stupid man who turns aside to the harlot's house 'does not know that the dead are there; that her guests are in the depths of Sheol' (Prov. 9:18 rsv). This is an example of many such in Proverbs where Sheol is a place from which a 'soul' is delivered by righteousness. A 'life after death' gave meaning to careful discipline of children. 'Do not withhold discipline from a child.... If you beat him with the rod you will save his life from Sheol' (Prov. 23:13, 14 rsv). 'The wise man's path leads upward to life, that he may avoid Sheol beneath.' Sheol is equated in three texts with a destruction (abaddon) distinct from death: 'Sheol and destruction [abaddon]' (Job 26:6; Prov. 15:11; and 27:20). This frightening term, rendered apollyon ('perdition') in the Greek New Testament, is hell. Here the devil is destined to be (see Rev. 9:11). These texts have no threatening force specially for sinners if Sheol does not designate a place of punishment.

The New Testament has a great deal to say about the intermediate state of the wicked dead. The rich man of Luke 16:19 ff. dies and immediately is 'tormented' in hell (Hades). This Hades is then (1) a place of retribution and torment, and (2) the contrary of heaven ('exalted to heaven ... brought down to Hades,' (Matt. 11:23). It is also (3) a kingdom of Satan, i.e. of evil (Matt. 16:18), and (4) the present residence of the wicked dead, later to be emptied into the final lake of fire (Rev. 20:12-14). Furthermore, (5) because of its frequent association with death in the New Testament, it is properly designated as eternal alienation from God. For the wicked, 'death and Hades' belong together (Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13, 14).

These considerations lead to a synthetic conclusion that the traditional Protestant view is correct: that at death the souls of the wicked go to a place of torment (the nature of which has not yet been discussed here) and the righteousness to heaven and this, though dimly revealed in early Old Testament times, with nothing to the contrary, is a part of Old Testament revealed religion.

A comparatively recent treatment of progressive revelation regarding death, immortality and future life in the Old Testament by J. Barton Payne, goes into these matters in great detail and ends with this conclusion, which I fully endorse.

The traditional Protestant position is to be maintained as: 1) The most simple, in holding to the hope stated in the Old Testament and New Testament (and nowhere denied) of a carrying to heaven immediately upon death for all believers. 2) The most Scriptural, in recognizing the paucity of revelation on Old Testament life after death and in rejecting hypothetical migrations [of O.T. Saints from Sheol-Hades to heaven at Christ's Ascension]. 3) The most consistent, in refusing the poor concepts of paganism and in maintaining the divine normativeness of the O.T. Scriptures.⁵⁰

This position—as against the prevailing opinions of all my teachers and the scholars marshaled in seminary days—holds that, though revelation on the matter appeared slowly throughout the Old Testament, more was understood by the people, as Hebrews 11 and John 11 indicate, than was enscriptured. We acknowledge a common core meaning of Sheol in the Old Testament—the realm of death, the grave and the mystery of what follows.⁵¹ ‘Sheol’ apparently is an infinitive of the verb sha'al, to ask and, as in most languages infinitives and participles may act as nouns, so it serves as a noun throughout the Old Testament. From the primary meaning of the place of the dead (always asking for more) come extended meanings. The first is ‘grave’ (where the body decomposes⁵²). The underground grave explains why saints ‘go down to Sheol.’ Secondly, ‘The abstract meaning “DEATH” occurs twenty-one times—in Psalm 89:48 parallel to “sheol”.’⁵³ The third is ‘hell,’ a place of punishment (Ps. 55:15), according to Payne, occurring twenty-four times.

On this basis the following can be concluded.

1. Luke 16:19 ff. (the rich man and Lazarus) does not represent a horizontal picture but a vertical one.

What elements of the story (or parable) are drawn from popular beliefs is hard to say. Calvin wisely remarks regarding the details:

Souls have neither fingers nor eyes, and are not liable to thirst, nor do they hold such conversations among themselves as are here described to have taken place between Abraham and the rich man; but our Lord has here drawn a picture, which represents the condition of the life to come according to our measure of capacity.

The general truth conveyed is that believing souls, when they have left their bodies, lead a joyful and blessed life out of this world, and that for the reprobate there are prepared dreadful torments, which can no more be conceived by our minds than the boundless glory of the heavens.... 54

2. From the Old Testament perspective, when a righteous man is said to ‘go down to Sheol’ at death it is the body, not the soul—as when Jacob said, ‘I shall go down to Sheol to my son, mourning’ (Gen. 37:35). Sometimes the whole thought of the realm of the dead, i.e. of Sheol, takes on features of the grave (Amos 9:2).

3. The hope of the saints in death, natural revulsion against it notwithstanding, was full of hope. See our earlier discussion. Some passages treated were Numbers 23:5, 10; Psalms 17; 15; 49:14, 15;

73:25, 26. We must seriously regard Hebrews 11:13, which says that these saints regarded themselves as pilgrims and foreigners on earth, preferring a heavenly country.

4. First Peter 3:19, 20 describes a preaching of the pre-incarnate Logos on earth during Noah's time, not as a proclamation by Jesus in Hades during the 'three days' (Matt. 12:40). The article of the Apostles' Creed, 'He descended into hell,' seems to rest on the view that the disembodied Jesus spent time in a subterranean Sheol-Hades, and rests on 1 Peter 3:19, 20 so interpreted.

With regard to the creedal article, let the following be observed.

A. The most ancient form of the creed did not contain this article.

B. The first ecumenical creeds, Nicea (ad 325) and Constantinople (ad 381), do not contain this article.

C. Some of the early statements of faith have 'descended into Hades' but, omitting 'and buried,' understand the descent as 'burial.'

D. Except in some Lutheran theology, most Protestants, following Calvin,⁵⁵ have interpreted the descensus ad infernum 'as a figurative expression of the unutterable suffering of Christ in his humanity [human nature].'⁵⁶

Those who do think that Jesus descended to Hades and preached 'to the spirits' (souls of the dead) have no agreement as to the persons addressed, the message preached, the purpose of it or the results. The reader who would like a quick survey of the proposals should read the old standard, Lange's Commentary.⁵⁷ Herman Wits (Witsius), a Dutch theologian and early exponent of the Federal (Covenant) theology, is reported to have said, 'There are almost as many dissertations concerning the Descensus as there are flies in the heat of summer.'

A thorough and convincing extended advocacy of the view advocated here is to be found in W. G. T. Shedd's Dogmatic Theology.⁵⁸ Francis Turretin, an exceedingly learned and devout successor to Calvin at Geneva, also presents a convincing advocacy of the view defended here.⁵⁹ A. H. Strong summarizes the view and evidence for it.⁶⁰ See also Geerhardus Vos' 'Eschatology.'⁶¹

5. Several passages of Scripture often supposed to teach a descent of Christ to Sheol-Hades or the limbus patrum are fully amenable to the view defended here. Some of these will now be examined.

First Peter 4:5, 6 (nkjv) says that Christ 'is ready to judge the living and the dead. For this reason the gospel was preached also to those who are dead [emphasis added]....' Geerhardus Vos comments,

For explaining the reference to 'the dead' [in v. 5] the connection with the preceding verse is fully sufficient. It is there stated that Christ is 'ready to judge the living and the dead.' The 'living and the dead' are those who will be alive and dead at the parousia. To both the gospel was preached, that Christ might be the judge of both. But that the gospel was preached to the latter in the state of death, is in no way indicated. On the contrary the telic clause, ‘that they might be judged according to men in the flesh,’ shows that they heard the gospel during their lifetime, for the judgment according to men in the flesh that has befallen them is the judgment of physical death. If a close connection between the passage in chapter three and that in chapter four did exist, this could only serve to commend the exegesis which finds in the earlier passage a gospel-preaching to the contemporaries of Noah during their lifetime, since, on that view, it becomes natural to identify the judgment in the flesh with the Deluge.⁶²

This is better than to suppose the ‘dead’ of verse 6 means ‘spiritually dead,’ for ‘the living and the dead’ in verse 5 clearly means physically dead. A shift to spiritually dead seems unlikely.

Though Matthew 12:40 says, ‘so will the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth,’ that in no wise means that the soul of Jesus went to Sheol-Hades (the Roman limbus patrum) somewhere near the center of our planet. ‘[H]eart of the earth’ means simply the grave, not a deep, deep subterranean cavern. It is an Hebraic-Aramaic expression, translating to Greek what Jesus said in Aramaic. Similarly, Tyre, located on a shore and an island offshore, is said to be ‘in the midst of the sea’ (Ezek. 26:5). Tyre’s ships sailed the surface of the oceans (it had no submarines). As a seafaring nation its ‘borders are in the heart of the seas’ (Ezek 27:4, 26, 32; 28:2). When in fulfillment of this prediction Alexander’s army scraped the part of Tyre on shore into the shallow shore water (Ezek. 27:27) it was ‘into the heart of the seas.’ After Pharaoh and his army were drowned, Miriam sang of the ‘heart of the sea’ as where it happened (Exod. 15:8). It should also be said that the language of Scripture nowhere reflects a world-picture (weltbild) in which earth is a planetary sphere with a heart or center downward from every spot on its surface. The heart of the earth in Scripture simply means under ground. All graves are underground but near the surface, covered with earth-fill in our times usually, but in Jesus’ time usually in a cavern cut in bedrock, with an opening closed by a single stone. In Joseph’s tomb Jesus’ body lay ‘in the heart of the earth.’ Similarly, in Scripture birds fly ‘in the midst of heaven’ (Rev. 19:17 kjv). Poets still speak like that.

Ephesians 4:7, 9 (kjv) says that ‘Christ ... descended first into the lower parts of the earth.’ Even in antiquity this was understood by some wise Fathers as referring to the incarnation, not a descent to Sheol-Hades. I discussed that at some length earlier (in Part 6: Ecclesiology) in connection with ‘Gifts of Christ to the church’ and in connection with the incarnation (in Part 4: Christology).

Fourth Proposition

The condition of the unsaved in their present disembodied state is one of conscious torment. This has already been partly established by previous considerations in this chapter. In addition, let the following be said.

1. ‘[T]he Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trials, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment [emphasis added] until the day of judgment, and especially those who indulge in the lust of defiling passion and despise authority’ (2 Peter 2:9, 10). This is very specific and scarcely needs comment.

2. As in the general outlook of the Old Testament, so in the book of Revelation, for the wicked, ‘Death’ is followed by ‘Hades’ (Rev. 6:8; 20:13, 14). Taken futuristically, and granted any literal meaning at all, Hades is inhabited by those who only after a future judgment will be turned into the lake of fire. This is the Hades where the wicked rich man of the parable of Luke 16 (Dives in the Latin Bible) was ‘in anguish in this flame’ (v. 24). Like ‘the angels when they sinned’ they are ‘kept until the judgment’ (2 Peter 2:9 and context). A change comes after ‘the thousand years were ended’ when all ‘the dead, great and small’ will stand before God for final judgment (Rev. 20:11–15). ‘Death and Hades gave up the dead who were in them’; they are judged and are ‘thrown into the lake of fire.’

This scheme of things was partly foreseen in outline by the prophet Isaiah in what Delitzsch called ‘the Little Apocalypse’ (Isa. 24:23): ‘On that day the Lord will punish the host of heaven, in heaven, and the kings of the earth, on the earth. They will be gathered together as prisoners in a pit; they will be shut up in prison, and after many days they will be punished’ (Isa. 24:21, 22 rsv). I have treated this more at length elsewhere.⁶³ Franz Delitzsch commented, ‘What the apocalypticist of the New Testament describes in detail in Revelation 20:4, 20:11 sqq., and 21, the apocalypticist of the Old Testament condensed.’⁶⁴

Fifth Proposition

The condition of the righteous dead in their present, disembodied, intermediate state, while not one of complete blessedness, is nevertheless ‘far better’ than that of living saints. ‘Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord,’ says the Scripture (Rev. 14:13). Though theirs is not a state of complete happiness, they ‘sleep in Jesus’ (only as to their bodies, whose usual reclining posture in the grave is obviously indicated). They are ‘with Christ’ and ‘them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him’ (1 Thess. 4:14, 15 kjv)—their souls, not their bodies, of course, for only their bodies are in their graves, ‘and the dead in Christ shall rise first’ (1 Thess. 4:16). Our best information is derived from several scriptural sources:

1. Jesus’ words to the thief: ‘in Paradise’ (Luke 23:43) brings a very pleasing prospect. Paradise is a Persian word: not nature as such, but a formal garden—calm, verdured, with splashing water. It is introduced in the Old Testament in the Song of Solomon 4:13 as an orchard; in Nehemiah 2:8 and Ecclesiastes 2:5 as a park or forest. In Revelation 2:7 overcomers are promised ‘to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God.’

2. Paul’s numerous statements: ‘to ... be with Christ,’ which ‘is far better’; ‘away from the body and at home with the Lord’; ‘clothed ... with our house which is from heaven;’ ‘the time of my departure [release, loosening of moorings] has come’ (Phil. 1:21–23; 2 Cor. 5:1–9 kjv; 2 Tim. 4:6). At 2 Corinthians 12:1–4, in language of mystical thought, he describes paradise, the third heaven, as a realm of ‘things that cannot be told, which man may not utter.’

3. The book of Hebrews: What it says throughout of heaven—its occupants, temple, temple furniture and the like—is in terms parallel to the Old Testament temple, priests and ritual, but in Hebrews 12:22, 23 the present inhabitants, divine, angelic and human, are classified as ‘innumerable angels in festal gathering ... the assembly of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven ... God, the judge of all ... the spirits of the righteous made perfect, and ... Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant.’ Then, as though to account for the ‘firstborn’ and ‘spirits of the righteous,’ the writer adds ‘the sprinkled blood that speaks a better word than the blood of Abel.’ A considerable challenge both to the exegete and poet, as well as the artist!

4. Insights from Revelation 6:9–11 and 7:9–17: Some clear facts and cautious inferences yield the following. (a) The righteous dead are in heaven. (b) They are conscious and resting. (c) They are robed. The robes (both of the martyr souls and the multitude) suggest an answer to Paul's desire not to be 'unclothed,' i.e. disembodied. Some cover for the soul (implied in 'clothed') is provided. (d) Some of them are 'under the altar' (here Revelation matches Hebrews), suggesting special care of martyrs. (e) They have capacity for speech and emotion. (f) They are blessed, for as Revelation 14:13 confirms, 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.'

Such revelation as the Bible furnishes about the home and condition of saints in the span of time between death and resurrection is scanty. The imaginations of Christians of every race, temperament, social level and degree of culture has been stimulated to supply the want of information with imaginative creations—lyrics, songs, painting, architecture. These lie deep in culture everywhere in Christendom and they grow with each new generation. Surely God intends it to be so. To empty the lyrics of hymn books of every element of imagination not strictly supported by factual statements of Scripture would gut the hymns and songs of their power and beauty. To ask the poets to quote a verse for every line would put them out of business—from 'Ring them bells' to Kipling's L'Envoi.

Postscript

An article by Robert G. Rayburn⁶⁵ properly brands as 'common errors'—not topics for debate among evangelicals—four teachings 'respecting the abode of the soul after death.' They are as follows. 1. 'The doctrine that the souls of both the righteous and the wicked sleep between death and the resurrection ... 2. The doctrine that the intermediate state is one of further probation ... 3. The doctrine taught by the Church of Rome that souls at peace with the church but not perfectly pure at death ... must undergo a period of purging before they are permitted to enter ... heaven ... 4. Finally there is the error of the doctrine of annihilationism ... no conscious existence of the wicked after death [or the judgment].'⁶⁶ These errors are not 'evangelical' doctrines, and this writer is one among many who questions the wisdom of the growing acceptance of those advocating one or more of these false doctrines in otherwise evangelical organizations.

¹ Thomas Oden, Life in The Spirit (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1993), p. 377.

² Gerhardus Vos, 'Hades,' International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, Vol. ii, p. 1315.

³ John Donne, 1st, 13th and 14th lines of his Sonnet, 'Death,' 1633.

⁴ Gustav Friederich Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. Geo. E. Day (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1883), p. 560.

⁵ ibid., pp. 564, 565.

⁶ More about this later.

⁷ Charles H. Hodge, Systematic Theology III (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 714.

⁸ The Catholic Encyclopedic Dictionary, ed. Donald Atwater, 3rd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1961), sub 'Limbo,' p. 293.

⁹ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, 4th ed. (Rockford, IL: TAN Books, 1974) pp. 191, 192. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica III.52.5.

¹⁰ A Catholic Dictionary, ibid.

¹¹ Ott, op. cit., p. 484.

¹² Ott, op. cit., p. 483.

¹³ Catechism of 1994, para. 1031, see 1030–1032, pp. 268, 269.

John McClintock and James Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

¹⁴ McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia Vol. V, 'Limbo,' p. 435.

¹⁵ Vatican Council II, vol. 2, More Postconciliar Documents, new rev. ed., ed. Austin Flannery, O.P. (Northport, NY: 1982), pp. 394, 395.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 502.

¹⁷ op. cit., p. 502.

¹⁸ Oscar Cullmann, Henry Wolfson, Werner Jaeger and Henry J. Cadbury, Immortality and Resurrection, Death in the western World: Two Conflicting Currents of Thought (New York: Macmillan Co., 1965).

¹⁹ ibid., pp. 9–53.

²⁰ ibid., p. 57.

²¹ See note 26, page 1027.

²² Calvin entitled his book: Psychopannychia: A Refutation of the Error Entertained by Some Unskillful Persons, Who Ignorantly Imagine that In the Interval Between Death and The Judgment The Soul Sleeps, Together With an Explanation of the Condition and Life of The Soul After This Present Life, Vol. iii, Tracts by Calvin, trans. Henry Beverage (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1851), pp. 413–490.

²³ A thorough work from the same point of view is Robert Martin-Achard, From Death to Life: A Study of the Development of the Doctrine of Resurrection in the Old Testament, trans. John Penney Smith (Edinburgh & London, 1960). These authors naturally do not bring to bear passages of Old Testament interpretation in the New Testament such as Peter's interpretation of Psalm 16:9–11 (Acts 2:25 ff.) and Paul's (Acts 13:35–37) and Hebrews 11:13 ff. A more trustworthy source is George E. Ladd's, A Theology of the New Testament, chap. 19 'Eternal Life' and chap. 24 'Resurrection' (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974, 1991). See also the brief article and bibliography 'Immortality' by Julius Scott in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology.

²⁴ Herman A. Hoyt, 'The Intermediate State' in The End Times (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 34–48.

²⁵ H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949, 1966), pp. 488, 489.

²⁶ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, Vol. ii (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 318, 319.

- ²⁷ Hoyt, op. cit., pp. 44, 45.
- ²⁸ Hoyt, op. cit., p. 45.
- ²⁹ Hoyt, op. cit., p. 45.
- ³⁰ Hoyt, op. cit., p. 45.
- ³¹ Hoyt, op. cit., p. 47.
- ³² See chart, ‘The Spirit World,’ Dispensational Truth, 1918, enlarged 1920 and many printings, by author, 2802 No. Park Ave., Philadelphia, PA, between pp. 95 and 96.
- ³³ John Calvin, Institutes II. 16.8–12; Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology II, (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1981), pp. 356–364; Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology III, op. cit., pp. 733–747; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publ., 1969), p. 595; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 707, 708; Buswell, op. cit., pp. 318, 319.
- ³⁴ Shedd, op. cit., p. 595.
- ³⁵ Shedd, op. cit., p. 595.
- ³⁶ Wm. Cullen Bryant, Thanatopsis.
- ³⁷ R. C. H. Lenski, The Interpretation of St. John’s Revelation (Minneapolis: Augsburg Publ., 1961), p. 75.
- ³⁸ Calvin, op. cit., 10.8.
- ³⁹ Mitchell Dahood, Psalms, Anchor Bible II (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965–1970), p. 187.
- ⁴⁰ ibid., 2nd note on v. 26, p. 196.
- ⁴¹ Geerhardus Vos, The Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), p. 325.
- ⁴² ibid., p. 349.
- ⁴³ ibid., p. 349.
- ⁴⁴ ibid., p. 347.
- ⁴⁵ Pss. 57:8–11; 66:1–4; 67:2–5; 96:3, 7–13; 100:1–3; 108:3; 113:3, 4; 117:1, 2; 145:21. Vos, ibid., p. 347.

- ⁴⁶ H. R. Mackintosh, Immortality and the Future, 2nd ed. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1917), ‘Eschatology in the Old Testament and Judaism,’ pp. 19 ff.
- ⁴⁷ ibid., as Mackintosh quotes Charles, p. 31.
- ⁴⁸ Charles Hodge, op. cit., p. 727.
- ⁴⁹ Shedd, op. cit., p. 636.
- ⁵⁰ J. Barton Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament, topic 30 ‘Life After Death’ (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962, 1976), pp. 443–463 and Appendix G, pp. 527–529.
- ⁵¹ ‘... But that dread of something after death,—/The undiscovered country, from whose bourn/No traveller returns—puzzles the will,/and makes us rather bear those ills we have/Than fly to others that we know not of’ (Shakespeare, Hamlet iii.1. lines 78–82.)
- ⁵² Job 17:13, 14; Ps. 88:3; Gen. 42:38; 1 Sam. 2:6; 1 Kgs. 2:6.
- ⁵³ Payne, op. cit., p. 528.
- ⁵⁴ John Calvin, Commentary on a Harmony of the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark and Luke, Vol. ii, trans. Wm. Pringle (Edinburgh: 1845), pp. 188, 189.
- ⁵⁵ Calvin, Institutes II.16.8–12.
- ⁵⁶ Donald G. Bloesch, ‘Descent into Hell’ (Hades) Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 314.
- ⁵⁷ Lange’s Commentary, Epistles General of Peter, G. F. C. Frommüller, trans. J. S. Mombert, 1872, ‘Excursus on the Descensus Ad Infernos,’ pp. 67–71.
- ⁵⁸ Shedd, op. cit., pp. 603–609, especially extended footnotes on pages 606–609.
- ⁵⁹ Turretin, op. cit., Q. XV, para. 12, pp. 360, 361.
- ⁶⁰ A. H. Strong, op. cit., pp. 707, 708.
- ⁶¹ G. Vos, op. cit., p. 992.
- ⁶² G. Vos, ‘Eschatology,’ ibid., p. 992.
- ⁶³ Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977), pp. 57, 58.
- ⁶⁴ Franz Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah, loc. cit. See also F. C. Jennings, Studies in Isaiah (New York: Loizeaux, 1950), p. 288.

⁶⁵ The late Robert G. Rayburn was President of Covenant Theological Seminary, St Louis, Missouri.

⁶⁶ Robert G. Rayburn, 'Intermediate State,' Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia, Vol. i, (Chicago: Moody Press, 1975), pp. 851, 852.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1040). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

4

The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead (I): Its Main Features and Unique Position in Biblical Religion

The name for the doctrine and title of this chapter is drawn from Paul's defense of his preaching before Governor Felix at Caesarea: 'there will be a resurrection of both the just and the unjust' (Acts 24:15). Paul frequently used this and similar language for that wonderful event (whether two events or only one). In John 5:29 Jesus spoke of 'the resurrection of life' and 'the resurrection of judgment.'

No one in recent decades has seen more clearly and written more effectively—and at length—on the subject of the resurrection of the dead and of the connection thereof with the resurrection of Jesus Himself, than J. A. Schep. I quote from one of his lesser works on the subject as an epitome of this chapter.

The resurrection of the dead in a body of flesh is guaranteed by Jesus' resurrection in a body of flesh and bones; with scars of His wounds visible, and capable of being touched and of eating food (Luke 24:38–43, Acts 10:41). At His ascension Jesus did not discard his flesh-body, as is clear from Acts 1:11; Philippians 3:21; Revelation 1:17. Since the resurrected believers will be like the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:49; Phil. 3:21; 1 John 3:2), they too will be raised in their bodies of flesh (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35–42). Only in this way is man saved in his totality, and able to live on a new earth (Isa. 65:17 ff.; 66:22; Matt 5:5; Rev. 21:1–3).¹

Wolfhart Pannenberg draws the same connection between Jesus' resurrection and ours, with the added notion that certainty of the revelation of God and way of salvation in Scripture and Christian teaching rests first on Jesus' resurrection and finally on ours. This theme runs throughout Pannenberg's work. In two prolix and complicated Germanic sentences he states this recurring theme:

Just as our understanding of eternity the Easter event is not merely the basis of the knowledge that Jesus of Nazareth even in his earthly form was the eternal Son of God, but also decides that he was this by giving retrospective confirmation, so the deity of the God whom Jesus proclaimed is definitively manifested by the eschatological consummation of his kingdom and the conflict between atheism and belief is finally settled thereby with repercussions for all eternity, for talk about God by its very nature implies the concept of eternity. Furthermore the resurrection of Jesus is definitively and irrefutably decided only in connection with the eschatological resurrection of the dead, with all the implications for the person of Jesus Christ that the Church already confesses on the basis of the conviction that the Easter message is true.²

The Apostle Paul, who also liked long sentences, came more quickly to the point when he wrote, 'Christ Jesus ... was declared to be the Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness [the divine nature] by his resurrection from the dead' (Rom. 1:1–4); and also, 'Now if Christ is proclaimed as raised from the dead, how can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there is no resurrection of the dead, then not even Christ has been raised. And if Christ has not been raised, then our preaching is in vain and your faith ... is futile and you are still in your sins' (1 Cor. 15:12–14, 17).

The Best Good News to Mortal Men, Yet a Perennial Stumbling Block

'No doctrine of the Christian faith,' says St Augustine, 'is so vehemently and so obstinately opposed as the doctrine of the resurrection of the flesh.'³

Resurrection of the body of flesh, though the best news sinners destined to death and judgment forever can hear, always has been nevertheless an offense to many. The resurrection of Jesus threatened the Jews of Jerusalem and Judea, for it authenticated the Messiah they had rejected. The cross and empty tomb both offended Greek 'wisdom' about the nature of man and the soul (1 Cor. 1:17–2:14; cf. Acts 17:32). Simple reference to the resurrection of Jesus as 'assurance to all' caused Greeks to mock Paul's gospel for it was then as still today 'against the wisdom' of men, even though it also attracted some (Acts 17:31–34).

In our times leading neo-orthodox scholars, though assigning great importance to 'the Easter event,' nevertheless have rejected 'the resurrection of the flesh' (as the ancient creeds have it). Emil Brunner, for example, in a book entitled 'Eternal Hope' could say on the one hand that except for what he called an Easter event 'the knowledge of Jesus would not have reached us.... The tiny flock of Christ's disciples filled and conquered the world ... solely and exclusively because Jesus Christ showed himself as the Risen One,' etc.⁴ On the other hand, he said that the idea of resurrection was a pagan import to Israel⁵ and, citing R. Bultmann, asserts that 'Paul's experience and testimony [as well as Gospel records] do not show that a dead man was raised to physical life.'⁶ Brunner spoke of 'the manifold discrepancy' of the 'Easter reports' as supporting the neo-orthodox (dialectical) assumption of an infinite qualitative gulf between our space-time world and the eschatological (i.e. supernatural) world. So the resurrection of Jesus was nothing that can be reported in space-time language.⁷ He had no explanation for the empty tomb.

As for the resurrection of 'the last day' Brunner makes the following points. (1) 'The resurrection of the individual is in the New Testament plainly to be understood as personal immortality.'⁸ (2) The body of our resurrection is a 'spiritual corporality'—'a paradoxical idea.' However (3), even though 'I, this specific non-interchangeable man, am to rise again ... the flesh will not rise again' whatever the creed says.⁹ (4) Two things must be demarcated: (a) 'the transient element, the flesh, is not to take part in the resurrection,' but (b) 'the individual person who is a special thought in the mind of God will not be excluded from eternity.’¹⁰ It is a very small leap from these statements to Barth’s apparently final opinion that our ‘resurrected’ state in eternity will be as a loved thought in God’s mind—the only heaven Jesus went to such great effort to purchase and to prepare and all we will ever get.

The heretical aspect of such views as these arose early in Gnosticism and among the followers of Marcion.¹¹ Tertullian argued against these assertions and similar, with evidences and arguments employed by the orthodox ever since. ‘The proof that Tertullian had the gnostics in mind has been supplied by the discovery at Nag Hammadi of the so-called Letter to Rheginos.’¹² The errors have reappeared recently among liberals, neo-orthodox and their successors, even among some evangelicals who seem not to understand the provenance of their perversion and denials of Christ’s resurrection.¹³

The Biblical Vocabulary of Resurrection of the Flesh

A subject as ancient as this and so furiously debated over the past two centuries has generated an enormous apologetical literature, too much to investigate further here. We shall seek to keep as close to Scripture itself as possible through this study.

In the King James Version—whose terms have furnished vocabulary for discussion of ‘resurrection’—the expression is used forty-two times, always translating anastasis—a standing up. In the New Testament it is a technical term for restoration of life to a dead person, though in non-biblical literature it had this and metaphysical uses. The idea of a corpse reclining in death, rising to the feet and looking abroad is the action indicated. Rise, risen, rose, arose and rising frequently translate anistēmi, which is the verbal equivalent of anastasis (above). This is illustrated at Acts 12:7, where an angel struck the sleeping Apostle Peter and said, ‘Arise up’ (kjv), ‘Get up’ (rsv). Sometimes these English words translate egeiro usually of Jesus’ resurrection. It is sometimes transitive-active in meaning (so raise, Acts 4:10, 5:30), sometimes intransitive-active (rise, 1 Cor. 15:29). The idea of a human body at rest or deceased rising to the feet is implied whenever applicable to resurrection. Another group of related words for resurrection are live, liveth, alive, make alive (revive, quicken), which need no explanation. ‘[F]irstborn of the dead’ (Rev. 1:5) and ‘brought again from the dead’ (Heb. 13:20) also refer to our Lord’s resurrection.

Though in Jesus’ language the spiritually ‘dead’ who ‘hear the voice of the Son of God ... will live,’ i.e. receive new birth (John 5:25), regeneration is not ever called a resurrection, though some would equate ‘This is the first resurrection’ (Rev. 20:5, 6) with ‘this is regeneration.’¹⁴

In addition to these specific terms for resurrection of the dead, in many contexts such words as live, lives (liveth), alive and make alive (quicken) imply resurrection.¹⁵ ‘[C]ome out’ is used at John 5:29. Jesus as the first to have complete resurrection to unending, glorified life is called ‘firstborn from the dead’ (Col. 1:18 kjv).

Orthodox Jews of Jesus’ time believed in a future resurrection of the righteous dead. If they, along with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and other saints of the past, were all to share in the blessings of the reign of Messiah, a resurrection would be necessary, according to Emil Schürer,¹⁶ the great historian of Jewish life and beliefs in Jesus' time. R. H. Charles' pioneering work is still a resource for all who examine the subject. He says: 'According to all the Jewish literature of the century [first ad] save the Apocalypse of Baruch and 4 Ezra, there was to be a resurrection of the righteous only.'¹⁷ Charles also argued at great length that the doctrine of personal, individual resurrection was indigenous to Israel. I quote a few lines at the close of his study of 'eschatologies of the individual and of the nation' as follows:

Thus when the doctrine of the blessed immortality of the faithful is connected with the coming Messianic kingdom, the separate eschatologies of the individual and of the nation issue finally in their synthesis: the righteous individual, no less than the righteous nation, will participate in the Messianic kingdom, for the righteous dead of Isaiah will rise to share therein.¹⁸

Strack and Billerbeck, in an excursus on John 5:28,¹⁹ say, in preliminary remarks, which translate, 'The pre-Christian Jewish literature has identified the Days of Messiah yemoth hammashiach with the future world olam habba. The messianic period serves as the time of absolute completion of salvation; accordingly it brings also the resurrection of the dead.'²⁰ They go on to show that Daniel 12:2 was the fountain of the teaching, but the obscurity of the text led to various interpretations—not only before Christ came but among later rabbis.

It is important to recognize that no heathen source of the idea of resurrection in Israel or the biblical doctrine of resurrection needs be conceded. There is a prevalent critical assumption that the notion came from Zoroastrianism, a religion of Persia, and that the Jews picked up the idea there during exilic and post-exilic times. No one however has found any direct or indirect link. It is true that early Zoroastrianism—about seventh century bc—had a conception of 'eschatology.' Noss remarks, 'According to Zoroaster's teachings, a general resurrection will take place at the end of the present world order.'²¹ It is also true that Cyrus, Darius I and Xerxes were Zoroastrians. These three figure in the last three Minor Prophets, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, as well as Daniel. Yet the government 'aid' for the returning Jews was to restore the Jewish religion and temple on its home ground for the worship of the territorial god whose name—and probably little more—Cyrus knew. The faith of the people of the restored commonwealth became Palestinian Judaism and, while cultural accretion occurred from the Hellenization of the Near East, there was only resistance to foreign religion among the most faithful.

Martin-Achard, who devoted exhaustive research to these matters, says that though

Iranian [Persian] influence on the formation of the Old Testament belief in the resurrection must not be either exaggerated or denied ... Zarathustra's [Zoraster] followers did not hand over an entirely unknown idea to the Jews; it is incorrect to speak of borrowing here and even questionable to say, as H. Birkland does, that the decisive factor in formation of the Jewish belief came from the Persian religion. The Iranian doctrine helped the Jews to adopt a conception whose essential elements had already been provided by their own tradition.²²

E. R. Bernard adds: 'At the most such belief among their foreign rulers did no more than stimulate the home-born expectation of resurrection in the breast of Israel.'²³

A whole school of Old Testament exegetes and theologians have sought the origin of Israel's late doctrine of resurrection in the Near Eastern beliefs and annual ceremonies of the dying (in the fall) and resurrecting (in the spring) god—Baal, Tammuz, and similar (cf. Ezek. 8:14). Martin-Achard cites J. Peterson,²⁴ 'The idea of dying and rising God, so dear to the agricultural peoples, was incompatible with the nature of Yahweh,' and adds, 'The Living God does not need to be born.'²⁵ Brief attention to this basis in Old Testament Scripture now follows.

Resurrection in the Old Testament

There is no Old Testament divine pronouncement of the resurrection comparable in fullness to statements of the unity of God or that God created the heavens and the earth. What we do have is (1) a series of promises which, to be fulfilled in a manner meaningful to the saints, requires a resurrection in the Messianic age; (2) a saintly awareness of the living God and of their life in Him which led to expectation of a cure from the loss of life in the tragedy of death; (3) examples of bodily translation of saintly people from earth to heaven; (4) several examples of return from physical death to physical life; and (5) many expressions of hope for a future restoration of life (in the flesh) and several prophecies of a resurrection of the righteous—the ḥasidim, true intimates of God.

1. There is a series of promises to the people of God, which, to be fulfilled in a meaningful manner, requires a resurrection in the times of Messiah. The promises to Abraham and his seed furnish the structure for all of Genesis after chapter 11. Over and over God spoke to the three patriarchs in language like this: 'all the land which thou seest [the Land of Canaan], to thee [singular] will I give it, and to thy seed [descendants] for ever' (Gen. 13:15 kjv). God challenges Abram to check out the promised land by walking through it (see vv. 14–18). Similar forms of the promise with much enlargement are found throughout Genesis.²⁶ All are reports of theophanies or oracles of the highest order of Old Testament religious expression. Among others, not only was David promised an eternal 'house' or dynasty (2 Sam. 7:1–28), also that the people Israel would be the Lord's forever (v. 24). Augustine's comments on Psalm 89:4, that David's 'seed will I establish forever,' makes this point.²⁷ David claimed to speak for God as a prophet: 'The Spirit of the Lord speaks by me; his word is on my tongue' and his psalm is a divine 'oracle' (2 Sam. 23:1, 2). Later prophets seem to predict that David will himself occupy his throne in times of the Messiah. '[B]ehold, days are coming,' prophesied Jeremiah of coming times of the Messiah, when 'they shall serve the Lord their God and David their king, whom I will raise up for them' (Jer. 30:3, 9). '[R]aise up' here is ʾāqim, a form of qum, which, though used hundreds of times for any act of rising, is here 'causative' (hiphil—i.e. God will cause David to rise from the dead). This word is one of three Hebrew words for resurrection from the dead in Isaiah 26:19 to be considered shortly.

2. There is the saints' awareness of the living God and of their life in Him, which led to expectation of a cure for loss of life in the tragedy of death. Jesus surely was not the first to think that 'God is not the God of the dead but of the living.' If God was David's 'refuge [and], my portion in the land of the living' (while hiding in a cave, as says the superscription of Ps. 142:5), and he could say that in 'the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me' (Ps. 23), then even in the grave his 'flesh also dwells secure' (Ps. 16). That hope was shared by Job, who in a flash of faith cried out, 'Oh that you would hide me in Sheol, that you would conceal me until your wrath be past, that you would appoint me a set time, and remember me!' (Job 14:13–15).

3. There are examples of bodily translation of godly people without death from earth to heaven. The instances, of course, are Enoch and Elijah. Such is the natural sense of Genesis 5:24, ‘Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him,’ and is so explained at Hebrews 11:5. So also it is with Elijah (2 Kgs. 2:11), a case where literally God made ‘winds’ His ‘messengers’ and fire and flame His ‘ministers’ (Ps. 104:4). Jews who believing, as we know they did, in a judgment of the ‘last day’ would have expected something of this sort first.

4. There are several Old Testament examples of miraculous resuscitations, returns from death to life. Murray Harris rightly points out that there are six such in the Old Testament. Three are in the Elijah-Elisha cycle of narrative: the son of the widow of Zarephath (1 Kgs. 17:17–24), the son of a Shunammite woman (2 Kgs. 4:18–37) and the man cast into the grave of Elisha (2 Kgs. 13:20, 21). Though not examples of resurrection to ‘eschatological’ (transformed) bodies (as in the prophecy of Daniel 12:2), ‘they demonstrated that Yahweh’s power extended to the grave and could revive even the dead.’²⁸

5. There are a few expressions of confidence in a future restoration to physical life. The godly Hannah, mother of Samuel, celebrating the birth of her prayed-for infant Samuel, sang ‘The Lord kills and brings to life; he brings down to Sheol and raises up’ (1 Sam. 2:6). Join this to the Song of Moses (Deut. 32): ‘See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no god beside me; I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal’ (Deut. 32:39).

Granted that both quotations are from poetry where hyperbole (literary exaggeration) is a common figure of speech, the passages seem to indicate belief that God can and may indeed raise the dead to deathless life, if not in every case, in some cases. In this class seems to fall Job’s expression of confidence, in Job 19:23–27. Von Rad makes this statement: ‘Everyone who reads the book must see in the two passages, Job 16:18 ff. and 19:23 ff., the climax of Job’s struggle. Nowhere else does such a certainty and consolation infold him as here. Nevertheless these passages are not to be called the solution, for the dialogue does not of course end here.’²⁹

6. And finally, there are several apparently plain prophecies (inspired predictions) of a future resurrection of the holy people (or hasidim), intimates of the Lord and His obedient servants. Scholars from earliest times have examined these passages minutely. We cannot here trace the history of exegesis, but results support the claim made at the head of this discussion that the firm belief of the Jews of Jesus’ time was based on Old Testament revelation, not mere wishful thinking or borrowing from Persian rulers or Canaanite neighbors. The prophetic passages are in Hosea, Isaiah, Ezekiel and Daniel.³⁰

I shall discuss the passages which appear to predict a future resurrection of the dead—whether of the righteous, or of righteous Israelites, of Gentiles, of all—in the order they appear in the English Bible. Some good scholars, e.g. Burton Scott Easton, find only ‘two certain passages ... Isaiah 26:19 and Daniel 12:2.’³¹ Though he discusses several more, Murray Harris adds only Isaiah 53:10–12 and Daniel 12:2 and 13 to Easton’s ‘certain passages.’³² Barton Payne adds Hosea 6:2 and 13:14 as well as Isaiah 24:22.³³

We shall briefly consider each.

There is a class of scholars who, though they apparently have an honest commitment to an orthodox Christology and faith in salvation through Christ's death and resurrection, find almost no genuine prediction of anything in the Old Testament. Yet they find it valuable to faith. R. Martin-Achard is typical in his conclusions on Psalm 16:9–11, which both Peter and Paul quote as prediction of Christ's resurrection (Acts 2:25 ff. and 13:35). His thoughts on the subject follow:

There is no question of a resurrection here.... This Psalm [post-exilic, not Davidic] is speaking neither of the immortality of the faithful, nor of his translation into the Beyond; the hasid is not really concerned about what will happen after death, his sole interest is in praising his chiefest good: Yahweh, God of Israel.

The real question of Psalm 16 is that of communion with the Living God; the writer sees no end to this; he does not trouble his mind, because it depends on God.... After Easter the faith of the psalmist became the great certainty that the Church has to proclaim to the world.^{34}

Christ made the whole Old Testament a Christian book when He taught the disciples to interpret 'in all the Scriptures' and 'beginning with Moses and all the Prophets' (Luke 24:27) and in 'the Psalms' (Luke 24:44) things 'concerning himself' (Luke 24:27). 'Then he opened their minds to understand the Scriptures' and 'that ... Christ should suffer and on the third day rise from the dead' (Luke 24:45, 46). Of course, not all the Old Testament is Messianic in a direct sense. Evangelical scholars distinguish five or more levels of messianic prophecy, as I have set forth at length in an earlier publication.^{35}

Psalm 16:9–11, seen as a prediction, not merely a hope.^{36} In Acts 2:24–31 and 13:34–37, first Peter then Paul quote Psalm 16:10 as a prophecy of the resurrection. They had every right to do so for David, whose experience and words they report, was a person typical of Christ. Franz Delitzsch placed this Psalm in the category of indirectly Messianic, or Messianic by hyperbole. The Psalmist described his feelings in such a way that 'he was raised above his own individuality and time, and uses regarding himself hyperbolic [i.e. legitimately exaggerated] expressions which were not to become full historical truth until they became so in Christ.'^{37} Let the reader check out how Peter and Paul interpreted the Psalm as prediction of Christ's resurrection. Peter was especially convincing. It became, if it had not been before (and that is not certain), part of the basis on which Jews just before Jesus would have come to believe in resurrection of the dead.

Isaiah 24:1–27:13. This passage predicts, from an Old Testament perspective, the consummation of history—that which the book of Revelation (Apokalupsis, English, 'apocalypse') presents through the eyes of a Christian seer with a final perspective. Two parts of this section seem to speak of a future resurrection, both of the righteous and unrighteous. They are not stated in such a way that a doctrine of resurrection could be established, but are certainly suggested. I deal with the entire passage in Daniel and the Latter Days.^{38} Let us look more closely at two portions of this passage.

Isaiah 24:21–23. 'On that day the Lord will punish the host of heaven, in heaven, and the kings of the earth, on the earth. They will be gathered together as prisoners in a pit; they will be shut up in a prison, and after many days they will be punished (visited, kjv). Then the moon will be confounded and the sun ashamed, for the Lord of hosts [armies] reigns on Mount Zion.'

To come quickly to the point—‘the shutting up of wicked kings in a “pit” ’ or “prison,” later to be “visited” in times when Messiah reigns in Zion.’ The visitation described, according to uniform Hebrew usage, can be for either deliverance or judgment. This passage suggests the ‘resurrection of judgment’ of which Jesus spoke (John 5:29).³⁹

Isaiah 25:8. ‘He will swallow up death for ever, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces, and the reproach of his people he will take away from all the earth; for the Lord has spoken’ (rsv).

This will be in the time the divine Savior for whom Israel has waited (v. 9) has come and has set up a feast of reconciliation ‘for all peoples’ (v. 6). From a New Testament perspective that is the parousia, the Second Advent. Portions of this verse are quoted in Paul’s resurrection chapter, 1 Corinthians 15 (v. 54), and in Revelation 7:17 and 21:4. Though every line asks for comment, we press on. Jewish people of Jesus’ time had got the message, we may be sure.

Isaiah 26:1, 19. ‘In that day [when God has brought messianic rest] this song will be sung in the land of Judah ...

Your dead shall live;

Together with my dead body they shall arise.

Awake and sing, you who dwell in dust;

For your dew is like the dew of herbs;

And the earth shall cast out the dead (nkjv).

Liberal critical authors find a plethora of figures drawn from Canaanite myth in the passage and, of course, if some of the language of that culture was in the mind of Isaiah he may have used it. Yet Von Rad’s dictum that Hebrew religion and language was steadily against these scholars’ opinions is valid. The language of dead bodies arising, awakening and singing, dwellers in dust rising as fresh as morning dew, the earth to which innumerable Adams have returned giving up her dead, all speak of literal resurrection—whether also transformation is not said. In context it is not a general resurrection. ‘My dead bodies’ (perhaps God’s or perhaps the prophet’s) suggests the resurrection of the righteous dead only.

Isaiah 53:10–12. It is the fashion of modern Old Testament scholarship to detect four ‘servant songs’ in Isaiah 42–53. Jesus applied portions of them as predictions of Himself. New Testament interpretation of the meaning of the death of Christ does so in the fourth and last of these ‘songs,’ Isaiah 52:13–53:12.⁴⁰ These fifteen verses constitute a poem of five stanzas of three verses each. The first verse (53:10) of the last stanza promises compensation and reward for the Servant’s suffering and vicarious death. Three benefits accrue to Him. They are the very rewards characteristic of successful work in ancient Hebrew society: (1) numerous family (‘he shall see his offspring’); (2) a long life (‘he shall prolong his days’); and (3) successful accomplishment of life’s purposes (‘the will [plan, pleasure] of the Lord shall prosper in his hand’). This is the sequel to being killed (v. 8), assigned a grave in a potter’s field ‘with the wicked’ (v. 9) yet buried in the tomb a ‘rich man’ (v. 9).

The Old Testament people who read these lines must have wondered how one martyred by his contemporaries (v. 8) could enjoy these three benefits, especially the prolonging of ‘his days.’ Like Abraham, who ‘considered that God was able even to raise him from the dead’ (Heb. 11:19), they might have considered just that possibility. Any Jew of Jesus’ time and for long before would have been prepared for the full New Testament revelation of the resurrection of the dead. I have discussed these verses in Isaiah at length elsewhere.⁴¹

Two passages in Hosea help lay a foundation for the doctrine of resurrection as found in Jewish expectation in Jesus’ time, as well as among the inter-testamental saints and their literature (Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha). Hosea, who prophesied in the northern kingdom, was contemporary with Isaiah, addressed the southern kingdom shortly before and after the turn of the eighth to seventh centuries bc. For present purposes we may be brief. Scholars no less than lay readers find Hosea’s oracles difficult to relate either to historical or literary context and his Hebrew is extremely difficult, due to lack of grammatical connections. Yet what he has to say about resurrection is important as background to Jewish expectations of Jesus’ time and the New Testament doctrine.

Hosea 6:1–3 quotes some unidentified person, perhaps the prophet or some group of Israelites, expressing perhaps sincere repentance, perhaps presumptuousness:

Come, let us return to the Lord; for he has torn, that he may heal us; he has stricken, and he will bind us up ... that we may live before him. Let us know, let us press on to know the Lord; his going forth is sure as the dawn; he will come to us as the showers, as the spring rains that water the earth (rsv).

The ‘spring rain’ and ‘the showers’ are of course associated with the revival (apparent restoration to life) of nature after winter. The verbs unambiguously assert resurrection, being the same as was used in Isaiah 26:14 and 19 and Daniel 12:2. Yet the revivals, living before God, are national, not personal. The northern kingdom was being threatened with an extinction which soon came. Someone (perhaps a pious remnant) hopes that beyond the extinction there will be a restoration, as the prophet had graphically predicted earlier (probably) in chapters 2 and 3. Though details of the three verses invite technical comment, the value of the passage is plain for present purposes. The Hebrews of the eighth century BC were already acquainted with the idea of physical resurrection and had language to express it.⁴²

Hosea 13:14—‘Shall I ransom them from the power of Sheol? Shall I redeem them from Death? O Death, where are your plagues? O Sheol, where is your destruction?’ (rsv).

On this reading in context the questions imply that the Lord ‘expresses despair over an unrepentant people who refuse to allow him to spare them the pains of exile.’⁴³ Death and Sheol are invited to come to destroy Ephraim (northern kingdom of Israel). But the Hebrew question mark (letter h) is not present. So a ‘jussive’ (I would) or indicative mood (I will) is more likely (as in kjv, asv, niv). The kjv language, which renders the Hebrew well, is partly reflected in 1 Corinthians 15:54, 55, where Paul employs it for the climax of a chapter on the resurrection of the body. The kjv reads, ‘I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction.’

In any case, whether threat or promise, the passage (from God's mouth, so to speak) 'demonstrates that death is Yahweh's servant and that resurrection is therefore not impossible.'⁴⁴

Ezekiel 37, a prophecy of restoration of dry bones to life, in a valley of dry bones, is a prediction purely of national restoration, though the notion of physical resurrection is the vehicle of expression. This again demonstrates the presence of the idea among sixth-century Jews.

Daniel 12:2, 3 (and 13) specifically predicts a limited future resurrection of the righteous (and possibly of the unrighteous) in unambiguous language. I reserve treatment for a later connection.

I think the Old Testament itself has demonstrated for us that though some of the modes of expressing resurrection from the dead may have been derived from the Near East culture of the time, the idea of resurrection of the flesh was contra-mythical in Israel, and that the idea arose from their revealed faith. It is a unique feature of biblical religion in details as we shall develop them in following pages.

The New Testament Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead

Resurrection of the Essence of Christianity

Though the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of the righteous dead are not mentioned on every page of the New Testament, the Christian Testament and the religion of the same would be pointless without them.

J. E. Fison, an unusually outspoken Anglican prelate, put the case this way.

The distinctive biblical perspective is focused on no continuance of a psychological something within us, called the soul, but rather on the incomprehensible miracle which affects the whole of us. Resurrection and not immortality is the Christian faith here and now and the Christian hope hereafter. From the beginning of creation to the end of time the Christian faith is a materialistic faith. The eschatological focus of Christian thinking as well as the eucharistic focus of Christian worship is not upon an immaterial state of being or upon some spiritual experience but upon a meeting of embodied man, with embodied God and with embodied fellow men and even with embodied nature. Out of the final meeting will come a transformation affecting not only men but nations [Isa. 11:1-9; Rom. 8:18 ff.]. There is no hint of pie in the sky when you die; there is no strategic withdrawal from the body and from the world. On the contrary, in and through the embodied meeting [the resurrection day] is offered the hope of the transformation of the human body and of the material world.⁴⁵

This is orthodox affirmation a pole apart from the liberalism and neo-orthodoxy of Fison's day when—as Brunner was asserting—'resurrection is mere personal survival.' Fison's vigorous, if reserved, prose is exceeded in force by the Apostle's fierce rebuttal of denial of eschatological re-embodiment, not only of Christ but of believers in particular and of all mankind in general.

It is uncertain whom Paul had in mind when he wrote, 'Now if Christ is proclaimed as raised from the dead, how can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?' (1 Cor. 15:12). Were they former Sadducees and now members of the congregation at Corinth? Former heathen Epicureans who did not leave their peculiar denial of the worth of the flesh behind? Former ascetical Essenes or denizens of Qumran? Was it nascent Gnosticism? Or just some philosophically inclined believers, lately come over from the Stoa or Academy at Athens? Whoever they were, the consequences of the denial had to be addressed, as Paul proceeded to do in 1 Corinthians 15.

A. Paul characterizes their objection as a denial of resurrection of the dead in principle. (1) In such a case the gospel Paul ‘preached’ (v. 12 kjv) is false, and (2) Christ did not rise from the dead (v. 13). (3) In consequence of such a denial of Christ’s resurrection the Corinthians’ faith in Christ is vain (kenos, empty) (v. 14) and (4) Paul and his fellow missionaries, Apollos, Silas, Timothy, Peter, Priscilla and Aquila, are misrepresenting God and are false witnesses (v. 15).

B. As further consequence of the logical subversion of Christ’s resurrection (vv. 14, 17) not only is ‘your faith ... futile (Gr. mataia, groundless, fallacious) but your sins are still unforgiven by God (v. 17) and the believers who had already died have ‘perished,’ never to be met again at the future return of Christ (v. 18; see vv. 51–55).

C. Such a ‘this-life-only’ outlook only increases the misery of the professed Christians who adopt it: ‘If in this life only we have hoped in Christ, we are of all people most to be pitied [most miserable, kjv]’ (v. 19). Yet there are moments and sometimes long periods of doubt and spiritual depression, when just such a paragraph as this, even for some great saints, is helpful to turn our thoughts away from self to Christ, who said ‘Because I live, you also will live’ (John 14:19).

Resurrection in the Life and Teachings of Jesus

Jesus performed several ‘resurrections’ in the sense of resuscitations, among many other miracles of His power and ‘authority on earth to forgive sins’ (Matt. 9:6). He called attention to this miracle in response to John’s question about His Messiahship (Matt. 11:5). It was His own resurrection in a deathless body, however, that He set forth as a ‘sign’ (John 2:19–20; Matt. 12:32–40). And during His ministry Jesus confirmed His power and authority as ‘the one who is to come’ (Matt. 11:3), i.e. the promised Messiah, by raising the dead (Matt. 11:5), among whom were a certain widow’s son (Luke 7:12–15), Jairus’ daughter (Luke 8:41, 42, 49–56), and, famously, Lazarus of Bethany (John 11:41–44). These were restorations of natural life, not eschatological resurrection and transformation, of which Jesus’ own resurrection was to be the very first, ‘the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep’ (1 Cor. 15:20 rsv).

Though Jesus assured us, ‘Because I live, you also will live’ (John 14:19), He did not provide many details or any theological construct as to the nature of the resurrection body, its characteristics and powers. We must turn to the entire New Testament for that.

Specific Reference of ‘Resurrection’ Is to the Human Body

When redemption is the subject of Scripture teaching, it is the whole of man which is redeemed—body and soul. Body as well as soul are redeemed (Rom. 8:23), but the word ‘resurrection’ is always, without exception, of the body, never the soul. Jesus did speak of regeneration as the dead hearing the voice of the Son of God and living (John 5:25), and a bit later of a certain parallel with resurrection of ‘all that are in the graves,’ but for good reason He did not call regeneration a resurrection. As J. A. Schep says, orthodox Jews of Jesus’ time believed strongly in the resurrection of the body of flesh... Consequently, when Jesus spoke of resurrection and the apostles taught the resurrection of the body, there was no sense in emphasizing the fact the resurrection-body would consist of flesh.⁴⁶

According to Jesus ‘all who are in the tombs’ on the last day ‘will hear his voice and come out’ either to ‘the resurrection of life’ or ‘the resurrection of judgment’ (John 5:28, 29). For the saved, the resurrection will be in a changed and glorious body (Phil. 3:2; 1 Cor. 15:49). We are told nothing of the nature of the bodies of those raised for judgment (John 5:29), who ‘did not come to life until the thousand years were ended’ (Rev. 20:5).

Hence from here on our discussion will relate almost entirely to the resurrection of the saved. The resurrection of Jesus Himself was of ‘the temple of his body’ (John 2:19–22) and His resurrection is to be the pattern of ours, ‘like his glorious body’ (Phil. 3:21), for, ‘we know that when he appears we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is’ (1 John 3:2). Therefore both ancient and modern evangelical (Protestant) creeds say that in the same body in which Jesus suffered and died He arose and is going to come again. It therefore is with resurrected bodies, as such, that resurrection is concerned.⁴⁷

The Extent of the Resurrection

The Old Testament speaks clearly and unmistakably of physical resurrection of the dead in only two passages, Isaiah 26:19 and Daniel 12:2. The latter is in an eschatological setting of tribulation (v. 1) and eternal rewards (v. 3). English translations usually seem to teach a general resurrection of both righteous and wicked dead, but neither the Hebrew text nor the commentators agree that resurrection of the wicked is contemplated in Daniel 12:2. My own opinion, which I have defended in several earlier works, is that Daniel’s informer is speaking only of the resurrection of ‘many’ righteous, probably Israelites, at a remote future time.⁴⁸ We earlier called attention to expressions of Jewish belief in a future resurrection, but less than clear revelation of resurrection in the Old Testament.

References to future physical resurrection in Jewish inter-testamental literature (mostly of martyrs or of righteous only) do not speak with such authority as to require discussion here.

The New Testament, as seen earlier, promises physical resurrection of both the righteous and unrighteous (Acts 24:15; John 5:29; Rev. 20:12). We pursue the subject further in the next chapter.

¹ J. A. Schep, ‘Resurrection’ in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975), p. 74.

² Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, Vol. i., trans. Geoffrey W. Bromily (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991), p. 331. For similar affirmations see pages 442, 314ff., 306ff., 264–265.

³ Augustine’s second sermon on Psalm 89. See The Catholic Encyclopedia Vol. xii, p. 794.

⁴ Emil Brunner, Eternal Hope, trans. Harold Knight (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1954), p. 143.

⁵ ibid., p. 142.

⁶ ibid., p. 144.

⁷ ibid., p. 144.

⁸ ibid., p. 148.

⁹ ibid., p. 149.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 149.

¹¹ Tertullian's 'Masterpiece,' De resurrectione, early 3rd century.

¹² J. Danielou, The Origins of Latin Christianity (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1997), p. 395.

¹³ See, e.g. Murray Harris, Raised Immortal (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985), pp. 44, 53–58; From Grave to Glory (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990), pp. 351, 376, 390–392, 404, 405, 423; with reference to the believers' resurrection, Raised Immortal, pp. 44, 123, 124, 126, 127. For further reaction to Harris's view see Norman Geisler, The Battle for the Resurrection (Nashville: Thos. Nelson, 1989); Robert Culver, A Wakeup Call (Clayton, CA: Witness, Inc., 1993).

¹⁴ More about this later.

¹⁵ See, e.g. Rev. 20:4, 'and they came to life and reigned.'

¹⁶ Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People, Second Div., Vol. ii, pp. 130–137.

¹⁷ R. H. Charles, Eschatology: The Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, Judaism and Christianity (New York: Schocken Books, 1963), p. 358.

¹⁸ ibid., p. 130.

Strack and Billerbeck Kommentar Zum Neuen Testament Aus Talmud und Midrasch, 6 volumes, Herman L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck

¹⁹ 'Allgemeine oder teilweise Auferstehung der Toten' (General or Partial Resurrection of the Dead).

²⁰ Strack & Billerbeck, Vol. iv. 2., p. 1166.

²¹ John B. Noss, Man's Religion, 3rd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 5th printing, 1974), p. 343.

²² Robert Martin-Achard, From Death to Life (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1960), p. 195.

²³ F. D. D. ...

²³ E. K. Bernard, 'Resurrection' in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. IV, p. 232.

²⁴ Israel, Vol. iii–iv, 1926, p. 442.

²⁵ Martin-Achard, ibid., p. 208.

²⁶ Genesis 12:1–3; 15:1–21; 17:1–21 and ff.; 18:1–15; 22:11–18; 27:27–29; 28:1–11; 31:3; 32:24–29; 46:1–4; 48:15–49:27.

²⁷ Augustine in NPNF, Vol. viii, 2nd Series, p. 430.

²⁸ Murray Harris, From Grave to Glory (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), p. 49.

²⁹ Gerhard Von Rad, Old Testament Theology, Vol. i, trans. D. M. G. Slatker (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1962, 1965), pp. 415, 416.

³⁰ Coming to the Old Testament as we do from the brilliant light of the New Testament on the resurrection from the dead we wonder why the Old Testament in general and the prophets in particular say so little about it. Von Rad derives this near silence from 'Jahvism's tendency to destroy myth in all its forms [which] was not abandoned in its understanding of death... This mysterious world is [contrary to the religions of Israel's neighbors] divested of its sacral character' (Von Rad, ibid., p. 350). He shows that Israel did not derive its 'understanding of the world and of man from the surrounding culture. For the Old Testament view was rather one which needed the constant support of Israel's faith to re-establish and maintain it in the face of the temptations offered by an environment where the determining factor was myth' (Von Rad, ibid., p. 351).

³¹ Burton Scott Easton, 'Resurrection' in ISBE iv, p. 2563.

³² Murray Harris, op. cit., p. 66.

³³ Barton Payne, Theology of the Older Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962, 1976), p. 460.

³⁴ Martin-Achard, op. cit., pp. 152, 153.

³⁵ Robert D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1976, 1991), pp. 18–24.

³⁶ Also see 2 Sam. 22:2, 3.

³⁷ Franz Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Psalms, I (3 vols., Edinburgh: Clark, 1871, 1893), p. 93.

³⁸ Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977) or The Earthly Reign of our Lord With His People (available from author, 1998), p. 57 ff.

³⁹ See Culver, ibid., p. 58. See also C. Von Orelli, Prophecies of Isaiah, pp. 142, 143.

⁴⁰ The centrality of the prophecy of Isaiah 52:13–53:12 to New Testament interpretation is demonstrated in this work in connection with ‘Part 4: Christology’, specifically Christ’s death as a substitutionary sacrifice. There are dozens of New Testament references and allusions.

⁴¹ Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory of the Lord’s Righteous Servant (Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock Publ., 2001), pp. 109–114.

⁴² Francis I. Andersen and David N. Freedman, Hosea, The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1980) is excellent on technical data of this verse. Author accepts the data on the future life in Psalms provided by Ugaritic research of Dahood and his disciples.

⁴³ M. Harris, op. cit., p. 65.

⁴⁴ M. Harris, op. cit., p. 66. F. I. Andersen, op. cit., is excellent on technical problems of the verse.

⁴⁵ J. E. Fison, The Christian Hope: The Presence and the Parousia (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1952), p. 50.

⁴⁶ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964), pp. 184, 185.

⁴⁷ We must not enter into the vast field of New Testament criticism and liberal reconstruction of this matter. Schep is a good guide both as to limiting the project to what the canonical texts say and drawing out their meaning. G. C. H. Berkouwer, ‘Resurrection’ in The Return of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 170–210 does the same in brief fashion. The two works by Murray Harris are valuable because they explore the field but should be used with caution: Raised Immortal: Resurrection and Immortality the New Testament (1983) and From Grave to Glory (1990). Dr Harris concludes ‘the believer’s resurrection body will come from heaven, not the grave,’ Raised Immortal, p. 44 and ‘dead persons are raised, not impersonal corpses’ (ibid., p. 133).

⁴⁸ C. F. Keil essentially agrees, Commentary on Daniel, pp. 481, 482 as also S. P. Tregelles, Remarks on the Prophetic Visions in the Book of Daniel, p. 168; Barton Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament, pp. 461, 462. See my Daniel and the Latter Days, rev. ed., 1977, pp. 183–187; also ‘Daniel’ in The Wycliffe Bible Commentary, 1962, p. 798; Histories and Prophecies of Daniel, 1980, pp. 186, 187.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1044). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead (II): Time and Order of the Resurrection of the Dead

At this point in our study of last things a persistent question which arose acutely in the fourth century calls for attention. Jesus said, ‘The hour is coming when all who are in the tombs will hear his voice and come forth, those who have done good, to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment’ (John 5:28, 29 rsv). Most Christian teachers before Augustine (fourth century) were much agreed that the Lord here specified two future times of resurrection for two different groups of people, the earlier for saints (‘those who have done good’) at the parousia (coming), apocalupsis (revelation) and epiphaneia (manifestation) of the Lord Jesus. These are the three most common New Testament words for the ‘come again’ (John 14:3) of Jesus (cf. Acts 1:11). They expected a later resurrection (after a thousand years) of ‘those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment’ (rsv) or ‘damnation’ (kjb). These were held to be the same as ‘a resurrection of both the just and the unjust’ (Acts 24:15).

These Fathers of the church found the view of the future filled out plainly in Revelation 19–20. There Christ comes with the armies of heaven to conquer and incarcerate ‘the beast and the false prophet’ and ‘the dragon’ (Satan). Then follows a scene where enthroned ‘saints’ (cf. 20:4, ‘those to whom the authority to judge was committed’ with 1 Cor. 6:3) and martyrs come to life and reign ‘with Christ for a thousand years’ (Rev. 20:4). The next verses say ‘This is the first resurrection’—seeming to imply a second resurrection—of the unrighteous, for the verse also says, ‘The rest of the dead did not come to life until the thousand years were ended.... Blessed and holy is the one who shares in the first resurrection!’ Another resurrection of ‘the rest of the dead’—the wicked dead, it would seem—is detailed in verses 11–14.

This is a very unsophisticated approach and seems to have prevailed through the first three Christian centuries. During the fourth century persecutions ceased, Christianity prevailed and was becoming not only official but popular. Christian leaders began to doubt their earlier opinion that Rome was the Antichrist to be destroyed before the ‘Second Advent.’ Augustine (354–430) reinterpreted the thousand-year reign of saints as of the present age by deceased saints in heaven, and the ‘first resurrection’ as personal regeneration. Emphasis came to be placed on the ‘hour’ of John 5:28 (‘[the] hour is coming’) as literally a very short time and not two separate eschatological resurrections, but one called ‘the general resurrection’ to be followed by a ‘general judgment.’ The older view was known as ‘chiliasm’ (Gr. thousand-ism), now usually ‘premillennialism,’ the newer view, ‘amillennialism.’ The latter view prevailed in the church until premillennialism was revived somewhat in Reformation times by ‘left wing Protestants’ and then became popular in several modified forms in the nineteenth century.

The development and present forms of millennial interpretations are very complicated. I have presented them in their simplest historic form simply to lay out the background of the question of two eschatological resurrections, and shall now proceed to sketch first the view that there will be two future resurrections, first, of ‘the just,’ and, second, of ‘the unjust.’ After that we shall present the view that there is to be only one resurrection. The reader who is uninitiated to this subject should know that there is immense literature on it, that it is imbedded deeply in certain prevalent systems of evangelical theology, and that these differences cross denominational lines.

The View of Two Future Resurrections

We shall first examine two chief passages which furnish a framework for the doctrine, called ‘historic premillennialism’, then supporting texts, after that linguistic evidences, and finally a summary.

Revelation 19:11–20

Some attention has just now been devoted to these climatic verses.¹ Near the beginning of the book of Revelation, John writes, ‘Behold, he is coming with the clouds, and every eye will see him, every one who pierced him’ (Rev. 1:7 rsv). This counts strongly for a futuristic interpretation of the book of Revelation. On that basis the climax falls at 19:11, where the seer sees heaven opened and forthwith follows the termination of Antichrist’s persecutions of the believers by destruction of the earthly forces of Satan, followed, as we have seen, by a coming to life of saints and martyrs—‘those who have done good’ (Rev. 20:4–6; cf. John 5:29) to a ‘resurrection of life.’ Then after ‘the thousand years are ended’ comes a vision of a judgment scene to which ‘the rest of the dead’ are summoned by resurrection from every conceivable place of disposal of their dead bodies (Rev. 20:11–14).

S. P. Tregelles (1813–1875) is perhaps best known for his work and leadership in preparing a critical list of manuscripts of the Greek New Testament and his translation of the Gesenius Hebrew Lexicon. What is not so well known is his strong exposition and defence of historic premillennialism. He quotes Revelation 20:1–4 and comments:

This is not only a vision, but also an explanation. John is taught what the thrones with certain sitting on them meant. They are the faithful in Christ in general (i.e. the whole family of faith from Abel onward), and one special class, those suffering for the witness of Jesus; and the glory given to them is explained to be the first resurrection. This is in full accordance with ... 1 Cor. 15:23, where the order of the resurrection is taught: ‘Every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward (i.e. next in order), they that are Christ’s at his coming.’²

Premillennarians insist that, granting the presence of much symbolism in Revelation 20 (key, chain and the like), the flow of thought requires a literal series of events. Otherwise we are left to pure subjectivism, i.e. to make the story fit what we bring to it. If we draw our doctrine from the text it teaches two future resurrections—one of the saved at Christ’s coming and another of those who are not His a thousand years later. Some of contrary opinion say the first resurrection is spiritual (i.e., regeneration as in John 5:25, not physical as in John 5:29). Famous comments by a great, devout scholar bear repeating:

As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. If in passages where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain psuchai edzēsan (souls lived) at the first, and the rest of the nechroi edzēsan (dead lived) only at the end of a specified period after the first—if in such a passage the first resurrection may be understood to mean spiritual rising from the grave—then there is an end of all significance of language, and Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to anything.³

1 Corinthians 15:1–28

I cite kjv here, and refer especially to verses 22–24. This is part of the longest continuous treatment of the resurrection of the dead in the Bible.

Let us see how Paul’s discourse on resurrection leads up to the matter of resurrection of all the dead.

1. In verses 1–5 Paul states all the elements of the saving ‘gospel’ which ‘I preached’—of which the last is Christ, who died and was buried, ‘rose again the third day.’
2. ‘[H]e was seen of Cephas, then [eita, after that] of the twelve’ (v. 5).
3. ‘After that [epeita, it interchanges with eita in Greek] he was seen of above five hundred’ (v. 6).
4. ‘After that [epeita], he was seen of James; then [eita] of all the apostles’ (v. 7).
5. ‘And last of all he was seen of me also.’ In verses 8–11 the Apostle declares how he saw the risen Christ and explains the meaning of the event.

It is easy to see that eita and its enlarged form epeita are interchangeable and mean ‘after that’ with reference to succession of events and passage of time, not ‘at the same time’ or ‘immediately after.’ The ‘five hundred’ of verse 6, for example, saw the risen Christ several weeks after the Twelve (v. 5) saw Him. The length of time designated by eita or epeita will depend on what series is being described. Events in atomic fission occur quickly ‘after that,’ but in growing a seed into a crop of wheat, weeks are involved.⁴ (See Mark 4:26–29, ‘first the blade, then [eiten = eita] the ear, after that [eiten] the full corn in the ear.’)

6. Paul proceeds to set forth the absolute essentiality of Christ’s resurrection to Christianity (vv. 12–19). We treated these verses earlier. From this point onward Paul assumes the resurrection of Christ really took place. In verses 20–28 he explains that not all dead men will rise at the same time—even though ‘all that are in the graves,’ as Jesus said, shall in a future ‘hour’ come forth at the sound of the ‘voice’ of ‘the Son of man’ (John 5:27–29). Paul reveals that there are three stages in the resurrection process, one already complete (of ‘Christ the firstfruits’) followed by two more in the future. Let us trace his thought.

i. Christ ‘[became] the firstfruits of them that slept’ (v. 20). ‘[S]lept’ is a euphemism for death and burial in a sleep-like posture. Paul is asking us to think in terms of order of events. No one ever before Jesus arose from the dead in a living glorified ‘eschatological’ body. So He was aparchē, ‘from-beginning,’ the first one. Others are to follow.

ii. Man (Adam) brought death and Man (Christ) brought resurrection (v. 21).

iii. ‘For as in Adam all [the whole race of mankind] die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive’ (v. 22). The subject of the whole of our race continues. Most commentators agree that in this passage ‘in Christ’ includes the human race as a whole. The phrase does not designate believers only (as so often in Ephesians and elsewhere). It is defined by the parallel with ‘in Adam’ as in Romans 5:9 ff. The entire human race is in Adam.

iv. ‘But everyman in his own order [tagma]’ (v. 23). All sources agree that the word tagma does not mean position in a series, as in ranking honors students who are placed first, second, third and so on in their class. Rather a whole group, cohort, body, collection of people is designated. There are three such groups in the resurrection, as appears: Christ the firstfruits, they that are Christ’s and the end group.

‘Christ the firstfruits,’ is the first rank, a group of one only. ‘[A]fterward [epeita, not ‘at same time,’ but after an interval] they that are Christ’s at his coming.’ This is the resurrection of a second tagma or group or rank, those who are Christ’s—everyone from our first parents on to the last saint to die before Jesus’ return. In 1 Thessalonians 4:15 ‘the coming’ (tēn parousian), parousia meaning ‘coming,’ refers to the time of resurrection and to the translation of the saved (‘rapture’) and the judgment of the Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:8). Both of these events occur at the parousia, which takes us directly to Revelation 19:16–21 (the destruction of ‘the beast’ and ‘the false prophet,’ evidently followed by (or co-ordinate with) the ‘first resurrection’ of Revelation 20:1–5.

v. ‘Then [eita, afterwards] cometh the end’ (v. 24). After the resurrection of ‘Christ’s’ people a third tagma (rank) will be raised from the dead. Taking Revelation 20 as guide, this will be the wicked dead who face the judgment of the great white throne ‘[after] the thousand years are expired (Rev. 20:7, 11). If this is not the case then Paul seemed to promise a resurrection schedule for every ‘man’ in 1 Corinthians 15:22, 23, but left out the wicked dead in his schedule. Admittedly it is possible that he left them out for some reason. If so Revelation 20 includes them in the schedule.

These are the chief passages of Scripture on which contemporary advocates of two future resurrections rest their view.

Supporting Texts for Two Future Resurrections

The clearest Old Testament text teaching a doctrine of resurrection of the dead is Daniel 12:1–2, which reads:

And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince who standeth for the children of thy people [Daniel’s people, Israel]; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book (Dan. 12:1 asv).

Commentators almost unanimously agree that this is eschatological, describing the great tribulation of the Last Days, and most agree that it relates primarily to Israel, presumed to exist as a national entity. The passage goes on to make the first clear reference to a partial resurrection of the dead, of the righteous only: ‘And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt’ (Dan. 12:2 asv).

S. P. Tregelles asks, ‘If language of this verse be not declaratory of a resurrection of the dead, actual and literal, is there any passage of Scripture at all which speaks of such a thing as a resurrection?’⁵ To what resurrection does it refer? It takes place at or near the time of the great tribulation and of deliverance of the nation of Israel. Who are included? ‘Many, not all,’ C. F. Keil insisted, quite against what he as an amillennialist might have wished ‘all [is] a meaning, rabbim (many) cannot have.’⁶ Further, says this great scholar, the word min must mean some, not all the ‘sleepers’ in the dust, that ‘the angel has it not in view to give a general statement regarding the resurrection of the dead.’⁷

So it is not only premillennarians who regard Daniel 12:2 as teaching a future resurrection which includes saints only. This lends support to the above interpretation of 1 Corinthians 15 and Revelation 20 as teaching two future resurrections. I quote from an earlier work of mine which is part of a five-page discussion of Daniel 12:1, 2:

The Hebrew of the passage permits and, according to many of the best authorities, demands a translation favoring this view. The translation, brought to the attention of the English reading public by Tregelles⁸ and advocated before him by Jewish commentators Saadia Haggon (10th century) and Aben Ezra (12th century) ... as given by Tregelles, it is: ‘And many from among sleepers of the dust shall awake; these shall be unto everlasting life; but those the rest of the sleepers, those who do not awake at this time, shall be unto shame and everlasting contempt.’⁹

It should be admitted by advocates of the two future resurrections view that supporting ‘proof’ is absent, but there are certain specific expressions which seem to favor the view. The ones usually cited are ‘a better resurrection’ (Heb. 11:35), ‘the resurrection of the just’ (Luke 14:14). There are also passages which seem to separate a resurrection of the righteous from a resurrection of the unrighteous, as in John 5:28, 29 (esv): ‘for an hour is coming when all who are in the tombs, will hear his [Son of Man’s] voice and come out, those who have done good to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of judgment.’ This passage seems to speak of two resurrections but it may also be construed to refer to two results of one. If two, then the ‘hour’ must be understood as indicating simply a long period of time. It proves nothing either way. Like Hebrews 11:35 and Luke 14:14 (cited above) 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 describes a resurrection of saints only and locates it in time at the Second Advent. If there is to be a general resurrection of all at one time why no mention of a resurrection of the ‘unjust’ in these important passages? There is no evidence of being raised for a discriminating or penal judgment there. The souls of those who have gone ‘to be with Christ’ come ‘with him’ to rejoin their freshly resurrected bodies. There is no evidence of a resurrection of the unsaved here at all, however one accounts for it.

Linguistic Evidence for Two Future Resurrections

Paul refers to his own future resurrection in a peculiar way as attaining unto ‘the resurrection of the dead’ (Phil. 3:11). A rare Greek word for ‘resurrection’ appears only here in the New Testament—exanastasis, literally, ‘the-out-from-resurrection.’ ‘Of the dead’ translates ek nekrou ‘out from dead.’ The best Greek texts are clear. Paul is contemplating not a resurrection ‘of’ the dead, but an out-resurrection ‘from among the dead’ (see Alford and Meyer in loco).

Whenever the New Testament reports or claims a resurrection ‘from the dead’ (not ‘from death’) the usual expression is ‘risen from the dead’ (Gr. ek nekrou; the first occurrence relates to, the supposed resurrection of John the Baptist in Matt. 14:2). In such case John would rise from among the many dead who did not also rise. It is not from death (thanatos) but ‘out from among dead people.’ Ek nekrōn is usual for the resurrection of Jesus—‘out from among the dead’ (Matt. 17:9). But when the possibility of resurrection in general is contemplated and the Sadducean denial of the same—‘touching the resurrection of the dead’—the Greek does not supply ek, out of, tou nekrōn. The words mean ‘of the dead,’ not ‘out from the dead.’ Throughout the New Testament the future resurrection of the righteous is designated as an ek nekrou resurrection, ‘out from the dead ones.’ In 1 Corinthians 15:12 the resurrection of Christ is ek nekrōn, ‘out-resurrection,’ but resurrection as a general event is anastasis nekrōn, ‘resurrection of dead ones.’

To summarize: premillennialists affirm ‘the teachings of two resurrections is a clear assertion of Scripture and the teaching of a single resurrection must pass over several important passages.’¹⁰ If, as almost all agree, the resurrection at the end of the millennium (Rev. 20:4–15) is literal, so is the first. ‘Two literal bodily resurrections are demanded.’¹¹ Other passages throughout the New Testament suggest or presuppose a first resurrection unto life and a second to damnation (John 5:29). Jesus spoke of ‘the resurrection of the just’ (Luke 14:14) and in Luke 20:35 of a resurrection ‘from among dead ones’ as a goal for believers—not a general resurrection of all.

Paul as a Pharisee believed in a future resurrection of the dead (Acts 23:6), but he personally hoped to attain to a special resurrection of the righteous, which he carefully designated tēn exanastasin tēn ek nekrōn, the out-resurrection from among the dead ones (Phil. 3:11). At His coming they that are Christ’s shall rise from the dead (1 Cor. 15:23) and afterward at ‘the end’ of a time unspecified (by Paul), the rest of the dead ‘shall rise,’ as Revelation 20 teaches. This view claims to rest its case on explicit affirmation of Scripture, not on any manipulation of texts.¹²

The View of One Future Resurrection

Another way of designating the one future resurrection view is amillennialism—i.e. denial of any long period (the thousand years of Rev. 20) between a first resurrection of the just and a second of the unjust. In the course of writing and lecturing on this matter over a good many years I have encountered a very large amount of amillennial (and postmillennial) theological and exegetical literature denying two resurrections and affirming one. I have brought much of it up to date in text and notes of The Earthly Reign of our Lord With His People (1998).

Perhaps the fairest, most comprehensive and convincing advocacy of this view was set forth by Geerhardus Vos, Professor of Biblical Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary.¹³ My own brand of premillennialism, or chiliasm, finds much support in evidence Vos brings forth ‘that a hard and fast distinction between a Messianic kingdom and the ultimate kingdom of God cannot be carried through in Paul’.¹⁴ I have argued at length that the cosmic changes described in (for example) Isaiah 65 and 66 and 2 Peter 3:10, 11 introduce the Messianic (or millennial) age rather than conclude it and that the Messianic age is an initial stage of the eternal, not preliminary to it.¹⁵

Postmillennialists of the past such as Daniel Whitby (1638–1726)¹⁶ affirm the Great Commission and other texts as showing that the gospel will continue to work like leaven in the bowl of dough until the whole world professes Christianity and then the second Advent, a general resurrection and a general judgment will take place. In recent times this view has been defended by Lorraine Boettner¹⁷ and J. Marcellus Kik.¹⁸ Contemporarily, articles asserting that it is God's program to win the world for Christ and to establish biblically based civil government everywhere appear regularly in Chalcedon, organ of the Reconstruction Movement,¹⁹ and in its official statement of beliefs. (Faith for All of Life is the new name of this magazine.)

It is acknowledged by most exegetes and theologians that a literal interpretation of Revelation 20 plainly extracts two future resurrections—first, one of the godly and a later one, of the ungodly. A prominent (amillennial) exponent of one general resurrection well wrote:

The most prominent line of cleavage among interpreters is between those who, with due allowance for figures of speech, take the vision literally, and those who consider it a symbol. The former see here a description of events that must come to pass substantially as written, at some future time: The latter understand it to be a symbolical presentation of some spiritual truth, or of events that happened long ago.²⁰

In modern times those who take the one-resurrection view are either postmillennialists or amillennialists—to employ the theological jargon.

Postmillennialism is that view of the last things which holds that the kingdom of God is now being extended in the world through the preaching of the gospel ... that the world eventually is to be Christianized.²¹

Boettner adds that after this takes place the Second Coming will occur, to 'be followed immediately by the general resurrection, the general judgment, i.e. heaven ... hell.'²² First expounded by Daniel Whitby in his orthodox phase, it was popular in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries among all denominations, but in recent times only by a few.²³ The downward moral trends, civil strife, social disintegration and wars of the past century have been unkind to any optimistic view of the course of the future leading up to the Second Advent.²⁴ Almost all other 'orthodox' theology, formal or popular, expects not only an Antichrist and great tribulation near the end of the present age but also apostasy of the church and a fearfully destructive war. More on this later.

Several varieties of theological opinion properly labeled amillennial hold that Revelation 20 describes only one future physical resurrection, not the one described in verses 1–4 but the one presupposed by the judgment scene of verses 11–13, where John 'saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne, and books were opened. Then another book was opened, which is the book of life. And the dead were judged by what was written in the books, according to what they had done' (v. 12).

Amillennial theology, beginning with Augustine, has proposed several explanations of Revelation 19:11–20:15 to do away with any reference to two future physical resurrections. Augustine's thought comes to focus on this point as follows:

So are there two resurrections—the one, the first and spiritual resurrection, which has place in this life, and preserves us from coming into the second death; the other the second, which does not occur now, but in the end of the world, and which by the last judgment shall dismiss some into the second death, others into life which has no death.²⁵

This form of amillennial theology, held through the Middle Ages by the Roman Church, has developed some variations, but consistently remains fixed on Augustine's notion that the resurrection of Revelation 20:1–4 is spiritual, i.e. regeneration of every true believer, and the 'second' resurrection is one of all, both good and evil, for a general judgment. For Augustine the 'reign' of saints is in the church on earth today.

Most contemporary evangelical, Protestant, amillennial scholars adopt Augustine's essential view of resurrection but think that the 'reign' of saints is in heaven 'with Christ.' Some Roman theologians now agree. The influential mid-twentieth century works by W. Hendriksen, O. T. Allis, G. L. Murray and Floyd Hamilton employed a 'recapitulation' or 'parallelistic' interpretation of the Apocalypse (book of Revelation).²⁶ In this view, for a seventh (and last) time the book of Revelation in chapters 20–22 goes over the course of the present age onward to the consummation. Anthony Hoekema, following Hendricksen, says:

Chapters 20–22 comprise this last of the seven sections of the book of Revelation and therefore do not describe what follows the return of Christ. Rather, Revelation 20:1 takes us back again to the beginning of the New Testament era.²⁷

Hoekema interprets the verse, 'they lived [or came to life] and reigned with Christ a thousand years' (Rev. 20:4), not as regeneration of believers (as many amillennialists do) but simply a way of describing the joy of dead saints (at present disembodied souls) now 'living and reigning with Christ in heaven.'

At least four other modern amillennial theories have appeared, with varieties of each, but the theory that most of the book of Revelation has already been fulfilled, and that the thousand years are the present age, has growing support today. This is called a preterist or 'Realized Millennium' view. There are many varieties of this view. A very competent report and evaluation of these theories of the millennium and attending events is chapter 4, 'The Fourth Last Thing' in David J. MacLeod's The Seven Last Things. He brings the discussion up to date.²⁸

The Body of the Resurrection

The previous discussion has shown that God intends to bring about the resurrection of all human dead—whether at one time or two (or several, as one form of premillennialism holds). The wicked dead, however, are raised only to be judged, each as a complete man, body and soul, and then to experience a 'second death,' presumably physical, for they will not be restored to spiritual life. In their resurrection they will still be spiritually 'dead in trespasses and sins.' Perhaps for this reason Scripture says nothing of the nature of their resurrection bodies. Therefore all that follows immediately here relates to those who participate in what may be called the resurrection of the just unto life everlasting.

The Bible tells us little about the intermediate state and few concrete details of the eternal states of heaven and hell. Because our Lord became a resurrected man and for forty days visited with and enlightened the apostolic agents of New Testament revelation, we know much more of the nature of the body of the resurrection. Further, a large part of 1 Corinthians 15 is devoted especially to the nature of the resurrection body. These sources and other biblical data enable us to know certainly two facts: (1) the body of the resurrection is to be a body of flesh, the same flesh laid in the grave; and (2) the flesh-body of the resurrection shall be changed in certain specified ways. We shall address these matters and follow with acknowledgment of some variations of understanding of the above and respond to some denials of the resurrection of our bodies of flesh.

I. The Very Same Flesh-body Laid in the Grave

The body of the resurrection is to be the very same flesh-body laid in the grave. This is the way the first Christians understood the Scriptures. Irenaeus (ad 120–202) in the first extensive, Christian, apologetical treatise, explains that among the universally held beliefs of Christians ‘dispersed throughout the whole world ... received from apostles and their disciples was faith in the resurrection from the dead, and the ascension into heaven in the flesh of the beloved Jesus Christ’ and His coming again ‘to raise up anew all flesh of the whole human race.’²⁹ The twelfth article of the earliest well-known creed, The Old Roman Creed, forerunner of The Apostles’ Creed, affirms, ‘The resurrection of the flesh.’³⁰ Though in most minds (quite correctly) body and flesh mean about the same, even in ancient times there were, as today, false teachers who affirmed the body of the risen Christ was spirit, not flesh, in substance, hence the credal insistence on ‘resurrection of the flesh’ of Christ as pattern of our resurrection bodies.

The Apostles’ Creed as recited today sometimes reads ‘the resurrection of the body.’ It seems this appeared for the first time in certain liturgies in 1552 (documented by J. A. Schep).³¹ J. N. D. Kelly showed that the phrase ‘resurrection of the flesh’ occurred in liturgies and creeds around all the Roman world at the end of the second century, as cited by Schep. He informs us that ‘the entire early Church, in the West and in the East alike, publicly confessed belief in the resurrection of the flesh.’³² He adds that this prevailed almost without exception through Reformation times.³³

Just as Jesus’ resurrection was an historical event in the world of space and time ‘on the third day’ so ours will be in a coming ‘last day’ or ‘hour.’ Norman L. Geisler writes, ‘Regardless of the supernatural nature of the event, the resurrection of Jesus was [as ours shall be] as much a part of history as was His incarnation before His death.’³⁴

Biblical evidence for the correctness of this view and for the value of its perpetuation is of several sorts.

1. The believer’s resurrection body will be like the resurrection body of Christ in every respect. Jesus took extreme measures to demonstrate beyond cavil or doubt that His was a body of ‘flesh and bone.’ That He omitted mention of blood does not mean for certain that it was absent from the hands and side exposed to Thomas or the lips and tongue which masticated the food at Emmaus and the lakeside.³⁵

According to Philippians 3:20, 21 ‘we await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself’ (rsv). The same is stated as ground of cheerful hope for God’s children now: ‘[and] it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is’ (1 John 3:2 rsv). It is hard to quarrel with the evident relevance of these passages to the resurrection body. Second Corinthians 3:18 seems relevant too, though not all agree: ‘And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another’ (rsv). Interpretations which would make this a physical change going on now must be rejected as foreign to the Bible. Granting that a moral and spiritual growth in Christlikeness is described, is that all? Is there an ‘eschatological element’? It is suggested the ‘to another’ refers to the honor (or splendor, Gr. endoxos) of the believers’ resurrection bodies, in this context, a form of Christlikeness.³⁶ In the context of 1 Corinthians 15:35–50—all about ‘how’ and ‘what kind of body’ in the resurrection—there seems surely to be a reference to the resemblance of our resurrection bodies to Christ’s body in verse 49: ‘Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven.’ Though there is apparent reference to the whole range of one’s life, the context (as many observe) requires reference also to the believer’s resurrection body.

2. It is implied by the biblical doctrine of mankind, that our whole being was created ‘very good’; that the body of man was fashioned from earth, likewise good; that redemption of man involves advancement to immortality of body as well as soul. To be normal again as social creatures among other social creatures, to work and serve God day and night, requires the resurrection of a useable body adapted to the soul with which it was concreated.

3. There really is no other way in the New Testament context, without twisting the meaning of language, to interpret the primary statements. It is true to say that neither Jesus nor the Apostles, in so many words, declared ‘the resurrection body will be composed of human flesh.’ They did not need to. Orthodox Jews of the time, as scholars versed in rabbinical apocryphal and apocalyptic literature acknowledge, firmly believed in the resurrection of the flesh. How else would the Jews of the time have understood Isaiah 26:19, ‘Thy dead shall live, their bodies shall rise’ (rsv) or Daniel 12:1–3? This was the doctrine rejected by the heterodox Sadducees. All Paul’s hate-filled Jewish hearers, both Sadducees and Pharisees, understood well (Acts 23:6) when he claimed to be on trial ‘with respect to the hope in the resurrection of the dead’ (see also Acts 24:15). So we must understand Jesus’ own comments on the subject. Why talk about coming out of tombs if not in the bodies deposited there (John 5:28, 29), as Mary’s hope and Lazarus’ ‘come forth’ demonstrate (John 11:24, 43, 44 kjv).

4. It was for the Jews of Jesus’ time, as for us today, a legitimate inference from the translation of Enoch and Elijah. These two events are described at Genesis 5:22–23 and 2 Kings 2:1–18. Both these gentlemen were taken to heaven—as the natural sense of Genesis 5:24 (cf. Heb. 11:5) reads and 2 Kings 2:11 specifically states. Their flesh, blood and bones went to heaven—with what modifications we do not know. Not only did Jesus ascend in a body of ‘flesh and bones’ (Acts 1:9; Luke 24:39) but as ‘this same Jesus,’ He ‘shall so come [again] in like manner’ (Acts 1:11 kjv).³⁷

5. Resurrection of the fleshly body is anticipated in the prophecies of the Messianic kingdom in both Testaments. In an outstanding apocalyptic vision of the messianic age, Isaiah 25:8 proclaims that the Lord of hosts ‘will swallow up death [emphasis added] for ever, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces, and the reproach of his people he will take away from all the earth; for the Lord has spoken’ (rsv). Further on in Isaiah’s apocalyptic vision of the future of Israel and the world in times of Messiah and just before proclamation of a final burst of divine wrath (Isa. 26:19–21) the prophet announces to Israel's elect saints: 'Thy dead shall live, their bodies shall rise. O dwellers in the dust, awake and sing for joy!' (rsv) Many scholars, even those who expect no future millennial reign and restoration of a converted nation of Israel, agree with this explanation of the passage.³⁸ These prophecies were addressed to the faithful remnant of Israel in Isaiah's time. He is saying that these dear folk, many of them martyrs, perhaps including the prophet himself, would in and through resurrection participate in the earthly glory and blessing of the Messianic age, merging into an eternal state (see Isa. 65, 66). Paul rightly quoted these verses to explain his own revealed doctrine of resurrection of the body of flesh. Says Schep:

Paul is correct, therefore, when he writes that the saying of Isaiah 25:8 will come to pass when those who died in Christ are raised imperishable, and when believers who are alive when Jesus returns are changed to glory and immortality (1 Cor. 15:54). 'The veil of mourning' (v. 7) 'spread over the nation' is of course in context grief over deaths of loved ones (See 2 Sam. 15:30; Jer. 14:1-4; Esther 6:12; Eccles. 12:8; Amos 5:16).... Understood this way as a prophecy within the framework of a moving description of the eschatological feast that the Lord will 'make unto all people' (v. 6), verse 8 ... [it describes] the great deliverance from death and its consequences, as Yahweh will grant it to his people all over the world.³⁹

In 1983 Murray J. Harris asserted, 'The identity between the physical and spiritual bodies can scarcely be material or substantial or physical unless we believe Paul and the early Christians took over without modification a crassly materialistic view of resurrection...'⁴⁰ He proposed that the 'identity of the resurrection body with the natural' is 'personal' only. 'There are two dwellings but only one occupant.'⁴¹ In a later book (From Grave to Glory) he stated, 'From this standpoint the new body is qualitatively and numerically distinct from the old body.'⁴² Along with numerous statements of this sort these large books also contain many orthodox sounding statements. To enter into extended debate on paper with these two books would take us far afield. They seem to have persuaded few of the apparent inconsistencies of outlook.

Wherein the identity of the natural body with the resurrection body lies is hard to establish. I shall remark briefly on the matter later, but the Scriptures are clear that the identity is in the body itself not in the 'person,' as Harris has it, who occupies the body.

II. The Saints' Resurrection Bodies Will Be Changed

In a manner similar to the change in our Lord's resurrection body, the saints' resurrection bodies will be changed.⁴³ The most relevant Scripture is Philippians 3:21, 'who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body,' in the context of 1 Corinthians 15:51, 52: 'Lo! I tell you a mystery. We shall not all sleep [in death], but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. For the trumpet will sound, and the dead will be raised imperishable, and we shall be changed' (rsv). The operative words obviously are change and changed.

In Philippians 3:21 Paul simply affirms what we have seen already in several texts—that the resurrection bodies of saints will be like Christ's resurrection body and that this obviously will require some changes. He explains elsewhere that this will be the case both for deceased saints at the parousia and those living at the time. Further, Paul seems to imply no difference in the human body of the incarnate (enfleshed) Son of God in heaven today from that body during the ‘forty days’ when He was ‘appearing to them.’ Who can say how this fits with the manifest deity of the appearance of the glorified Christ when He first made Himself known to Saul of Tarsus (Acts 9:1–9) and when He appeared to John on Patmos (Rev. 1–3)? His body, even before death and resurrection, made some temporary changes for, ‘as he was praying, the appearance of his face was altered, and his clothing became dazzling white’ and presumably likewise so did ‘Moses and Elijah’ who ‘appeared in glory’ with Him (Luke 9:29–31).

The whole matter is explained (as fully as in our present state we mortals can know) by the Apostle Paul in response to two questions by a ‘foolish person’: ‘How are the dead raised? With what kind of body do they come?’ (1 Cor. 15:35; cf. v. 36). One derives the impression that Paul was more than a little disgusted with the questions. Why otherwise would he call the questioner a fool (v. 36)? He seems to think he is explaining the obvious. Jesus was known to scold His disciples for inattention, stupidity and poor memory (Mark 8:11–21; Matt. 16:1–12). Once He called their incredulity ‘hardness of heart,’ and ‘upbraided’ them for it. I shall therefore enter into no minute exegesis of this passage. Paul intended to use language plain enough for anyone who wants to know what he meant. Cultural distance from the world of Paul and ancient Corinth poses no serious obstacle.

In verses 36–38 there is an assumed parallel between planting a seed in soil and placing a dead human body in the grave. Each kind of seed appears to rot in the soil. There is also an assumed parallel between the plant that grows from the rotting seed and the body which shall come forth from the grave at the resurrection. In each case with seeds ‘God gives it a body as he [God] has chosen, and to each kind of seed its own body’ (v. 38). There are as many kinds of bodies as there are kinds of seeds.

In verse 39 he expatiates on the varieties of flesh which compose bodies—of men, of animals, of birds, of fish. Then he makes the non-technical observation that just as among the various earthly (terrestrial) bodies each has an excellence (glory) peculiar to itself, so likewise have the ones in the skies above (celestial)—sun, moon and stars. Further, the earthly ones as a group differ from the ones in the sky as a group (vv. 40, 41).

Then returning to the seed-plant metaphor he says, ‘So it is with the resurrection of the dead.’ ‘[W]hat you sow is not the body that is to be’ (v. 37) in verses 42–44. The corpse ‘sown’ (i.e. buried) is perishable, but raised imperishable; buried in dishonor, but raised in glory; buried weak, raised powerful; buried a physical body, but raised a spiritual body. He affirms the existence of each kind of body (v. 44). Because the bare translation of the terms ‘physical’ and ‘spiritual’ have a cultural and linguistic context not apparent to us today we must return to this matter. However explained, Paul is not denying that the body of the resurrection has ‘flesh and bones’ as Jesus’ resurrection body did. As regards the ‘nature’ or attributes of the resurrection body, it will be imperishable, honorable, glorious, strong and spiritual.

Verses 45–47 bear directly on a single point—in the resurrection ‘we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven’ (v. 49). He explains the cause of this ‘change’ by contrasting ‘the first man Adam’—whose progeny we all are—with ‘the last Adam.’⁴⁴ The First Adam ‘became a living being’

(v. 45), i.e. he received such life as he had and Adam passed the same on to us who are all ‘in Adam’ (vv. 22, 27). The kjv faithfully indicates (as rsv does not) that the text of verse 45 says simply ‘the last Adam [was made] a life giving spirit.’ As pre-incarnate Logos, the Lord made the First Adam and gave Adam life. Now as incarnate Logos He gives life, spiritual and physical. But perhaps Paul means he ‘became’ a life-giving spirit and if so, as Alford asks, ‘When?’ and comments: ‘That his resurrection state alone is not intended, is evident from the words “from heaven” (New Testament for English Readers, en loc).⁴⁵ Verse 47 calls Adam ‘the man of dust’, recollecting Adam’s condemnation to death in ‘unto dust shalt thou return’ (Gen. 3:19 kjv). All the human beings of whom he is head are physically dead or shall become so: ‘so also are those who are of the dust.’ After this comes the happy conclusion that in the resurrection we who believe will no longer bear Adam’s death mark but in our resurrection flesh will ‘bear the image of the man [Christ] of heaven’ (v. 49).

Verses 50–58 summarize, repeat, emphasize and apply what the apostolic author has already written. The only new information is that it will all happen ‘in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet’ (v. 52). G. C. H. Berkouwer wisely cautions:

This reality is assumed into the sphere of our expectation and consolation, without any effort to satisfy our desire for it to be imaginable.... The same applies to Romans 8:29, where Paul talks about the predestination of the elect, ‘to be conformed to the image of his Son.’⁴⁶

Even after our resurrection and transformation take place we will not understand much more about it, I think, just as essentially I know little about my present natural body. Even though I am perfectly at home in it. I do not need to know more than I do. I like it here.

Two Misused Texts

First Corinthians 15:44 reads: ‘It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body’ (kjv). There are several other ways to translate the verse as the Versions testify, but the essential sense does not vary. Neo-orthodox authors, as I pointed out early in this chapter, have used this one of the several Pauline antitheses (1 Cor. 15:42–44) to do away with any physical resurrection at all. Brunner, as we saw, thought that survival of the person and whatever changes take place in the personal spirit at death constituted the ‘resurrection.’ It would take several pages to document the departures from an orthodox view of the resurrection, which ground or support their views on Paul’s statement, ‘it is raised a spiritual body.’

What does ‘spiritual’ mean? What is ‘a spiritual body’? The answers are not far away. The antithesis of spiritual (Gr. pneumatikon) is natural (psuchikon). Let us start with ‘natural’ (Gr. psuchikon). Psuchikos is used six times in the New Testament. Earlier in this same Epistle it is said that ‘The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God’ (1 Cor. 2:14). Here also, in context, ‘natural’ is in contrast with ‘spiritual’: the spiritual man. ‘The spiritual person judges all things’ (1 Cor. 2:15). The spiritual man dwells in a body quite as fleshy as that of the natural man. The natural (psuchikos = soulish) is directed by the ‘desires of the body and the mind’ (Eph. 2:3) while the spiritual is directed by the Holy Spirit through a renewed mind. In James 3:15, the kjv renders psuchikos ‘sensual,’ i.e. controlled by appetites not God’s Spirit. In Jude 19 ‘sensual’ (psuchikos) is defined as not having ‘the Spirit.’ So the opposite of spiritual is being ‘devoid of the Spirit', not to be directed by the Spirit. Therefore the spiritual is to be filled and directed by the Spirit.

Psuchikos is employed twenty-five times in the New Testament and in no single case does it designate something composed of spirit. Never in the New Testament does it mean something ethereal, airy or of refined substance. The article on pneuma-pneumatikos (over a hundred pages in TDNT, VI) in brief comment says that pneumatikos means to be controlled by the Spirit of God (TDNT, VI, p. 437). The idea is control, not substance or matter.

In English the usual antithesis to 'natural' is 'supernatural.' While this is not precisely the contrast Paul has in mind, it is close, rsv renders pneumatikos as 'supernatural' at 1 Corinthians 10:4. Whatever 'spiritual' (pneumatikos) means, it is not immaterial. Alford, who is to be trusted in such matters, commenting on our verse, quotes Theophylact with approval: 'A spiritual body is one rich with the working of the Holy Spirit, and administered in all things by Him.'⁴⁷

1 Corinthians 15:50 reads: 'Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption' (kjv). This passage has been the chief scriptural 'proof text' for erroneous views of the resurrection from early Christian times on to the present. Irenaeus opens a very competent lengthy treatment of the importance of the resurrection of the flesh with these lines: 'Among the other [truths] proclaimed by the apostle [Paul], there is this one, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. This is [the passage] which is addressed by all the heretics in support of their folly, with an attempt to annoy us, and to point out that the handiwork of God [i.e. the human body] is not saved.'⁴⁸ He then devotes eight chapters to defense of the doctrine of the resurrection of the flesh. One chapter develops the theme that 'Unless the flesh were to be saved, the Word would not have taken upon him flesh of the same substance as ours: from this it would follow that neither should we have been reconciled by him.'⁴⁹ This church Father saw what some evangelicals today cannot seem to discern, that the resurrection of our flesh is a correlate of the incarnation, which to deny and carry to its logical conclusion is a heresy.

The facts are apparent to any one who cares to look into the matter more than casually. Besides 1 Corinthians 15:50 ('flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God'), the expression 'flesh and blood' appears in four other passages in the New Testament. They 'form a single conception ... a semitic wordpair.'⁵⁰

I shall sketch Scheps's five-page discussion of the expression. When Jesus said to Peter, 'flesh and blood has not revealed this to you' (Matt. 16:17), he writes, 'Jesus cannot possibly have meant that the substance of flesh and blood could give any revelation.' He was not thinking of the human body.⁵¹ The article on 'flesh and blood' in TDNT shows that the term in then-current rabbinic vocabulary always denoted the whole man with all his functions, with particular emphasis on man's earthly condition as a frail and perishable creature in contrast to the eternal and Almighty God.⁵² Hence 1 Corinthians 15:50 does not mean 'the body of resurrected saints cannot be a body of flesh,' as certain scholars claim, for four reasons (I drastically abbreviate).

1. Such a meaning contradicts what Scripture says of Jesus' resurrection body of flesh (and bones), the body He now has in heaven.

2. It contradicts what Paul himself says elsewhere in 1 Corinthians 15 and Philippians 1:21.

3. It misrepresents the meaning of the expression, ‘flesh and blood,’ in Jewish literature of the time and in Galatians 1:16 and Ephesians 6:12.

4. It is foreign to the context, especially the verses immediately following, where Paul explains sufficiently for our present pilgrimage, the kind of change ‘necessary for man to enter the new world.’⁵³

The notion that personal existence and personal responsibility for ‘deeds done in the flesh’ endure beyond the crisis of one’s death, and that public accounting to God with consequences to follow, is deeply planted in human consciousness in every place and in every age.⁵⁴ This is on record in long ago ages, in records as disparate as the Akkadian Gilgamesh Epic (at least as early as seventh century bc) and the Egyptian Book of the Dead (fifth and sixth dynasties, before 2000 bc). Though presently suppressed in the world it remains deeply imbedded in human consciousness.

¹ I have published a more complete treatment of this and the other texts to follow in Daniel and the Latter Days, rev. ed. (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977), and a further rev. ed. entitled The Earthly Reign of Our Lord with His People (self-published).

² S. P. Tregelles, The Hope of Christ’s Second Coming, 5th ed. (London: The Sovereign Grace Advent Testimony, 1986), pp. 29, 30.

³ Henry Alford, Greek Testament with a Critically Revised Text 4:732–733.

⁴ Bauer, Arndt & Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon, sub eita.

⁵ S. P. Tregelles, Remarks on the Prophetic Visions in the Book of Daniel, 7th ed. (London: Sovereign Grace Advent Testimony, 1965), p. 168.

⁶ C. F. Keil, Biblical Commentary on Daniel, p. 482.

⁷ ibid., p. 481.

⁸ Tregelles, op. cit., pp. 162 ff.

⁹ Culver, op. cit., p. 186.

¹⁰ George Ladd, The Blessed Hope (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956), p. 81.

¹¹ ibid., p. 81.

¹² A strong summary statement of evidence for two future resurrections quite apart from the thousand years of Revelation 20 was published in 1866 in Edinburgh and inserted by the American editor of Lange’s Commentary on Revelation, last line on p. 353 and top half of p. 354. Though now over 125 years old, this lengthy work is exceedingly valuable, especially on account of the additions by the American editor, E. R. Craven.

¹³ Geerhardus Vos, chap. 9, ‘The Extent of the Resurrection’ and chap. 10, ‘The Question of Chiliasm,’ The Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), pp. 215–260.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 260.

¹⁵ Robert Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, rev. ed. 1977, pp. 41–65.

¹⁶ Daniel Whitby ended his life as an Arian, and during his orthodox phase really ‘invented’ postmillennialism.

¹⁷ Lorraine Boettner, The Millennium (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1970).

¹⁸ J. Marcellus Kik, An Eschatology of Victory (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1971).

¹⁹ The Reconstruction Movement, P.O. Box 158, Vallecito, CA 95251–9989.

²⁰ Albertus Pieters, Studies in the Revelation of St John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950), p. 282.

²¹ Loraine Boettner, ‘Postmillennialian’ in The Meaning of the Millennium, Four Views, ed. Robert G. Clouse (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1977), p. 117.

²² ibid., p. 117.

²³ See A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 1014, 1045; Lorraine Boettner, The Millennium (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1970); Marcellus Kik, An Eschatology of Victory (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1971); Articles in Chalcedon, journal of Reconstruction, regularly posts its postmillennial creed and publishes articles in support. A very favorable and convincing brief summary of arguments in support of a postmillennial interpretation of Revelation 20 is two columns by E. R. Craven (American ed.) in John Peter Lange, The Revelation of St John, trans. (Elvina Moore, New York, 1874), p. 353.

²⁴ See Boettner’s essay cited earlier and my Daniel and the Latter Days, pp. 203–208 for details of the view, its history and further evaluation.

²⁵ Augustine, The City of God, 20.6. His full treatment is found in chaps. 6–13.

²⁶ W. Hendriksen, More Than Conquerors: An interpretation of the Book of Revelation (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1944); O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1964); G. L. Murray, Millennial Studies (1948); Floyd Hamilton, The Basis of Millennial Faith (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1942).

²⁷ Anthony Hoekema, ‘Amillennialism,’ chap. 4 in The Meaning of the Millennium, Four Views, ed.

— Anthonij Hoekema, Amillennialism, chap. 4 in The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views, ed. Robert G. Clouse (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1977), pp. 59, 60.

²⁸ David J. MacLeod, The Seven Last Things (Dubuque, IA: Emmaus College Press, 2003), pp. 131–178.

²⁹ Irenaeus, Against Heresies, 1.10, ANF i, p. 330.

³⁰ Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford Press, 1963), p. 34.

³¹ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964), p. 322. Schep cites J. T. Darragh, The Resurrection of the Flesh, pp. 224 ff.

³² ibid., p. 221.

³³ ibid., p. 221. See extensive documentation in works of J. N. D. Kelly, H. B. Swete and Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom.

³⁴ Norman L. Geisler, The Battle for the Resurrection (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1989), p. 64.

³⁵ The evidence is overwhelming. See Part 4: Christology: Person and Work to Christ, chapters 19–20.

³⁶ Schep, op. cit., p. 184; G. Kittel, TDNT II, pp. 254, 255 and others.

³⁷ See my discussion above of Jesus' Ascension and present residence in heaven as incarnate (enfleshed) God in treatment of the Ascension in Part 4 of this book.

³⁸ G. C. Berkouwer, The Return of Christ, trans. James Van Oosterom (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 116, 175–179, 186. Schep, op. cit., pp. 51–56, ³⁹ Schep, op. cit., p. 52.

⁴⁰ Murray J. Harris, Raised Immortal (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1983), p. 126.

⁴¹ ibid., p. 126.

⁴² Murray J. Harris, From Grave to Glory (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990), p. 22.

⁴³ Here again I ask the reader to refer to the portions of this work relating to Jesus' resurrection and Ascension.

⁴⁴ Not a second, for there will be no further Adams 'as being the last head of humanity' (Alford).

⁴⁵ William Milligan, Erich Sauer and Klaas Schilder are in agreement with Schep, that Christ became a life-giving spirit ‘when, as the reward for his atoning death, he received the promised Spirit in His resurrection and ascension’ (Schep, p. 76). Matthew 28:18 does connect Jesus’ ‘all power’ with His resurrection ministry and Peter’s pronouncement (Acts 2:33) with Jesus’ Ascension.

⁴⁶ G. C. H. Berkouwer, op. cit., p. 194.

⁴⁷ TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

⁴⁸ Henry Alford, New Testament for English Readers, p. 1081.

⁴⁹ Irenaeus, Against Heresies, V.17; ANF, I, p. 531.

⁵⁰ ANF I, p. 541.

⁵¹ Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Studies, Feb., 1965, p. 152 as cited by Schep, op. cit., p. 201.

⁵² Schep, op. cit., p. 201.

⁵³ Schep, op. cit., p. 202.

⁵⁴ Schep, op. cit., pp. 203, 204.

⁵⁵ See discussion in Part 1: Theology Proper, Chapter 4. Why People Do Believe in God.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1054). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

The Doctrine of Judgment

The future accounting, with consequences in reward for good deeds and punishment for bad ones, is the judgment of the biblical record. ‘Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment’ (Ps. 1:5 kjv) is an early biblical reference to such a ‘grand assize.’ The Old Testament refers to a heavenly council where God holds court (Ps. 82:1): ‘God has taken his place in the divine council; in the midst of the gods [angels] he holds judgment [Mishpat, often the place or convening of a judicial court].’¹

There will be a final special convening of such a court but not of such a council (Rev. 20:11–15; cf. Matt. 25:31 ff.). As we shall see, there is considerable variety in the manner Scripture represents such a presently incomprehensible event of cosmic proportions.

The Sum of the Doctrine

The entire doctrine of judgment is summed up in two short verses in the book of Hebrews: ‘And just as it is appointed for man to die once, and after that comes judgment, so Christ ... [was] offered once to bear the sins of [the] many’ (Heb. 9:27, 28a).² The notion of ‘once’ (hapax Heb. 9:26, 28 kjv) and ‘one’ (mia Heb. 10:12, 14 kjv) are opposed to ‘often’ (pollakis Heb. 9:25, 26 kjv). ‘Once’ and ‘one’ pervade chapters 9 and 10 (9:7, 12, 26, 28; 10:10, 12, 14 kjv). The idea governs the verses quoted above. There once was a particular past day of judgment when Jesus was judged (punished) for ‘the many’ (Isa. 53:6 and 12). There is also a future day appointed for every human being after death. Though Jesus did say that ‘whoever hears my word and believes ... does not come into judgment’ (krisin John 5:24), His authorized messenger, Paul, elaborated the statement with: ‘we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God’ (Rom. 14:10 rsv) and ‘we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that which he hath done, whether it be good or bad’ (2 Cor. 5:10 kjv).³

Human Awareness in Conscience

It is deeply written in the conscience of mankind that, as ‘the Preacher’ (Qoheleth, Eccles. 1:1, 2) said: ‘God will bring every deed into judgment, with every secret thing, whether good or evil’ (Eccles. 12:14). In enjoying youthful pleasures to the full, ‘know that ... God will bring you into judgment’ (Eccles. 11:9). For this reason old age may be a time of anxious conscience about early misbehavior (‘Remember not the sins of my youth ... O Lord’ Ps. 25:7) and may be why unchaperoned ‘dating’ and co-educational colleges for eighteen year olds, much less ‘co-ed dorms,’ may be very bad ideas. The same David was most concerned about sins undiscerned by himself (Ps. 19:12) and accounts for his prayer that ‘the meditation of my heart [phantasies] be acceptable in thy sight’ (Ps. 19:14 kjv).

Emil Brunner, who in his lifetime sought manfully to bring the liberal wing of Protestantism at least partway back to biblical orthodoxy, thought deeply on these matters and expressed them in a chapter on ‘The Last Judgment.’ He speaks of world history as existing under the ‘category’ of the long-suffering of God. Yet ‘one day the saturation point will be reached and it will be necessary to terminate the provisional period.’ He goes on to say, ‘The vague surmise or intuition—a surmise widespread among many peoples who know nothing of the Christian revelation—that one day all secrets must be disclosed, that a time of final retribution and reckoning must come, is thus in harmony with the divine will as it is revealed in Christ.’⁴

This natural feeling is enhanced in the regenerate heart, but may be very feeble among the unregenerate. Abraham was quite fearful for his life among such people: ‘There is no fear of God at all in this place, and they will kill me because of my wife’—i.e. to steal her from him (Gen. 20:11). Paul was constrained by ‘the terror of the Lord’ as well as ‘the love of Christ’ to live and work for God (2 Cor. 5:11, 14 kjv). The preaching of both law and grace stirs to life innate awareness of a coming day of judgment, as when Paul ‘reasoned about righteousness and self-control and the coming judgment [and], Felix [the Roman governor] was alarmed’ (Acts 24:25). On the other hand, when the ‘gospel came ... not only in word, but also in power ... and with full conviction’ (1 Thess. 1:5) those who are ‘chosen’ and believing (1 Thess. 1:2–4) can wait for God’s ‘Son from heaven’ knowing He ‘delivers us from the wrath to come’ (1 Thess. 1:3 and 10).

Interim Judgments

The final judgment is not the only judgment of God on good or evil works of mankind. Scripture presupposes that history reflects the righteous judgment of God, even though not apparent at every point of time. When Abraham protested to divine beings en route to destroy the ‘cities of the plain’ he was aware of this: ‘Shall not the Judge of all the earth do what is just?’ (Gen. 18:25). As One whose ‘kingdom rules over all’ (Ps. 103:19) the course of the world constantly carries out what theology has called His ‘providential judgments.’

The book of Proverbs regularly states and presupposes such, as for example ‘Whoever closes his ear to the cry of the poor will himself call out and not be answered’ (Prov. 21:13; cf. 29:9). The captivity of Israel to Babylon, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and similar, are said specifically to be divine judgments, but they were not eschatological judgments. Each person who suffered or was rewarded in these matters has yet to face God’s throne in the judgment after ‘the resurrection on the last day’ (John 11:24). Likewise the very entrance of Jesus into the world and the proclamation by His messengers was ‘For judgment ... that those who do not see may see, and those who see may become blind’ (John 9:39; cf. Matt. 13:14–17). There are eternal consequences in providential judgments but they are not final judgments. These judgments are part of the control God exercises over the world in order that human society does not destroy itself and that orderly civil life might be possible. God ‘has established his throne for justice’ (Ps. 9:7); hence the prophet says, ‘When your judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness’ (Isa. 26:9). Since Calvary, the world has been ‘reconciled to God’: a temporary truce declared (2 Cor. 5:9–21), final judgment delayed. Nevertheless God is not mocked. Whatsoever a man sows he shall reap (Gal. 6:7), not because of any built-in justice in the world but because ‘the Lord is the avenger’ of everyone who ‘defraud[s]’ his brother ‘in any matter’ (1 Thess. 4:6 kjv). The Scriptures of both Testaments plainly teach that there will be a future final judgment for every person whether Jew or Gentile, pagan or Christian, when Jesus comes again. We have already quoted some of the passages. Some additional texts say that God will come ‘to judge the earth ... the world in righteousness’ (Ps. 96:13) and ‘God will bring every deed into judgment ... whether good or evil’ (Eccles. 12:14). Details of the principles God will follow in that judgment are set forth in Romans 2 and other places. Paul told a heathen audience that God ‘has fixed a day on which he will judge the world in righteousness by a man whom he has appointed; and of this he has given assurance to all by raising him from the dead’ (Acts 17:31).⁵

Necessity of a Final Judgment

1. A public event, such as a final Judgment Day, is a moral necessity for more than one reason. Emil Brunner pointed out: ‘The God who reveals himself in Scripture ... does not occupy an attitude of indifference beyond good and evil’ and goes on to say: ‘This non-neutral positive purposefulness is so consistently and piercingly the Biblical idea of God that we cannot be surprised that the thought of judgment penetrates unequivocally every section and layer of Holy Scripture.’⁶

2. For another reason, the threats of conscience which do restrain evil actions would not exist, or if they existed would not have force, if in the heart there were no lingering fear that God will bring every deed into judgment.

3. Further, some sort of divine adjudication is necessary to adjust the rewards life here gives to the greedy and ruthless, as well as the unjust sufferings of the pious, the poor and the defenseless, whose cause the Lord promises to take up sometime, somewhere.

The Law and the Prophets state it and the Psalms celebrate it: ‘The Lord sets the prisoners free; the Lord opens the eyes of the blind ... lifts up those who are bowed down ... loves the righteous ... watches over the sojourners ... upholds the widow and the fatherless, but the way of the wicked he brings to ruin’ (Ps. 146:7–9). Yet this is not evident anywhere in the wide world now or at any other time—except to the eyes of faith. God’s justice awaits public vindication on the day of judgment. Habakkuk 2 raises this problem, as well as Psalm 73, and also the cries of the martyrs of Revelation 6:9–11. The necessity for a public vindication of God’s righteousness is so plain that the most obtuse must recognize that it awaits the Great Day of the Almighty up ahead. Then and only then will there be public answer to the cry, ‘Where were you, God, when I needed you?’

4. In all of the periods of a person’s life from infancy to old age there is a sense of responsibility for what one thinks and does. The same is true of every human collectivity from partnerships and family businesses and social collectivities to national governments and armies. Apart from belief in a future judgment this sense lacks strength to enforce its dictates. Emil Brunner said,

Only the thought of judgment gives to the thought of responsibility its ultimate seriousness, and thus makes clear the relationship between God and man. Apart from the prospect of divine judgment, man may repeatedly misunderstand his freedom as freedom in responsibility, as absolute indetermination, and such a misunderstanding of his own being spells his own sin and death.⁷

5. Jesus enforced the necessity of spiritual preparedness for Judgment Day in a series of parables and pronouncements, among them Matthew 25:31–46. It is surely a mistake to put this ‘judgment of the nations’ at Jesus’ return in a schedule of preliminary end-time events. Let us take a closer look.

‘When the Son of Man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him’ (Matt. 25:31) introduces the time of judgment. But it is not necessary to suppose the next words, ‘then he will sit on his glorious throne,’ and following takes place immediately. ‘When the Son of Man comes [Gr. hota de elthē]’ might more literally be rendered ‘When the Son of Man has come [elthē, a second aorist subjunctive].’ Then (tote) indicates what follows but not necessarily immediately. When Luke wanted to indicate immediate action with tote he prefixed eutheos and this is translated ‘immediately after’ (Acts 17:14). J. O. Buswell’s careful interpretation treats the passage as gathering together all the events of the Parousia in what he calls ‘cosmic perspective,’ and I think he is right.⁸

The form of the parable-like vignette is similar to a parable or allegory. It seems meant to teach spiritual preparedness for that Return which could happen at any time, as in the Parables of the Ten Virgins (vv. 1–13), and of the Talents (vv. 14–30). The ‘sheep on his right’ and ‘the goats on the left’ has given rise to a valid but eccentric (off-center) view of the purpose of this dominical presentation of the coming final judgment. The orderly mind of J. E. Fison, a devout Anglican scholar, lays out the Lord Jesus’ point of the panorama, which certainly was neither to produce morbid introspection, nor to frighten sinners into a rush to repentance, nor to describe the opening act of the millennium. Rather the passage, like much New Testament teaching regarding the ‘last judgment,’ is to jolt the complacent church member. The New Testament presentation, Fison says, ‘is not to spring a surprise on the post pagan souls outside the pale of the church, but upon the complacent ecclesiastical souls whose entire confidence is based upon the fact that they are well within [the church].’⁹

Contrariwise, there are others who are well aware of their peril.

For they see only too clearly the abiding significance of the fact that ‘judgment must begin at the house of God’ (1 Peter 4:17). All the last judgment does to them when it is devoid of any living connection with Jesus himself is to cut the nerve of certainty and hope and joy and to kill the inspiration for creative and adventurous living by inspiring a perpetual, morbid and scrupulous introspection.¹⁰

Contrariwise, I add, for the instructed believer who is also spiritually and emotionally healthy, in the New Testament the Advent of Christ is a ‘blessed hope,’ a ‘glorious appearing,’ for which one has ‘eager expectation’ (Titus 2:13). It bespeaks invitation to the joy of a wedding feast (Rev. 19:6–9).

One Final Eschatological Judgment: One, Two or Many?

All Christians agree that every person, angel or man, who ever lived, will come to a final judgment. Those convinced that there is to be a resurrection of the righteous dead and translation of living saints before a thousand-year reign of Christ on earth, to be followed by the resurrection of the ungodly following that millennium, believe there are to be two future, final, eschatological judgments. Most are convinced that the first is ‘at the judgment seat of Christ,’ referred to in 2 Corinthians 5:10 and Romans 14:10, and the second that is described in Revelation 20:10–15.¹¹ Some schools of thought have refined and expanded the doctrine of two resurrections and two judgments in harmony with their understanding of end-time events to distinguish several resurrections and judgments. This outlook has been popularized by recent, widely read Christian fiction. This view was carefully expressed in the very useful Introductory Lectures In Systematic Theology by H. C. Thiessen.¹² In Dr Thiessen’s book (the standard at Wheaton College for several generations of juniors) ‘there are at least seven future judgments.’¹³ These are elaborated, with Scriptures related, as follows. (1) The judgment of believers (Rev. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; 1 Cor. 3:11–15; 4:5; Matt. 25:14–30; Luke 19:11; Matt. 20:1–16). (2) The judgment of Israel during the great tribulation (Jer. 30:7; Rev. 7:1–8; 12:6; 13:17; Ezek. 20:33, 34; Mal. 3:2–5). (3) The judgment of Babylon (Rev. 17:1–19:5) during the great tribulation. (4) The judgment of the beast, the false prophet and their armies (2 Thess. 2:7–10; Rev. 16:12–16; 19:19–21; Zech. 12:1–9; 13:8–14:2). (5) The judgment of the nations on the basis of their treatment of the Jews (Matt. 25:31–46; Joel 3:11–17; 2 Thess. 1:7–10; Acts 17:31, see comments p. 463). (6) The judgment of Satan and his angels (Rev. 2:7–9, 13–17; Matt. 5:41; Matt. 8:29; Luke 8:31). (7) The judgment of the unsaved dead (Rev. 20:11–15; 21:5; and other passages).¹⁴ Thiessen’s arrangement is similar to that of the Scofield Bible of 1909, 1919, 1945, replicated in many early twentieth-century evangelical publications. Herman Hoyt¹⁵ adds a resurrection and judgment of tribulation, saints and martyrs, a judgment of God and Magog, and another of angels—though as ‘categories’ rather than distinct events.

This eagerness to schedule every aspect of end-time events in a schema has not been shared by every recent pre-millennial scholar. Erich Sauer, for example, found two future resurrections in Scripture and only two judgments: ‘The Judgment seat of Christ for believers and the Great White Throne judgment of unbelievers.’¹⁶

Paul developed the doctrine of resurrection in some detail, even a ‘schedule’ of three ‘orders’ of the resurrection—Christ the first-fruits, then they that are Christ’s at His coming, and after that ‘the end' resurrection. But there is no such schedule of judgments, though he knows of the 'judgment seat of Christ' (2 Cor. 5:10) or 'of God' (Rom. 14:10), and he speaks of those who store up wrath for themselves on the day of wrath when God's judgment will be revealed (Rom. 2:5) and develops principles of judgment (Rom. 2). George Ladd, an historic premillenarian, noted Paul's passing references to judgment and a day of judgment in Romans 13:2; 1 Corinthians 11:32; Romans 3:6; 1 Corinthians 4:5; 2 Thessalonians 2:12; and 2 Timothy 4:1 and comments: 'In some way not explained to us, the saints are to assist God in the judgment of the world, even to the point of judging angels (1 Cor. 6:2, 3).'

Will Saints Ever 'Come into Judgment'?

Jesus said, 'he who hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life; he does not come into judgment, but has passed from death to life' (John 5:24 rsv). Jesus said the same thing in various ways, including some parables. Paul in various ways declared the judgment of those justified by faith, by blood, by grace, by Christ, a matter of past history at the cross. We need fear no future 'wrath of God.' 'Since, therefore, we have now been justified by his blood, much more shall we be saved by him from the wrath of God ... while we were enemies we were reconciled to God' (Rom. 5:9, 10 esv).

In an important treatise, Geerhardus Vos, Professor of Biblical Theology at Princeton Seminary, asserted that 'justification ... is to Paul virtually a judgment by way of anticipation.'¹⁸ But this, says Vos, does not mean that believers do not need to think about judgment, for many passages in Paul's letters to Christians remind them of coming judgment where 'salvation' and 'non-salvation' (Rom. 2:2, 3, 6; 3:6, 8; 5:16; 1 Cor. 5:13; 6:2; 2 Cor. 2:9; 2 Thess. 2:12; 1 Tim. 3:6; 2 Tim. 4:1) are discussed.¹⁹ Though Vos thinks in terms of only one future resurrection and judgment he asserts that, 'with Paul the judgment is an event that will make discrimination as to future rank and enjoyment in the life to come between individual Christians. The differences established may and will be great, but the range covered by them lies within the realm of salvation.'²⁰

This judgment is scheduled to take place at Christ's appearing (epiphaneia) when a 'righteous judge' will assign 'crown[s] of righteousness' and many other awards (2 Tim. 4:8). Though already, in justification, declared righteous—acquitted—before God, being regarded by the Judge as 'in Christ,' we must nevertheless 'all appear before the judgment seat.'²¹ It holds no threat of damnation for those in Christ for 'There is ... no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus' (Rom. 8:1–39). Yet there will be loss of rewards which can only be gained in the present life by proper stewardship of God's gifts of abilities, of time and of strength through the Spirit (1 Cor. 3:12–15). I have already tried to show that we should not think of this scene as taking place at the Last Judgment, described as before 'a great white throne' (Rev. 20:11–15) following the millennium. Believers will not stand before God to be judged by Him in that grand assize, because they are to be associated with God in Christ at that judgment in some unspecified way. Paul says, 'the world is to be judged by you' (1 Cor. 6:2), including angels (1 Cor. 6:3).

There is nevertheless a certain threat of possible grievous loss of 'what might have been.' Think of the severe conclusions to Jesus' parables and several warnings about careless stewardship. Paul warned servants to be obedient to 'earthly masters with fear and trembling, with a sincere heart, as you would Christ, not by the way of eye-service, as people-pleasers, but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart ... as to the Lord ... knowing that whatever good anyone does, this he will receive back from the Lord.’ In some way we will get back what we did. Then he warns masters to ‘do the same ... and stop your threatening, knowing that ... there is no partiality with him [God]’ (Eph. 6:5–9; see also Col. 3:24, 25). At God’s bēma (both podium of reward and seat of justice) we will get back what we gave in life, in some undisclosed way, not involving loss of salvation, so says the same author elsewhere (1 Cor. 3:10–15, especially v. 15). John A. Sproule seems therefore correct on the basis of the above in concluding that ‘believers will be rewarded for lives of faithful service and obedience.... However there is strong evidence that believers, at the judgment seat of Christ, will suffer some kind of chastisement for slothful, careless lives. This involves more than simply the loss of reward. Concerning the details, the Bible is silent.’²²

The Word of God makes more of this matter than we preachers do. It warns plainly of severe loss if present opportunities are lost and present duties neglected. Here are some more of them in the stark severity of the King James Version: ‘And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming’ (1 John 2:28); ‘behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be’ (Rev. 22:12); ‘Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord [not of hearers but of preachers], we persuade men’ (2 Cor. 5:11). See also Revelation 2:7, 10, 17, 26–28; 3:2–5, 10–12, 18–21. Leon Morris makes the point that

Believers may have confidence in the judgment. Though believers, like all the rest of mankind, face judgment, they do not face it in the same way. The New Testament attitude is not one of cowardly shrinking from it but of anticipation in mingled joy and solemnity ... the dawn of the kingdom more than the doom of the world.²³

Morris cites Romans 8:33; Hebrews 6:10; Jude 24; and 1 John 4:12.

The Certainty of Final Future Judgment

There is analogy between human tribunals and the divine one yet future, but not strict similarity of process or court scene. An omniscient God will require no investigative procedures. The books which shall be opened will not require time to read for memory and all else will be ‘open’ to public knowledge. There will be no preliminary motion to dismiss charges.

The ‘literary’ court of world judgment set up in the first three chapters of the Epistle to the Romans summarily dismisses objections to a final Judgment Day, saying: ‘Let God be true though every man be false ... if our wickedness serves to show the justice of God, what shall we say? That God is unjust to inflict wrath upon us? (I speak in a human way.) By no means! For then how could God judge the world?’ (Rom. 3:3–6 rsv). Similarly Hebrews 6:1 ff. puts ‘eternal judgment’ among ‘the principles of the doctrine of Christ’ (Heb. 6:1, 2 kjv).

As for the Old Testament, the sentence of death for sin on the first man and the race of mankind in him was the actual beginning of eschatological judgment. Henceforth ‘the living know that they will die’ (Eccles. 9:5). The prophets declare the future ‘day of the Lord’ or ‘that Day’ or ‘the great and awesome day of the Lord’ (Mal. 4:5) that will burn ‘like an oven, when all the arrogant and all evildoers will be stubble. The day that is coming shall set them ablaze, says the Lord of hosts.... But for you who fear my name, the sun of righteousness [the Messiah] shall rise with healing in its wings. You shall go out leaping [frolic] like calves from the stall' (Mal. 4:1, 2).

Jesus certainly endorsed the conviction of future divine judgment already present among His audience: 'It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment, than for that city [which spurned His messengers]' (Mark 6:11 kjv). In John 5:22 and 27 ff. Jesus assumed His duties as the prophesied Messiah to be the Judge at the final reckoning and said something specific about it in Matthew 25:31 ff. The communion ordinance He founded was designed in part to speak to hearts of the importance of getting ready for the coming of the kingdom of God over all the earth, calling for self-judgment 'that we may not be condemned along with the world' (1 Cor. 11, especially vv. 28–32).

The Gospels are filled with statements about the coming of God's kingdom. Liberalism of the past was designed to take the threat of judgment out of that parousia of the Son of Man by treating the kingdom simply as the reign of good ethics in human hearts. More recently (and more seriously) some New Testament scholarship would make the parousia of Christ and His kingdom entirely something of the present. 'Realized Eschatology' is the name for this partially true but essentially fractional address to the whole truth.²⁴

It is correct to say that the certainty of the judgment in a world created by God is guaranteed by the nature of the Creator, who is omniscient and omnipotent as well as holy. Emil Brunner was almost right about many aspects of theology. Even though there is in the New Testament 'variety of testimony,' he saw clearly that it is necessary to emphasize—as the one consistent and basic factor implied through it all—the conviction that the conception of judgment flows necessarily from a recognition of the holiness of God. God is He who takes His will (i.e. law) in absolute seriousness, He who is not mocked (Gal. 6:7).²⁵ Writing when the existentialist doctrine of freedom as autonomous self-will had not yet borne fruit of disaster and gone stale, he denounced the 'absolute determinism' of 'atheistic existentialism,' which found no place for the holiness of God or the creaturely responsibility of mankind. In thinking 'about judgment' we must 'recognize God seriously as God, and man as man. If there is no last judgment, it means that God does not take His own will seriously.'²⁶

Principles of Divine Judgment

In the scene of the Last Judgment (Rev. 20:12) it is said, 'books were opened.' Not 'the books' as later in the verse, but books indefinitely, books such as registers of what people say, do and think (Ps. 56:8; Isa. 65:6 and context; Mal. 3:16; Deut. 32:34; Matt. 12:37). For 1,500 or more years these books have been interpreted as a symbol of the divine omniscience or of 'a certain divine power, by which it shall be brought about that everyone shall recall to memory all his own works, whether good or evil.'²⁷ In Daniel's vision of the judgment, likewise the 'judgment [was set], and the books were opened' (Dan. 7:10).

Five Books

What books? Scripture suggests five records, 'books' available and publicly exposed on that day.

1. The book of divine omniscience. When ‘the messenger of the covenant’ comes, before whom none ‘can stand,’ then ‘I [the Lord] will draw near to you for judgment. I will be a swift witness ...’ (Mal. 3:2, 5). No investigative research. An omniscient and willing witness will be there.

2. The book of divine remembrance—this book might also be called—of ‘those who feared the Lord ... a book of remembrance was written before him of those who ... esteemed his name’ (Mal. 3:16).

3. The book of human conscience. Romans 2:12–15 shows that apart from special revelation, some of the righteous requirements of God are ‘written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness and their conflicting thoughts accuse or perhaps excuse them on that day when ... God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 2:14–16 rsv).

4. The book of divine providence. The goodness of God in His providence toward mankind (Acts 13:15–17) was designed to ‘lead ... to repentance’ (Rom. 2:4) but ‘man’ (2:3) has presumed ‘on the riches of his kindness and forbearance and patience,’ storing up ‘wrath ... on the day of wrath ...’ (Rom. 2:3–5).

5. The book of God’s Word, spoken and written. Jesus said, ‘the word that I have spoken [and written in the Bible] will judge him on the last day’ (John 12:48).

6. The book of life. Alford writes, ‘Those books and the book of life bore independent witness to the fact of men being or not being among the saved: the one by inference ... the other by inscription or non-inscription of the name in the list. So the books would be as it were the vouchers for the book of life.’²⁸

Evidence, however, must be weighed by judge or jury. The principles or rules of evidence, relevance of circumstances, and the like are no less important in the Last Judgment than in human courts. What are the ‘rules’ supplied by Scripture for that grand assize?

The standard as in human courts will be law. There are several kinds of law acknowledged in courts: customary or common-law (the way things have been done in this particular jurisdiction); judge-made laws or legal precedents; positive enactments of legislatures; and, where a government has a religious commitment, what is esteemed divine law. In the Last Judgment, of course, it will be divine law, whether inscriptured or not. As was shown in the sections of this volume on mankind and sin, God’s law is simply the expression of His will, which flows from His nature. He is ever true to Himself. This will has been expressed in conscience, and ‘common grace’ by prophets who received revelation in many ways, some of which is written down in Scripture. (See above, Part 1: Theology Proper.)

The Standards of God’s Law

1. In the first place, because so frequently mentioned, is the complete absence of what in the kjv is designated ‘respect of persons,’ and in recent translations ‘partiality.’ All God’s judgments are so.²⁹ Jesus made this the point in more than one of His parables.

2. God will judge according to the standard of the law, but ‘not as that law has been ignorantly conceived of by each, but as it has been more or less clearly, revealed by the Judge Himself to each severally.’³⁰ According to Romans 2:12–15 the heathen who had no written revelation shall be judged by the law ‘written’ on the heart (‘natural light’ in old terms, ‘general revelation’ in the newer). Those who have known the light of scriptural law will be judged by that in accordance with the whole will of God made known and the privileges and responsibilities there. This is the point in the parable of the ‘faithful and wise steward’ (Luke 12:41–48) where some are punished with ‘a light beating’ others with ‘a severe.’ ‘Everyone to whom much was given, of him much will be required, and from him to whom they entrusted much, they will demand the more’ (Luke 12:47, 48).

3. Judgment will be ‘according to truth’ (Rom. 2:2)—truth as to the law of God and truth as to actual facts in right relation. ‘Circumstances alter cases.’ Paul put this first in the order of principles in Romans 2.

4. ‘[T]o each one according to his works’ (Rom. 2:6) is second of Paul’s stated principles. All of Romans 2:6–13 should be read, especially by complacent Christians, ‘For it is not the hearers of the law who are righteous before God, but the doers of the law who will be justified.’ Let us thank God for our Lord Jesus who took the strokes of the law in our place—as the author of Romans 2 carefully explained in the two next following chapters of Romans.

5. Though perhaps covered in point 3 above, Paul also mentions ‘that day when ... God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 2:16). ‘Therefore do not pronounce judgment before the time, before the Lord comes, who will bring to light the things now hidden in darkness and will disclose the purposes of the heart. Then each one will receive his commendation from God’ (1 Cor. 4:5). David’s concern about ‘hidden faults’—hidden even from himself—should be a concern of all.

Concluding Questions

1. How can justified (acquitted) believers be judged by their works? A. A. Hodge’s paragraph applies: ‘The saints will not be acquitted on the ground of their good deeds, but because their names are found “written in the book of life,” or the book of God’s electing love and on the ground of their participation in the righteousness of Christ.’³¹ Their good deeds will be publicly cited as evidence of their faith which is the instrument of their justification by faith (Phil. 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 13:8; James 1:22–25; 2:14–18).

2. What is the final purpose or telos of eschatological judgments? It is the same as the telos of God in all creation and in His providence as well as His eternal plans for all creation, the manifestation of His own glory. Ephesians 1:1–12 makes plain that this was the purpose of the Father, ‘the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will’ (v. 11). This is His purpose in the church as well (Eph. 3:9, 10), and in His government (providence) of nations (Rom. 9:17, 22, 23). And it is the duty of Christians to adjust their own goals in life to God’s goal, that is, His glory. Enforcement of laws is as necessary to an orderly universe as to any well-ordered human society.

It is therefore proper to say, uncomfortable as the idea may be to modern denizens of this planet, that final judgment has the same telos—God’s glory. I am not here on earth to attain personal fulfillment. Paul says explicitly in Romans 9 that the redeemed are forever ‘vessels of mercy’ prepared beforehand to make known the riches of God's glory, and that the lost, as 'vessels of wrath,' will exhibit God's righteous wrath and make His power known. God will necessarily thus unveil the secrets of men to make known their real character in order to make final disposition of them. This is true whether there be one final judgment or several.

Other aspects of the doctrine of divine judgment will now follow as we consider the final state of the lost and of the saved.

¹ I have previously cited the great work of Mitchell Dahood on Psalms who comments on this: 'The proposed exegesis assumes a rather advanced concept of resurrection and immortality, but there is ample basis in the Psalter for this supposition,' Psalms I, 1–50. Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1965), p. 4, 5.

² Among the several competent exegetical commentaries on these verses, Franz Delitzsch in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1887) has not been excelled. He brings his unsurpassed mastery of Old Testament language and sacrificial liturgy to the text with reverence for sound orthodoxy. I am indebted particularly to his exegesis of this passage.

³ The syntax of this verse is very difficult. 'It is the final judgment of all believers that is in view here, not a universal judgment ... and the issue is not salvation or damnation (as in 2:14; Rom. 2:5–11, etc.) but whether, as a Christian, one has been committed to the Lord.' Paul Furnish, II Corinthians: The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1984), p. 305.

⁴ Emil Brunner, Eternal Hope (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1954), p. 176.

⁵ See also Luke 10:14; Jude 14, 15.

⁶ Brunner, op. cit., pp. 173, 174.

⁷ Brunner, op. cit., p. 178.

⁸ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, Vol. ii (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1963), pp. 417–423.

⁹ J. E. Fison, The Christian Hope (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1952), p. 249.

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ C. R. Ludwigson, A Survey of Bible Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975), pp. 115–126; 65–68.

¹² H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures In Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1949 and many repr.), 574 pages.

¹³ ibid., p. 498.

- ¹⁴ ibid., chap. 45, ‘The Judgments’ pp. 496–505.
- ¹⁵ Herman A. Hoyt, The End Times (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 217–222.
- ¹⁶ Erich Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), chap. 11, pp. 78–80.
- ¹⁷ George Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974, 1991), p. 565.
- ¹⁸ Geerhardus Vos, The Pauline Eschatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), p. 271.
- ¹⁹ ibid.
- ²⁰ ibid.
- ²¹ I find no great significance in Paul’s use of bēma for this seat, for both judges at games and at judicial courts were seated on a bēma, or throne set on a podium, ordinarily. See 1 Corinthians 16:12 where Gallio occupied a bēma.
- ²² J. A. Sproule, ‘Judgment Seat’ or ‘Awards Podium,’ Grace Theological Seminary Journal, Vol. 13, No. 1, Spring, 1974, p. 5. Two recommended books which treat this serious matter have the same title, The Judgment Seat of Christ. The older work is by D. M. Parton (republished by Bethany Fellowship Press, Minneapolis, n.d.). The newer work is by L. Sale-Harrison, 4th ed., New York, 1938.
- ²³ Leon Morris, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment (London: The Tyndale Press, 1960), p. 71.
- ²⁴ C. H. Dodd in The Parables of the Kingdom (London, 1935) and The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (1944, 1980) gave the world this interpretation of Jesus’ doctrine of the kingdom. It was early answered (with due appreciation for its positive contributions) by many New Testament scholars. The theological errors were answered notably by J. E. Fison, The Christian Hope, The Presence and the Parousia (London, 1952), chaps. 3–6. I have relied on Fison’s work frequently in this volume.
- ²⁵ Emil Brunner, op. cit., p. 173.
- ²⁶ Brunner, op. cit., p. 179.
- ²⁷ Augustine, City of God XX.14, NPNF First Series, 2, p. 434.
- ²⁸ Henry Alford, NTER, p. 1931.
- ²⁹ Deut. 10:17; 2 Chron. 19:7; Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25; Prov. 24:23; 28:21; Col. 2:16; James 2:1, 3, 9; 1 Peter 1:17.
- ³⁰ A. A. Hodge. Outlines of Theology (New York: R. Carter & Brothers. 1860). p. 574.

³¹ A. A. Hodge, The Confession of Faith (London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1964), p. 302.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1066). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

7

The Final Destiny of the Unsaved (I)

The doctrine of the dreadful destiny of the lost is an unpleasant shadow across biblical doctrine. So it is not very remarkable that the surveys of religious opinion, frequently reported in the press, will relate that of the same church people, who by strong majority believe in God, immortality, the divinity of Jesus and heaven, many dissent from a belief in hell. Yet that doctrine stands behind and enforces the need for the incarnation of the Son of God, His sinless life, and especially His substitutionary atonement and present ministry of intercession. It also sustains the common moral life of mankind and is indispensable to any strong apostolic fervor in Christian missions and evangelism.

In an earlier period of growing national wealth, accompanied by a decline in biblical faith and Christian living, the then Roosevelt Professor of Systematic Theology in Union Theological Seminary, New York City, William Greenough Thayer Shedd (1820–1894), wrote near the end of his life:

The recent uncommon energy of opposition to endless punishment ... synchronized with great ... breaches of trust, uncommon corruption in mercantile and political life, and great distrust between man and man. Luxury deadens the moral sense, and luxurious populations do not have the fear of God before their eyes. Hence, luxurious men, recalcitrate at hell and 'kick against the goads.' No theological tenet is more important than eternal retribution to those modern nations which like England, Germany and the United States, are growing rapidly in riches, luxury and earthly power. Without it, they will infallibly go down in that vortex of sensuality and wickedness that swallowed up Babylon and Rome. The bestial and shameless vice of the dissolute rich ... is a powerful argument for the necessity and reality of the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone.¹

Dr Shedd's great exposition of the doctrine of divine punishment is not widely read today. Among the greatest informers of the lecture desk in theology today is the Church Dogmatics of the late Karl Barth. Barth is more widely read by professors than by students, for whom one would hardly dare assign such voluminousness! Though he probably would not acknowledge it, Barth's universalism appears in his treatment of Christology and Soteriology. Yet significantly, it is in one of the volumes on reconciliation (IV, 1) that his most extensive development of this subject appears—over a hundred pages of it. It is the old universalism in new dress. Barth did not believe anyone would be finally lost and ultimately perish. Presumably his views have now been clarified.

Only a step behind Barth in importance, and far more readable and widely read in America since the arrival in America in English dress of The Mediator in mid-twentieth century, is Emil Brunner. His three-volume Dogmatics was widely used in Protestant theological schools, including some which up to very recently were strongly fundamentalist. What did this teacher of teachers say? Having resolved the issue into the usual paradoxes of the school of neo-orthodoxy, adding the inevitable denial of propositional statements of theological truth, he affirmed both universal salvation and eternal damnation, merging both in what he understood is the personal dimension of theological truth.² Other theologians have managed to say, 'I do not know,' with less flourish. How different the clear statements of the Bible!

Five Propositions

I shall summarize what I have confirmed to be the biblical doctrine in connection with five propositions. After that, theories which deny the biblical doctrine will be discussed briefly. Finally a conclusion will be suggested. The five propositions now follow:

1. The state of the lost in their final punishment is death.
2. The measure of the final punishment is deeds done in life.
3. The nature of the final punishment is torment.
4. The duration of the final punishment is everlasting.
5. The place of the final punishment is hell, also called the lake of fire and Gehenna.

When I first assembled this outline, late on a cold northern Ohio night, alone in a small church basement room with concrete walls, my feet cold, my hands numb, alone in the great building, my dear wife and two small sons snug in bed two miles away, the stillness undisturbed save for the hiss of the gas heater and the annoying clack of the ancient typewriter, I shrank from every word I wrote. Even now in greater comfort there is no greater pleasure in the task, for the very atmosphere of this lovely autumn Sabbath seems deadly with the weight of the sinner's doom. Yet we approach it with the interest and respect due to all of God's revelations. What His Word teaches clearly we accept in faith even if the heart staggers and the mind reels. Just what does the Bible clearly say?

For if we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses: Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace? For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord.... It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. 10:26–31 kjv).

I have cited the above text in the stark simplicity of the Authorized Version to prick the conscience, thereby impelling us, if possible, to see the matter through. For similar reasons I now present some of the strongest words on the subject, two statements from the lips of the Savior of mankind, with the additional purpose of laying part of a scriptural groundwork for the doctrine to be developed later.

[I]f thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched. And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched (Mark 9:43–48 kjv).

As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth (Matt 13:40–42 kjv).

These are only a sampling of the many passages of Scripture which set forth the destiny of the lost. We now turn to an analysis of the biblical doctrine.

I. The State of the Lost in Their Final Punishment Is Death

Scripture clearly teaches that although it is ‘appointed unto men once to die,’ all men will also experience an ‘eschatological’ resurrection, i.e. a restoration of physical life, as a part of the divine program of the consummation. As seen in the previous chapters on the resurrection of the dead, though there is difference of opinion as to whether the unsaved shall rise from the dead at the same time the saved do, there is no difference among orthodox theologians about the fact of a resurrection to condemnation. Jesus spoke plainly of a physical resurrection of the lost for judgment: ‘the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, And shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation’ (John 5:28, 29 kjv).

It was given to John the Revelator to see a vision of the Last Judgment. He reports:

And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works.... And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death (Rev. 20:11, 12, 14 kjv).

This plain passage, together with Jesus’ parable-like ‘sheep and goats’ prophecy of Matthew 25, has shaped generations of Christian imagination of ‘the last judgment.’ We presently focus on one last detail of Revelation 20:14: ‘This is the second death.’ Many other passages, beginning with Genesis 2:17, connect all human death with sin as its invariable penalty. But what is death?

There are three conditions which the Bible calls death. Each one consists of a separation, or alienation, of what normally should be in union. We are familiar with one of them as physical death.

Technical discussions aside for the moment, when the Apostle Paul dies he not only, like Adam, returns to the ground from which he was taken (Gen. 2:17; 3:19), but he also departs to be with Christ in heaven, which is far better (Phil. 1:21–24); he is ‘absent from the body’ and ‘present with the Lord’ (2 Cor. 5:8 kjv). That which is present with the Lord when a believer dies is a ‘soul’ (Rev. 6:9 ff.; 20:4). Some recent theology, seeking an orthodox basis for shifting the chief emphasis of the church from spiritual matters to social ones sometimes overemphasizes an alleged ‘indissoluble unity’ of man—spiritual and physical. To the contrary, while man is normally such a unity, the unity was disturbed and in part destroyed by sin at the beginning and is fully ruptured at physical death. Anthropology must come to terms with eschatology! ‘[T]he body apart from the spirit is dead’ (James 2:26) and from another point of view, when the body goes to dissolution and the spirit goes to God, the man is dead even though his spirit has departed to Paradise or Hades.

Spiritual death is alienation of man from his creator-God. God had threatened this too (Gen. 2:17), and it occurred upon the occasion of the original sin (Gen. 3:8 ff.). Spiritual death is the present condition of all men apart from a new birth for ‘we all’ are ‘dead in the trespasses and sins ... by nature children of wrath ... alienated from the life of God’ (Eph. 2:1, 3; 4:18), and that because of our connection natural and federal with Adam (Rom. 5:12–21); hence ‘sin reigned in death.’

But what will the ‘second death’ be? I think the simplest explanation, the literal one, probably is the correct one. In their final judgment men shall stand before God in physical bodies. What the capacities of those bodies may be, we are not told, but we are told that in the judgment men will be physically alive. Their condemnation to everlasting banishment from God’s presence is perpetuation of spiritual death—alienation forever from their Creator, in whom alone is life. Cast into a ‘lake of fire,’ punished with ‘everlasting destruction,’ they shall die physically again, existing forever in the state of permanent disembodiment. There are competent interpreters who treat the expression figuratively (and there certainly are figurative elements in the book of Revelation). Yet there is no clear biblical parallel to such use of ‘second’ as indicating something like ‘consummate degree’ or ‘ultimate.’ Besides being the literal sense of the phrase, punishment in a disembodied state during final eternity is parallel to, and rendered feasible by, such punishment of the wicked during the state intermediate between death and the final judgment, in a disembodied state. Though his body was in a grave somewhere, Dives, the ‘rich man,’ was ‘in anguish in this flame’ (Luke 16:24)! Before proceeding onward, let us put ourselves on notice that death is not the same as extinction, cessation of existence or annihilation. In the Bible, dead men exist—and consciously so—quite as truly as living men. In Jesus’ familiar story of the rich man and Lazarus, when ‘The poor man died’ he was carried by the angels to ‘Abraham’s side’ and the rich man also having died and being buried, ‘in Hades, being in torment, he lifted up his eyes’ (viz. Luke 16:19 ff.). Both men continued to exist as men. Think also of Jesus’ words to the repentant thief and of Paul’s expectation.

Passages which refer to a dead man as being buried (and there are lots of them) are only employing the common manner of speaking the Bible usually employs. They do not deny the common scriptural teaching that life is one mode of human existence, death another. It will be helpful to know that ‘destruction’ in ‘the way ... that leads to destruction’ (Matt. 7:13) is a verbal form of the same word rendered ‘destroy’ in the place where Jesus speaks of God’s power to ‘destroy both soul and body' in Gehenna (Matt. 10:28). So extinction of being is not what the 'destruction' of death means. The word for destruction or destroy in each of the passages just cited is always a form of apollumi (verb) or apoleia (noun). The use of this term by the happy father in Jesus' story of the prodigal son will help us to see what the true sense of the word is. After the prodigal had come home again the father declared, to the elder brother, 'your brother was dead, and is alive; he was lost [apollumi], and is found' (Luke 15:32). Specifically, to be lost (or destroyed) is the opposite of being found, not the opposite of existence.

Destroyed things, in the biblical sense (as in most discourse in English), are rendered useless, out of order, wasted, unable to perform the normal part in ongoing existence; they are not rendered extinct or annihilated. So when the wicked are said to be destroyed in hell, as several texts in one way or another do say, the meaning is that they are put out of order, wasted, made useless there, but not extinct.

II. The Measure of Final Punishment Is Deeds Done in Life

The terms of this sentence are suggested by extracts from Paul: 'God's righteous judgment ... will render to each one according to his works' (Rom. 2:5, 6) 'For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive what is due for what he has done in the body, whether good or evil' (2 Cor. 5:10). Also there is one from Peter to the effect that judgment is to be 'in the flesh the way people are' (1 Peter 4:6).

The simple teachings captured in the rubric above signify that what people do is of eternal consequence, their deeds bearing directly on their final eternal condition and that all the deeds of consequence for that final state are performed in the 'here and now.' Eternal destiny is settled here and now without opportunity for revision of the record or change of destiny after death.

It is the uniform teaching of the Bible that God has scheduled a 'time' or 'day' or 'hour' of final judgment. In this chapter our interest is not how that judgment relates to the redeemed, but to the lost. As we found in studying the doctrine of judgment, the basis of God's verdict on that day will be what people have done. We are assured that divine law will be the formal basis, laws about deeds (see Ps. 1:2, 6). The second chapter of Romans assures its readers that the judgment of God accords to truth (v. 2), that God will decide without partiality (v. 11; cf. 1 Peter 1:17), and that He shall uncover 'the secrets of men' (v. 16) in doing so. All this however is in specific relation to people's actions, for the passage focuses on deeds, referring to the wicked as those who 'because of your hard and impenitent heart ... are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath when God's righteous judgment will be revealed. He will render to each one according to his works: ... wrath and fury ... tribulation and distress for every human being who does evil' (Rom. 2:5, 6, 8, 9). An impressive array of passages could be added.³ The words which people speak are specifically joined with the deeds they do as being together the works to be judged, i.e. words are a species of works, for, as Jesus Himself said, the Son of Man shall not only 'repay each person according to what he has done' (Matt. 16:27) but that 'on the day of judgment people will give account for every careless word they speak' (Matt. 12:36; cf. Jude 15).

These things being true, several further aspects of the doctrine of judgment appear. There is not a large amount of revelation on the subject but enough to allow several firm statements. Here are some of them.

Though sin is a habit which, if unchanged by personal salvation in Christ, will persist in hell forever, consignment to that dread place is on the basis of deeds performed in the here and now, done ‘in the body,’ as ‘men in the flesh.’ Though the continuing wicked thoughts of people in hell may provide some justification for the unending punishment which the Bible denounces, Scripture says nothing about it. People’s words and deeds in the present life are the crucial ones.

Judgment according to deeds, on logical grounds, demands grades and degrees of punishment, though a firm basis for a doctrine of proportionate rewards (for the righteous deeds of righteous people) and punishments is based primarily on texts which affirm it rather than on logic. In a former age, when Christian doctrines (as opposed to the present preoccupation with feelings only) was thought to be a fit subject for lyrical expression, the first important American poet, a Puritan, of course, wrote a poem of judgment and hell which still turns up in symposiums of American literature. Michael Wigglesworth—preacher, physician, poet of New England (1631–1705), famous as a poet throughout Puritan America⁴ and to a lesser degree in England as well—was pastor of a single church at Malden for forty-nine years, till his death in 1705. Our present interest is in his ‘The Day of Doom,’ America’s first significant poem. Early in the long semi-epic the composer prays:

The God of Heaven grant
These lines so well to speed
That thou the things of thine own peace
Through them may’st better heed;
And may’st be stirred up
To stand upon thy guard,
That Death and Judgment may not come,
And find thee unprepared.

As the imaginary description of Judgment Day moves on, the least hell-deserving are represented as being brought before the bar of God and there hear Him say:

A crime it is; therefore in bliss
you may not hope to dwell;
But unto you I shall allow the easiest room in Hell.

Now we must admit that Wigglesworth’s lyric does not fall on appreciative ears today, even among those in agreement with his high Calvinism. And though we have no firm biblical teaching affirming various ‘rooms in hell’ corresponding to the ‘many mansions’ of ‘the Father’s House,’ the idea of graduation of punishments, as affirmed above, is a logical correlate of the doctrine of judgment and has a sufficient biblical basis. In the law of Moses, for example, some crimes were punishable by fines, some with flogging, a few with banishment and a very few by death. In a statement about the judgment, Jesus affirmed ‘that servant who knew his master’s will but did not get ready or act according to his will, will receive a severe beating. But the one who did not know, and did what deserved a beating, will receive a light beating’ (Luke 12:47, 48). Similarly Sodom, famous of old for sin, and Tyre and Sidon, two wicked pagan cities, will find affairs ‘more bearable’ at ‘the day of judgment’ than will the towns of Palestine which received the benefit of the Savior’s ministry (Matt. 11:20–24; Luke 10:12–15).

Modern theories of penology, based on correction of offenders, deterrence of offenses in society and protection of society, have little if any place in a rationale for such statements about punishments. In the biblical view, sinners are offenders against divine laws, which in turn are expressions of justice which finds its root in the divine character and will. Deserved punishment should be inflicted only because it is right to do so.

This explanation of law and justice is true on all levels. It is the clear teaching of Scripture that when punishment is just, then and only then is it either preventive or corrective. In the final punishment, while there likely is some benefit by way of isolating incorrigibly wicked souls from the rest of God’s creation, they are put forever beyond the reach of correction. People fear light because their deeds are evil and they fear exposure. Because they resist correction here and now they must be punished hereafter—not because they are proper subjects of improvement but because their deeds were evil! For such people life itself becomes day by day a preparation for final punishment, just as other people’s lives are a daily promise of future glory. ‘While there are people whose offenses are so obvious that they run before them into court [judgment], there are others whose offenses have not yet overtaken them. Similarly, good deeds are obvious, or even if they are not, they cannot be concealed forever’ (1 Tim. 5:24, 25 neb). People today are inclined to scoff at any anxious thought about such things—which makes for bad life adjustment, they say—but this is not the biblical wisdom of Moses, the man of God in Psalm 90:7–12:

For we are brought to an end by your anger;

by your wrath we are dismayed.

You have set our iniquities before you, our secret sins in the light of your presence.

For all our days pass away under your wrath;

we bring our years to an end like a sigh.

The years of our life are seventy, or even by reason of strength eighty;

yet their span is but toil and trouble;

they are soon gone, and we fly away.

Who considers the power of your anger, and your wrath according to the fear of you?

So teach us to number our days that we may get a heart of wisdom.

Serious contemplation of the many passages like this one will make it clear that all people ought to consider death and eternity now. They should ‘seek the Lord while he may be found.’ It is good for believers to temper their presently touted joie de vivre with sober contemplation of their coming meeting at a judgment seat of Christ (Rom. 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:13–15; 2 Cor. 5:10). Contemplation of the future life in heaven has always been a Calvinist emphasis, beginning with Calvin himself; it is an important aspect of biblical Christianity. There is a frightening possibility that if our pastoral efforts are completely successful in getting people’s anxieties quieted and their lives well adjusted, the same people will some day slip peacefully into perdition. Rather let us set before them A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life.⁵

Punishment according to deeds is possible only because the judge is to be an all-knowing and all-wise God. He will be fully aware of mitigating circumstances of every sort. No, there is no promise, as the somewhat sub-biblical song has it, ‘He’ll understand and say, “Well done,” ’ but rather, ‘He’ll understand and see that what is done is right.’ As everyone ought to know, to break the commandments of God is wrong, but not all acts of law-breaking, though culpable, are equally blameworthy. Even human law and jurisprudence recognizes the principle: ‘Circumstances alter cases.’

Hence, in civil law there are several degrees of murder, from premeditated (‘in the first degree’), punishable by death, to homicide by preventable accident, which is punishable by fine or short-term imprisonment, and similar. This same feature is to be found in Mosaic law, as noted earlier. So there are the varying degrees of blameworthiness noted in Luke 12:47, 48; Matthew 11:20–24; and Luke 10:12–15, also observed earlier. One of the circumstances God will take into consideration will be the degree of knowledge of divine law involved. ‘Ignorance is no excuse,’ but it is an ameliorating circumstance. God also knows the hidden hereditary weaknesses individuals carry, the faulty training they have had, the perverted misdirections of conscience, quirks of disposition and the effects of training and environment. These all affect the record of the deeds of personal beings, responsible before their Creator for every deed. Otherwise God’s judgment could not be wholly just when the time comes to ‘render to each according to his works.’

There are consequences for evangelism in this New Testament point of view. We must work to save people now, for ‘night is coming, when no one can work’ (John 9:4). Yet, while laboring to save the lost from hell’s danger, we must be careful lest the perils of our closeness to them and our intimate dealings with them do not destroy our power and willingness to proclaim and counsel, as Jude puts it, ‘There are some doubting souls who need your pity; some you should snatch from the flames and save; there are others for whom your pity must be mixed with fear; hate the very garment that is contaminated with sensuality’ (Jude 22, 23 neb margin). ‘There are grave dangers to the soul in aggressive evangelism! Be aggressive! Yet be on your guard!’ Jude seems to say.

III. The Nature of the Final Punishment of the Lost Is Torment

The amount of information furnished on this aspect of the subject by the Scriptures, though small, is very impressive. Acknowledging at the start that many of the expressions are obviously figurative, the general sense of the passages on this subject is frighteningly clear. I shall present first an elaboration of the texts which form the basis of the above proposition and then try to sketch out details of the subject as far as the Scripture gives us leave to do so.

The nearest thing to a direct, complete statement about the nature of final punishment is a passage which treats the destiny of the followers of Antichrist (the ‘first beast’ of Rev. 13), as follows.

If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name (Rev. 14:9–11 kjv).

The phrases ‘shall be tormented,’ ‘their torment’ and ‘no rest day or night’ capture the idea of the essential nature of the punishments of hell. The verb (basanidzō, to torment), though used in non-biblical Greek of torture in judicial examination, has no such special sense in any biblical text. Its primary sense is any severe pain, whether physical (see Rev. 12:1, of childbirth) or mental (see 2 Peter 2:8, Lot’s mental distress at the sins of Sodomites). The corresponding noun (basanismos) here means the pain of being tortured. It is as simple as that. In the case of the rich man in Hades (Luke 16:23) and his ‘being in torment’ (basanois, sing. basanos, a related word of similar meaning) is employed. Being in ‘torment’ uses the word huparchōn, a strong word meaning ‘existing,’ emphasizing the permanence of the torments. When the rich man later says ‘I am tormented’, a different Greek word (odunaō) is employed but it means essentially the same. So the idea is still simple—exactly the same as the English word ‘torment’ means. It is appropriate to add that the passive voice, ‘they shall be tormented,’ points to God, as is frequent in similar biblical constructions (see Isa. 53:5 of Messiah’s sufferings), as the agent in bringing the torment about. God will be acting there no less than He was when the Lord ‘laid on him the iniquity of us all’ and ‘it was the will of the Lord to crush him.’ Though in divine providence and human history Pilate, Herod, the Roman soldiers, the Sanhedrin and assembled Jewish people killed Jesus (Acts 2:23; 3:14; 4:27), it was God Himself who delivered the stroke which ‘laid on him the punishment due us all’ (Isa. 53:6 author’s translation).

There are several ways by which the torments of hell are represented. A number of passages say that the wicked will be punished with fire—‘the unquenchable fire ... thrown into hell ... where ... the fire is not quenched’ (Mark 9:44–48). The rich man in Hades claims that he is ‘in anguish in this flame’ (Luke 16:24) and the passage cited from Revelation 14:10, 11 speaks of ‘fire and sulphur’ as well as ‘smoke.’ Once Jesus speaks of hell as the ‘eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels’ (Matt. 25:41).

On the contrary, other passages speak of hell as a dark place (unlike flames of fire). Jesus says that the unprofitable servant (all people are supposed to be God’s servants) shall be cast into ‘outer darkness’ (Matt. 25:30) as also unfaithful sons of the kingdom, to the accompaniment of ‘weeping and gnashing of teeth’ (Matt. 8:12). Similarly, for false prophets, such as Balaam, ‘the gloom of utter darkness has been reserved’ (2 Peter 2:17). One thinks of the blackness of interstellar space—a truly mind-numbing thought.

A related idea is that the place for wicked spirits is an abyss (i.e. a deep, or as in Rev. 20:1, 2: kjv, a bottomless pit). Satan’s minions swarm out of it (Rev. 9:2, 11). The leaders of the horde are called Abaddon and Apollyon, forms of the Hebrew and Greek words, for ‘perishing,’ ‘loss,’ ‘perdition,’ ‘destruction’ (see earlier comments herein on ‘destruction’). This place is the home of demon spirits (see Luke 8:31 where the deep is ‘abyss’). The torment is also said to be an undying worm (Mark 9:47, 48; cf. Isa. 66:24). The wicked, false prophets are destined to be forever ‘wandering stars’ (Jude 13)—one thinks of the comets and asteroids of outer space.

Finally, this punishment is said to be submission to God, even if compelled, on the part of infernal spirits ‘under the earth’ (Phil. 2:10) and an ‘eternal punishment’ (Matt. 25:46)—i.e. a punishment belonging to eternity, whatever in specific that may be.

Let me propose some feasible interpretations of these—at least mainly—figurative terms. Holding in mind that having experienced a ‘second death’ (and hence being disembodied spirits as in their state between first death and the resurrection for judgment) some of the terms seem quite understandable. The eternal fires may be remorse, for ‘Of all the sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these: “It might have been.” ’ The darkness has been equated with exclusion from God’s presence forever; the wandering to everlasting loneliness; and the abyss of endless descent, to the utter hopelessness of hell. The lost are ‘without hope’ even now. Imagination fails when one thinks of the hopelessness of eternity without Him.

The developing Enlightenment which came to be called ‘modernism’ intruded upon the thinking even of the orthodox in the late nineteenth century; hence arose an extensive literature, furious as well as reasonable, in defense of the orthodox historic doctrine. In the year 1881 a small volume of 150 pages by a scholarly American pastor, Rev. John W. Daley (The Hereafter of Sin: What it Will Be; Answers to Certain Questions and Objections), summarized about all that ever has been said or can be said by way of interpreting the expressions, literal and figurative, regarding the ‘nature’ of ‘future retribution.’ He made nine points. Further retribution will consist of the following.

1. Consciousness of personal blame. He cites Matthew 25:46; Luke 16:25; several theologians; and the painful admissions of Lord Byron.

2. A deep and abiding sense of shame. He quotes Jeremy Taylor; and refers to Ecclesiastes 12:14; Matthew 12:36; Mark 4:22; Luke 8:17; and 12:2, 3.

3. Remorse of conscience. He quotes Dorner and Martineau and the ‘famous scene’ of Lady

Macbeth ‘endeavoring to wash an imaginary blood-stain from her hand’—‘Out damned spot!’

4. The withdrawal of good and saving influences—of which the lost will be aware. He cites Matthew 25:29; and Luke 8:18; and exegetes Trench, Meyer, Lange, Murphy, and Taylor. All the brakes have now failed. He cites Psalm 81:13; Romans 1:24–28; Mark 3:29; and Revelation 22:11.

5. Consciousness of a self-perpetuating tendency for moral character. The only movement is downward. Habit has taken over forever. He refers to many literary and doctrinal authorities and, of course, to Jeremiah 13:23.

6. A conviction of the hopelessness of their condition. In Dante, there is the message, ‘All hope abandon, ye who enter here,’ over the gate of hell. He cites Luke 16:26; Matthew 22:13; 25:41; the chasm between Abraham’s bosom and Hades in Luke 12; and Isaiah 57:20, 21.

7. The raging of unholy and unsatisfied passions and desires. We leave behind all objects of desire, 1 Timothy 4:7 (his longest section).

8. The miserable ‘society of that dark world.’ ‘Companionship may prove to man the greatest blessing or the greatest curse.’ Adam needed the society of Eve. Outside the heavenly Jerusalem are only those described in Revelation 21:8 and 22:15 as incorrigibly evil.

9. Last and most burdensome: an unfailing sense of the displeasure of the Almighty. John 3:36, ‘The wrath of God remains on him.’

Among his concluding lines are the words: ‘These, as we gather from Scripture and reason are some of the ingredients of that cup of woe which the finally impenitent must drain to the dregs. We say “some” for there may be others of which we have no knowledge “... the wages of sin.” ’⁶

I know Christians whom I would like to count as friends who are mightily upset about anything other than a literal-material interpretation of the phrases and sentences just now discussed. If they have a formula wherein fire and darkness, worms and a bottomless pit, disembodiment and a tongue tormented by flame, with consistency, logic and good sense can be interpreted literally, we shall all be willing to let them be our teachers, but I think they shall not succeed and are obviously on the wrong track. As many utterly devout and godly teachers have observed, when the subject matter of revelation transcends anything of direct human experience, when even direct analogies break down, God teaches us by symbols and figures. The literal realities represented by the symbols will be immeasurably more meaningful than the symbols. Hence to employ the symbols is in no wise to degrade or depreciate the realities.

In Four Views of Hell, Dr John Walvoord—a longtime friend—was assigned the first essay, ‘The Literal View.’ For some reason he surveys the whole doctrine of the final state of the unsaved—views, history of the doctrine, objections and the like—and devotes only two-thirds of his last page to the main question, ‘Is the fire of eternal punishment to be understood literally?’ In refutation of ‘The Metaphorical View’ he adamantly refuses to budge, though he does not explain how Dives (the rich man of Luke 16), in a disembodied state in ‘hades,’ could suffer physical pain from literal, material flame. It is apparent that Dr Walvoord is trying (valiantly but ineffectively, I think) to protect ‘literal’ or grammatico-historical interpretation of the predictive parts of the Bible. Most of his four-page rebuttal of metaphorical interpretation of ‘the fire’ of hell is, as he says, to prove ‘the metaphorical view requires a non-literal interpretation of prophecy.’⁷

Scripture employs figurative language no less in describing the eternal home of the blest than the final ‘place’ of the damned. ‘Why?’ asked Thomas Boston, the pastor of Ettrick, Scotland in the time of the prevalence of Puritanism, ‘Why are the things of another world represented to us in an earthly dress?’ He answers, ‘because the weakness of our capacities ... requires it; it being always supposed that the things of the other world are in their kind more perfect than those by which they are represented.’ As to why hell is represented in so many different ways in Scripture, the worthy scholar-pastor says that ‘the reason of it is plain; namely, that hereby what of horror is wanting in one notion of hell, is supplied by another.’ Similarly ‘heaven’s happiness’ is ‘represented under the various notions of a treasure, a paradise, a feast, a rest’ and similar.⁸

IV. The Duration of the Punishment of the Lost Is Everlasting

Such is the plain sense of several clear statements of Jesus, who said more about it than any biblical prophet or writer. We have had occasion to note His warnings against the place where the ‘worm does not die and the fire is not quenched’ (Mark 9:47, 48) and of hell’s ‘eternal fire’ (Matt. 18:8) and of ‘eternal punishment’ (Matt. 25:46). We have also seen how the terrible smoke of the torment of Antichrist’s followers goes up ‘for ever and ever’ (Rev. 14:11).

Now, at this point those who wish to expect something like universal salvation of all people, restitution of most of the wicked or their utter annihilation, usually start to talk about Greek words. Some of them do not do so very knowledgably, but they do make a show of scholarship. And since their messengers are often at the front door seeking to peddle books and supposed Bible translations supporting their doctrines, it seems necessary here to devote some space to the meaning of the terms used in Scripture for the everlasting duration of the final punishment of the wicked. I will try to be as non-technical as possible.

The New Testament words for ‘everlasting’ are chiefly one noun (aiōn, often translated ‘world’ or ‘age’) and one adjective (aiōnios) derived from it. In the New Testament these words are arranged in essentially three ways to express ‘everlasting’—be it life, death, punishment, the life of God, or whatever. The simplest idiom (adj., aiōnios) I shall render ‘aionian,’ the more complicated combination ‘unto ages’ or ‘unto the ages,’ as the case may be, and the most complicated ‘unto ages of ages’ or ‘unto the ages of the ages,’ as the case may be.

These standard expressions for endless futurity in the New Testament are used firstly of the endless life of God or of Christ, viz. ‘the everlasting God’ (the aionian God, Rom. 16:26 kjv), ‘Christ remains for ever’ (Christ remains unto the age, John 12:34), ‘I am alive for evermore’ (I am alive unto the ages of the ages, Rev. 1:18).

They are employed, secondly, of the believer’s eternal life: viz. ‘but have eternal life’ (but have aionian life, John 3:16 and forty-four times in John alone); ‘eternal salvation’ (aionian salvation, Heb. 5:9); ‘eternal redemption’ (aionian redemption, Heb. 9:12); ‘he will live for ever’ (he will live unto the age, John 6:51); ‘and they will reign for ever and ever’ (and they shall reign unto the ages of the ages, Rev. 22:5).

Two of these standard expressions are used to set forth the contrast between the everlasting and the temporal: viz. ‘For the things that are seen are transient [lit., for a season], but the things that are unseen are eternal [aionian]’ (2 Cor. 4:18); ‘God ... has called you to his eternal [aionian] glory,’ etc. (1 Peter 5:10); ‘they were prevented ... from continuing ... but he ... continues for ever [unto the age]’ (Heb. 7:23, 24).

These are the very same standard expressions used by Scripture to designate the everlasting duration of the punishment of the wicked. Aiōnian, for example, appears in the phrase ‘eternal punishment’ at Matthew 25:46 and, most significantly again, in the same verse of the believer’s everlasting life. Jude 13 employs unto (an) age in the phrase ‘the gloom of utter darkness ... for ever,’ and in John 10:28 the phrase ‘will never perish’ literally translates unto the ages as ‘never.’ In Revelation 14:17 (which I have cited several times) unto ages of ages is translated ‘forever and ever,’ while in Revelation 19:3 (‘The smoke from her goes up for ever and ever’) the same English words translate unto the ages of the ages, the fullest and strongest of the expressions.

We conclude therefore the following: (a) in a context of the life of the redeemed or the punishment of the lost these expressions must mean endless time. (b) The very variety of usage (three main categories, with minor variations of two, making five in all) indicate effort to exhaust the possibilities of the language for expression of endlessness. If we were to translate the English Bible into the common Greek of the first century we would have to employ them. (c) Though these Greek words do sometimes refer to periods of limited time—limited by the nature of the things connected (e.g. the epoch of the gospel in Matt. 28:20 where ‘world’ is aiōn)—the context will always make this clear (see Matt. 12:23 also, where ‘world’ is aiōn). (d) Qualitative distinctions may sometimes be indicated by ‘eternal’ (aiōnios, aiōn, etc.) but in such cases it is not because quality is in any manner inherent in the meaning of such words. Rather, as in all languages, words can be drawn away from their normal sphere of use into uses not strictly proper to them, especially when the language lacks proper words for such meanings. Such a case may be the use of ‘eternal’ in 2 Corinthians 5:1 which refers in a puzzling manner to the resurrection body as now ‘eternal in the heavens.’ There is no reason at all for making a rare or even non-existent sense the prevalent one.⁹

V. The Place of the Final Punishment Is Hell, Also Called the Lake of Fire and Gehenna

The word ‘hell,’ found often in Scripture as a name for the place wherein the wicked go immediately after they die, is also the commonest English translation of other terms for the place wherein they are to be punished forever. The English word ‘hell’ translates several Greek and Hebrew words, but does so quite adequately, for the right idea is conveyed by it. Though the old Saxon word helan, from which it is derived, means ‘to cover’ (hence, hell, the covered or unseen world of the dead), ‘it has been so long appropriated in common usage to the place of future punishment for the wicked, that its earlier meaning has been lost sight of.’ This common meaning is the one the translators of the Authorized Version (1611) convey when sometimes they use it in the Old Testament to render Sheol and in the New Testament to render Hades and Gehenna. True, frequently as in Luke 16, the ‘hell’ (or Hades) is to be emptied into the place of final punishment (Rev. 1:12, 13), the distinction, however valid, is not very important. What English-speaking people mean by ‘hell’ when they thoughtfully use the word is what the biblical words mean also.

Among the Jews when our Lord walked among men, a common name for this place was evidently ‘Gehenna.’ It appears twelve times in the New Testament and, except for James 3:6, only in the speeches of the Savior of men, Himself (Matt. 5:22, 29, 30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5). The practice of translating this word by ‘hell,’ which in utterly unambiguous fashion refers to the place of final punishment of the wicked, is older than the Authorized or King James Version of 1611 and is quite properly continued by recent scholarly translators. neb, for example, does so consistently.

At this point, an interesting, if somewhat horrifying, story about words and geography is appropriate and seems necessary. When the Land of Canaan was apportioned to the twelve tribes under Joshua, the border between Judah and Benjamin was run just south of Jerusalem ‘by the valley of the son of Hinnom.’ This valley was very near a south gate of Jerusalem (Jer. 19:2). Though originally just an ordinary patch of real estate (as it is now again and has been for centuries), its proximity to Jerusalem and relative isolation, owing to the fact of its being a rather narrowly confined ravine, made it a convenient center for a particularly heinous form of apostate religious cult-practice in ancient Israel.

Here two apostate kings, both under the influence of Syrian and Mesopotamian religion, carried out human sacrifice—the burning of infants to the worship of Moloch (also Moleck, Milcom, Malcham, Melcom), a fire god, specially honored by the Ammonites. The above-mentioned kings, Ahaz and Manasseh, made their children to ‘pass through the fire’ to Moloch in this ravine (or valley) before idols and altars erected therein at a place called ‘Topheth’ (or Tophet) (2 Kgs. 16:3; 2 Chr. 28:3; 2 Kgs. 23:10; 2 Chr. 33:6; see also Jer. 7:31, 32). Archaeology of Carthage has turned up acres of the cemetery or Tophet for the infants sacrificed at that colony of Canaan in North Africa. So now we know what the word Tophet means.

Josiah put an end to these wretched ceremonies (2 Kgs. 23:10–14), but they were shortly thereafter briefly revived (Jer. 11:10–13; Ezek. 20:30; cf. Jer. 7:32; 19:11). In late times, according to Jewish sources, when the Jewish people were cured of idol-worship, the defiled gully was used as a city dump for Jerusalem with fires constantly smoldering there. It served also as a place for disposal of corpses of beasts and unwanted, unclaimed human corpses. It has been said that Jesus’ body would have ended up there had not friends lovingly provided otherwise (Isa. 53:9 asv).

This place, it is affirmed, furnishes the imagery for the terrible description of the eternal punishment of apostates found in Isaiah 66:24: ‘And they shall go out and look on the dead bodies of the men who have rebelled against me. For their worm shall not die, their fire shall not be quenched, and they shall be an abhorrence to all flesh.’ This vivid manner of referring to hell developed further during the inter-testamental period and later, as is easily traceable in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal literature. When Jesus lived, the words ‘ge-hinnom’ (Gr., ‘Gehenna’) meant hell, the place of eternal loss and retribution as regularly and certainly as ‘Waterloo,’ the place of Napoleon’s defeat, means defeat, or to ‘cross the Rubicon’ means not Caesar’s act at all but any important irrevocable commitment, or ‘Munich’ means appeasement, and so on. Significantly, in a similar manner ‘Paradise’—a Persian word for ‘garden’—came to be the name for ‘Heaven,’ the eternal home of the redeemed. When one visits Jerusalem today (unless the Israelis have made some unexpected topographical changes!) a short walk from the ‘dung gate’ can take one to the site of that strange, infamous property of Hinnom (belonging to some Canaanite farmer of long ago?). The persistent notion that the ‘Akeldama’ of the story of Judas (Acts 1:18, 19) was in the valley of Hinnom cannot be far from correct. There is (or was) a tumbledown Orthodox monastery there—inhabited the last time I visited it, several years ago, by a single ragged monk and a few scrawny chickens.

The passage describing this place as the ‘lake of fire’ will be quoted without further comment: ‘Then Death and Hades were thrown into the lake of fire. This is the second death, the lake of fire. And if anyone’s name was not found written in the book of life, he was thrown into the lake of fire’ (Rev. 20:14, 15).

Does the Doctrine Have a Practical Importance?

It is most significant that Gehenna, what we would today call a city dump, the place of discarded, corrupt and useless things, is the biblical name most frequently used by Jesus for hell. Hell is the place of discard, of uselessness, of abandonment, of eternal destruction; hell is the final smoldering trash-heap of the universe. The doctrine of hell has great importance for the moral life of the mankind. Jesus spoke of hell many times, always by way of supporting some moral imperative.

Some striking language in a tract I selected from a literature rack in an Episcopal church, renders this poignantly:

For this reason, then, I believe that hell has a very practical importance in our Christian lives. Most of us treat life entirely too lightly. We say, ‘What difference does it make what I do or choose or think?’ Hell reminds us it does make a difference. Life is earnest ... every day we choose between life and death, every hour we look toward God or toward destruction, we stand between heaven and hell. This is why Jesus had such an offensive earnestness as he looked at Gehenna: ‘If thy hand offend thee, cut it off, if thy foot offend thee, cut it off, if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out.’ Did he mean to mutilate our bodies? Not at all. He meant that what our hand may choose, our foot may do, our eye may see, can take us moment by moment on the road either to heaven or to hell. That’s how important our decisions are in this life; they determine character and character stands for all eternity.¹⁰

Robert Peterson proposes two reasons for ‘such terrible doctrine: to provide believers with powerful motivation for evangelism, and to make us grateful to him who redeemed us by suffering the pains of hell for us.’¹¹

¹ W. G. T. Shedd, The Doctrine of Endless Punishment (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1886), pp. 158, 159.

² Emil Brunner, Dogmatics III (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962), pp. 420–424.

³ See Eccles. 12:14; Ps. 28:4; Prov. 24:13; Jer. 25:14; John 3:18–21; 1 Tim. 5:24, 25; Rev. 2:2, 5, 9, 13, 19, 23, 26; 3:1, 2, 8, 15; 20:12, 13.

⁴ With the decline of orthodoxy in the heirs of New England Puritanism some of them (Hawthorne, Emerson, et al) slandered their ancestral theology. Puritans were aware of the orthodox, biblical doctrine of hell but were not generally preoccupied with it. For example, Thomas Boston, a Scot of the Puritan era (1676–1752), produced a widely read, substantial work on Human Nature in its Fourfold State (1720, repr. London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1964). Of the 500 pages of the book only thirty pages deal with ‘Hell.’ Lamentably, Jonathan Edward’s famous sermon on ‘Sinners in the Hand of an Angry God’ is the only part of his voluminous writings most people know about. Not only were the Puritans not puritanical, they were not morbid about life or death or, as forgiven sinners, either unconcerned or preoccupied with the terrors of hell.

⁵ William Law, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (reprint, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1966).

⁶ John W. Daley, The Hereafter of Sin: What it Will Be; Answers to Certain Questions and Objections (Andover, Mass., 1881), pp. 1–63.

⁷ John F. Walvoord, Wm. Crockett, Zachary J. Hayes, Clark H. Pinnock, Four Views on Hell, ed. Wm. Crockett (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996), pp. 78–81.

⁸ Thomas Boston, Human Nature in its Fourfold State (London: The Banner of Truth Trust, first printing, 1720, 1964), p. 4.

⁹ Mention should be made of the claims that aiōn (age, eternal) and derivatives refer to quality rather than quantity—especially as applied to ‘eternal life’ (dzōēn aiōnion, John 3:16). TDNT does not recognize such a meaning in its long article. Robert W. Yarbrough says that the terms relate ‘especially to the quality of life in this age, and to both the quality and duration of life in the age to come’ (EDBT, ‘Eternal Life, Eternality, Everlasting,’ p. 209). Yet throughout the article he treats the terms only as indicating duration, and demonstrates that time and eternity have connection, rejecting the Thomist notion that ‘eternity is a motionless, changeless state, remote and qualitatively distinct from time.... The Old Testament like the New Testament resists this time-eternity dualism’ (ibid.).

¹⁰ The Meaning of Hell (Boston: Whittemon Associates, n.d., no author’s name).

¹¹ Robert Peterson, ‘Eternal Punishment’ in EDBT, p. 313.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1074). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Some Perversions and Denials of the Scriptural Doctrine¹

The perversions and denials of the scriptural doctrine which here concern us are those made in the name of Christian truth. The ingenious efforts to expound these ideas have created an enormous literature which to cite and document here is impossible. D. A. Carson has competently addressed the problem of pluralism, but acknowledges some limitations to this expanding character of the present spirit of the age in a book of 600-plus pages.² His chapter on the subject of this chapter is entitled, ‘Banishing the Lake of Fire.’ After sketching some of what I call perversions and denials and suggesting answers, he wisely concludes his chapter with this paragraph:

Despite the sincerity of their motives, one wonders more than a little to what extent the growing popularity of various forms of annihilationism and conditional immortality are a reflection of this age of pluralism. It is getting harder and harder to be faithful to the ‘hard’ lines of Scripture. And in this way evangelicalism itself may contribute to the gagging of God by silencing the severity of its warnings and by minimising the awfulness of the punishment that justly awaits those untouched by his redeeming grace.³

How much more direct and convincing the biblical passages which affirm the doctrine!

How does one explain the singular persistence among Bible-honoring Christians of doctrines which fly in the face of some of the strongest language in the Bible? Universalism, also called restorationism and apokatastasis from Peter’s remarks (Acts 8:21), the doctrine that all sinners will ultimately be saved and annihilationism, the doctrine that the incorrigibly unrepentant will cease to exist, as well as the Post-Mortem Evangelism teaching, have been consistently, unanimously and invariably rejected by every orthodox body of Christians in the history of our faith. Donald G. Bloesch gingerly advocates the possibility of conversion after death, describing it as Post-Mortem faith and repentance. In his Essentials of Evangelical Theology (otherwise quite traditional orthodoxy) he proposes that repentance and faith may arise in sinners after death and that God will not withhold mercy even then. He cites as scriptural warrant, Isaiah 26:19; John 5:25–29; Ephesians 4:8, 9; 1 Peter 3:19, 20; and 4:6.⁴ These opinions have never wanted earnest advocates (scholarly and unlearned), making every conceivable appeal to Scripture, to antiquity, to reason, to dogma and to sentiment.

Roots in Feelings of Sympathy

It is safe to say that distaste for the scriptural teaching of everlasting punishment of the lost finds its chief support in natural human feelings of sympathy and in native common sense. As to the former, I cite a striking example. Robert Browning, ‘the preacher’s poet,’ tells how in the year 1856, while visiting Paris, he stepped into a city morgue where he saw three corpses laid out, each a suicide by drowning in the Seine. One, he theorized to be a disappointed politician, the second an anarchist and the third a gambler disappointed at cards. Then the tenderhearted poet wrote:

It’s wiser being good than bad;

It’s safer being meek than fierce;

It’s fitter being sane than mad.

My own hope is, a sun will pierce

The thickest cloud earth ever stretched

That after Last returns the First,

Though a wide compass round be fetched;

That what began best, can't end worst,

Nor what God blessed once, prove accursed.

These lines from 'Apparent Failure' do not state a doctrine, they only express what Browning called 'my own hope.' Tennyson, whose life, like Browning's, spanned most of the Victorian era, devotes many lines of his grandest poem, 'In Memoriam,' to meandering expressions of similar thoughts, closing with the famous fainthearted sentiment:

I stretch lame hands of faith, and grope,

And gather dust and chaff, and call

To what I feel is Lord of all,

And faintly trust the larger hope.

Browning's 'my own hope' and Tennyson's 'faintly trust the larger hope' furnish the tone of most 'evangelical' advocacy of restorationism and second chance (a few) and annihilationism (some in every age). Browning and Tennyson were among the most learned poets of the great Victorian epoch; both were intelligent and articulate and both were earnest Christians. Neither ever wrote a learned treatise advocating universal salvation, yet their mutual tenderness of heart, not well-balanced by steady awareness of biblical teachings, brought forth these dainty, inchoate expressions. It has ever been so, for the greatest dangers in this quarter do not arise from the Unitarian-Universalist churches but from the ever-present natural human sympathy for people who suffer, certainly stronger among the regenerate than among the unregenerate. Aside from the biblical revelation, universal salvation is a doctrine our hearts find it easy to believe.

Roots in Common Sense Rationalism

The sentiment which responds favorably so readily to 'the larger hope' finds a strong ally in common sense. It is true that the orthodox Christian doctrine is supported everywhere by the poignant pricks of conscience (what rationalist's conscience declares with certitude that there cannot be a hell?), yet reflective people cannot help but wonder how a finite person, a mere speck in the ocean of created reality, can possibly commit any act of evil which calls for punishment in torments which last forever.

Charles Hodge (contemporary with the above poets), a firm supporter of the orthodox doctrine, compares it, in this respect, with the doctrine of salvation by God's free gift rather than by works, viz.:

Rationalists say that it is very impolitic [non-strategic] for Christians to represent the everlasting punishment of the wicked as a doctrine of the Bible. This is undoubtedly true. And so Paul felt that it was very impolitic to preach the doctrine of the cross. He knew that doctrine to be a stumbling-block to the Jew and foolishness to the Greek. He knew that had he preached the common sense doctrine of salvation by works, the offence of the Cross would have ceased. Nevertheless, he knew that the doctrine of Christ crucified was the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation. He knew that it was not his business to make a Gospel, but to declare that Gospel which had been taught him by the revelation of Jesus Christ.⁵

The Mood of Modern Denials

These characteristics of mankind have assured a perennial opening for doubt, if not rejection, of the truly frightful biblical doctrine, in every age of the church. The past four centuries have developed a climate of general intellectual, social and religious outlook which has rendered acceptance of the biblical teaching even more abhorrent than in previous centuries, even among Christian people. Mention could be made of the growth of skeptical, naturalistic, mechanistic ways of looking at everything. This, however, should not be a strong factor where people are genuinely Christian. There are some other influences, very powerful because people are unconscious of how they have taken possession of us. I take note of two: the prevalent humanism (often called humanitarianism) and pragmatism.

By humanism I mean that progressive shift of focus in our system of values which has been ever away from the glory of God, biblically understood, to the comfort, health, longevity and personal growth of man, secular man, temporally related, apart from his God-relatedness. By progressive and now accelerating degrees the proper love of neighbor has come to be to regard one's neighbor primarily in his temporal, social connections rather than in relation to God and with regard to his eternal destiny. In such a case it becomes hard to suppose that God, who presumably also puts such great emphasis on man's present comfort and happy adjustment, can ever consign any human being to everlasting torment. I am aware that several contemporary 'evangelical' theologians and their disciples will react very negatively to these assertions, but does not such reaction demonstrate how desperately this point needs to be made, if we are to remain truly biblical and Christian?

J.I. Packer, in connection with a related topic, made some telling comments as to the confused state in evangelical churches produced by this kind of thinking. His remarks were written before the false notion of God's 'universal salvific will' had gained currency among us and in that sense are somewhat predictive. The situation is worse now than when he wrote over forty years ago. I quote somewhat at length.

There is no doubt that Evangelicalism today is in a state of perplexity and unsettlement.... If we go to the root of the matter, we shall find that these perplexities are all ultimately due to our having lost our grip on the biblical gospel. Without realizing it, we have ... bartered away that gospel for a substitute product.... The new gospel conspicuously fails to produce a deep reverence, deep repentance, deep humility.... The subject of the old gospel was God and his ways with men: the subject of the New is man and the help God gives him.... Thus we appeal to men as if all had the ability to receive Christ at any time;

we speak of His redeeming work as if He had done no more in dying than make it possible to save ourselves by believing; we speak of God's love as if it was no more than general willingness to receive any who will turn and trust; and we depict the Father and the Son, not as sovereignly active in drawing sinners to himself but as awaiting in quiet impotence 'at the door of our hearts for us to let them in.'⁶

By pragmatism I have no reference to the theories of William James, rather the growing and amazingly prevalent, peculiarly American conviction, that what produces desired results must necessarily be true. 'If it ain't broke, don't fix it' and 'If it works it must be right.' The time has come when even in strictest evangelical circles it takes a great deal of courage strenuously to promote an idea or doctrine simply because it is biblical, right and true, quite apart from 'church growth' considerations. It often seems that effects on the feelings, responses, generosity, and good feelings of the public or constituency must come first. This now extends even to theories of Bible translation. It is part of the 'success ethic' of our time and the American nation. It tends to be the most prominent consideration in the choice of every kind of leader, not only in business and politics, where it might justly be expected, but also in selection of Christian college presidents, pastors and other church leaders.

1. Universalism, Also Called Restorationism and Apocatastasis

I must limit discussion of this ancient error to a few paragraphs. As already noted, it has an ancient lineage, beginning among Christians probably with Clement of Alexandria (c. 155–220). His brief remark was: 'For all things are arranged with a view to the salvation of the universe.'⁷ Origen of Alexandria, the first Christian scholar of eminence (c. 185–254), was the first to give the doctrine of universal salvation 'systematic' exposition.⁸ Clement supposed all punishment to be remedial and grounded his Universalism on that. Origen, his pupil and successor, argued on the ground of never-ending freedom of the will, here or hereafter, and the power of truth ultimately to prevail, that all would ultimately be saved. Origen, however, had frequent second thoughts on the subject, as Pierre Batifol points out.⁹ Universalism was condemned in several councils and synods of late antiquity, though some brave souls ventured to believe it privately and to teach it publicly. 'Universalism almost wholly disappeared during the period known as the Dark Ages, although there are occasional glimpses ... in the mutilated records which the papal Church has permitted to descend to us.'¹⁰

Varieties of Universalist Doctrine

Since Reformation times there have never been wanting a few sincere, otherwise orthodox advocates (and some thoroughly heterodox) of universal salvation. Since not really based on clear scriptural grounds, there has been no uniform Universalist doctrine. Three commonest shades of Universalist doctrine are proposed. (1) Sinners are punished for all their sins in this life and when they die go immediately to heaven, or, with a soul-sleep twist, they all die and at the general resurrection go to heaven. (2) More commonly, there is a real hell to which all unreconciled to God go for punishment. All punishment is held to be remedial, hence a sort of purgatory. After an indefinite period they are purified and then go to heaven. (3) More commonly all, including the devil, will attain apocatastasis (Gr. for restoration, Acts 3:21), though some exclude him. In reading about this subject I have found no uniformity in detail. Most, like the poets quoted earlier, are very indefinite—as to a degree, it must be acknowledged, all of us are when Scripture does not speak decisively about a topic of curious interest.

Modern Advocates

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Universalism attracted a number of advocates in Britain and America—notably canon F. W. Farrar (1831–1903), in whose 1877 book Eternal Hope he somewhat timidly advocated universal salvation (mentioned earlier). Universalism took sufficient hold in northeastern United States in the late eighteenth century for a formal organization of Universalist churches with a statement of belief, in Winchester, New Hampshire in 1803. The second article of their ‘Profession of Belief’ was ‘that there is one God, whose nature is love ... who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.’ Though at first somewhat biblically rooted, the Universalist church quickly wandered away from most recognizably historic Christian doctrinal commitments. They later merged with the Unitarian church, also restorationist. Their beliefs have spread and are now widely held by mostly liberal Protestants of many denominations.

In the past 100 years many notable liberal theologians have held some form of apocatastasis doctrine.¹¹ I say ‘liberal’ advisedly, for the Report of the Evangelical Alliance Commission correctly concluded that ‘a universalist stance ... is not an option for evangelicals.’¹²

I have already said something of Karl Barth’s views. He denies the charge of Universalism, yet says all human beings are elect in Christ who is God’s elect.¹³ He argues from the unity of the race in Christ by the incarnation¹⁴ and affirms Christ’s death was ‘the death of all’ whether they know it or not and whether they agree or not.¹⁵ He also argues for universal salvation from the doctrine of an everlasting covenant which includes every sinful being in its scope. Yet he falls short of dogmatizing, he says, because it would seem to limit God’s freedom. ‘God does not owe eternal patience and therefore deliverance.’¹⁶

In the next two paragraphs I am indebted to several researchers, especially Larry E. Dixon. C. H. Dodd, whose New Testament studies gave the world ‘realized eschatology,’ taught that ‘in the end no member of the human race is left outside the scope of salvation.’¹⁷ More spectacular were the publications by J. A.T. Robinson (1919–1985), made famous by his Honest to God book. He insisted in articles and books that the very necessity of the nature of God demands and will result in not one sinner left in hell.¹⁸

Nels Ferré, however, was perhaps the most aggressive and most famous proponent of universal salvation of the twentieth century. He cut quite a swath for a few years following 1950. He too based his argument for salvation of all on what he conceived to be God’s nature and attributes.¹⁹ He was perfectly clear that his views were in no wise scripturally derived. That being the case, the purposes of this chapter are fully served by ignoring what he had to say. He understood ‘God is love’ as definitive of God’s nature to exclusion of other attributes. As a fellow Baptist and Swede, Dr Millard Erickson pays special attention to Ferré. His treatment is worth reading by any one interested in pursuing this heresy.²⁰

Proposed Bases and Arguments for Universalism

Whatever the real reasons may be for adhering to Universalism (apocatastasis, restorationism), the usual arguments proposed are based on misconstrued Christian doctrines and misinterpreted (i.e. out of context) biblical texts.

A. The proposed doctrinal bases are mainly (1) God's love, and (2) God's atonement, or, one could say, (1) the attributes of God, and (2) the work of Christ.

(1) God's love, in one way or another understood as overwhelming or including all other attributes, is the attribute of God on which universalism rests its case against historic Christian orthodoxy. This argument, of course, pays scant attention to the fact that God's love is not unconditional, unless the word is carefully defined. It is true God loves the unlovely; but it is also true, as the Psalmist said, 'You hate all evildoers' and His love is conditioned by His own justice, holiness and all His other attributes. God's love is not absolute, which seems to be what advocates of Universalism mean by unconditional.

Robinson wrote, in an article where he cites Origen as precedent: 'Christ, in Origen's old words remains on the Cross as long as one sinner remains in hell ... a statement grounded in the very necessity of God's nature. In a universe of love there can be no heaven which tolerates a chamber of horrors, no hell for any which does not at the same time make it hell for God. He cannot endure that—for that would be the final mockery of his nature—and he will not.'²¹ Carl F. H. Henry, founding editor of Christianity Today, in the first volume of the magazine, was getting on top of the then flourishing Universalism current in the likes of Barth, Ferré, Dodd, Robinson and others. I shall not here refute these authors' presentation of divine love, save to say that it does not relate love satisfactorily to holiness and justice and neglects the decrees and works of God. These authors are reincarnate today in the spin placed on what Clark Pinnock called 'the unconditional love of God' by 'inclusionists' in soteriology and annihilationists and second-chance theorists. When I used to hear Clark Pinnock preach it thirty years ago I wondered how far it would go. Now I know.

John Sanders, another contemporary advocate of inclusivism, is more cautious, speaking of 'God's radical love.'²² This is in debate, but in an earlier work Sanders devotes several pages to show what he calls 'God's universal salvific will' is a 'theological axiom,' an 'essential truth.'²³ He seeks to show, among other examples, that God loved Pharaoh and God sought to save him and the Egyptians through the plagues, but failed. This same sort of thinking has since led both Pinnock and Sanders to reject the attribute of divine omniscience and to put limits on His sovereignty and omnipotence. In this they are quite logical.

I close on this aspect of the subject with the prime affirmation of the alleged basis of Universalism and its refutation in an old standard:

The ultimate restoration of all sinners to happiness and the favor of God is maintained by universalists on the ground that the final exclusion of any soul from heaven would be contrary to the illimitable love of God; that the wrath of God is only exercised against sin... This supposes a distinction between sin and the sinner which is without foundation in the Holy Scriptures, but is contradictory to their statements. We are nowhere told, as regards a future state, that God's wrath against sin will only continue so long as sin remains, but the sinner himself who dies impenitent will be eternally punished.²⁴

(2) A doctrine of universal atonement by Christ's sacrifice is asserted. There are several places in Scripture where something like a universal 'reconciliation' is affirmed. Older Universalists cited Colossians 1:19–20 and similar passages such as 2 Corinthians 5:19–21. They argued that Christ's death made absolute reconciliation for all sin and every sinner and if there is a hell it must be temporary to bring those sent there to repentance.

There were and are many varieties of this sort of doctrine for there are no scriptural controls for them anyway. Karl Barth and disciples connect this doctrine also with the incarnation whereby simply becoming one with the race as a whole, in Christ we are all redeemed and certainly elect, plus the rest of the ordo salutis. We shall not pursue these matters here. Let the positive doctrine be sufficient refutation.

B. Misinterpreted and wrongly applied Scripture texts are employed to support Universalism. I will cite and discuss a few typical examples, such as Psalm 103:8, 9 ('He will not ... keep his anger for ever') and Isaiah 57:16 ('I will not ... be always wroth' kjv). These passages have to do with God's treatment of His people who have disobeyed, not the unrepentant reprobate. John 12:32 states, 'I ... will draw all people to myself.' This remarkable statement cannot mean merely 'Gentiles and Jews' or 'the elect' or 'all who believe,' said B. F. Westcott. Christ in His incarnate life, death, resurrection and Ascension has had an unusual drawing power through His own story in the New Testament Scriptures and the Holy Spirit, that 'other Advocate' who 'convicts the world' of sin, righteousness and judgment. But if He 'draws' all He does not effectually 'bring' all.

First Timothy 2:4–6 states that God 'desires all people to be saved ... one mediator between God and men ... gave himself as a ransom for all.' It has been thought by Universalists (and contemporarily by Clark Pinnock, John Sanders and others) that these verses teach 'God's universal salvific will' toward all people, hence the likelihood of a general rescue as well as a general redemption at the cross, which effects salvation for all. But God's purpose, for reasons He has never revealed, is not to save all as Romans 9 and numerous other texts reveal, and He has given each the power of making final choices—not quite 'free' will, but certainly uncoerced choices. Some choose to go to their 'own place.' Jesus died, according to 1 Timothy 2:6, 'as a ransom for [on behalf of] all': not 'in the place of all.'

Philippians 2:10 and other passages which affirm that God at last will be 'all in all,' and similar are Universalist super proof texts. Yet Philippians 2:10 omits the usual Pauline 'under the earth.' And besides, many passages, Old Testament and New Testament, insist finally that God will bring forced submission, not willing obedience. The demons in Christ's time on earth recognized Christ as their nemesis, not their Savior. So similarly with Colossians 1:19, 20; 2 Corinthians 5:19, 20; Ephesians 1:9, 10. They cite 1 Corinthians 15:22, 'in Christ shall all be made alive' as teaching universal salvation. Yet in context the subject is resurrection of the physical bodies of all who have died; some 'made alive' will enter the future kingdom of God while some will be cast into the lake of fire. After all, the same Jesus who said something about drawing all people to (toward) Himself also plainly spoke of resurrection of all people, some of them to 'the resurrection of judgment' (John 5:29 rsv), and said, 'he who does not obey the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God rests upon him' (John 3:36 rsv).

Let me add some excerpts from Scripture—all of which, if the reader cares to check, are genuinely relevant to the subject. They are truly chilling thoughts for any who entertain false Universalist hopes: ‘shall ... be destroyed, and that without remedy’; ‘When a wicked man dieth, his expectation shall perish’; ‘hath never forgiveness’; ‘the wrath of God abideth on him’; ‘Whose end is destruction’; ‘good for that man [Judas] if he had not been born’; ‘sorrow not, even as others which have no hope’ (Prov. 29:1; 11:7; Mark 3:29; John 3:36; Phil. 3:19; Matt. 26:24; 1 Thess. 4:13 kjv).

The Universalist doctrine is equally a menace to morality, both private and civic, and the end of sufficient motivation for missions and evangelism. Imagine the Apostles giving their lives to evangelize a world which was already saved forever without their labors! The armies of missionaries might have stayed at home and waited for Gabriel to notify the heathen of their salvation at the resurrection.

2. Annihilationism or Conditional Immortality

The rubric calls for clarification. Annihilation means to be brought to non-existence. Conditional immortality is the name for the view that the soul of man is neither ‘naturally immortal’ nor granted immortality (deathlessness) by God in creation; but that immortality is the gift of God to the saved only. In relation to the present topic, there are theologians and groups who teach that after the resurrection and judgment of the lost they will be annihilated by God—either immediately or after a term of punishment in hell. The saved will, after resurrection, be granted immortality (eternal life) and live forever with God. Their eternal life (immortality) is conditional upon their faith, repentance, conversion and the divine grant of immortality.

This view is frequently connected with the doctrine of ‘soul sleep’ (or psychopannychia in the Latin/Greek of Reformation times): that if the soul, or center, of consciousness exists apart from the body as instrument of consciousness, it is inoperative (unconscious) between death and the resurrection, but brought back into existence by resurrection. Among modern denominations Advent Christian and Seventh Day Adventists make this distinctive of their groups. It gained some notoriety, though not general acceptance, in the nineteenth century among a few Anglican clergyman.²⁵ In recent years, as noted earlier in connection with the intermediate state, Oscar Cullmann revived the notion in scholarly circles.

In ‘evangelical’ circles—as indeed among orthodox Christians everywhere in every age—these notions are not only rejected but frequently condemned. Calvin wrote his first²⁶ sizeable book of doctrine (Psychopannychia) to disprove and condemn it. In the first form of the Articles of Religion of the Church of England, the fortieth article read, ‘They which say the souls of those who depart hence do sleep being without all sense, feeling or perceiving till the Day of Judgment, do utterly dissent from the right belief disclosed to us in Holy Scripture.’ The founding documents of the Evangelical Alliance made immortality of the soul a test of orthodoxy, i.e. of evangelical faith. It remained so until recent modification in response to rise of ‘conditional immortality’ in the teaching of one or two prominent evangelicals. Anyone interested will find the story in *The Nature of Hell*²⁷ and in recent issues of the Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society. In the Society, many of the same persons promoting conditional immortality (annihilation of the unsaved rather than eternal punishment) are also prominent in promoting the notion that God is somewhat less than omniscient and omnipotent. The situation is too fluid to summarize.

At any rate, it is clear that though Universalism offers no strong challenge to the received orthodox (and biblical) teaching of everlasting punishment and has no prominent advocates who influence orthodox evangelicals, this is not true of Roman Catholics, for whom the late Pope John Paul II may be quoted in mild support of Universalism. Since Cullmann's Immortality or Resurrection, there has been some scholarly 'evangelical' pressure toward 'soul sleep' and more toward conditional immortality, or annihilation of the wicked dead after the judgment. Though the topic was raised in the period 1941–1982,²⁸ the issue was thrust into the midst in 1988 by no less an evangelical stalwart than John Stott in his *Evangelical Essentials: A Liberal-Evangelical Dialogue*²⁹ and other publications shortly thereafter.

It was not long until the somewhat theologically peripatetic Professor Clark Pinnock challenged the orthodox doctrine with some deliberately provocative statements and shortly thereafter some ancient arguments to go with them in A Wideness in God's Mercy.³⁰ The bait did get attention; for said he:

I consider the concept of hell as endless torment in body and mind an outrageous doctrine, a theological and moral enormity, a bad doctrine which needs to be changed. How can a Christian possibly project a deity of such cruelty and vindictiveness.... Surely a God who would do such a thing is more like Satan than like God.... Surely the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is no fiend; torturing people without end is not what our God does.³¹

The above was two years before the book, A Wideness in God's Mercy, was published.

Professor Pinnock condensed his arguments in a 1996 symposium, Four Views on Hell, Zondervan, 1996, in which he was well answered by the other three writers, John Walvoord, William Crockett and Zachary Hayes. Clark Pinnock had once held to scriptural inerrancy but later conceded to a self-described flexible outlook. He had once been a high Calvinist, then an Arminian, an associate of the young social radicals of the 60s and 70s, then a social conservative, so theologians tended to shrug him off. But then came John Stott's announcement (1988, as above) and a clutch of British advocates of the doctrine of annihilation of the unsaved.

In my judgment both annihilationism and its sometimes partner, conditional immortality, are best refuted simply by asserting the positive scriptural doctrine as I have done in the last previous chapter and, as in the main, Walvoord and Crockett do in the above-mentioned symposium-debate. Good point-by-point rebuttals of annihilationism have been very competently produced, of which the ones I have found most helpful are a paper by Harold O. J. Brown in which he concluded Pinnock simply 'sidesteps the question of truth' in favor of his own feelings and says of A Wideness in God's Mercy, '... the book is a kind of exercise in wishful thinking—compassionate and thoughtful wishful thinking, but wishful thinking nevertheless.'³² Robert Peterson, cited earlier, is complete, well documented and devastating. Perhaps the most thorough airing of the controversy is The Nature of Hell, a report of a commission working group (David Hilborn, Faith Forster, Tony Gray, Philip Johnston and Tony Lane) of the Evangelical Alliance in Britain, cited earlier in this chapter.

This is also called postmortem evangelism (Gabriel Fackre) and other designations. In the last two chapters on soteriology in this volume I discussed, (1) whether Christ is the only way to salvation and (2) whether Christ may be found as Savior, though unnamed, in other religions. I did not discuss the proposition of a few ‘on the fringes of Christianity,’ as Millard Erickson refers to them, who propose that death does not mark the final border of opportunity to hear and believe.³³

As noted earlier even Donald Bloesch, who certainly is not on the fringe of Christianity, hesitantly proposes this view, not wishing, he says, ‘to build fences around God’s grace’ so as to ‘preclude that some in hell might be translated into heaven.’³⁴ In other writings he condemns any notion that one can be saved apart from hearing and believing the gospel.³⁵ Sanders gives this view very favorable description³⁶ and without committing himself sees ‘many strengths in the concept of eschatological evangelism.’³⁷ Clark Pinnock in a tentative probe says that ‘Scripture does not require us to hold that the window of opportunity is slammed shut at death’ and proposes perhaps ‘babies ... who die in infancy’ and a ‘post-mortem encounter’ for those who in life wanted ‘to love God’ but ‘had not heard of Jesus,’ and so on.³⁸

Gabriel Fackre, however, is not tentative. Among current defectors from strict historic doctrine that death closes the door of opportunity, he most aggressively, under the banner of ‘Divine Perseverance,’ has proposed his view in several works but spelled it out fully in debate with inclusivist John Sanders and orthodox restrictivist Ronald Nash in a 1995 book quoted earlier: What About Those Who Have Never Heard?: Three Views on the Destiny of the Unevangelized.

This view on the ‘fringe of orthodoxy’ achieved undeserved respectability by the commentary of G. F. C. Fronmueller, a German pastor, on The Epistles General of Peter in the large Lange’s Commentary series. Though several current writers assign the comments to Lange he did not write it. Fronmueller did and said in comment on 1 Peter 4:6:

Holy Scripture nowhere teaches the eternal damnation of those who died as heathens or non-Christians; it rather intimates [cautious language!] in many passages that forgiveness may be possible beyond the grave, and refers the final decision not to death but to the day of Christ, Acts 16:31; 2 Timothy 1:12; 4:8; 1 John 4:17. But in our passage [1 Peter 4:6] as in 1 Peter 3:19, 20, Peter by divine inspiration clearly affirms that the ways of God’s salvation do not terminate with earthly life, and that the Gospel is preached beyond the grave to those who have departed from this life without a knowledge of the same.... The divine truths contained in this passage may be abused against the cause of missions and the necessity of a holy life.³⁹

Scripture references alleged to support this view, in addition to 1 Peter 3:18–20 and 4:6 cited above, are Isaiah 26:14; John 5:25–29; and Ephesians 4:8, 9 (by Bloesch). Fackre finds support in John 10:16; 5:25; 1 Corinthians 15:19; Ephesians 4:8, 9; and even Matthew 12:40; Romans 10:7; Philippians 2:10; and Revelation 1:18; 5:13; 21:25.

It is significant that except for 1 Peter 3:18–20 and 4:6, the texts cited by different authors in support of postmortem evangelism (Fackre’s ‘Divine Perseverance’) are not the same. Any reference to an offer of salvation to souls after death is obtained only by strained, often ridiculous, exegesis. I select for example Jesus’ mention of ‘other sheep ... not of this fold’ in John 10. In context Jesus is referring plainly to the change from the Jewish fold to a world-wide offer of salvation, as the history of Acts 1–15 relates, and so forth. As Ronald B. Nash points out, ‘great violence to the text’ is required to support such a doctrine (Is Jesus the Only Savior, p. 98).

Ephesians 4:8, 9 describes the descent of the Second Person of the Godhead to the earth at the incarnation and return to heaven, not a descent to a realm of spirits of antediluvians.

I have discussed the meaning of 1 Peter 3:18–20 and 4:6 in connection with other theological loci, especially the intermediate state and Christology. At this point I would direct the reader to several recent and older authors.⁴⁰

In greater depth of exegesis, Charles Hodge expounds both passages in relation to the creedal statements showing how unlikely there is any reference in 1 Peter to Jesus’ preaching to either Old Testament saints or the lost in the unseen world.⁴¹

It has seemed to me and to several others who would have desired to keep this discussion brief, that the matter of any trip of Jesus’ spirit to a prison of departed spirits during the three days His body lay in Joseph of Arimathea’s tomb is specifically excluded by Jesus’ promise to the dying thief (Luke 23:43) ‘today you will be with me in Paradise.’ If Jesus was with the thief (who died hours later) our Lord must have been in Paradise for some time, beginning immediately after He proclaimed His work ‘finished’ and, having committed His spirit to His Father’s hands, ‘gave up the spirit.’ The human spirit of the temporarily disembodied incarnate Person is not ubiquitous. If He as human spirit was in Paradise He was not with any ‘spirits in prison.’

I close on the subject of a supposed postmortem evangelism by quoting two famous authorities who will likely still be read when the current buzz has receded from memory, and a proposal from another great author of an earlier time. First, James Orr says regarding the hypothesis of an extended probation and work of evangelization beyond death. This theory labors under the drawback that, in marked contrast with Scripture, it throws the larger part of the work of salvation into the future state of being. It is, besides, apart from the dubious and limited support given it by the passage in Christ’s preaching to ‘the spirits in prison’ (1 Peter 3:19, 20) destitute of Scriptural support.⁴²

I give now an extract from Geerhardus Vos’s article ‘Eschatology of the New Testament.’

The New Testament does not teach that there is any possibility of a fundamental change in moral or spiritual character in the intermediate state.... The only passages that can with some semblance of warrant be appealed to in this connection are 1 Peter 3:19–21 and 4:6.... The context is not favorable to the view that an extension of the opportunity of conversion beyond death is implied; the purport of the whole passage points in the opposite direction, the salvation of the exceedingly small number of eight of the generation of Noah being emphasized (3:20). Besides this it would be difficult to understand why this exceptional opportunity should have been granted to this particular group of the dead, since the contemporaries of Noah figure in Scripture as examples of extreme wickedness. Even if the idea of a gospel-preaching with soteriological purposes were actually found here, it would not furnish an adequate basis for ... the broad hypothesis of a second probation for all the dead in general or for those who have not heard the gospel in this life ... because the generation of Noah had the gospel preached to them before death.⁴³

On 1 Peter 3:19 and 4:6 Geerhardus Vos goes on to say that the two passages may have ‘had no connection in the mind of the author’ and points out:

For explaining the reference to ‘the dead’ the connection with the preceding verse is fully sufficient. It is there stated that Christ is ‘ready to judge the living and the dead.’ ‘The living and the dead’ are those who will be alive and dead at the parousia. To both the gospel was preached, that Christ might be the judge of both. But that the gospel was preached to the latter in the state of death is in no way indicated. On the contrary the telic clause ‘that they might be judged according to men in the flesh,’ shows that they heard the gospel during their lifetime, for the judgment according to men in the flesh that has befallen them is the judgment of physical death. If a close connection between the passage in [1 Peter] ch. 3 and that in ch. 4 did exist, this could only serve to commend the exegesis which finds in the earlier passage a gospel-preaching to the contemporaries of Noah during their lifetime, since, on that view, it becomes natural to identify the judgment in the flesh with the Deluge.⁴⁴

AN ADDENDUM

The nineteenth century was a time of debate among learned Protestant divines over the fate of the lost in general and the possibility of salvation of the heathen, apart from hearing the gospel. In 1889 a book was published entitled That Unknown Country.⁴⁵ Professor A. J. McClain spoke approvingly of the book when I was a student in his class. So when I discovered a copy I bought it and have read much of it. I do not recall anything I have read in the spate of literature raised by recent controversy not said many times in that book, wherein famous British, European and American scholars, preachers and prelates expressed their arguments from every possible angle, and the views of the theologians of the past from Justin Martyr to Joseph Cummings (Methodist, President of Northwestern University at the time) are set forth. I write this to make readers aware of this treasure of theological literature; also to report that whatever the views taken by the authors of articles in that book, most agreed that taking the Bible for what it says, it teaches a doctrine of everlasting punishment—whether of banishment from the presence of God; mental suffering symbolized by fire, worm, brimstone and the like; irremedial loss of all hope and joy; loss of personal awareness but everlasting empty existence; and so forth.

The question of the destiny of ‘those who have never heard’ has been raised in this my book, in the parts on Christology and soteriology and should be mentioned again here. My own view coincides with the usual consensus of orthodox theologians:

As to the heathen ... who have missed the way of life ... we can safely leave to God the justification ... of his own government of the world; but we must take careful heed that we do not be more merciful and wise than he to whom sin, as long as it continues to be sin, is thoroughly damnable.⁴⁶

If there is salvation for the unevangelized, God has not spoken clearly about it in His Word. As another wisely said, it is one of God's many secrets.

Current discussion of the 'fate of the heathen' seems unaware the subject was rather fully canvassed in the nineteenth century. Many substantial, orthodox authors were convinced that 'implicit saving faith' on the part of heathen does exist by virtue of special divine grace in general revelation. They found authority for their view in the Parable of the Judgment of Sheep and Goats (Matt. 25:31–46). I quote the new edition of The Expositors' Bible.

Kindness to the poor comes in, not as in itself the ground of the division, but as furnishing the evidence or manifestation of that devotion to God as revealed in Christ, which forms the real ground of acceptance and the want of which is the sole ground of condemnation. True it is that Christ identifies Himself with his people, and accepts the kindness done to the poorest of them as done to Himself; but there is obviously implied, what is elsewhere in a similar connection clearly expressed, that the kindness must be done in the name of a disciple. In other words, love to Christ must be the motive of the deed of charity.

While there is no encouragement here for those who hope to make up for the rejection of Christ by deeds of kindness to poor people, there is abundant room left for the acceptance at the least of those who had no means of knowing Christ, but who showed by their treatment of their fellow-men in distress that the spirit of Christ was in them. To such the King will be no stranger when they see him on the throne; nor will they be strangers to Him. He will recognize them as His own; and they will recognize Him as the very King of Love for whom their souls were longing.... To all such will the gracious words be spoken 'Come, ye blessed of My Father; but they too, as well as all the rest, will be received not on the ground of works as distinguished from faith, but on the ground of a real though implicit faith which worked by love and which was only waiting for the revelation of their King and Lord to make it explicit, to bring it out to light.⁴⁷

Ethnos, the word in plural form rendered 'nations' in Matthew 25:32, is frequently, in appropriate contexts, translated 'Gentiles' or 'heathen,' or even occasionally 'peoples.' If we were to read in English that the subjects of the judgment were 'all the heathen' it might make some sense to accept the above argument as correct. No less famous an authority of orthodox credentials than Denney, took the words this way. He outrightly rejected all notions of future probation and universal salvation but wrote this:

In the 25th chapter of Matthew our Lord expressly gives, in pictorial form, a representation of the judgment of the heathen. All nations—all the Gentiles—are gathered before the King; and their destiny is determined, not by their conscious acceptance or rejection of the historical Saviour, but by their unconscious acceptance or rejection of Him in the persons of those who needed services of love. Those who acknowledge the claim of a brother's need prove themselves the kindred of Christ and are admitted to the Kingdom; those who refuse to acknowledge it prove themselves children of another family and are shut out. This is unquestionably Christ's account of the judgment of the heathen, and it does not square with the idea of a future probation. It rather tells us plainly that men may do things of final and decisive import in this life, even though Christ is unknown to them. I frankly confess that this is the only view of the matter which seems to me to keep the ethical value of our present life at its true height.⁴⁸

Recently Thomas Oden, quite as tentatively as the above-quoted authors, under the umbrella of ‘prevenient grace,’ presents a similar argument. His whole discussion is well worth reading. I select the following of his concluding remarks. Citing pre-Mosaic Old Testament saints, ‘pious Jews of every generation’ and ‘Gentiles who have not heard,’ he affirms, ‘All humanity is offered sufficient prevenient grace to enable each to respond rightly to probational opportunities’ (a Wesleyan doctrine). He suggests perhaps ‘in meeting these situations they might have developed a general or inchoate predisposition for faith such as [ascribed] ... to Abel (Heb. 11:11).’ Later on Dr Oden concludes: ‘Though such an argument is speculative, venturing beyond clear scriptural definition, at the very least it provides a way by which Christian teaching may keep the question open as to the destiny of the benighted.’⁴⁹

¹ Many of the topics discussed in this chapter receive much fuller treatment in Part 5: Soteriology, chap. 20, ‘Salvation Through Christ Alone’ and chap. 21, ‘Is Christ Present in Non-Christian Religions?’

² D. A. Carson, The Gagging of God: Christianity Confronts Pluralism (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996).

³ ibid., p. 536.

⁴ Donald A. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology vol. ii (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978, 1979), pp. 224 and 227.

⁵ Charles H. Hodge, Systematic Theology, Vol. iii (reprint, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 877.

⁶ J. I. Packer, ‘Introductory Essay,’ in The Death of Death in the Death of Christ by John Owen, 1959 repr. of the 17th century work (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust), pp. 1, 2.

⁷ Clement, The Stromata or Miscellanies, Book VII, chap. 11, ANF II, p. 525.

⁸ Origen taught salvation of all souls through transmigration and the Sibylline oracles, mid-second century, taught salvation of all through prayers of the saints.

⁹ Pierre Batifol, ‘Apocatastasis,’ The Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. i, pp. 599, 600.

¹⁰ ‘Universalists’ McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia, Vol. x, p. 658. This condensed article provides an excellent brief survey of the history of the subject (pp. 657–665).

¹¹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, ‘Apocatastasis?’ in The Return of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 387–423.

¹² ACUTE, The Nature of Hell (London: Evangelical Alliance Commission, 2000), p. 121.

¹³ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics II, Part 2, p. 167.

¹⁴ D. A. Carson, The Gagging of God, p. 53.

¹⁴ Barth, Church Dogmatics IV, Part 1, p. 53.

¹⁵ ibid., p. 295.

¹⁶ Barth, Church Dogmatics, IV, part 3, pp. 477, 478.

¹⁷ C. H. Dodd, New Testament Studies (Manchester: Univ. Press, 1953), p. 123 as cited by Larry Dixon, The Other Side of the Good News (Wheaton, IL: Scripture Press, 1992), p. 42.

¹⁸ J. A. T. Robinson, In the End God (London: James), p. 38, 102, 103, and ‘Universalism: Is It Heretical?’ Scottish Journal of Theology II (June, 1949), pp. 143, 144 as cited by Larry Dixon, ibid., pp. 45–47.

¹⁹ Nels Ferré, The Christian Understanding of God (NY: Harper Bros., 1951) as cited by Larry Dixon, ibid., pp. 47–58.

²⁰ Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), pp. 1018–1020. Dr Larry Dixon likewise pays special attention to Ferré’s multiple heresies in many books, op. cit., pp. 47–58.

²¹ Cited by G. C. H. Berkouwer, ‘Universalism,’ in Christianity Today, Vol. i, #16, May, 13, 1957, p. 5.

²² Gabriel Fackre, Ronald H. Nash and John Sanders, What About those who Have Never Heard? (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995), pp. 26–31.

²³ John Sanders, No Other Name: An Investigation Into the Destiny of the Unevangelized (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992), pp. 25–31.

²⁴ ‘Universalism,’ in McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia Vol. x, p. 656.

²⁵ The lengthy book, Hades and the Intermediate State of Man, by H. Constable, Prebendary of Cork, was republished in America by the Advent Christian Publication Society.

²⁶ Though not published first.

²⁷ The Nature of Hell, A Report of the Evangelical Alliance’s Commission, London, 2000.

²⁸ See Robert A. Peterson, ‘A Traditionalist Response to John Stott’s Arguments for Annihilationism,’ Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, Vol. 37, no. 4, December, 1994, p. 553.

²⁹ John Stott, Evangelical Essentials: A Liberal-Evangelical Dialogue (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1988), pp. 312–320.

³⁰ Clark Pinnock, A Wideness in God’s Mercy (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992), pp. 217.

³¹ This was published somewhat obscurely in a journal, Criswell Theological Review, April 2, 1990, pp. 246, 247, cited by Robert Peterson, ‘Eternal Punishment’ in EDBT, p. 553.

³² Harold O. J. Brown, ‘Contra Augustum,’ a review of A Wideness in God’s Mercy read at a Midwest sectional meeting of the Evangelical Missiological Society at Grace Seminary, Winona Lake, IN, March 20, 1992.

³³ Millard Erickson, How Shall They Be Saved: The Destiny of Those Who Do Not Hear of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1996), p. 159.

³⁴ Bloesch, op. cit., p. 225.

³⁵ John Sanders, No Other Name: An Investigation Into the destiny of the Unevangelized (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), p. 189.

³⁶ ibid., pp. 177–214.

³⁷ ibid., p. 283.

³⁸ Pinnock, op. cit., p. 171.

³⁹ Frommueller in Lange’s Commentary (New York: Scribners, 1872), p. 275.

⁴⁰ Millard Erickson furnishes a careful but thorough investigation of these passages in his recent volume on ‘the destiny of those who do not hear of Jesus.’ op. cit., pp. 164–173. Larry Dixon on ‘Confronting Contemporary Challenges to Jesus’ Teaching on Hell.’ op. cit., pp. 111–119. They relate the topic to current controversy. Ronald H. Nash in Is Jesus the Only Savior? (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994) is mainly concerned about pluralism and inclusionism but raises the question of postmortem evangelism as set forth by John Sanders, Joseph Leckie, George Lindbeck (non-evangelicals) and evangelicals Gabriel Fackre, Donald Bloesch, John Lawson and Wayne Grudem. He asserts, ‘The position is widely taught in Southern Baptist colleges and seminaries.’ In pages 150–158 he discusses ‘What About Salvation After Death?’ devoting major attention to 1 Peter 3:18–20 and 4:6 as the only possibly relevant Scripture texts.

⁴¹ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology III (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint 1970), pp. 618–625. See also pp. 616–618 where he discusses other Scripture texts alleged to support a preaching by Jesus in hell. Also A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 707, 708 from the same epoch, both in connection with Christology. Louis Berkhof, ‘The Intermediate State Not a State of Probation’ in Systematic Theology, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), pp. 692–694. Robert Reymond more recently defended the doctrine that death closes the door of opportunity and helps the reader face the evident biblical truth that God’s ‘salvific will’ is not best described as universal (as we are being told) but ‘by divine arrangement’ only to those ‘who actually hear the gospel’: A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson, 1998), pp. 673–678. All the recent writers cover the same ground pretty much as the older writers cited. The arguments pro and con do not change, hardly even the form or statement.

⁴² James Orr, article 'Punishment' in The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, Vol. iv (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1943), p. 2503.

⁴³ Geerhardus Vos article 'Eschatology of the NT' in ISBE, Vol. ii, p. 992.

⁴⁴ ibid., p. 992.

⁴⁵ C. A. Nichols (Editor), That Unknown Country, or What Living Men Believe Concerning Punishment After Death Together with Recorded Views of Men of Former Times, The Whole Field Explored, Every Source of Wisdom, Past and Present, Made Tributary to the Theme: Man's Final Destiny, A Standard Book for All Time, published in Springfield, Mass.: 1889, 959 pages.

⁴⁶ Johann J. Van Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatics, Vol. ii, p. 458.

⁴⁷ Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, ed., The Expositors Bible (London: Hodder & Stoughton, n.d.), pp. 372, 373.

⁴⁸ James Denney, Studies in Theology, Lectures Delivered in Chicago Theological Seminary (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1895), p. 243.

⁴⁹ Thomas Oden, Life in the Spirit: Systematic Theology III (San Francisco: Harper, 1992), p. 449.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1085). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

Heaven, the Eternal Home of the Redeemed

D. L. Moody published a small book, Heaven and How to Get There in 1880. My 1908 edition was printed after 350,000 copies had already been sold. Dozens of books on heaven appeared in late Victorian and in Puritan times, but not many specifically on the topic in the twentieth century as Wilbur Smith's extensive bibliography shows.¹

But if scholarship has neglected the theme, interest in heaven has not waned among the ill, the aged and the devout of every time of life. Though death has been masked under many euphemisms, the Christian doctrine of heaven is of compelling interest when one faces death up close, as all of us inevitably, and sooner than we would like, must do. Early Protestants were familiar with death. In Calvin's time hundreds of evangelicals (Huguenots) in France were being martyred for their faith. Families prepared their own dead for burial, dug the graves and were present as the coffins were lowered into the ground. Funerals were frequent, for medical science had not yet learned how to handle plagues, the perils of childbirth, epidemics, infections and the like. Hence early Protestant writers had much to say about heaven as a present hope of all believers. Calvin's Institutes has many pages about heaven as a hope and the values of contemplation of heaven.² At the time Wilbur M. Smith published The Biblical Doctrine of Heaven, we both taught at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. In a special lecture he challenged the scholars with these remarks: 'A most interesting theme in the area of English literature, would be a critical study of those great classics of the seventeenth century. Setting forth the blessedness of the life to come, e.g. The Invisible World Discovered to Spiritual Eyes, by Joseph Hall (1574–1656); Of the Blessed State of Glory Which the Saints Possess After Death, by Thomas Goodwin (1600–1679); The Saints' Everlasting Rest, by Richard Baxter (1615–1691), a work of some 460,000 words!; The Holy City or The New Jerusalem, by John Bunyan (1628–1688); A Discourse Relating to the Expectation of Future Blessedness, by John

Howe (1630–1705); and A Discourse Concerning the Happiness of Good Men, by William Sherlock (1647–1707).³

In this chapter we shall discuss first the meaning of the words for the eternal home of the saints in the Bible, and heaven as God’s dwelling place, then what heaven offers believers up ahead and what the inhabitants of heaven will do. We close with John’s vision of heaven in the book of Revelation.

Biblical Words for the Eternal Home of the Saints

The Hebrew word shamayim, which is in the first verse of the Bible and appears an uncountable number of times, is of unknown derivation. In a general way the Hebrews of Old Testament times thought of heaven as everything in the skies overhead, beginning (1) with the air where the clouds and birds fly and the winds blow; (2) extending to the raqia’ of heaven (rendered ‘firmament,’ perpetuating the LXX mistake—stereoma, firm, hard, the stereo in stereophonic) or expanse, where sun, moon and stars follow their courses; and (3) beyond that to the heaven of heavens of God and His angels. Gerhard von Rad makes the comment regarding biblical expressions that add ‘waters under the earth’ to ‘heaven above’ and ‘the earth beneath’ as in Exodus 20:4: ‘It seems that there never was a sacrally canonized view of the world in Israel. The basis of this surprising fact is to be sought in the complete absence of a myth uniting and quickening [giving life to] the elements. Only occasionally do we find fragmenting mythical ideas, and these are rather used with poetic freedom as ancient ways of making things vivid.’⁴

In the Old Testament ‘the heavens’ (always plural in Hebrew, perhaps indicating immensity) also refers to the place of God’s dwelling. This is literally ‘the heavens of the heavens’ rendered ‘highest heaven’ (1 Kgs. 8:27 rsv) and ‘the heaven of heavens’ (Deut. 10:14 rsv). More about this later.

This word is regularly translated ouranos in the ancient Greek translation (Septuagint, LXX) and thus comes into the New Testament in quotations of the Old Testament. Many times heaven or heavens is simply the part of the creation which is non-earth, as ‘heaven and earth’ indicates (Gen. 1:1; Exod. 20:11; Acts 4:24; Rev. 14:7). Sometimes ‘and the waters’ is added to distinguish earth as dry land from oceans, lakes, springs and similar.

The New Testament adds nothing to the meaning of the word ouranos as such, though very much to the meaning of heaven. Heaven (ouranos) is still (1) the air space over the earth where birds and clouds fly (Matt. 8:20; 24:30); and (2) the region of sun, moon and stars, as in Genesis 1:14 (‘Let there be lights in the expanse of the heavens’) and Genesis 1:16 (see Acts 7:42 and Heb. 11:12). There is also a higher heaven from whence Christ came down at the incarnation, as we have seen, and to which Paul was caught up (2 Cor. 12:2), and to which the risen, incarnate Christ returned ‘now to appear in the presence of God on our behalf’ (Heb. 9:24).

The derived term, ta ourania, ‘the heavenlies,’ sometimes seems to mean (1) the region where God and the angels dwell (Eph. 1:2, 20; 2:6); (2) the unseen spirit-world of good angels (John 3:12; cf. Heb. 2:14; Dan. 8:15; ff. and the doctrine of angels generally); as well as (3) the world of unseen evil spirits (Eph. 6:12; Rom. 8:38; Dan. 10:10–14; Jude 8, 9).

Other Designations of Heaven

The speakers in the story of the Bible and the didactic texts refer to heaven more frequently without employing the name ‘heaven’ for the ‘place’ (we shall say more about this). Two figures of speech, where an important part of heaven is put for the whole (metonymy), are (1) God’s ‘throne,’ as in Matthew 5:34 (‘Do not take an oath ... by heaven, for it is the throne [seat of power] of God,’ cf. Jer. 14:21; and Isa. 6:1; and Rev. 4:2 ff.); and (2) ‘the glory of God’ (Acts 7:55 and 1 Tim. 3:11). The hope of heaven is the same as ‘the hope of glory’ (Col. 1:27).

Six other designations in various ways, without using the word, indicate heaven as the place of God’s ‘special manifestation’ as theologians say, or more simply, ‘dwelling.’

Heaven is (1) God’s dwelling or tabernacle (Heb. 8:2; 9:11); (2) His sanctuary (Heb. 8:2; 9:8, 12); (3) His habitation (Ps. 33:14, cf. Isa. 63:15); (4) His tent (Ps. 61:4); (5) His house (Ps. 65:4; John 14:2); and (6) God’s temple. This last term calls for a bit of explanation. The Hebrew language borrowed an Akkadian (Babylonian-Assyrian) word, Egal, for a great house—be it palace, citadel or temple—and modified it to hēkhal.⁵ Though the most magnificent edifice in Israel at the time was only a very special ‘tabernacle,’ it might occasionally be called an hekhal (1 Sam. 1:9). This word was usually reserved for the first or second temple at Jerusalem (1 Kgs. 6:3, 5, 17, 33) and occasionally for the temple in heaven (2 Sam. 22:7; Isa. 6:1). The ideas of the heavenly and earthly seem to merge.⁶

Heaven Primarily God’s Home Not Man’s⁷

The above considerations introduce the fact that in three-fourths of the Bible, i.e. the entire Old Testament, heaven is scarcely, if ever, said to be or intended to be the eternal home of a redeemed people. David might exclaim, ‘Whom have I in heaven but you?’ (Ps. 73:25) and ‘If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there’ (Ps. 139:8 kjv). Lack of revelation did not prevent David’s composing a liturgical prayer which exclaims, ‘Let me dwell in your tent for ever! Let me take refuge under the shelter of your wings!’ (Ps. 61:4). Yet, the Psalmist had no more expectation, so far as we know, of going to heaven very soon, any more than ‘[to] make my bed in hell’ (Ps. 139:8 kjv). I know of no Old Testament passage which specifically says that any Old Testament saint expected to ‘go to heaven when I die,’ though it may be inferred perhaps from hope to ‘dwell in the house of the Lord for ever’ (Ps. 23:6) and the unusual ascension of Elijah (2 Kgs. 2:11), and the translation of Enoch (Gen. 5:25; Heb. 11:5). Von Rad is surely correct in affirming, ‘Whenever the Old Testament refers to rapture it always has in view heavenly chambers ... set in a state of perpetual nearness to God.’⁸

Not only in the Old Testament, but to a high degree also in the New Testament, heaven is God’s dwelling place, manifest there in a manner nowhere else: He ‘who is high and lifted up, who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy’ (Isa. 57:15). ‘The heaven, even the heavens, are the Lord’s; but the earth hath he given to the children of men’ (Ps. 115:16 kjv).

Does not this indicate that already before the fall the earth was designed as mankind’s home indefinitely into the future? And does this not coincide with Revelation 21 and 22, in which heaven comes down to earth where ‘God will be with them and they shall be his people’? We greatly err when we ignore the biblical emphasis on the Ascension of Christ in a physical body and of our coming back with Him to earth, after resurrection, in glorified but physical bodies, to inhabit an earthy (not etherial) earth. A large incubus of medieval, mystical, neo-Platonic, ascetic thinking has carried over among many Christians into modern times.

The future hope of ‘the people’ of Israel, and of every godly Israelite, lay more in ‘God with us’ than ‘we with him.’ That was the symbolism of God’s tabernacle-house-temple at the center of the camp or Land of Israel. Isaiah’s prophecy of Immanuel (chaps. 7–12) is all about ‘God-with-us’—which is what ‘Immanuel’ means. The same is cast in an eschatological setting in chapter 60: ‘Your people shall all be righteous; they shall possess the land for ever ... that I might be glorified’ (Isa. 60:21 rsv). Revelation 21 borrows language from this and other late chapters of Isaiah to describe the eternal home of all saints of the earth, on the earth, in enhanced Christian terms. Ezekiel’s prophecy of a future temple for Israel with gates (Ezek. 48:31–34) is enhanced into ‘the tabernacle of God ... [which] is with [all] men.’ And ‘He will dwell with them, and they will be his peoples,’ [plural] (Rev. 21:3).

This is not the end of the story however. God was not ready to reveal clearly that the blessed dead go immediately to be with Christ until the Son of God returned there, as we shall see.

In several interesting passages of Scripture God is seen to preside over a court composed of angels and perhaps other sentient, rational beings. It appears as some kind of court in the first two and last chapters of Job. There are references to the Lord of hosts (armies) sitting above the cherubim (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2; Pss. 80:1 and 99:1). In the last of these passages His reign from a heavenly throne is over ‘all the peoples’ (the Hebrew word is ‘ammim, plural) including Israel (cf. all of Pss. 93–100). The prophet Micaiah ‘saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host [army] of heaven standing beside him on his right hand and on his left’ (1 Kgs. 22:19). It is said elsewhere that these armies of angels are sent out to do God’s bidding. For example, ‘the Lord sent an angel’ to turn back Sennacherib (2 Chron. 32:21) and on numerous other occasions of Scripture story. Angels (of which there are thousands, Ps. 68:17) are not sent forth generally and willie-nillie but, specifically, are ‘all ministering spirits sent out to serve’ (Heb. 1:14). This means that, in an utterly non-Platonic sense, everything that happens on earth, especially to His people, is controlled, even directed by heaven, a thought connected of course with many things, including our opinions about prayer, God’s knowledge of the future and control of it. ‘[T]he Most High rules the kingdom of men’ (Dan. 4:32; cf. Joel 3:11 and the doctrine of providence) and He has ‘thousands upon thousands’ of powerful agents available to do His bidding (Ps. 68:17 rsv).

At the Incarnation the Son of God ‘Came Down From Heaven’ and at the Ascension Returned

Having said all this, heaven is the place whence came the Son of God from the Father, where He had been ‘at the Father’s side’ (John 1:18) ‘before the world existed’ (John 17:5). Repeatedly in John 6 Jesus says that He had ‘come down from heaven.’ He ascended there again to be with the Father at His ‘right hand’ (Heb. 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Peter 3:22). Believers on earth are presently ‘in Christ’ (Eph. 1) and we are told to set our affections there ‘where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God’ (Col. 3:1–3). We pray to ‘Our Father in heaven’ (Matt. 6:9) and at death, like the repentant thief, we expect to be with Christ ‘in Paradise’ (Luke 23:43). Therefore for now, and until the consummation, heaven is our natural home. ‘The hope that sustains us is laid up for us in heaven (Col. 1:5).’² So we, like Stephen, in dying, pray ‘Lord Jesus, receive my spirit’ (Acts 7:59) while through our lives we acknowledge ‘our commonwealth is in heaven,’ and from it we ‘await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ' (Phil. 3:20 rsv). So heaven is central to the eternal future of the redeemed, even though heaven, it seems, shall some day come down to earth. These facts lead to a familiar question.

Is Heaven a Condition or a Place?

Our answer to this question will not be determined by literalizing the anthropomorphic figures for God and metaphors for heaven, but by our understanding of the nature of Jesus' body at resurrection, Ascension and Second Advent. The 'flesh' in which He arose, ascended and in which He will return is the same as ours in the resurrection.

In effect we answered this question in discussion of the resurrection and Ascension of our Lord and of the resurrection body of the saints. I shall not here repeat the clear biblical doctrines that Jesus arose in the same body of flesh and bone (perhaps of blood also) as that laid in the tomb and that we too shall experience 'the resurrection of the flesh' as the earliest, authentic form of the Apostles' Creed has it.¹⁰ 'Flesh' was to correct the Gnostic notion that Christ's body which arose and our 'spiritual bodies' of the resurrection will be immaterial. Current errors call for re-emphasis of these points.

Since Jesus arose in a physical body now in heaven, then heaven has dimensions of a sort commensurable with physical existence. The best literature related to this question, cited by many defenders of physical resurrection, both Christ's and ours, is, unfortunately out of print—J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body. Schep points out that the Ascension of Christ furnishes the deciding answer to the question—recognized by many orthodox scholars.¹¹

Many recent liberal and neo-orthodox scholars and some evangelicals who were influenced by them deny this connection.¹² Schep refers to several who regard heaven not as a local place but 'a state of blessedness' (W. Barclay, A. M. Randy, J. G. Davies), and several to the contrary (A. Kuyper, K. Schilder and even Karl Barth). He makes the point that even though we need not accept the Hebrew notion of a three-storied universe or seven heavens ('safely left to the Rabbis,' K. Schilder), 'this does not imply that heaven is no place at all.'¹³ Further, the human nature of Christ partakes of creaturehood and creatures have no existence at all except in relation to space and time.

Even spirits, who have no physical body that can be measured, cannot be omnipresent. As creatures they must be somewhere in space, though they do not occupy a measurable part of space. According to scripture their [the holy angels?] usual dwelling place is heaven, which is a part of God's creation see [Gen. 1:1] where they worship God, whose throne is in heaven and who from there [a created heaven], rules the universe and blesses his people (e.g. Ps. 103:19–21; Isa. 62 ff.; Heb. 8:1; 12:2; Rev. 4:2 ff.).¹⁴

The presence of the glorified, complete manhood of Christ (body and soul and spirit) in heaven renders certain that it is a place friendly to the flesh of holy human beings. The surpassing insight of H. B. Swete in his amazingly illuminating study, The Ascended Christ: A Study in the Earliest Christian Teaching, furnishes the following on the relation of this teaching to the fulfillment of God's original purposes for mankind in God's creation. After citing Hebrews 2:5 ff., which quotes Psalm 8:6 ff. on 'the supremacy of man over the rest of creation,' Swete enlarges:

Modern knowledge has almost indefinitely extended the limits of this control, making man master of natural forces the very existence of which was unknown to Biblical writers, or in some instances to the last generation; and it is not improbable that the coming years will witness [writing before 1910!] an enormous enlargement of such powers. But in Jesus Christ humanity has already entered upon the fulness of its inheritance: whatever can be done by human nature which from the first was free from sin and has now been perfected in all its powers is within the reach of the glorified manhood of our Lord. How far such a nature may carry its control over the physical world we have no means of judging. Moreover, it is to be remembered that the glorified humanity is, so far as manhood can be this, a perfect medium for the self-expression of the Divine Word. The personal force which lies behind the forces of Nature, carrying them on to the accomplishment of their destiny, works through the human mind and will of the ascended Christ, so far as the human in its perfected state is able to respond to the divine.¹⁵

B. F. Westcott spoke to those who think there is no place for a complete humanity, body and soul in heaven, when in a time of intense controversy with dogmatic Enlightenment agitation, he wrote:

At one time the logical development of His true divinity leaves room only for a shadow of manhood, as unsubstantial as the phantom which already usurped His place [in early Gnosticism]. At another time the loving portraiture of his true humanity places Him before us as a man among men as a part among parts; and not, according to His own self-chosen title as the Son of man in whom all the separate endowments of sex and race and age co-exist in absolute harmony.... The forms of Nature, so to speak, are revealed to us in the Bible as gathered together and crowned in man and the diversities of men as gathered together and crowned in the Son of man; and so we are encouraged to look forward to the end, to a unity of which every imaginary unity on earth is a phantom or symbol, when the will of the Father shall be accomplished and He shall sum up all things in Christ [emphases added]—all things and not simply all persons.¹⁶

Such a future of nature and of mankind in the biblically prescribed order of things means precisely that heaven as well as earth be ‘places’ friendly to and compatible with whole human persons, body and soul, or for now, of disembodied saints. To isolate man, complete man, at any time now or ever ‘from the realm committed to him is a doctrine of heathen philosophy and not of Judaism or Christianity.’¹⁷ The same argument I have pursued above is stated succinctly by Klass Schilder:

Let us note the historical relationship of Christ, Adam, and the last day. In the center of history Christ ascended from earth to heaven, bodily. The glorified body of Christ was received into heaven, and appeared at the right hand of the Father, who is upon His throne surrounded by angels who ‘behold’ His face. In all this, the ‘physical’ gives the exegete something concrete to hold to in the interpretation of figurative language.... We cannot escape implication of transition from one state with preservation of the physical and therefore of space [all emphases original]. In this sense also the dwelling place of God would then have come to men. And turning to the end of history, we read again of a moment of time ... which will bring man into a different state, again with the preservation of the physical. Man will inhabit the new earth—and also heaven—physically. Heaven also, because heaven then will unite itself with earth [Rev. 22:1 ff.].¹⁸

It is important to note that the Apostle Paul had a glimpse of the Paradise of God above (2 Cor. 12:1–

10) and was able to disclose nothing of what he saw and heard there, and revealed that he had the experience only after about fourteen years had passed. He desired not to boast and seems to suggest—in opinion of some interpreters—that he had already experienced a severe ‘thorn in the flesh’ on account of it. How this holy restraint contrasts with some today, including the abysmally ignorant and learned, who claim trips to heaven to report what Paul plainly declares is ‘unspeakable’ and ‘not lawful.’ Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe, in a thorough study of the devout, but hard-nosed New England Puritans, records that

Since Puritans believed that the goal of devotional practices was union with Christ, a union that was expressed in mystically erotic imagery from the Song of Songs and Jesus’ parable of the ten virgins, opening the record [of deep spiritual experience in devotion to Christ] was as improper as publishing an account of one’s sexual experiences in marriage.¹⁹

That pioneer of common sense in the doctrine of heaven, Joseph A. Seiss, expounded at length on the theology of Revelation 22, of which I quote a small portion. He has noted that many believers seem anxious to put off going to heaven as long as possible, and proposes that

The reason is heaven has no substance, no reality, for the soul to take hold on. It is nothing but a world of shadows, of dim visions of blessedness with which it is impossible for a being who is not mere spirit—who ... knows only to live in a body—to feel any fellowship or sympathy with.... Did men but learn to know the difference between a Paradise of sense and a Paradise of sensuality.... There was a material universe before sin was, and ... a material universe will live on when sin shall have been clean washed away from the entire face of it.²⁰

One need not subscribe to Islam’s notions of a heaven of sensual extravagance catering to male erotic pleasures to accept what the Scriptures say of the final state of the redeemed in a real place, including a renewed earth, where truly risen and glorified whole human beings will truly be ‘at home’ and able to fulfill the mandate given the first man before the fall which brought about the ensuing disaster. That disaster crimped, twisted and misdirected every one of us ‘from ... youth’ onward (Ps. 129:1) because of our being conceived in sin, born in iniquity (Ps. 51:5), our hearts ‘deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked’ (Jer. 17:9 kjv).

What Heaven Offers Those Who Attain it Now

We are urged by Jesus to rejoice that our names are ‘written in heaven’ and when some country villager asked Him, ‘[W]ill those who are saved be few?’ He said to the whole mixed crowd, ‘Strive to enter through the narrow door’ (Luke 13:23, 24). In the last chapter of the Bible Jesus pronounced a blessing on those ‘that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city [the New Jerusalem come from heaven to earth]’ (Rev. 22:14 kjv; cf. 21:2). What specifically does Holy Scripture tell us about the blessedness of heaven now and when the dwelling of God is with mankind? I can only sketch some answers and leave it to the interested reader to explore the texts.

Because these expressions have captured the hearts of believers in all conditions of life, whether in sickness or health, joy or sorrow, youth, middle life or old age—but especially in sickness, sorrow and old age—they appear in hymns, poetry and the liturgies ministers use to minister in those border areas (what Tillich called the grenz) of transition: sickness, death and other sad seasons. They are sweet ‘to sinner’s ears.’ I acknowledge the help of some old writers, especially J. P. Boyce.²¹

We shall take note of expressions which are stated with reference (1) to the condition where grace found us; (2) to new possessions as opposed to old; (3) to a contrast with former oppression and scorn; (4) to Christ; (5) to rewarding activities; (6) to how the place called heaven is described and characterized; and (7) to how the Lord announces our entrance to the eternal home of the redeemed.

Most of these expressions, imbedded in the language of devotion and worship, have been derived over 350 years from the Authorized or King James Version and I therefore quote it in this section.

1. The future state is said to be salvation. ‘[N]ow is our salvation nearer than when we believed’ (Rom. 13:11; also 1 Thess. 5:9; 2 Tim. 2:10). We are delivered ‘from every evil work ... unto his heavenly kingdom’ (2 Tim. 4:18); rescued from sufferings such as hunger and thirst, tears and pain (in many passages, e.g. Rev. 7:16, 17); and relieved from toil in rest (‘they may rest from their labours, Rev. 14:13).

We shall rest

And faith we shall need it;

Lie down for an eon or two

Till the Master of all good workmen

Shall put us to work anew (Kipling).

We shall have a comfortable environment, no night (Rev. 21:25; 22:5) and no filth (Rev. 21:27), and good company as opposed to bad (Rev. 21:8 and 22:15).

2. With reference to new possessions as opposed to old ones, we shall receive complete knowledge (‘know as we are known,’ no longer ‘in part’ 1 Cor. 13:12), and several possible crowns: ‘of life’ (Rev. 2:10); of righteousness (2 Tim. 4:8); and of glory (1 Peter 5:4). We shall also gain several precious emblems of victory: ‘a white stone ... and a new name’ (Rev. 2:17) and ‘white raiment’ (Rev. 3:5).

3. In contrast to former oppression and scorn there will be many desirable distinctions such as to ‘sit with’ Christ ‘in [H]is throne’ (Rev. 3:21) and to receive from Christ ‘power over the nations’ (Rev. 2:26) and privileged to ‘walk with me [Him] in white’ (Rev. 3:4).

4. In relation to Christ, the saved shall ‘always be with the Lord’ (1 Thess. 4:17), where ‘they may behold [His] glory.’ Christ will be ‘glorified in his saints’ (2 Thess. 1:10) and they shall ‘enter thou into the joy of the Lord’ (Matt. 25:21, 23 kjv).

5. Heaven will provide not only rest but rewarding activities which are said to be reigning (2 Tim. 2:12), judging (Matt. 19:28), serving God (Rev. 7:15; 22:3), praising Him (Rev. 14:2, 3; 15:3, 4; 19:5, 6) and praying (Rev. 6:9–13; 7:11, 12).

6. The place called heaven is also described and characterized as ‘paradise,’ i.e. a beautiful, cultivated garden (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7); a beautiful city, both ‘holy’ and ‘great’ (Rev. 21:10–27). It is the ‘Jerusalem which is above’ (Gal. 4:26) ‘come down to earth’ (Rev. 3:12; 21:2); a place of ‘many mansions’ in the ‘Father’s house’ (John 14:2).

7. The Lord Himself is represented by Scripture as rendering a favorable verdict, sentence or proclamation establishing permanent entrance to heaven and all it offers them. Let us savor some of these supremely encouraging sentences and phrases. The ‘sheep’ on the Lord’s right hand in the judgment hear Him say, ‘Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world’ (Matt. 25:34), and at the close of this parable-prophecy, ‘the righteous [go] into life eternal’ (v. 46). In the parable of the ‘wheat and tares’ the ‘householder’ (Matt. 13:27) says to the reapers (angels), ‘gather the wheat into my barn’ (Matt. 13:30) and ‘Then shall the righteous shine forth ... in the kingdom of their Father’ (Matt. 13:43).

A particularly thrilling sentence comes from the Parable of the Talents, where the lord says to each of the good servants, ‘thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord’ (Matt. 25:21, 23).

From the Bible itself we learn how to respond to all this beauty of thought and language. In the hour of his death the first Christian martyr breathed out this prayer, ‘calling on God and saying, “Lord Jesus, receive my spirit” ’ (Acts 7:59), not unlike the Lord Jesus Himself who near the end of His Passion cried out with loud voice and declared, ‘It is finished’ (John 19:30). And in the words of Scripture (Ps. 13:5), ‘he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost’ (Luke 23:46). How many devout folk have whispered those same poignant words in the hour of death! I so used them once myself after about forty minutes pinned under an overturned Farmall H tractor with no help in sight, though I thought I heard the distant wail of an approaching ambulance.

The great Christian poets of Britain and America were saturated with these biblical themes and phrases about the eternal home of the redeemed and their entrance to it. One theme not yet mentioned is the blessed prospect of a first meeting with Jesus face to face. Alfred, Lord Tennyson drew on that for the best lines in what may be his best short poem, Crossing the Bar:

For tho’ from out our bourne of time and place

The floods may bear me far,

I hope to see my Pilot face to face

When I have crossed the bar.

Though Presently Unseen, Heaven Is the Most Real of All Great Realities of Faith

Even in the world of time and space where we presently live out our days, the passing of time only makes more emphatic the truth that things we cannot see or sense in any other way are the very most real and enduring. When the atom bombs exploded on two cities of Japan in 1945 we were rudely brought to attention that a theoretical, tiny ‘thing’ with a nucleus of a proton and planetary particles called electrons (or something like it) is not only real but important. Gravity, or mass attraction, is a name for some universal physical force never given a name till Sir Isaac Newton announced it along with centrifugal and centripetal (and who knows what more?) forces, which are all invisible but decisively affect every molecule from that in the ink I now spread on this yellow lined sheet to the most remote galaxy. Yet no one has quite seen or exposed the What and How about them.

The highest values of the Christian faith, though invisible to the eye, are blessedly real: God, the Holy Spirit, faith, hope, love, eternal life—‘Jesus Christ: Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory: Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls’ (1 Peter 1:7–10 kjv/rsv; see also 2 Cor. 4:18; Heb. 11:1).

Heaven, however inadequate or even misconceived our perception of it, is repeatedly clothed with more reality than the present scene of earthly life. This is the message of Hebrews 6–9, of which the following select quotations are very encouraging examples. This profound book speaks of believers as heirs of God’s promise, and of ‘two unchangeable things’ of God, in which it is ‘impossible for God to lie’ and of this as both our ‘refuge’ and ‘encouragement.’ Hebrews continues:

We have this as a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul, a hope that enters into the inner place behind the curtain [in heaven], where Jesus has gone as a forerunner on our behalf, having become a high priest for ever (Heb. 6:7–20).

The writer dwells at length through Hebrews 7 on that heavenly high priesthood and continues the theme in Hebrews 8:

Now the point in what we are saying is this: we have such a high priest, one who is seated at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven, a minister in the holy places, in the true tent [or, tabernacle, esv marg.] that the Lord set up, not man (Heb. 8:1, 2).

Of the Tabernacle of Moses and accoutrements he says:

They serve [as] a copy and shadow of the heavenly things (Heb. 8:5).

Of heaven and its ‘good things,’ he states that they are ‘greater and more perfect ... not made with hands, that is, not of this creation’ (Heb. 9:11). The Mosaic rites are ‘copies of the heavenly things’ where ‘Christ has [now] entered, not into holy places made with hands, which are copies of the true things, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God on our behalf’ (Heb. 9:23, 24).

These are matters not of logical inference, natural light or of human insight, but of divine revelation available and applicable to faith which ‘walks’ but ‘not by sight,’ useful for believers in all of life but specially encouraging ‘as the morning breaks’ at life’s end ‘and the shadows fly away.’

Treasure, Inheritance and Rewards in Heaven

Jesus admonished, ‘but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys and where thieves do not break in and steal’ (Matt. 6:20) and that thereby our hearts may already be in heaven. Christians are truly ‘future oriented.’ Earlier in the day He had said the ‘[b]lessed’ who suffer persecution and slander for righteousness’ sake and ‘for my sake’ should ‘Rejoice ... for your reward is great in heaven’ (Matt. 5:11, 12). There is therefore nothing derogating to service in and for Christ’s present kingdom done in hope of treasure and rewards for the same. Beyond ‘treasure’ and ‘rewards’ up ahead, Paul writes eight times of our inheritance here and in heaven as well as of God’s inheritance in us (Eph. 1:18; also Heb. 9:15; and 1 Peter 1:4).

Without being technical, it is ordinarily true that treasure which is inherited comes as a gift or bequest upon the death of someone else, while rewards are conferred upon those who earn them. We may think of inheritance and rewards both as treasures.

Let us speak first of rewards.²² A quick search of the Bible in a concordance reveals many rewards and the conditions for receiving them. The Bible recognizes that it is entirely righteous and wholesome for believers, whose salvation is already assured by faith in Christ, to work for rewards. These rewards will come when Jesus returns from heaven as the last chapter of written revelation, spoken by Jesus Himself, declares: ‘Behold, I am coming soon, bringing my recompense with me, to repay everyone for what he has done’ (Rev. 22:12). As for the Twelve, Jesus promised, ‘Truly, I say to you, in the new world [regeneration, kjv; Gr. palingennesia], when the Son of Man will sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel’ (Matt. 19:28). This places the time of formal awarding of these earned treasures after the first resurrection, though there is much difference of opinion as to what ‘the regeneration’ may be.

This kind of life and service is important to us precisely because Jesus made so very much of it from the beginning to the end of His ministry. The theme begins in the Sermon on the Mount and continues to the last chapter of Revelation. Rewards shall be given for Christian hospitality (Matt. 10:41, 42; cf. Mark 9:41), for love even for enemies, ‘expecting nothing in return’ (Luke 6:35 rsv). The messages of Christ to the seven churches of Asia (Rev. 2–3) furnish several awards. For those ‘who have not soiled their garments, and they will walk with me in white, for they are worthy’ (Rev. 3:4). Their names will remain in ‘the book of life’ (3:5) and Jesus will ‘confess’ each one’s name ‘before my Father and before his angels.’ He says, ‘The one who conquers, I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God. Never shall he go out of it, and I will write on him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God ... and my own new name’ (3:12).

That every such reward is not automatically distributed to everyone who attains that kingdom, Jesus warns: ‘I am coming soon [1,900 years ago!]. Hold fast what you have, so that no one may seize your crown’ (3:11). ‘The one who conquers, I will grant him to sit with me on my throne’ (3:21).

Those who win ‘the victory’ of faith (1 John 5:4) will ‘eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God’ (Rev. 2:7) and to those who are ‘faithful unto death [i.e., die for their faith],’ says our Lord, ‘I will give you the crown of life’ (2:10), also ‘some of the hidden manna, and ... a white stone, with a new name written on the stone that no one knows except the one who receives it’ (2:17).

The promises to the Apostles (Matt. 19:28) that they would sit on thrones and judge seems to be extended to all who ‘overcome.’ I quote more at length:

The one who conquers and who keeps my works until the end, to him I will give authority over the nations, and he will rule them with a rod of iron, as when earthen pots are broken in pieces, even as I myself have received authority from my Father. And I will give him the morning star (Rev. 2:26–28).

Efforts of Christian antiquarians, linguists, and authorities in Jewish and Roman antiquities have filled shelves of theological libraries with results of their searches for the specific meaning of some of the mysteries of these seven short letters to the seven churches of Asia—‘new name,’ ‘morning star’ and the like—and the millennial or non-millennial significance of ruling ‘with a rod of iron’. This must not obscure the obvious. Precious indeed shall be the awards for purity of life and dedicated stewardship of God’s gifts. They are worth working and waiting for.

Several of Jesus’ parables place this giving of rewards at the time of His return ‘after a long time’: the Parables of the Faithful and Wise Steward (Luke 12:41–47; Matt. 24:45–51); of the Pounds (Luke 19:11–28); of the Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt. 20:1–16); and of the Talents (Matt. 25:14–30).

R. C. H. Lenski says, commenting on Jesus’ response to the rich young ruler (‘one thing you lack, go sell ... and give to the poor and you shall have treasure in heaven’):

It would be the grossest perversion of this word of Jesus to have it mean that by selling and giving away his entire wealth the man would receive ... this treasure in heaven. This treasure is the unmerited pardon of God. For the other side of the one thing the man yet lacked, the one thing that always goes with contrition, is the true and saving faith in Christ.²³

As for our inheritance in heaven, it is a curious fact that such is first mentioned in Paul’s address to the elders at Miletus on his third missionary journey (Acts 20:32), when Paul appears to be passing on something Jesus told him audibly at the Damascus Road encounter (Acts 9:3–6), but reported only in his defense before King Agrippa and Governor Festus at Caesarea. In each case it is an inheritance among the ‘sanctified by faith.’ An inheritance comes to the receptor only after the death of the ‘testator’ (see Heb. 9:16, 17). In which case apparently the testator is our Lord Himself and the testament or inheritance is the same for each believer—life everlasting, ‘For God so loved the world, that he gave his only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life’ (John 3:16) and ‘Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life’ (John 3:36). It is manifest that we cannot exhaust this theme.

The Inhabitants of Heaven and Their Occupations and Preoccupations

The only comprehensive statement of Scripture as to who dwells in heaven reflects both biblical history and fresh revelation. The author of Hebrews is trying to get his Jewish-Christian readers to shake free of the limited horizon of the old covenant background. The horizon is no longer the summit of gloomy height, Mt Sinai:

But [now] you have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering, and to the assembly [ekklēsia] of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven, and to a judge who is God of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood that speaks more graciously than the blood of Abel (Heb. 12:22, 23 rsv).

We saw earlier that the Old Testament informs of the court of heaven, with God on the throne surrounded by seraphim, cherubim and other angels (assuming all these celestial beings are rightly called angels). Daniel was given to know that a Son of Man would come from that glory presence and be given an eternal kingdom (Dan. 7:9–14) in which the ‘wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament; and those who turn many to righteousness, like the stars for ever and ever’ (Dan. 12:3 rsv). They do so as members of the church of the first-born and spirits of the just made perfect (but not yet resurrected) now in heaven—as Hebrews 12:22, 23 says. God, innumerable joyful angels, the ekklēsia of Christ and spirits of just men (Old Testaments saints, whether distinct from the ekklēsia or not)—all shining like stars of the sky—and Jesus Himself, are the present list of ‘those who dwell in heaven’ (Rev. 13:6; cf. 12:12).

What do they do there? What occupies their time and effort and preoccupies their thoughts? I shall answer first by a sketch derived from the sense of Scripture and conclude with what John the Revelator saw and heard in Revelation 4 and onward.

A quick check of a dozen general treatments of systematic theology in English turned up only one which offered even a minimal treatment of the activities of the saints in heaven. An exception is Millard Erickson’s last chapter, where he addresses ‘Our Life in Heaven: Rest, Worship and Service,’ developing these themes on the basis of appropriate passages.²⁴ The same is not true of larger treatment in books and monographs on the final state of the redeemed. Wilbur M. Smith, whom I have profitably cited several times, devotes twelve pages to ‘Occupations of the Redeemed in Heaven,’ which are found to be worship, service, authority, fellowship and learning.²⁵ Chapters 12 to 14 of Smith’s volume relate the book of Revelation to heaven, including the heavenly activities of saints.

I shall freely mine the exposition of my friend, Dr Smith, of activities of saints in heaven, as well as my own previous studies in connection with ecclesiology.

Worship is the primary activity of saints in glory. Reading the New Testament furnishes not a single verse that certainly prescribes music in public worship. Authorities do not think the ancient synagogue furnished any example of music in the weekly Sabbath services. Yet Dr Smith rightly says of heavenly worship: ‘Much of this worship will be conducted within the framework of music.’²⁶ He cites several passages to demonstrate the claim, but most of them say nothing of song or music, though in Revelation ‘each’ of the twenty-four elders has a harp (Rev. 5:8) ‘[a]nd they sang a new song’ (Rev. 5:9, 10). Later we find them ‘playing on their harps’ (Rev. 14:2) and still later ‘those who had conquered ... with harps of God’ (Rev. 15:2). ‘And they sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb’ (Rev. 15:3). A prophecy of Isaiah says in the future kingdom of Messiah: ‘the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with singing; everlasting joy shall be upon their heads’ (Isa. 35:10). I suspect when John reports various heavenly groups ‘saying with a loud voice’ (Rev. 5:12; 19:1) we should understand chanting, giving voice in unison, not singing.

Service to God is another activity of saints in heaven. It is said of ‘the holy city ... coming down out of heaven from God’ (Rev. 21:2), that ‘the throne of God and of the Lamb will be in it, and his servants will worship him’ (Rev. 22:3). ‘Servant’ (Gr. doulos) is a term Paul applied to himself frequently. It means bond-slave. As created and redeemed—‘bought with a price’—believers are God's (1 Cor. 6:19–20) and obligated not only to 'glorify God' here on earth but also to 'serve him' (kjv) forever (Rev. 22:3) in heaven. The word for service has no relation to slave labor as such, but to ministry of various sorts, especially religious service. The ritual which the Levitical priest exercised in the Jewish temple was a leiturgia (Luke 1:23; Heb. 9:21), hence the exercises of Christian worship in public worship are called a liturgy, obviously the Greek word in English dress. It is a good word, whether designating what Quakers do in worship of God, or high church Anglicans, or Baptists—though we like to fancy our 'order of worship' as 'non-liturgical.' Though not always a religious term, it is obviously so in Revelation 22:3. So it seems that we shall participate in regular, if not formal, 'liturgies' in heaven just as we do here. Why should we not?

Perhaps there will be service in the form of work. The word for 'servant' in the Old Testament, is ovedh, one who does work. May we connect this with prophecies of the Messianic kingdom, when each on his own farm 'shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree' (Micah 4:4)? Why not? Because Rudyard Kipling's great poem L'envoi (a not fully scriptural gem) fires my imagination and, I pray, my readers'. I expose the reader to 12 lines once more.

When Earth's last picture is painted, and the tubes are twisted and dried,
When the oldest colours have faded, and the youngest critic has died,
We shall rest, and, faith, we shall need it—lie down for an aeon or two,
Till the Master of All Good Workmen shall put us to work anew!
And those that were good will be happy: they shall sit in a golden chair;
They shall splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comets' hair;
They shall find real saints to draw from—Magdalene, Peter, and Paul;
They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all!
And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as he sees It for the God of Things as They Are!

Exercise of Government. I choose another venue for discussion of whether or not Christians shall reign with Christ over a millennial earth. Whatever one's view of that, it must accommodate the fact that Jesus made promises to the Apostles and spoke parables which seem plainly to say that, sometime in the future, 'in the new world, when the Son of Man will sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel' (Matt. 19:28). Further, Jesus made many statements which seem designed to stimulate such expectations among hearers steeped, as they were, in Old Testament prophecies of a glorious future on earth for a restored and repentant Israel. It is no wonder that they still had such hopes right up until Jesus'

Ascension (Acts 1:6). In the Parable of the Pounds the king 'When he returned' gave 'authority over ten cities' to one servant and 'to be over five cities' to another (Luke 19:15, 17, 19). In the Parable of the Talents Jesus twice prophesies of good servants, 'You have been faithful over a little; I will set you over much' (Matt. 25:21, 23). According to the Revelation certain highly honored saints in heaven expect to join in a future reign, for they cry out, 'and you [the Lamb] have made them a kingdom and priests to our God, and they shall reign on the earth' (Rev. 5:10).

No doubt we of every millennial persuasion have many surprises in store as to how exactly these dominical and heavenly sayings will be fulfilled. Yet wielding of some sort of governing authority must be in prospect for at least some 'overcomers.' Wilbur M. Smith calls attention to the several New Testament references to our future 'inheritance' (Luke 20:32; Eph. 1:11, 14; 5:5; Col. 1:12; 3:24; Heb. 9:15; 1 Peter 1:4) and the promises to Abraham and his seed that he would be 'heir of the world' (Rom. 4:13). Though our unearned inheritance, he acknowledges, is 'first of all spiritual, immaterial, involving eternal life, righteousness, etc.,'²⁷ he asks, 'Is there not something more here?'²⁸ He cites the promise to Christ in Psalm 2:8, 'I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession' and notes that we are 'fellow heirs with Christ' (Rom. 8:17).

Growth in Knowledge. 'Ever learning yet never coming to the knowledge of the truth.' Truths without the truth has become the sad result of secularized academic pursuit in what used to be called Christendom. But when 'we are in him who is true' (1 John 5:20) and 'see him as he is' (1 John 3:2) learning will take on a new interest. There will be access to new worlds of truth to explore. The original mandate for our race, both to fill and to subdue the earth, as well as to exploit it for human benefit (Gen. 1:28, 29; 9:3), now no longer cursed but renewed (Isa. 65:17–25; Rom. 8:18–23; Rev. 21–22), will no doubt now be fully implemented.²⁹ This of course does not apply to the present occupations of saints in the presence of Christ in heaven. While it is 'far better' there, as Paul assures us (Phil. 1:23), it has an interim character, of hopeful expectation of the coming day of God when they shall receive their glorified, resurrection bodies and find some wrongs righted (Rev. 6:9–11; Ps. 73; Jer. 12:1–4; Hab. 1:1–4 et al). Consider also that we will have the Lord Jesus, the Master Teacher, as our 'professor.'

Finally, there will be fellowship with all 'of the righteous made perfect.' The present state of believers may or may not include such fellowship. The Bible, all agree, has very little to say about the state of souls between death and the resurrection. The promises of future glory relate to our resurrection at Christ's coming. 'God considers it just ... to grant relief to you who are afflicted ... when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven' (2 Thess. 1:6–7). This promise is in a context of correcting false hope and false views brought on by uninformed speculation (see 2 Thess. 2:1 ff.) At the close of a celebration of the faith of saints of the past, Hebrews 11:40 seems to say that they with 'us' shall all 'be made perfect' at some future time. Consider the cautious remarks of John Calvin on this subject in his comments on 'when the perfect comes' in 1 Corinthians 13:10:

'Perfection,' says he [Paul], 'when it will arrive, will put an end to everything that aids imperfection.' But when will that perfection come? It begins indeed at death, for then we put off, along with the body, many infirmities [Calvin was chronically sick]; but it will not be completely manifested until the day of judgment.... Hence we infer, that the whole of this discussion is ignorantly applied to ... the intermediate [state].³⁰

Stephen M. Smith, with good reason, therefore ends a fine article on the intermediate state with cautions against transferring what the Bible teaches about our eternal state to our situation between death and resurrection. Having earlier cautioned that ‘Salvation is never the extrication of the soul from the body for participation in etherial bliss,’³¹ he says:

The intermediate state remains an area of inevitable concern for Christians both for practical pastoral reasons and as part of the meaning of salvation. However it should remain clear that the hope of the Christian focuses on the parousia of Christ and the new creation. Speculation on the intermediate state should never diminish the certainty which flows from the cross or the hope in the new creation.³²

Heaven in Revelatory Visions of the Bible

As we saw early in this discussion, heaven, the dwelling place of God, from which the Son of God came, returned to, and shall come again, is not ordinarily visible to the inhabitants of earth. Yet several prophets (‘formerly called a seer,’ 1 Sam. 9:9) were privileged in some mysterious way both to see the heaven of God and to hear it. Paul had such a remarkable experience, but was not allowed to describe it. He is unsure, he says, whether he was in the body or out of it (2 Cor. 12:1–5). Many prophets received revelation by the channel of dreams and visions (Num. 12:6 et al). The word of the Lord came in many other manners to many prophets (Heb. 1:1). Some of them, ‘in the Spirit’ or better ‘in spirit’ as opposed to ‘in flesh’ or ‘in body,’ were ‘brought in the visions of God’ apparently to the heaven of God. They are Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and John the Revelator.

Isaiah, in his much homiletically overworked sixth chapter tells how he beheld the Lord on his throne ‘high and lifted up’ and spoke further of a temple, and seraphim (Isa. 6:1–4); whether the temple is heavenly or the one in Jerusalem is obscure.

Ezekiel simply says, ‘I saw visions of God’ and reports that ‘the hand of the Lord was upon him’ (Ezek. 1:1, 3) and forthwith, right from his house in Babylon, he beheld an elaborate enactment of worship by the inhabitants of heaven (Ezek. 1:4 ad fin).

Daniel at first only interpreted the dreams, or apparitions of others (Dan 2:36 ff.; 4:8 ff.; 5:13 ff.); but later, though in ‘a dream and visions of his head as he lay in his bed’ (Dan. 7:1) he beheld ‘the Ancient of days’ (i.e. the Eternal God) in an elaborate judgment scene in heaven on a throne, and the granting of an eternal kingdom to ‘one like a son of man’ (Dan. 7:9–13).

John’s experience starts at verse 10 of his first chapter with a visitation by the risen Christ in revelatory and ruling mode and at chapter 4:1 moves on through a door to the throne room of heaven—all while he was ‘in the Spirit on the Lord’s day’ on the isle that is called Patmos (Rev. 1:10 onward).

I shall not go into the details of these revelatory passages, but we should try to grasp both what we should and should not derive from them as to the eternal destination of the righteous. Let us make some relevant observations.

1. There are both similarities and differences in these several representations of heaven and its inhabitants. God always rules from a throne, but only in John's vision is there a rainbow about it. There are 'living creatures' close to the throne in each case, but above it in Isaiah's vision, beneath it in Ezekiel's. In Daniel, these beings are evidently hidden among the throng (Dan. 7:10) or perhaps identical with the 'wheels' of 'burning fire' and beside the throne in Revelation 4:6. A comparison shows similar features of these 'beings' displayed in different ways. This suggests another observation.

2. These vivid pictorial scenes were designed by their divine and human authors, for pastoral reasons, to prick consciences and to stimulate both interest and imagination. The stories have made their impact through the generations, leading to fear of God, conviction of sin and reverent worship as well as other benefits. The impressions are mostly direct, straight to the heart and mind, when read aloud (as first intended) to an assembled group of worshippers.³³

3. They are not descriptions of heaven, and those who dwell there. They are symbolical representations, crafted to fit the historical and revelatory context when enacted. There is therefore considerable material unique to each, as well as much that is similar in all the visions. I shall not dwell on this save to say it calls for great reserve in interpretation.

4. Great care as well as caution must characterize our effort to distinguish literal and figurative elements. At one time my teaching assignments, as well as my preaching, caused me to assemble dozens of books on Daniel, Revelation, Isaiah and Ezekiel. Every author struggled with this problem. All, of course, try to distinguish the literal from the symbolical; also the doctrinal from the revelatory framework. Lest any of us be 'exalted above measure' by the successes we think we have attained in such projects I quote G. H. Lang's opening remarks in a truly insightful commentary on Revelation.

To employ figurative speech is a native characteristic of the human mind. It is more marked in some minds than in others, and in some races than in others. The oriental is very prone to it, the westerner less so, as result perhaps of the mechanical and mathematical habit of mind induced by modern industry and science. It is a regrettable loss, and especially it disenables the ordinary westerner from penetrating into the deeper and higher truths taught in the Bible, this Book being preeminently oriental in style and tone, and beautiful by reason of its richness in figurative language. It is highly needful that the western mind should immerse itself in the Bible manner of speech and endeavor resolutely to form the habit of speaking pictorially.³⁴

Lang quickly warns against wholly symbolical and wholly literal interpretation, though he concludes, 'Doubtless it is safer to incline rather to a literal rather than a figurative sense, but always with the large reserve and latitude that human speech is a blend of direct and symbolic language.'³⁵

5. The four heavenly scenes (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1; Dan. 7; and John in Rev. 4 ff.) are scenes both of worship and of judgment. They tell us nothing about our 'Father's house' where Jesus is preparing many 'abiding places.'

These prophets promise a glorious future for God's people in the coming kingdom of God (Ezek 40-48; Dan. 7:27, 28; Rev. 21, 22), when heaven has come down to earth and all the judgments are past (Rev. 21, 22). They therefore relate more to the eternal state than the intermediate state.

Revelation adds a little about our present and future state whether ‘in the body’ or ‘absent.’ Our prospects are superb: ‘the Lamb’ has ‘ransomed’ us and made us ‘a kingdom and priests’ to our God, and we ‘shall reign on the earth’ (Rev. 5:10)—whether in the millennium of chapter 20 or the eternal state of chapters 21 and 22, granting they are to be distinguished. Martyrs for Christ’s sake have a special place of protection under heaven’s altar while they wait for vindication (Rev. 6:9).

Of the same sort of encouragement is the whole of chapter 7 of Revelation, an interlude before breaking of the seventh seal. As John looked toward earth from his ‘door opened in heaven’ he sees history pause while 144,000 out of ‘every tribe of the sons of Israel’ are given a protective seal against the divine judgments of ‘the great tribulation’ coming on the world—perhaps ‘it represents the complete number of Jews who are children of Abraham by faith ... who will turn to God during the closing days of the present age.’³⁶

This literary interlude seems also to indicate a pause in the processes of judgment of the final great tribulation which will be the birth pangs of the coming kingdom of God. Before the most severe tribulations of them ‘who dwell on earth’ (Rev. 13:8), on ‘the great day of their [God’s] wrath’ (Rev. 6:17), John sees a worshipping multitude before the august throne ‘and before the Lamb.’ Whether the scene should be interpreted as of only those who ‘are coming out of great tribulation,’ three and a half times or forty-two months or 1,260 days in length (Rev. 11:2; 12:14; 12:6; 13:5; Dan. 9:27; 12:7, 11, 12) or if there is a projection of the interpreting elder’s mind (see Rev. 7:13–14) into the future beyond all resurrections and judgments is hard to say. Scholars differ.

This is the most complete picture anywhere in Scripture of glorified saints in heaven and their participation in their activities. Though every phrase makes allusions to Old Testament passages and incidents from Genesis 13:5 to Zechariah 2:13, as well as the prophetic addresses of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount and the Olivet discourse, we leave that for a later portion of this book. Let the reader seek to absorb both the grand scale and the exquisite beauty of this glittering picture of saints in heaven before the throne of God, in the presence of their Redeemer and every other living creature—all the denizens of the future home of the redeemed. I cite the Revised Standard Version of Revelation 7:9–17.

After this I looked, and behold, a great multitude which no man could number, from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and tongues, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, with palm branches in their hands, and crying out with a loud voice, ‘Salvation belongs to our God who sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb!’ And all the angels stood round the throne and round the elders and the four living creatures, and they fell on their faces before the throne and worshiped God, saying, ‘Amen! Blessing and glory and wisdom and thanksgiving and honor and power and might be to our God for ever and ever! Amen.’

Then one of the elders addressed me saying, ‘Who are these, clothed in white robes, and whence have they come?’ I said to him, ‘Sir, you know.’ And he said to me, ‘These are they who have come out of the great tribulation; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

‘Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night within his temple;

and he who sits upon the throne will shelter them with his presence.

They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more;

the sun shall not strike them, nor any scorching heat.

For the Lamb in the midst of the throne will be their shepherd, and he will guide them to springs of living water;

and God will wipe away every tear from their eyes.’

¹ Wilbur Moorehead Smith, The Biblical Doctrine of Heaven (Chicago: Moody Press, 1968), pp. 289–301. Smith says, ‘As far as I know, this is the only comprehensive bibliography in English on the subject of Heaven that has been attempted’ (p. 289) and follows with a list of about 200 books. Klaas Schilder’s Heaven—What is It? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950) and Peter Kreeft’s Heaven, The Heart’s Deepest Longing (New York: Harper & Rowe, 1980) are useful. Schilder treats the subject from a biblical-theological angle; Kreeft from the standpoint of ‘the heart’s hunger’ but does try also to be biblical-theological. He is a disciple of C. S. Lewis, whose many books of Christian apologetics argue for the existence of God. Many of these works argue for the existence of God—the God of the Bible—from the nature of man, the anthropological argument. Such is Kreeft’s argument for heaven. Since the God of the Bible ‘dwells’ in heaven, it may rightly be said Lewis and the numerous school of writers he exemplifies are all writing about heaven. They only lead to a biblical theology of heaven; but they do not create one. The literature bearing on ouranos and related Greek terms in the New Testament and Septuagint is overwhelming in magnitude. Two authors, Traub and von Rad, devote nearly fifty pages in Vol. v of TDNT, with 386 footnotes, most referring to other works on the words shamayim, ouranos and ouranios in the literature of Jewish and Greek antiquity.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

² Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion III, 9. See R. S. Wallace, Calvin’s Doctrine of the Future Life II, chap iv.

³ Wilbur M. Smith, lecture, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, 1965.

⁴ TDNT, V, p. 503.

⁵ It would clarify things if only this one word were translated ‘temple’. niv is very confusing in 2 Samuel 7, where the whole point of the passage hinges on a consistent rendering of beth as house.

⁶ W. M. Smith, ‘Heaven,’ ZPEB, III, pp. 61, 62.

⁷ Scholasticism (late medieval theologians and followers) speculated that since God ‘in the beginning of the world' created the 'heavens and the earth' His so-called dwelling place before that was not in heaven and there was no created 'place' where He dwelt. Similarly, though the created universe displays God's glory (Pss. 19, 103; Rom. 1) there has always been an 'uncreated' glory of God which creation only mirrors. In other words, God was glorious before creation took place, when creation was only in His purpose. The glory displayed in nature is not that uncreated glory. (See the article 'Glory' in The Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. vi, pp. 585, 586.) The heavens 'declare' that glory but are not per se the glory. Some Christian mystics through the ages and to the present have conceived of multiple layers of heavens through which by various practices and moral attainments those both pious and industrious in religious exercises many ascend to the goal of beatific (blessed) vision of the essence of God. There have been numerous decrees of popes and councils defining these matters—utterly without authority or precedent in the Bible. Recently Romanist theologians have pretty much laid aside these speculations and have, like Protestants, interpreted the biblical language about seeing God 'face to face' simply as 'living joyfully and everlastingly in the immediate presence of God' (J. Van Engen, 'Beatific Vision' EDT, p. 131) without speculating as to how the invisible essence of God can ever be viewed except as seen in the incarnate Second Person.

⁸ TDNT, V, p. 508.

⁹ W. M. Smith, op. cit.

¹⁰ Henry Bettensen, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (London: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963), p. 33, 34; Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom vol. i (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, n.d., repr. of the 1919 ed.), p. 50.

¹¹ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964), chap 5, 'The Body of our Exalted Lord,' pp. 145–179.

¹² Murray Harris in two books, Raised Immortal (England: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1983) and From Grace to Glory (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989) insists that the physical body of the risen Christ was non-physical—'that after his resurrection his essential state was one of invisibility and therefore immateriality' (From Grave to Glory, p. 53, see also pp. 53–57), that the Ascension was a parable acted out for the benefit of the disciples, for the Ascension actually occurred at the moment of resurrection (Grave to Glory, p. 423; see Raised Immortal, p. 92). These pages remind one of Paul Tillich's distinction (an advanced case of unbelief) between the ultimate and penultimate. For rebuttal of these views see Norman Geisler, The Battle for the Resurrection, Nashville: Thos. Nelson, 1989 and N. Geisler, In Defense of the Resurrection (Nashville, Thomas Nelson 1992) and R. D. Culver, A Wakeup Call (Clayton, CA: Witness Inc., 1993).

¹³ Schep, op. cit., p. 159.

¹⁴ op. cit., pp. 159, 160.

¹⁵ H. B. Swete, The Ascended Christ: A Study in the Earliest Christian Teaching (London: Macmillan, 1916), pp. 28, 29.

¹⁶ D. F. Westcott, Christian Cosmogony (London: Macmillan, 1886) in his second section 'The

¹⁶ B. F. Westcott, Christus Consummator (London: Macmillan, 1886), in his second section 'The Incarnation and the Creation,' pp. 102, 103. (In this age of short sentences and short attention span it is to be noted that these remarks are part of sermons preached in Westminster Abbey while the author was Canon of Westminster in 1885 and 1886. Let his remarks not be pearls cast before swine.)

¹⁷ Westcott, ibid., p. 133.

¹⁸ K. Schilder, Heaven: What Is It? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950), pp. 32, 33.

¹⁹ Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe, The Practice of Piety: Puritan Devotional Disciplines in Seventeenth-Century New England (Chapel Hill, NC: Univ. of NC Press for Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, VA, 1982, 1988), p. 189.

²⁰ J. A. Seiss, Lectures on The Apocalypse (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1964). I regret that I have lost the page number.

²¹ James Pedigru Boyce, Abstract of Systematic Theology (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1878), pp. 472–477. Dr Boyce is still remembered at Southern Baptist Seminary of Louisville, KY as professor of systematic theology and his Abstract has been recently reprinted by Presbyterian & Reformed.

²² I am indebted here to Wilbur M. Smith, The Biblical Doctrine of Heaven (Chicago: Moody Press, 1968).

²³ R. C. H. Lenski, Interpretation of the Gospel of Luke (Columbus, OH: 1944), p. 41 as cited by Smith p. 176.

²⁴ Millard Erickson, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1985), pp. 1229–1231.

²⁵ W. M. Smith, op. cit., pp. 190–201.

²⁶ Smith, op. cit., p. 199.

²⁷ Smith, op. cit., p. 193.

²⁸ ibid., p. 193.

²⁹ Perhaps I will finally be able to fill in the blanks in our family genealogical chronicles!

³⁰ John Calvin, Commentary on the Epistles of Paul to the Corinthians, vol. i, trans. John Pringle (Edinburgh, 1848), p. 428.

³¹ Stephen M. Smith, 'Intermediate State' in EDT, p. 562.

³² ibid., p. 563.

³³ When our youngest was about five years old, we were reading Revelation, a chapter a day. I had just concluded, ‘they had hair as the hair of women ... teeth of lions ... tails like unto scorpions,’ etc. (Rev. 9:8–10), when the little girl sprang from her chair and exclaimed, ‘Daddy, when we finish Revelation, let’s read it again. This is exciting!’

³⁴ G. H. Lang, The Revelation of Jesus Christ: Select Studies, 2nd ed. (London: Paternoster, 1948), p. 17.

³⁵ ibid., p. 23.

³⁶ Harold Lindsell, note on Rev. 7:4–8 in Harper Study Bible, RSV, p. 1871.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1096). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

10

The Second Advent of Christ and Related Events

Advent is a venerable Christian word embedded in liturgies, creeds, hymns and theological writing.¹ In the first place it refers to the coming of Jesus the promised Messiah and all events related to that coming, especially the birth narratives of Matthew and Luke. Hence we call Christmas ‘Advent Season.’ There is going to be a Second Coming. Jesus many times promised His disciples—as also throughout the New Testament—that He will come again. The Nicene Creed (325/381) confesses that the ‘Lord Jesus Christ ... cometh again with glory to judge the quick and the dead.’ This is the Second Advent, or, as some prefer, ‘The Return of Jesus Christ.’² In theology and history some groups which make the return, or ‘second coming,’ of Christ their major emphasis, are called Adventist—as Seventh Day Adventist and Advent Christian denominations. In the following discussion Second Advent, Second Coming and return are used interchangeably.

The Second Advent is sometimes employed as a comprehensive caption for all of eschatology—as for example Berkouwer’s The Return of Christ. This is quite feasible, for every feature of individual eschatology—death, intermediate state, resurrection, judgment, and finally hell or heaven—at some point focuses on the return of the Lord in glory.

‘Comings’ of Christ in the New Testament

Modern interpreters of the New Testament have discovered valid references to several ‘comings’ of Christ after His death. Some of these ‘discoveries’ have led to systematic theories of the Second

Advent and formation of enduring Christian sects. There is a certain validity and importance to each of these ‘comings.’

1. There was a physical Advent in Jesus’s resurrection. At the Last Supper Jesus said to the Twelve, ‘I will come to you. Yet a little while, and the world will see me no more, but you will see me’ (John 14:18, 19). A short while later the same evening He repeated, ‘A little while, and you will see me’ (John 16:16). The Apostles were mystified by His words, but on the two following Sundays the mystery of this ‘I will come’ was cleared up. The Christian gospel, of course, was born out of this ‘advent’ (1 Cor. 15:1 ff.).

2. The ‘coming’ of the Holy Spirit fifty days later was a coming of Christ. This also was stated to the Twelve early in the evening of Jesus’ Passion. ‘[W]e [the Father and I] will come to him and make our home with him [the one who loves Jesus]’ (John 14:23). Later, Jesus spoke of the Paraclete who will ‘come to you’ (John 16:7). According to Harold De Wolf, the coming of God’s rule in the individual heart, what all call ‘regeneration’ (‘come into my heart Lord Jesus’), is a sort of Second Advent.³

3. Some have interpreted John 14:3, ‘I will come again and will take you to myself,’ as Jesus coming to every believer at death to take him to a ‘mansion’ or ‘place’ that is ‘prepared’ in ‘the Father’s house.’ This is not usually intended to foreclose on an eschatological coming of Jesus.

4. The destruction of Jerusalem and slaughter of its inhabitants by the Roman armies in ad 70 was a ‘coming’ of God in judgment. Most interpreters find this obliquely set forth in Jesus’ Parable of the Wicked Tenant-farmers (Matt. 21:33–45; Mark 12:1–12; Luke 20:9–19) and very plainly in the Parable of the Marriage Feast (Matt. 22:1–4; Luke 14:15–24), both given on the Lord’s last day of public ministry in the capital city, Jerusalem. In the latter parable the Jews of the city understood these parables to be ‘against them’ (Mark 12:12). They heard Him say ‘[t]he king’ (in this case, God) was angry and sent His troops (Vespasian’s army, it turned out) and destroyed their city (Matt. 22:7). Preterist (past-fulfillment) interpreters of the Olivet discourse (Matt. 24:1–25:46; Mark 13; Luke 21) think that this is the whole subject of these passages, and specifically that ‘then will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man’ (Matt. 24:30) has no reference to the future ‘coming’ Christ, only to His providential coming in ad 70. Matthew 24:34 is often cited in proof. Evangelical preterists do not deny that other passages promise a now still future ‘Second Advent.’ Advocates of this preterist theory seem to be growing in number today.⁴

5. It seems correct to speak of many critical events at different times in church history as ‘comings’ of Christ in judgment, distinct from His future eschatological coming. Several times in the messages to the ‘seven churches of Asia’ (Rev. 2–3), Jesus threatens, ‘I will come’ and do such and such in judgment on the church (Rev. 2:5, 16; 3:3). There is however no confusion of Christ’s comings in providential judgment or in special deliverances with His parousia in power and glory (Rev. 2:25; 3:11).

6. Many providential events may be said to be comings of Christ. H. A. W. Meyer interpreted Matthew 26:64 (‘from now on you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power and coming on the clouds of heaven’) as continual and sustained ‘comings’ of the now glorified Christ in sovereign manifestation of His ‘power’ in many events of history. He cites several European Protestant scholars in agreement.⁵

7. An eschatological Second Advent of Christ at the end of the present age is the subject of this section of this volume. The New Testament does not in every case—especially in Jesus’s own ‘apocalypse’ of the Olivet discourse (Matt. 24–25; Mark 13; Luke 21)—distinguish precisely between the eschatological parousia, His Advent at the end of the age and some of the other comings mentioned above. Therefore it seems that the student of theology should be made aware of the above non-eschatological ‘comings.’

I know of no orthodox, evangelical interpreters of the Bible who do not find large portions of the New Testament—as well as the Old Testament—which predict an eschatological Second Advent of Jesus to raise the dead, to judge the dead and the living (as the ancient creeds affirm) to be followed by renewal of the heavens and the earth. Yet there has been considerable variety of opinion throughout much of Christian history as to the precise order of events and the spacing of them. Over the centuries three major strongly held and rather precisely defined views of these matters have developed among orthodox Christians. There are also some other views of the Second Advent. The three main views will be briefly examined shortly in this study.

A Pre-Christian Connection

The doctrine of a Second Coming of Christ at the end of the present age to bring a close to ordinary history by supernatural intervention is a generally acknowledged New Testament teaching. Jesus is the One who introduced it. He hinted at it over the months of ministry and in the very last days before His Passion taught the doctrine in parables (which we shall briefly examine) that were understood only afterward and He gave a lengthy discourse (the Olivet discourse of Matt. 24, 25; Mark 13; and Luke 21) which plainly and in some detail promises a future Advent.

Yet Jesus also has made plain to present readers of the Bible (if not immediately to the original disciples) that His First Advent did not completely fulfill Old Testament prophecy of Messiah and many other features of Old Testament prediction. Especially plain are His remarks on the Easter evening (Luke 24:25–27) and on the first Sunday after Easter: ‘And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me. Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem’ (Luke 24:44–47 kjv). These announcements helped them understand that Jesus the Christ was also the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 and the God-forsaken One of Psalm 22. Jesus had promised that the Holy Spirit will ‘declare to you the things that are to come’ (John 16:13), and so the Holy Spirit did. Over the next few years the Apostles received much further revelation about a Second Advent of Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords. He came once in humiliation; He shall come again in glory.

Peter, who heard Jesus make such limited explanation of the two comings as the disciples were then prepared to hear, makes precise reference to them in his first Epistle, the first being ‘the sufferings of Christ’ and the second ‘the subsequent glories’ (1 Peter 1:10–12). In Peter’s second Epistle he developed the Second Advent theme at length (2 Peter 3:1–15). Even the writing prophets, though they foresaw both humiliation and glory and had the order right, did not distinguish two Advents. Peter's first Epistle is mainly concerned with 'the suffering,' both of Jesus in His First Advent and of His disciples through the generations (see 1 Peter 2:13–25); his second Epistle is concerned mainly with the Second Advent (see especially chap. 3). Already there were 'scoffers' (2 Peter 3:3) in the church who denied any such supernatural intervention as Peter talked about, when 'the heavens will pass away with a roar, and the heavenly bodies will be burned up and dissolved' (2 Peter 3:10).

It is legitimate therefore, with New Testament hindsight, to seek out the evidence of foresight of a Second Advent in the Old Testament. W. A. Brown well said that the doctrine of a future parousia had its origin in Jesus' prophecy of His own return, but adds:

Nevertheless, it is not without preparation in the past. It has its parallel ... in the prophetic anticipation of the day of the Lord (e.g. Amos 5:18; Isa. 2:12; 13:6; Joel 1:15; 2:1; Zeph. 3:8)—that great day when Jehovah shall be manifested as the Judge and Saviour of Israel.... Many features of the New Testament doctrine are anticipated in the Old Testament. Thus the warlike imagery of Revelation 19:11 ff finds parallels in Isaiah 13:4; 34:6; Jer. 16:10, etc. The connexion of the resurrection of the dead with the deliverance and judgment of the living is made in Daniel 12:1–3. The great convulsions of 2 Peter 3:10 have their anticipation in Isaiah 34:4. The signs in the heavens predicted in Matthew 24:29 and parallels are foretold in Isaiah 13:10 ff., Joel 3:15, 16, etc. The renewal of nature prophesied in Isaiah 65:17 reappears in Revelation 21:1 (cf. Rom. 8:21; 1 Cor. 7:31). Most striking is the parallel in Daniel 7:13ff., where the seer has a vision of one like unto a Son of Man coming with the clouds of heaven to receive dominion and glory, and a kingdom that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him as [Rev. 19:11–21; and 22:5; also 1 Cor. 15:25 plainly say].⁶

Special credit is due the research of R. H. Charles and successors in inter-testamental studies, who have demonstrated that in the late Old Testament period, the apocalyptic writings (or pseudepigrapha) found friendly lodgement in the hearts of many truly pious Israelites, lifting the hope from a merely worldly triumph of the nation of Israel (though they did not give that up) 'till the hopes of the righteous were transferred from a kingdom of material blessedness to a spiritual kingdom, in which they were to be as the angels [as Jesus agreed] and become companions of heavenly hosts. This partial transference of the hopes of the faithful from the material world took place about 100 bc.'⁷

Around the time John the Baptist and Jesus were born there were people waiting for this kind of 'consolation for Israel.' Some of them became parents of John and of Jesus; others became His supporters in ministry as well as disciples and followers.

The Two Comings in Old Testament Prediction

Believing scholars generally agree that predictions of two comings of Christ are latent in the Old Testament, but there is no uniform interpretation as to which relate to the Second Coming and how. Most agree, for example, that Genesis 3:15 is a protevangelion (first preaching of the gospel). Satan will, at the cross, bruise the heel of the ‘seed’ of the woman and the ‘seed’ will crush the serpent’s head. The heel-bruising refers to the success of the devil’s seed in crucifying the woman’s ‘seed’ but not destroying Him, for He arose from the dead. Satan’s program of death—physical and spiritual—for all mankind was potentially destroyed, for Jesus’ death ‘destroy[ed] him that had the power of death, that is, the devil’ (Heb. 2:14 kjv; cf. Luke 10:18; John 12:31).

Yet Satan still prowls about ‘as a roaring lion’ (1 Peter 5:8 kjv) and deceives billions as effectively as he did Eve (1 Tim. 3:6; 2 Tim. 2:21). ‘[T]he whole world is in the power of the evil one’ (1 John 5:19 rsv). So the serpent’s head is still not fully crushed. That will happen only in an eschatological event (1 Cor. 15:24) when the devil will be ‘cast into the lake of fire’ (Rev. 20:10 kjv).

The plainest case of this age-long temporal span, hidden away in a single Old Testament passage, probably is Isaiah 9:6, 7. ‘For to us a child is born, to us a son is given’ (v. 6a) obviously applies to Jesus’s first advent as an infant who grew up as a Son both of God and of man. The passage continues, ‘And the government shall be upon his shoulder,’ and so on to the verse which ends ‘The zeal of the Lord of hosts [armies] will do this’ (v. 7b). The latter begins its fulfillment at Jesus’ return in power and glory as set forth in Revelation 19:11 ff. and other passages.

This dual character of the first Old Testament prediction of Christ and of Isaiah’s vision of ‘a Son’ is characteristic of many other Old Testament predictions. This is not ‘double fulfillment’ but simply two distinct elements, each fulfilled separately.

The largest single passage in which these two comings lie unlabeled, so to speak, in the prophecy, but distinguishable from our New Testament viewpoint may be Isaiah 52:13–53:12. In this ‘golden passionate,’ as Franz Delitzsch called it, the Lord’s suffering and death is followed by the prediction that God ‘will divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong’ (Isa. 53:12 rsv). Isaiah 61:1, 2 is cited by Jesus as being fulfilled as far as ‘to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor’ (Isa. 61:2a) at Nazareth, about ad 30, but not ‘the day of vengeance of our God’ (Isa. 61:2b). (Read Luke 4:16 to see what our Lord did.) Some object to this understanding of Luke 4:16–20, but I think to do so is to deny the obvious. Another example is Zechariah 9:9, 10. Verse 9 is a specific prophecy of that Palm Sunday when Jesus presented Himself to the Jewish people, ‘mounted on a donkey’ (Matt. 21:1–5). Verse 10 looks far into a time, still future today, when ‘he shall speak peace unto the heathen: and his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth’ (kjv).

Though most conservative commentators recognize this feature of Old Testament predictions, there is disagreement as to how much of some of the predictions remains unfulfilled. Many are inclined to place fulfillment of all prophecies of a kingdom of Messiah in the present age while many others place at least some of them in the future. If the church, as some say, has replaced Israel in fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies of Israel’s future blessedness in times of a Messiah, then the great mass of Old Testament prophecy is being fulfilled now. If so, most of these prophecies have little if any specific literal reference. How, for example, should we interpret Zechariah 12–14 kjv, which describes a future rescue of embattled Israelites in the Land when ‘the Lord comes.... And his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives’ and ‘they shall look upon me whom they have pierced’ and ‘the inhabitants of Jerusalem’ shall receive ‘the spirit of grace’? See Zechariah 14:1–4 and 12:9, 10 and compare the verses with Revelation 1:7, which seems to apply this passage to the time when ‘Jesus Christ... is coming with the clouds, and every eye will see him, even those who pierced him, and all tribes of the earth will wail on account of him’ (Rev. 1:1, 7). While dissolving these Old Testament prophecies into a ‘spiritual’ (wholly non-literal) fulfillment might seem reasonable enough in principle, such transformation is very difficult in detail, as the strivings of spiritualizing commentators, who choose not to skip the hard verses, adequately demonstrate. They simply do not know what to do with the details. This is not to say advocates of literal (i.e. grammatico-historical) interpretation, both in meaning and reference, do not have problems.

These two lines of prediction have puzzled Jewish rabbis before and since Jesus’ First Advent. Emil Schürer says that the semi-official Targum of Jonathan refers the prophecy of Isaiah 53 to the Messiah on the whole, but denies application to Messiah of just those verses which treat of the sufferings of the servant of God.⁸ He adds, ‘In not one of the numerous works [of Jewish interpretation] discussed by us have we found the slightest allusion to an atoning suffering of Messiah.’⁹ John 12:34 shows how wholly foreign such an idea was to Jewish thinking of Jesus’ time and we know how utterly the disciples at first rejected the notion (Matt. 16:22; Luke 18:31–34; 24:21). It is true that the Qumran sect (of the Dead Sea Scrolls) may have expected two Messiahs and perhaps even one who would be violently killed. The Qumran community may have thought of themselves as, in their suffering, being maskilim—the wise ones (Dan. 12:10)—and would ‘accumulate merit sufficient to make propitiation for their erring fellow-countryman.’¹⁰ Such a Messiah as Jesus Christ of the four Gospels, however, was no more present in that community’s expectation than anywhere else in Judaism. Both in the pseudepigrapha and at Qumran there was possibly a rare rabbinical expectation of two Messiahs—one priestly, one Davidic (discussed in scholarly literature now for fifty years)—but no expectation of two Advents of one Messiah. Even Jesus’ Jewish disciples took quite a while before figuring out the puzzle. The puzzle was first publicly explained by Peter many weeks after Jesus’ resurrection and Ascension:

But what God foretold by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ would suffer, he thus fulfilled. Repent therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Christ appointed for you,¹¹ Jesus, whom heaven must receive until the time for restoring all the things about which God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets long ago (Acts 3:18–21).

There is a lesson here for us all who conscientiously, in the fear of God, try to interpret the unfulfilled prophecies of Scripture. If prophecies of the First Advent of Christ could only be partially understood until after fulfillment, even by the best devout minds, it is likely true that no interpreter of yet unfulfilled prophecy today, or any school of interpretation, has a lock-hold on all the certainties of the future. We will likely all be as surprised as Peter (who tried to talk Jesus out of His determination to embrace the Passion, Matt. 16:22) was when prediction of ‘the sufferings of Christ’ became history (1 Peter 3:8–12). Though we have enough information to formulate a ‘theology of hope’ we must still ‘walk by faith, not by sight.’

So it should be clear that though much Old Testament prediction awaits the Second Advent for fulfillment, the specific doctrine of a future parousia of Christ is, in a strict sense, a New Testament teaching. It originated in Christ Himself. At several points he made statements indicating that there was to be a future kingdom of Messiah in a definitely eschatological setting beyond His first presence on earth. He was not so plain or so well understood that the Apostles adopted it immediately. Poring over His words and bringing all the techniques of modern historical and literary research to the problem, scholars have many diverse interpretations on those words. It would be a diversion from present purposes to introduce theories of consistent eschatology, realized eschatology, inaugurated eschatology, and theories of Jesus' statements about the kingdom of God and kingdom of heaven. I have dealt with some of these matters in the first chapter of this present Part 7 of this book as well as in Part 6: Ecclesiology, and other sections. In the main, these theories divert the believing student away from the great and noble task of interpreting Scripture as truthful and consistent in all it teaches.

It is apparent the Second Advent, a topic extending from Genesis 3:15 through Revelation 22, is a big subject with numerous aspects and angles of approach.

We shall focus and limit our discussion of the Second Advent in this volume.¹² In this chapter, we shall examine what the Bible has to say plainly—and as much as possible without reference to controversies among orthodox, believing scholars—concerning the nature of the event itself, viewed as a moment of expectation. Though we do not know the day or the hour there will be such a day and hour. In following chapters we shall view the Second Advent of Christ in relation to other aspects of the future of the world.

The Second Advent of Christ Viewed As a Single Future Event

The doctrine of the Second Advent of Christ is not a sectarian specialty of some queer Christians. It is affirmed in the Apostles' Creed: 'From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead' and the Nicene Creed (381): 'And he shall come again, with glory to judge the quick and the dead; whose kingdom shall have no end.' This teaching, properly designated a dogma (official church doctrine), is an essential affirmation in that coherent body of truth which distinguishes Christianity from every other faith-system. The very spectacular nature of that possibly near event seemed a bit weird to me when I first heard it declared by a lay preacher, especially the 'rapture' as described in 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18. Yet I quickly came to understand it as pervading every aspect of the hope my parents and I had recently embraced. Though 'prophecy' of the Second Advent is not the only string on the theology harp,¹³ it is as important as 'the crown of righteousness' is for those 'who have loved his appearing' and 'have kept the faith' (2 Tim. 4:7–8): those to whom Christ 'will appear a second time, not to deal with sin but to save those who are eagerly waiting for him' (Heb. 9:28).

The Moral and Spiritual Imperatives of the Second Advent

Several of our Lord's last discourses and parables demanded spiritual watchfulness for His coming as a mark of spiritual preparedness. As Jesus and His disciples journeyed from Galilee toward His rendezvous with death He knew, of course, that the friendly crowds likewise journeying toward the Passover celebration would join with others of their nation in the cry 'Crucify him' in a very few days. He warned them of the dire results of spurning His 'reign.' As they came 'near to Jerusalem' (Luke 19:11) He warned them in the parable of the 'pounds' (minas): 'But as for these enemies of mine, who did not want me to reign over them, bring them here and slaughter them before me.' The words have an eschatological ring but they also have odour of the slaughter which would take place at Jerusalem in ad 70.

After entering the city and on through the last week Jesus repeated the warning in other parables of the ‘husbandmen’ or tenant farmers (Matt. 21:33–45), concluding: ‘Therefore I tell you, the kingdom of God will be taken away from you... And the one who falls on this stone [Christ Himself] will be broken to pieces; and when it falls on anyone, it will crush him’ (Matt. 21:43, 44).

The Parable of the Wedding Feast (Matt. 22:1–14) climaxed with a warning for the Jews of His time who spurned Him at His First Advent which is no less applicable to careless, insincere Christians at His Second Advent. The grim warning is from the lips of the Savior Himself: ‘cast him into the outer darkness’ (Matt. 22:13).

This parable is transitional from warnings for the Jews of that long ago time, for those whose religious professions were insincere, to a series of warnings to Christians whose professions are insincere.

In the declining hours of the last day of His public ministry Jesus addressed several Apostles as they paused on the Mount of Olives enroute to lodging at Bethany. He spoke of the time of His Second Advent as immediately after a great tribulation, ‘Immediately after the tribulation of those days... Then will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn [see Rev. 1:7; cf. Zech. 12:10–14], and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he will send out his angels with a loud trumpet call, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other’ (Matt. 24:29–31; cf. Matt. 13:30, 41, 42 and context; also 1 Thess. 4:13–18 and 1 Cor. 15:51–53).

He goes on to say that the time was unknown to any one but the Father and that ‘the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect’ (Matt. 24:44), therefore His servants should be ready at all times lest they be found to be hypocrites and be judged with the same Jewish hypocrites whom Jesus had reproached earlier in the day (Matt. 24:45–51).

The lesson of the Parable of the Ten Virgins which followed (Matt. 25:1–13) is likewise about spiritual preparedness or watchfulness. Not that one should be in tiptoe expectancy, but attending to spiritual readiness: ‘Watch therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour’ (Matt. 25:13).

The severity of our Lord’s words about failure to be ready and watching extends to industry (‘good and faithful servant’ versus ‘worthless servant’) in the last of these parables, the Parable of the Talents (Matt. 25:14–30; contrast vv. 21, 23 with v. 30). The lesson seems to be that zeal and activity in tending to the Lord’s interests on earth during His long absence is a mark of genuine faith in Christ, an indispensable element in preparedness.

In what may be the first canonical New Testament writing, the Epistle of James, the Lord’s brother, put the Second Advent at the very heart of Christian, ethical motivation, saying: ‘Be patient, therefore, brethren, until the coming of the Lord. Behold, the farmer waits for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it until it receives the early and the late rain. You also be patient [enduring]. Establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is at hand’ (James 5:7, 8 rsv). This emphasis, coupled with severe warnings and exhortations, is strong in all the Epistles of the New Testament as well as Hebrews and Revelation.

The Second Advent is the central feature of the consummation of history in a world judgment. While not quite unique to Christianity,¹⁴ belief in an ‘end’ of history was foreign to the culture of the Greco-Roman world. That civilization looked with scorn on the notion of a telos which involved resurrection and judgment. That civilization had no eschatology, only endless repetitions of cycles. This was an early cause of rejection of Christianity by the intelligentsia (Acts 17:32; 2 Peter 3:4). The early Christian apologists labored the point. They insisted that the world had a created beginning by the same God who would also bring it to His predestined telos (consummation).

Outstanding Characteristics of the Second Advent

As explained by the Lord Jesus Himself, as well as angelic messengers and apostles, the Second Advent of the Lord will have the following characteristics.

1. Christ will come again visibly, just as He departed. At Jesus’ Ascension ‘while they were gazing into heaven as he went, behold two men stood by them in white robes, and said, “Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking into heaven? This Jesus, who was taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven” ’ (Acts 1:10, 11 rsv). Whatever partial truth there may be in a spiritual coming at the believer’s death or in the descent of the Holy Spirit, and so on, ‘in the same manner as you saw him go’ is as visible as a hot-air balloon ascent. ‘For as the lightning comes from the east and shines as far as the west, so will be the coming of the Son of Man’ (Matt. 24:27 rsv) shows how publicly visible His coming will be, as does also ‘every eye shall see him’ (Rev. 1:7 kjv), which removes the event from dreams, visions or a spiritual category. There will be no ‘Lo, here ... or there’ (Matt. 24:23 kjv; Luke 17:21) as with the false prophets of the Adventist movement of the 1840s and the Russellites (Jehovah’s Witnesses), whose predictions even of a spiritual return failed to materialize.

2. He will return in Person. We have just taken note of Luke’s report of how the two angelic messengers to the scene of the Ascension said ‘this same Jesus’ (kjv) would so come again. Paul was quite as specific: ‘the Lord himself will descend from heaven’ (1 Thess. 4:16 rsv). The Greek text is very specific: ‘autos ho kurios ... katabēsetai.’ Autos (the intensive pronoun) in this particular construction means ‘himself,’ ‘herself,’ ‘itself,’ and the like. ‘The function of the intensive pronoun is to emphasize identity.’¹⁵

3. Jesus’ Second Coming, though personal and visible like His first coming, is otherwise quite in contrast with the humble carpenter who, when they saw Him, ‘[there was] no beauty that we should desire him’ (Isa. 53:1, 2), for Jesus will come again in glory. Jesus’ petition to the Father (John 17:1–4) to regain His uncreated glory was answered at His Ascension. Three times Matthew quotes Jesus to the effect that He will come again in glory: ‘in the glory of his Father’ (Matt. 16:27); ‘with ... great glory’ (Matt. 24:30); and ‘in his glory’ (Matt. 25:31).

The glory of God has several quite biblical senses. The glory which was the Son’s ‘before the world was’ is the ‘essential’ or ‘uncreated glory’ so mysterious that no one of the several sources I have consulted seems to know exactly what to say about it. Is it ‘the sum of all His attributes’? In the above references to His coming in glory, the glory surely must be the same brightness of light as Isaiah and Ezekiel saw (Isa. 6; Ezek. 1).

This seems to be a necessary inference from the several accounts of the Transfiguration. Late in His ministry Jesus promised His disciples that ‘some standing here who will not taste death until they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom’ (Matt. 16:28). The story of the Transfiguration immediately follows: Jesus ‘was transfigured before them, and his face shone like the sun, and his clothes became white as light’ (Matt. 17:2; see parallel in Luke 9:27–36). This must be when the prediction of seven days earlier occurred, of seeing ‘the Son of Man in his kingdom’—Peter, James and John looking on as Moses and Elijah (denizens of heaven) conversed with our Lord. The parallel, Luke 9:32, says that ‘they saw his glory.’ So this is how the next time Jesus is seen on earth He will appear to all.¹⁶

4. Jesus will come again with power: ‘and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory’ (Matt. 24:30). The ‘power’ is dunamis, inherent might, connected with ‘His coming at the commencement of the millennial reign to establish his kingdom’.¹⁷ This is the event prophesied in Daniel 7:13, 14, which Jesus claimed for Himself at His interrogation by Caiaphas in Mark 14:61–64, asserting thereby to be the divine Messiah who would in the eschaton fulfill the Old Testament prophecies of the kingdom of God. This power is the authority of divinity and the might of omnipotence. It was possessed, but unused, except as willed by the Father in occasional miracles during His incarnate life on earth, but resumed after His resurrection (Matt. 28:18), and fully employed at His Second Advent, when he shall raise the dead, sit in judgment and reign until every enemy has been brought to submission (1 Cor. 15:24; John 5:25–29; Phil. 2:10, 11; Isa. 9:6, 7; 11:1–12:6).

5. He will come ‘with clouds.’¹⁸ Why is this important enough to receive Scripture notice? It should be remembered that Jesus departed with ‘a cloud’ and that in ‘this way’ He shall come again (Acts 1:11). The Apocalypse declares: ‘Behold, he is coming with the clouds’ (Rev. 1:7), echoing the high point of the Savior’s Olivet discourse: ‘and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power ...’ (Matt. 24:30) and the earlier prophecy, again, of Daniel 7:13, where one like a son of man comes before the Ancient of Days in heaven ‘with the clouds of heaven.’ What are these clouds and what do they mean?

It has been suggested that the ‘ten thousands of his holy ones,’ i.e. angels with whom the Lord shall come (Jude 14), are the cloud (= crowd). Much more likely is the rather well known Old Testament cloud as sign of the presence of deity. The cloud over Sinai not only signified that God was there but also served as protection for mortals against instant death. At least six times in the twenty-two New Testament occurrences of nephelē (cloud) it is used to indicate the presence of deity. For our topic it is important that several of these are in eschatological connection. (1) We have already cited the Transfiguration, when God spoke from a cloud (Matt. 17:5) in a species of pre-constitution of the eschatological kingdom, and (2) and the cloud over Sinai which may be the same as the cloud that followed the Israelite ‘fathers’ (1 Cor. 10:12); also (3) Jesus’ Ascension (Acts 1:9), and (4) that ‘he is coming [again] with the clouds’ (Rev. 1:7; Matt. 24:30 and 26:64; with parallels in Mark 13:26; 14:62; Luke 12:54; and 21:27). Furthermore (5) a ‘mighty angel’ descends in a cloud in the midst of other eschatological events (Rev. 10:1), announcing ‘the end’—some think the mighty angel to be none other than the Lord Himself. In the same book the two martyred and resurrected witnesses ascended to heaven in a cloud (Rev. 11:12).

I quote the language of the King James Version at 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 because it is well embedded in Christian consciousness and vocabulary. ‘[T]he Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout ... and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air ...’ In the ancient Latin Version ‘caught up’ employs the verb rapiō, hence the word ‘rapture’ for this opening event of the day of the Lord.

This language suggests natural clouds ‘in the air’ though perhaps the presence of deity as well. Oepke¹⁹ observes: ‘In the two rapture stories in the Old Testament (Enoch in Genesis 5:24; Elijah in 2 Kings 2:1 ff.) there is no express mention of a cloud.’

In my judgment the coming ‘with clouds’ indicate the divine presence and fulfillment of one of the several strands of Old Testament prophecy, that the denouement of history in the eschaton will be an occasion when ‘the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come’ (Mal. 3:1); ‘behold, the Lord is coming out of his place, and will come down’ (Micah 1:3). See also Psalm 50:3; Psalms 93; and 94. ‘These constitute predictions of the deity of the coming Christ, a fact which the Jews never fully understood and which renders a large part of the Old Testament distinctly messianic and, in a certain sense, exclusively Christian.’²⁰

6. He will come again accompanied by angels: ‘all the angels with him, then he will sit on his glorious throne’ (Matt. 25:31). Perhaps the ‘ten thousands of his holy ones’ with whom He shall come (Jude 14) are not a host of human saints but angels. They will not be a mere escort party, for there is sifting and sorting and harvesting to be done by angels. The weeds must be removed from the field of the world (Matt. 13:24–30). ‘The Son of man will send his angels, and they will gather out of his kingdom all causes of sin and all evildoers ...’ (Matt. 13:41 rsv). There will be a kingdom to establish and these angels are to be the agents of effecting the same.

7. Jesus will return ‘swiftly.’ I have put ‘swiftly’ in quote marks because that is how it seems best to interpret places in the New Testament where Jesus Himself says, ‘behold, I am coming soon’ (Rev. 22:7 rsv), ‘Surely I am coming soon’ (Rev. 22:20 rsv) and John the Revelator says the events of his book ‘must soon take place’ (Rev. 1:1 rsv). In this text (Rev. 1:1) the word ‘soon’ translates en tachei which means ‘with speed,’ though also ‘soon’ or ‘shortly’. The two other uses of ‘soon’ translate tachu, a related adverb meaning ‘speedily’ or ‘soon,’ as the several lexicons agree. Which is the meaning here? Will Jesus come after a short interval of time (soon) or when He comes will the event itself happen with speed (like lightning)? The words as such are capable of either meaning. It seems plain that the interval between the Ascension and the parousia is not intended. After all, the words were written 1,900 years ago and the Lord has not yet returned. Speed rather than a short interval is the first meaning assigned these words by Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich.²¹ It must be the sense in these three passages as in Matthew 28:7, 8, where tachu appears twice and refers not to an interval of time, but is interpreted by the fact that the two Marys ‘ran [not walked or strolled] to tell his disciples’ that Jesus was risen. Many decisive events of history occur swiftly but are long in developing. The same will be the case in that most decisive event of the future.

James 5:7–8 and 1 Peter 4:7 define for every believer the lesson to be drawn from the sudden swiftness with which the parousia will occur and the solemn duty. James says that the believer should wait, just as the farmer, who sows in hope of harvest and patiently waits for the necessary rains from heaven to produce harvest, knows in God's time the harvest time will come. It will be through many uncertainties, rains sometimes fail and the poor husbandman must skimp on expenses, plant again and wait some more. Yet he has makrothumia, patience: literally, long patience or long mindedness. The farmer does not give up. James compares this patience to the 'steadfastness' of Job (James 5:11) and we all know how impatient Job was, though enduring and believing. We know the coming of the Lord, says James, 'has been' or 'is' (ēggiken, perfect tense) drawing near. The verb is cognate with the adjective eggus (near). The coming of the Lord has always been 'nearing' and remains so. James' exhortation calls for 'long patience' (James 5:7 kjv) (not tippie-toe excitement, so we won't be 'left behind').

Peter used the same word for 'drawing near,' ēggiken (1 Peter 4:7), for the divinely scheduled but to us unknown moment of our Lord's return. But Peter drew still another lesson. It relates to the believers' lives of prayer. 'The end of all things is at hand [ēggiken]; therefore be self-controlled and sober-minded for the sake of your prayers'. The end Peter intends is, of course, the future arrival of the King, Himself. 'The kingdom of this world' becomes 'the kingdom of the Lord and of his Christ.' We keep 'the end of all things' in mind as we watch and pray, 'Give us this day our daily bread' (we need it for 'long patience'), but we long and pray also, 'Thy kingdom come.'

Let these sayings of the Lord and two of His leading disciples rule both our theology of the Second Advent and our spiritual preparation for His appearing.

¹ The word Advent came into all languages of Christendom via Latin when all its literature was in Latin. It means the same as the Greek parousia, translated 'coming' in the New Testament, either of Christ's first coming, arrival, approach, drawing near or His Second Coming.

² Title of G. C. Berkouwer's volume on eschatology.

³ Harold DeWolf, A Theology of the Living Christ (New York: Harper, 1953), pp. 302, 303.

⁴ In my judgment it is correct to say, 'If it were not for Matthew 24:14 and Mark 13:10 [which prophesy preaching the gospel to all the nations before the end] it would be easy [better, feasible] to bring the entire prophecy of Matthew and Mark within the limits of a single generation.' W. A. Brown in 'Parousia' in HDB, III, p. 676 rt. col.

⁵ H. A. W. Meyer, Critical and Exegetical Commentary to the Gospel of Matthew, trans. F. Crombie & W. Stewart (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1884), p. 482.

⁶ W. A. Brown, 'Parousia' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible III, p. 675.

⁷ R. H. Charles, Eschatology: The Doctrine of a Future Life In Israel, Judaism, and Christianity (New York: Schocken Books repr. 1963 of the 2nd ed. of 1913), p. 179. Dr Charles was not only an eminent scholar but an Anglican preacher who wore himself out from time to time in his combined pastoral and scholarly efforts. I sympathize. R. H. Charles, in another very large work, carried inter-testamental connections too far. The 'Apocalyptic' pseudepigraphal writings were hardly 'the parent of Christianity' as he says in The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (Oxford, 1963 repr. p. 1). See Leon Morris's comment, Apocalyptic (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), p. 9. If any books were 'parent of Christianity' they were the Law, the Prophets and the other writings of the Old Testament.

⁸ Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, 2nd Division, Vol. ii, trans. John MacPherson (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1890), p. 186.

⁹ ibid., p. 186.

¹⁰ F. F. Bruce, Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts (London: Tyndale Press, 1960), p. 58.

¹¹ Some commentators and theologians of various schools of doctrine think verse 20 constitutes an offer by Peter (presumably with apostolic authority and by divine revelation) that if the assembled Jews in the assembled crowd would at that time repent and return to God (v. 19), God would cause their Christ to come down from heaven, that is, the Second Advent would occur. A better meaning of Peter's words must be sought in verse 21. Peter goes on to say that Jesus Christ will remain in heaven until all the Old Testament prophecies about the present age should be fulfilled. Jesus had said only days before that this would include evangelizing from Judea to the uttermost part of the world. The disciples did not even then know fully what that meant. Even Peter did not yet catch on. See Acts 10 and 11.

¹² In Daniel and the Latter Days (rev. as The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People) and in The Histories and Prophecies of Daniel I discuss this topic in detail and at some length.

¹³ A Baptist pastor in Fredericktown, Ohio, near my student pastorate, preached on the Second

Coming and nothing else. For a period in the second third of the twentieth century, fundamentalists' interest in the Second Coming rose to a crescendo, together with the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation. There have been recurrences of this interest throughout Christian history due likely to the same forces—persecution of Christians and curiosity about the future, as well as general moral decay—which caused the first several generations of Christians to feel certain of the Lord's return in their lifetimes. More about this later in this chapter.

¹⁴ There is a somewhat similar doctrine in Parsee (Zoroastrian) religion (See John B. Noss, Man's Religions, [New York: Macmillan, 1978] p. 343) as well as in the indigenous polytheistic religions of Europe, both Celtic and Teutonic. Of course the Old Testament is the root of this aspect of Christian doctrine.

¹⁵ H. E. Dana and Julius R. Mantey, A Manual Grammar of the Greek New Testament (New York: Macmillan, 1927, 1955), p. 129. See as further examples Rom. 8:16, 26; 1 Thess. 4:9 in Dana and Mantey, ibid., p. 130. Also J. Gresham Machen, New Testament Greek for Beginners (New York: Macmillan, 1934), p. 53.

¹⁶ Many scholars suggest that the Transfiguration quite fully matches the situation when in the millennium a glorious Christ, resurrected saints (Moses and Elijah) and other men (the three Apostles) in natural life and bodies will mingle together. If it happened on 'a mountain' in Palestine where Jesus went to pray, why not in a renewed earth during a future millennium?

¹⁷ Henry Alford in NTER, p. 168.

¹⁸ Some of us can remember when country roads were unpaved and everything that moved came with clouds—of dust!

¹⁹ 'Nephelē,' TDNT, vol. ii, p. 905.

²⁰ Robert D. Culver, The Earthly Career of Jesus the Christ (Scotland: Mentor/Christian Focus, 2003) p. 22.

Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

²¹ Bauer, Arndt & Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon, also Thayer, Greek-English Lexicon, and Liddell & Scott, Greek-English Lexicon.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1111). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Time of the Lord's Return

When will the Lord return? There is no scriptural answer which satisfies mere curiosity. Long ago after I had finished my first series of sermons on prophecy and had then passed the seminary course in eschatology with a good grade, I might have answered the question with a more certain answer; but since then I have read the Bible some more and I am now less certain. In my opinion this is exactly what Jesus Himself intended (who said much about the time of His return), as well as the Apostles (who both spoke and wrote about it). More about this later. Let us view some of the biblical evidence and attempt some synthetic conclusions.

I. When asked by four of His disciples (Mark 13:3, 4) for a 'sign' of His promised return and the consummation of the present age, Jesus gave an answer that is both plain and obscure. The plain part of the answer should condition every other remark Jesus made: 'But concerning that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only' (Matt. 24:36). The Father sent the Son the first time at His own pleasure in 'the fullness of time' (Gal. 4:4) and the same will be the case when the Father sends the Son again. He will not consult the prophecy 'experts,' whether critical or evangelical, scholarly or popular.

Comparison of the three accounts (Matt. 24; Mark 13; and Luke 21) yields several then future events to transpire before Jesus' return. They are the destruction of Jerusalem, appearance of false Christs, severe persecution of Christians—especially those dwelling in or near Jerusalem—and a uniquely fierce time of tribulation such as never was before or ever will be, 'upon all who dwell on the face of the whole earth' (Luke 21:35). He said that 'the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet Daniel' (Matt. 24:15; cf. Dan. 9:27) would be placed in an end-time 'holy place,' i.e. the temple of Jewish worship and went on to say: 'Immediately after the tribulation of those days ... will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven ...' (Matt. 24:29, 30).¹

Immediately after He had made known these many harbingers of the Second Advent, Jesus went on to issue a lesson and a warning designed to do away with any form of date-setting or of fanatical excitement about an immediate (perhaps an impending or imminent) appearance of the Lord from heaven.

(1) Jesus drew 'The Lesson of the Fig Tree' (Matt. 25:32–35 esv rubric) from the fact that in Palestine the fruit of the fig tree appears very shortly after the leaves develop. (This explains the acted parable of Matthew 21:18–20.) The similitude does not provide another sign of the Lord's return but a lesson in how to interpret all the things He said earlier in response to the request for a sign of His coming again and related events. Leaves on the fig tree ('and all the trees' cf. Luke 21:29) do not appear overnight nor do figs spring to full size and ripeness. But the latter does follow the former. 'So also,' Jesus explained, 'when you see all [note, not simply one or two] these things, you know that he is near, at the very gates' (Matt. 24:33). The Greek text is not quite so vivid. 'Very' is not present, or any equivalent idiom—engus estin epi thurais. 'Drawing near upon the gates' is more the tone of the expression. The notion that ‘he’ or ‘it’ is presently to walk through the city portals is not required, but rather approaching, getting closer but still out of sight—‘we walk by faith, not by sight.’ The lesson is: think of our Lord’s return as approaching, perhaps very near, but not certainly so. This has been the mindset of God’s people through the generations, generally speaking. The tiptoe excitement induced by the ‘left behind’ literature of recent generations is not the élan of sober Christian fathers, mothers, children and their pastors. (See Titus 2:1–13 kjv.)

(2) Jesus’ warning (Matt. 24:36 and parallel Mark 13:32) further conditions the previous language about a ‘sign’ and precursors of the future Advent: ‘But concerning that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only.’

It has occurred to me that this verse is best explained by Galatians 4:4: ‘But when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son.’ Then as now the Father decides when to send the Son incarnate into the world of men. We know that a circle of devout but obscure believers were expecting it to happen (Simeon, Anna, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary). One of them had special information about it. One of them (Simeon of Jerusalem) was specially informed that he would live to see the Lord’s Christ (Luke 2:26). All were very quiet about it. Think what a sensation Simeon might have created if he had published and distributed a book about what ‘had been revealed to him by the Holy Spirit’ (Luke 2:26) in the manner of one of the current ‘prophecy’ novels of evangelical pop theology.

The rest of the discourse on our Lord’s return in Matthew 24:7–25:30 is all about being watchful and ready when Jesus comes, at whatever time of our lives, whatever the time of day, and under whatever exigencies of health or illness, peace or prosperity, war or poverty.

As pointed out earlier, there are several dominical parables to the same effect. This line of evidence (and there is more of it) seems plainly to say that true faith and loyal service to Christ, who presently is at the right hand of the Father, rather than preoccupation with the time of the Advent, is our proper habit of thinking about the Second Advent.

II. Some New Testament passages seem to say that His return would be then far in the future. Crowds accompanied Jesus as He slowly progressed toward Bethany and Jerusalem. Luke tells us that he spoke a parable ‘because he was near to Jerusalem, and because they supposed that the kingdom of God was to appear [with Jesus as Messianic King] immediately. He said therefore, “A nobleman went into a far country to receive a kingdom and then return” ’ (Luke 19:11, 12 rsv). The parable thus introduced has much more to say about how we should behave while the Lord is away in heaven. The words ‘far country’ correct the notion that the interval between Jesus’ departure and return (as we now can see clearly) would necessarily be short. Similarly, a few days later in the Parable of the Talents, the man who distributes his property ‘went away’ (Matt. 25:15) and ‘after a long time the master ... came and settled accounts’ (25:19). In the Parable of the Ten Virgins ‘the bridegroom was delayed.’ In each of these cases the passing of considerable time before the coming of Christ ‘in his kingdom’ is integral to the message. What is a long time? To a small child on Christmas morning, waiting for father and mother to arise and open packages of gifts, fifteen minutes is a long time. For a ninety-year-old man, most of a century seems a short time. On the above evidence a century, a millennium, or more or less is not only possible but likely.

III. According to Scripture—both Old Testament and New Testament—certain recognizable events will occur before Jesus comes again to bring the present age to a close. These are of two sorts.

First are events somewhat tangential to the matter—not intended primarily as related to the time of Second Advent but impinging on it nevertheless. In this category are (a) the days of waiting for the promise of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4, 5), and (b) the death of Peter in old age (John 21:18, 19). Of greater relevance (c) is the destruction of Jerusalem and with it the end of temple and Torah and the beginning of the Diaspora (dispersion) of Palestinian Jews (Luke 21:20–24). There is not space here to trace out all the scriptural information found in the three accounts of our Lord’s last formal discourse (on the Mount of Olives) found in Matthew 24; 25; Mark 13; and Luke 17; and related Old Testament passages such as Hosea 3:4, 5. The latter text says that ‘the children of Israel shall dwell many days’ without a civil commonwealth and without the historic sacrificial system but later ‘shall return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king, and they shall come in fear to the Lord and to his goodness in the latter days.’ The judgments on Jerusalem (ad 70) which began the present sad epoch are clearly forecast by Jesus in the Olivet discourse as preceding the second advent.²

The destruction of Jerusalem and dispersion of the Jews, including the numerous Christians of Jewish ancestry before, during and after the lengthy siege is specifically said by Jesus to precede His Second Advent. In prospect of this looming catastrophe Jesus warned the Jewish Christians to flee Judea and Jerusalem (Luke 21:21), which they did—to Pella far to the north in trans-Jordan in the valley below the present city of Irbid in the Kingdom of the Jordan. Luke’s report of Jesus’ grim forecast of the future of Jerusalem should be read in entirety (Luke 21:20–28). I quote verses most pertinent to the matter of the long delay of the Second Advent.

But when you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near. Then let those who are in Judea flee to the mountains, and let those who are inside the city depart, and let not those who are out in the country enter it, for these are days of vengeance, to fulfill all that is written’ (Luke 21:20–22).

Among the ‘all that is written’ in the Old Testament were many prophetic oracles, written after the first destruction and diaspora (586/585 bc), of a prolonged desolation of Jerusalem. Some predicted it would lie desolate for a long time before Messianic renewal. One such is the prophecy of Hosea 3:1–5. The prophet Hosea had redeemed his wayward, enslaved wife and prevented any further unlawful sexual intercourse with her and determined not to resume his lawful married relation with her for a longtime, designated as ‘for many days’ (Hosea 3:3). This symbolic action was, in authentic prophetic technique, a symbolic prediction of Israel’s future, when they would endure a long period of time without valid ritual temple worship (owing to destruction of the temple) and without pagan ritual and priestly ministration as well. This describes Israel in world-wide dispersion since ad 70. Hosea, however, predicted Israel’s repentance and resumption of right relation with the Lord under a Davidic (anointed, Messianic) king. The desolate condition initiated by the Roman armies was to last for ‘many days’ (Hosea 3:4).

And so it came to pass. The land and the city fell into the hands of Gentiles—Romans, Byzantines, Persians, Arabs, Crusaders, Arabs again; then in times remembered by people living today, by Turks and then the British (after 1918); then shortly after World War II, some of the land and city was turned over to the ‘Israeli.’ As of now, it is hard to say who is treading down Jerusalem, Jews or their irate Arabic-speaking Muslim neighbors.³ Whatever the outcome of the recent turmoil, Daniel's prophecy, echoed by Jesus, still holds true: 'And after the sixty-two weeks, an anointed one shall be cut off [crucified] and shall have nothing. And the [Roman] people of the prince [Antichrist] who is to come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary ... and ... Desolations are decreed' (Dan. 9:26).

It is true, Jesus' predictions of the destruction of temple and city are not clearly distinguished from events in connection with the Second Advent in Jesus' Olivet discourse, but they became distinguishable, as they certainly became evident to Christians when forty-plus years later the horrible climax to Jewish intransigence took place.

We should also mention (d) Jesus' instructions to the Apostles for their first mission (Matt. 10) in which there is much which related, not alone to the immediate mission to Israel which lasted a few weeks, but also to the apostolic age of the church and later ages.⁴ For example, few if any Christians, whether missionaries or not, were 'dragged before governors and kings for my [Jesus'] sake' for several decades (Matt. 10:18).

Instructions for church discipline in Matthew 18 (e) seem to assume an extended future for the church. The same is true of Jesus' remarks about the church spoken near Caesarea Philippi in response to Peter's great confession (Matt. 16:18).

Four Specific Events to Precede the Parousia

More directly, several specific, important events are to precede what one of the disciples called 'your coming [parousia] and of the close of the age' (Matt. 24:3). The position of the article before 'your coming and end of the age' shows they thought of that as one event and Jesus did not correct their opinion. Jesus said many things about His coming again and the end of the age in that discourse and clearly declared at least one important goal to be completed before His return. Paul added two more. Let us take preliminary notice of all of them.

1. The evangelization of all the nations before Jesus' return, when 'this gospel of the kingdom will be proclaimed throughout the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come' (Matt. 24:14; parallel Mark 13:10).⁵ Jesus said more about this just before His Ascension, predicting (not commissioning!) Christian witness 'to the end of the earth' (Acts 1:8) and 'that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be proclaimed in his name to all nations' (Luke 24:47). It seems unlikely that twenty-five or thirty years later Paul intended to say, in the Epistle to the Colossians, that the mission had already been completed (Col. 1:6, 23). He refers to 'the word of the truth, the gospel, which has come to you, as indeed in the whole world ...' (Col. 1:5, 6). And again Paul asserts, 'the hope of the gospel ... has been proclaimed in all creation under heaven' (Col. 1:23). E. Earl Ellis, a first rate New Testament scholar, comments on 'to every creature' (kjv, i.e. 'whole creation'): it 'may be a reference, as the context would admit, to the cosmic scope of the proclamation (cf. 2 Peter 3:9). If Paul is here speaking of the Roman citizenry, he may be allowed a hyperbole inevitable to a "born" evangelist.'⁶

Nor do I accept as reasonable or scriptural the notion I was taught in the footnotes of the first Bible I owned (and the opinion of a diminishing number of scholars today) that all this relates to a preaching different from the gospel of grace in a period after the rapture of the church.⁷ That such a campaign of evangelism will be conducted by the 144,000 Israelite elect of Revelation 7 is without any contextual basis at all.

This great task of world evangelism is the goal of history as announced to Abram: ‘in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed’ (Gen. 12:3b kjv). The same is implied by passages such as Matthew 8:11; Luke 2:32; Romans 9:24–26; and the many Old Testament prophecies of Messiah as light to the nations, as the one in whom the Gentiles would come to trust. In the Romans passage Paul interprets Old Testament prophecy as embracing the winning of the Gentiles to Christ. These are events which most will find it difficult to place in any prophetic schedule after the parousia of Christ.

Most candid readers of Jesus’ plain words about the evangelization of the world before His return will, I think, agree with J. O. Buswell, who devotes several paragraphs to the subject. He takes note that Mark simply says ‘the gospel’ not the ‘gospel of the kingdom’ must be preached, and similar, and concludes: ‘Certainly the chief business of the church is the preaching of the Gospel in all the world for a witness to all nations. No man can judge when God will count the task completed; but when God sees it completed, then the end will come.’⁸

2. The revelation of Antichrist, called ‘the man of lawlessness’ and ‘son of destruction’ (2 Thess. 2:3) by Paul is clearly scheduled to be ‘revealed’ before the parousia (coming) of Christ—also designated our being ‘caught up together ... to meet the Lord’ (i.e. the resurrection and translation of saints, 1 Thess. 4:13–18). Paul puts these events also before ‘the day of the Lord’ (2 Thess. 2:2). This is what the passage seems plainly to say. It has been read that way from remote Christian antiquity. Only with development in modern times of the theory of two phases of the parousia did many earnest folk see it otherwise. I do not personally see how an informed person can firmly assert a ‘rapture’ of the church before the revelation of Antichrist, in view of this passage—though I am aware of how the seeming plain sense is reversed by some earnest, informed people. They do so, I think, because of the complicated system they bring to the passage rather than what they find in it. More on this problem in the next chapter.

3. The same is true of the ‘falling away’ or apostasy of which Paul speaks in the same second chapter of 2 Thessalonians. The falling away and the revelation of Antichrist are joined as though they are aspects of the same event—‘that day shall not come, except there come a falling away (apostasy) first, and that man of sin (lawlessness) be revealed’ (2 Thess. 2:3 kjv).

In a moment of exasperation over the faithlessness of most people of the time our Lord exclaimed: ‘Nevertheless, when the Son of Man comes, will he find faith on earth?’ (Luke 18:8). Does this not suggest that for all the victories of Christian evangelism and ‘church planting’ there will be a time of acute abandonment of proclamation of ‘the faith’ (as the Greek text of Luke 18:8 has it) as far as Christendom has spread immediately before ‘the Son of Man comes’?

A later chapter will take up the great apostasy in more detail. It will suffice for now to say that the earliest Christian writers to comment on our Lord’s return agreed generally with the foregoing points. Chief among these was Irenaeus, whose writings are held in high regard. His remarks on these aspects of eschatology are found in his justly famous book, Against Heresies.⁹

4. There will be what Jesus called ‘great tribulation’ for the Lord’s people immediately before the Lord’s return. Whether this is to be equated with ‘the great tribulation’ of Revelation 7:14, will receive some attention later. That this season of the world’s history will be one of extreme distress for believers, perhaps also for the whole world, is clearly indicated in each of the three Synoptic reports. Having just spoken of ‘people fainting with fear and with foreboding of what is coming on the world,’ Jesus drew connection to His return, saying: ‘Now when these things begin to take place, straighten up and raise your heads, because your redemption is drawing near’ (Luke 21:26, 28). Mark is even more specific (if that seems possible). Having spoken of ‘that tribulation,’ Jesus proceeds to connect it with His coming to gather the saints: ‘And then they will see the Son of Man coming in clouds.... And then he will send out the angels and gather his elect ...’ (Mark 13:24, 26, 27). Matthew’s report is like Mark’s. He quotes Jesus as predicting, ‘Immediately after the tribulation of those days.... Then will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man ... and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven.... And he will send out his angels with a loud trumpet call, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other ...’ (Matt. 24:29, 30, 31).

How shall we put these indications of the time of our Lord’s coming again together? Are they capable of synthesis into an airtight position? These New Testament statements which relate to the time of our Lord’s return leave us in somewhat the same situation which prevailed in late pre-Christian times among thoughtful, informed believers. They knew that the Messiah was coming, as all the Scriptures in one manner or another indicated. They could not know how prophecies of the seed of David, the Son of Man, the Suffering Servant, ‘that prophet’ and the universal King, were to be related to the renewal of creation in a new heaven and a new earth. The several elements seemed to lack coherence. Their rabbis disagreed among themselves. They did form theories of how to integrate it all. No scheme turned out to be wholly correct. Yet much they knew for sure—enough to be ready for His appearance if their hearts were right. Their experience should teach those who ‘love his appearing’ to be humble as to how we interpret some of the details. Though our present-day Christian ‘rabbis’ disagree, let them still stay on comfortable speaking terms. We shall try to follow our own advice as we proceed through further aspects of the doctrine of our Lord’s return.

How Jesus Interpreted Daniel’s Prophecy of Christ and Antichrist

Early in our Lord’s Olivet discourse about His Second Advent He announced a sure, immediate precursor of the closing events of the present age, saying: ‘So when you see the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet Daniel, standing in the holy place [i.e. the Jewish temple] (let the reader understand),’ a ‘great tribulation’ would immediately follow (Matt. 24:15, 21). He continued:

Immediately after the tribulation of those days the sun will be darkened, and the moon will not give its light, and the stars will fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens will be shaken. Then will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he will send out his angels with a loud trumpet call, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other (Matt. 24:29–31).

Thus Jesus connected the great tribulation, the resurrection and translation of ‘the elect,’ and His Second Coming (Dan. 12:1, 2; Jer. 30:1–7). These things He declared would all immediately follow ‘the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet Daniel.’ If therefore ‘the reader’ is to ‘understand’ (Matt. 24:15), at least a rudimentary knowledge of several chapters of Daniel (Dan. 2; 7; 9; 11:36–12:13) is required. The key to that series of predictions as they relate to ‘the sign of the Son of Man,’ His coming, the tribulation and the gathering of the elect (Matt. 24:30, 31; 1 Thess. 4:13–18; 2 Thess. 2:1 ff.) is Daniel 9:27, I now quote as in the New American Standard Bible of 1963.

And he [the prince that shall come, of v. 26] will make a firm covenant with the many for one week, but in the middle of the week he will put a stop to sacrifice and grain offering; and on the wing of abominations will come one who makes desolate [marg. ‘causes horror’], even until a complete destruction, one that is decreed, is poured out on the one who makes desolate (Dan 9:27).

It appears that we owe New Testament recognition of the future fulfillment of this week of years to Jesus, Himself. He definitely removed ‘the abomination’ spoken of by the prophet Daniel from the past, present or immediate future to a more remote future time. He also appears to acknowledge the division of the seven years into two equal parts, for He affirms Daniel’s words about the predicted sacrilege ‘in the middle of the week.’

Further, the person who shall perform this act of desecration is a prince of ‘the [Roman] people’ who destroyed ‘Jerusalem and its sanctuary’ (ad 70, v. 26). So it is Jesus Himself who places the seventieth week of Daniel’s prophecy of seventy weeks (Dan 9:27) in the future, immediately preceding the Second Coming of ‘the Son of Man.’

The two halves of this week (probably of seven 360-day years) appear many times in the Old and New Testaments. To begin with the first reference and then consecutively to read each occurrence in literary order is quite an eye opener for the skeptically inclined, even if lightly read. I present these passages here for several reasons: first, to demonstrate the prevalence of the idea through Scripture and thereby, secondly, to open minds to the possibility that Scripture prediction specifies some details about end-times and thirdly, to open up some vistas of revelation among serious-minded readers and students. Here is some of the biblical material.

‘[A]nd they [Daniel’s holy people] shall be given into his hand until a time and [two] times and half a time’ (Dan. 7:25 asv).

‘[F]or one week: and in the midst of the week [of years] he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and upon the wing of abominations shall come one that maketh desolate’ (9:27 asv).

‘[T]he children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation... How long shall it be ...? He held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and swore by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, [two] times, and a half’ (Dan. 12:1–7 asv).

‘And from the time that the continual burnt-offering shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up; there shall be a thousand and two hundred and ninety days [three and a half years plus thirty days]’ (Dan. 12:11, asv).

‘Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days’ (Dan. 12:12 asv).

Observe here that Jeremiah spoke of ‘the time of Jacob’s trouble’ with accompanying specification of unique and terrible suffering, out of which he (Jacob = Israelites) would be saved (Jer. 30:4–7 asv), and that each of the Synoptic Gospels reports Jesus as speaking of ‘the abomination of desolation, which was spoken of through Daniel the prophet’ (Matt. 24:15 asv; cf. Mark 13:14; Luke 21:20). Then follows in the book of Revelation: ‘And the court which is without the temple leave without, and measure it not; for it hath been given unto the nations [Gentiles]: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months’ (Rev. 11:2 asv). ‘And I will give unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days’ (Rev. 11:3 asv). ‘And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that there they may nourish her a thousand two hundred and threescore days’ (Rev. 12:6 asv). ‘And there were given to the woman the two wings of the great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness unto her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent’ (Rev. 12:14 asv). ‘[A]nd there was given to him [the beast = Antichrist] a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and there was given to him authority to continue forty and two months ... to make war with the saints’ (Rev. 13:5–7 asv).

To read these verses thoughtfully and consecutively at a single sitting is a disturbing experience if you have been led to believe that a seven of years, significant to biblical predictive prophecy, is a bizarre thing, of interest only to sectarian fanatics.

Daniel arranged his chapters in such a way that this consummately evil opponent of Christ and His people (both Israel and the church) is progressively introduced. Chapter 2 is a prophecy of the succession of empires from Daniel’s time on till the Advent of the Son of Man to judge and rule the world. He tells of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream of a great metallic image—the head of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of bronze, the legs of iron, its feet of iron mixed with clay. Daniel interpreted these stages as four empires which history determined to be the Babylonian, succeeded by the Medo-Persian, then the Grecian empire of Alexander, succeeded by the Roman. In the only actions of the dream a divinely cut stone strikes the image on its weak feet (iron mixed with clay), the image crashes, the fragments are blown away, to be followed by the establishment on earth by ‘the God of heaven,’ of a kingdom which shall never be destroyed.

I have argued that the kingdom envisioned is the future millennial kingdom (Daniel and the Latter Days, pp. 131–134, and Wycliffe Commentary). This view implies, say some, a revival in end-times of the Roman Empire. My own opinion is that culturally, in law and literature, Western civilization is almost a living, breathing extension of the Rome of the Caesars, Seneca, Cicero, Roman law and all the classical Latin literature on which even the education of children in Europe and America was based until very recent times.

Chapter 7 of Daniel goes over the same ground from a divine outlook. The succession of kingdoms is not a statue of a rational man but a succession of violent, snarling, non-rational, brute beasts. The first, a winged lion, represents Babylon; the second, a bear, represents Medo-Persia,¹⁰ the third is a swift leopard with four wings and four heads. It represents the Greeks (Alexander) who swiftly, about 330 bc, brought down the Persian Empire. Upon his death the area was divided into four jurisdictions represented by the four heads. The Jews of the second century suffered greatly from one of those four ‘heads’ (Syria), as prophesied in Daniel 8 and reported in several books of the Apocrypha, especially 1 and 2 Maccabees. The fourth (Roman) beast is an unnatural monster: ‘It devoured and crushed and trampled down the remainder with its feet; and it was different from all the beasts that were before it, and it had ten horns’ (Dan. 7:7 nasb). That is exactly what transfer of the center of the gravity of world rulership did when the ruling culture moved from East (Oriental) to West (Occidental). The process is still going on. Example: even the Chinese and Japanese have given up their robes for Western garb. Will Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan follow? This is partly what the war on terrorism (the West) and jihad (the East) is about.

But Daniel 7 particularizes and enlarges on a little horn (v. 8) which ‘came up among them [the ten horns] ... before which three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots.’ Yet, though, the fourth ‘beast’ lived on awhile. The little horn becomes the ruler of all. ‘He shall speak words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints [holy people] of the Most High ... and they shall be given [by God, of course] into his hand for a time [year], times, and half a time’ (Dan. 7:25).

Three years later Daniel received a vision (Dan. 8:1) of developments in the second (Medo-Persian) and third (Grecian) periods. In this, the division of Alexander’s dominions into four, one of which was Syria, is the burden of revelation. The king of Syria is represented by a ‘little horn’ who in history turned out to be an aggressor named Antiochus (Epiphanes, the magnificent). He sought to seduce the Jews, then under his rule (second century bc), to abandon worship of Jehovah and to adopt Grecian social and religious customs. He brought temple ritual practice to a stop, desecrated the temple and began enforcing paganism. In his war with the Jews which followed this ‘little horn’ was defeated. The revealing angel ended his explanation with the promise, ‘he shall become great. Without warning he shall destroy many. And he shall even rise up against the Prince of princes [high priest?] and he shall be broken—but by no human hand’ (Dan. 8:25). Further details of this king’s nefarious career are supplied in early verses of Daniel 11.

The prophecy provides such specific details that when Antiochus (the little horn) began the depredation of 168–165 bc, the Jews could hardly fail to recognize him.

Many interpreters of the ‘little horn’ of chapter 8 (I think rightly) have seen in him a type or foreshadowing of the final ‘little horn’ (of chap. 7), and the prince that shall come of Daniel 9, the one who creates the abomination of desolation of Matthew 24:15, the one Paul names the ‘man of lawlessness’ (2 Thess. 2:3) ‘whom the Lord Jesus will kill with the breath of his mouth’ (2 Thess. 2:8).

The theological literature read by the earliest church Fathers was chiefly the Old Testament. They were well acquainted with the picture of the future painted by Daniel in particular. Hippolytus (ad 170–236) in his Treatise on Christ and Antichrist, laid out for one Theophilus a detailed exposition, concentrating on Daniel.¹¹ He treated Daniel chapters 2, 7, 9, 11 and 12 essentially as I have summarized above. Moreover he regarded the first sixty-nine weeks of Daniel’s prophecy of seventy weeks, determined on Daniel’s people and city of Jerusalem, as terminating on the Christ. Further, he taught that the seventieth week is future and belongs to the period immediately before Christ’s return, that its division into two parts of forty-two months, 1,260 days, or three and a half years is real not allegorical. The church, he said, will be persecuted by Antichrist and will go through the great tribulation. Let the reader confirm this report by reading Hippolytus' treatise, which is easily available and the sixteen pages may be read in one sitting. A sample from chapter 64 near the end of the Treatise on Christ and Antichrist provides the sense and tone of Hippolytus's exposition of prophecies of the course of the world and of end-times.

These things, then, being to come to pass, beloved, and the one week being divided into two parts, and the abomination of desolation being manifest then, and the two prophets [Rev. 12] and forerunners of the Lord having finished their course, and the whole world finally approaching the consummation, what remains but the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ from heaven, for whom we have looked in hope.¹²

This Father of the church then employs the language of Scripture (Luke 21:28, 18; Matt. 24:27, 28, 31) to show that the Second Advent comes near or at the end of that seventieth week of Daniel.¹³ He ends his treatise by quoting in full the description of 'the rapture' (1 Thess. 4:13 ff.) and quotes Titus 2:13 as summarizing the Christian hope.

Historic premillennialists will feel quite at home in all of Hippolytus's treatise on Christ and Antichrist. The same is generally true also of The Epistle of Barnabas IV, Justin Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, lii, lxxx, cx), The Shepherd of Hermas (Fourth Vision), The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles and Irenaeus in the last part of the Fifth Book of Against Heresies. It is evident that Hippolytus's ideas were passed down from his teacher, Irenaeus. Irenaeus is said to have been taught by Polycarp and he by the Apostle John. This chain of tradition is very important to the establishment of a very early distribution of the whole New Testament canon (see C. R. Gregory's Canon and Text of the New Testament).¹⁴ Jerome (ad 340–420), perhaps the greatest of translators and Bible commentators of Christian antiquity, quite untypically refrained from publishing any opinion of his own on the meaning of Daniel 9:24–27, the prophecy of the 69 plus 1 weeks. Instead he presented at length the interpretation of seven others, of whom three (Africanus, Apollinarius of Laodicia and Hippolytus) affirmed 'that the final week will occur at the end of the world (Jerome's commentary on Daniel, trans. Gleason L. Archer, Grand Rapids: Baker Book House, 1958, pp. 94–108.)

'The Seventy Weeks' prophecy is the chief basis for the commonly held (but little understood) teaching that there will be seven years of the 'Great Tribulation,' at the end of which Jesus will come again. Some more recent schools of thought have placed His coming to rapture the church at the beginning of the week (pre-tribulationism), the middle (mid-tribulationism), or even later in the week, just before the eschatological wrath of God announced by the sounding of the seventh trumpet and subsequent seven bowls of wrath in the midst of the week (seven) of years (pre-wrathism).

Literature on the Time of the Lord's Return

There is an enormous amount of literature—ancient, recent and contemporary—on these aspects of eschatology, but few major works of systematic theology have extended treatment. It was a major concern of L. S. Chafer's multi-volume Systematic Theology and J. O. Buswell favored the church with a large section on the Second Advent, the millennium and related matters.¹⁵ I acknowledge a certain debt to the latter work which appeared in early years of my ministry. In his major volume,

Millard Erickson furnished merely a chapter of twenty pages on ‘Millennial and Tribulation Views,’ providing only a single sentence relating to the seven years: ‘In theory, all premillennialists hold that there will be a great disturbance of seven year’s duration ... prior to Christ’s coming,’¹⁶ but reserved full treatment with exegesis of relevant Scripture for a subsequent volume (wisely, I think). I follow a similar technique except that I refer the reader to volumes and articles which were published previously to this present work of systematic theology. With respect to the seventy weeks of Daniel 9 and the futurity of the seventieth week see Daniel and the Latter Days, also The Earthly Reign of our Lord with His People (pp. 144–169), The Histories and Prophecies of Daniel (pp. 147–161), and in the Wycliffe Commentary (pp. 792–795).

¹ Insofar as a partial fulfillment of the predicted events took place at the siege and fall of Jerusalem to the Roman armies in ad 70, ‘this generation’ (v. 34) did not ‘pass away, until all these things’ took place. This verse is, of course, the spear-point of preterist interpretation.

² The preterist interpretation of the Advent in the Olivet discourse will be treated briefly later in this book.

³ Most of the residents of pre-1948 Palestine, west of the Jordan, were not ethnic Arabs.

⁴ I have discussed this at length in The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1976), pp. 149–151; The Earthly Career of Jesus the Christ (Scotland: Mentor/Christian Focus, 2003); and also in my book A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984), where I treat Matthew 9:35–10:42 as specific instruction to the church in its age-long mission of world evangelism. Alford in his New Testament for English Readers, treats Matthew 10 as a preview of evangelism through the several stages of the present age., pp. 65–75.

⁵ An important system of contemporary evangelical theology relates this evangelistic program to a time of the rapture of the church. The ‘gospel’ is the news that the visible reign of Christ is to begin soon. ‘Verse 14 has specific reference to the proclamation of the good news that the kingdom [postponed since the Jews rejected it and crucified the King] is again [emphasis added] at hand.’ The New Scofield Reference Bible, p. 1033 note 4. See also H. A. Hoyt, The End Times (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 147, 155–157.

⁶ Wycliffe Bible Commentary, eds. Charles F. Pfeiffer & Everett F. Harrison (Chicago, IL: Moody Press, 1962), p. 1339.

⁷ I have treated this view with respect but with contrary evidence in these studies in connection with Part 6, on the doctrine of the church as also in another book, A Greater Commission.

⁸ James O. Buswell, Jr, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, II (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962), p. 367.

⁹ Irenaeus, Against Heresies, Book V, chapters 30–36.

¹⁰ Daniel began his career with the lion, ended with the bear.

¹¹ Hippolytus, Treatise on Christ and Antichrist in ANF, Vol. v, pp. 204–219.

¹² ANF, Vol. v, p. 218.

¹³ ibid., p. 218.

¹⁴ C. R. Gregory, Canon and Text of the New Testament (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1907), pp. 146–154.

¹⁵ J. Oliver Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, Vol. II (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 346–538.

¹⁶ Millard J. Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1985), pp. 1205–1225.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1120). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

Precursors to the Day of the Lord: The Great Tribulation, the Great Apostasy and the Revelation of the Man of Sin

There are passages in the New Testament which provide partial perspective on the course of the present age leading up to consummation in the Second Advent. The felt need we all have is expressed in the disciples' question, 'what will be the sign of your coming and of the close of the age' (Matt. 24:3). Paul surely is thinking of the same in 2 Timothy 3:1–7, which begins, 'But understand this, that in the last days there will come times of difficulty' and ends with prediction of growing moral decline and doctrinal deviation of 'men corrupted in mind,' presumably at the parousia. Similarly in Peter's second epistle he says, 'scoffers will come in the last days with scoffing, following their own sinful desires. They will say, "Where is the promise of his coming?"' (2 Peter 3:3). He then launches into a vigorous discourse on events at the parousia (2 Peter 3:4–17). These scoffers are to be expected before that consummation. Jesus rebuked every request for a 'sign' of His authority as Messiah (John 2:18; Matt. 12:38–45), but He gave a long discourse in response to the disciples' interest in some 'sign' of His promised return. He refused to respond to mere curiosity, but He did provide information relative both to the disciples' interest and ours. His answer fills several long chapters in each of the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21).

There is a large number of devout teachers who insist that in the Olivet discourse Jesus addressed the Apostles as Jews, or even 'a future Jewish remnant' after the rapture—an opinion without any direct support in the language of any of the three reports (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21) and dependent on doubtful inferences from other passages of Scripture.

Matthew 24:14 (kjv) reads, ‘And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come.’ A note on this verse in the Scofield Reference Bible declares: ‘Verse 14 has specific reference to the proclamation of the good news that the kingdom is again at hand by the Jewish remnant.’ Scofield insisted that this ‘remnant’ would arise after the rapture of the church. Homer A. Kent, Jr. comments on the gospel of the kingdom as ‘the good news of salvation in the Messiah, with the emphasis that the Messianic kingdom is about to be established. This message will go into all the world during the tribulation through the efforts of the two witnesses (Rev. 11:3–12) and the sealed remnant of Israel (Rev. 7).’¹

An extended response to the idea would point out that the Olivet discourse in detail parallels quite exactly the teaching of every other section of the New Testament regarding the course of the age and its consummation, hardly intended only for Jews. Several authors have demonstrated this. It is a commonplace of New Testament biblical theology. When Paul delivered the classic passage on the resurrection and translation of believers, he prefaced it with: ‘this we declare to you by a word from the Lord [en logo kurio]’ (1 Thess. 4:15). ‘By a word from the Lord’ is close to the usual Pauline designation for what Jesus Himself had taught while on earth, as distinguished from what Paul, himself, had received later ‘by revelation’ (Gal. 1:12; 2:1, 2; Eph. 3:3) or expressed as personal counsel (1 Cor. 7:25 ff.; cf. 7:12). Paul had ample opportunity to learn Jesus’ teaching from the Apostles and their immediate associates. Barnabas took him as a new believer to Jerusalem, possibly precisely to mingle with the Apostles (Acts 9:27, 28). Luke reports another time Paul consorted with the Apostles at Jerusalem (Acts 15:4) and, in Galatians 1:18, Paul reports that he once ‘went up to Jerusalem to visit Cephas and remained with him fifteen days.’ In an excellent article Marvin J. Rosenthal observes:

It is certainly reasonable to understand that when Paul spent time with Peter and other Apostles, the major topic of conversation would have been the Lord and His teachings.

From Peter and the other Apostles, Paul would have heard what the Lord Himself taught concerning His second coming and the end of the age, particularly His Olivet Discourse, which He shared with His Apostles shortly before His crucifixion.²

Rosenthal demonstrates the amazing identity of teaching by pairing the discourse of Matthew 24 with 1 Thessalonians 4 and 5. The conclusion: the Olivet discourse is as much for believers of this age, whether Jews or Gentiles, apostles or common believers. The elect who are ‘raptured’ after ‘the tribulation of those days’ are the same as ‘the elect’ in other parts of the New Testament. This issue is canvassed well by J. O. Buswell in his chapter, ‘The Olivet Discourse and Collateral Scriptures.’³

C. Henry Waterman, a professor of New Testament at Wheaton College Graduate School, demonstrated the full dependence of Paul’s teaching regarding the Second Coming of Christ in the Thessalonian Epistles on the teaching of Jesus in the Olivet discourse. I list his twenty-four correspondences: (1) the use of the word parousia for the Second Coming; (2) it will be ‘the Lord himself’; (3) He will come ‘from heaven,’ (4) accompanied by angels, (5) heralded by a loud trumpet sound; (6) those who endure or are alive and remain are translated; (7) He will come ‘with clouds’; (8) the waiting believers will ‘meet the Lord’; (9) the subject of the time of His coming is introduced by almost exactly the same words (cf. 1 Thess. 5:1, 2 with Matt. 24:36—peri de tōn, ‘concerning the’); (10) both relate the parousia to ‘the day of the Lord’; (11) He will come ‘like a thief in the night,’ (12) bringing sudden destruction; (13) the sudden coming is compared to ‘labor pains’; (14) there is no escape for the unprepared; (15) believers compared to sons of light; (16) Christians are urged to ‘watch’; (17) there is warning against danger of sleeping, and (18) warning against the danger of drunkenness; (19) believers are destined to receive salvation rather than wrath; (20) Jesus will come in power and glory; (21) the saints will be gathered together; (22) the apostasy will precede the day of the Lord; (23) the Antichrist will be revealed before the coming of Christ; and (24) the gospel will be preached far and wide first.

Waterman concludes (I abbreviate):

1. The Olivet discourse in oral or written form is the source of Paul’s teaching.
2. Close verbal resemblances point to a written rather than an oral source.
3. Paul’s materials are parallel more to Matthew than to either Mark or Luke.
4. Where there is no verbal resemblance to Matthew the thoughts are parallel.

5. Papias (whose life overlaps the Apostles’ lives) mentions the Logia (sayings) which he says Matthew composed in Hebrew (Aramaic), probably a collection of Jesus’ sayings and discourses. This might have been Paul’s source.⁴

If this is true, Paul applied Jesus’ teachings in the Olivet discourse directly to the believers at Thessalonica, and we should apply Jesus’ teachings directly to Christians, whether Jew or Gentile, now or in the future.

New Testament expectation of the eschaton (the last time) or the telos (consummation) focuses on the Second Advent. Several aspects of this overture to the eschaton are to be stages in the consummation of evil, the last gasps of the serpent’s seed,. They are, so to speak, harbingers of Christ’s coming in the clouds with power and great glory accompanied by angels—precursors to the parousia and the day of the Lord, constituting movements in an overture to the main event.

From the earliest times of which we have record Christians found (1) the great tribulation, (2) the apostasy and (3) the revelation of the Man of Sin in the oral apostolic tradition (before the collection of apostolic Scripture) and in the writings of the Apostles. Though not a part of the consummation, these three events are prelude to the consummation. We therefore attempt here to report and clarify—as far as present knowledge enables us—what Scripture says of these three matters.

Enter these waters gingerly, for there is great difference of opinion about some biblically obscure aspects of ‘prophetic’ subjects, accompanied, too frequently, with unjustified insistence and more harsh judgment than seems justified. Many years ago James Graham (who wrote tellingly, if a bit too fiercely, on these topics) wisely observed, ‘Prophecy ... cannot be popularized. Neither is it so simple nor the order so clearly defined that the events can be listed like a high school commencement program.’⁵

A backward look on Old Testament prophecies of the first parousia of the Savior from the standpoint of their fulfillment illuminates this matter. Generously explained, both by the events and the apostolic explanations, all seems reasonably clear. 'Unfulfilled prediction is designedly less clear than that which has been completed. If we see fulfilled prophecy of the first advent quite plainly, we can see the unfulfilled prophecy of the second Advent only in the manner of "men as trees walking" [Mark 8:24]. Its general contours can be discerned and as the events draw closer, the lines are more clearly defined, though some of the details remain obscure. The course of events convinces us that our redemption draweth nigh, yet the day and the hour knoweth no man, and the prophecies are always elastic enough that we cannot apply them with absolute precision to any specific person or event.'⁶

Biblical predictions usually will have a true but obscure reference to future events. Jesus' predictions of His resurrection are typical examples. In giving a 'sign' (Matt. 12:40), He did not plainly say, I will die, my body will be buried and three days later emerge alive again. Rather He made an enigmatical reference to Jonah's experience in the 'great fish' and indicated He would have a similar experience in the 'heart of the earth'. He earlier predicted His resurrection in connection with His cleansing of the temple (John 2:18, 19) in a manner which neither the Jewish antagonists nor the disciples present understood until after fulfillment (Easter), and then only upon steady reflection (John 2:22). 'If this obscurity were not initially present, prophecy might actually produce its nonfulfillment through the efforts of those who might wish to oppose it, or its evidential value might be destroyed by bungling efforts of too-helpful friends who would try to bring it to pass.'⁷

If I am correct, the future events discussed in this chapter belong to the final years of the present age though they have been developing ever since the fall. They will come to climax as immediate precursors of the return of Christ. There is a very respectable number of earnest Bible students in about every evangelical group who believe there will be a preliminary descent of Christ to the air seven (or three and a half) years before His return to earth to rapture the church. Neither the title of this chapter nor ensuing remarks is intended to denounce that possible interpretation of the scriptural information. I once held similar opinions based on what I heard at church and in the literature recommended, especially the notes in my first copy of the Holy Scriptures, the Scofield Reference Bible, bought at the age of fourteen years and my only Bible until I entered seminary nine years later.

Though exposition of biblical prophecy invites speculation, treatment here will try to avoid it. A. W. Tozer, of an older generation, wrote:

Shortly after the close of the first World War, I heard a great Southern preacher say that he feared the intense interest in prophecy current at the time would result in a dying out of the blessed hope when events had proved the excited interpreter wrong. The man was a prophet, or at least a remarkably shrewd student of human nature, for exactly what he predicted has come to pass.⁸

Tozer was right several times over.

The Great Tribulation

The name of the event was furnished by one of the twenty-four elders whom John saw seated about the throne of God in the Revelator's initial vision of 'what must soon take place' (Rev. 1:19). It is during an interlude before the breaking of the ‘seventh seal’: the elder’s explanation identified the glorified ‘great multitude ... from every nation’ tribe, people and tongue, saying, ‘These are the ones coming out of the great tribulation [Gr. ‘the tribulation, the great one’]. They have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb’ (Rev. 7:14).

Immediate, previous connection of the great tribulation with the Second Advent seems clearly stated in the Lord’s great eschatological discourse about His return at the end of the age:

Immediately after the tribulation of those days the sun will be darkened, and the moon will not give its light, and the stars will fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens will be shaken. Then will appear in heaven the sign of the Son of Man, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory (Matt. 24:29, 30).

This tribulation will be unique in human history. In Mark’s report of the Olivet discourse Jesus warned, ‘For in those days there will be such tribulation as has not been from the beginning of the creation that God created until now, and never will be’ (Mark 13:19).

Though, as we shall see, there is some special reference to Israel in Old Testament prophecies of this uniquely distressful period (Jer. 30:4–11; Dan. 12:1), it will be world-wide in scope. The ones saved out of it (apparently while it is going on) are of every nation (Rev. 17:13), and again in the description of it in the Revelation it is the whole living human race who suffer its ravages. In Jesus’ message to the Philadelphian church He spoke of it as ‘the hour of trial that is coming on the whole world, to try those who dwell on the earth’ (Rev. 3:10).

The language of all the above passages seems to reflect Old Testament prophecies which relate these trials in a special way to the nation of Israel, still in rejection of their Messiah at that future time. Let us look at portions of some of them. The first contemplates a restoration (Jer. 30–31) far exceeding anything that happened in the post-exilic period following 536 bc.

The restoration will be permanent—‘It shall not be uprooted or overthrown any more for ever’ (Jer. 31:40). Before that however:

These are the words that the Lord spoke concerning Israel and Judah: “Thus says the Lord: We have heard a cry of panic, of terror, and no peace. Ask now, and see, can a man [zakar, male] bear a child? Why then do I see every man [gever, male person] with his hands on his stomach like a woman in labor? Why has every face turned pale? Alas! That day is so great there is none like it; it is a time of distress for Jacob [tsarah, distress, anguish]; yet he shall be saved out of it” (Jer. 30:4–7).

The passage goes on to say that this unprecedented time of anguish will terminate with what can only be called conversion and permanent restoration of the entire nation of Israel in times of Messiah (Jer. 30:8–31:40).

The prophecies of Jeremiah were well known to Daniel (see Dan. 9:20). So the revelation given to him on the subject of future unique distress for Jacob was no surprise. Note both the similarity of the revelation vouchsafed to him and the advance in detail, but strictly in eschatological context. I cite the text in asv:

And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince who standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble [tsarah, as in Jer. 30:7 above], such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever (Dan. 12:1–3).

At this point it is important to point out (in whatever manner one thinks these predictions of Israel's conversion, restored relation and new covenant with the Lord should be interpreted) this trouble is not located in any past historical situation but just previous to the eschaton. Here are all the main events of eschatology: a resurrection of the dead, a judgment when the books are opened (see Rev. 20:12, 15), and rewards, both for good and for evil. It meshes quite exactly with Jesus' specification that 'Immediately after the tribulation of those days ... they will see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven' (Matt. 24:29, 30).

These plain to a point but still somewhat enigmatic statements, along with the terrors of Revelation 6–19, went into general Christian awareness very early. The Epistle of Barnabas (written, says Lightfoot, before ad 132) is rife with references to the prophecies of Daniel, the Revelation and the Olivet discourse. It refers even to the shortening of the days of the great tribulation.⁹ 'Barnabas' seems to entertain no doubt that the Christians he addresses might be involved in that time of great stress. The Shepherd of Hermas (before ad 150) has these lines: 'Blessed are ye, as many as endure patiently the great tribulation that cometh, and as many as shall not deny their life. For the Lord swore concerning his Son, that those who denied their Lord should be rejected from their life, even they that are about to deny him in the coming days.... But thou, Hermas, hast had great tribulation of thine own,' etc.¹⁰ These ancient Christians obviously thought it possible that they might suffer this predicted 'great tribulation' and felt they should get ready for it.

Irenaeus in Book V of Against Heresies very plainly taught that Christians of his own or some future generation would enter the great tribulation and encounter Antichrist (the man of lawlessness of 2 Thess., the beast of Rev.). Among many passages, perhaps the strongest is: 'But he [John, author of Revelation] indicates the number of the name [the Beast, Antichrist, 666] now, that when this man comes we may avoid him, being aware who he is.'¹¹

This awareness of prophesied 'perilous times,' 'trouble,' 'travail,' was already present in late pre-Christian Judaism. Borrowing Jeremiah's pungent expression (rendered 'travail with child' above, Jer. 30:6) they speak of the 'birth pangs of Messiah.' So Jesus was not introducing something entirely new.

Raphael Patai is a renowned contemporary Jewish scholar. In The Messiah Texts, where he records Jewish Messianic teaching through the ages, he writes:

Once the idea became entrenched that the coming of Messiah will be preceded by greatly increased suffering, and that even the beginning of the messianic era itself will be an age of trials and tribulations, apocalyptic fancy went to work elaborating in gruesome detail what would happen at the onset of the days of the Messiah¹².... Both the people and its religious leaders continued to hope for the coming of the Messiah, much like a woman who hopes and waits for the birth of her child, even though she knows that she will have to go through severe pangs of childbirth before she can enjoy the pleasures of motherhood.¹³.... (There was even a Talmudic tradition of seven years.) ¹⁴

Of course these thoughts were derived from such Old Testament passages as Jeremiah 30; Daniel 7 and 9; Zechariah 12–14; and others.

At about the same time the birth pangs preliminary to birth of the Messianic age were being discussed at Qumran by the teachers of the people of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

In every epoch of perceived persecution of Christians or of expected persecution, devout believers have wondered if the predicted great tribulation were impending or even present.

This, as far as I can determine, has never changed except that an influential movement, which originated in Britain early in the nineteenth century, captured wide attention in recent decades, and is promoted throughout the world, holds that all believers will be removed from earth to heaven before the great tribulation begins. This is a modification of the premillennialism (or millennialism) of the early centuries and of common understanding among all millennial views—as we shall see. It requires a considerable readjustment of historic premillennial interpretation of the book of Revelation, the Olivet discourse, and Paul’s treatment of the parousia in 1 and 2 Thessalonians.

I ordinarily do not use the word ‘rapture’ as a short designation of the resurrection of the righteous dead and their translation with the righteous living at our Lord’s return, because in our time many who read that word ‘rapture’ will bring to it a whole complex of popular end-time scheduling which may or may not be scriptural. The teaching of 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 has great capacity for spectacular enlargement by creative imagination. Several series of fictional books and movies, built on the words ‘one shall be taken and the other left,’ have captured evangelical readers in recent generations. Presently a whole series of movies and novels employ the ‘left behind’ theme. When ‘rapture of the church’ is read the result is just as the American West of pioneer times is imprinted on minds by Gary Cooper and John Wayne movies, more than by memory of the elders, and bona fide historical literature. The public in general (including naive and theologically neglected church folk) bring a prophetic ‘schedule’ and supposed spectacular end-time events at the ‘coming’ of the Lord, its precursors and sequents, to the subject. Distortion of the doctrine by spectacular imagination has created a prophetic paradigm for which, even if correct in part, has been accepted without knowledge of the basis for it. How many, for example, could supply biblical support for ‘seven years of tribulation’? Most would not know even the chapters of the Old Testament and New Testament to consult. So I try to avoid the word which triggers a partly fictitious paradigm of prophecy.

Yet nothing has dislodged this conviction of the first Christians that just before our Lord’s return there would be a period of intense persecution of believers in Christ. Usually this is discussed in the very terms of the Olivet discourse, Revelation 7; Daniel 12; and Jeremiah 30; as well as Paul’s ‘perilous times’ and Peter’s ‘last days.’ There have been three waves of interest and attempts to relate current events to this aspect of prophecy in my lifetime. The first was during the decade of the 1930s, when there was the rise of fascism (Mussolini) and Italian subjection of Libya and Ethiopia (see Dan. 11:36), plus in the United States of America, the New Deal efforts at centralized control (the National Recovery Act and the Blue Eagle). The second was in the late 1960s, when Hal Lindsey's writings hit the market. The third was the now recent (though much chastened) popularity of the 'Left Behind' books and films.

Concurrent with the popular 'rapture' excitement, serious study with scholarly control has proceeded steadily. There are dozens of monographs on deposit in seminary libraries and hundreds of journal articles. Results have been incorporated in volumes of systematic theology by competent evangelical authors. Even biblically oriented Roman Catholic scholars such as Vincent P. Miceli, S. J., have become interested. Father Miceli produced a scholarly work covering the subject.¹⁵ Before we proceed let us emphasize that the topics of this chapter, weird as they may seem at first exposure and distasteful to nominal Christians, and even 'turned off' by some evangelical believers, are authentic main features of Christ's own revelation about the future of the human race.

The second and third topics should be introduced together.

The Great Apostasy and the Revelation of the Man of Sin

These two end-time events are introduced together as aspects of the period of time known as the great tribulation which we have just previously discussed. Paul's 'eschatological discourse' found in his two Epistles to the new congregation of Thessalonica assumes and supplements Jesus' Olivet discourse on the time of His coming. As we have seen, they should be studied side by side. Paul's 'discourse' starts at 1 Thessalonians 4:13 and continues through 2 Thessalonians 2:11. He had taught the Thessalonian congregation about these matters when he was with them founding the congregation (see Acts 17:1-9; cf. 2 Thess. 2:5). The letters were probably written within a year while Paul was missionizing Corinth (Acts 18:11).

In the earlier letter he wrote a message of comfort, assuring them that at Jesus' coming their believing dead would be restored to life and, together with living believers, would be transformed and rise to 'meet the Lord in the air' (1 Thess. 4:13-18). Meanwhile unhealthy fanaticism and speculation (never quite absent from discussion of biblical predictions) had broken out. Hence the second Epistle carries a message of correction.

Some at Thessalonica were agitating fellow believers with the notion that 'the day of the Lord' was about to occur. Some felt so sure, they had stopped daily labor to earn a living (2 Thess. 2:2; cf. 3:5-15). Paul counseled 'patient waiting' (2 Thess. 3:5 kjv). Paul's teachings had been misconstrued and even falsely represented, perhaps by forged letters and perhaps even denied by 'spirit or word'—i.e. prophetic utterances, perhaps spoken or written by members of the local church (2 Thess. 2:2). So the great evangelist and teacher, in a rather severe mood, wrote a second letter to set things straight. He explained how the 'rapture,' the apostasy and the revelation of Antichrist really are connected and in what order. Paul sets forth the order in which the tribulation, the apostasy and the revelation of the Man of Sin were to take place. Here are his own words. I cite the kjv with one textual correction ('Lord' for 'Christ' in v. 2) because it furnishes the classic terms in which the discussions and controversies have been conducted over several generations.

¹ Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming [arrival, parousia] of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him [the ‘rapture’], ² That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor letter as from us, as that the day of the Lord is at hand. ³ Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; ⁴ Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. ⁵ Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? ⁶ And now ye know what withholdeth [is restraining, rsv] that he might be revealed in his time. ⁷ For the mystery of iniquity [anomia, lawlessness, rsv] doth already work: only he who now letteth [restrains, rsv] will let [do so, rsv] until he be taken out of the way. ⁸ And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: ⁹ Even him, whose coming [parousia, arrival, as of Christ’s Second Advent in v. 1] is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, ¹⁰ And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish [are perishing]; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. ¹¹ And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: ¹² that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness (2 Thess. 2:1–11).

A principle which should guide in interpreting any piece of literature, especially in interpreting biblical prediction, is that stray or incidental statements delivered in another connection must not take precedence over statements of an author made specifically regarding the subject he is treating. In this case the subject was a question (v. 2): Has the day of the Lord arrived yet, i.e. at the time of Paul’s writing? Is it already here? The Greek, enestēken hē emera tou kouriou, rendered ‘the day of the Lord is at hand’ (kjv) requires some special attention, as now follows.

Does the word enestēken mean ‘has arrived’ or ‘is at hand, about to appear’? The kjv ‘is at hand’ is changed to ‘has arrived’ in most recent Bible Versions and the preponderance of modern scholarship favors arrival resulting in presence rather than proximity. It is true that in several of the six times of the employment of some form of enestēken in the New Testament it means to have arrived and be present (in Rom. 8:38, e.g. things present as opposite things to come). Yet in some others the rsv renders it ‘impending’ (1 Cor. 5:26) and in 2 Timothy 3:1 rsv renders the future tense as ‘will come.’ Lexicons furnish both ‘to stand close upon, to be at hand, impend’ (as kjv reflects) and ‘to be present’ (as rsv and others).

There is a respectable school of thought which proposes that some were worried the Parousia and ‘rapture’ had already happened and they all at Thessalonica had been left behind. Thirty-five years ago Dr John Walwood proposed this theory to me when he was visiting me in my office at Wheaton College. He became the most notable advocate of it. Literature supporting the view is now plenteous.

However we translate—whether the day of the Lord is about to happen (‘at hand,’ kjv) or ‘has come’ (rsv and many scholars)—the notion that the Thessalonians thought that the day of the Lord, i.e. the rapture, had taken place and they had been ‘left behind’ seems quite implausible, for at least one compelling, simple reason. It is unreasonable to suppose that they thought the ‘rapture’ had occurred and all the congregation, including their elders and others who had endured much persecution for the Lord’s sake (1 Thess. 2:13–16), had been ‘left behind.’ Did they suppose that Paul himself and perhaps Silas and Timothy (Acts 18:5), all of whom probably kept in communication with Thessalonica, had missed the rapture too? Verses 1 and 2 show that Paul and perhaps his assistants were in regular communication. That is how he, Paul, would have known of false and perverted teachings being promoted at the scene of his ministry back in Thessalonica.

In any case, therefore, it seems clear that Paul is saying, the day of the Lord will not come until after the he apostasia (kjbv ‘the falling away’; rsv ‘the rebellion’)—that day shall not arrive except the apostasia comes first.

What does he apostasia (the apostasy) mean? ‘Apostasy’ is an anglicized form of the Greek word. We have already briefly examined the word in chapter 10 above, under the subject of the time of the return of Christ.

In the New Testament and the Greek Old Testament (Septuagint) as well as in other koine (i.e. common Greek of New Testament times) the term invariably has the meaning of departure or rebellion in the sphere of politics or religion. Many years ago, when a highly regarded evangelical author¹⁶ proposed that in 2 Thessalonians 2:3 apostasia means departure (of the saints), i.e. rapture of the church, one of the most able senior students in our seminary wrote his graduation thesis on this subject,¹⁷ demonstrating to everyone’s satisfaction that the word does not mean physical departure of any sort in actual usage, but political or religious defection from a previously held position—what Christian theology has always meant by apostasy (see article ‘apostasy,’ in The Catholic Encyclopedia Vol. 1), abandonment of the Christian faith. The word appears over forty times in the Septuagint in various forms, always in the sense of defection, not physical removal. The New Testament simply (as with most Greek words of doctrinal significance) took over the meaning in Hellenistic (koinē) Greek from the Septuagint. It is true that aphistēmi, the verbal relative of apostasia, often bears the meaning of physical, spatial removal but at the time Paul wrote, not the noun apostasia. The reality of apostasy occurred regularly in Israel’s history which, as I. H. Marshall states, was one of continual apostasy as the people deliberately turned away from the God who redeemed them out of Egypt, and followed false gods and sinful ways.... In the New Testament apostasy occurs when men turn aside from following Jesus (John 6:66 ff.) ... in falling away from faith under persecution (Matt. 24:9–13), denying the deity of Jesus (1 John 2:22), living a life of open sin that denies the faith (2 Peter 2:20). It is characteristic of the last days (2 Tim. 2:3; 1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:1, 5; 4:3).¹⁸

Paul, however, in 2 Thessalonians 2:3 is not pointing to apostasies in general but the apostasy (hē apostasia), an already prophesied apostasy. He is not making a fresh revelation, for Paul is very careful to distinguish what he might have received as special revelation, as a prophet (Apostle), from what he knew from Jesus’ teaching as passed on in the Christian tradition, which later was written down in the Gospels (see Gal. 1:11–24 and 1 Cor. 7:10, 12, 25). The origin of Paul’s teaching about the apostasy and the man of lawlessness is Jesus’ Olivet discourse (Matt. 24; 25; Mark 13; Luke 18). In that discourse Jesus said much about the great apostasy and the tribulation which would occasion it.

First He warned against going ‘astray’ (Matt. 24:5) at the time of ‘the close of the age’ (v. 3) and spoke of a succession of earlier false Christs (v. 5; cf. Luke 18:8, ‘when the Son of Man comes, will he find [the] faith on earth?’), and of potentially alarming wars and rumors preliminary to ‘the end’ (v. 6). He told also of widespread devastating famines and earthquakes (v. 7). Jesus continues:

Then they will deliver you up to tribulation, and put you to death; and you will be hated by all nations for my name’s sake [religious persecution and martyrdom]. And then many will fall away [kjv, be offended, Gr. skandalisthēsontai], and betray one another, and hate one another. And many false prophets will arise and lead many astray [kjv, and shall deceive many]. And because wickedness [anomia, lawlessness] is multiplied, most men’s love will grow cold (Matt. 24:9–12 rsv).

Mark 13:22 adds: ‘False christs ... will ... lead astray, if possible, the elect.’

Some of the very earliest Christian writers saw identity of subject between these verses spoken by Jesus and prophecy of great tribulation in the sense of religious persecution, religious falling away from Christ (apostasy) and revelation of the man of lawlessness by Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2:3 ff. Jesus says that ‘lawlessness’ shall be multiplied and Paul identifies the cause as ‘the man of lawlessness,’ thus connecting the apostasy with the supreme apostate, the final Antichrist, or the man of lawlessness. The connection is cemented when Jesus goes on to inform His questioners that all this will come to climax in a certain act of sacrilege (abomination of desolation, kjv) taking place ‘in the holy place’ (v. 15). Prophecy of the abomination of desolation and the wicked ruler of the end-times who installs it starts at Daniel 7:8, ‘another horn, a little one,’ then on through chapter 7, continuing as a ‘prince who is to come’ (Dan. 9:26) and a ‘king’ who ‘shall do as he wills’ (Dan. 11:36–45), and on to the ‘abomination’ of the Olivet discourse (Matt. 24:15). John knew about this rambunctious, big-mouthed, persuasive character and introduced him to his readers as one they already knew about: ‘antichrist is coming’ (1 John 2:18 cf. 4:3), and the ‘beast rising out of the sea’ (Rev. 13:1 onward). There is every reason to unite these references with the ‘man of lawlessness’ (cf. 2 Thess. 2:3). Let us now turn our attention to what Paul has to say about what and who is holding up the arrival of this Antichrist.

What and Who Restrains, the Parousia, and the Man of Lawlessness

Paul expands on the career of this man, but does so in a manner that raises several questions and leaves several either unanswered or only partially so. ‘Do you not remember that when I was still with you I told you these things?’ (2 Thess. 2:5). He evidently told them when he was still at Thessalonica and before he wrote 1 Thessalonians that this monstrous person would appear. What any Bible student would give to have a transcript of those sermons! But we do not have them, though if God, the providential Manager of such things, intended for us to know what Paul said it would have been in our New Testament.

There follows another important item of information along with another question for us: ‘And you know what [neuter gender, a thing not a person] is restraining him [the man of lawlessness] now so that he may be revealed in his time’ (v. 6). There will come a proper time for revelation of this man. After he is revealed Jesus will come. The believers at Thessalonica knew what this thing was (or is) but we do not.

There follows another pair of predictive pieces of information, with a question: ‘For the mystery of lawlessness is already at work. Only he who [masculine gender, a person] now restrains it [the mystery of lawlessness] will do so until he is out of the way [ek mesou genētai, becomes out of the middle]’ (v. 7). Most expositors rightfully agree that this means removal of some person, and now holding back a surge of lawlessness, from the scene of action. Alternative views have not found general acceptance. The identity of the thing restraining a surge of lawlessness by the man of lawlessness, and the person who does the same, as well as the relation of the two, have been vigorously explored and discussed from Christian antiquity to the present. There is a crowd of commentators and a plethora of literature to advise us.

One of the most thorough and penetrating has come from an unexpected quarter, an article by a European scholar in the Journal of Biblical Literature. Roger D. Aus, who lived in Germany, published his ‘God’s Plan and God’s Power; Isaiah 66 and the Restraining Factors of 2 Thess. 2:6, 7.’¹⁹ He produced impressive evidence—too technical to present here. Thoroughly versed in the Hebrew Bible and its Greek translation (Septuagint), Aus found all verbal and doctrinal elements of 2 Thessalonians 2:1–11 in the Old Testament: in Daniel 11 and 12; in Ezekiel 28; and especially in Isaiah 66:3–7, 9, 15 and 18–21. The passage (2 Thess. 2) also, Aus thinks, reflects Matthew 24:14 and anticipates Revelation 17–19. The person who restrains, ho katechon (2 Thess. 2:7), is God Himself, who is in absolute control and the thing which restrains is God’s plan—His project of evangelizing all the world (Matt. 24:14). That which is removed or taken away (ek mesou genētai, 2 Thess. 2:7) is the same as the mystery of lawlessness. ‘The mystery of lawlessness in v. 7a is the subject of genētai in v. 7b ... That is, evil or lawlessness which has not yet reached its peak. Only then when it is most intense and apparent to all, will God cease His restraining, the Messiah will come, and the decisive battle between the lawless one and the Lord Jesus takes place.’²⁰

Aus refers in this article to his larger works on the subject in two other European scholarly journals. Would I had time and means to pursue them! But perhaps someone will open up this channel of very competent research, reported in footnotes to the article. Aus concludes his article with a summary as follows:

The above interpretation of the katechein motif in 2 Thess 2:6–7 does not solve all the difficulties inherent in the text. There are too many variables in these verses to obtain any absolute certainty. Nevertheless, the solution offered above has two major arguments in its favour. First, it means that To Katechon [the thing which restrains] and ho katechōn [the person who restrains] are intimately related. God, he who now restrains the Day of the Messiah, does so because of his plan or will that the gospel first be brought to all men. Secondly, it is based on an OT text, Isaiah 66, which is employed elsewhere in 2 Thessalonians. The author then employed imagery from the same OT chapter for his description of the restraining factors in 2:6, 7.²¹

I treat the topics of this chapter at length in Daniel and the Latter Days and in the successor volume, The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People.²²

Though Paul, in my opinion, clearly settled the matter of the order of the tribulation, the apostasy and the man of lawlessness, this chapter must close with some mysteries of biblical prediction unresolved. This is as it should be, because the Bible itself leaves them so. It is profitable for us not to be wise beyond that which is written and to be cautious and humble in speculation.

True religion must always protect its mysteries. The sort of religion that one can easily figure out before being initiated into it is of no more use to the healthy minded person than a novel whose plot can be figured out by careful scrutiny of the dust jacket. The permanent appeal lies in the mysteries.

The same is true of other important aspects of human life. For example, it is doubtful if any other social arrangement is more important to the race than marriage. Everybody is interested in some features of marriage. In recent times when sexual experiences have been emphasized as important to happiness (or fun, pleasure, fulfillment) a large number of people have apparently been led to suppose that sex is the only feature of marriage they need to know about in order to be fully successful and happy—with or without entering into marriage vows and covenants.

In a similar manner a considerable number of people who have only casual interest in Christian worship and doctrines have an insatiable appetite for what is popularly called ‘prophecy.’ And, though theologically illiterate, insist on being supplied a schedule of future events which neither Daniel nor Paul nor John the Revelator, not even the Son of God Himself, could produce. Scripture reminds these folk and other earnest seekers that the promise is not to those with the most defensible timetable for end-time events but to all of them ‘that love his appearing.’

¹ Homer A. Kent, Jr, in Wycliffe Bible Commentary, p. 972.

² Marvin J. Rosenthal, ‘By the Word of the Lord’ in Zion’s Fire magazine, vol. i. 14, No. 6, Nov.–Dec. 2003, p. 5.

³ J. Oliver Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion, Vol. ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 393–395.

⁴ C. Henry Waterman, ‘The Sources of Paul’s Teaching on the 2nd Coming of Christ in 1 and 2 Thessalonians’ in Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, Vol. 18, no. 2, Spring 1975, pp. 105–113.

⁵ James Graham, Watchman, What of the Night? (Los Angeles: Ambassador for Christ, n.d.), p. 5.

⁶ ibid., pp. 6, 7.

⁷ Robert D. Culver, 'Were the Old Testament Prophecies Really Prophetic' in Can I Trust My Bible, in a symposium by eight authors (Chicago: Moody Press, 1963, 1976), p. 99.

⁸ A. W. Tozer, Born After Midnight.

⁹ J. B. Lightfoot, ed. J. R. Harmer, The Apostolic Fathers (London: Macmillan, 1898), p. 271.

¹⁰ ibid., pp. 408, 409.

¹¹ Against Heresies, Vol. v, 30.4.

¹² Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts (Detroit, MI: Wayne State Univ. Press, 1988), p. 95.

¹³ ibid., p. 96.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 104.

¹⁵ Vincet P. Miceli, The Antichrist (Harrison, NY: Roman Catholic Books, 1981).

¹⁶ E. Schuyler English, 'Rethinking The Rapture' in Our Hope magazine, Vol. 56 #6, December, 1949.

¹⁷ Kenneth Teague, whose monograph is on deposit at the library of Grace Theological Seminary, Winona Lake, IN.

Catholic Encyclopedia The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes

¹⁸ I. H. Marshall, 'Apostacy,' ZPEB I, p. 216.

¹⁹ Roger D. Aus in Journal of Biblical Literature, 96, 4, Dec. 1977, pp. 537–553.

²⁰ ibid., p. 551.

²¹ ibid., p. 553.

²² Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977), pp. 66–77. Now available from author in revised form with a new title. See also R.D. Culver, The Histories and Prophecies of Daniel (Winona Lake, IN: BMH Books, 1980), 191 pages.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1128). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Thousand Years of Revelation 20

The words chilia etē, a thousand years, appear six times in Revelation 20:2–7. Pseudo-Latin renders the words as ‘millennium’ after the analogy of biennium, and the like. It is not news to readers that there is much difference of opinion among orthodox scholars and believers about the place of these ‘thousand years’ in Christian doctrine. A full treatment would require reference to the structure of Revelation, especially with regard to the succession of seven seals broken, seven bowls of wrath poured out and seven trumpets sounded. At this point I propose simply that we read Revelation 20 continuously with chapter 19. The vision of chapter 19 begins with ‘After this [Gr. meta tauta, literally, after these things] I heard’ and continues with ‘Then I heard’ (v. 6) and ‘Then I saw’ (v. 11), ‘Then I saw’ (v. 17) and ‘Then I saw’ (20:1) followed by ‘Then I saw’ (20:4). This successions of events John heard and saw are set off from John’s previous narrative and visions by ‘After this’ (meta tauta) at the beginning of chapter 19. They seem therefore all to be connected with the beginning of chapter 20, each a successive event in one vision. Let the reader consider that as we now read, beginning with the last phrase of chapter 19:

... and all the birds were gorged with their flesh. ^{20:1} Then I saw an angel coming down from heaven, holding in his hand the key to the bottomless pit [Gr. abyssos] and a great chain. ² And he seized the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is the devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years, ³ and threw him into the pit, and shut it and sealed it over him, so that he might not deceive the nations any longer, until the thousand years were ended. After that he must be released for a little while.

⁴ Then I saw thrones, and seated on them were those to whom the authority to judge was committed. Also I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God, and who had not worshipped the beast or its image and had not received its mark on their foreheads or their hands. They came to life and reigned with Christ for a thousand years. ⁵ The rest of the dead did not come to life until the thousand years were ended. This is the first resurrection. ⁶ Blessed and holy is the one who shares in the first resurrection! Over such the second death has no power, but they will be priests of God and of Christ, and they will reign with him for a thousand years.

⁷ And when the thousand years are ended, Satan will be released from his prison ⁸ and will come out to deceive the nations that are at the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them for battle; their number is like the sand of the sea. ⁹ And they marched up over the broad plain of the earth and surrounded the camp of the saints and the beloved city, but fire came down from heaven and consumed them, ¹⁰ and the devil who had deceived them was thrown into the lake of fire and sulfur where the beast and the false prophet were, and they will be tormented day and night for ever and ever. (Rev.

It should be apparent that the natural (normal) sense of this passage is that the predicted future events of chapter 20 are subsequent in time to those of chapter 19. But are there reasons, not apparent, to the contrary? There have been interpreters, both learned and devout, since at least Augustine's time (354–430), who think that John's story starts over again (as, some suppose, several times before) at 20:1, and relates to a situation long past or perhaps to the present time, or of spiritual realities which have no relation to earthly history.

No less an authority than H. B. Swete in his work on the Apocalypse, pronounced by Wilbur Smith the best ever, says, as he begins his exegesis of chapter 20: 'It must not ... be assumed that events now to be described chronologically follow the destruction of the Beast and the False Prophet and their armies [of chap. 19].'¹

What evidences support this outlook? We shall say more of this later, but now note only that some who think John's vision starts over again with events at the beginning of the present age (1) say that the restraint put on the devil by the cross of Christ (Matt. 12:26–29; Heb. 2:14; John 12:31; 16:13) is identical with the imprisonment of the devil in Revelation 20:1, 2; (2) 'They came to life' (Rev. 20:4) is individual regeneration, as described by Jesus (John 5:25–27); (3) 'and reigned with Christ for a thousand years' (Rev. 20:4) is to be explained as believers presently in the heavenlies reigning there with Christ (Eph. 3:19–21 et al).

What evidences support the view that the events of chapter 20—the imprisonment of the devil for a thousand years, the resurrection of saints and martyrs, and their reign with Christ for a thousand years—follow the return of Christ described in the preceding chapter?

1. For thousands of ordinary readers the natural reading of Revelation 20, to which I have already called attention in introducing this chapter, continues the narrative with no flashbacks. If there were no editorial division between chapters 19 and 20 this would be even more apparent.

2. The narrative of chapter 19 seems unfinished. Two members of the wicked trinity—the beast and the false prophet—have been disposed of properly; now the narrative follows, chronologically, unless there is contrary evidence in the text, to dispose of the third and most enduring nefarious member, the devil himself. This is how Henry Alford (1810–1871), no less an authority than his younger contemporary, H. B. Swete cited earlier, handles the text. Alford begins his comments on chapter 20: 'The next enemy now remaining is the Arch-fiend himself....'²

3. The antecedent subject of the verb ekathisan (they sat) in verse 4 cannot be found in context except in the host of saints, 'the armies of heaven,' who accompany Christ to the battle of 19:17–21 and who share the rewards of victory. Opponents say many verbs lack subjects in this book. I have not found this assertion plausible. This, however, is not the end of the matter.

It is not surprising therefore that chiliasm (belief in the thousand-year reign) was widely spread, if not universal, in the first three centuries. They interpreted Daniel 2, 7, 9 and 11–12 in relation to this future thousand years. It may well be that this thinking was influenced toward a literal future fulfillment by Jewish apocalypse (another very large subject), but that hardly accounts for the way educated and sophisticated Christians such as Justin or Irenaeus, both scholars conversant with classical Greek literature, were convinced of thoroughgoing millennialism and vigorously propagated it. Philip Schaff, whose authority as church historian has hardly been exceeded, wrote: ‘The most striking point in the eschatology of the ante-Nicene age is the prominent chiliasm, that is, the belief of a visible reign of Christ in glory on earth with the risen saints for a thousand years, before the general resurrection and judgment.’

Schaff cites as examples ‘Barnabas,’ Papias, Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Methodius, and Lactantius.³ Hippolytus should be added, as outstanding.

Schaff was no advocate of millennialism, hence, this is not a tendentious report. Adolph Harnack held no admiration for Christian orthodoxy, much less the notion of a future ‘millennial reign’. Yet his article ‘Millennium,’ retained through several editions of Britannica, forcibly declares belief in a future much like that of Jewish apocalypse ‘shorn of its sensual attractions.’ was prevalent among early Christians.⁴

Harnack says:

Amongst the early Christians (50–150) ... a fixed element [was] (1) the notion that a last terrible battle with the enemies of God was impending; (2) the faith in the speedy return of Christ; (3) the conviction that Christ will judge all men, and (4) will set up a kingdom of glory on earth.⁵

He remarks of Justin Martyr’s millenarian views:

That a philosopher like Justin, with his bias towards an Hellenic construction of the Christian religion, should nevertheless have accepted its chiliastic elements is the strongest proof that these enthusiastic expectations were inseparably bound up with the Christian faith down to the middle of the 2nd century.⁶

Yet millennialism (chiliasm, premillennialism) did not entirely hold the field. Over-ardent premillenarians do well to take note of all Justin Martyr (110–165) had to say in his Dialogue With Trypho about millennial expectations. Toward the end of chapter 80 he wrote:

I and others who are right-minded [orthodox] Christians on all points, are assured that there will be a resurrection of the dead and a thousand years in Jerusalem which will then be built, adorned and enlarged [as] the prophets Ezekiel and Isaiah and others declare.⁷

He acknowledges, however, earlier in the chapter that not all the ‘right-minded’ (= orthodox, Catholic) agreed on this millennial prospect, and that he had been acknowledging the same over a period of time, as follows:

I admitted to you [Trypho, the Jew] that I and many others are of this opinion, and [believe] that such will take place, as you assuredly are aware; but on the other hand, I signified to you that many who belong to the pure and pious faith, and are true Christians, think otherwise.⁸

Jean Cardinal Danielou, without peer among twentieth-century historians of very early Christian doctrine, has a long chapter on millenarianism. He says that the doctrine is of an earthly reign of the Messiah before the end of time.... It seems hard to deny that it contains a truth which is a part of the common stock of Christian teaching, and which occurs in 1–2 Thessalonians, in 1 Corinthians and in the Revelation of John [and] is to be found as early as Ezekiel [and, he goes on to say, in several apocryphal books].⁹

Danielou thinks that the doctrine, though very widely accepted, may not have been accepted universally or consistently, for he points out that as ardent a millenarian as Irenaeus was willing to apply some of Isaiah's prophecies of a renewed heaven over a reconciled earth to the church age¹⁰ and remarks, 'It is worthy of note that neither Clement of Rome nor Hermas make any allusion to millenarianism—indeed, with the latter the emphasis is placed on the times of the church as immediately preceding the final judgment [i.e, amillennialism].'¹¹

In fairness one should add that only a few Fathers before ad 150 wrote anything now extant about an earthly reign of Christ. W. J. Grier takes advantage of this fact to refute the verdict that the early Church was fully millenarian. He also claims that Origen's argument against chiliasm prevailed and that 'Lactantius was the only man of note in the fourth century who still held the system.'¹²

While the church remained a persecuted minority in the pagan world of the Roman Empire it was easy for Christians to see themselves as candidates for deliverance from a great tribulation by the return of Jesus to be followed by a thousand years when they would 'live and reign with Christ.' When, however, the Roman government became their protector and then sponsor, it seemed impolitic, if not incorrect and false, to regard that government and its emperor as the beast (Antichrist). Thus a reversal took place and for more than a thousand years millennialism (premillennialism, chiliasm) almost disappeared.

Though there is some evidence Augustine (354–430) borrowed it from North African Donatist schismatics, it was he who first fully articulated the new views. He grew up in Roman Africa, more Latin than Italy itself, and in his magnum opus, reinterpreted Revelation 20 for both the Western and Eastern church and formulated the roots both of postmillennialism and amillennialism.

Augustine on the Thousand Years

Augustine's views on eschatology, among many other subjects, are set forth in The City of God, the result of thirteen years of labor (ad 413–426).¹³ The part which relates to the millennium is book 20, chapters 4 to 15.¹⁴ It is safe to assert that until this section of Augustine's great work is mastered one cannot fully appreciate the millennial discussions which have followed since his day. It is almost, if not wholly true, that all amillennial and postmillennial systems have been postscripts to The City of God.

Having read the entire section in The City of God several times over many years, I do not feel that it can be positively asserted that Augustine was convinced that the thousand years should be taken literally. He seems to say so, but he is not unequivocal. His nearest approach is in chapter 10. There he seems to say that the millennium may be either the last thousand years before the consummation, into which the present age falls, or it may be the entire period of the world's history, called a thousand years because 1,000 as the cube of 10 would be ‘the number of perfection to mark the fullness of time.’¹⁵ He seems to lean toward the first of the two possibilities. But, in either case, whether he thought the thousand years to be literal or a figure, he believed the term stood for a real period of time, whether one thousand or 6,000 years.

At any rate, he believed the whole present age to be in the millennium and that the termination of the present age and of the millennium would be approximately synchronous. It also appears that he followed the Septuagint chronology (it is believed that he did not know Hebrew) and thought that the 6,000 years of human history to be well in progress when the present dispensation began. He also evidently believed that at the end of 6,000 years of history, Christ would come again and end the current age.¹⁶ He specifically rejected the idea that the millennium is a future age after the close of the present dispensation.

Later he makes it clear that he feels the millennium refers to the course of the church in the world, and the reign of saints to be a present situation on earth (the organized church), except insofar as the unity of the church living and dead involves a secondary reference to the saints in heaven as well.

His views of matters related to the millennium are clarified as he goes on to give his views on the rest of Revelation 20.

‘The first resurrection’ (Rev. 4–6) he holds to be a spiritual resurrection—the same as that ‘resurrection’ or ‘regeneration’ described in John 5:26, 27. It is the same as personal salvation. It is participated in only by the saved; as he says, ‘In the first resurrection none have a part save those who shall be eternally blessed.’¹⁷

The second resurrection described in Revelation 20 is a physical resurrection of all people, according to Augustine. He speaks of it as a resurrection ‘of judgment,’¹⁸ almost as a premillennialist, but he goes on to clarify his statement and show that he means only that the saints, all of whom participate in spiritual regeneration (the first resurrection), shall not be ‘judged’ (damned) in this second or physical resurrection at the consummation, even though they do participate in the same resurrection. He concludes:

So are there these two resurrections,—the one the first and spiritual resurrection, which has place in this life, and preserves us from coming into the second death; the other the second, which does not occur now, but in the end of the world, and which by the last judgment shall dismiss some into the second death, others into that life which has no death.¹⁹

On the binding of Satan, he asserts that it has regard to the nations (as Rev. 20 says) but that this means ‘no doubt, those among which the church exists.’ Later he clarifies this to mean that Satan will not be able to seduce the elect of the church militant. This binding took place at the beginning of the present age when Christ first bound the ‘strong man’ in order that He might ‘spoil his goods’ (he cites Mark 3:27). This binding he seems to conceive of as a judicial act of God rather than of some specific historical event such as the death of Christ, the founding of the church, the work of the first missionaries, and similar.

On the loosing of Satan (Rev. 20:7–9), he writes that it refers to the revived ability of Satan to seduce the non-elect of the church visible. He seems to relate the biblical references to a final great tribulation, the great apostasy and the Antichrist to the ‘little season’ during which Satan is to be loosed. This he places at the end of the present age but before the consummation (i.e. before the ‘general resurrection’ judgment, and so forth).²⁰ He leaves the problem as to whether the ‘little season’ is within the thousand years or immediately afterward an open question.

These are the main features of Augustine’s view. It bears repeating that his views are of the utmost importance to present-day millennial discussions, for about every orthodox amillennial or postmillennial view since Augustine has embodied some of the main features of his view. Indeed, the very passages of Scripture which Augustine used in support of his arguments appear often in contemporary amillennial literature.

To recapitulate the main features of Augustine’s view: the thousand years is an expression, whether figurative or literal he is not certain, standing for a literal period of time. The millennium (Rev. 20:2–5) relates to the present age. Either this age is the millennium or is contained in it; approximately, the present age and the millennium terminate synchronously. The reign of the saints (Rev. 20:4) is during this age and it is on earth through the appointed leaders (clergy, and the like) of the visible church. The first resurrection (Rev. 20:4, 5) is spiritual and is the regeneration of the individual believers whereby they become members of the body of Christ, that is, of the kingdom of God. The second resurrection (Rev. 20:12–14) is physical and refers to the resurrection of all people at the consummation. The binding of Satan (Rev. 20:2) consists of Satan’s being deprived of any ability to seduce the elect. The loosing of Satan (Rev. 20:7 ff.) consists of revived ability to seduce the non-elect. The ‘little season’ (Rev. 20:3) will come at the end of the current age when the Antichrist, the great tribulation, the apostasy and so on, will come. This will be followed by a general resurrection and a general judgment (Rev. 20:11–14).

It remains to be added that, in the main, Augustine’s view is, and has been, the view of the Roman Catholic Church.²¹

Christianity world-wide, at present, is possibly as much allied with Augustinian post- and amillenarian exegesis as with premillennialism. In the next chapter we shall consider what scholars and ordinary Christian folk since Reformation times have come to believe about the millennium and associated events.

¹ H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of John (New York: Macmillan, 1907), p. 259.

² Henry Alford in NTER, p. 1997.

³ Philip Schaff, History of the Christian Church, Vol. ii (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans rep. 1973), p. 614.

⁴ Adolph Harnack, 11th ed., Britannica, Vol. 18, 1911, p. 462.

⁵ ibid., p. 461.

⁶ ibid., p. 462.

⁷ Justin Martyr, ANF, Vol. i, p. 239.

⁸ ibid., p. 239.

⁹ Jean, Cardinal Danielou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity: A History of Early Christian Doctrine Before the Council of Nicea, trans. John A. Baker (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1964/1978), p. 377.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 386.

¹¹ ibid., p. 386.

¹² W. J. Grier, The Momentous Event: A Discussion of Scripture Teaching on the Second Advent (London, Banner of Truth Trust, 1970), p. 27.

¹³ A more up-to-date introduction and translation which I have found useful is Augustine: The City of God, trans. Henry Bettenson (who has provided much such literature) ed. David Knowles (Penguin Book) Middlesex England, 1972, LIII + 1095 pages. The last three books contain Augustine's eschatology.

¹⁴ This may be read in The Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Second Series, Vol. 2, trans. Marcus Dods.

¹⁵ Augustine, The City of God, 20.6.

¹⁶ ibid., 20.7.

¹⁷ ibid., 20.6.

¹⁸ ibid., 20.6.

¹⁹ ibid., 20.8.

²⁰ ibid., 20.13.

²¹ A note in the official Roman Catholic Bible in English (The Holy Bible Douay-Rheims Version) on Revelation 20:3 reads: 'The souls of the martyrs and saints live and reign with Christ in heaven, in the first resurrection, which is that of the soul to the life of glory.'

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1138). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Recent and Current Views of ‘The Millennium’: Postmillennial, Amillennial, Premillennial

First off, it must be acknowledged that many, perhaps most, Christians have no clear, well-articulated conception of the thousand years. A great deal of reading and reflection is required even to ask meaningful questions. One competent, and later famous writer, whom I heard lecture on the book of Revelation said it was a ‘cryptic letter’ from the ‘concentration camp’ on Patmos and when first read to the seven churches was also furnished with a key which was irretrievably lost.¹

In the American Midwest where I live there is a ‘fifth Gospel’—the Gospel according to Martin Luther. The Christians here learn nothing at church about the millennium, the Augsburg Confession has already pushed it out the church door, even though some leading advocates of millenarian thought since Reformation times have been Lutherans. Among them Joseph Seiss and George N. H. Peters were nineteenth-century Americans, and it was J. A. Bengel, a German Lutheran scholar, who is credited with making the word ‘millennium’ respectable in Europe in the eighteenth century.²

As we proceed to present postmillennialism, amillennialism and premillennialism several notices are in order. (1) The discussion will be kept as closely to Revelation 20 as possible. (2) There are varieties of each view, which, though they do not render generalizations impossible, require some caution in generalizing. (3) Though some reference to historical backgrounds is necessary,³ I will pass over medieval and Reformation times, except as necessary to explain views as expressed in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. (4) With due respect to Swedenborgians, Russellites (Jehovah’s Witnesses), Church of God (Armstrongism), Seventh Day Adventists, their millennial views do not come within the limits of this survey. (5) There are varieties of opinion in each category. Hence the course followed will be to describe each view as set forth by a leading advocate(s).

Postmillennial Views of the Millennium

Postmillennialism is of comparatively recent origin. Several of the best advocates of the view attribute its origin to Daniel Whitby (1638–1726), an English Arminian theologian who near the end of his life adopted Arian views of the Godhead. A. H. Strong, for example, writes: ‘Our own interpretation of Revelation 20:1–10, was first given, for substance, by Whitby.’⁴

One of the best-known statements of the postmillennial position is that of A. A. Hodge. With his customary force, skill and brevity, Hodge presented the case as follows:

What is the Scriptural doctrine concerning the millennium?

1st. The Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament, clearly reveal that the gospel is to exercise an influence over all branches of the human family, immeasurably more extensive and more thoroughly transforming than any it has ever realized in time past. This end is to be gradually attained through the spiritual presence of Christ in the ordinary dispensation of Providence, and ministrations of His church.

2nd. The period of this general prevalency of the gospel will continue a thousand years, and is hence designated the millennium.

3rd. The Jews are to be converted to Christianity either at the commencement or during the continuance of this period.

4th. At the end of these thousand years, and before the coming of Christ, there will be a comparatively short season of apostasy and violent conflict between the kingdoms of light and darkness.

5th. Christ's advent, the general resurrection and judgment, will be simultaneous, and immediately succeeded by the burning of the old, and the revelation of the new earth and heavens.⁵

Hodge, then, was convinced that the 'one thousand years' is a literal period of a thousand years, and that they will run their course in the latter portion of this present age.

However, David Brown, certainly the most voluminous writer in support of postmillennialism, took a slightly different view. He wrote:

One remark, however, I must request the reader to bear in mind.... I attach no importance, in this argument, to the precise period of a thousand years. It occurs nowhere in Scripture but in one solitary passage. There are reasons for taking it definitely and literally; but to some these reasons appear slender. They think it means just a long indefinite period; agreeing with us, however, as to its being yet to come.⁶

There are variations in the minor points among postmillenarians but most would agree on the general scheme of Hodge above. Another orthodox and scholarly advocate of postmillennialism was A. H. Strong. I cite his views as characteristic of most orthodox postmillennial doctrine.

The binding of Satan is presumably the restraint put on the devil by the ultimate prevalence of Christianity throughout the earth—when Jew and Gentile alike became possessed of Christianity's blessings.⁷

The first resurrection (Rev. 20:4–6) is not a preliminary resurrection of the body, in the case of departed saints, but a period in the latter days of the church militant, when, under special influence of the Holy Ghost, the spirit of the martyrs shall appear again, true religion be generally quickened and revived, and the members of Christ's churches become so conscious of their strength in Christ that they shall, to an extent unknown before, triumph over the powers of evil both within and without.⁸

The resurrection is only of 'the spirit of sacrifice and faith,' and the statement of Revelation 20:5 (asv) that 'The rest of the dead lived not [again] until the thousand years should be finished' means only that the 'spirit of persecution and unbelief shall be, as it were, put to sleep.'⁹

Strong feels that the release of Satan (Rev. 20:7) for 'a little season' indicates that at the close of this millennial period, evil will again be permitted to exert its utmost power in a final conflict with righteousness. This spiritual struggle, moreover, will be accompanied and symbolized by political convulsions, and by fearful indications of desolation in the natural world.¹⁰

Thus the 'little season' is the great tribulation period. The destruction of Satan, Gog and Magog, the general resurrection, and the general judgment of the great white throne are held to be at the Second Advent, sometime after the close of the millennium.

It should be seen that postmillennialists have not generally held that the Second Advent closes the Millennium, for in Strong's view, the 'little season' is said to intervene. It is after the millennium, but how long after is not declared.

It needs to be added that many advocates have been of the opinion that neither the church nor the world may be conscious of either the beginning or the close of the millennium. Brown makes this clear:

Let no one suppose I expect that the beginning and end of this period will be so clearly discernible as to leave no room for doubt on any mind. On the contrary, I think there can hardly be a doubt that it will follow the law of all Scripture dates in this respect—of Daniel's 'seventy weeks,' and of the 'twelve hundred and sixty days' of Antichristian rule. The beginning and end of the former of these periods [the seventy weeks of Dan. 9] is even yet a matter of some controversy.¹¹

The period during which postmillennialism was at its height of acceptance was the latter half of the nineteenth century and during the first quarter of the twentieth century. It was an era of optimism, belief in progress, congenial to the postmillennial view. Among the great theologians of this era, Strong, C.A. Hodge, A.A. Hodge and C.A. Briggs were postmillenarians. Postmillennial writers of the more popular sort were Albert Barnes (Commentaries on the New Testament) and David Brown, to mention only a few. James H. Snowden (The Coming of the Lord, 1919) and B. H. Carroll (The Book of Revelation, 1916) are among the most recent thoroughgoing postmillennial orthodox writers. During the 'golden age' of American Protestant Modernism, which came to an end with World War II, Modernists adopted a kind of postmillennialism to which earlier doctrinally orthodox advocates would have given no approval (e.g. Rall, Modern Premillennialism and the Christian Hope). It was based more on the theory of evolution and humanism than on any interpretation of the Bible and need not occupy our attention here. The present heirs of Modernism, the neo-orthodox and neo-liberal people, are scarcely more optimistic about the course of the present era than premillenarians and so are not inclined to postmillennialism.

Fifty years ago postmillennialism had few strong, vocal advocates. This, however, is not true today. Lorraine Boettner's The Millennium (1957) disturbed the quiet. It has nearly 400 pages of exposition and defense of postmillennialism. Boettner speculated that 'Life in the Millennium will compare with life in the world today in much the same way that life in a Christian community compares with that in a pagan or irreligious community.'¹² Marcellus Kik has produced essays in support of the doctrine. Another writer, like Boettner and Kik, of strongly Reformed background and persuasion, tries to draw too much theological water from the present reign of Christ ‘in the midst of ... [his] enemies’ (Ps. 110:2). I refer to the redoubtable and inimitable late R. J. Rushdoony, founder of the Christian Reconstruction movement. Andrew Sandlin, upon whom Dr Rushdoony’s mantle seemed to fall for awhile, outlines the Reconstruction arguments for postmillennialism in A Postmillennial Primer.¹³ Being Calvinists all, and holding a strong and sound doctrine of man’s fallenness, it seems surprising that they would expect human depravity ever to yield such results. I quote here my remarks in another publication:

Peter announced that at Jesus’ session at the Father’s right hand, He was proclaimed, ‘Lord and Christ’ (Acts 2:33, 36). It is argued [as Reconstructionists] that it is right, therefore, to expect His Lordship to be effected in the present age by the work of evangelism and instruction. It is a form of postmillennialism, though not of the usual type. Most of the advocates of this approach are of strong Reformed background, especially the admirers of Kuyper, Dooyeweerd, and Rushdoony. Elements of this approach will also be found in the writings of Dietrich Bonhoeffer (especially in Ethics), and Oscar Cullmann.¹⁴

In fact one cannot quite keep up with the postmillennial literature of the Reconstruction movement, especially in their well-edited magazine, Chalcedon (now Faith for All of Life).

Mid-twentieth century, Lorraine Boettner spoke up for postmillennialism when it was in eclipse in his book The Millennium.¹⁵ Later Robert Clouse chose Dr Boettner to defend this view in a symposium of four authors.¹⁶ J. Marcellus Kik affirmed that enemies of Christ ‘could be completely vanquished if the Christians of this day and age were as vigorous, as bold, as earnest, as prayerful, and as faithful as Christians were in the first centuries and in the time of the Reformation.’¹⁷

Though in order to be brief as possible I have not traced post-Reformation optimism about a successful spread and victory of Christianity which has since come to be called postmillennialism, but readers should know that the Puritan movement both in Britain and America had a broad streak of this outlook. The researches of Haller and Becker, and others in Puritan history, show clearly that the men who led the Puritan migration from Britain and many New England clergy before 1776 thought that the millennial situation might be brought about first in the ‘New World.’ More enlightening on this score is Puritans, the Millennium and the Future of Israel, Puritan Eschatology 1600–1660 (ed. Peter Toon, London: James Clark, 1970). Chapter II, ‘The Latter-Day Glory,’ by Toon, illustrates from writings of the time the birth of hope that the ‘Thirty Years War’ then raging on continental Europe might introduce the millennium. Several keen advocates of postmillennarian interpretation deserve evaluation here. Space in this book and related time to read their books and articles fail us for now.

Many ‘secularized versions of millennialism’ owe much to liberal Protestant postmillenarianism. Hanz Schwarz comments: ‘The idea of the kingdom of God in America, a country which is not just called the New World because it was discovered late’ is a secularized version of millennialism—of course in its post-form.¹⁸

Amillennial Views of the Millennium

In the preceding chapter we observed how Augustine reframed Christian understanding of the course of the present age, making the church age the time of the thousand years. So when theologians decided to call this denial of a millennium after Christ's return amillennialism, a misunderstanding was introduced, because most who deny a future post-Advent millennium agree that the Second Advent is 'post' some sort of 'millennium in the present age.'¹⁹

1. A Modified Augustinian View

The most aggressive and, in my opinion, most cogently presented form of amillennialism among evangelicals for several generations accepts Augustine's interpretation with one major change and some minor shifts.

The 'thousand years' is a figurative expression designating the course of the present age from the death of Christ to the Second Advent. The reference is to the reign of the saints with Christ in heaven.

It will be seen at once that this is an Augustinian view modified. The major change is that the reign of the saints in the millennium is said to take place in heaven rather than on earth, as in the view of Augustine. An important minor shift is that recent amillennialists have clearly broken with the idea that the millennium is to be taken as a literal designation of a literal length of time. Instead of setting any particular date, precise or approximate, for the end of the millennium, the length of the millennium is simply conceived to be the length of the present age not of the age of the human race. Some adjustment of this kind was inevitable in amillennialism when once ad 1000 was passed.

An able representative of the school was William Hendriksen, whose views are set forth in his book, More Than Conquerors: An Interpretation of the Book of Revelation. Following the 'recapitulation' or 'parallelistic' method of interpreting the Apocalypse, he believed that with Revelation 20 the prophecy returns to the beginning of the present age. The 'order of events' has the following 'sequence.' He says, 'Christ's first coming is followed by a long period during which Satan is bound; this in turn is followed by Satan's little season; and that is followed by Christ's second coming, that is, His coming unto judgment.'²⁰ Concerning the binding of Satan, he writes: 'This work of binding the devil was begun when our Lord triumphed over him in the temptations in the wilderness.' Then, after citing and discussing a number of texts (Matt. 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13; Luke 10:17, 18; John 12:20–32; Col. 2:15; and Rev. 12:5 ff.), he asserts that the 'binding and casting out or falling of Satan is ... associated with the first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.' He thinks that it consists of reducing Satan's power to keep the nations from the light of divine revelation and the saving gospel—almost unrestricted till Jesus came. Satan has been so bound that Christ may, in this age, draw people of every nation unto Himself.²¹

This school of amillennial theology dissociates itself completely from the postmillennial optimism which expects a kind of literal millennium in this age. It also rejects the aggressive stance of the reconstructionism or dominion theology of Rushdoony and disciples. Hendriksen makes it clear that he believes that the binding of Satan is only in certain limited respects. The imprisonment (or binding) has respect to earth and living people; the reign of saints has respect to heaven and dead believers.

The first resurrection is the 'translation of the soul from this sinful earth to God's holy heaven' at the death of the believer.²² The second resurrection, according to Hendriksen, is the resurrection of the bodies of all people at the consummation. The ‘little season’ during which Satan is loosed is related to a coming time of apostasy, tribulation and the like, at the end of this age, and just before the consummation.

These confident expressions of Protestant amillennialism, skillfully articulated mid-twentieth century by O.T. Allis,²³ G. L. Murray,²⁴ Floyd Hamilton,²⁵ Wm. Hendricksen²⁶ and others became standard for much of evangelical Reformed and Presbyterian Christianity in America. Dr Robert Reymond of the Presbyterian Church in America later set it forth briefly in his volume of systematic theology.²⁷

2. The Millennium As a Form of ‘Apocalyptic Comfort’

In a long chapter G. C. Berkouwer cautiously introduces about every serious theory of the millennium and decides among none of them. He concludes: ‘So the important choice is not between interpreting the millennium as a feature of church history and interpreting it as something to be awaited at the end of history. Rather, it is the choice between apocalyptic comfort [emphasis added] and a strictly chronological account. Apocalyptic comfort is not spiritualization ... it is a view of reality seen in eschatological perspective in the last days.’²⁸ Is this something like ‘doxological language’? Elsewhere in his chapter Berkouwer seems to allow credence to the modified Augustinian view. At least Robert Reymond thinks so.²⁹

3. The Millennium As a Figurative Expression

The millennium is a figurative expression whereby the present age is viewed from the standpoint of how much it is enjoyed by saints in heaven, now in the disembodied intermediate state. This was B. B. Warfield’s view and except that it was phrased by a noted scholar whose expositions of other Christian doctrines are justly and famously regarded as very valuable, it is doubtful it would have made much of an impression. Warfield set this forth in the last chapter of a posthumous collection entitled Biblical Doctrines.

4. The Millennium As an Idea of Completeness or Perfection

The millennium is a figurative designation of the idea of completeness or perfection. William Milligan in the section on ‘Revelation’ in The Expositor’s Bible promulgated this idea, adopted also by A. Plummer in a commentary on ‘Revelation’ in the multi-volumed The Pulpit Commentary. Milligan proposes the notion only as a suggestion as follows: ‘The Thousand years ... express no period of time.... They embody an idea, and that idea whether applied to the subjugation of Satan or to the triumph of the saints is the idea of completeness or perfection.’³⁰

5. The Preterist School of Millennial Doctrine

The preterist school of millennial doctrine holds that the millennium refers figuratively to ‘a great epoch in history’ (H. B. Swete). The conquest of the devil and reign of saints refer to the long past triumph of Christianity which began with the victory of Christianity over paganism in European history and continues to the present. This has been the opinion of several contemporary scholars.

This view was advocated notably by Henry Barclay Swete in The Apocalypse of St. John, 2nd ed., 1907 and later, in America, by Albertus Pieters in Studies in the Revelation of St. John (1943, 1950), among orthodox scholars.

Most contemporary amillennialists, as pointed out earlier, draw a sharp break between chapters 19 and 20, but, like premillennialists, the advocates of the preterist form of amillennialism recognize that the first resurrection, the binding of Satan and the thousand years follow the defeat of Antichrist related in chapter 19. They (quite correctly in my opinion) do not think John started to tell his story all over again at Revelation 20:1. In respect to most of the details of the prophecy their views are similar to the postmillennial scheme. Details of interpretation are very similar to those of David Brown and B. H. Carroll, postmillennialists. In fact, except that this system finds the fulfillment of the prophecy of the binding of Satan and the first resurrection in the past, the preterist view would have to be called postmillennial.

Swete thinks that the millennium began with the breakup of the beast ('Roman world power') and the false prophet ('pagan system of priestcraft and superstition'). This is followed by a long period of 'Christian supremacy during which the faith for which the martyrs died would live and reign.' The war with Gog and Magog to follow is the recrudescence of evil at the end of the present age.³¹

The binding of Satan is the divine restraint put upon the devil so that he was unable any longer to 'deceive the nations,' that is, to bring about a restoration of that paganism.

The three and half years stand for the period of struggle with paganism, and the thousand years for the succeeding period of uninterrupted triumph of Christianity over it.³²

On second thought, this may be the most satisfactory of all varieties of amillennial interpretations. It has the least inconsistency and has regard to the place of Revelation 20 in the order of events in the book of Revelation.

John Calvin, though he never wrote a commentary on Revelation, shows a definite leaning toward a preterist interpretation of Daniel's predictions of the victory of Christ over the nations. Of the dream-image of Daniel 2 he says, 'The image perished when the Roman empire was broken up.'³³ Similarly, in commenting on Daniel 7:27, he asserts that the giving of the kingdom to the people of the saints:

was partially fulfilled when the Gospel emerged from persecution ... thus Daniel or the angel does not predict here occurrences connected with the advent of Christ as Judge of the world, but with the first preaching and promulgation of the Gospel, and the celebration of the name of Christ.³⁴

Then he uses something of a double-fulfillment technique (not common among current Augustinian interpreters) and applies it also to the 'final completion' of Christ's reign. He does not like it that Rabbi Abarbanel thought this 'spiritualizing' to be foolish.

6. A Different and Distinct Preterist View: 'Realized Millennialism'

A different and distinct preterist view of the millennium has been proposed by Jay E. Adams, known for writing on many theological subjects. His modest-sized book, The Time is at Hand, effectively employs the long standard interpretive methods and arguments of amillennialism, with a bit of flair. He responds to several premillennial writers who he rightly feels have moved away from the garden varieties of premillennialism of the past several years, such as J. O. Buswell³⁵ and George Ladd.³⁶ Adams thinks my Daniel and the Latter Days offers a more feasible brand of premillennial teaching. However this may be, Dr Adams has done us the favor of summarizing his own preterist (he calls it ‘realized millennialism’) doctrine of the millennium:

1. The book of Revelation is largely fulfilled. It is written about things which would take place shortly after its writing.
2. It deals with the persecution of believers under Judaism and Rome and predicts God’s judgment upon these enemies of the church. Its purpose, therefore, is to strengthen and encourage believers in time of trial. This is an important fact from the homiletic viewpoint.
3. The kingdom of God was set up in the days of the Roman empire, and through preaching the gospel, broke the latter in pieces. The kingdom is the fifth kingdom promised by Daniel.
4. The millennium, like the book of Revelation, is realized. It is coeval with the so-called church age, and coextensive with the time of the world-wide kingdom of God which has replaced the world-kingdom of Satan.
5. The kingdom is not, and never was intended to be, a golden age.... The golden age of Scripture is perfect ... and ... will emerge after the general judgment.
6. The 1000 years of Revelation 20 refer to the ‘church age’ during which the martyrs first are given the special privilege of ‘living and reigning’ with Christ, which all believers will enjoy during the eternal state.³⁷

Dr Adams asserts of Revelation 20:4, 6:

That the reign of Christ and the martyrs is in heaven is the only sensible construction to place upon the passage. Nothing is said about the earth... Then too, everywhere else in Revelation, thrones are mentioned as being in heaven. Christ too is said to be there.³⁸

I have withheld extensive evaluation of these views but must comment that certainly Dr Adams ought to direct his attention to Revelation 5:9–10, wherein saints, on thrones set in heaven, surely enough, proclaim to their Lord, the Lamb: ‘Worthy are you to take the scroll and to open its seals, for you were slain, and by your blood you ransomed people for God from every tribe and language and people and nation, and you have made them a kingdom and priests to our God, and they shall reign on the earth.’ Perhaps Adams should look over all the evidence, not just selected passages. Adams relates that the book is essentially a transcript of lectures he gave at Covenant Theological Seminary at a time when prominent premillennial theologians (J. O. Buswell, R. Laird Harris) were leaders there. One wonders about how they reacted and what has become of premillennialism at that school in the decades since.

(A new, thoroughly erroneous preterism contends that the events the Bible associate with the Second Advent of Christ [the parousia], including resurrection and judgment, have already happened at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in ad 70. The movement and the literature which promotes it are thoroughly exposed and answered in a recent volume published by Presbyterian & Reformed Publishing [When Shall These Things Be? A Reformed Response to Hyper-Preterism, ed. Keith A. Mathison (Presbyterian & Reformed Publishing, Phillipsburg, NJ, 2004)].)

7. Approaching the Apocalypse As a Whole

Finally, over the years several thoughtful scholars have approached the Apocalypse as a whole, paying attention to the way transitions are indicated by ‘I was in the Spirit,’ as well as the ‘after these things,’ indications of shift of subject, and the many ‘and I saw’ or ‘and I heard’ suggestions of movement and continuity. One must ignore most of the chapter divisions to do this. One such is Verner Eller, who at the time he wrote was an ordained minister in the Church of the Brethren, teaching at LaVerne College (CA). He found a break in thought not at the end of Revelation 19, where the first two of the unholy trinity of beast, false prophet and dragon (devil) are put in the lake of fire, and the beast’s army fed to the birds, but at the end of Revelation 20:3, with Satan in custody and under protective custody in ‘the abyss.’ So he observes that, now the bad actors are well in hand, the narrative turns to the good ones—dead and living. The devil is imprisoned for a thousand years; the good people, now all ‘come to life,’ reign for a thousand years, after which the evil people (all raised from the dead) are sentenced to the lake of fire (Rev. 20:4–15). Though I do not endorse all of Eller’s exposition I think his book³⁹ has never received quite the attention it deserves. It cuts through established systems, hence it must overcome initial resistance. I understand his problem, having gone through the same myself more than once.

Premillennial Views of the Millennium

Louis Berkhof, not an advocate of the view but a keen observer and a very competent theologian, formally described premillennialism (millennialism, chiliasm) as commonly held by chief advocates before several competing forms of the doctrine were introduced in late nineteenth century. These views are fervently held by multitudes of evangelical Christians today.

The coming advent of Christ ... is near and will be visible, personal, and glorious ... preceded ... by certain events such as the evangelization of all nations, the conversion of Israel, the great apostasy and great tribulation, and the revelation of the man of sin. Dark and trying times are therefore still in store for the Church, since she will have to pass through the tribulation. The second coming will be a single ... event, but will be accompanied by several others bearing on the church, on Israel, and on the world. The dead saints will be raised and the living transfigured, and together they will be translated to meet the coming Lord. Antichrist and his wicked allies will be slain, and Israel ... will repent, be saved, and restored to the Holy Land. Then the Kingdom of God, predicted by the prophets, will be established in a transformed world.... Gentiles will turn to God in great [numbers].... A condition of peace and righteousness will prevail.... After the expiration of the earthly rule of Christ the rest of the dead will be raised up ... followed by the last judgment and the creation [or renovation] of a new heaven and a new earth.⁴⁰

Whenever millennialism of this sort has arisen, believers, not necessarily scholars, thought that they derived it essentially from chapters 2 and 7 of Daniel and portions of chapters 8–12, Paul’s Epistles to the Thessalonians, and the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation. With due allowance for normal figures of speech and the prevailing symbolism of Daniel and Revelation, they have accepted what these chapters (especially Rev. 19–20) seem to say about how this age will end.

There are other impressive reasons for a simple, non-technical literalism in interpreting these chapters, derived from what Jesus Himself and those associated with Him said about the future. Observe:

1. First, the Old Testament contains the story of the kingdom of God on earth under the conditions caused by the fall. This kingdom, as given form in a succession of patriarchs, kings, priests and prophets, is sometimes called the Mediatorial Kingdom of God. Promises of a coming Messiah (anointed King) are frequent in that story. Many passages in the prophetic books predict in detail features of a coming visible, earthly reign of Messiah, as well as the conversion and restoration of Israel.

2. John the Baptist, Jesus' forerunner, announced that the King and His reign had arrived and that the people of Israel should therefore prepare to meet Him by repentance (Matt. 3:10).

3. Jesus was the promised King. He was reserved in public acknowledgment that He was the Messianic king, but He represented His gospel as the Word of the kingdom and the Apostles as its messengers, with entrance to the kingdom variously stated as by repentance, or faith, or new birth. At that stage of history and on to the present moment the kingdom of Christ on earth has been definitely a spiritual affair—though not without important beneficial effects in every department of the lives of people and nations. The many parables of Jesus about the message of the kingdom (Matt. 13) and instructions to the corps of preachers (Matt. 10), as well as numerous passages, insure that the church, considered as professed believers in Christ (Messiah), is a present form of a spiritual kingdom of God (or of heaven). But one must ask, 'Is this kingdom wholly and forever only a spiritual affair?'

4. Quite to the contrary, nowhere in the New Testament is the promised visible earthly kingdom denied; nor was the disciples' expectation of the same reprov'd or denounced by Jesus. Early on, Jesus almost casually announced to His disciples, 'many [Gentiles] will come from east and west and recline at table [presumably on earth, for heaven is neither east nor west] with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Matt. 8:11). Jesus encouraged Peter, somewhat disconsolate over 'poor pay' in discipleship, this way: 'Verily I say unto you [plural], That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel' (Matt. 19:28 kjv).

Perhaps these apparently plain references to a future reign of our Lord on earth, in which disciples are associated with Him, might be understood in some metaphorical, spiritual sense as applying to spiritual salvation in the present age. If so, why does Jesus add 'and [not 'that is'] shall inherit everlasting life' (Matt. 19:29 kjv)? Jesus apparently did not equate sitting on thrones with possessing eternal life. The disciples did not understand these promises as metaphors when spoken by Jesus, nor a few months later during the 'forty days,' for they asked if He would at that 'time restore again the kingdom to Israel.' Their question was quite in order. Jesus had just reiterated His previous promise that the Holy Spirit would soon be poured out upon them. They also knew that several Old Testament prophecies predicted the outpouring of the Spirit, and, coupled with Israel's repentance, would usher in the earthly Messianic kingdom, with Israel ‘the head’ not the ‘tail’ in the world (Isa. 32; 44:1–5; Ezek. 36, 37; Deut. 28:13), and with ‘David ... king over them’ (Ezek. 37:24). A further reason was that Jesus neither modified nor rebuked their expressed hope, but rather implied that the restoration of the kingdom to Israel was for another time, and turned their thoughts away from any earthly future kingdom to the missionary program within the present spiritual kingdom of heaven (Acts 1:6–8; cf. all of Matt. 13).

5. According to the vision of John the Revelator, certain highly honored beings in heaven (the twenty-four elders) still have expectation to join in a future reign of Christ on earth. They express their hope in the opening heavenly throne scene as part of a ‘new song,’ which concludes: ‘and you [Christ the Lamb] have made them a kingdom and priests to our God, and they shall reign on the earth’ (Rev. 5:10). Their understanding of a reign of saints was all to be in the future and to take place not in heaven, as some claim, but ‘on the earth.’

6. At the grand climax of the book of Revelation, the Advent of the Word of God with the armies of heaven, the beast and his armies already cast into the lake of fire, and the resurrection of believers now having occurred, it is said of these now resurrected saints, ‘they will be priests of God and of Christ, and they will reign with him for a thousand years’ (Rev. 20:6). If we may speak of a geography of the kingdom over which they shall reign a thousand years, it shall occupy ‘the four corners of the earth’ (Rev. 20:8). Of course it seems entirely proper that special mention by way of eminent honor (Rev. 20:4) should be made of the beheaded martyrs (even in heaven they now pray for vindication and deliverance, Rev. 6:9–11) who lost their lives ‘for the word of God and for the witness they had borne.’ Martyr is the Greek word for witness and it is for this reason the word came into language as a name for those who give up their lives because of their witness for Christ.

7. The specifically biblical-Christian understanding of the coming resurrection of believers made the idea of a future time when the risen Christ ‘reigns on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and his glory will be before his elders [risen glorified saints]’ (Isa. 24:23) seemed quite a normal thing for Christians to accept. The Fathers and the early creeds were consistent in affirming that Jesus ascended to heaven in a body of flesh and shall come again in ‘the same body,’ likewise that believers shall rise again in a body like His. They knew that Jesus in His resurrection body accompanied with His disciples in their natural bodies for forty days and it seemed to them not grotesque that such associations should occur during a coming ‘regeneration’ of human environment and society in a future renovated millennial world. Even heaven itself (as pointed out carefully by H. B. Swete in The Ascended Lord) is at the present time a place of friendly environment for the human body of Jesus, a place where, in the future, risen saints in bodies of flesh shall feel at home. All Christians, not only premillenarians, should share this expectation and usually do so unless seduced away from it.

For these reasons and quite apart from any other influences, the millennial hope of many through the ages of the church and to the present hour, seems quite justifiable. There seems to be nothing fantastic or weird about it. Admittedly some, both ancient and recent, have (distorted the millennial hope in some weird ways.

Many justly honored names, some famous scholarly writers of modern times (post-Reformation), mainly before the beginning of the twentieth century, adhered (with some variation) to chiliastic views. Among them are Mede, Bengel, Gill, Auberlen, F. Delitzsch, Bernard, Godet, Hofmann, J. P. Lange (editor and writer in the famous commentary series), Stier, Van Oosterzee, Samuel Andrews, Ellicott (editor of the commentaries), Guinness, T. Zahn, W. G. Moorehead, B. W. Newton, Trench, Tregelles, Alford, Duesterdick (in Meyer's Commentary) and Meyer himself. Some of these are still widely read today and their views are cited in current scholarly literature.

Ideas of a future millennial reign of Christ after the Second Advent and associated matters, should stand on their own feet without distortion or support from presuppositions such as are sometimes found in some 'covenant' theology and some 'dispensational' theology today. (I put these words in quote marks because, though each system has a distinctive view of biblical history and of doctrines, each has a place for biblical covenants and periods of divine government, i.e. dispensations.) In competent hands neither is without an important handle on systematic theology though each has been overzealously championed by some to the distortion of mutually acknowledged truths. Neither outlook is by inherent necessity either contrary or favorable to the ancient millennial hope.

One matter of importance has been excluded from discussion: the precise time-relation of the resurrection and translation of believers (the so-called rapture of the church) to the coming great tribulation, for two reasons.

1. While the millennium rests on what most millenarians hold to be clear Scripture texts, the 'Rapture debate' depends on inferences from Scripture passages which primarily treat other subjects. Some supposedly direct affirmations of a pre-, post- or mid-tribulational rapture are irrelevant.
2. Though the firmness with which competing views (pre-, mid- and post-tribulational) of the coming resurrection and translation of believers is sometimes advocated suggests otherwise, the Scriptures indicate that God may have rendered this problem incapable of full solution until He gives more light. There is always danger in going beyond that which is written, especially in speculative matters and in biblical prediction. In a famous passage which we have already discussed, Paul clearly asserts that readers of his Epistles had access to knowledge on this matter which he saw fit never to commit to writing. After referring to Jesus' Second 'coming' and the 'gathering together' of saints at that time, and speaking of the revelation of the man of lawlessness, the Antichrist, Paul writes, 'Do you not remember that when I was still with you I told you these things?' (2 Thess. 2:5). The Thessalonian believers were told these things, but we have not been told—at least not fully—as they were. He adds, 'And now ye know that which restraineth ... only there is one that restraineth now' (2:6, 7 asv). True, of the people who heard Paul at Thessalonica, he could say, 'now ye know.' We, however, have our theories but do not know for certain because there is no record of what he 'told' the believers at Thessalonica. In fact, there is hardly a New Testament text which has more thoroughly mystified interpreters. Since this is true, then this seems to be how God intended and intends to let the matter rest for awhile. Does this not suggest that we should be willing to leave the matter where God left it? I say this even though, as I understand the Word of God, the great tribulation will be among precursors to the coming. As indicated many times in the course of these chapters, there is a degree of built-in, divinely-intended obscurity in most biblical, prophetic predictions, especially those delivered in the form of visions. Did not the Lord make this plain when He said to Aaron and Miriam: 'Hear my words: If there is a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known to him in a vision, I will speak with him in a dream. Not so with my servant Moses; he is entrusted with all my house. With him I speak mouth to mouth, clearly, and not in dark speech' (Num. 12:6–8 rsv).

¹ See E. M. Blaiklock, The Seven Churches (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, n.d.).

² Joseph Seiss, Lectures on the Apocalypse and George N. H. Peters, The Theocratic Kingdom were 19th century Americans. J. A. Bengel in Exposition of the Apocalypse and Gnomon of the New Testament, made the word millennium respectable in Europe in the 18th century.

³ For complete coverage of views through the Christian centuries see LeRoy Edwin Froom, The Prophetic Faith of the Fathers, 4 vols., about 4,000 pages (Washington D.C.: Review & Herald, 1950). This work is unique and valuable.

⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Fleming Revell, 29th printing of the 1907 ed., 1974), p. 1014.

⁵ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 568 ff.

⁶ David Brown, Christ's Second Coming: Will It Be Premillennial? (New York: Carter, 1879), pp. 27, 28.

⁷ A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 1008.

⁸ ibid., p. 1013.

⁹ ibid., p. 1013.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 1009.

¹¹ Brown, op. cit., p. 28.

¹² Lorraine Boettner, The Millennium, 4th ed. (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed), p. 19.

¹³ Andrew Sandlin, A Postmillennial Primer (Valecito, CA: Chalcedon Foundation, 1997), 50 pages.

¹⁴ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government, A Biblical View (Edmonton, AB: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology & Public Policy, 2000), p. 207.

¹⁵ Lorraine Boettner, The Millennium (Philadelphia: Prebyterian & Reformed Publ.).

¹⁶ Robert Clouse, ed., The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1977).

¹⁷ J. Marcellus Kik, An Eschatology of Victory (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1970), as cited by Boettner, op. cit., p. 119.

- ¹⁸ Hanz Schwarz, On the Way to the Future (Minneapolis: Augsburg Publ., 1972), p. 154.
- ¹⁹ Amillennial and amillenarian are evidently recently coined words. While the Oxford English Dictionary traces premillennial back to 1846, it does not even have an entry for amillennial. Advocates do not approve the name. I employ the word only as a convenience to ‘label’ those who do not fall under the categories commonly understood as pre or post millennial.
- ²⁰ William Hendriksen, More Than Conquerors: An Interpretation of the Book of Revelation, (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1944), p. 222.
- ²¹ ibid.
- ²² ibid., p. 222.
- ²³ Oswald T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1945).
- ²⁴ George L. Murray, Millennial Studies (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1948).
- ²⁵ Floyd E. Hamilton, The Basis of Millennial Faith (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1942).
- ²⁶ William Hendriksen, More Than Conquerors: An Interpretation of the Book of Revelation, 3rd ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1944).
- ²⁷ Robert Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998), p. 1063.
- ²⁸ G. C. Berkouwer, The Return of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), p. 315.
- ²⁹ ibid., p. 307. See Reymond’s comment in his book, op. cit., p. 1063.
- ³⁰ William Milligan, ‘The Book of Revelation’ in The Expositor’s Bible, W. R. Nicoll, ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1943), p. 913.
- ³¹ Henry Barclay Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John. The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes and Indices, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1907), p. 266.
- ³² Albertus Pieters, Studies in the Revelation of St. John, p. 301.
- ³³ John Calvin, Commentaries on the Book of the Prophet Daniel, Vol. i, p. 167.
- ³⁴ ibid., Vol. ii, p. 74.
- ³⁵ J. O. Buswell, Systematic Theology, Vol. ii (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), pp. 424–538.
- ³⁶ George Ladd, The Blessed Hope (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956).

³⁷ Jay E. Adams, The Time Is At Hand (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1970), pp. 105, 106.

³⁸ ibid., p. 90.

³⁹ Verner Eller, The Most Revealing Book of the Bible: Making Sense Out of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974).

⁴⁰ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 4th ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 709.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1143). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

15

The Future Eternal State

When God created mankind, male and female, He put them in an earthly setting. There ‘God blessed them. And God said to them, “Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth”.’ Further, ‘The heavens are the Lord’s heavens, but the earth has he given to the sons of men’ (Ps. 115:16 rsv). And though the saved of every age have a ‘heavenly hope,’ and at present ‘our citizenship is in heaven’ (Phil. 3:20), it seems apparent in Scripture, in the final state, redeemed humanity will again call earth their home. In the final vision of the Apocalypse John ‘heard a loud voice from the throne saying, “Behold the dwelling place of God is with man. He will dwell with them, and they will be his people, and God himself will be with them” ’ (Rev. 21:3). In its present fallen state of ‘bondage to corruption,’ earth is no proper permanent home for God’s regenerate children, so at death they ‘depart and be with Christ’ in heaven which ‘is far better’ (Phil. 1:23)—but not permanently.

The kingdom of God of which Old Testament prophets spoke, announced by John, Jesus and the Apostles, includes heaven, of course, but ultimately is to be formally and permanently established on earth also. Its final state is a new heaven and a new earth. The Old Testament prophets predicted its establishment in a world from which the disordering effects of the fall have been removed and replaced by a new cosmic order (numerous passages in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Amos). Jesus spoke of this change as a ‘regeneration’ (Matt. 19:28). Peter spoke of it as ‘new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells’ (2 Peter 3:13). Peter was carrying forward Old Testament prophecy, including the two promises of the same in Isaiah 65 and 66, as also the Apocalypse elaborated in John’s vision of the descent of the Lamb’s wife from heaven to dwell in a new Jerusalem under a ‘new heaven’ upon a ‘new earth’ (Rev. 21:1, 2, 9, 10). These references—together with Paul’s unprecedented and unrepeated declaration that our Lord will yield up this kingdom to God the Father after the last enemy, death, has been destroyed (1 Cor. 15:24–28)—will occupy our attention for the rest of this chapter and will bring this journey through the loci of systematic theology to a close.

The doctrine of the future visible reign of God in a new world, a renovated earth under a ‘new heaven,’ has its roots in Old Testament history and prophecy. The picture drawn in Revelation 21 and 22 of the final development of the history and fulfillment of the prophecy is, in almost every detail, connected by the author (John) to specific Old Testament texts. He does not formally base his remarks about the new heaven come down on earth to Old Testament Scripture. He simply employs the language and the symbols about the kingdom employed by prophets (chiefly Isaiah) to describe the ‘new regime.’

The prophetic picture of the kingdom’s future in times of Messiah, after ‘the day of the Lord’ has arrived, is hard to harmonize fully with itself. This is because even though the prophets predicted absolute holiness and perfect reconciliation of mankind, God and nature, they also imply that some of the imperfections of our present fallen world will persist. For example, the same Isaiah who predicts complete victory over death ‘on that day’ (Isa. 25:9), also seems to say that, though the length of human life will be greatly extended, sinners will be present among the people, and physical death will still occur (Isa. 65:20). A temporary reign of Christ with His people for a thousand years after the resurrection of the saved, followed by the second resurrection (and judgment) of the lost, to be succeeded by the eternal state, provides a feasible explanation. In such a case the mixed condition is millennial; the perfect one is the eternal state. Those who reject a post-Advent, temporary reign of Christ have other explanations, chiefly based on progressive revelation.¹

George Eldon Ladd, who gave this subject as exhaustive an examination as any, declared:

Whatever [the] historical background ... we must still ask the question of its theological significance in the New Testament. Here we are shut up to inferences, for the New Testament nowhere explains the need for the temporal kingdom except to indicate that in some undisclosed way it is essential to the accomplishment of the reign of Christ (1 Cor. 15:24 ff.).²

I find myself now, after a long life of reflecting on the biblical materials, very reluctant to say much about the eternity to come. It seems presumptuous to do so. Hence I present the relevant passages and comment as seems justified. The description of the final state in Revelation 21 and 22, of course, specifically employs only the elements in the prophecies predicting perfection.

The Final Future State Is the Kingdom of the Father

After speaking of the order of the resurrections in 1 Corinthians 15:22–24, Paul’s thought continues:

²⁴ Then comes the end, when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father after destroying every rule and every authority and power. ²⁵ For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet. ²⁶ The last enemy to be destroyed is death. ²⁷ ‘For God has put all things in subjection under his feet.’ But when it says, ‘All things are put in subjection under him,’ it is plain that he is excepted who put all things under him. ²⁸ When all things are subjected to him, then the Son himself will also be subjected to him who put all things under him, that God may be everything to every one (1 Cor. 15:24–28 rsv).

The Son was aware, as he spoke in parting words to the disciples, that all power had been given Him in heaven and earth (Matt. 28:18), but He had yet to employ that power to clear the creation of death, ‘the last enemy.’ Such ultimate benefit had to await the Last Judgment when not only that unholy trinity—the beast, the false prophet and the devil (Rev. 20:7–10)—but every other unreconciled enemy has been disposed of, removed from God’s world. After that, creation shall take the form originally designed in God the Father’s eternal counsels, including those features which even evils, both material and moral, were designed to effect (see Eph. 1:9, 10). In that coming epoch creation will have been delivered from its present bondage to corruption into the liberty proper to it (Rom. 8:19, 20).

George E. Ladd well says in comment on Romans 8:19–23:

The final restoration includes the very material world.... While Paul does not develop this truth of the redemption of nature, there is a profound biblical theology underlying it. The redemption of the natural world from evil and decay is the corollary of the redemption of the body. The prophet constantly described the establishment of God’s kingdom in terms of a redeemed world (Isa. 11:6–9; 65:17–25); and the New Testament shares the same theology.³

It is also apparent that the Son of God, eternally begotten of the Father, shall within the created order of things take the subordinate position which is a mark of the essential Trinity. This passage seems to suggest that the subordination of the Son to the Father is to be affirmed not only of the economic (functional) Trinity but of the essential Trinity, what the Godhead is in and of itself. The final, eternal age to come is to be the time of the Father’s unmediated authority; the millennium of the Son’s unveiled and manifest authority and glory; the present is the time of the ‘Son’s veiled reign and hidden glory.’⁴

The New Heaven and the New Earth

The Apocalypse strikingly introduces the future eternal state in continuity (‘And I saw,’ Rev. 21:1 kjv) with the preceding vision of the final judgment of the wicked (Rev. 20:11–14). ‘Then I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away, and the sea was no more’ (Rev. 21:1 rsv).

Peter makes the only other New Testament reference to a new heaven and a new earth as a summation of previous remarks about ‘the day of the Lord’ which will come like a thief. Then ‘the heavens will pass away with a roar, and the heavenly bodies will be burned up and dissolved, and the earth and the works that are done on it will be exposed’ (2 Peter 3:10). Then after a warning he concludes: ‘But according to his promise we are waiting for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells’ (2 Peter 3:13).

Peter to a degree (2 Peter 3:13), and John overwhelmingly in the last two chapters of the Apocalypse, are both borrowing language from the prophecies of Isaiah and interpreting the same. Both 2 Peter and the Revelation are extracting ideas and language from two passages in Isaiah where that evangelic prophet spoke in a context which (if one believes in a future millennium) sounds inescapably millennial.

Both passages, Isaiah 65:17–25 and 66:18–23, should now be read to get the full flavor of the remarkable projection of the final future of our world. In the first passage the Lord promises: ‘For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former things shall not be remembered nor come into mind’ (Isa. 65:17). The passage proceeds to place ‘Jerusalem to be a joy’ in this ‘new earth,’ a renovated new world where no one weeps; where if one dies at 100 he will be a ‘child’ (long life); where a spiritual condition enables answered prayers; and where a natural environment allows even animals to be reconciled one to another (Isa. 65:18–25).

Isaiah’s second reference to ‘the new heavens and the new earth’ (Isa. 66:22, 23) compares the same to the permanent restoration of Israel:

For as the new heavens and the new earth that I make shall remain before me, says the Lord, so shall your offspring and your name remain. From new moon to new moon, and from Sabbath to Sabbath, all flesh shall come to worship before me, declares the Lord.

This again raises the question of the millennium and its relation to the eternal state. I am among many who think the only way the many predictions of Israel’s future national regeneration and restoration can find complete fulfillment is in a literal fulfillment. For this the millennium provides an appropriate time. Because I have written elsewhere at length on this subject it seems appropriate here to say little more about it.

I argue,⁵ ‘The closing days of the present age shall witness the restoration of Israel to the land and the conversion of the nation, to be followed in the millennium by fulfillment of the Old Testament covenant promises distinctive to that nation.’ Later in the same volumes I contend, ‘that as to time the new heavens and new earth anticipated by Peter and the other prophets are to appear at the beginning of the Millennium, and that in nature and extent the conflagration which introduces the new heavens and new earth shall consist of a strictly limited renovation rather than annihilation of the existing natural order.’⁶

Through the Christian centuries theologians no less than lay readers of the Bible have wrestled with the problem. It is not a problem any more severe than the predictions of ‘the sufferings and the glory’ of Christ were to the Old Testament prophets in interpreting their own divinely supplied oracles predicting Messiah’s ‘sufferings’ and ‘glory’ (1 Peter 1:10–12). How could the same reigning Savior also be a Suffering Servant? We should take notice of the fact that the special place of Israel in the divine scheme of the future extends even into the eternal future state. For though the walls of ‘the holy city Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God’ (Rev. 21:10) have ‘twelve foundations, and on them were the twelve names of the twelve apostles’ (Rev. 21:14) the wall itself has twelve gates, ‘and on the gates the names of the twelve tribes of the sons of Israel were inscribed’ (Rev. 21:12).⁷

Let these remarks conclude with the plain apostolic application of the message of the new creation in which we hope to dwell forever:

But the day of the Lord will come like a thief, and then the heavens will pass away with a roar, and the heavenly bodies will be burned up and dissolved, and the earth and the works that are done on it will be exposed.

Since all these things are thus to be dissolved, what sort of people ought you to be in lives of holiness and godliness, waiting for and hastening the coming of the day of God, because of which the heavens will be set on fire and dissolved, and the heavenly bodies will melt as they burn! But according to his promise we are waiting for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells (2 Peter 3:10–13).

¹ It is interesting to read the debate between the amillenarian translator, George E. Day, and millenarian Gustav F. Oehler, the author of Theology of the Old Testament (NY: Funk & Wagnalls, 1883). I shall not repeat the debate here.

² George Eldon Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974, 1991), p. 631.

³ ibid., p. 567.

⁴ ibid., p. 630.

⁵ In Daniel and the Latter Days (1977) and revised as The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People (1998), pp. 87–100. Same page in each ed.

⁶ My arguments (pp. 188–200, both eds.) follow rather closely the work of George N. H. Peters, The Theocratic Kingdom, three large volumes, 1854, republished 1957.

⁷ Chapter 9 above, ‘Heaven, the Eternal Home of the Redeemed’ is relevant and appropriate at this point.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (1153). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.