A. The greatest weight must be attached to Jesus' own awareness of preexistence and His testimony to that awareness. He is best qualified to speak, as He Himself claimed, 'Even if I do bear witness about myself, my testimony is true, for I know where I came from and where I am going' (John 8:14). This was His rebuff to the Pharisees' denying value to His testimony (v. 13). He laid claim to the fact that Bethlehem was a step down from previous existence when to Nicodemus He spoke of Himself as Him 'who descended from heaven' (John 3:13). Again the thought appears when He asked some defiant Jews, 'what if you were to see the Son of Man ascending to where he was before?' (John 6:62). Later as the mystery of His Passion was settling in, and in the solemn truthfulness of 'death-bed' prayer, He cried out, 'And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed' (John 17:5). About forty times in John's Gospel alone Jesus used expressions that, while not directly claiming preexistence, do imply it. I cite only one more example, from John 8:42 (kjv), 'I proceeded forth and came from God.'

B. Some of John's testimony to Christ's preexistence has already been cited, for he it is who was quoted in most of the above paragraphs. As the 'Beloved Disciple' his insights (perhaps John even shared some special revelation) gave him a special right to speak to this matter. The striking opening of John's Gospel (John 1:1–3) puts the Word at 'the beginning.' He carries the same dual witness (his own and Jesus' quoted words) on into 1 John where our Lord is 'that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us' (1 John 1:1, 2) and in the book of Revelation where Jesus speaks as 'the Alpha and the Omega, ... who is and who was and who is to come, the Almighty' (Rev. 1:8 et al).

C. The forerunner, John the Baptist, more than hinted at preexistence when he said Jesus 'was before me' (John 1:15) and Paul, as usual, making doctrinal statements to support ethical-practical exhortation, places Christ, the 'Rock that followed them,' with Israel in the wilderness trek (1 Cor. 10:4–9) and preexisting 'in the form of God' (Phil. 2:6) and 'before all things' (Col. 1:17).

The liberal but honest presentation of Paul's affirmations by F. R. Craddock⁶ required thirty-five pages for a mere survey of Paul's affirmations, allusions to and assumptions of this doctrine—already accepted among the readers of his Epistles.

Craddock shows how Paul relates the preexistent Christ to the original creation, to the incarnation and to history. The most pertinent is, of course, the preexistent Christ in creation as in two of the outstanding passages, 1 Corinthians 8:5, 6 and Colossians 1:15–20. In the first Paul says although there are 'so-called' gods on earth and in heaven 'for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things ... and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist.' In the second, Christ is 'the image of the invisible God ... all things were created through him and for him. And he is before all things, and in him all things hold together.'

The teaching of Christ's preexistence is not being announced in these great passages; rather it is assumed as an acknowledged fact, helpful for solving other theological and practical problems. In 1 Corinthians 8:5, 6 the problem is theological—monotheism versus polytheism. Paul directs their attention to the agreed fact that 'for us there is [only] one God ... and one Lord, Jesus Christ.' The readers needed to be reminded of these accepted theological roots. In the Colossians passage the same polytheism ('thrones ... dominions ... principalities ... authorities') needed to be dislodged from the minds of the former polytheists of the congregation not yet quite purged of pagan superstitions. In Corinth the worship of heathen gods was manifest in lingering attendance at the local pagan shrines and the meals served there (chap. 8), in Colosse the worship of angels, though we do not know what form it took.

Being now centuries removed from overt polytheism in our outlook it seems unnecessary to prove the non-existence of supernatural spooks or spirits who must be honored or placated. But this was necessary then and in many parts of Christendom still is necessary. In theological parlance Paul is saying: the God and Christ of redemption is the God and Christ of creation and providence also. The so-called gods of heathenism have no more power to control crops, fortunes, health, winning or losing than power to save, which is none at all. The Redeemer and the providential Lord of creation are the same Lord Jesus.

The Apostle treats the preexistence theme as an aspect of incarnation. The goal is to inculcate moral and spiritual virtues. Among these virtues is generosity, ‘For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich [emphasis added], yet for your sake he became poor,’ etc. (2 Cor. 8:9), and unselfishness, ‘Do nothing out of selfish ambition or vain conceit’ (Phil. 2:3 niv). The author is employing the moral leverage in the example of the preexistent Christ who in not hanging on to equality with God but humbling Himself, took our humanity to save us (Phil. 2:4–11).

He elsewhere employs the dogma of the preexistence as a rhetorical support in the perennial task, familiar to every pastor, of raising money for benevolent purposes. If they are to ‘remember the poor’ (Gal. 2:10) he reminds them they have Barnabas and Paul as models, but no less so the example of Jesus cited above (2 Cor. 8:9; Rom. 15:27). Thus not only are creation by the preexistent Christ and redemption by the same incarnate Lord twin doctrines, but the preexistence is also part and parcel of salvation doctrine too or Paul would not be coaching his ‘second string’ evangelists toward sanctification by appeals to it, as he does in these communications.

Let us take note of a final example. The new Christians at Corinth were prone to indulge their baser appetites by concessions to the immoral rites of idolatrous worship prevalent in this city. To encourage them toward better things he directed these former heathen to the direct spiritual assistance Christ gave to the Israelites at the time of the Exodus and wilderness wanderings, viz.: ‘I want you to know, brothers, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank from the spiritual Rock that followed them, and the Rock was Christ’ (1 Cor. 10:1–4). He then goes on to warn the new people of God at Corinth against similar sins of self-indulgence, idolatry, frivolity and fornication which brought about destruction of the Israelites of old. The point of the passage is that Christ was present as bread of life and water of life to ancient Israel and is still present now, faithful to provide strength to escape every temptation (1 Cor. 10:11–13). The rest of chapter 10 continues the lesson against self-indulgences of various kinds.

D. The Epistle to the Hebrews carries forward the same sequence of preexistence followed by incarnation. The opening paragraph says God who spoke in the Old Testament dispensation by prophets has spoken in the present dispensation finally by a son. This particular son, the Epistle goes on to say, happens to be the Son, the One by whom God made the worlds. ‘[B]eing ... the express image’ (kjv; ‘exact imprint esv; ‘exact representation’ niv) of God’s person, He is the One who purged our sins and then returning to heaven ‘sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high.’ This with different emphasis and a different name (‘my Son,’ Heb. 1:5), is the preexistence theology of John, chapter 1, where the One by whom God created the world is the Word.

Hebrews 2:9–18 is arguably the greatest Christological passage in the Bible. It is devoted to explaining the nature of the incarnation itself and the divine purposes for the event and its sequel in the life, death, resurrection and ascension of the Savior. The personal transaction of the preexistent Son is well put in verse 14, ‘Forasmuch then as the children are partakers [i.e. by nature, conceived and born that way] of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same.’ The King James Version, just cited, cannot be much improved upon, except to note that like every Version I can recall consulting, for some strange reason it reverses ‘blood and flesh’ of the Greek, which is to be regretted. The author intended to emphasize not merely the humanity of incarnate deity but as Friederich Bleek explains: ‘The whole sensuous corporeal nature of man, which he has in common with the brutes.’⁷ The emphasis is on the ‘infirmity, decay, and transitoriness’ of being part of a material world. Koinoneō is the word rendered ‘partakers’ conveying what human beings naturally have in common by virtue of existence. Metechō is here rendered not partake which might have a passive meaning, not different especially from koinoneō. But the translators of 1611 rightly rendered it by an unmistakably active expression, ‘took part.’ The Son of God, so to speak, saw human kind in a material, physical world and took part in their humanity in order to die for them, as the last part of verse 14 says. He stepped up to the table, so to speak, and took part with them by means of the event of incarnation. A parallel of precise sense is the contrast of forebear, a passive notion, with bear for, an active idea.

The preexistent ‘Jesus’ (see Heb. 2:9) reached out and took our human nature. There is a realism here that has nothing at all in common with the mythical or occult mysticism to which some modern New Testament scholarship would assign this teaching. Nor is there the least maudlin sentimentality at Christmas often associated with popular folk-celebration about the manger scene of popular imagination and commercial exploitation. To those who would deny the propriety of such, F. F. Bruce replies:

The man who says, ‘I could not have a high opinion of a God who would (or would not) do this or that,’ is not adding anything to our knowledge of God; he is simply telling us something about himself. We may be sure that all God does is worthy of Himself, but here our author singles out one of God’s actions and tells us that ‘it became him’—that it was a fitting thing for him to do.⁸

E. This theology is pervasive on through the book of Revelation—never introduced, as liberal religion would have it, as an interpretation of people’s religious experiences, but report of what Jesus and the Apostles had said from the beginning. Nor is it the fruit of theological reflection by the Jewish or Jew-Gentile church, as liberal New Testament theology would have it, but as received truth addressed to Christians who already believed and had believed it for thirty years before Paul wrote Philippians 2:5–9.

The Preexistent Christ in Old Testament History and Prophecy

A. As understood by the ancient church: No text of the Old Testament speaks with the clarity of John 1:1 or 17:5. Yet the Second Person of the Godhead, incarnate in Jesus, has a place in several aspects of Old Testament narrative.

The Eastern church Fathers read the Old Testament only in the Greek translation known as the Septuagint. The word for wisdom, sophia, has much overlapping of meaning with logos, quite as justifiably translated reason or logic as word even in the first chapter of John and elsewhere in the New Testament. So when the three Cappadocians—the two Gregories and Basil—in the late third century were sifting the Old Testament for evidence of Christ’s preexistence and deity, Proverbs chapter 8 seemed like certain proof. It is a soliloquy by wisdom—Greek sophia, Hebrew ḥokma. Wisdom claims ‘The Lord possessed me at the beginning of his work... Ages ago I was set up, at the first’ (Prov. 8:22, 23) and similarly throughout the chapter. It is not surprising that before and after the Councils of Nicea (ad 325) and First Constantinople (ad 381) the supporters of orthodoxy quoted this chapter in support. By connecting Psalm 104:24 (LXX, 103:24) with 1 Corinthians 1:24 and John

1:1–3 they thought they had an airtight case and used it that way. J. Pelikan discusses this at length and with great profit for any reader.⁹

Yet suggestive as it is, the female ḥakma-sophia-wisdom of Proverbs is patently a personification of the ethical spiritual quality exalted from the first verses of the book onward (1:1–4) a synonym of the fear of God (1:7), similar to discretion, understanding, righteousness, judgment and equity (2:9–11). Wisdom in Proverbs 8 is not a hypostasis (person) but wisdom hypostatized (personified).

B. There is strong evidence from some early Jewish sources that one stream of thought among Jews, though not all, of two centuries before Christ and for several centuries afterward expected Messiah to be a preexistent person—not God Himself, but one created by God before the creation of sun and stars. There is a Jewish literature (‘intertestamental’), sometimes called also Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, much of which has been known to Christian scholars for many centuries. Other ancient Jewish literature (e.g. the Book of Enoch in Etheopic translation) has turned up in modern times. Judaism also produced Mishna and Gemara (the Talmud), Midrashim (commentaries), and other writings emanating from the first to sixth centuries of our era. Then in 1947 and subsequently, the Qumran findings (Dead Sea Scrolls), have provided much information directly from a community of devout and zealous Jews who were intent upon being prepared spiritually to receive Messiah and to support what they expected would be Messiah’s program of deliverances of ‘the chosen people.’

Scholars, both Jewish and Christian, in modern times before the Qumran discoveries, canvassed that literature. One of the best was Joseph Klausner, who after a distinguished career in European universities became Professor of Hebrew Literature and Jewish History at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His book, The Messianic Idea in Israel, mostly written originally in German and published 1902–1921 was translated into Hebrew and then into English. In the second part, on the messianic idea in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Klausner, commenting on the Etheopic Enoch states: ‘The Messiah existed before the creation of the world—as in the later Baraitas of the Talmud ... and in the Midrashim.’ In a note he continues: ‘To be sure only the name Messiah preceded the creation of the world’ (p. 290). On a later section of Enoch he comments:

The Son of man and his name are named before the Ancient of Days. ‘Before the sun and the planets were created, before the stars in the heavens were made, his name was named before the God of Spirits’ (48:2–3). Likewise even in the earlier Baraitas—Messiah’s Name existed before the sun and stars: it is one of the seven things that preceded the creation of the world.¹⁰

The Messiah Texts by Raphael Patai treats the post-biblical literature of ancient Israel topically (logically, according to subject). Each chapter consists of an interpretive introduction and the texts in the author’s translation. The second chapter is ‘Preexistence and Names of the Messiah.’ He says:

Messiah first appears as preexistent in the apocryphal First Book of Enoch (180–150 bc). ... From that period on the concept of the Messiah who was created in the six days of Creation, or even prior to them, or who was then hidden to await his time, became a standard feature of Jewish Messianic eschatology.¹¹

I know of no reference to Messiah’s preexistence in the Qumran literature or in the literature about it, nor any clear expectation of a purely non-human, divine Messiah. Michael (Who is like God?) and Gabriel (Man of God) do appear as accompanying Messiah in His coming. It would not be surprising if some text should turn up claiming a preexistent divine Person as Messiah on the basis of the Son of Man apocalypse of Daniel 7. The Sadducean priests were certainly conscious of such a connection, as Luke 22:71 shows. Sometimes Messiah is called ‘Son of the Clouds’ in the Talmud.¹² This suggests Daniel 7:13. The Talmud, Pirque Mashiah (chapters of Messiah) has a passage referring to King Messiah as coming ‘as it is written, Behold, with the clouds of heaven came one like unto a son of man.’

In so far as the preexistence of Messiah appears in Jewish literature, it is not the eternal preexistence of God Himself but of One created in heaven before His coming to earth. A. H. Strong provides a valuable assessment of Christ as preexistent Wisdom and Word.¹³

C. The angel of the Lord (a subject better pursued at length in connection with the doctrine of the Trinity): The New Testament clearly identifies ‘the angel of the Lord’ of Old Testament theophanies with Christ, as a comparison of Malachi 3:1 with Mark 1:2 shows. This Person appeared to Hagar (Gen. 16), to Abram (Gen. 18), to Jacob (Gen. 32) and others and is called Jehovah (the Sacred Name; ‘Lord’ is used in most translations) in Genesis 18:18–21 and God in Exodus 3:2. ‘Wonderful’ is a ‘name’ for the predicted Christ in Isaiah 9:6 and ‘wonderful’ is also the name of ‘the angel of the Lord’ in the annunciation of the birth of Samson to his parents (Judg. 13:18). This striking connection of the Angel of the Lord with the preexistent Christ has attracted the attention of scholars from ancient times. See Irenaeus,¹⁴ A. A. Hodge,¹⁵ A. H. Strong¹⁶ and Pelikan.¹⁷ It should be pointed out that ‘the angel of the Lord’ disappears with the Advent of Christ. ‘The angel of the Lord’ at Matthew 1:24 is not an exception. The article is by way of reference to ‘an angel of the Lord’ (v. 20), the particular one sent to announce the virginal conception.

D. Other suggestions: Though many Old Testament passages state, suggest or hint a future Advent of the Lord God of Israel, e.g. ‘the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple’ (Mal. 3:1), no one, it seems, identified these prophetic remarks as referring to Messiah. Yet certain rather well-known, acknowledged prophecies of Messiah suggest the Advent of an eternal personal Being. Micah 5:2, employed by the Jerusalem elders to guide the Magi to Bethlehem says ‘whose goings forth have been ... from everlasting’ (kjv) and Isaiah 9:6 can best be explained from hindsight of the New Testament (‘Mighty God, Everlasting Father’) as implying the preexistence of the child born at Bethlehem. ‘Everlasting Father,’ Hebrew ‘Evi-‘Adh means literally, Father of eternity in the sense of ‘perpetuity’ (Brown, Driver and Briggs) and puts our Lord before time, not in time, but time in Him.

The Scope of Christ’s Preexistence and Activity Therein

Once made thoroughly aware of the pre-incarnational Christ many scriptural statements take on a much larger meaning than otherwise. I shall attempt an outline of the subject.

A. As to the scope of His preexistence: as a very young man I remember reading of the birth of the present Dalai Lama, head of the Tibetan Buddhist religion. The announcement said (for I wrote this down) the newborn was ‘preexistent, planfully incarnate, supernaturally conceived, and miraculously born.’ This interesting refugee from communist China, even if one were to grant the claims made, is—if I understand the matter correctly—only supposed to be the re-embodiment of another religious leader who was born many centuries earlier. This Buddhist belief in metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls is itself a part of the general belief of millions of eastern and southern Asiatic peoples in the cyclic (repetitious) quality of the existence of all living beings (souls). Every soul embodied in some vital object is a re-embodiment of that soul in a chain of previous re-embodiments. There is no real beginning of things in this religious belief, for Hinduism and its offshoots (of which Buddhism is only one) have no substantive doctrine of original creation. In this regard Christ is unique in His claims. A sketch of the matter shows:

(1) He was present and active in the act of condescension by which the Son of God became incarnate in Mary's womb. '[T]aking the form of a servant,' 'he humbled himself' (Phil 2:7, 8).

(2) Some think He was present in the 'shekina' or glory-presence of the Mosaic Tabernacle and Solomonian and Restoration temples (though Jewish tradition claims no shekina for the restored temple). The story of the departure of the glory is told by Ezekiel who in a series of visions was privileged to see it happen. No one, in my opinion, can be sure how much of sheer symbolism is involved. The shekina, which was present in the Mosaic-Aaronic holy of holies, was present at least for awhile. '[F]ire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices, and the glory of the Lord filled the temple' (2 Chr. 7:1) when Solomon completed the dedicatory prayer. Ezekiel's vision furnishes that temple with the 'glory' Presence (Ezek. 10:4) though whether or not it was anything merely mortal eyes could behold is doubtful. The date of the vision is about August–September 591 bc according to Ezekiel 8:1. As Ezekiel's vision presents it through the next four chapters the irremediable sins of the nation were driving the Presence away. The heart-rending spectacle, visible only to the prophet, shows the glory-Presence sorrowfully, heart-brokenly, reluctantly taking His leave—first from 'the cherub on which it rested to the threshold of the house' (Ezek. 9:3). Then he returned and did it again (10:4). Then as though taking a painful leave the glory 'went out from the threshold ... and stood over the cherubim' (10:18). After that '... the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city and stood on the mountain [Olivet] that is on the east side of the city' (11:23) and presumably from that height departed for heaven—or at least disappeared. But Ezekiel was vouchsafed a promise of the return of the glory in the time of Israel's reformation and reconciliation when he beheld 'the glory of the God of Israel came from ... the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters' (Ezek. 43:2 kjv). Christians know that voice as that of the risen and glorified Jesus; 'his voice was like the sound of many waters' (Rev 1:15 rsv). Jesus likewise ascended from the Mount of Olives and, according to prophecy, there, according to respectable opinion, He shall return; 'On that day his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives' (Zec. 14:4).

Interpreters will not all agree on the meaning of these very exciting prophetic revelations and I have no inspired insights. Yet they strongly suggest the presence of the Second Person of the Godhead in Israel's central sanctuary throughout its checkered history to the end of the first temple.

(3) He was present to David, who called Him 'Lord' (Ps. 110:1; cf. Matt. 22:41–5).

(4) He was 'with God' back in eternity 'past' (if we may use any word at all) through all duration (John 1:2) not only in co-existence but in the mutual Trinitarian fellowship throughout eternity.

B. As to His activity as the preexistent One: New Testament texts already cited as testimony to the fact all had something to say as to the activity of the preexistent Christ. It is no small matter that He was from the beginning 'with God.' He was a divine agent in creating the heavens and the earth, in preservation of the created universe, and in its providential governance.

Some more particular matters can create wonder in the pious heart as they receive attention. Moses' renunciation of the perquisites of a royal prince of Egypt is said to be a choice which esteemed 'the reproach of Christ greater wealth than the treasures of Egypt' (Heb. 11:26). What does this mean? F. Bleek in his Lectures on Hebrews, published in Berlin (1868), wrote: '[T]he reproach which Christ had to bear in his own person, and in his members.' Hence, comments Dean Alford:

All Israel's reproach was Christ's reproach: Israel typified Christ ... all Israel's sufferings as the people of God were Christ's ... by that inclusion in Christ which they, his members before the Head was revealed; possessed ... ever present in and among God's people.¹⁸

What did Jesus mean when He uttered the anguished appeal: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the city that kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to it! How often would I have gathered your children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you would not!' (Matt. 23:37)? The answer comes clear if we understand He was the One who inspired Jeremiah's urgent appeals and who sent the prophet 'Zechariah' (Matt. 23:35) to reprove the backslidden Joash, who then allowed the bold prophet to be stoned (2 Chr. 24:20), and He was the One who sent other prophets, likewise rejected (2 Chr. 24:19).

Not for proof as such, but to show how important the preexistence is fully to understand even some incidental features of Jesus' outlook on Himself, observe Jesus in verbal contest with the protesting Pharisees of Luke 15. They were offended that He received sinners and even ate with them. The crux of His defense was that there is joy in heaven when sinners repent and that, most significantly, before the throne of God. He is not really rebuking the Pharisees or vindicating Himself, rather Jesus is explaining how natural joy is and how normally business is carried on in heaven. To receive and rejoice over repentant sinners as they had reproached Him for doing is normal to heaven and its residents—of whom He has been one. This is simply heaven's normal operational procedure. And it is His also, because, as He said more than once, He was heaven come down to earth. He will ascend there later because He is the living bread that came down from heaven (John 6:41, 51).

¹ F. B. Craddock, The Preexistence of Christ (Nashville, TN: Abington, 1968), p. 7.

² See 'Preexistence of Souls,' article by J. M. Marshall, Dictionary of the Bible iv, ed. J. Hastings (New York: Charles Scribner & Sons, 1909), p. 63.

³ B. B. Warfield, The Lord of Glory (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, n.d.), p. 38.

⁴ B. B. Warfield, art. 'The Person of Christ' (1915), ISBE v. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1943), p. 2338.

⁵ ibid.

⁶ F. R. Craddock, op. cit.

⁷ 'Lectures on Hebrews,' 1868, cited by Dean Henry Alford, New Testament for English Readers

⁷ LECTURES ON HEBREWS, 1886, cited by DEAN HENRY ALFORD, NEW TESTAMENT FOR ENGLISH READERS (Chicago: Moody Press, n.d.), p. 1465.

⁸ F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964), p. 41.

⁹ Jaroslav Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993), pp. 70, 71, 218 ff.

¹⁰ Joseph Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel, trans. W. F. Stinespring (New York: MacMillan, 1955), p. 292.

¹¹ Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts (Detroit: Wayne State U. Press, 1979), p. 16.

¹² ibid. pp. 81–83.

¹³ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 320, 321.

¹⁴ Irenaeus (in Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. Roberts and Donaldson, 1885, repr. Peabody, Hendrickson Publ., 1994), Against Heresies 4.10.1.

¹⁵ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (New York: R. Carter and Brothers, 1860, repr. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), pp. 170, 171.

¹⁶ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 319, 320.

¹⁷ J. Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture, pp. 210, 213.

¹⁸ Alford, NT for English Readers p. 1567.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (438). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

4

The Deity of Christ (I): Introduction; Names and Attributes of Deity

The immensity of this subject requires some boundaries to the discussion in this chapter. A topic which fills about half the pages of the writings of the Fathers of the century before the Second Ecumenical Council (ad 381) obviously cannot be exhaustively treated here. Nor is it either desirable or necessary, as we shall see.

Principles and Approach to the Subject

1. The deity of Christ is not an inference derived from cumulative evidence gained by inductive Bible research. Rather it is ‘derived directly from statements concerning Him in the Bible. The references are so many and their meaning so plain that Christians of every shade of opinion have always regarded its affirmation as an absolute and indispensable requisite of their faith.’¹ For this subject recourse to the erudite tools that theologians and exegetes often deploy is neither necessary nor appropriate if the Bible is to control our thinking.

If arrangers of the New Testament canon had decided to put John’s Gospel first instead of fourth, the New Testament would truly have opened at the beginning of Christology with these verses:

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.... And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we have seen his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father, full of grace and truth (John 1:1–3, 14).

Not that this is not plain enough, the same biblical author near the end of the last book of the New Testament says the One who ushers in the final judgment of this present order is One whose name is ‘The Word of God’ whose fierceness and wrath is the wrath of ‘God the Almighty’ and has the ‘written’ name of ‘King of kings and Lord of lords’ (Rev. 19:11–16). In another text the ‘Christ Jesus’ who stood ‘before Pontius Pilate’ is to have a second ‘appearing’ ‘which he will display at the proper time—he who is the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone has immortality, who dwells in unapproachable light, whom no one has ever seen or can see. To him be honor and eternal dominion’ (1 Tim. 6:13–16). Such unmistakable assertions of the absolute deity of ‘our Lord Jesus Christ’ make it impossible knowingly to think the New Testament does not directly teach the deity of Christ.

2. The New Testament nowhere goes out of the way to announce the deity of Christ, rather it is usually presented incidentally as something everybody on the inside of the Christian movement already understands. The deity of Christ was a matter of revelation not the fruit of reflection by Jesus’ disciples as a liberal theory would have it. Nor is it the creation of a generation of Christians who created the ‘myth’ a generation or two after the Apostles died off, as skeptical scholars of our time would have it. And that revelation is primarily in the New Testament—all of it, really. It is true, of course, that there is some development in the way it is expressed. The manner of expression is related always to the purpose of introducing it. For example, the profound statement of condescension in incarnation at Philippians 2:5–9 is incidental to teaching unselfishness, humility and service to others. Paul is employing several features of the divine condescension for support of a moral lesson. In Romans 8:3 God ‘sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh’ affirms Christ’s deity (as eternal Son) only as part of a chain of argument for the doctrine of sanctification. It is assumed the Roman readers were already fully acquainted with Christ—as in Romans 9:5, ‘God over all, blessed for ever’—and so on through all the Epistles and Revelation. B. B. Warfield developed this theme effectively in the article ‘Person of Christ’² and in his article ‘The Deity of Christ.’³

3. The exposition and arguments of this chapter are addressed primarily to those who have already acknowledged Jesus Christ as ‘God and only Savior.’ They may not yet be prepared to give a full account of why they believe Him to be so, but they know in their hearts who He is and, for deepening faith and strengthening assurance as well as resistance to erroneous views, they welcome evidence, proofs and analysis.

In most of the important matters of life fuller understanding comes after sufficient cause has produced knowledge and conviction. In the closing scene of Doctor Zhivago, the unhappy man sees the lady-love of his life fleetingly and only for a moment, through the window of his railway coach. She is walking slowly and the train is moving. He knows it is she and in the heightened excitement of the knowledge his weakened heart gives way and the poor doctor dies. Given a month to analyze how and why he knew it was she would have made him no more certain. His grounds were adequate. If granted time and opportunity we may suppose he could have written a book about her, for he 'knew' her much more intimately than he should have (cf. Gen. 4:1). So it is in recognizing one's signature on a check, or my father's picture in a photo of about 1915—a smiling young man with mock ferocity swinging a double-bitted axe midair.

The church Fathers discussed the matter of Christ's deity and debated with errorists and heretics from the beginning. This was long before the strong affirmations of Christ's deity in the early creeds, confessions and definitions. If anything is plain about these orthodox writers it is their unanimous intention to teach, confess, affirm 1) nothing more or less than the apostolic Scriptures teach and 2) to preserve intact nothing more and nothing less than what the Apostles had taught in their churches. This explains the earnest vehemence of the writings of Athanasius, for example. It explains the careful brevity of the Nicene Creed and the Definition of Chalcedon as regards Christ's deity, humanity and the relation between them. They wished to preserve the first universal, if unsystematized consensus. Because of Paul's prominence in preserving that consensus in writing I cite the following rather lengthy passage:

Written occasionally to one or another of the Christian communities ... from twenty to forty years after the origin of Christianity, these letters reflect the conceptions which ruled in Christian communities of the time. Paul had known the Christian movement from its beginning; first from the outside ... and then from the inside.... He was familiarly acquainted with the Apostles.... He explicitly declares the harmony of their teaching with his, and joins with his their testimony to the great facts which he proclaimed.... The person of Jesus fills the whole horizon of his thought, and gathers to itself all his religious emotions. That Jesus was the Messiah [Gr. Christos] is the presupposition of all his speech of him and the Messianic title [English, Christ] has already become his proper name behind which his real personal name, Jesus, has retired. This Messiah is definitely represented as a divine being who has entered the world on a mission of mercy to sinful man ... but ... has ascended to the right hand of God, henceforth to rule as Lord of all.⁴

Hence, the present chapter is an effort in systematic form, and as succinctly as feasible, to set forth the faith of Christianity from remote antiquity to the present, for the living church today. 'All that Jesus is to the eye of faith'⁵ is the adjusted focus of this chapter.

4. This chapter, while not addressed directly to those who do not acknowledge Christ as Lord and God it is not without reference to them. After all, the very earliest theology, even in the New Testament was stimulated by the necessity of defining the faith against errors within and without the church. We must notice what the self-proclaimed Arians of old, Unitarians of yesterday and the liberal churchmen of today have to say about the texts of Scripture which they think show our Lord to be a mere man, even if an extraordinary one. To examine the academic Christology, prevailing in the university faculties of religion, where a third 'search for the historical Jesus' is now being vigorously pursued, would only be a barren waste of time for present purposes. The Jesus Seminar and writers of symposia like The Myth of God Incarnate may be safely ignored. They cannot be answered except for relatively brief periods, for in one lifetime the 'faith' of these self-appointed academic experts has changed its directions several times.

5. There are several types of evidence for the deity of Christ as the Bible presents Him: 1) the names He bears, 2) the attributes of deity He manifested, 3) the works of God He performed, 4) the claims He made for Himself, and 5) the worship which He received and accepted. These are the 'formal' proofs. While they are decisive as to the plain sense of the biblical texts, there are certain hermeneutical problems that require attention and the perversions of ignorance or of design by heretical groups call for response. These are the five consensual arguments, part of the legacy of centuries of Christian advocacy and apologetics. I suggest further 6) importance of the cosmic functions of Christ and 7) the underlying assumptions of all the New Testament literature.

Evidence of the Names He Bears

The New Testament directly assigns names and titles for Christ, and name-like words, proper only for one who is God. Some very valuable treatments of the whole of Christology organize the data entirely about His names and titles.

1. He is called God. The most unambiguous possible designation of deity in the Greek New Testament is theos (God) with the article ho (the). Depending on the grammatical construction or emphasis, the same degree of clarity prevails without the article. In New Testament Greek, names usually have the definite article prefixed. When not accompanied by the article standard usage required a reason.

I shall rely heavily on the study of the late R. E. Brown, a renowned Roman Catholic scholar, for the technical dimensions of this matter.⁶

There are three passages which explicitly use theos of Jesus. I shall employ the kjv, precisely because it helpfully represents the distinction between second person singular (thee, thou) and plural (ye, you), which most recent Versions do not.

First is Hebrews 1:8, 9, which quotes the LXX of Psalm 45:6, 7. Our interest is in, 'But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever.' 'O God' translates ho theos, indicating deity in the most specific manner possible in Greek. It is clearly a vocative (mode of address) in the quoted LXX, parallel with the preceding verse where God is addressed 'O Mighty One.' Apparently the biases of some translators of the rsv New Testament 1952, emboldened them to turn the vocative noun into an attributive adjective ('thy divine throne'). But even the neb perpetuated 'O God' and the same is still in the Revised English Bible and now the powers that be of publication have got religion and have restored an honest 'O God' in the New Revised Standard Version!

The second is John 20:28 where Thomas, face to face for the first time with the risen Christ, addresses Him, 'My Lord and my God!' Brown comments:

This is the clearest example in the NT of the use of 'God' for Jesus ... The scene is designed to serve as a climax to the Gospel ... one at last gives expression to an adequate faith in Jesus ... applying to Jesus the Greek equivalent of two terms applied to the God of the OT ... in Psalm 35:23 where the Psalmist cries out: ‘My God and my Lord [Adonai].’ No devout Jew would have said it; or recorded it; nor would Jesus have approved it as he immediately did or have failed to rebuke it if not a true statement.⁷

The third is John 1:1, ‘and the Word was God.’ As we saw earlier John 1:14 and Revelation 19:11 ff. show exactly what the statement means. I quote the comment (probably by F. F. Bruce) in the Christianity Today article cited earlier.

Much is made by Arian amateur grammarians [‘Jehovah’s Witnesses’] of the omission of the definite article [here theos does not have it]. Such an omission is common with nouns in a precative [i.e. in a prayer] construction. To have used it would have equated the Word and the Word only with God, whereas without it the force is ‘And the Word was Himself God’ ... ⁸

There are several other texts which many scholars hold certainly employ theos or ho theos as designation for Jesus. Among these the strongest are Romans 9:5; Titus 2:13; 1 John 5:20, 21; Colossians 2:2; 2 Thessalonians 1:12; and 2 Peter 1:1. Also probably John 1:18 and more obscurely Galatians 2:20 (there is a textual difficulty) and Acts 20:28.

A problem arises. The word ‘God’ is occasionally used of some of God’s creatures (angels and men) and occasionally in the Hebrew Old Testament as a kind of superlative, as in ‘mountains of God’ for high mountains (Ps. 36:6) or ‘garden of God’ (Ezek. 31:8, 9) for a fine garden, or a very strong man (Ezek. 31:11; ‘mighty’ in Hebrew is ‘el, God), etc. Does this weaken or invalidate the argument we propose? Jesus Himself seems to exacerbate the problem as reported in John 10:32–36 (though this is really ad hominem, debating the opponent on his own ground). He is alluding to the fact that in the Hebrew Bible local Israelite magistrates (judges), in several Old Testament passages, are called ‘the gods’ (‘elohim’) (Exod. 21:6; 22:8, 9, 28). The simple explanation is that the magistrate (Rom. 12:1) in civil government stands in God’s place, viz.: Deuteronomy 19:17. In controversies ‘both parties ... shall appear before the Lord, before the priests and the judges who are in office in those days.’ Judges (called elohim in Exod. 21) ‘judge not for man but for the Lord’ (2 Chr. 19:6); ‘the judgment is God’s’ (Deut. 1:17; cf. Isa. 3:13–15; Mic. 3:1–4; Jer. 22:1–4).

2. Jesus is called the ‘Son of God.’ This is common throughout the New Testament. That Jesus plainly approved of the name, exuberantly joyous that Peter confessed ‘the name’ (Matt. 16:16–19), makes Peter’s ‘confession’ of high importance to the proper use of the name. On occasion Scripture refers to an ordinary human being as a son of God, or in plural as sons of God. Adam is listed in Jesus’ genealogies as ‘the son of God’ (Luke 3:38; English only, not in Greek). There is no ambiguity about Luke’s meaning—created by God. But as used in the Land of Israel in Jesus’ time, ‘the Son of God’ or ‘the Christ, the Son of God’ meant ‘God’ as in Peter’s confession. To use it of one’s self was considered blasphemy (Matt. 26:63–66; John 5:18; 10:33–36; 19:6, 7). kjv is formally correct at Acts 4:30, ‘thy holy child [emphasis added] Jesus’ though niv ‘your holy servant [emphasis added] Jesus’ helps the reader see the reference to Isaiah’s prophecy of the Servant of Jehovah (Isa. 42–53, esp. 53:11, ‘my righteous servant’).

3. Jesus is called ‘only begotten Son [emphasis added]’ of God (mo-no-gen-ēs huios, John

1:18—translated ‘only begotten Son’ in the kjv and most descended Versions). This familiar name, found also in John 3:16, has been the basis of some misunderstandings. Understood as though derived from gennao, to beget, the ancient church set forth the orthodox doctrine of the eternal begetting of the Son by the Father. This doctrine was formulated to protect the eternity of the Son of God. The Arians and their imitators through the centuries have used the phrase to prove the Son of God had a beginning in time. The Mormons have a doctrine that the Father in a literal physical way begat the Son. In recent times it has been proposed the word monogenēs is derived from mono (only, one, etc.) and genos (family, kind, kindred, race, etc). Hence, ‘only one of his kind,’ i.e. unique. Thus the niv has ‘one and only’ and the esv ‘only God’ and ‘only Son’ in these passages. Jesus Christ then, according to this widely accepted view, is God’s unique Son. Angels are His sons by creation, as is also Adam (Job 38:7; Luke 3:38). In the sense of mediate creation all men are God’s genos (family, kindred, Acts 17:28). Jesus, however, is the Son of God in a sense that no other is. Not every conservative scholar agrees that unique or only is the precise sense of monogenēs. Yet this use of the word monogenēs in this sense is confirmed by Hebrews 11:17 where Isaac, brother of Ishmael, is called monogenēs. He was not an only begotten son, for Abraham begat Ishmael several years earlier and begat several more later (Gen. 25:1, 2; 1 Chr. 1:32), but he was a special son, enjoying a unique relationship to Abraham not shared by his older brother or his younger brothers.

4. Jesus is called Lord (ku-ri-os). The disciples customarily addressed Him this way, but perhaps only as a courtesy title like Sir or the German Herr so-and-so. The Hebrew word Adhon, translated lord, is such a title. Slightly modified in Adhonai, it is an unmistakable title for the Almighty. And these words, through the Septuagint, come into the New Testament translated ‘Lord.’ The personal name of the God of Israel in written Hebrew is YHWH. We have no certain knowledge of the vowels because ancient Hebrews ceased to pronounce the name, substituting the name Adhonai (Lord). The vowels of Adhonai were supplied to the Hebrew consonants in the written text; hence the word Jehovah of the English ‘Authorized Version.’ Yet no one can be sure Yahweh is correct either. The LXX uniformly renders the tetragrammeton (YHWH, Jehovah) by kurios and is therefore the prevalent referent. So it is in the New Testament. Unless there are clear contextual reasons, as in 1 Peter 3:6 (‘Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him lord [kurion]’), New Testament use refers to the one true God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. (See Exodus 3:13–16.)

The prevalent use of kurios for Christ begins with the angel’s announcement to the shepherds’ ... a Savior, who is Christ the Lord [Christos kurios]’ (Luke 2:11). Jesus appropriated it (e.g. John 13:13), Paul employed it (Rom. 10:9) and prophesied universal acknowledgment of this name for Jesus Christ (Phil. 2:10).

Two important passages of Scripture enforce the certainty that the kurios of the New Testament is the Jehovah (YHWH) or Lord of the Old Testament. The first is probable; the second unmistakable. 1) The first is plain in the niv rendering of Romans 10:9a, ‘That if you confess with your mouth, “Jesus is Lord”.’ It does not say, ‘address Jesus as Lord (sir)’ but ‘is Lord (kurios)’ the uniform name for Israel’s God, spelled all capitals in kjv, niv, etc., Lord throughout the Old Testament. This name specifically designates the Jehovah (kjv) of the Old Testament. 2) The second is John 12:37–41. It comes at the very end of Jesus’ public ministry, immediately before the Lord’s Passion and death. John is summarizing all of Jesus’ ministry of words and works. He says the rejection by the nation is fulfillment of Isaiah’s prophecy (Isa. 53:1; cf. John 12:38). He says Israel’s refusal to believe the message of Jesus' many miracles is fulfillment of Isaiah 53:1. John attributes the cause to the hardening of the people's hearts rendering faith impossible and that this also was prophesied by the same Isaiah (Isa. 6:9, 10) at the time of Isaiah's commissioning vision of Jehovah in the temple (See John 12:40, 41). Then the crux of the matter: John says in verse 41 the Lord (Kurios, YHWH) of Isaiah's vision (Isa. 6:1, 3, 8, 11, 12), before whom the seraphim cry 'Holy, holy, holy' is none other than Jesus: 'Isaiah said these things because he saw his glory (i.e. Jesus' glory, as the niv interprets correctly) and spoke of him'.

The New Testament use of these four names, God, Son of God, only begotten Son, and Lord (Kurios) and supporting information are sufficient to establish beyond question that the names of Jesus Christ imply His full deity.

Scholarly criticism of recent generations, up to and including the authors of The Myth of God Incarnate and the Jesus Seminar, do not deny this. But this is the mythical Jesus, say the critics, produced by the 'creative reflections' of the first generations of Christians. I have read by now, I suppose, thousands of pages written by these busy denizens of apostate seminary faculties, religion departments of universities—and sadly—by some doubting Thomases in evangelical groups. I have followed the evolution of this debate through the last forty-some years in Journal of Biblical Literature articles and reviews, also in the literature of Christology and The Life of Christ without gaining many insights to the true meaning of Jesus. The arguments employed change every generation. For the past three or four decades they have changed as fast as graduate schools of religion could deposit new doctoral theses. To pursue these matters for purposes of professional scholarship, perhaps even apologetics, is of some value, but for theology Malcom Muggeridge's autobiography comes to mind: 'Chronicles of Wasted Time'.

Further New Testament evidence of the deity of Christ in His names is quite extensive. He is called 'the Lord of glory [emphasis added]' (1 Cor. 2:8); in Psalm 24:1, 8–10 'the Lord of glory' is Jehovah. He is called 'the Holy One [emphasis added]' (Acts 3:14 kjv), who in Hosea 11:9 is 'God and not a man, the Holy One.' Jesus is 'the first and the last [emphasis added]' (Rev. 1:17, 18; 2:8), the 'Lord of hosts' in Isaiah 44:6. (Note a plurality in the Godhead in this verse, as also Isa. 48:12–16). Our Lord Jesus says, I am 'Alpha and Omega [emphasis added]' (a Greek equivalent of A to Z in our alphabet, Rev 1:8 kjv; 22:13, 16). This is a cryptic way of saying, 'the first and the last.' The sonorous, rolling clauses of Psalm 90:1, 2 (kjv) may be applied directly to the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ: 'even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God.'

Attributes of Deity Assigned to Christ

The New Testament affirms attributes of Christ (directly and indirectly) that properly belong to God alone.

It is not appropriate to introduce here the problem of whether God's essence is knowable through divine attributes or not. Our only interest is to show that granting the theistic position, Christ is presented in the New Testament as possessing the attributes of the God of theism. If this is true, then we have a Christian theism. Since the attributes of personality, as such, are not in question—both God and man have them—we present discussion only of those attributes that are distinctive to God.

Jesus' several statements of His oneness with the Father bear upon this subject, especially John 16:15, 'All that the Father has is mine.' This is a stupendous claim. Nothing could be greater. This explains why in the previous verse (John 16:14) He could say that the work of the Holy Spirit is to glorify Christ: 'He will glorify me, for he will take what is mine and declare it to you.' Beyond Christ there is nothing to know about the character of God (John 14:9).

1. Christ possessed the attribute of self-existence. 'In him was life' (John 1:4)—in context this is a claim of divine life. 'I am ... the life' (John 14:6) does not say 'I have' but 'I am.' These verses must be understood against the background of the name Jehovah (YaHWeH) as explained in Exodus 3:13–15 and 6:2–9. 'Before Abraham was, I am' (John 8:58). The I Am of the burning bush is the same with the Lord Jesus Christ.

Peter informed the crowd at Pentecost, 'Ye killed the prince of life'—a paradoxical statement to be explained in relation to the divine purposes of the incarnation (see Matt. 20:28).

A problem is posed by Jesus' saying: 'For as the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son also to have life in himself (John 5:26). Does this teach a doctrine of derived existence? Does it undercut the above statement of self-existence (aseity)?

There are two possible solutions to the problem. The more usual, and I think satisfactory, is that this describes the Father's act in giving life-in-Himself to Jesus as man. Self-existence could, by its very nature, be assigned only to One to whom it is germane, whose it properly is. This could never be a mere creature.

Another view holds that this and similar texts are referring to an economic (i.e. a matter of procedures) subordination of the Son to the Father which is eternal and is consistent with substantial equality as asserted in the great ecumenical creeds and definitions. (Dr Vincent Taylor devoted an immensely productive lifetime to this and other Christological doctrine. I furnish his very valuable discussion of this problem as an appendix to chapter 5.)

2. The New Testament affirms Christ possessed all God's attributes of immensity. He is eternal, unchangeable, omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, perfect (nothing lacking) and incomprehensible.

a. Christ is eternal. Some of the passages which apply say: the Christ, as son of David, is to be called 'Everlasting Father [emphasis added]' (Isa. 9:6); in God's house 'the son remains for ever' (John 8:35); eternal life is in God's Son (1 John 5:11; 1 John 1:2). Joined with texts affirming Christ's eternal preexistence the evidence is unmistakable. And it is interrelated to the doctrine of the Trinity (q.v.). 'Those who reject the one as speculation reject also the other.'⁹ To refine the idea of eternal-eternity: as used of God it means without beginning or end, of created things, without end.

The early church debated this matter vigorously. I have discussed this matter somewhat in connection with the Trinity. New Testament Greek words for begotten, became, born, first born, first begotten seemed to indicate the Son of God had a beginning, some said, and had to be applied scripturally and understood Christologically when applied to One whom plain text said was an eternal Being, in the sense that God is eternal. I shall supply an appendix on this subject. Of these the most serious problem arises with first born (protōtokos). Those which refer to Him as Mary's prōtotokos create no problem. The problem texts are: Rom. 8:29; Col. 1:15; Col. 1:18; cf. Ps. 89:27; Heb. 1:6; 12:23; Rev. 1:5. Colossians 1:15, the ‘firstborn of all creation’ is superficially the most likely to suggest Christ is a creature brought into existence before any other created beings. Several ancient heretical teachers and groups taught just that. Literally, first born of course means the first offspring produced by a male or female parent whether man or beast (Gen. 25:25 LXX; Luke 2:7, and several other examples). The literally ‘born first’ son was ordinarily heir of the family fortune and prior in position as well as order of birth. The sense of first in position is the sense in all the passages related to Christ, except the ones relating to birth by Mary. Even as first-born from the dead (Col. 1:18; and Rom. 1:5) this seems to be the case. In Colossians 1:15 and 18 Paul borrows the language of Psalm 89:27 (LXX) where the positional sense is indisputable.

b. Christ is unchangeable. In the familiar statement of Hebrews 13:8 (‘Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and for ever’), though the name of the historic Jesus is used, it is clear the preexistent Person is meant. Similarly, Hebrews 1:10–12 shows the eternal Logos changed His position, but not His Person.

c. Christ is omnipresent. Jesus promised His disciples to be with them always (Matt. 18:20) and in the midst of every Christian gathering (Matt. 18:20); yet paradoxically, He has ascended to heaven to stay for awhile (Acts 3:21). He is ‘all, and in all’ (Col. 3:11). Since Jesus in His body ascended to heaven most Christians affirm that though He is ‘really’ present, especially in the memorial sacrament, He is so spiritually in the divine nature only.

A body by reason of the permanent character of all bodies is always local and in one place at a time with limited spatial relationships. Jesus’ body is now in heaven to stay for awhile (Acts 3:21; cf. 1:6–11). Yet He Himself is really present as a Person with His church and stands beside His missionaries, as the texts say. To support Luther’s insistence on the material presence of Christ’s body and blood ‘in, with and under’ the Eucharistic elements, many Lutherans have taught that while the body of Christ is not omnipresent (present everywhere), it is ubiquitous (present anywhere) when the Eucharist is enacted truly. Certain views of the church make more than our Lord intended by the vivid figure of the church as Christ’s body, speaking of it very erroneously as a ‘continuation of the incarnation.’ Though widespread and persistent, both of these ideas lack the general endorsement of most orthodox theologians and I think are without any clear biblical support. A reading of reports of discussions between Lutherans and Calvinists of the Reformation era show, in my judgment, why no Lutherans have ever convinced any I know of except other Lutherans of the ‘ubiquity’ doctrine and I have personal knowledge of convinced Lutheran leaders who disagree with this teaching, opting for real, spiritual, personal presence in the elements of communion. Christ was with Israel personally and spiritually in the Exodus time, hence He is quite able to be with us in the same way today.

d. Christ was Omniscient. Though Colossians 2:3 says, ‘in whom are hidden all the treasures ... of ... knowledge’ and the disciples were convinced Jesus knew everything (John 16:30) and numerous New Testament reports illustrate His unusual knowledge (John 2:24, 25; 4:16–19; 6:4; 21:6; Rev. 2:2, 9, 13; 3:1, 8, 15; Matt. 17:24–7; Luke 5:22), a question arises: Are these passages sufficient to prove He was all-knowing in the state of humiliation?

There is a special mystery in this connection, for the Gospels seem to present Him as occasionally without information or seeking information. Certain of these cases involve no problem of omniscience, because a didactic purpose is involved. For example, His instruction to the Samaritan woman to call her non-existent husband (John 4:16) really demonstrates knowledge rather than ignorance, as well as a didactic purpose. See also John 6:5, 6. There may be texts that do demonstrate ignorance on some point, though all have been challenged by someone or other. If so, the explanation is to be found in the kenosis or humiliation of Christ, to be treated later in connection with the incarnation.

A special case is Mark 13:32: ‘But concerning that day or that hour, no one knows, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father.’ Certain theologians, however, except this from ‘kenosis’ treatment in the following manner:

Bengel, on Mark 13:32, adopts the explanation favored by Augustine, ‘Christ’s words may be understood to mean, that he does not know the time of the judgment day, because it was not among his instructions from the Father to declare the time. An apostle was able both to know and not to know one and the same thing, according to the different point of view (‘I know that I shall abide,’ Phil. 1:25): how much more Christ?’ cf. Paul’s ‘I know not’ in [Phil. 1:22] 2 Cor. 2:2, to ‘know’ means to ‘make known.’ ‘I determined to know nothing among you but Christ and him crucified.’ The same is the meaning of ‘know’ in Gen. 22:12: ‘Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son from me.’ God had made Abraham’s faith to be known, by his trial.¹⁰

Some neo-orthodox writers today, while acknowledging His full deity, not infrequently assert that Jesus’ omniscience was fully conditioned by His humanity in such a way as to be practically eliminated. In this way His authority on historical and literary questions is undermined.¹¹ The omniscience of the glorified Christ, as in Revelation 2:2, 9, 13; 3:1, 8, 15, etc., is acknowledged. It is the ‘days of his flesh’ on earth that are under question. These writers assert that His superior knowledge was only such as prophets have.

On purely doctrinal grounds it must be asserted on the contrary that if He was truth (John 14:6), then, as the perfect Savior, He never believed or taught error, or entered into complicity with it in any way (‘If it were not so, would I have told you,’ John 14:2). This is not to deny the mystery involved in Luke 2:52 (‘increased in wisdom’). See later discussion of this question in connection with the incarnation.

e. Christ was Omnipotent. As in the case of omniscience, certain problems will be reserved for later discussion. If one accepts His essential deity on the grounds of direct statements, treated earlier, omnipotence logically follows. Yet as in the case of omniscience and omnipresence there are legitimate questions as to whether He employed these attributes of His divine nature in the state of humiliation. There is no doubt He claimed equality with God in power (John 5:19). He is called Pantokratōr, Almighty, in Revelation (1:8; 22:12, 13). He demonstrated power such as only God has, over disease, death, the freaks of nature as the familiar Gospel stories illustrate. He even had full power, He said, over His own human existence (John 2:19, 20; 10:18).

f. The Perfection of Christ, without any conceivable shortcoming or limit is clearly taught, for example in Colossians 1:19 and 2:3, 9, 10 and Ephesians 3:8.

g. Finally Christ is said to possess the divine attribute of incomprehensibility. This is not to say Christ (or God) cannot be known adequately, by us sinners. It is to say that there is now and forever will be a plus ultra, more beyond. John 17:3 is clear that our possession of eternal life guarantees adequate knowledge of God and Christ. Christ claimed as Man fully to know the Father (Matt. 11:27) while Paul affirms the ‘riches of Christ’ are ‘unsearchable’ (Eph. 3:8) and the love of Christ for us ‘surpasses’ our ‘knowledge’ (Eph. 3:19).

3. Christ possesses the moral attributes of God. The Bible never makes a list of God’s moral attributes. It does however, in our Lord’s own words, affirm that only God is ‘good’ (Matt. 19:17, cf. Mark 10:18, Gr. agathos the opposite of evil, ponēros; Matt. 5:45). All the goodness of God is Christ’s also—goodness in absolute degree. ‘For in him the whole fullness of deity dwells bodily’ (Col. 2:9 en auto katoikei pan to plērōma tēs theotētos sōmatikōs). In context this plērōma consists of those excellencies of God which an incipient ‘gnosticism,’ through false philosophy (v. 8) would affirm has nothing in common with men in bodies. But Christ Jesus has this fully as a human being with a body.

The way to see this perfect goodness is to read the Gospels. It is there seen in action.

It is proper also to note that moral excellencies can be analyzed and given names. Thus as God is holy, true, loving, righteous, faithful and merciful, so is Christ the Lord.

These virtues become in Him practical arguments for His Godhead of greater, personal, convincing weight to sinners whose hearts God has touched, than the proof texts for the metaphysical attributes. Like all truth of a basic sort, here truth is its own strongest argument: ‘O, taste and see that the Lord is good!’ (Ps. 34:8).

¹ ‘Two Laymen on Christ’s Deity,’ Christianity Today (December 18, 1964), p. 11.

² B.B. Warfield, art. ‘Person of Christ’ (1915), ISBE v. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1943), pp. 2338–2348.

³ B.B. Warfield, art. ‘The Deity of Christ’ The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth, ii, chap. x (Los Angeles: The Bible Institute of Los Angeles, 1917), pp. 239–246.

⁴ B.B. Warfield, The Person and Work of Christ (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1950), pp. 6, 7.

⁵ R. A. Cole, art. ‘Christology,’ Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, i ed. Merrill C. Tenney (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975), p. 805.

⁶ R. E. Brown, ‘Does the New Testament Call Jesus God,’ Theological Studies, xxvi, 4, Dec., 1965. [I have not listed any journals or magazines in bibliography, RDC.]

⁷ Brown, ibid.

⁸ ‘Two Laymen on Christ’s Deity.’ Christianity Today (December 18, 1964), p. 16.

⁹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, The Person of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1954), p. 184.

¹⁰ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1894), p. 276 footnote.

¹¹ Vincent Taylor, The Person of Christ In New Testament Teaching (London: Macmillan Co., 1958), pp. 104, 105.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (445). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

5

The Deity of Christ (II): Works, Claims, Honors, Assumptions, Position of Deity

Christ's Works Exclusively and Uniquely of God Alone

Christ performed works that are exclusively within God's power and privilege. This is related to the attributes of omniscience and omnipotence.

We do not here speak of miracles which may be wrought by communicated power [such as the many miracles of Elijah and Elisha], but of such works as creation of the world, upholding of all things, the final raising of the dead, and the judging of all men. Power to perform these works cannot be delegated, for they are characteristic of omnipotence.¹

Some of these works began in eternity past and are usually treated in connection with the doctrine of God's works and Christ's preexistence. 1) That He 'created all things' has been noted (John 1:3; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:10; 3:3, 4; cf. Rev. 3:14) as also that 2) 'in him all things hold together' (preservation) (Col. 1:17 rsv; see also Heb. 1:3). The forces of the world of space, time, energy and matter, such as mass attraction, centripetal and centrifugal force, which we call the laws of nature, 'are the habits of Christ, and nature is one organic whole, so that we can speak of a universe.'² 3) He also directs the course of history in what theology calls divine governance or providence. This is the sense of Hebrews 1:2, 'Through whom [Christ] he [God] made the ages' (nasv margin). 'Worlds' or 'ages' here is the plural of aiōn, which has been appropriated in English as 'eon.' So God through the Son made 'the eons' of geological time or of any other measurement. Thus the four works of God as regards the created universe except for decrees (predestination), which in Scripture is the distinct work of the Father, are all ascribed to Christ. In the symbolism of the Revelation it is the Lamb who has sole right to open the seven-sealed book of the consummation of history (Rev. 5:5) and whose agents say 'Come!' to the four horsemen of conquest, war, famine and death (Rev. 6:1, 5, 7, 9). The Lamb also comforts the martyrs in heaven (Rev. 6:9–17) and frightens 'those who dwell on the earth [emphasis added]' even while He seals the servants of God for their safety (Rev. 7:1–4).

Other distinctly divine prerogatives and powers assigned to Christ follow: 4) authority to forgive sin, a distinctly divine prerogative (Isa. 43:25), was manifest early in His public ministry in a very bold move (Mark 2:5–12), 5) power to bestow eternal life (John 10:28) and even to raise the dead—in the present age (Lazarus, John 11:25–44) and at the ‘last day’ (John 5:21, 28, 29), a power inherently His according to John 5:21, not by delegated authority such as some clergy claim for the forgiving of sin. The New Testament makes a strong point of the fact that 6) Christ will be the presiding Judge in final judgment (John 5:22, 27; Acts 10:42; 17:31; and Matt. 25:31–46). Believers, who in some sense will share in this function (1 Cor. 6:3), are nevertheless to face Christ as their Judge after life on earth is over (2 Cor. 5:10).

Two other types of acts of omniscience and omnipotence are directed toward the aid of the believing church, namely 7) Jesus Himself builds and supports the church (Matt. 16:18; Eph. 4), and 8) He hears and answers prayer (John 14:14). All of these works of omnipotence and omniscience by nature belong to God alone as the Lord Himself argues at Isaiah 40:28.

The Claims, Honors, Assumptions and Deity of Christ Throughout the New Testament

Christ made claims that clearly imply He thought of Himself as ‘equal with the Father.’

This clear fact of Scripture is downplayed in the literature of current Gospels and New Testament criticism. Even some writers otherwise orthodox seem to fall over one another to deny He made any high claims for Himself. What did Jesus really think of Himself? The New Testament critics differ among themselves on many questions but most seem to agree on this matter. I cite the word of one reputed authority:

The days are happily gone when that problem could be discussed in terms of ‘the claims of Christ.’ It is not only that the titles of dignity he used or accepted—Messiah, Son of Man, Son of God—are of doubtful meaning; the phrase itself is misleading, and even offensive. Jesus was not concerned to make ‘claims’ for himself. It was God and God’s Kingdom that he preached. The Gospels have preserved for us a few intense utterances which give us passing glimpses into the mystery of his inner soul. We have to pass from the outer to the inner, and try to form some idea of how he judged his place and person from the total impress of his work and mission.³

It would be interesting to know by what name this author, whose own views are favorable to the doctrine of Christ’s deity, would treat the following scriptural data if ‘claims’ are to be eschewed. Based on radical views of the origin of the Gospels this author and many others eliminate from the Gospels all direct claims or statements that Christ is God. This is supposed to have been an idea that only gradually dawned in the church’s consciousness in later times—according to this class of interpreters.

The following remarks are directed to those who accept the Gospels as true and are acquainted with their contents, citing references but not quoting them. Any one who doubts may look up the verses in any standard Version and will find the assertions supported.

1. Jesus claimed authority over the laws of God and God’s institutions on earth. Examples are the temple of God (Matt. 12:16), the holy Sabbath (Matt. 12:8), the law of God—think of His several ‘Moses said, but I say’ pronouncements (Matt. 5:31–34, 38, 39 with 7:28, 29) and even the kingdom of God (Matt. 16:19).

2. Jesus claimed to be the true object of saving faith. Men are to believe on Him just as they do the Father (John 14:1), as He said in a very solemn moment. Eternal life depends on knowing the Father and the Son of God (John 17:3)—the basis for Peter’s claim, ‘there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved’ (Acts 4:12). Sometimes He points to Himself as the one true object of faith and devotion, saying, ‘Come unto me [emphasis added]’ (Matt. 11:28; John 3:36), ‘love me [emphasis added]’ (John 14:15). All other loyalties and ties of devotion on this earth are to yield to Him (Matt. 10:37–39)—no other gods on the shelf of idols. They must all come down and be trashed. God in Christ will not share His glory with another (Isa. 42:8; 48:11). These passages are conditioned by others wherein His power and glory are ‘with the Father’ (see John 17:5) where ‘with’ is Gr. para, alongside, i.e. equally. He Himself is the special Revealer of the Father, being the Author of each believer’s faith, for He alone knows the Father and is the Way to Him (Matt. 11:25, 26; John 14:6).

3. He claimed to meet fully in Himself all the deepest needs of humanity. Not surprisingly most reports of these claims are in John’s Gospel, designed to make believers of sinners (John 20:31). ‘Come to me, all who labor and are heavy laden’ (Matt. 11:28) says it all. In Christ those who come will find ‘rest for your souls’ (Matt. 11:28, 29). They will find the way to the Father God (John 14:19) and the ‘way’ to God (14:6), ‘the light of the world’ (8:12), ‘the water’ of ‘life’ (4:14; 7:37), ‘the bread of life’ (6:35, 51), ‘the good shepherd’ of souls (10:11) and the assurance of a voice they know (10:4–6), guidance (10:11; cf. Ps. 23), assurance of life forever (11:25, 26), fruitful living (15:5) and eternal safety in the ‘Father’s hand’ (10:28, 29).

It has been said that Jesus really didn’t make any claims for Himself (see earlier quotation from Cave). The exact contrary is true. If, of course, we eliminate the book of John as giving us the theological formulation of the second century (as in the Tübingen School) or as giving us the constructive theology of the Ephesian church in the late first century (cf. V. Taylor, Person of Christ and others), then the force of Jesus’ claims is reduced. Even then it is not eliminated. See K. S. Latourette’s treatment of Jesus and His effect on subsequent history.⁴

4. Christ received honor and worship due only to God. From a certain standpoint the whole Old Testament is designed to promote the idea that worship properly is directed only to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the ‘God, Most High’ of Melchizedek and of all the cognomens of the Song of Moses (Deut. 32). The New Testament assumes that idea is correct and only occasionally reminds readers of it (Acts 10:25, 26; 12:21–23; 14:11–14; Matt. 4:8–10; Rev. 22:8, 9), but then directs that single eye of valid worship toward Christ. Sometimes He merely accepted worship (Matt. 14:31–33; 15:25–28; 28:9, 10, 16–18; John 19:35–39) but on others He *demand*ed it (John 5:23) and the Father commanded even the angels to worship Christ (Heb. 1:6). The whole of creation will yet unite in worshipping Him (Phil. 2:10, 11; Rev. 5:9–14).

5. The deity of Christ is an assumption underlying every sentence in the New Testament. The abundance and prevalence of this assumption increases the difficulty of stating it. It is similar to the abundance and prevalence of salt in the seas of the world. Taste it, it is salty; weigh it in scales; test it by chemical analysis; bathe in it; boil a pot dry and perform these experiments in the Black Sea or the Gulf of Alaska; always, everywhere it contains salt and lots of it. To this point it is written in volume II of the famous The Fundamentals:

The deity of Christ is in solution in every page of the New Testament. Every word that is spoken of Him, every word which He is reported to have spoken of Himself, is spoken on the assumption that He is God. And this is the reason why the ‘criticism’ which addresses itself to eliminating the testimony of the New Testament to the deity of our Lord has set itself a hopeless task. The New Testament itself would have to be eliminated. Nor can we get behind this testimony. Because the deity of Christ is the presupposition of every word of the New Testament, it is impossible to select words out of the New Testament from which to construct earlier documents in which the deity of Christ shall not be assumed.⁵

This has not kept the literary magicians of Formgeschichte, Redaktionsgeschichte, the Bultmannians and their successors of the ‘Jesus Seminar’ from casting a ‘trajectory’ of Gospel fragments from Jesus and His friends through an assumed development from Jewish Christianity to Gentile Christianity to creation of a mythical divine messiah. At the present time, though many academics are consulting, competing for attention and publishing, not many Bible readers are listening. They have not erased the integrity of the New Testament. They have no evidence outside the New Testament and that is all against them. It cannot be suppressed in even the words of Jesus. His commonest self-designation is Son of Man. As such, Jesus’ words, ‘the Son of Man’ sends out, not God’s angels, but ‘his angels,’ any or all of them. At the Son of Man’s behest the angels gather ‘his elect’ and ‘all causes of sin and all law-breakers, and throw them into the fiery furnace’ (Matt. 13:41, 42; 16:27; 24:31). This language cannot be expelled from the Jesus story nor explained by any theory except that He Himself said them. They have no appearance of being contrived to prove a point.

Dip into the waters of the New Testament ocean anywhere and this is what comes up in the bucket. The New Testament does not overtly prove the deity of its Subject, it presupposes it!

Even the National Council of Churches to date has not been inclined officially to deny the deity of Christ in its formal constitutional documents. The reason being, I suspect, that they have not found a way to do that without expelling both the New Testament and historic Christianity. As long as people read the New Testament, in or out of school, the conviction will remain with them that the New Testament is a gospel of Jesus Christ and a revelation of Him and that Jesus Christ is ‘very God of very God’ just as the creed affirms. Few will so decide on formally assembled inductive evidences or deductive syllogisms. To quote a wise author once more:

We do not need to wait to analyse the ground of our convictions, any more than we need to analyse our food before it nourishes us; and we can soundly believe on evidence much mixed with error, just as we can thrive on food far from pure. The alchemy of the mind, as of the digestive tract, knows how to separate out from the mass what it requires for its support; and as we may live without any knowledge of chemistry so we may possess earnest convictions, without the slightest knowledge of logic.⁶

Hence the evidence one offers for belief in the deity of Christ may be inadequate and poorly stated, even though the evidence on which the faith rests may be irresistible.

6. The cosmic position and functions of the Christ of the New Testament testify to His Godhead. We may be brief. ‘[God] put all things (ta panta) under his feet, and gave him as head over all things [ta panta].’ He is ‘the fullness [to plērōma] of him [God] who fills all in all’ (Eph. 1:22, 23). ‘[I]n him all things [ta panta] hold together' (Col. 1:17). 'For in him the whole fullness of deity dwells bodily' (Col. 2:9), and 'who is the head of all rule and authority' (Col. 2:10). Stephen sees him at the right hand of God (Acts 7:55). He is the 'brightness' (apaugasma) of God's glory and the 'express image' (charactēr) of God's 'person' (hypostasis) (Heb. 1:3 kjv). My mind cherishes the hours spent listening to lectures on those Greek words in seminary days and later acquainting myself with them in the Christian exegesis, theology and speculation through the ages. No one can acquaint himself with Christ's universal, cosmic position and function without knowing in his heart, such a Being is no less than God. Reject the conclusion if you wish, but in doing so also reject the New Testament.

Appendix I

Vincent Taylor on the Economic Subordination of the Eternal Son

After affirming that 'Christ is the divine Son of God in a relationship ... of being and nature' Dr Taylor writes:

Nevertheless, along with this exalted teaching, the same intractable element of subordination which we have already encountered in the Pauline Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews appears also in the Fourth Gospel. Indeed, it is present in a more emphatic form. Jesus is 'sanctified' and 'sent' into the world by the Father (John 10:36; cf. 17:18). His divine life, His authority to execute judgement, and His glory are all the Father's gifts (5:21f., 26f.; 17:22). The charge to lay down His life He has received from the Father (10:18). 'I can of myself do nothing' He says (5:30), and explicitly He declares, 'The Father is greater than I' (14:28). It is not possible to explain these sayings convincingly as reflecting the conditions of the incarnate life of Christ, for unlike St Paul the Evangelist does not think of that life as one of humiliation, except in so far as he thinks of the departure of the Son from the world as His glorifying (17:1, 5; 13:32). In the sayings quoted above, the context shows that in each case Christ is thinking of His glory as maintained during the conditions of His life on earth. In the same moment that He speaks of being consecrated and sent by the Father He asks if His claim to be the Son of God is regarded as blasphemy (10:36). His life-giving power, His authority to execute judgement, and His glory, although they are the Father's gifts, are divine aspects of the Son's incarnate life (cf. 5:21–27; 17:2). With reference to the Father's charge to lay down His life He says, 'I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again' (10:18). His statement that He can do nothing of Himself relates to His divine authority to execute judgement (5:30), and when He declares that the Father is greater than Himself, He is speaking of His going to Him (14:28). The subordination, then, is not merely a temporary condition which obtains while He lives on earth, but an eternal relationship which is manifested amid the conditions of His human existence.

The eternal character of this relationship accentuates the subordination, but it also gives a clue to its true nature. It belongs to relationships of love which are interior to the life of the Godhead. It is as far as possible from the 'subordinationism' of the Arian controversies and the 'adoptionism' current in Spain and France towards the close of the eighth century. It is not a servant and master relationship, or that of an inferior and a superior, but that of two in perfect unity in an eternal fellowship of love. It is a state of being in which direction is the function of the one and obedience is that of the other in a relationship of love which robs direction of superiority and obedience of inferiority. It is our limited experience of such a unity which leads us to think of obedience as servility and of direction as lordship. And yet we are not without some knowledge of this unity. Even in military relationships in moments of extreme danger, and sometimes in industrial associations of long standing, it can be reflected; most of all in the highest expressions of human love in which service is perfect freedom.⁷

Appendix II

Principles for Writing About Christology

By now readers know that this book of theology tries to get quickly to a positive presentation of a doctrine. Controversies over individual doctrines, history of the formation of individual loci and contemporary developments call for sufficient treatment to explain their part in the development of orthodox theology and to provide for systematic formulation of truth. What is true stands out for true in contrast to what is not true. We need to present as much as feasible about such matters but there are reasons why they are not major features here.

The best example in writing in this style may be John Calvin. Repeatedly he will obliquely or in summary fashion refer to some contemporary error, scholastic ‘conceit’ or ancient church Father’s writing. Yet he rarely develops any false and inadequate views fully; only when it contributes quickly and importantly to his own theologizing. He says his task is to expound ‘the whole sum of piety and whatever it is necessary to know in the doctrine of salvation.’ The Institutes he called ‘not a summa of theology but a summa of piety’—piety in the sense of praiseworthy devotion to God, a prerequisite for sound knowledge of God.⁸ He cuts himself short repeatedly ‘lest these remarks become unnecessarily prolix.’

We may emulate Paul’s single-minded brevity. He would declare to the elders ‘the whole counsel of God’ not keeping back ‘anything that was profitable.’ He would warn of ‘wolves’ from outside who would threaten to devour the flock and teachers ‘from among your own selves’ who would try to divide the flock (Acts 20:20, 27, 29, 30). Yet in none of his Epistles do we learn more than the barest fragment of what these errorists taught or who they were. Neither Calvin nor Paul unnecessarily advertized heresies in their specifically theological writings. Calvin wrote at length in debates over doctrine and Scripture interpretation of his time. One may read more lengthy explanations of the errors and heresies he had to meet in his tracts and treatises and the like, published quite separate from his systematic theology, that is, Institutes of the Christian Religion. The errors of his own and earlier times are referred to but not discussed in detail in the Institutes. These tracts and polemical treatises were addressed to the people of his time in a direct manner both to friends and to adversaries. Practical apologetics is not absent, but scanty in the Institutes. I think Calvin shows an admirable impatience with perverse and stupid purveyors of error and heresies in the Institutes, though he is sometimes criticized nowadays for dismissing them briskly.

It is difficult to follow this course in Christology even after one decides where Christology belongs among the loci of theology.

The doctrine of the deity of Christ is almost a fugitive among the loci in books of systematic theology. Sometimes it is treated in connection with the Trinity as part of the doctrine of God, sometimes as a sub-point of the doctrine of the incarnation and sometimes nearly skipped altogether. Those who do not confess sincerely with Peter that he is ‘the Christ, Son of the living God;’ with Thomas that He is Lord and God, and with the creeds ‘very God of very God’ can be expected to marshal arguments against it. Over the past 200 years they have furnished a vastly complicated literature, designed to destroy. Any one who devotes less than an enormous amount of time quickly gets lost.

The literature of this ‘Christology’ whether believing and conservative or unbelieving and radical, as well as the ranges in-between, is amazingly enormous and growing by the day. In the process of writing a 300-page book on The Life of Christ,⁹ an essay on Jesus’ parables in a festschrift for Homer Kent and two on Gospels-criticism, several shelves of books on Christ and the Gospels have grown in my library. Not long ago I conducted a seminar course on contemporary ‘Christologies.’ Each of the class of thirty-one wrote on a different Christology. Now a few years later we might have found that many more! Most of the views we discussed then are now already out of date and unimportant even among the critical ‘scholars’ who keep the ‘Jesus business’ operating in universities and seminars, publishing and selling ephemeral books.

It is no wonder then, that teachers and writers of Christology can be tempted to slight the timeworn themes, evidences, arguments of our predecessors in order to keep up the ‘exciting’ developments in Gospels-criticism and new ‘quests’ for the historical Jesus and other projects unproductive of substantive Christian theology.

Arguments against using the plain sense of the Bible, especially the New Testament, for the full deity of Christ as they have developed from the eighteenth-century Enlightenment to the present are chiefly five. 1) Jesus Himself did not make claims for Himself, even as reported in the Gospels, though some others in the story said He was God. 2) The parts of the Gospels in which the author or others in the story say He was God are mythological—fictitious, fabricated to support some religious opinion. 3) These mythological features are the creation of the early church after it became chiefly Hellenistic-Gentile in membership. The members brought the ‘incarnation’ myths of paganism with them into the church and Christianized them into the myths of God incarnate. 4) It is impossible for God to become, a man. God and man are on incommensurable levels of being (the incarnation is defined erroneously and declared impossible thereby). 5) Modern people know what previous generations did not, that the supernatural does not exist, or even if it does cannot be empirically verified, hence it cannot be accepted by thinking, educated, modern people as true.

These and other arguments have been effectively answered by conservative New Testament scholars. I recommend the chapters and bibliography in G. E. Ladd’s A Theology of the New Testament. Millard Erickson’s (Christian Theology, chap. 31) is helpful in laying out the critical approaches and answering the currently reigning theories as of 1980. Lewis and Demarest (Integrative Theology, II, chaps. 5 and 6) traces the history of heresies and criticism in an orderly manner. Their principles of theologizing emphasize these matters.

There are precedents for coming immediately to a positively constructed spiritual doctrine of our Lord's deity. Long before the early church formulated a doctrine of the Trinity or phrased a careful statement of the incarnation (they came more or less together in the fourth and fifth centuries—ad 325–431) the deity of Christ was 'believed, taught and confessed' (J. Pelikan) every time Christians met together for worship. 'The most primitive confession had been Jesus Christ is Lord [cites Rom. 10:9; Phil. 2:11] and its import had been elaborated and deepened in the apostolic age.'¹⁰ Of course they confessed His perfect manhood too. For the first confessors His humanity needed no proof, in fact that was all some of His enemies could see and it is still so today. It is no evidence of Ebionism to lay out clearly the scriptural evidences of His full deity, then move on to His humanity.

Our generation, largely without any veritable God 'in their thinking' worthy of worship but with multitudes of diminutive gods and goddesses of their own making, fleeting heroes and anti-heroes of sports and entertainment, need to meet the 'Alpha and Omega' whom John saw on Patmos. 'Jesus Christ ... is Lord to Christians in the same sense Jehovah was Lord to the Hebrews.... We have but one Lord: and Jesus Christ is Lord.'¹¹ The resurrection of the Lord assured their hearts He was 'the Son of God with power' (Rom. 1:3, 4). Said Bishop Charles Gore in the Bampton Lectures of 1891: 'The confession of Thomas after the resurrection ... "my Lord and my God" is no less representative than the earlier confession of Peter ... "Thou art the Christ of God,"—the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Gore goes on to say Matthew's record of Jesus' last words 'gave permanence and security to their highest thoughts of Him as Son of God, by formulating the name, or revelation of God for all time as "the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."' He says this persisted after Pentecost: 'The apostles had no doubt at all that Jesus Christ as Son of God was the summary object of faith and worship.'¹²

The following paragraph from a Christmas essay by an evangelical Christian philosopher (Ph.D.) errs in assuming the divine nature became also human nature: his philosophy is correct, but his definition of the incarnation incorrect. The divine Person, the Logos, added human nature to the Person. The natures are unmixed, though joined to the Person. I shall leave the author unidentified, Hardly any doctrine is more basic to biblical historic Christianity than the proposition that Jesus Christ was the God-man. When Jesus was born, God became incarnate. The Lord was still fully God and yet he became fully man. Philosophically, all this is utter nonsense and totally impossible. It isn't even conceivable. Historically, nonetheless, it is profoundly true and gloriously factual. Would it interest you to know that philosophically—more specifically, metaphysically or ontologically—this is utter nonsense? The fact of the matter is that according to all of which human reasoning is capable and according to all logical categories, it is impossible that the same being could be both God and also man. What philosophers have since the days of Aristotle called the basic laws of thought all contradict the idea. The law of identity says a thing is itself and nothing else. The law of contradiction asserts that a thing cannot be both itself and not itself. The law of excluded middle has it that a thing is either itself or not itself, but it cannot be something in the middle.

My treatment of the questions of Christology thus far has been frankly traditional, as systematic as I can make it and supportive of the creeds of the ancient church, that is, dogmatic in the proper sense. Thorough acquaintance with the doctrines of Christianity, biblically derived, historically shaped and systematically arranged is the very substance of systematic theology. Reference to contrary views of individual doctrines, how they are defended and how answered, should be employed to clarify sound doctrine not simply to inform. This is the way theology has been taught under church sponsorship (not university) for many generations. I was taught that way. Through the wilderness of competing Christologies since I finished seminary in the midst of the Second World War, the positive instruction of a master teacher of a sound Christology, ‘biblically derived, historically shaped (respect for the creeds and definitions of ancient and Protestant orthodoxy) and systematically arranged’ (Calvin to Thomas Oden) has been thoroughly adequate. Since then duty and inclination have driven me not only to read the competing literature but to teach in elective courses, also to write some about it. I emphasize, however, grounding in the truth should come first. One of the indirect benefits of this approach is the relatively smaller length of treatment. Multi-volume sets of theology cannot be read within the bounds of a seminary course. I think the 12 basic volumes of Barth’s Dogmatics, some running to 900 pages, as a practical tool for ministers and missionaries, are an absurdity.

Further, through the ages, sound theology has sometimes been stimulated by doctrinal attacks from without the church and within it. This is observable in the New Testament itself. For example, Galatians was written to enlarge the doctrine of salvation by grace alone, through Christ alone, by faith alone. In the process Paul managed to address some of the points made by the Judaizing legalists, but we don’t know the name of one of the false teachers in Galatia, where they came from for sure, or even the main points of their arguments, not even where the disputes took place, for certain. Colossians was in part composed to fortify the believers against what was likely an essentially pagan philosophy similar if not identical with Gnosticism. We infer (can’t be sure) a mystical, somewhat pantheistic form of religion seeking to enforce another sort of legalism, was the foe. Again we have no names, no schools of thought or leaders of thought mentioned. Paul did not promote these errorists by advertizing their books and their scholastic lineage by leading off with pages about them. Imagine how famous these heretics might have become immediately if Paul, the consummate theologian, had conducted a seminar about them with the ‘undergraduates’ of Galatia and Colossae! Theology, however, would immediately have become a department of apologetics instead of the other way around!

Christology is the central area of Christian doctrine and of our religion as well. Hence in these last days it has become the focus of attention from those who would weaken the doctrine by revival of ancient errors or destroy it by erasing the time-honored orthodoxy of Nicea, Constantinople, Ephesus and Chalcedon, the Reformers and the faithful Protestant evangelical authors.

Adequately to trace the origins of these movements and to describe their teachings, furnishing proposed philosophical answers is not in my judgment the proper project of a book of basic theology.

Appendix III

A Necessary Digression

A soundly evangelical Christology rests on the reliability of the Gospels as truthful reports of the career, works and words of Jesus and the rest of the New Testament as dependable, authoritative (apostolic) interpretation of Christ, His works and words. Over the past century and more, a literature, too large to report here, has grown up which, denying the reliability of the Gospels and the Epistles as apostolic interpretation, has sought to disengage the Gospels’ reports of Jesus’ self-consciousness of Messiahship and divinity. Some of this literature would disconnect the high Christology of the rest of the New Testament from the first Jewish generation of believers and the leadership of the eyewitnesses as reported in Acts 1–12. The acknowledged high view of Jesus in the canonical writings was imported, they say, from various sources present in the Roman world into the belief system of the early church after it was no longer dominated by the beliefs of the Jewish church at Jerusalem and groups emanating from that matrix. We shall have occasion from time to time to call attention to these critical views and the conservative scholarship that has responded to them.

Competent conservative scholars have shown that quite to the contrary the pre-Pauline church (i.e. the first generation of believers, mainly Jewish) is the source of the testimonies to His Person given permanent form in the New Testament. It took several generations—down to the Ecumenical Council of Nicea (ad 325) and First Constantinople (ad 381) and Chalcedon (ad 451) to work it out and give it permanent theological expression. Yet there, is nothing in these creeds and definitions not assumed or implied or stated in the New Testament records. A condensed, relatively brief and thorough presentation of this matter, not superseded by any more recent work is The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity by Richard N. Longenecker (1970).

Longenecker concludes (in part):

It has become popular of late to argue for the discontinuity of Christological conviction between Jesus, the Aramaic church in Palestine, and Hellenistic Christianity (whether Jewish, Gentile, or even Pauline). But our study has shown that while Christology of the earliest Jewish believers was primarily functional, it presupposed and carried in substratum ontological commitments; that while it received extensive development even within the Jewish Christian cycle of witness, that development was of the nature of explication and not deviation; that while it spoke mainly in terms understandable within a Jewish milieu, the proclamation of Christ in the Gentile mission in terms understandable in that context was in essentials not unfaithful to the earlier preaching; and that there is more than an implicit continuity existing between the self-consciousness of Jesus, the convictions of the earliest Jewish Christians regarding Jesus, and the affirmations of Paul in the Gospel mission.¹³

That long sentence might be compressed to assert: what we read in the Gospels and Epistles about Jesus is really what Jesus thought of Himself, what the first Christians accepted as true, and what the sermons in Acts and Paul's; sermons truly mean to say.

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), 319.

² ibid., p. 311.

- ³ S. Cave, The Doctrine of the Person of Christ (London: Gerald Duckworth, 1925), p. 11.
- ⁴ K. S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, vol. i, 'The First Five Centuries' (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1971), pp. 162–170.
- ⁵ B. B. Warfield, 'The Deity of Christ,' The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth, ii (Los Angeles: The Bible Institute of L.A., 1917), p. 243.
- ⁶ Warfield, ibid., pp. 240, 241.
- ⁷ Vincent Taylor, The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (London: Macmillan Co., 1958), pp. 104, 105.
- Institutes* John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes
- ⁸ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, ed. John i. McNeil, trans. and ed. Ford L. Battles (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), Introduction, pp. i, ii, iii.
- ⁹ R. D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1976; enlarged edition with title, The Earthly Career of Jesus, The Christ). See Bibliography.
- ¹⁰ J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, Revised Edition (San Francisco and New York, 1978). p. 138.
- ¹¹ C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology i (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, repr. 1970), p. 496.
- ¹² Charles Gore, The Incarnation of the Son of God (London: John Murray, 1903), p. 15.
- ¹³ R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity, (London: SCM Press, 1970) p. 155.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (453). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

Anthropotēs, the Human Nature of Christ

Forty years after Jesus ascended to heaven Paul was appealing to the received consensus of believers everywhere when he addressed Timothy, his suffragan at Ephesus, about the human nature of Jesus in these words: 'For there is one God, and there is one mediator between God and man, Christ Jesus, himself man' (1 Tim. 2:5, neb). Perhaps better than any other text of Scripture these words starkly isolate and emphasize the human nature of Jesus—His fully authentic membership in the human race. F. C. Baur (1792–1860) founder of the 'Tübingen School of Theology' thought he found the Hegelian categories of thesis-antithesis-synthesis supported in this verse, excluding Jesus from the category of God. Ancient Monarchians and Socinians (the Unitarians of Reformation times) thought the text supported their opposition to the doctrine of the triune God. This, of course, is rejected with scorn by those who have read the whole chapter.

The verse is part of an exhortation to pray not only for kings and those in high places but for ‘all men’ (pantōn anthrōpōn, the generic noun for the human race, v. 1). Paul exhorts us to do this because God wishes ‘all men’ (pantas anthrōpous) to be saved (v. 4). There is a member of our race, ‘himself man’ (anthrōpos, singular, generic mankind) who became the ‘go between’ of God and men (anthrōpon, plural, generic, mankind). This Mediator, the passage goes on to say, ‘gave himself a ransom for all [mankind]’ (v. 6).

There is no possibility that Paul entertained any doubt of the Lord’s full deity as well as humanity, for not many lines further on is one of the most outstanding statements of Christ’s preexistence and deity (1 Tim. 3:16).

Jesus’ maleness is not in view but His humanness, veritable human nature. Paul employs the Greek word for man as male often in his writings and does so three verses further on in specifying that prayer for all mankind is especially a male duty (1 Tim. 2:8). The neb highlights this with a paraphrase, ‘that everywhere prayers be said by the men [andras, genitive plural of aner] of the congregation’ (1 Tim. 2:8) while the women (gunaikas, plural of gunē) have other duties (1 Tim. 2:9). This is a ‘complementarian’ text, assigning one spiritual duty for man, male and others for man, female.

So if any passage in the Bible lays out the fact of Jesus’ complete, unimpaired humanity it is this one. We shall recur to it frequently.

The Earthly Jesus

In the Epistles

The Epistles of the New Testament assume the readers have knowledge of the earthly life and career of Jesus in the Land of Israel. It is not without significance that the first extensive report of the preached message, or kērygma (Acts 10:34–43), consisted chiefly of the story of who Jesus was; where He lived and worked; when He began His public ministry; His special relation to God; His mission of divine mercy in Galilee, Judaea and Jerusalem; His death ‘in the country of the Jews’ by crucifixion; His resurrection ‘on the third day’; the apostolic witness; His command to preach ‘to the people’ (tō laō, in this case the Jewish people, not tois laois, to the peoples); the Old Testament prophecies; the remission of sins for ‘everyone who believes in him.’ There can be no doubt this outline, consisting largely of a sketch of Jesus’ human, earthly career, was henceforth proclaimed, with enlargement by the apostolic witnesses wherever the gospel was preached and congregations of believers formed—and that was ‘everywhere’ (Mark 16:20).

The Epistles of Peter and the Epistle to the Hebrews show that both authors wrote with very full knowledge of Jesus’ life on earth and of His career, though neither gives many details. The author of Hebrews knows of His suffering and death (2:9), that He was ‘the seed of Abraham’ (2:16), ‘Jesus, the Son of God’ (4:14), ‘holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners’ (7:26 kjv); the body of Christ a sacrifice to God (10:5–10); Jesus' crucifixion and later exaltation (12:2). Peter gives a rather complete, brief summary of the events of the Lord's Passion (1 Peter 2:21–25).

All these messages of concern for moral and spiritual welfare assume the facts of the earthly life and career are about as familiar to the readers as to the writers.

B. B. Warfield pointed out Paul had no occasion to enter into the details of Christ's earthly life, 'But he shows himself fully familiar with them and incidentally conveys a vivid portrait of Christ's personality.' If one were to read all of Paul's Epistles one would learn Jesus was a descendant of David, born of a woman like everyone else, humbly lived out His life subject to the Mosaic law, as every other observant Jew, and died on a cross. Though Paul quotes only one of Jesus' sayings (and that in Luke's report of him, Acts 20:35) he is aware of many more, which he praises elsewhere as 'wholesome words' necessary for godliness (1 Tim. 6:3 kjv). Paul knows the details of the Last Supper of Jesus with his Apostles (1 Cor. 10, 11) and of water baptism. He never assays to inform about these details, rather he assumes they are already well known among Christians everywhere.

In the Gospels

Luke, who probably wrote his Gospel sometime in the ad 60s before the execution of Paul, begins his narrative with a formal declaration that the story of Jesus' career from annunciation to Elizabeth and to Mary on to the ascension are matters already 'most surely believed among us' (Luke 1:1 kjv). Though Matthew and Mark (who may have written a bit earlier) do not say so, they certainly assumed the same narrative.

It is beyond the scope of this chapter to trace it all out, but the incidental references in all the Epistles are in full agreement with the formal treatises called Gospels. Only a few years at most after the bulk of the Epistles had appeared in places as far apart as Rome and Colosse, all this literature, except possibly the fourth Gospel and the other Johannine writings, came into existence in various places and from several authors writing independently except for casual contacts. They were not collaborators. There was, therefore, a commonly received knowledge of our Lord's person, words, works and career previous to the New Testament, made known throughout 'the world' (Mark 16:15, 16) through an acknowledged tradition. Oral transmission of the basic historical content of the Gospels and the doctrines of Christianity which interpret that history clearly preceded the written New Testament. There were indeed a primitive kērygma (preached gospel) and a confessed didachē (teaching, doctrine), both apostolic, previous in time to apostolic and prophetic New Testament Scripture.

The Gospels are not biographies, but regarding the period of His ministry they supply sufficient details of travels, discourse, miracles and conversations within sufficient chronological and geographical framework to make Jesus for all time the best-known figure of antiquity. It is important, for:

[I]f the elements of time and space are stricken from the Gospels, the Lord's life ceases to be a truly human and intelligible one; He becomes only a wandering voice. The more fully we know the outward circumstances of His life, and His relations to those around Him, the more do His words gain in significance and attest His discernment and wisdom.

Thus it is of importance to know, so far as we are able, both the times and places of His utterances; and the labor spent in this study is not idle, but will yield rich reward.¹

Emphasis on Jesus' Death

One may speak of a 'Life of Jesus' only in a modified sense, however. The only sources available are the Gospels and though each contains some biographical information, only one incident from His life before opening His ministry is reported. For the rest we have the two birth narratives (Matthew and Luke) and the story of His public career. The latter concentrates on His Passion, death and resurrection. Taking the arrival at Bethany, less than a week before the crucifixion, as the beginning of the Passion narrative, John devotes the last ten of his twenty-one chapters to it, Matthew, chapters 21–28; Mark 11–16; and Luke 11:29 onward to chapter 24. About one-half of John and one-third of the Synoptics are devoted to Jesus' death on the cross and events immediately before and after. The writers report in detail how Jesus exerted Himself repeatedly during the last six months to prepare the Twelve for His inevitable death and resurrection.

The Gospels, though in a sense tragic narratives, have nothing at all characteristic of the dramatic tragedies of ancient writers. Plutarch's biographical Lives are quite unlike the four Gospels. They are Gospels, messages of good news for sinners everywhere on earth. The purposes of each writer—Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, whatever his emphasis, were subservient to the principle of salvation, viz.: 'you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins' (Matt. 1:21); 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Luke 19:10); 'to give his life a ransom for many' (Matt. 20:28).

Redaction Criticism is an effort to get behind the Gospels to the true life and sayings of Jesus on the theory the authors slanted their writings tendentiously, to support what each thought would support views of Jesus current in their time but not necessarily original with Jesus and the circle of His first disciples. We agree each had different aspects to emphasize, but disagree they are tendentious (distorted details to prove a point) or are of late origin. And they are in complete agreement that the events of Passion Week, Jesus' death and resurrection are the climax and central meaning of each. That there is a distinct theological emphasis of each Gospel, each contributing something unique about the meaning of Jesus and His redemptive work, is a commonplace of New Testament scholarship from antiquity. See, for example, M. C. Tenney, The Genius of The Gospels.

Chronology of Jesus' Ministry

Careful scholars have found sufficient information in the Gospels for dating His birth shortly before the death of Herod the Great (4 bc) and Jesus' death, probably at ad 30: and for a tentative framework of a ministry of three and a half years.

Except for the Gospel of John, almost nothing could be ascertained as to the precise length of our Lord's public career. On the basis of John's data, several chronologies of our Lord's ministry have been proposed.

There is an ancient one-year theory. A certain Ptolemy, disciple of the famous ancient Gnostic Valentinus, taught this theory, basing his argument probably on the silence of the three Synoptics and on a bizarre interpretation of Jesus' remark about 'the year of the Lord's favor' (Luke 4:19).

There is also an ancient ten-to twenty-year theory. Irenaeus (second century) refuted Ptolemy, arguing from 'about thirty years of age' (Luke 3:23) and 'not yet fifty years old' (John 8:57) that Jesus' ministry lasted between ten and twenty years.

On the basis of John's more complete data, in modern times the most generally accepted chronology takes as starting point Jesus' baptism by John a few months before Passover in March/April ad 27 and ends with His crucifixion on the day (by Jewish reckoning) of the 'last Passover' in ad 30.

It is safe to affirm that Jesus' baptism took place within a year of the opening of John's ministry. John began his ministry 'In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar' (Luke 3:1). According to the method of counting employed in the eastern provinces of the Empire, reckoning would start with Tiberius's brief co-regency with Augustus, his fifteenth year being the calendar year (by modern reckoning) of ad 26. Jesus came for baptism some weeks, at least, before the next following Passover. If He was baptized earlier then it was in ad 26, if in the month of January (as many scholars argue), then very early in ad 27. At this time He was 'about thirty years of age.' The December of His birth thirtysome years before would have been in 5 bc (from 1 bc to ad 1 is only one year). Passover falls in the Jewish month Nisan (Exod. 12:6) (formerly called Abib), our March/April.

This first Passover of His public career is mentioned only at John 2:13–23. The second is unmentioned by John, but Jesus' reference to 'four months' to 'harvest' in John 4:35 suggests that the narrative has moved on to the month Shebat (January/February) of ad 28. The next feast mentioned simply as 'a feast' (John 5:1) was almost surely (as idiom indicates) tabernacles, celebrated in autumn (Tishri, September/October). So though John does not mention the second Passover, he has rather clearly, if inadvertently, indicated its passing. Another close-to-certain indication of the passing of a second but (cf. Mark 2:23) unmentioned Passover is the incident of Luke 6, in which the disciples aroused the criticism of certain Pharisees by plucking ears of ripening grain. In the Holy Land small grains ripen shortly after a late Passover. The narrative does not appear to allow that Passover to be the one either of John 2 or of John 6:4. It has to fall between.

The third Passover (ad 29) is distinctly mentioned (John 6:4). The following context of John 6 treats incidents of His pilgrimage to Jerusalem to attend this Passover. Six months later He was again at Jerusalem for the feast of tabernacles (John 7:1, 14). Two months after that (Kislev, November/December) He was yet again in Jerusalem for the feast of dedication (John 10:22).

The narrative of events surrounding the last Passover, the fourth of His public career according to our reckoning, is the climax of each of the Gospels and provides the framework for the great bulk of the four accounts. They each trace the climactic development of events up to His death by crucifixion on the day before the evening when the whole of Jewry consumed their Paschal lambs 'without spot and without blemish.' This was in Nisan (March/April) ad 30.

The above is the most commonly received opinion—endorsed in a general way by the present author. It must be admitted, however, that even aside from emphasis in the Gospels on the last week, there seems to be a disproportionate amount of narrative, sermons, and discourses crowded into the last twelve months. But acknowledging the Gospels' emphasis on Jesus' death and associated happenings, this is quite to be expected. Some remove the difficulty by postulating still another Passover between the third and the final one, placing it shortly after the feeding of the 5,000 in Galilee. This requires a ministry of over four years. In support it is noted that John does not refer to the second Passover, though we know it took place before the third Passover of John 6:4, hence, no a priori objection to another un-noted Passover can be raised. In this way space is opened up for all the happenings from Mark 6:30; Luke 9:10; Matthew 14:13; and John 6:1 to the end of His ministry. Arguments are impressive but not compelling. Let us at least tentatively accept the traditional view that the Lord's public career lasted three years and three or four months, from His baptism to the crucifixion, meanwhile acknowledging that we are dealing with possibilities and probabilities rather than certainties.²

Authentic, Common Humanity on Display

The genuine humanity of Jesus is displayed in fascinating though incidental detail in Luke, especially in the largest single block of His teaching activity in any of the Gospels, Luke 9:51–19:27. This falls chronologically in the last six months. We know most of this time was spent in Trans-Jordan (Peraea), though Luke's report is singularly free of geographical and chronological details. Luke is plainly interested in giving his readers extensive knowledge of typical, significant examples of Jesus' teaching.

Here as nowhere else we meet the human mind of Jesus, as well as the ancient, Palestinian, Jewish world in which His thoughts moved. These chapters furnish likewise the cultural patterns of the people, even for the casual reader.³

These chapters also show how fully Jesus was a part of that particular local human culture. When the woman at the well exclaimed 'How is it that you, a Jew ...?', she too was thinking and speaking out of a very localized culture. She saw Him as the Gospels reveal Him and as we must see Him, not as a great cosmopolitan character, but as a Palestinian Jew. In fact, His culture may be described as that of a rural Galilean Jew. Jesus as seen by contemporaries was no cosmopolitan world-citizen. He had almost no intercourse with Gentiles. He never travelled more than a few miles from His childhood home. To summarize: Jesus participated in ordinary human nature the same way we all do. He was every inch a male, not androgynous (male-female).

That He was male rather than female or androgynous poses no problem for any one who takes Paul's teaching of the relation of female to male (1 Tim. 2:13; 1 Cor. 11:2–12) seriously as well as the narrative in Genesis 2 and 3.⁴

It is precisely because of these facts that His teachings are timeless. They are truly set in a single culture. The authors of the Gospels do not try to make of Jesus a sophisticated, urbane man of universal culture. There really can be no such person. Each of us also is a creature of a local culture. To the degree we are not, we tend to be disoriented, deracinated, without roots in any stable soil. By incarnation He became man, yet to do so He had to become an individual man. It is as such that He is the cosmic Christ, Savior of the world.

Across the distance of two millennia and the barriers between ancient oriental and modern Western culture, to say nothing of the distance between twenty-first-century urban life and ancient rural village life, the themes plainly come through.

The Theological Doctrine of the Humanity of Christ

There is an historical dogma of the humanity of Christ. More will be said of this in connection with the incarnation. For the present let us examine relevant quotations from several creeds and other official Christian documents to show that the doctrine of Jesus' humanity has dogmatic standing. This may seem unnecessary since modern people are not generally aware that our Lord's humanity was ever in doubt. Our purpose is not so much to defend as to clarify.

After these official statements seven points should be made about the human nature of Jesus. It was and is: 1) genuine, 2) complete, 3) permanent, 4) sinless (impeccable), 5) from Mary alone, 6) always in perfect union with the divine nature, 7) a human personality which from the first moment developed in connection with the Person of the divine Son. The divine assumed the human. There was no duality of persons.

The dogmatic statements are all brief: 'Jesus Christ ... was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary' (the Apostles' Creed); 'was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man' (Nicene Creed, ad 325, 381); 'We, then, following the holy Fathers, all with one consent teach men to confess ... our Lord Jesus Christ ... perfect in manhood ... truly man, of a rational soul and body ... consubstantial with us according to the Manhood' (Anthrōpotēta), in all things like unto us, without sin ... born of the Virgin Mary, the God Bearer according to the Manhood (anthropōtēta) (Symbol of Chalcedon, 22 October 451). '... it is necessary to ... salvation: that one believe faithfully the Incarnation ... that our Lord Jesus Christ ... is God and Man ... of the same substance of his Mother, born in the world ... perfect Man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting ... inferior to the Father as touching his Manhood ... One Christ, One; not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh; but by taking [assumption] of the Manhood into God ... by the unity of Person' (The Athanasian Creed, from arts. 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 36). The first article of the Profession of the Tridentine (Council of Trent) Faith, 1654, reaffirms en toto the Nicene Creed. The evangelical (Protestant) Article viii of The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (1571) reaffirms the Nicene, Athanasian and Apostles' Creeds. The Heidelberg Catechism (1563) does the same. The Lutheran Formula of Concord (1576) affirms at length the same in detail (Art. I Affirmative) as does also the Westminster Confession (chap. 8, arts. 2, 3).

The fact that every one of these important dogmatic statements includes a strong and clear statement of our Lord's humanity (the standard English word is Manhood, i.e. 'Manness') shows two things: first, like every aspect of Christology, the fact of our Lord's normal humanness has been attacked or compromised in every age and, second, it must be clearly stated again for every age of the church. Each of the following seven affirmations has been occasioned by some fresh or renewed error or heresy regarding the true enfleshment of the Son of God. That is why the teaching, though explicit in the Bible, had to be formulated in many formal statements throughout Christian history.

1. The humanity (Latin, humanitas; Greek, anthrōpotēs, [Clement of Alexandria]) of Christ is genuine, or 'authentically human.' A rather special meaning has been placed on the latter term by the intrusion into theology of existentialist ideas and terms of neo-orthodox (dialectic, krisis) theology and, prominently, Paul Tillich. But in the proper sense of the word authentic, any one born of human parents, saint or sinner, sick or well, whole or maimed is authentically human—the presence of sin excepted, for sin is not essential to human nature. The archetypes, our first parents, gave up their full authenticity, or integrity when they sinned. In other words, before the fall our parents were normal. Afterward they and all their offspring have been abnormal. ‘To err is human’ is a misleading statement. ‘To err’ is only average, not normal.

So ‘the holy one’ who was born of a virgin and ‘in whom was no sin’ is more fully normal than any of us. The Bible is clear that Jesus was neither a monster nor a freak. After some of His exploits some might exclaim ‘What manner of man is this?’ But no one doubted He was truly one of mankind.

The writers of the New Testament almost inadvertently express this, as though the contrary did not occur to any one. Peter knew Jesus was the ‘fruit of David’s loins’ which is certainly about as bluntly human as one can get in view of what we know about David; Paul, that Jesus was ‘of Israel according to the flesh’; Matthew traced His ancestry through the generations back to Abraham; Luke to Adam; and Hebrews chapter 2 says He partook of ‘flesh and blood’ just as other people do. He had the apparent ethnic, physical characteristics of a Palestinian Jew and dressed Himself like one (John 4:9). He looked so unexceptionally the part of a Hebrew prophet some thought He might be John the Baptist or some ancient prophet risen from the dead (Matt. 16:13, 14).

Insofar as we know the biographical details of His life until ‘about thirty years of age’ (and it seems to be about as much as we know of Julius Caesar or Plato to that age), Jesus’ story reads like any one’s story. He is first an unborn child in His mother’s womb, known only to the mother and intimates with whom she shares the knowledge; then a newborn wrapped in standard infant wear, next a suckling babe in an itinerant carpenter’s ‘mobile home’, after that in a house, later doted on by aged kinsmen and others, still later in a village-tradesman’s shop assisting His human father, growing in wisdom, stature and good favor with neighbors and properly schooled in Jewish piety, then a confirmed son of the law (bar-mitzvah), an independent-minded juvenile and finally a mature adult about to embark on His life-calling.

2. From the standpoint of a biblical anthropology, whether one views it as a dichotomist (body and soul-spirit) or a trichotomist (body, soul and spirit) His humanity was complete, everything a normal specimen of humanity should have and be. One ancient error, proposed by someone who wished to rationalize the incarnation, had it that while His physical body and animal soul were those of man His spirit was not, being furnished by the eternal Word (Logos) (see later on the incarnation). The fact of His human body, which hungered and thirsted and became limp in sleep and bled when wounded is plain in the narratives. His soul is troubled at times or angered or grieved and He committed His human spirit to God when He died. Some of the ancient Gnostics and other Docetists (only seemed a man) thought the Jesus of Gospel story was a man possessed at a certain stage by the Son of God (of which more later) as does modern ‘Christian Science,’ but all the evidence is against the notion.

The fact Jesus was completely human can be verbalized simply as ‘perfectly human’—which raises the subject of His personal stature, physical type, and presence or absence of physical comeliness. It has been inferred from Isaiah 53:2 (‘no form nor comeliness ... no beauty that we should desire him’ kjv) that Jesus was an ugly man. The passage means He had no kingly form or regal splendor or worldly majesty such as nationalistic Jews would look for in a claimant king. As to

His physique, there is no scriptural attention to it at all. We know common people liked Him as did also children and many women. But great physical attractiveness is not required for that (Mother Teresa, for example). Physical details of Jesus' persona are obviously unimportant to the authors of the New Testament. The strange modern preoccupation of 'clinical' and analytical interest in every news event—giving in public such indiscreet morbidities as the length of Lyndon Johnson's abdominal incision and the precise location and direction of John Kennedy's fatal bullet wound—is absent from Luke's reporting of the baby Jesus. Two verses, no more, are devoted to the mother's delivery and the infant's first care. In place of statistics on length of time in labor, pounds and ounces, color of skin and eyes and hair, we know only that there was no public announcement of His birth emanating from the parents. We know the infant's bed was a manger and He was given careful infant attention and attracted a lot of attention from heaven and a few pious folk whom heaven touched in special ways.

3. The genuine, complete humanity of Jesus Christ is permanent. The ancient creeds stress this, for if there is anything made plain in the testimony of the Apostles and the words of Jesus plus angelic messengers, it is that when the 'Word became flesh' it was to be forever. In this case 'flesh,' as in John 1:14, is a term for both the material and immaterial part of man. His resurrection included body and spirit, He showed Himself alive in flesh and bones, demonstrated unmistakably in various ways (including eating in the Apostle's presence) and ascended before their eyes in that body, and according to the angels, will so come again.

4. The human nature of Christ was derived entirely from His mother Mary. As we shall treat more at length in connection with some thoughts on the virgin birth. He had no male parent, even though to show His full legal right to David's throne by male line of descent both the genealogies mention Joseph. There is an enormous modern literature on the subject. The Westminster Confession says the Son of God 'did take upon him man's nature ... being conceived ... in the womb of the Virgin Mary of her substance' (chap. viii.).

Long ago, however, the ancient church learned how to state this matter. They phrased it well in more than one of the ancient confessional documents. Hold in mind that they wished to be faithful to the 'rule of faith' or 'desposit of truth,' received in the apostolic age, passed on faithfully in the churches, and loyal to the Holy Scriptures. 'The right faith is that the Lord Jesus Christ ... is ... Man, of the Substance of his Mother, born into the world' (Quicumque or, the Athanasian Creed, para. 31).

The last thing any of the orthodox fathers wished to be was an innovator of new doctrine. It is hard to say exactly when the books we now call the New Testament were in possession of all the churches, but we do know that the churches regarded apostolic authority equal with the authority of the Hebrew Scriptures and the authority of Scripture the same as the authority of God. This matter is made plain in the way they cite apostolic writings and the high regard that they held for the apostolic foundation of churches and teachings laid down in those churches. Tradition meant apostolic teaching preserved in apostolic writings and oral teaching as well.

Against the claims of supposed newly minted truths of Gnostic teaching, Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, late in the second century called attention to the earlier authoritative teaching of the Apostle Peter. He cites at length Peter's sermon to Cornelius' household (Acts 10:37–44) and concludes:

[I]t is evident from Peter's words that he did indeed still retain the God who was already known to them [i.e. the God-fearers of Cornelius' household]; but he also bare witness to them that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, the judge of the quick and the dead ... Can it really be, that Peter was not at that time as yet in possession of the perfect knowledge which these men (gnostics) discovered afterwards?⁵

A few pages earlier he pointed out the Apostles did not preach or write until they were specially endowed with the gifts and power of the Holy Spirit (Pentecost).⁶ After that they went about to the ends of the earth. He gives details of how the Gospels were apostolic.⁷ Hence, 'If any one does not agree to these truths, he despises Christ Himself the Lord ... opposing his own salvation.' He goes on to assert 'the tradition of the apostles remains in "the whole world" in the succession of bishops [that is, presbyter-pastors] in the Church ... to our own times.'⁸

5. Christ was (is) a sinless Man. This means He was free both from original sin (hereditary depravity) and from any thought or act of sin. The New Testament is plain about this and other evidences support it. The traditional name is impeccability.

The New Testament says the child begotten of Mary would be 'the holy thing' (Luke 1:35, kjv). Jesus challenged His enemies to convict Him of sin (John 8:46) and claimed the devil 'has no claim on me' (John 14:30), i.e. no flaw in His character which would give the tempter any leverage for enticing to sin. He 'became flesh,' all right (John 1:14), but with the limitation that sin was not part of the 'likeness of sinful flesh' and it was 'for sin,' i.e. to deal with it in others, not to embrace it Himself (Rom. 1:3). Other texts affirm 'him ... who knew no sin' (2 Cor. 5:21); 'in every respect tempted as we are, yet without sin' (Heb. 4:15); 'holy, innocent, unstained, separated from sinners' (Heb. 7:26). Jesus' sinlessness (impeccability) was by virtue of the miracle of 'immaculate conception',—not of the mother of Jesus, but of her child, without human male parentage. This is apparently the significance of the 'therefore' (kjv and esv), 'for that reason' (nasb) in the angel's announcement: 'The Holy spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you, and for that reason the holy thing begotten shall be called the Son of God' (Luke 1:35, nasb margin).

Of the creeds of the Reformation era the statement of Westminster (1647) says the least about 'Man's nature' in Christ: He did 'take upon him man's nature and all common infirmities thereof, yet without sin' (chap. VIII). The Thirty-Nine Articles of 1563, 1571 say the most, with good reason, according to E. C. S. Gibson.⁹ Fanatics of the time 'were some [Anabaptists] who revived docetic notions of our Lord's humanity, some who denied His atonement and asserted His sinfulness, and others who [maintained] the regenerate could not sin.'¹⁰ Hence, article XV says, 'Christ in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things (sin only except), from which he was clearly void, both in his flesh and in His spirit. He came to be the Lamb without spot, Who by the sacrifice of Himself once made, should take away the sins of the world: and sin (as St John says) was not in Him. But all the rest (although baptized and born again in Christ) yet offend in many things, and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.'¹¹

There is a complete absence of tendentious reporting of Jesus' sinlessness. Mainly the matter is simply assumed. His mother observed the Mosaic rite for purification of herself, but not for her Son;

He went frequently to the temple but never, we may assume, offered sacrifice for sins (as sin and trespass offerings of Lev. 5–7). He prayed ‘Father forgive them,’ but never ‘forgive me.’ His expressions of anger and irritation are obviously justified and never out of control. His prayers to the Father during the intense strain and suffering of the Passion, especially the last evening in Gethsemane, including the marvellous prayer of John 17, are in awareness of full fellowship with the Father unobstructed by the slightest taint of sin.

6. The personality of His human nature existed only in union with the divine Second Person of the Godhead. Many have sought to state and explain the absence of a human ‘person’ in a way fully intelligible and consistent with a genuine and complete human nature and we shall treat the matter further in discussing the incarnation, chapter 7. Berkouwer¹² is helpful; W. G. T. Shedd¹³ is satisfying; H. M. Pelton¹⁴ exhausts about all that can be said on the subject. Strong states it well:

[T]he Logos did not take into union with himself an already developed human person, such as James, Peter or John, but human nature before it had become personal or was capable of receiving a name. It reached its personality only in union with his own divine nature. Therefore we see in Christ not two persons—a human person and a divine person—but one person, and that person possessed of a human nature as well as a divine.¹⁵

7. In His humanity (‘Manhood’ of the creeds) He constituted Himself the head of the new humanity. As Adam is the head of the fallen race of man Christ is the head of the race of redeemed mankind. He is the ‘last Adam’ (1 Cor. 15:45). What the First Adam was as head of a fallen race Christ is to the race of redeemed men (Rom. 5:12–19). This is a way of stating the prime purpose of ‘God ... sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh’ (Rom. 8:3). According to Hebrews 2:9–18 (nasb) God’s Son became a brother to us, actively and voluntarily partook of the human nature (v. 14) which we have involuntarily, to ‘taste death for everyone’ (v. 9), thereby begetting a new family of children (v. 13). This is the theology of further biblical statements. In Isaiah 9:6 our Lord is called ‘Everlasting Father [emphasis added].’ The saved are His ‘offspring’ in Isaiah 53:10. He is both ‘the root’ and ‘the descendant of David’ in Revelation 22:16 and ‘the Son [who] gives life to whom he will’ (John 5:21).

This concept of Christ as progenitor of a new spiritual race has intrigued many authors, and rightly so. The application of it is relevant to Scriptures that speak of Christ as ‘head of the church’ (Eph. 5:23), Christ as vine, of us as branches (John 15).

The importance of Christ’s genuine, complete, permanent, sinless humanity joined, of course, to His deity, is so great that it is usually an adequate test for orthodoxy. According to 1 John 4:1–3 and 2 John 7, he who does not confess the genuine, permanent enfleshment of the Son of God is ‘not from God,’ ‘of the antichrist,’ a ‘false prophet,’ and ‘a deceiver’ and ‘the antichrist.’ What could be more emphatic?

The practical value is the subject of Hebrews 2:9–18 and 4:4–16. The present author’s several sermons and essays on those texts will not be included here but the humanitas (Lat.), anthrōpotēs (Gr.) manhood of the Savior of the world will be an important substrate of all subsequent chapters of this book.

¹ S. I. Andrews, The Life of Our Lord Upon the Earth, rev. ed. (New York: Scribner’s Sons, 1901)

² I have discussed these matters more fully in The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1976. See bibliography).

³ I discuss this in Excursus 10, ‘Local Human Culture in Jesus’ Discourses,’ The Life of Christ, pp. 189–192.

⁴ See my essay in ‘A Traditional View,’ Women in Ministry, ed. by Clouse and Clouse (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1989), pp. 25–27.

⁵ Irenaeus (in Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. i, ed. Roberts and Donaldson, 1885, repr. Peabody, Hendrickson Publ., 1994), Against Heresies, 3.12.7, pp. 432, 433.

⁶ ibid., 3.1.1–3, pp. 314–316.

⁷ ibid., 3.1.1–2.

⁸ ibid., 3.1.3.

⁹ E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England Explained with an Introduction, 8th ed. (London: 1912).

¹⁰ ibid., p. 441.

¹¹ ibid., p. 439.

¹² G. C. Berkouwer, The Person of Christ, trans. John Vriend (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1954), chap. 11.

¹³ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), pp. 298–308.

¹⁴ H. M. Pelton, A Study in Christology: The Problem of the Two Natures in the Person of Christ (New York: Macmillan, 1922).

¹⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 679.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (461). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

7

The Virgin Birth of Jesus

The virgin birth of Jesus is important because it is the mode by which God deigned to enter earthly history as a member of the human race. On that account it became prominent in the theological reflections of the first Christians and has remained so to greater or lesser degree ever since. While we cannot know for certain that the incarnation could have occurred only by this very biological miracle we do know that the God of the canonical Scriptures is in charge of employment of miracles. It is reasonable to assume there were special reasons why this particular miracle took place—as we shall consider later in this chapter.

Definition and Designation

As set forth in Scripture the birth of Jesus is not primarily a doctrine. It is a fact, event, occurrence, as is the worldly entrance of every other human being. In this case the conception took place in the womb of a human female without the then otherwise invariable act of previous sexual intercourse with a male. The entrance of our first parents is reported in the Bible as two dissimilar miraculous events, each a unique event, not to be repeated in the case of any others.

This raises the question of how rightly to name the event, and where to place the locus of the supernatural operation of God's Spirit (Luke 1:35; Matt. 1:20). The special 'power' 'of the Most High' (Luke 1:35) was specifically in the conception without a male parent (Matt. 1:20), not in the birth, which was quite ordinary as such. For this reason Bernard Weiss in his justly famous three-volume Life of Christ entitles the chapter on this subject 'The Immaculate Conception'¹ laying emphasis not so much on the virginity of the mother as on the absence of original sin in the offspring. '“Virgin conception”, other things being equal, would be the most precise term to use. Even so, of the events of conception, gestation and birth, taken as a whole, custom and theology have agreed, “Virgin-birth” is the correct designation of the birth statement contained in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke.'² 'Supernatural conception' is too broad for there was a supernatural element in the conception of Isaac, Samson and John the Baptist. 'Immaculate conception' means non-contamination with a sinful nature and is really an interpretation of the event, not a proven feature of absence of a male parentage. Also, 'immaculate conception' tends to confuse unsophisticated people's minds with the alleged conception of Mary, herself, without a sinful nature—a Roman dogma not a scriptural teaching.

The Virgin Birth in the Ancient Church

The ancient church, following Scripture, was uniform and consistent in holding to two important affirmations in connection with Jesus' birth. 1) He was conceived in Mary's womb by the power of God as says the Scripture (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:35) and 2) the mother was a virgin at the conception and remained so until after the birth of the child (Luke 1:27, 34; Matt. 1:18, 25). The alleged perpetual virginity of Mary is a dogma contradicted by Scripture.

With regard to the conception, the Old Roman Creed, of very great antiquity, says He 'was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary.'³ The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (ad 325, 381) says He 'was made flesh of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary, and became man.'⁴ The Nicene Creed really carries over the affirmation of the Apostles' Creed of which the origins lie in the second century. Any one who doubts the church believed, confessed and taught this from the very earliest time should read the evidence cited by John G. Machen in The Virgin Birth of Christ.⁵ One of the very earliest of the writing Fathers, Ignatius of Antioch (martyred not later than ad 117, perhaps as early as ad 107) mentions the virgin birth and miraculous conception. The writer's phrases appear as if not needing confirmation among his Christian readers, viz.: 'conceived in the womb of Mary ... by the Holy Ghost' (both in To Ephesians, xviii). Twice in To Ephesians xix, he says 'the virginity of Mary was hidden from the prince of the world.'⁶ Other similar statements showing acceptance of the virgin birth by Ignatius and his readers will be found in To the Smyrnaeans chapter 1 and other places.⁷ Justin Martyr, who lived from about ad 110 to ad 165, is similarly at ease with the virgin birth, even devoting two chapters of his Dialogue with Trypho to prove from Old Testament prophecy that Christ was born of a virgin.⁸ The matter was not seriously challenged so far as we know until post-Reformation times.

'It [the virgin birth] is a constant and ... universally recognized element in the doctrinal tradition of the post-apostolic period, for of any important or fruitful opposition to it the history of doctrine knows nothing.'⁹

Yet there were mutterings of exception. Evidently some thought they found contradictions between the Matthew and Luke genealogies of Jesus. At any rate Julius Africanus, a Christian historian and friend of Origen and resident of Palestine who flourished about ad 220, wrote a letter to a certain Aristides, of which a fragment exists today in the Church History of Eusebius (ad 260?–340?). Eusebius comments that 'many suppose' the genealogies of Matthew and Luke 'are at variance with one another' (chap. vii, 1). He then goes on to cite at length Africanus' careful explanation of the alleged discrepancies.¹⁰ This is the first hint I know of any Christian apologetics for the virgin birth. Yet even here it is treated more as a problem for reverent exegesis of a problem passage of the Bible than response to anti-Christian attack.

Objections Old and New

Objections have not varied much through the centuries. Let us summarize some of them. In the interest of brevity I shall not try to trace the origin of the objections.

1. There are discrepancies between the details of the two genealogies of Matthew 1:2–17 and Luke 3:23–38. The history of this charge, as we have already noted, goes back to a time about 100 years after the two accounts were written. I shall not here enter far into the details of either of the alleged discrepancies or possible harmonizations. Julius Africanus tried to explain that both genealogies are of Joseph (Mary's husband), the legal father of Jesus, and that one traces the legal line by virtue of levirate marriage, and the other the actual biological line: 'Thus neither of the Gospels is in error, for one reckons by nature, the other by law.' Varieties of Africanus' view have many modern advocates.¹¹ A respectable modern attempt at harmonization, not very different from Africanus' theory, holds that while Matthew's obviously somewhat artificially constructed plan is clearly Joseph's legal line of descent from David, stressing Jesus' legal right to David's throne, Luke's genealogy is of Mary. Alford summarizes this view in a kindly way but rejects it. The key idea is that in Luke 3:23 (kjv) the parenthesis should be enlarged to read, 'Jesus ... being (as was supposed the son of Joseph), which [i.e. Jesus Himself] was the son [or, grandson via Mary] of Heli.' In such case the line of descent was Heli, Mary, Jesus. It is pointed out in support that every name in the genealogy is prefixed by the genitive article tou, whereas Joseph's name is not, thus putting

Joseph outside the genealogy. This then would be Mary's line of biological descent from 'David's line.' This has always appealed to me as reasonable. Yet I share the rather reserved approval of this theory expressed by John Walvoord¹² and Alford's comment, 'Here as elsewhere ... it is quite as presumptuous to pronounce the genealogies discrepant, as it is ever curious and uncritical to reconcile them.'¹³ I was taught this view in seminary. Harold Lindsell presents this possible harmonization briefly and well in his note on Luke 3:23 in the Harper Study Bible rsv.¹⁴ Perhaps the most readable and complete account of the views of the 'discrepancies' is by Samuel Andrews, The Life of our Lord.¹⁵

2. Many neo-orthodox writers think the virgin birth did not occur and that the doctrine subtracts from Jesus' true humanity while adding no support for Christ's full deity. Emil Brunner specifically acknowledges that he rejects the teaching, in the face of clear scriptural evidence to the contrary.¹⁶

Rudolph Bultmann and disciples treat the virgin birth in a similar way. The virgin birth did not occur but has worth as myth embodying value, amenable to the enlightened sensibilities of our age, which cannot believe in supernatural miracles. John Macquarrie, a dedicated Bultmannian, says the myth should be understood as pointing to Jesus 'as one who has come from God and in whom God's advent and epiphany ... have taken place.'¹⁷

Macquarrie and the approach he represents need not be refuted, yet some further notice should be given. Rejection of the supernatural among professedly Christian scholars has nevertheless required of them some positive evaluation of Jesus as presented in the Gospels. Many of them have been clergymen—pastors, teachers—and some held chairs of theology in Christian schools. Through the nineteenth century the common approach of this sort of liberalism was to make of Jesus the highest ethical expression ever to appear on earth and Christian religion simply the promotion of Jesus' teachings and/or example. All we really know of Jesus and His teachings must be derived from the Bible, and since on principle the supernatural had been (wholly or partly) removed, what was left in this liberal treatment was a religious genius much like a cultivated European bachelor who was always a gentleman.

At the turn of the century this outlook lost much of its scholarly support, though it has never died out. Subsequent liberal movements in theology and New Testament studies have sought to discover 'the historical Jesus.' The new liberals still hold the supernatural in disdain in varying degrees. But the historical Jesus turned out to be no practicing gentleman but one who challenged people in a confrontational way and may even have been a political zealot.

The twentieth century was not twenty years old when a quite different reaction against easy-going liberalism set in. It came to be called neo-orthodoxy, also dialectical theology and crisis theology. Neo-orthodoxy embraces many of the elements of the old-but-continuing liberalism and 'the historical Jesus' thinking but fosters individual subjective religion—attainment of authentic existence, being or becoming one's real self. Crisis, confrontation, commitment, personal decision, etc. are the reigning ideas. These folk also have an interest in finding value in 'Jesus and His Story' in the Gospels.

Bultmann and his disciples in an eclectic manner embrace some of all of the movements of liberal theology just characterized. Hence Macquarrie, a bona fide Bultmannian rather encapsulates them all.

All these movements seem to be efforts to be both believing and unbelieving, rejecting the supernatural but trying to love Jesus.

Wolfgang Pannenberg is a prestigious contemporary writer somewhere on the scale of belief between nineteenth-century liberalism and orthodox acceptance of the factual truth of the New Testament documents. He does not receive the virgin birth narratives as historical truth, but like liberals as far back as David Strauss wants to find religious value in them. Even though his acceptance of the resurrection as reported is equivocal, for Pannenberg the resurrection has sufficient 'retroactive force' to validate Jesus as divine Son and sent by God.¹⁸ He also speaks of the 'confirmatory force of the Easter event.'¹⁹ Hence, he can dispose of any certainty in the virgin birth reports on the ground of 'the apparently legendary nature of the narrative.'²⁰ What is the religious value? Answer:

Essentially this spiritual reality [Mary's humble receptivity] is not dependent on whether there was a male participation or not in the conception of the boy Jesus. It was enough on its own, however, to induce all Christians to show loving and reverent regard for Mary as the theotokos [God-bearer]. Christ is to achieve form in the life of every Christian as in that of her Jesus (Gal. 4:19).²¹

Having given some notice to these denials and weakenings of the Gospel reports of Jesus' virgin birth we must be quick to say refutation will not convince the gainsayers. They and we operate on different presuppositions. No amount of evidence as such will convince one who on philosophical grounds rejects the possibility (or at least the certainty) of a supernatural realm or a supernatural power capable of producing events in the natural order. We and they run on different epistemological tracks.

3. A related opinion held by liberal theologians for over a century and more recently by neo-orthodox and even a few conservative evangelicals is that whether true or not the virgin birth was unnecessary or unimportant. Whether deity could have assumed humanity in another way or the sinlessness of Jesus secured other than by absence of a male parent cannot be proved. Yet it can be truthfully said that if God, who does not appear to engage in miracle-mongering, could have accomplished these desiderata in another way, He would likely have done so.

Perhaps two important features of the incarnation would not have been possible except for the virginal conception of the baby Jesus. One is the sinlessness of Jesus, called 'impeccability' in formal theology and succinctly phrased, 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (Heb. 4:15 kjv).

There is an enormous literature supporting this proposal. I shall not pursue it at length. The theme has attracted the interest of medical doctors M. R. Dehaan of Radio Bible Class fame and Arthur C. Custance whose 600-page book *The Seed of the Woman*²² makes interesting and informative reading. Machen has something to say of this to which we shall return in a moment.

Another is the unity of the Person of the God-man, for which the ancient term was anhypostasia, or impersonality of the human nature, a later and better term is enhyposstasia of the human person. The idea intended in the latter is the truth that the Person of the God-man was one and the One was and is the Second Person of the Godhead, further that the human personality was not a second self-consciousness or center of consciousness, but a human consciousness or personal awareness that developed only in and with the divine Person. The connection of this important ancient understanding of the unity of the Person (as in the Creed of Chalcedon and the Athanasian Creed) is this, viz.: the invariable consequent of the coming together of ovum and sperm in human conception is a new human person. In Jesus' case there was no new person but the eternal Person acquiring, by addition and union, a human nature without a new human person. The personality of Jesus developed in permanent union with the Logos, the Second Person of the Godhead. The preferred theological word for this is enhypostasia—meaning simply in personality, not non-personality.

Besides, as J. Gresham Machen reminds the learned rejecters, the virgin birth is (1) 'obviously important for the general question of the authority of the Bible.'²³ (2) It 'is important as a test for a man to apply to determine whether one holds a naturalistic or supernaturalistic view regarding Christ.'²⁴ The fact that many writers of various shades of departure from the authority of Scripture can think they believe in a genuine incarnation apart from the factual teachings of the Bible is irrational. How can we learn anything factual from the Bible if its 'witness to revelation' cannot be held to tell facts as they are?

I think we can follow Machen further. In the last three pages of his great book he makes several affirmations regarding the importance of the virgin birth, viz.: (1) as an event in history 'it fixes for us the time of the incarnation' (25 December may not be the day, but there was a day!). 'It is not strange that it has always given offense to the natural man.'²⁵ (2) The virgin birth erects a barrier against Pelagianism, which rejects 'the solidarity of the race in the guilt and power of sin,' In Pelagianism no man is a sinner by nature. Sinlessness is entirely possible to any one who has enough help. Even some orthodox writers make sport of any necessary connection between our doctrine and our Lord's sinless nature. Machen wants to know 'how except by the virgin birth, could our Savior have lived a complete human life from the mother's womb, and yet [be] from the beginning no product of what had gone before, but a supernatural Person [the enhypastasia, to be treated further in Chapter VI] come into this world from the outside to redeem the sinful race?'²⁶ (3) And maybe the virgin birth is sometimes part of the intellectual content of saving faith. 'Who can tell exactly how much?... saving faith is acceptance of Jesus Christ "as he is offered to us in the gospel." Part of that gospel is which Jesus is offered to our souls in the blessed story of the miracle in the virgin's womb.'²⁷ (4) 'Even if the belief in the virgin birth is not necessary to every Christian, it is certainly necessary to Christianity ... necessary to the corporate witness of the Church ... and that ... witness is strongest when taken as it stands.'²⁸

4. It is charged the New Testament evidence for the virgin birth is weak. This is stated in different ways, viz.: only Matthew and Luke seem to know anything about it, or Jesus is completely unaware of it in Gospel reports, or there is no evidence in the Epistles that Paul or Peter and the other writers knew of any virgin birth. So perhaps it is a myth or legend that came to be incorporated in two Gospels. This in essence is to argue from silence. Because nothing is said about something by these writings does not demonstrate that Jesus was unaware and His disciples and Jewish contemporaries had heard no rumors of anything unusual about Jesus' manner of entrance into the world.

It is well to remember Matthew and Luke were likely written after most of the Epistles. For now, let us acknowledge that the conception of a baby is about as private a matter as this world knows.

Even today in the sad lack of shame about sins and vulgar exposure of intimacy, orderly, common people don't talk or write about how and when a pregnancy began without some embarrassment. So we should not be surprised if the subject was not bruited about promiscuously by Jesus' immediate family. Evidence of the virgin birth in the rest of the Bible will be treated more at length shortly.

5. There is said to be such similarity between the legends and myths of the birth of the gods and heroes of paganism that the accounts of Jesus' supernatural conception and birth surely originated not in fact but legend or myth. A legend is an unverifiable or unhistorical story from earlier times handed down and accepted as true. Myth is sometimes used in the same sense as legend. David Strauss (1808–1874) proposed myth as the origin of all the miracles of the Gospels—meaning unconscious exaggerations of devoted first disciples put in writing a century or two later. R. Bultmann in the recent past employed myth as a hermeneutical principle, that is, the Bible must today be interpreted not as history but as imagery to express the otherworldly in terms of human life, the other side in terms of this side. He adopts this opinion frankly on the ground of plain and simple rejection of the supernatural. He writes, 'the idea of wonder as miracle has become almost impossible for us today because we understand the processes of nature as governed by law';²⁹ 'We recognize as real ... only what can be set in this context of the rule of law; and we judge assertions which cannot be accommodated to this conception as fantasies';³⁰ 'The idea of miracle has, therefore, become untenable and it must be abandoned'³¹ (emphasis Bultmann's). Radical Gospels criticism recently has gone far beyond even this. Yet Bultmann wished to be regarded as a devout Lutheran.

With regard to the alleged myth-legend character of the virgin birth it will be sufficient for the believer to know that the classical myths of ancient heathendom (paganism or credulous rusticity, are not quite the words here for the sophisticated literature of these stories) have many stories of heroes and gods born to women who conceived by intercourse with supernatural beings in human form. Each one is an obscene tale. The Bible narratives are sober, chaste, transparently pure, sober reporting of what someone knew to be true. They are told as reports of miracles, usually known at least to two sane, surprised, overwhelmed but normal human beings in full possession of sound powers of sight, hearing, speech and of rational reflection.

Really this sort of rejection is based on presuppositions, prejudgment, one could say, prejudice. There can be no debate with this outlook. There is nothing compatible between belief and unbelief at this level. It is the zeitgeist of the world's intelligentsia today.

Through the rest of this chapter the goal is to consider the virgin birth of Jesus from the biblical perspective without intentional reference to apologetical questions. Let us now consider what the accounts say specifically about the conception and birth of the child, then move on to consider the nature and significance of the genealogies, next the background in the Old Testament, and after that the virgin birth in Jesus' own consciousness and in Mark and Luke as well as the New Testament outside the Gospels. The discussion will close with attention to problems and values and will be as succinct as the subject allows. There is an immense literature on almost every aspect of this outline in encyclopaedias, essays, monographs, commentaries and works of theology. I am indebted to all of them, particularly my own teachers, who had explored the subject at a time when it was the subject of much controversy. There is probably nothing original to be said about it but everything to affirm as to the facts and their meaning.

What the Accounts Affirm About Jesus' Conception and Birth and Surrounding Circumstances

Let us consider the virgin birth rather narrowly at first, with attention to what chief points the two accounts unite in affirming.

They agree (1) the mother's name was Mary, in Greek, Mariam, more recognizable as the well-known name of the sister of Moses. Such a name suggests she was from an un-Hellenized peasant family (Matt. 1:18, 20; Luke 1:27, 30, et passim). The mother is declared to be (2) a virgin both at the time of conception (Luke 1:27, 34; Matt. 1:18, 23) and, as Matthew says, she remained so until after being delivered of her child (Matt. 1:25; Luke 2:5). 3) She was betrothed to Joseph (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:27), but 4) before consummation of the marriage she became with child (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:34, 35) and 5) an angel made announcement of the fact (to Joseph, Matt. 1:20; to Mary, Luke 1:28–35). The accounts agree 6) the child was appropriately to be named Jesus (Greek equivalent of Hebrew, Jehoshua, the Lord saves) since he was to be Savior of His people (Matt. 1:21; Luke 1:31–33). 7) The name was commanded by an angel of God (Matt. 1:21, 25; Luke 1:31; 2:21). 8) The angel (or angels) explained to each parent that the conception would take place by the power of God—no hint of any carnal act by the deity (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:35). Like all biblical miracles, the precise, invisible, intangible cause is left unidentified. It is important to note, that pneuma hagion (holy spirit) in the angel's announcement to Mary is without the article on either word. It probably should be read, 'Holy Spirit will come upon you,' not really identifying at this point the one who 'proceeds from the Father and the Son.' The doctrine of the holy Trinity did not exist as a formulated dogma when the angel spoke. The basis for it was to be laid in the New Testament yet to be written, but for a couple of centuries the church directed its best theological thought to clarifying and defending a doctrine of the Second Person of the Godhead. A formal doctrine of the Trinity and the deity of the Third Person of the Trinity came later. It seems probable a divine power, not a divine Person, is meant. Gabriel is thus emphasizing special divine agency working in a special supernatural way, not the work of God's Spirit in natural processes contemplated in such Old Testament passages as Psalm 104:30, where God's general preservation and providence in nature is designated. Albright and Freedman assert, 'In Aramaic at this time there was no differentiation between the definite and the indefinite article. The absence of the definite article in Greek at this point is therefore not significant.'³² Perhaps so, but how can they be so sure? H. L. Strack and R. Billerbeck (warmly commended as indispensable to study of Matthew) say, 'the words signify the life-working creative power of God.'³³ This, of course, is not to say that the Third Person of the Godhead was not directly involved. Yet the emphasis of the passage is on the fact the virginal conception was by a creative act of God not that the Third Person of the Godhead begat Jesus the Son of Mary.

This view of the meaning of 'holy spirit' without the definite articles in the Greek text of Luke 1:35 (and the same in Luke 1:15; Matt. 1:18 and 20) is stated precisely by J. A. Fitzmeyer:

The Greek text has no definite article. The parallelism of 'holy spirit' and 'power of the Most High' is intended to let the phrases explain each other. The latter phrase indicates that the Spirit is understood in the OT sense of God's creative and active power present to human beings.³⁴

Fitzmeyer fully supports the doctrine of the Trinity but rightly finds here 'elements of the doctrine not the doctrine itself.'

Alford aptly refers Pneuma hagian to ‘the creative Spirit of God,’ Genesis 1:2. He goes on to say, ‘But as the world was not created by the Holy Ghost, but by the Son [John 1:1, 2] so also the Lord was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, but by the Father; and that before the worlds’ (Alford’s emphasis).³⁵ So also Charles John Ellicott.³⁶

9) Both accounts further report that the couple did not engage in conjugal intercourse until after the child was born (see above) and that there was no human fatherhood. In Matthew 1:16 (kjv), ‘Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus,’ ‘whom’ is hēs, feminine gender, indicating Mary alone. Further, it seems quite feasible, as many scholars have proposed, that at Luke 3:33 the end of the parenthesis is properly not after ‘supposed’ but after ‘Joseph’ (see above) and that though Mary is not mentioned (there are no women’s names anywhere in Luke’s genealogy), Mary is the daughter of Heli and Jesus the grandson of Heli. It was quite usual to skip generations in using the word son in this way (again see above).

It is therefore quite unfair to assert, as one commonly reads in critical treatments, that the accounts are in disagreement as to the facts. They are different as being complementary, why should they not be? There is no contradiction.

The Nature and Significance of the Genealogies and the Nativity Narratives

The only extended genealogy in the New Testament is of Jesus. Since His descent from Abraham and David was essential to His Messiahship, it was essential that an authentic line of descent should be known, especially considering that He was first manifest to Jews and that preaching the gospel during His ministry and for some years afterward (‘Jerusalem and in all Judea’ Acts 1:8) was only to ‘the lost sheep of the house of Israel.’ They were the first ones to be convinced the accounts of the virgin birth, oral or written, were authentic. We are certain that public records were kept of such matters at the time of Jesus’ birth. This is not contested by modern Jewish authorities. Joseph and Mary returned to Bethlehem to satisfy legal requirements of enrolment. Josephus declares, in some detail, how the public records were kept at Jerusalem by the priests. He claims that even in foreign lands all Jews ‘sent to Jerusalem the ancient names of their parents in writing, as well as those of their remote ancestors’ (Against Apion, 1, 6, 7).

Apologists and expositors have much to say about how the genealogies report different details, with different emphases and on different principles with different goals. It is amazing that with such differences (not discrepancies) the two narratives and genealogies come together on so many details indispensable to a consistent Christology. Matthew gives prominence to Joseph, in keeping with his purpose to show readers Jesus’ right to David’s throne through the line of David. It has been suggested that Matthew’s division into three groups of fourteen generations each is based on a typically Jewish use of symbolical numbers, derived in the style of gematria from the numerical value of the three Hebrew letters (no vowels in written Hebrew) of David’s name. David in Hebrew spelled DWD is the central member of the chain of ancestors (Matt. 1:6, 17 [twice], 20; cf. Luke 1:32). The numerical value is based on order in the alphabet, daleth D is fourth, hence value of four and waw W sixth, hence value of six. Four plus four plus six equals fourteen, the suggested basis of the three chains of fourteen. This may have meant little to Matthew, but likely would have impressed Jewish readers. (Douglas J. Culver, PhD in Hebraic Studies is the source of the above.)

Each genealogy has strong links with Old Testament Hebraic thought and culture, but Matthew's is especially so, in keeping with his apparent intention to address, instruct and convince Jewish readers. Matthew's genealogy therefore gives prominence to Joseph's lineal descent from David. We know not how many levirate marriages and other distinctly Mosaic or customary arrangements lie undisclosed or how many generations are skipped. Comparison with O.T. records suggests there are some. The genealogy at any rate emphasizes the Messianic line through David's royal family. The story of David's importance begins with 2 Samuel 7:12–13, where the throne is promised to David's dynasty 'for ever' several times. Then the theme is carried on through the books of Kings and Chronicles, the Prophets (especially Isaiah 7–12; cf. Jer. 17:25), and many of the royal Messianic Psalms (see Pss. 72; 89:35, 49; 132:1, 11). Matthew is demonstrating Jesus' legal right by legal line of descent from David through Joseph His legal father.

Luke has the same interest in the Davidic connection, but he also shows our Lord's connection as Son of Man (our Lord's favorite title for Himself) with universal humanity by tracing His ancestry back to Adam the first man. And, many would say by giving biological descent through Mary (in a literal sense 'from David's loins' herself) Luke demonstrates that in a literal sense Jesus was 'the fruit of David's loins, according to the flesh' (Acts 2:29, 30). Jesus is frequently addressed in the Gospels, even by strangers, as the 'son of David' and Paul made a point of it (Rom. 1:3).

If there were human sources employed (Luke 1:1–4) they had to be primarily from Joseph and Mary. In such a case Matthew's account appears to come from Joseph. If church tradition had anything to do with it (which it is not necessary to suppose owing to the overlapping of the generation when the Gospel was written and the lives of Jesus' brothers and sisters, the offspring of Joseph and Mary) then Joseph could have been the only once removed source of Matthew's information. It is hard to imagine the development of such a sober statement of facts as folk tradition even among devout peasants, of whom Matthew, at least, certainly was not. He had been a hard-boiled tax farmer. Luke's more sophisticated Greek is interrupted by the large 'island' of Hebraic Greek in the birth narrative. The oracle-like, poetic expressions of Zechariah (Luke 1:67–79), Elizabeth (Luke 1:41–45), Simeon (Luke 2:28–32), and Mary (Luke 1:46–55), the lead personalities in the narrative, constitute this 'island' of Hebrew (Aramaic) thought in literal translation. This indicates Luke quoted unrevised sources leading back to these very people.

Critics almost invariably cite the absence of genealogies and virgin birth narrative in Mark and John as supposed evidence there is something doubtful about the two we do have. In response, let it first be said it suited Mark's purpose in developing his main theme of Jesus the Servant of God not to introduce the topic of origins. Slaves need no pedigree. Further, Mark clearly intended to be brief and to the point, to create an atmosphere of urgency throughout, as his employment of eutheos (straightaway, immediately, forthwith) over forty times demonstrates. No time for pedigrees! Throughout John's first chapter it is the full humanity of the incarnate Word which is emphasized, as we say now, incarnation. Ginomai, 'became' or 'was made' (John 1:14) has no reference to natural birth at all and should not be rendered 'born.' It is to be regretted that niv translators at Galatians 4:4 ignore (or were ignorant of) the important point which the best ancient theologians made on the difference between ginomai and gennao, to bear, give birth, in reference to aspects of the incarnation. The very fact that Paul uses ginomai, 'made of a woman' rather than 'born of a woman' has suggested to generations of learned scholars that Paul was pointedly indicating something unusual about the birth of Jesus, even though he did enter the world through a birth canal, just as the rest of us do. Paul shifts to gennaō, to bear, give birth, in the same chapter, three times later on (Gal. 4:22, 24, 29).

The Virgin Birth in the Other Gospels and in the Consciousness of Jesus Himself

Mark and John, as noted earlier, say nothing directly about the virgin birth of Jesus. Negative criticism says this is because they knew nothing about it. The contrary is more likely. These books are not ‘Lives of Christ’ but summaries of His redemptive career and in John’s case, a definition of who Jesus is. What book, for example, about Abraham Lincoln’s presidency of a little more than four years would devote pages to his birth in Kentucky and boyhood in another state and early manhood in still another? A biography would do that. Yet such a book might provide indirect allusions or signs of generally understood awareness of his ‘first estate.’

It is quite to be expected then, that given Mark’s evident purpose (see above) he should come immediately (one of his pet words) to the ministry of the forerunner, John, which began only months before Jesus’ baptism, temptation and the calling of the first disciples (Mark 1:1–20). Yet there is indirect evidence that even the common people of Nazareth and environs (‘his own country,’ Mark 6:1 kjv) may have been aware that Joseph was not His sire (to use the plain word), for they depart from the common form ‘the son of so and so’ (and the Aramaic Bar Jonah [Peter] Bar Nabas—Barnabas, Son of Consolation), rather saying, ‘Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?’ This is a very unusual mode of identifying a first-century Jew among his neighbors. When they follow with names of brothers and reference to sisters it appears from this side to reveal a very clear community consciousness of ‘a story,’ perhaps a scandal. Matthew’s account in nearly the same words (Matt. 13:54–57) instead of ‘Is not this the carpenter?’ (Mark 6:3) has ‘Is not this the carpenter’s son?’ and perhaps shows a similar diffidence about the matter for though Mary and her sons are named, Joseph, her husband, is not.

Only by prior rejection of the testimony of the early church as well as the claims of John’s Gospel for itself (John 20:30, 31; cf. 1 John 1:1–3) can one insist the Gospel of John is a tendentious composition to support an elaborate Christology originating in an ethnic myth. This claim by Rudolph Bultmann and disciples is complicated and has been rebutted by believing scholars. Researches in history of the first centuries of our era do not support the Bultmannian frontal attack.

An alternate reading of the Greek text of John 1:13 would put a direct allusion to the virgin birth in the Prologue. ‘Who,’ the first word in the verse, in the Greek of the alternate reading is singular, referring to Christ, viz., ... his name, who (singular) was born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man but of God.’ The textual evidence for this reading while not decisive is substantial, enough to convince a number of modern scholars.³⁷ Whether correct or not, the fact that very ancient readings of the text thus imply the virgin birth and that Tertullian, Origen, Ambrose and Augustine adopted the reading is further evidence of belief in the virgin birth from the beginning.

However we understand the details of Mary’s pregnancy and Joseph’s dilemma (Matt. 1:18, 19) we may surmise the village rumor and gossip mill of Nazareth was buzzing with it—for, even though the infant son was a legitimate son of Joseph, he was born less than six months after the mother ‘was found with child’ and began living with Joseph. (Strack and Billerbeck say according to rabbinic law a newly widowed woman could not marry until three months after the decease of her husband, because until then she could not know for sure she was not pregnant.) ³⁸ Hence, though Joseph then ‘took unto him his wife,’ that is, she moved out of her parent’s house and into his, it would have been common knowledge that ‘the baby was three months early.’ H. A. W. Meyer³⁹ and many others since his time have argued that the virgin birth has no connection at all with either the incarnation or His sinless nature. It is not uncommon to read a pronouncement like Meyer’s that there is not ‘the slightest whisper of so hostile a report’ (p. 47) and apart from ‘the preliminary history (Matt. 1; Luke 1) no glimpse of this doctrine appears anywhere in the N.T.’⁴⁰ But are these opinions fully justifiable?

Let us take note of two rather extended passages of the fourth Gospel. In the judgment of some competent believing scholars, properly to interpret chapter 6, one must hold in mind that Jesus Himself was fully aware of the unique manner of His conception and birth. Also, that the fickle crowd who followed from Tiberias to the Capernaum synagogue were quite aware of the ‘scandal’ of His birth. The second passage, chapter 8, is probably incapable of full explanation without His own awareness and at least some rumor of it among the temple crowd who listened to His great discourse on this occasion. This was so fierce an encounter that, as Westcott notes, it occasioned ‘the first open assault upon the Lord with violence’ (compare vv. 20 and 59).

After the crowd of 5,000 plus had pursued Jesus to the area of Capernaum synagogue He delivered a discourse (in the following I cite the rsv only) on the bread of life (John 6:22–40) that was interrupted frequently by murmuring of ‘the Jews.’ For true life, He said, they must eat of ‘the bread of God’ (v. 33) ‘which comes down from heaven’ (v. 33). He told them ‘I have come down from heaven’ (v. 38). That ‘ticked them off,’ as the saying goes (v. 41). He said much more about salvation and about faith, but what added puzzlement to anger among His listeners (v. 52) was the sentence ‘the bread which I shall give for the life of the world is my flesh’ (v. 51). The controversy, as it developed to this point, was simply about His human origin. This suggests at the very least that the question of His birth was already a live issue, especially among His fellow Galileans. If the crowd was not aware of the matter (and I cannot prove they were) the language Jesus used makes certain that the seed in Mary’s womb which grew to an infant delivered on Christmas Day originated not in Joseph but in some sense ‘came down from heaven.’ The text is plain, it seems to me, that ‘the bread’ is ‘my flesh’ (not the eternal Son Himself in this text) ‘which came down.’ Is this not Jesus’ language in John’s Gospel for what the angel in Matthew and Luke referred to as ‘that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit,’ i.e. of divine power (Matt. 1:20 and similar language in Luke 1:35)? The ‘flesh,’ or human nature of Christ did not ‘come down from heaven’ except that the divine power from heaven quickened the virgin’s womb with the conception of the ‘man, Christ Jesus.’ Jesus was frequently quite oblique in speaking with His enemies and this is one occasion when He seemed purposely both pointed and vague.

The eighth chapter of John focuses on His claim, ‘I am the light of the world’ (v. 12). This claim is connected with His further assertion, ‘I know whence I have come and whither I am going’ (v. 14). Then He added, ‘the Father ... sent me,’ etc. (v. 18). At this point ‘They [Pharisees, v. 13] said to him ... “Where is your Father?”’ (v. 19). The Versions generally capitalize the ‘F’ of Father in the Pharisee’s question and most commentators defend it. But no less theologian than Augustine as well as Bede, the Venerable, and the scholars W. M. L. de Wette and Hermann Olshausen thought Pharisees meant a physical, human father⁴¹ and some suppose, as I think possible, there may have been an allusion to the reputation of bastardy.

In the verses following Jesus makes further claims of His heavenly origin and of His soon return there, to which the Jews respond by ‘Who are you?’ (v. 25). Amid all the adjacent bitter words of ‘the Jews’ and Jesus’ very severe responses, the issue of paternal origin becomes paramount: they say, ‘We are descendants [seed kjv] of Abraham’ (v. 33); ‘Abraham is our father’ (v. 39). Jesus says, ‘I know that you are descendants of Abraham [physically, of course]’ (v. 37) and ‘If you were Abraham’s children [spiritually], you would do what Abraham did’ (v. 39). The Jews respond, ‘We were not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God’ (v. 41).

It is difficult to know exactly what they meant by this denial. Are they speaking of true spiritual relation to God or have they descended to the insulting suggestion that Jesus was conceived out of wedlock? Passing over the next part of the dialogue, these particular Jews (who formerly had believed in Him, v. 31) tear into Him, saying, ‘Are we not right in saying that you are a Samaritan and have a demon?’ (v. 48). The Samaritans were ‘half-breeds,’ half Jew, half Gentile in origin, so they may be broadly hinting He had a Gentile father (a Roman soldier?).

One cannot erase from this passage the possibility that this group of bitter Jewish enemies of Jesus were throwing up more than a hint of bastardy and mixed ancestry—on account of the Nazareth rumors of His mother’s pregnancy before full marriage to her husband.

The usual interpretation supposes that ‘born of fornication’ (v. 41) reflects the Old Testament, which frequently equates idolatry with fornication, and Jesus’ Jewish attackers are protesting that He, having already acknowledged their physical descent from Abraham should acknowledge their spiritual sonship too. He had just accused them of being the devil’s children. This may be true, but not necessarily.

I quote Raymond E. Brown whose three large volumes (Anchor Bible) on ‘John’ are as thorough a canvas of scholarship on the book as ever has appeared in English. After briefly taking note of the more common view that I have just described he says:

But there is another possibility: the Jews may be turning to an ad hominem argument against Jesus. He has been talking about his heavenly Father and about their father, but were there not rumors about his own birth? Was there not some question of whether he was really the son of Joseph? The Jews may be saying, ‘We were not born illegitimate [but you were].’⁴²

When Philip referred to Jesus as ‘Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph’ he was in a normal way distinguishing Him from others of the same name at Nazareth as we distinguish between Robert Smithwick, my brother-in-law, from Robert Hood who lives in the same neighborhood. But ‘son of Mary’ at Mark 6:3 is rather strange in the mouth of people of His home town and ‘may be an insinuation of illegitimacy.’⁴³ Ethelbert Stauffer, Jesus and His Story, takes a similar view.⁴⁴ Origen tells how a certain Jew claimed Mary was ‘turned out of doors’ by Joseph once he found he had married a pregnant girl. Later her son, Jesus, hired out as a servant in Egypt ‘and having acquired some miraculous powers, on which the Egyptians pride themselves, returned to his own country ... and by means of these proclaimed himself a God.’⁴⁵

Convinced of this understanding by Professor A. J. McClain in my student days, I wavered on account of lack of support by many major scholars, Father Brown's sturdy Christological orthodoxy and support encouraged me to study further and to introduce it here. Brown's acceptance of the now widely spread view especially among Roman Catholic scholars, that John chapter 6 is a sort of misplaced Eucharistic liturgy or Last Supper discourse of course lends no support for my earlier remarks on John chapter 6.

We must not press the matter further. I add that all through John, especially chapter 17, Jesus addresses the Father God in a way that seems inexplicable apart from two assumptions. The first, that Jesus recognized no male being on earth, living or dead as His father.

To this point Warfield rightly wrote:

It is just in proportion as men lost their sense of Divine personality of ... Immanuel, God with us, that they are found to doubt the necessity of the virgin birth; while in proportion as ... this fact remains vivid and vital with them, do they instinctively feel that it is alone consonant with that this Being should acknowledge none other father than that Father which is in heaven, from whom alone he came forth to save the world.⁴⁶

Secondly, the absence of a direct statement about the virgin birth suggests the author of the fourth Gospel assumed that all his believing readers knew about the virgin birth of the main subject of his narrative. It is not possible adequately to answer Jesus' question, 'What do you think about the Christ? Whose son is he?' (Matt. 22:42) without reference to the virgin birth or at least to assume it—and it seems entirely reasonable, I think, that no writer of the New Testament attempted to do so.

The Virgin Birth in New Testament Doctrine

In the fledgling journal, Christianity Today (vol. iv, 7 December 1959), most of the total of forty pages (about three and a half of advertisements, a little news) was devoted to four excellent articles on the virgin birth and an editorial by C. F. H. Henry on the same subject. Five years later (vol. ix, 18 December 1964, more news, fewer advertisements) the same journal again featured the virgin birth. In the earlier number an article by E. J. Carnell of Fuller Seminary claimed no connection at all between the virgin birth and 'Christ's incarnation' or 'Christ's sinlessness.' He said its significance was chiefly as a miraculous sign, like the smoking furnace and flaming torch to Abraham, Moses' rod and Gideon's fleece. I note the more recent work of Lewis and Demarest seems to endorse this.⁴⁷ Quite to the contrary, the earlier article in Christianity Today by James Taylor, then of Ayr Scotland, argued that the virgin birth is important both for our understanding of Christianity and the Person of Christ. The brief article finds in the virgin birth (1) attestation of predictive prophecy by fulfillment, (2) a miraculous sign of the presence of God's kingdom on earth in Christ, (3) 'the presence of mystery' as 'the footprint of the divine,' (4) 'unique attestation of the person of the Saviour,' and states, with support from Warfield⁴⁸ (5) 'the redemptive work of Christ depends on his supernatural birth to the virgin Mary.'

Warfield vigorously affirmed in the first place:

His supernatural birth [in the sense of special miracle] is given already ... in his supernatural life and his supernatural work, and forms an indispensable [emphasis added] element in the supernatural religion which he founded ... the supernatural birth of Jesus is a necessity ... not ... unnatural or contra-natural, but distinctly supernatural.⁴⁹

In this I concur.

Jesus said He was not 'out of this world' (ek tou kosmou toutou) indicating source, and that He came down from heaven. He was born into our race but His Person, the eternal Logos, was not of our race. He came down from heaven. Who is to say the Logos could have taken to Himself humanity without creating another human person, resulting in dual personality (an ancient heresy) apart from virgin birth? The incarnation was voluntary but not lawless. The invariable result of usual conception by a male and female coming together is a new person with a distinct, personal center of consciousness. The virgin birth was different. The incarnate Son was 'made of a woman' (Gr. ginomai) according to Galatians 4:4 (kjv). This occurred in conception, gestation and birth when 'the Son' (Gr.) was 'sent forth' by God. It is a grievous error to mistranslate the verb ginomai, to become, as though it were gennaō, to be born or to bear a child, as the niv does at Galatians 4:4. The whole process: virginal conception, the gestation and the birth 'of a woman' are in view.

Furthermore, to redeem sinners, the Savior must be without sins or sin nature. I do not know where Carnell got the notion '[T]he apostles trace Christ's sinlessness to his holy life.' But the rule of nature since Adam, whether the soul be generated in the ordinary way by two parents or created specially by God is that ordinary procreation results in a sinful being who performs sinfully. Of course Mary was a sinner but the chain of cause-effect was broken in Jesus' case. The single case in all human history of birth of a sinless man came by virginal conception. Does not the angel's message strongly suggest so? Among theologians born of women 'there hath not risen a greater' lately than James Orr, author of a famous book⁵⁰ on the virgin birth of Jesus, editor of the ISBE and the major article therein on Jesus Christ. Orr wrote,

The announcement itself was of the most amazing import.... He would be 'holy' from the womb (Luke 1:35).... The holiness of Jesus is here put in connection with His miraculous conception, and surely rightly. In no case in the history of mankind has natural generation issued in a being who is sinless, not to say superhuman. The fact that Jesus, even in His human nature, was supernaturally begotten ... does not exclude the higher and eternal Sonship according to the divine nature.⁵¹

The modern revised Greek text rightly excludes 'of the' after 'born.' A literal rendering will read, 'Holy spirit will come upon thee [sing.], and [the] Highest's power will shade upon thee [sing.]. Therefore also [dio kai] the [def. art.] thing born [neuter] shall be called God's son' (Luke 1:35). The words 'therefore also' (dio kai) join the 'inferential conjunction' with also, 'denoting that the inference is self evident' (Bauer Lexicon). Bauer lists Luke 1:35 among seven New Testament examples of this usage. Once the second 'of thee' has been properly eliminated it is clear that the begetting is by Holy Spirit and Highest power not Mary. Begetting is normally a male function not female (though sometimes the word is used otherwise in the New Testament). So, because begotten by divine potency not human male potency, 'the inference is self-evident' (Bauer) that the holy thing (neuter grammatical gender not physical gender) is called God's Son. That there is causal connection, therefore, between the virginal conception by divine power and the holiness of the One who after His birth was to be called God's Son seems to be affirmed (Meyer). There is no immaculate virgin here. But there is an immaculate ‘thing born’ and that because of a miraculous conception.

The Practical Importance and Values of the Virgin Birth

Much has already appeared in this chapter on the matter of the practical importance and values of the fact of the virgin birth and of believing it to be a fact. It has been vigorously defended by exponents and apologists from the earliest times of which we have record—from Justin Martyr, Ignatius and Irenaeus, among others—on to the latest evangelical or Roman Catholic Bible dictionary. J. Gresham Machen, of Princeton, later one of the founding faculty of Westminster Theological Seminary and in some respects the leader of the American resurgence of Protestant orthodoxy, dedicated years of scholarly effort to the defense of this doctrine in The Virgin Birth of Christ (1932) already cited in this chapter as also did James Orr (The Virgin Birth of Jesus, 1907). The following remarks therefore draw from the veritable ocean of what has been said often before but needs to be said again. Like the gospel message itself, of which the virgin birth of Jesus is a part, related simply and earnestly in three chapters of two Gospels and assumed by all the rest of the New Testament, the importance and values of the virgin birth must be declared anew to every generation.

1. The virgin birth is essential to the trustworthiness of the Bible itself, not least the Gospels, the only source available as to how our Lord and Savior entered this world.

It is perfectly clear that the New Testament teaches the virgin birth of Christ; about that there can be no manner of doubt. There is no serious question as to the interpretation of the Bible at this point. Everyone admits the Bible represents Jesus as having been conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary. The only question is whether in making that representation the Bible is true or false.⁵²

Assertions like these will have little force with authors of the amazing volume of contemporary literature in ‘search for the historical Jesus,’ all of which disregards any possibility of the supernatural and rejects the claims of the Gospels themselves to authenticity. If, however, one wishes to read the Gospels with acceptance of what they really say he will find this doctrine spread across the first page of the first Gospel and the first chapter of the third. How can one believe much of anything for sure of the rest of the New Testament if he rejects the foundational message?

2. Knowing as every Christian does, the importance of our Lord’s holiness (impeccability, sinlessness), it is important that the record connects the fact of Jesus’ holiness with miraculous conception by divine power (Luke 1:35) as also His being the Savior of His people (Matt. 1:21). We have reasoned earlier that the words ‘Holy Spirit’ being without the article (‘Holy Spirit,’ Luke 1:35, also Matt. 1:18 and 20) and joined in parallel with ‘power of Highest’ (again no article) signify simply the supernatural power of God rather than the Third Person of the Trinity. ‘The parallel between the two expressions indicates that the one should be interpreted by the other’ (Lange’s Commentary, loc. cit.). James Orr, in the five-volume encyclopaedia of which he was general editor, comments on the above expressions:

He would be ‘holy’ from the womb.... His name was to be Jesus ... denoting Him as Savior. The holiness of Jesus is here put in connection with His miraculous conception, and surely rightly. In no case in the history of mankind has natural generation issued in a being who is sinless, not to say superhuman.⁵³

3. Even in our post-modern age of ethical relativism and the growing influence of evolutionary psychology of sex, it is of some importance that unless Mary was still a virgin, as Matthew and Luke say, when her first born was delivered she was the immoral, youthful mother of a bastard. This state of affairs would be disgraceful now even as then—the mother an object of rejection and pity rather than what she is in the Gospels, a pious, prayerful, devout and pure servant of God. The alternatives are simply unacceptable. Subsequent generations, just as she herself foresaw, have rightly risen to call Mary ‘blessed’ (Luke 1:48) and as the angel promised, she remains ‘blessed ... among women’ (Luke 1:28 kjv). The Madonna of Hollywood and rock music is the parody: Mary the reality of pure motherhood.

4. The virgin birth provides a reasonable explanation for how a divine Being who is without beginning might take to Himself a human nature without the procreation of a new person. A. J. McClain, dean of Ashland Seminary and later first president of Grace Theological Seminary and long-time professor of theology said:

The virgin birth gives the only reasonable explanation of the incarnation of God’s Son in human flesh. The natural result of human procreation is ordinarily the beginning of a new person. But Christ did not get personhood through two parents. He was a person before he was born. There was therefore no need for the usual procreative process to bring into existence a new person. Such a process would have been out of the question. Employment of the ordinary procreation process would have required a special miracle to avoid a dual personality.⁵⁴

The author of those sentences understood well the requirements of the creedal articles of Chalcedon and Quicumque Volt. The virgin birth was therefore both important and apparently necessary.

5. The foundation of the ‘high Christology’ of the creeds and of orthodox Christianity from that day to this came directly out of the virgin birth record of Matthew and Luke. This becomes evident first in the early second century in the writings of Justin Martyr and Ignatius, later in the century in those of Irenaeus. This doctrine was at the heart of discussion and debate of the idea of incarnation as well as the two natures of Christ. The manner of Jesus’ birth was foundational in these discussions. Many modern writers have pointed out that in that early day when the chief antagonist was a corrupt but sophisticated heathenism the miracle of supernatural conception and virgin birth was set forth as the prime proof of Jesus’ divinity and of the incarnation. This is easily demonstrated (Machen cites the literature fully in chap. 1, ‘The Virgin Birth in the Second Century,’ pp. 2–43) and the literature readily available in volume I of The Antenicene Fathers and The Apostolic Fathers by Lightfoot.

6. The virgin birth is a necessary, constituent part of an incarnation that was and is supernatural, as well as natural, through and through. One well said, ‘[I]t cannot be denied that the supernatural birth of Jesus enters constituously into the substance of that system which is taught in the New Testament as Christianity—that it is the expression of its supernaturalism, the safeguard of its doctrine of incarnation.’⁵⁵

7. In a practical way the virgin birth tests whether a theologian or a theology is approaching Christianity with wholly naturalistic assumptions or is open to the supernatural. We live in an age of serial attacks on plain understanding of plain speech such as we find in the Bible. These have come from many quarters since the beginning of the Age of Reason, or the Enlightenment—none more persistent than in theology and hermeneutics (interpretation) of literature. It is not uncommon in liberal literature to read approving references to ‘the Easter event’ or ‘resurrection faith’ of the disciples or of the ‘presence of the divine’ in Jesus or even of ‘the deity of Christ.’ Yet the purpose of the author of the statements may be to deny or at least subvert the bodily resurrection of the flesh of Jesus and the ‘very God of very God’ of Jesus as is the plain sense of all the orthodox creeds and the Scripture passages underlying the creeds. The result has been an ‘abysmal intellectual morass’ in which it is hard to know who the confessors of Jesus really are.

The virgin birth furnishes a better test. As Machen stated the case: ‘If a man affirms that Jesus was born without a human father, being conceived by the Holy Ghost in the virgin’s womb, it is difficult to see how he can escape the plain meaning.’⁵⁶ This does not make the virgin birth central to the structure of Christian doctrine and the ‘plan of salvation,’ but it is a useful test. If, as Emil Brunner does say, the virgin birth is an unnecessary teaching, an incubus so to speak, that Christianity is better off without it, we know about where to place him in reference to orthodox Christianity.

8. On the contrary, the miraculous conception and virgin birth of Jesus have an importance all their own. Even children seem to understand this, perhaps better than their tutors. Christianity as we know it would be a different religion in its public expression in worship and in personal piety would not be the same.

It was a correct instinct which put the virgin birth—miraculous conception—in the ‘rule of faith’ expressed in the very earliest of post-apostolic confessions, catechisms and creeds. Some of these have been convincingly traced back to the first third of the second century.⁵⁷ These found permanent expression in the Old Roman Creed,⁵⁸ then ‘the Apostles’ Creed’ so-called, then in the great ecumenical creeds and on to the present in almost every formal statement of church doctrine.

It was the same right impulse which made the virgin birth a major issue in the developing denial of historical Christianity in nineteenth-century liberalism and the response of alarmed believing scholars. James Orr, ‘Defender of the Faith’ as Peter Toon calls him in *The Gospel Magazine*⁵⁹ could produce his magnum opus, The Christian View of God and the World (1893), scarcely mentioning the virgin birth, but fourteen years later he produced a supplement, so to speak, The Virgin Birth of Christ (1907). This work, at a critical moment in the developing apologetics of orthodoxy, helped to cause the virgin birth to be understood by embattled defenders of orthodox faith of the time as a ‘fundamental.’ J. Gresham Machen in his 1930 book of similar title, affirming the same faith, but more from strict historical critical perspective, was as much as any man then alive the founder of the fundamentalist movement. These men, whom we should rise to call their names blessed, had the right instinct when, just as the framers of the ancient catholic rule of faith and later of the Apostles’ Creed, they named ‘the virgin birth’ among ‘the fundamentals’ of the faith which call for special defense (not that they summarize all Christian beliefs). They meant to designate truths that cannot be abandoned without abandoning Christianity. It was the distinct privilege of The General Assembly of the Northern Presbyterian Church in 1910 to affirm ‘five essential doctrines as under attack in the church: the inerrancy of Scripture, the virgin birth of Christ, the substitutionary atonement of Christ, Christ’s bodily resurrection, and the historicity of the miracles.’⁶⁰ It was fitting that in The fundamentals, twelve volumes of articles published in Chicago between 1910 and 1915 as ‘witness to the central doctrines of and experiences of Christianity, and as a defense against numerous ... criticisms of orthodoxy’⁶¹ one of the leading authors should be James Orr on the subject of ‘The Virgin Birth of Christ.’

¹ Bernhrd Weiss, Life of Christ trans. J. W. Hope, vol. i (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1883), p. 222.

² L. M. Sweet, art. ‘Virgin Birth of Jesus,’ ISBE, ed. J. Orr (Grand Rapids, MI: Wm B. Eerdmans, 1939), p. 3052.

³ Henry S. Bettenson, ed., Documents of the Christian Church (New York: Oxford University Press, 1963), p. 33.

⁴ ibid., p. 37.

⁵ Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, The Virgin Birth in the Second Century (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1967), chap. 1, pp. 2–43.

⁶ Ignatius in Ante-Nicene Fathers, i, ed. Roberts and Donaldson, 1885, repr. (Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), p. 57.

⁷ ibid., p. 86.

⁸ Justin Martyr (in Ante-Nicene Fathers, i, ed. Roberts and Donaldson, 1885, repr. Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), chaps. xliii, p. 216 and lxvii, p. 231.

⁹ B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1952), p. 158.

¹⁰ Eusebius in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Second Series i, ed P. Schaff, 1886, repr., Peabody (Hendrickson Publ., 1994), chap. 1, pp. 91–99.

¹¹ Eusebius, Church History, i, trans. Isaac Boyle (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1850, 1969), p. 7.

¹² John F. Walvoord, Jesus Christ Our Lord (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), p. 104.

¹³ Henry Alford, New Testament for English Readers (Chicago: Moody Press, 1868), p. 314.

¹⁴ Harold Lindsell, Harper Study Bible Revised Standard Version (New York: Harper & Row, 1964), p. 1536.

¹⁵ Samuel Andrews, The Life of Our Lord Upon the Earth (New York: Scribners, 1891), pp. 58–68.

¹⁶ Emil Brunner, The Mediator: A Study of the Central Doctrine of the Christian Faith, trans. Olive Wyon (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1947), pp. 322, 323, 329, 361, 362.

¹⁷ John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, 2nd ed. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1977), pp. 280–282, 299, 395.

¹⁸ Wolfhart Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. ii, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991–1994), pp. 303 (n. 92), 317–319.

¹⁹ ibid., p. 366.

²⁰ ibid., p. 318.

²¹ ibid., p. 319.

²² A. C. Custance, The Seed of the Woman (Brockville, Ont.: Doorway Publications, 1980).

²³ J. Gresham Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1967), p. 282 ff.

²⁴ ibid., pp. 287 ff.

²⁵ ibid., p. 394.

²⁶ ibid., p. 395.

²⁷ ibid., p. 396.

²⁸ ibid., p. 496.

²⁹ Rudolph Bultmann, Faith and Understanding (London: SCM Press, 1969), p. 247.

³⁰ ibid., p. 248.

³¹ ibid., p. 249.

³² W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Matthew vol. 26. The Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1981), p. 8.

H. L. Strack and R. Billerbeck Kommentar Zum Neuen Testament Aus Talmud und Midrasch, 6 volumes, Herman L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck

³³ H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar Zum Neuen Testamentum aus Talmud und Midrasch, i (Munich: C. H. Beck'sche, 1969), p. 48, 49.

³⁴ J. A. Fitzmeyer, The Gospel According to Luke i–ix. Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1981), p. 351.

³⁵ Alford, NT for English Readers, p. 296.

³⁶ Charles J. Ellicott, Editor, Ellicott's Commentary on the Whole Bible, vol. vi (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1954), p. 247.

³⁷ Bruce M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek NT, p. 196, 197 and the United Bible Societies ed. of the Greek New Testament of 1966, textual notes on John 1:13.

³⁸ H. L. Strack and P. Billenbeck, op. cit., pp. 47, 48.

³⁹ H. A. W. Meyer, Critical and Exegetical Commentary to the Gospel of Matthew, trans. from the 6th ed. by F. Crombie and W. Stewart (New York: Funk & Wagnalle, 1884), pp. 45–48.

⁴⁰ ibid. p. 48.

⁴¹ ibid., vol. ii, p. 268.

⁴² Raymond E. Brown, The Gospel According to John, i–xii. Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966), p. 357.

⁴³ ibid., on John 1:45, pp. 82–83.

⁴⁴ Ethelbert Stauffer, Jesus and His Story (London: SCM, 1960), pp. 23–25.

⁴⁵ Origen, Against Celsus, in Ante-Nicene Fathers, i (ed. Roberts and Donaldson, 1885, repr.

Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), 1:28, p. 408.

⁴⁶ Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies, p. 164.

⁴⁷ Gordon Lewis and Bruce Demarest. Integrative Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1990), pp. 273 ff.

⁴⁸ Warfield, 'The Supernatural Birth of Jesus,' in Biblical and Theological Studies, p. 161.

⁴⁹ ibid., pp. 161, 163.

⁵⁰ James Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ (London: 1907).

⁵¹ James Orr, art 'Jesus Christ,' ISBE v, pp. 1631–1632.

^{Bauer} Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

⁵² Machen, Virgin Birth, p. 382.

⁵³ Orr, ISBE iii, pp. 1631, 1632.

⁵⁴ McClain, from Robert D. Culver's handwritten record of the lecture.

⁵⁵ Warfield, 'The Supernatural Birth of Jesus,' in Biblical and Theological Studies, p. 167.

⁵⁶ Machen, Virgin Birth, p. 390.

⁵⁷ Machen, Virgin Birth, chap. 1, 'The Virgin Birth in the Second Century.'

⁵⁸ Bettenson, Docs of Christian Church, p. 33.

⁵⁹ The Gospel Magazine, August 1972, as cited in art. 'James Orr,' Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, Baker Books, 1984), p. 804.

⁶⁰ Carl T. McIntyre, 'Fundamentalism,' Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 435.

⁶¹ ibid., p. 436.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (469). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

This chapter concentrates attention to the meaning of the incarnation in Scripture and in the church.

The doctrine of the triune God is presupposed in the doctrine of the incarnation of the Son of God. In Scripture and history of doctrine the Father is distinguished from the Son and Spirit by paternity, the Son from the Father and Spirit by filiation, the Spirit from the Son and Father by procession. Now that we have considered our Lord's preexistence as eternal Son, His full deity and humanity in full integrity and supernatural entrance into the world we must pursue closer attention to what incarnation (Latin for enfleshment) involved. It is sometimes said to be an act of humiliation, condescension or kenosis in some recent theology. The characterization of the incarnation as a kenosis or self-emptying will be examined in chapter 10. Let us devote first attention to how the doctrinal expression developed in the church.

The Central Message from the Beginning

We know when and where the followers of Jesus first came to be called Christians (Acts 11:26). The sermons of the first chapters of the book of Acts are evidence of why. They are about 'Jesus of Nazareth' at first, 'a man [emphasis added] attested . . . by God with mighty works and wonders and signs' (Acts 2:22), One who is nevertheless also 'Lord and Christ' (Acts 2:34–36). These were the first efforts, by a fisherman turned Apostle, to state a public, agreed Christology. The seeds of the highest whole-Bible, truly ecumenical theology are all there, viz.: Jesus is man, He is Lord, the Jehovah of the Old Testament, and He is Christ—the 'coming one' of prophecy—and Savior of men (cf. Matt. 1:21). Some or all of these features of a doctrine of Christ's Person, nature and work prevail in every biblical expression of Christian witness: short and pithy (as Acts 16:30) or extended as Peter to Cornelius' household (Acts 10:34–43) and Paul's addresses from Acts chapter 13 onward. It is therefore clear why ancient believers were named 'Christians' by their neighbors in Antioch (Acts 11:26; cf. 26:28; and 1 Peter 4:16). These people knew nothing important to talk about save One who had by now come to be known as 'the Lord Jesus Christ'—not the name Jesus preceded by a modifier (Lord) and followed by the name of an office (Messiah-Christ) but now a compound name.

The Unique Apostolic Message and Claims

This message and accompanying claims were unique. Though certain parallels have been alleged in pagan mythology of gods coming to earth as men and of men attaining deity by heroic deeds, it must be acknowledged that pagan antiquity quickly came to understand the uniqueness of Christian preachment of Jesus Christ, even though more than two centuries passed before the message received legal recognition as tolerable. It was shortly given permanent form in the apostolic and prophetic literary deposit we call the New Testament.

The Mystery and the Name

We know of no apostolic writings to 'explain' the mystery of Christ (Eph. 3:4; Col. 4:3) to unbelievers—either Jewish or Gentile. Nor does any passage of the apostolic and prophetic Scripture really explain One who is Savior, Lord-God, Christ and Man of Nazareth. His grace and truth are proclaimed; his Person, divinity, humanity and career are stated and sometimes defended; but never is the slightest effort made to solve the unavoidable intellectual question of how one Person could honestly be the subject of all those momentous claims.

Later, when theology came to be a self-conscious effort of scholars, the word incarnation was coined as apparently a specifically Christian word for the event of ‘Christ-came’ and that aspect of Christology that relates to His nature and Person.¹

The Classical Text

John, the author of the fourth Gospel, says he wrote it in order to cause men to believe ‘Jesus is the Christ’ (John 20:30, 31). He therefore began with eighteen verses devoted exclusively to a theological statement of the incarnation, captured in a nutshell at verse 14: ‘And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth’ (in the kjv).

Later we shall return to this classical text to examine the precise meaning of every word and relation of each to the central affirmation of our religion, setting it so far apart from ethnic religious systems it scarcely fits the category of ‘religion.’

Biblical Terms for the Incarnation

There is considerable variety of expressing the incarnation in the New Testament. John states God sent ‘his Son into the world’ (John 3:17) and many times more in John’s Gospel; John 3:13 that he ‘descended from heaven’ and ‘came down from heaven’ (John 6:51). The Baptist referred to Him as ‘the one who is to come’ (Matt. 11:3) and later Jesus says ‘the Son of Man came’ (Matt. 20:28). In the language of space and time these several expressions speak of a transfer from heaven of God to the world of men. He came ‘from there to here.’

Sometimes the incarnation is said to mean that ‘He’ was ‘manifested [emphasis added]’ (1 John 3:5 kjv) or ‘grace ... was ... made manifest by the appearing [emphasis added] of our Savior Jesus Christ’ (2 Tim. 1:9, 10 kjv) or ‘God was manifest [emphasis added] in the flesh’ (1 Tim. 3:16). These are telling us that ‘a man called Jesus’ and characterized by divine grace became visible as a normal human being, as well as manifest deity, on the face of this planet.

Some of the passages declare, hint or allude to the changes He made, the price He paid, the glory He laid aside, for ‘he humbled himself’ (Phil. 2:8), ‘became poor’ (2 Cor. 8:9) and ‘was made lower than the angels’ (Heb. 2:9).

Others emphasize the authenticity of His full humanity as ‘the Word became flesh’ (John 1:14), ‘partook’ of flesh and blood (Heb. 2:14) and was ‘found in human form’ (Phil. 2:8). Matthew and Luke describe the nativity of Jesus as entering this world the same way every human being does (Matt. 2:1; Luke 2:1–7) and, like every Jew of His time, as ‘under the law’ subject to the usual restrictions and duties of pious Jews (Gal. 4:4; cf. Heb. 2:17 kjv).

One text, however, carefully distinguishes the Lord’s unfallen human nature as distinguished from our fallen nature, speaking of ‘[God] sending his own Son in the likeness [emphasis added] of sinful flesh’ (Rom. 8:3). This distinction is preserved in the words, ‘being found in human form [emphasis added]’ (‘found in fashion as a man’ kjv) (Phil. 2:8), though here ‘form’ must not be carried to the later Docetics’ conclusion that He only appeared to be (looked like) a man, masquerading deity as humanity.

His lowly state is emphasized in ‘taking the form of a servant [emphasis added]’ (Phil. 2:7).

Theological Formulation in Christian Antiquity

It should not then be surprising that Christians early in the era became deeply interested in combining all the biblical information available into some comprehensive statement or statements about the Person and nature of the Savior, Redeemer, Lord, King, Great High Priest, Captain of Salvation, Lamb of God, God, Man, Jesus, Lord and much more. This became a problem acutely necessary to address even before the Apostles were dead as is evident even on a few pages of the New Testament. The earliest heresies all related to the incarnation directly or indirectly and several arose in the apostolic age (1 Cor. 15:12; 1 John 4:2, 3; 2 John 7).

The story of how the ancient church tackled this project is fascinating for any one who bothers to search it out. Later in this series we shall address it. For now, let us pass on to the permanent results of it in the Creed of Nicea (ad 325) the enlargement of the same at Constantinople (Second Ecumenical Council of ad 381) and the Definition of Chalcedon (Fourth Ecumenical Council, 451). To the present no large group of Christians has permanently rejected the theology of these creedal monuments created by the ‘Old Catholic’ and pre-papal, undivided, ancient church. Though always subject to inspection and improvement by Scripture, they have stood the test of 1,500 years of Christian history. Any one who tries to rewrite ancient orthodoxy of the Incarnation does so to his own great peril. Menno Simons, for example, founder of Mennonites, is said to have rejected certain clauses, but orthodox Mennonite churches, even though they did not have formal creeds, soon had a Christology fully consistent with the ancient creeds. Further, many denominations, scarcely aware their evangelical heritage has a lineage directly leading to Chalcedon, Constantinople and Nicea, sometimes unknowingly reject all connection or dependence upon these ancient treasures of sound biblical religion. There is quite a literature of this sort among the ‘free churches.’ Titles such as The Free Church Through the Ages and British and Foreign Baptists and the like fill a section of my library and I was raised among some of that persuasion.

All orthodox, evangelical Christians should appreciate the contributions of the authors, chiefly British and American (many conservative Anglicans who had a special interest in the subject), who have defended and expounded orthodox Christology against the tide of perversions and denials of the past 200 years. A symposium, The Myth of God Incarnate (John Hick ed., 1976–1977), is a striking example.

The Central Affirmations

Charles Gore (1853–1932), an Anglican bishop and scholar, was an outstanding defender of orthodox Christology in Britain in the late nineteenth century. In defense of orthodoxy he proposed a form of what has been called kenotic Christology. It was an effort to explain how Christ could apparently ‘not know’ certain things and yet be God, omniscient.²

Gore summarized the ‘ancient venerable’ definitions of the ancient creeds of Nicea (ad 325), Constantinople (ad 381), Chalcedon (451) and decisions of the general councils of the still undivided church in the Bampton Lectures at the University of Oxford (1891), published as The Incarnation of the Son of God. He wrote:

These definitions consist in substance of four propositions:

- (1) that as Son of God, Jesus Christ is very God, of one substance with the Father;
- (2) that as Son of man, He is perfectly Man, in the completeness of human faculties and sympathies;
- (3) that though both God and Man, He is yet one person, namely the Son of God who has taken manhood into Himself;
- (4) that in this incarnation the manhood, though it is truly assumed into the divine person, still remains none the less truly human, so that Jesus Christ is of one substance with us men in respect of His manhood, as He is with the Father in respect of His godhead.³

To this Gore implicitly adds a (5), His complete manness, body and soul are His forever, i.e. the incarnation is permanent. Jesus, the Son of God, is still today a man in heaven. His exact words are:

The humanity in Christ remains distinctively what it was: it is not transmuted out of its own proper character; the eternal person assumes the human nature, and acts through it, without its ceasing to be human. Christ, who is of one substance with the Father in respect of His Godhead, is of one substance with us in respect of our manhood, and that for ever.⁴

The Practical Connection of the Incarnation

There are practical reasons set forth by Scripture, why some such understanding is mandatory for the purity and soundness, even survival of Christianity. Four profound major Scripture passages (John 1:1–14; Phil. 2:6–11; Heb. 2:9–18; 1 Tim. 3:16) give special treatment to the incarnation. Each is specifically introduced to enforce some moral or spiritual truth of the essence of our religion. If authentic Christianity is to survive it must adhere to what these and other passages plainly say and the ancient church clearly so understood. To think otherwise is to reject the first four and a half centuries of the church, which would be a bit of the arrogance of ignorance. Observe the connection of the incarnation with practical Christianity in these four majestic portions of the New Testament.

First, the Prologue of John’s Gospel: ‘The Word’ who ‘became [was made] flesh’ is the One through whom ‘all things became [were made, emphasis added]’ and ‘without him’ was made not even one thing that was made (John 1:3). Not only so, even though ‘the world was made [emphasis added] through him’ this world did not receive him (v. 10), to those who ‘believed in his name’ he gives power ‘to become [be made, emphasis added] children of God’ (v. 12). This One in whose name we must believe, whose name we must know in some essential way, is He who ‘became [was made, emphasis added] flesh and dwelt among us’ (v. 14). Each of these seven becomes or becames renders a form of ginomai. When we read ‘there was man sent from God whose name was John’ (John 1:6) ‘was’ might well be rendered ‘came to be’ or simply ‘came,’ for again the word is ginomai. Observe the new birth is connected with (not necessarily caused by) believing in the incarnate Word (John 1:12, 13). The force of these seven ‘becames’ leads to enormous practical consequences for us as well as for Him.

The classical definition of the incarnation at Philippians 2:6–11 is to teach us to look out for others' interests rather than our own (v. 4).

Hebrews 2:9–18, perhaps one of the most comforting passages in the Bible discusses the nature and purposes of the Incarnation in relation to our assurance of a sympathetic answer to the needs we express in our prayers.

First Timothy 3:16 ('[God] manifested in the flesh', etc.) is spliced in a niche between instruction on how a minister of the Word 'ought to behave' and a warning against being led astray by the deceiving spirits who propagate false doctrine and its accompanying false piety. 'Ideas have consequences' was known to Scripture long before Richard Weaver employed the sentence as title for a great book! In this case the idea is the complete and permanent manness of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Five Changes Involved in Incarnation

Traditional exposition of the doctrine of the incarnation properly distinguished three 'states' of Christ, viz.: the state of pre-incarnate glory, the state of humiliation and the state of exaltation. We shall discuss these valid and useful distinctions a bit later. At this point let us note five changes for Him that the Bible indicates and seek somehow to understand as much as we can with our earthbound noetic powers and vocabulary.

1. There was a change in His dwelling-place. Jesus said, 'I am the living bread that came down from heaven' (John 6:51). A whole class of such New Testament texts speaks of the incarnation in similar language. These neither affirm nor deny that the pre-incarnate Logos was both immanent in the world and transcendent above it.

Nor is John, chapter 6 (as some falsely say) part of a late communion-table homily, dislocated from the first-century Jewish church to the pages of the New Testament. The sixth chapter of John, in context and taken at face value, has no more connection with the elements and ceremony of the Lord's Supper than do Jesus' several other 'I am' statements such as 'I am the vine,' 'I am the living water,' 'I am the light,' etc. Certain critics have tried to make it seem so. See the relevant discussion by R. E. Brown in the Anchor Bible.⁵

Quite the contrary, John 6:51 is a cryptic, personal statement by Jesus about His own origin to hard-hearted Jews who had already rejected Him. It employs symbolism drawn directly from the preceding day's miracle of the bread that fed 5,000 hungry men (cf. John 6:10; and 3:2–26). No cosmic geography of heaven and earth is intended when Scripture speaks of heaven as up and earth as down or 'lower parts of the earth.'

Modern science did not discover that 'up' is not literally the location of heaven. Solomon's prayer (2 Chr. 6:18, 30) shows he was aware that heaven is simply the 'place' of God's special permanent manifestation. He contrasts that heaven with the earthly temple building where He had chosen specially to manifest Himself on earth. When the Son of God became incarnate, Mary, Nazareth, Bethlehem, the Land of Israel became, until His ascension, the place of the Son's temporary special manifestation.

2. There was a change in His possessions. As Logos-Creator, of course, He is possessor of heaven and earth. But as the babe of Bethlehem and throughout His earthly career He laid that aside. Paul, writing to an ancient congregation, encouraged generosity by stating, 'For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor' (2 Cor. 8:9). Jesus had 'food and clothing' and was no doubt 'with these ... content' (1 Tim. 6:8) but He owned no real estate and none of this planet's 'worldly goods.' He was no Jewish Diogenes wandering about in a tub. Yet as pre-incarnate Word He was 'Possessor of heaven and earth' (Gen. 14:19, 22) and could say 'the world and its fullness are mine' (Ps. 50:12). But this lack of possessions was temporary. He will come again as King of kings and Lord of lords to take immediate possession (Rev. 19:16).

3. There was a change as to His glory. The Old Testament makes much of the 'weight' (Heb. ḥavodh) or glory of the God of Israel. This outward glory is even personalized in certain passages and represented as having something like a personal history in several chapters in Ezekiel. The heavens 'declare' His glory day and night. Yet, for thirty-some years on earth the Son of God was incognito in respect to His divine glory, even though muffled glory flashed forth on occasion, especially at the Transfiguration. Jesus made specific reference to this when He prayed, 'And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed' (John 17:5). At the end, of course, He was 'taken up in glory' (1 Tim. 3:16) and shall return 'with power and great glory' (Luke 21:27) and reign before His saints gloriously (Isa. 24:23). This absence of divine glory also was temporary.

4. There was a change in position in relation to the Father. This has always been very far from being fully understood. The eternal relation of the three Persons of the Trinity cannot change. He is eternally Monogenēs Theos, 'God ... only begotten ... which is in the bosom of the Father' (John 1:18 kjv). Yet in a way only God can fully understand, He, though 'he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the form of a servant' (Phil. 2:6, 7). The form of God is here in contrasting parallel with form of a servant, one whose will is constantly pliable, willingly agreeable to a master. 'Slave' in the American history of slavery is not the right word for the Old Testament ideal of voluntary obedience. 'I have come to do your will, O God,' He says, if we may borrow the language of Hebrews 10:7 which in turn quotes a Psalm. But, again, this is temporary. 'Wherefore ... highly exalted': 'cross, then crown' is the triumphant verdict of Scripture. The state of humiliation ended with resurrection, ascension and session at the right hand of the Father. He is now exalted Lord and Christ (see Acts 2:33–36) and coming King.

5. There was a change from form of God to fashion as a man. (How can I characterize it with some logically appropriate word?) Paul's expression is 'being found in fashion as a man' (Phil. 2:8 kjv), a good literal translation. John says 'the Word became flesh' (John 1:14). By 'flesh' John means all that it means to be man, a member of the human race. We shall examine these two passages later.

This act of taking to Himself a complete human nature was far different from the other four changes. He came to earth, but returned to heaven; changed possessions for poverty, but gained back all He gave up plus a numerous posterity (Isa. 53:11; Pss. 22:30; 45:16); changed glory for humiliation, but He was received back to heaven in glory and shall so come again; equal with God He stooped to servanthood but is now Lord and Christ. His manhood, in contrast, is forever. When the moon is old, the stars are cold and the leaves of the judgment book unfold, the Judge of all the earth will be a man. When in the future all things will be subject to Him, it will be to the God-man.

When Jesus was on earth His favorite name for Himself was ‘the Son of Man,’ in Greek literally the son of the man, probably (in addition to other freight of meaning) indicating a particular man as repeatedly in Ezekiel a similar expression does. There is a slight but very significant departure from this at John 5:27, where the definite article is absent in the Greek: ‘And he [the Father] has given him authority to execute judgement, because he is the Son of Man,’ or ‘a son of man,’ i.e. a human being. His permanent humanity specially qualifies Him, as being Himself a descendant of Adam, to be a fully competent Judge of men, He will never cease to be a man. Hebrews 2:17, 18 and 4:14–16 make much of our Lord’s present fully human nature as our Great High Priest in heaven.

They who witnessed Jesus’ ascension ‘as he went up’ were told by two heavenly messengers that ‘this same [emphasis added] Jesus ... shall so come’ again (Acts 1:11 kjv).

When Stephen saw Jesus standing in heaven (Acts 7:55), it was the man of Nazareth, not a spook or wraith. He is still en sarki, ‘God manifested in flesh.’

The last page of the Bible, where our Lord reaffirms the whole of the book of Revelation as His own revelation, also affirms His own permanent full humanity as the ‘descendant of David’ (Rev. 22:16).

No Change of Personal Identity

There was never any change of personal identity—being always from eternity to eternity God Only Begotten, Eternal Word of God. We put off development of this important fact to the next chapter and for now take note of the importance theology has always ascribed to the permanence of God manifest in human ‘flesh’—after that first Easter in resurrected flesh and bone, but not less than full humanity. A doctrine of man is of course implicit. This also calls for further attention later.

The importance of the permanence of our Lord’s incarnation as a complete man, body of flesh and soul (or spirit), has not been missed by good theologians nor has it been missed by historic creeds and confessions and works of theology. Let one outstanding example suffice for present purposes.

The Westminster Shorter Catechism, ‘Q. 21 ... [the] Son of God became man, and so was and continueth to be, God and man, in two distinct natures, and one person, forever.’⁶ The Confession states that as Mediator between God and man it was necessary that ‘On the third day he arose from the dead, with the same body in which he suffered; with which also he ascended into heaven (emphasis added), and there sitteth at the right hand of the Father making intercession; and shall return to judge men and angels at the end of the world.’⁷

His office as Mediator required that the same baby’s body that was conceived in and born of Mary, ‘increased in stature,’ in which He ‘suffered and died’ be the same (glorified to be sure, but not substituted) in which He ascended, now vehicle of mediatorial intercession and in which He shall return. L. Berkhof is accurate but unexceptional in heading a section of his fine work, Systematic Theology, ‘The Physical Return of Christ.’

The success of the ancient undivided church in forming adequate statements of Christology, the Holy Spirit and the Trinity came only with protracted, exhaustive effort by several generations of saints and scholars—almost all of whom were pastors. This involved painful travel to four Ecumenical Councils all in the region of Constantinople the capital of the eastern (Greek speaking) part of the Roman world.

The Creed of the Undivided Ecumenical Church

The Nicene Creed is the ‘Creed of Nicea’ of the 318 fathers who met at Nicea (ad 325) supplemented by the 150 who convened at Constantinople (ad 381), perhaps discussed at the Ephesus Council of 431, read and approved at Chalcedon (451). The Nicene Creed now follows in the translation of Henry Bettenson.

We believe in one God the Father All-sovereign, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, Begotten of the Father before all the ages, Light of Light, true God of true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made; who for us men and for our salvation came down from the heavens, sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and cometh again with glory to judge living and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end:

And in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and the Life-giver, that proceedeth from the Father, who with Father and Son is worshipped together and glorified together, who spake through the prophets:

In one holy catholic and Apostolic Church:

We acknowledge one baptism unto remission of sins. We look for a resurrection of the dead, and the life of the age to come.⁸

The Definition of Chalcedon

The Definition of Chalcedon (451) is a refinement of some points of the Nicene Creed. It follows in Bettenson’s translation.

Therefore, following the holy Fathers, we all with one accord teach men to acknowledge one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, at once complete in Godhead, and complete in manhood, truly God and truly man, consisting also of a reasonable soul and body; of one substance with the Father as regards his Godhead, and at the same time of one substance with us as regards his manhood; like us in all respects, apart from sin; as regards his Godhead, begotten of the Father before the ages, but yet as regards his manhood begotten, for us men and for our salvation, of Mary the Virgin, the God-bearer; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, recognized in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation; the distinction of natures being in no way annulled by the union, but rather the characteristics of each nature being preserved and coming together to form one person and subsistence, not as parted or separated into two persons, but one and the same Son and Only-begotten God the Word,

Lord Jesus Christ; even as the prophets from earliest times spoke of him and our Lord Jesus Christ himself taught us, and the creed of the Fathers has handed down to us.⁹

It now is ‘time to return to the Lord.’ This Lord is the Christ of the Bible and of historic, orthodox, evangelical faith. The supine, somewhat effeminate Doctor of Feelings being featured in much popular ‘evangelical’ literature is not that Christ. He who claimed to be ‘the descendant of David’ (conqueror of Goliath) must be advertised anew. That Christ will produce a newly vigorous, truly righteous society of believers, only when our Sunday pulpits ring again with a sound of sound theology. Perhaps then the stacks of how-to-do-it books on marriage, sex, and other feel-good literature which flood both religious bookstores and our coffee tables will silently steal away.

The Personal (Theanthropic) Union

Two terms not common to ordinary discussion but very important in any carefully defined Christology must be introduced at this point. Since most people educated in English are no longer taught Latin and Greek they seem strange to us, precisely because they were either invented or adapted by the Fathers of the church in a time when all of them spoke either Greek or Latin. Person (Latin persona, a mask) is one of those words. With reluctance it came into use in the Latin West to translate Greek hypostasis (what stands under) and prosōpon (face, front). Neither word meant an individual center of self-consciousness as we employ ‘person’ today. Another Latin word is unio taken over into English as union. From this welter comes out theanthropic and theanthropos (theos, God plus anthrōpos, man, mankind), both Greek words. So whenever we say theanthropic union or personal union we are talking in ancient Greek and Latin. The title of the next chapter, The Incarnate Person of Christ, except for ‘the’ and ‘of,’ is more Latin and Greek. I introduce these facts to promote acceptance by readers of some presently strange sounding words.

The New Testament represents Jesus Christ as a single undivided Person possessing a human nature and a divine nature. Each nature is unaltered in essence from its normal attributes and powers. The Person is the same divine Person who ‘came down from heaven’ and was joined to a complete human nature in the womb of Mary. Henceforth He is not properly God and man, but the God-man, in the ancient language of theology the Theanthrōpos or Theanthropic Person.

The bond which unites the divine and human in Jesus Christ is not physical, as between the mother and the unborn infant; or merely moral, as between parties in agreement; or fraternal as between brothers; or federal, as between parties to a covenant. It is a wholly personal (hypostatic) union of the divine nature with an acquired human nature. (Hypostatic is derived from Greek hypostasis a word that the church Fathers, after much discussion, accepted as equivalent to persona.)

For this reason, from very ancient times orthodoxy insists there is no human person in the Theanthrōpos, while there is a human personality, which developed from the first moment of incarnation in connection with the divine Person and nature.

So delicate is this matter one scarcely trusts his mind to furnish the words for his pen as he writes. Let me continue with the time-tested phraseology of Robert Dabney:

Hypostatic Union. The doctrine of the constitution of Christ’s person, is purely one of revelation and involves a mystery (1 Tim. 3:16) as great, perhaps, as that of the Trinity itself. But though inexplicable, it is not incredible. The scriptural argument by which this twofold nature in one person is established, is analogous to establishing a Trinity in unity. The text nowhere defines the doctrine in one passage as fully as we [i.e. orthodoxy theology] assert it. But our doctrine is a necessary deduction from three sets of scriptural assertions. First, Jesus Christ was properly and literally a man ... Second, Christ is also literally and properly divine [in highest possible sense] ... Yet [third] this Man-God [Theanthrōpos] is one and the same.¹⁰

The scriptural evidence for this perfect union is abundant in the New Testament and it is this which compelled not only the creedal agreement of antiquity but the sufficient rebuttal of the multitude of errorists and heretics through the ages of Christian history who in one way or another attempted to avoid, subvert, wrest and deny the massive force of the biblical evidence. The many writers who might be consulted on the scriptural proofs all say the same things in different or even similar words, differing mainly only in completeness and depth of coverage. It would be impossible to say anything new. In Scripture:

1. Our Lord always speaks of Himself as a single Person. The same prevails when He is spoken about or addressed by another. The human nature never addresses the divine or the divine the human, though the Father addresses the Son as a single Person (Heb. 5:5; 1:5; Acts 13:33) and the Son likewise the Father (John 17, et passim).

2. Though some attributes, powers and properties inhere in only one of the natures (e.g. omniscience in the divine; hunger and thirst in the human) yet the New Testament offers (ascribes, attributes) them to the one Jesus Christ. For example, the Jesus who became hungry in the wilderness and wept at Lazarus' grave is the same as He who stilled the waves and turned water into wine. Matthew does not say the divine nature stilled the waves or that the human nature grew hungry, but that Jesus did.¹¹ Admittedly some of this language is a manner of speaking, readily understood even without extended reflection. Wesley certainly knew that God is immortal, incapable of death, even though with poetic license he wrote 'God the mighty Maker died for man the creature's sin.'

3. No evidence of a dual personality in Jesus exists in Scripture. As discussed under the mediatorial office of Christ there is much emphasis on two natures, both united in one Person (hypostatic union above). Nothing comparable to Paul's two-part soliloquy (Rom. 7) appears in Jesus' words. In some passages one Person of the triune God addresses another (Pss. 2:7; 40:7, 8; John 17:1, 4, 5, 21–24) but there is nothing of the sort in Jesus' reflexive language. In John 3:11 Jesus associates Himself with His disciples ('We speak that we do know' kjv) in distinction from Nicodemus, not His two natures speaking one to or with reference to the other.

A problem arises. Two Pauline texts speak of the death of Christ as though 'the Lord of glory' dies (1 Cor. 2:8) and of 'redemption' by the 'Son' who is 'the invisible God' (Col. 1:13–15). Acts 20:28 kjv speaks of the blood of God, recent Versions based on revised Greek text, of the blood of 'the Lord,' i.e. Lord Jesus. Conversely other texts seem to speak of the human nature as possessing divine attributes and powers (John 3:13; 6:62; Rom. 9:5).

These must be understood as a 'manner of speaking' for which there is no technical name I know of but similar to prolepsis, speaking of a future event or condition as if it had already happened.

Examples are common in everyday occurrence: ‘When President Eisenhower lived in Abilene, Kansas.’ Or conversely ‘the rail-splitter was commander in chief of the Union armies’—the reverse of prolepsis. Everyone ought to understand ‘the manner of speaking’ as truthful even if in manner of statement inexact. In each case the one Person, the Theanthrōpos, is simply being referred to by the title, name or attribute of one of the two natures.

Refinements of the doctrine of the two natures of Christ arise in part from the positive meaning of these and other passages. In a general way all orthodox Christians, except Lutherans, endorse the following doctrine of communication, or better, communion, of properties, operations and graces. The common understanding is:

a) A communion of properties of each of the two natures in the Person. The divine Person brought with Him, in His act of humiliation, all the attributes and properties of the divine nature. To the Person, but not to the divine nature, His human nature ‘communicated’ the properties of human nature. The Person Christ was hence united with the Father and the Spirit while on earth yet the God-man was local in Nazareth, Bethlehem, Egypt and Nazareth again. Lutheran theology insists the body of Christ is ubiquitous as sharing in the divine omnipresence. This doctrine is an aspect of the particularly Lutheran doctrine of the ‘real presence’ of the body and blood in the Eucharist as the very plain chapters in Pieper and Mueller amply show. Not every Lutheran, however, endorses this understanding of the communicatio and the real presence. Lutherans do not teach that human properties were imparted to the divine nature, because of God’s immutability.

b) A communication of operations of each nature in producing the final results of redemption. Further accessible discussion of the communicatio for those interested will not be found in technical books of theology. Interest in these seemingly over-refinements arose in the scholastic period of Lutheran theology in support of Luther’s rather mystical theory of the real presence. The Reformed disagreed and then in the polemics with Lutherans introduced these terms to their own theology, though not with exactly the same meanings or consequences. Plain, yet irenic, brief treatments will be found in Strong and Berkhof from the Calvinist perspective.

The terms perichōcēsis (Greek) and circuminsessio (Latin) both meaning mutual indwelling or interpenetration, are usually employed rightly to describe the inner relations of the three Persons of the Godhead. Where the Person is or works the other two are also. This is a correlate of the consubstantiality of the three Persons. Some Lutherans (and no others I know of) say there is a perichōrēsis of the two natures of Christ. The importance of this matter to some orthodox Lutherans is shown by the fact that of the 340 pages of Francis Pieper’s Christology, 162 pages are devoted to the communion of natures and of attributes as well as many pages in discussion of the distinctive Lutheran doctrine of the ‘real presence’ in the Lord’s Supper.

It should be added that the mood, almost unprecedented, of current interest of Western people in social, experiential and psychological aspects of life is reflected in growing transfer of that interest to theology. Now some theologians try to find a social life in the Trinity and new experiences for God, especially for the Father. So the relation of deity to humanity in our Lord has grown exponentially.

Certain theologians (J. Moltmann, Hans Urs von Balthasar) recently have argued in support of this departure from the uniform and time-honored doctrines of God’s immutability and impassibility from the standpoint of the doctrine of divine immanence. Though this has been called ‘the new patripassionism’ these authors have attempted to adhere to Christian orthodoxy. Certain others with a somewhat different outlook who claim to be evangelical and orthodox have accepted aspects of the doctrine of panentheism, a central feature of modern process theology. From this outlook they have sought to do what Norman Geisler calls ‘Creating God in the Image of Man.’ This outlook was proposed in a volume entitled The Openness of God.¹² I have defended the ancient orthodoxy in several papers delivered to the Evangelical Theological Society as has Dr Geisler in Creating God in the Image of Man.¹³ The Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society has recently carried many articles in discussion of this subject. Rejection or modification of the doctrines of divine immutability, simplicity and impassibility accompanied some forms of the kenosis theories of mid-nineteenth century. The new patripassionism or neotheism has generated interest in the kenotic theology of 150 years ago, hence, recent translation into English of I. A. Dorner’s 1956 essay and publication in America.¹⁴

¹ ‘Incarnation,’ Oxford English Dictionary.

² S. M. Smith, art. ‘Kenosis, Kenotic Theology,’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), pp. 600–602.

³ Charles Gore, The Incarnation of the Son of God (London: John Murray, 1891), pp. 80, 81.

⁴ ibid., p. 95.

⁵ R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John 1–xii, Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1966), pp. 268–294.

⁶ The Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. together with The Larger Catechism and The Shorter Catechism (Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, n.d., but post-1944), p. 396.

⁷ ibid., chap. vii, sec. iv, pp. 55, 56.

⁸ Henry Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church (New York: Oxford University Press, 1963), pp. 36, 37.

⁹ ibid., p. 73.

¹⁰ Robert Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (1878) (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1972), pp. 466, 467.

¹¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, Revell, 1907), pp. 684, 685; cf. H. Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, repr. 1979), p. 383.

¹² Clark Pinnock, Richard Rice, John Sanders, William Hasker and David Basinger, The Openness of God (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1994).

¹³ Norman Geisler, Creating God in the Image of Man (Minneapolis: Bethany House Publ., 1997).

¹⁴ I. A. Dorner, Divine Immutability, A Critical Reconsideration (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress Press, 1994).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (483). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

The Incarnate Person of Jesus Christ

This chapter relates to the doctrine of the personal union of a divine nature and a human nature in one Christ. The ancient Greek-speaking theologians were the first to adopt the word hypostasis for the idea of person, hence the term ‘hypostatic union,’ or personal union of the divine and the human nature in Christ. Though strange to our ears the expression defines and renders distinct and unique the idea it embodies as no other term does. Another useful term, as we have seen, is the adjective, theanthropic (from Gr. theos, God, and anthrōpos, man in generic sense, member of the human race). So theologians speak of ‘the theanthropic person’ of Christ and ‘the Theanthropos,’ the God-man.

It is not difficult to establish by Scripture that our Lord was God; nor that He was man. This is stated theologically as the doctrine of the two natures of Christ. But great problems inevitably arise. They arose in the first generations after the ascension. Peter delivered a very simple gospel—good news about Jesus—but identified Him only as ‘of Nazareth,’ ‘anointed’ by ‘God’ ‘with the Holy Spirit’ and that ‘God was with him’ (Acts 10:38). However, by the time the various Christological statements of Paul (Acts 17; Phil. 2; Col. 1, 2), of Hebrews 2, of John’s Prologue and on throughout his Gospel and the Apocalypse were in circulation, a full understanding of the Person of God incarnate had become a contested and complicated matter.

One might rightly say the incarnation doctrine initially addresses the Christian’s faith rather than his understanding. Yet if, as Augustine said, we believe in order to understand, all believing Christians, to say nothing of those who aspire to be teachers, have some refinement of thinking to do about the central, distinctive feature of our religion!

If Jesus was God and man, then apparently He must have been two Persons. Yet in Scripture He is invariably presented as only one single Person speaking, acting, reflecting on problems or making decisions, never two Persons as the ancient Nestorians taught (or at least were supposed by their opponents to have taught).

If He was only one Person, was the seat of the self-conscious Person in the human or the divine or both? If in one rather than the other, how could ‘the other’ exist in full integrity? Could He be two-thirds of a man and one-third God as Apollinaris (condemned at Constantinople, ad 381) thought?

The Definition of Chalcedon (451) was intended to set the borders within which orthodox Christology could be expressed. Because it condenses the scriptural data it needs exposition. That exposition came and still comes in sermons, instruction of children, theology textbooks and courses. There had been intense study and conflicting opinions on some points among competent teachers and leaders before 451 and the same continued for awhile. It has been raised again in recent neo-orthodoxy and process theology among both Protestant and Catholic theologians as well as in nineteenth-century kenosis theology.¹ There is a further question: Is the incarnation permanent, that is, when the Son of God assumed a human nature, including a body of literal flesh, is that forever? Is he still today in heaven and indefinitely into eternity a man, ‘my flesh in the Godhead’ as Robert Browning puts in David’s mouth in the poem, ‘Saul’?

We must look into these questions and many more. The Definition of Chalcedon (451) dealt specifically with many of the main questions but not all derivative questions. The Fifth, Sixth and Seventh Ecumenical Councils further clarified and defined issues.

Sometime after Chalcedon the so-called Athanasian Creed appeared in western Europe. This really beautiful Latin composition, also called Quicumque vult from the first two words, ‘whosoever will’ (be saved), in a thoroughly logical way addresses more questions. Some think it goes too far in solving indissoluble mysteries of the incarnation, but everyone should at least know what it says. The wide and prolonged use of this creed in Western Christendom bears witness to the felt need for the precision it supplied. It has been supposed Caesarius, Bishop of Arles (504–543), may have written the Quicumque. He is known to have used it as an elementary catechism. It is more likely he was taught it in his youth—he was not a creative writer. The earliest surviving evidence of its wide use is in surviving sermons in which clauses are quoted, as well as at the Fourth Council of Toledo (633). This Council (or synod) determined that the Christianity of Spain would be orthodox (i.e. Nicene, affirming Christ’s deity) rather than Arian. The best guide to literature about Quicumque I have found is the excellent article ‘Creeds’ in the eleventh and fourteenth editions of Britannica. Denzinger’s guide is less complete.

The relevant portions of Quicumque vult are articles 29 to 37. I furnish the numbers from Schaff² but the English translation is from Denzinger (the Sources of Catholic Dogma) for reference later in this chapter.

29. But it is necessary for eternal salvation that he faithfully believe also the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ.

30. Accordingly it is the right faith, that we believe and confess, that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and man.

31. He is God begotten of the substance of the Father before time, and he is man born of the substance of his mother in time:

32. perfect God, perfect man, consisting of a rational soul and a human body [Lat. carne, flesh],

33. equal to the Father according to his Godhead, less than the Father according to humanity.

34 Although he is God and man, yet he is not two, but he is one Christ;

35. one, however, not by the conversion of the Divinity into a human body [Lat. in carnem, into flesh], but by the assumption of humanity [Lat. humanitatis, humanity] in the Godhead;

36. one absolutely [Lat. unus omnino, one wholly] not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person.

37. For just as the rational soul and body are one man, so God and man are one Christ.

Let us hold in mind that we are debtors to the ancient bishops (really local pastors) who at great personal cost and tremendous expenditure of time and treasure (travel was slow and expensive) came from far corners to Chalcedon, a town opposite Constantinople. There they wrestled with the question of the union of the two natures for weeks. It speaks eloquently of how important the truth was to them and how important to the public weal or woe. I personally am also indebted to all the faithful orthodox teachers who preached and have written on these questions, also to my immediate teachers and colleagues of yesteryear.

I am trying to make the point that every Christian preacher and teacher and serious Christian owes something to this subject in both time and attention in prayer and study. This is difficult in a generation when many Christians have not read the Bible very much and many of whose pastors care little about the injunctions to guard the deposit of truth handed down to them by Scripture and faithful shepherds. Saint Paul was determined, he said, not only to pray and sing ‘with my mind’ but also ‘in church I would rather speak five words with my mind in order to instruct others,’ etc. (1 Cor. 14:14, 15, 19). Let us have similar determination to understand all we can with the help of our predecessors in this profound matter.

Without dependence on the ancient creeds, but not without their help and guidance, let us state in ten propositions what the agreed doctrine is.

(1) First Proposition. No informed theologian thinks the ‘Great ... mystery’ of ‘[God] manifested in the flesh’ (1 Tim. 3:16) has been fully illuminated. After all ‘no one knows the Son except the Father’ (Matt. 11:27). If as Scripture says, ‘the love of Christ ... surpasses knowledge’ (Eph. 3:19), the Person of Christ is no less surpassing. Yet the disciples (Philip in particular) were rebuked for not having at least rudimentary, correct, assured knowledge of Him and His relation to the Father (John 14:5). It is not that we cannot know enough for faith and godliness but that we do not know everything that can and ought to be known and certainly cannot explain everything we know. By definition, the New Testament mysteries are truths known to us only because they have been announced by God’s emissaries (prophets, Apostles). However, Scripture encourages us to understand as much as humanly possible of ‘all the riches of full assurance of understanding and the knowledge of God’s mystery, which is Christ’ (Col. 2:2), even though these ‘treasures’ ‘are hidden’ in Christ (Col. 2:3 niv).

‘[God] manifested in the flesh’ is, exactly as Paul said (1 Tim. 3:16), a mystery. It is not fully comprehensible. The possibility for analysis is therefore limited. Empirical science can do nothing at all with it. Dissection is conducted on cadavers not living beings.

Perhaps the limitations for scientific study, which deals with lesser mysteries, are loosely parallel to this branch of theology. For example, a laboratory technician might surreptitiously mount some gadget to measure the temperature of the kisses of two lovers, perhaps also pressures and their fluctuations—even blood pressure, pulse rate and the like. Yet any freak who would try such an experiment might be the least capable of understanding the worldwide phenomenon of human love. Only lovers know such things, if any one does, and they do not fully understand or each pair of lovers would not seem to think they alone know what real love is. ‘[N]o one knows who the Son is except the Father’ (Luke 10:22). To some the Father makes Christ known (Matt. 16:17) and they may not be able to tell us all they learn.

Which probably means that insofar as we are able to explore the mystery of incarnation it will be by divine gift and after that by contemplation, by prayer, and of course by consultation of Scripture, and the aid of previous godly scholars within the limits of received orthodoxy. The names of genuine innovators throughout church history have all turned out to be the names of heretics.

(2) Second Proposition. Without exception, when mentioned together, the deity (divine nature) and the humanity (human nature) are always assigned to the one Person.

One example is Romans 9:5 where Christ is ‘God over all, blessed for ever,’ yet also an Israelite descended from Hebrew patriarchs—‘and from their race ... Christ’ came (9:5). In Romans 1:3, 4 one divine Person, called ‘Jesus Christ our Lord’ is ‘descended from David according to the flesh’ in which case, like John 1:14 ‘the ... flesh’ means complete humanity. The text (Rom. 1:3, 4) goes on to say He is ‘declared to be the Son of God ... according to the spirit of holiness,’ designating His full deity. In the Old Testament the Immanuel, God-with-us of Isaiah 9:6, 7 is also ‘a [human] child ... born.’

(3) Third Proposition. Christ the Person expresses the one consciousness of the one Person who possesses both natures whenever He expresses Himself. ‘I and the Father are one’ (John 10:30) expresses one consciousness in awareness of His divinity, but ‘I’ in awareness of His human nature when He says ‘I am thirsty’ (John 19:28). The same single Person expressing Himself either as man or God can be seen in pairing John 17:5 with Matthew 17:4–6. In a similar way He asks Peter a question that draws out Peter’s confession of Christ’s deity but follows with very human exuberance when Peter gets it right (Matt. 16:15–17).³

There is a certain analogy to this fluctuation in ordinary people. When David said to his soldiers, ‘Oh, that someone would give me water to drink from the well of Bethlehem’ (2 Sam. 23:15), David’s consciousness was formed by elements in his bodily (material) nature. When, later, elements in his mental and ethical nature, which no brute has, were shaping his consciousness he ‘poured it out to the Lord,’ aghast at the mortal risk taken by the two men who fetched the water. Yet this took place in the single ego of one man in each case. There is everything normal and not the least unusual about this. In Jesus there was one personal self-consciousness expressing a divine nature and a human nature and while unusual, even unique in all history, the hypostatic union was neither abnormal, nor weird and not freakish. Jesus was the most normal man who ever lived, albeit far above average.

Some very early theologians proposed that every human being furnishes an analogy to the one Christ, of two natures, divine and human. Man, created in God’s image is body and soul. That is, there is a material, physical component ‘of [the] dust from the ground’ and a non-material, spiritual component, ‘the breath of life’ breathed into him by the Creator (Gen. 2:7). Article 37 of Quicumque, cited above, draws this analogy: viz.: ‘For just as the rational soul and body are one man, so God and man are one Christ.’

Passages from the writings of Gregory of Nyssa and Augustine employ the analogy,⁴ but perhaps Anglican Gilbert Burnet put it best in his Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles, 1699, commenting on Art. 2:

[A]s a body is still a body, and operates as a body, though it subsists by the indwelling and actuation of the soul, so in the person of Jesus Christ the human nature [body and soul], was entire and still acting according to its own character, yet there was such an union and inhabitation of the Eternal Word in it, that there did arise out of that such a communication of names and characters as we find in the Scriptures. A man is called tall, fair, and healthy, from the state of his body; and learned, wise, and good, from the qualities of his mind; so Christ is called holy, harmless, and undefiled, is said to have died, risen, and ascended ... with relation to his human nature. He is also said to be in the form of God, to have created all things, to be the brightness of the Father’s glory, with reference to the divine nature.⁵

The analogy has been carried even further (legitimately, I think). Every man has an ‘animal consciousness,’ as do brutes, in which one is aware of hunger, thirst, physical pain. Unlike brutes one can also experience rational, aesthetic and religious emotions (‘joy in God,’ Rom. 5:11 kjv, ‘joy in the Holy Spirit,’ Rom. 14:17, ‘joy unspeakable,’ 1 Peter 1:8 kjv). Yet he is one man. When one’s tooth aches the source of that conscious awareness is the material. When one rejoices in solving a problem of geometry or figuring out how to put a new appliance together the source is in the rational capacities of the soul, as also when on a higher level one rejoices with joy unspeakable in Christ. Yet the soul of the same undifferentiated, undiffused, identical man is a ‘person’ with a center of conscious where all this is registered. So the Logos, joined with the human nature (John 1:14) was and is the personal center of everything the Gospels report of Jesus’ life, sayings, experience and so forth.

(4) Fourth Proposition. When passages of the New Testament assign human actions, attributes and experiences to the Lord we must understand them of the Person of the Logos by virtue of His human nature and similarly divine attributes of the Person by virtue of His divine nature. Scripture thus may sometimes speak of the divine nature in a human way. Examples are the ‘blood ... of God’ (Acts 20:28 kjv), ‘[T]hey ... crucified the Lord of Glory’ (1 Cor. 2:8) and the ‘Son of the Most High’ being conceived in Mary’s womb (Luke 1:31, 32). In late antiquity some orthodox Christians began to call the virgin mother of Christ theotokos, God-bearer, against Arian and adoptionist heretics. In doing so they had a biblical, linguistic precedent. ‘Mother of God’ is a jolting expression for Protestants to hear, God-bearer less so.

More simply, Paul calls Jesus, ‘man’ (anthrōpos), ‘the second man,’ and ‘the last Adam’ in 1 Corinthians 15. This ‘man’ will raise the dead at the Last Day (1 Cor. 15:21, 45; John 5:28) and preside on the final Judgment Day (John 5:22). But in each case it is as incarnate God.

Calvin reassures us we are on the right track here, saying ‘[T]he most apposite parallel seems to be that of man, whom we see to consist of two substances. Yet neither is so mingled with the other as not to retain its own distinctive nature.’⁶ In this he follows Augustine.⁷

In this, as in his whole discussion of the Person of Christ, Calvin ‘adheres strictly to the line of Chalcedonian orthodoxy.’⁸ Both W. Niesel⁹ and F. Wendel¹⁰ agree. Let Wendel speak for both authorities on Calvin’s thought:

Calvin had made the traditional trinitarian teaching his own, without the slightest reservation. The same attachment to the dogmatic tradition is prominent in his Christology ... He adopts in full the dogma of the two natures and the current explanations of the relation between the two natures.¹¹

Many sensitive souls will nevertheless wish Wesley had composed a less-jarring phrase than ‘Christ the mighty Maker died for Man the creature’s sin’ and will prefer Mary the ‘God-bearer’ to ‘Mother of God.’ The point of the ancient Christians in insisting Mary was theotokos, God-bearer, was that Jesus was God incarnate from conception onward, not beginning at His baptism or some other time or manner.

Thus, in the Gospels, when Jesus speaks, it is always the Person talking though the words He says may express either a divine consciousness or a human consciousness. When the infant Christ cried out for a diaper change, it was not the Logos expressing Himself, it was infant humanity; likewise when on the cross He said, ‘I thirst’ (John 19:28) it was thirsty, adult humanity. Contrariwise, when on the previous evening He prayed, ‘And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed’ (John 17:5) it was the eternal Son expressing Himself, even though speaking through human lips.

(5) Fifth Proposition. On many occasions in the narrative of Jesus’ life and ministry the attributes of each of the two natures appear side by side, very naturally expressing the single Person of the Theanthrōpos. Just to cite the more familiar ones: He sleeps from weariness yet arises to command a storm to cease (Matt. 8:24–26); He weeps at the grave of a friend yet raises the friend from the dead (John 11:35, 38, 43, 44); with only a look He strikes backward an arresting party of police yet is bound and flogged (John 19:1); He is hungry after forty days of fasting yet survives the devil’s worst unscathed (Matt. 4).

In instructing disciples He promises his future eschatological arrival as heavenly Son of Man while predicting also an immediate future of abuse by priests and people. He bows His head in submission to baptismal identification with sin and sinners, yet challenges all comers to convict Him of any sin whatsoever.

In none of these cases, and they could be multiplied indefinitely, does the Scripture say His divine nature or His human nature did or said this or that but always Jesus, whom we know as the Logos who became flesh and camped (tabernacled, John 1:14) for awhile among us in our worldly realm.

(6) Sixth Proposition. In later theological reflection it is the same. Jesus is of the seed of David, yet declared to be the Son of God; He is ‘the last Adam ... the second man’ yet also ‘from heaven’ (1 Cor. 15:45–47); Jesus is ‘persecuted’ by Saul of Tarsus, yet acknowledged Lord; He ‘suffered when tempted' yet now 'is able to help [from heaven] those who are being tempted' (Heb. 2:18); He as man 'suffered once for sins' yet, ages before 'in the spirit ... went and proclaimed ... in the days of Noah' (1 Peter 3:18–20); He was heard, seen and handled; yet He is 'the eternal life,' which was with the Father, and was made manifest to us (1 John 1:2). In the Revelation He is the One who 'was dead' and 'pierced,' yet also Alpha and Omega, beginning and ending, who is, was and is yet to come, 'the Pantokratōr' (Rev. 1:8, 18). This pairing of New Testament references both to deity and humanity embodied in one Person, could go on to great length.

In all the Gospel records, Acts and Revelation, Jesus obviously speaks of Himself as one Person. Sometimes He distinguishes Himself from all other men, as whenever He refers to His being the bread or flesh from heaven in John 6 or from the Jews of His time, saying, 'You are from below; I am from above' (John 8:23).

He distinguishes His own divine personal self from the Father in many sayings, 'The Father who sent me bears witness about me' (John 8:18) and 'the Father is greater than I' (John 14:28); likewise from the Holy Spirit whom He calls the Spirit and Paraclētos (Comforter) many times in John 14:16–16:16.

The individual personality of Jesus is a point driven home in Jesus' bitter controversy with the Pharisees (John 8:23, 26, 28 and 58). Employing the emphatic personal pronoun egō (I, I myself), Jesus contrasts Himself with humeis (you, yourselves) in verse 23, 'You are ... I am,' 'You are ... I am not.' The meaning would have been the same (but in a weaker and less emphatic sense) if He had omitted egō (I, I myself) and simply used the verbs este (you are) and eimi (I am). This Jesus is emphatically 'I am' (egō eimi). This Person is the Son of Man from heaven (cf. v. 28 with 23) and yet He is 'a man' (anthrōpos) v. 40, with no implication of variation from the norm.¹² Yet in v. 58 this anthrōpos is the same Person who spoke to Moses at the burning bush, and called Himself 'I AM.'

This claim, 'before Abraham was, I am' (John 8:58) is unique in Scripture and calls for comment. '[W]as' renders genesthai, second aorist of ginomai (simple past, here) and means He became, He came to be. Egō eimi means I myself, am, present tense. This means Jesus a man (anthrōpos, v. 40), claimed personal existence even before Abraham came into existence. 'The phrase marks a timeless existence ... "I was" would have expressed simple priority. Thus there is in the phrase the contrast between the created and the uncreated, and the temporal and the eternal.'¹³ Raymond Brown says 'the climax of all that Jesus has said at that [Feast of] Tabernacles comes in the triumphant proclamation by Jesus of the divine name, I AM, which he bears,'¹⁴ and devotes an extended Appendix IV to discuss and document proof of the same.¹⁵

(7) Seventh Proposition. Passages of Scripture which seem to interchange attributes between the divine and human natures should not be interpreted realistically but as figures of speech. We have already spoken of how Scripture language sometimes refers to the Person (Jesus) by one of His divine titles and assigns human characteristics to Him even though employing a divine title. The outstanding examples are 'crucified the Lord of glory' (1 Cor. 2:8) and 'killed the Prince of life' (Acts 3:15 kjv); and 'the church of God [the Lord' rsv], which He obtained with his own blood' (Acts 20:28; see Col. 1:13, 14; Luke 1:31, 32). The reverse occurs when divine attributes are ascribed to the Person by one of His human designations. Examples usually cited are Revelation 5:12;

Romans 9:5; and John 6:62 and 3:13. This is understood realistically only by a few modern writers—all I know of being strict Lutherans. Lutheran doctrine from the Formula of Concord onward holds (not always with equal explicitness) that the now ascended Christ is everywhere present according to His human nature and possesses the divine attributes of omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence. Their chief interest is in omnipresence, to explain the ‘real presence’ (by which they mean entire presence, including flesh and blood of Christ) with the elements of the Lord’s Supper. This is called ubiquity, present anywhere.

Calvin, however, set the pace for most Protestants, saying,

The Scriptures ... sometimes attribute to him what belongs solely to his humanity, sometimes what belongs uniquely to his divinity; and sometimes what embraces both natures but fits neither alone. And they so earnestly express this union of the two natures that is in Christ as sometimes to interchange them.¹⁶

Then he adds, ‘This Figure of Speech is called by the ancients Communication of Properties.’¹⁷ Later in the Institutes his discourses on the sacraments discuss at length his views of the manner of the union of the human and divine natures in the Person.¹⁸ He also produced numerous treatises some by way of instructing the church at Geneva and Reformed churches everywhere and some in debate with the disciples of Luther.¹⁹

The Second Helvetic Confession (1566) of Reformed Christians in Switzerland, chapter 11 typically teaches the local presence only of our Lord’s body in heaven citing John 14:2 and especially Acts 3:21: ‘Jesus, whom heaven must receive until the time for restoring all the things about which God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets long ago.’²⁰

In the Reformation era this matter was debated between Reformed and Lutherans. Calvin and Protestants generally since his day have been perfectly willing to confess the ‘real presence’ (Matt. 28:20; 18:20) of Christ in the church to the end of time, and even in a special mode, left undefined, in the Eucharist. But if definition be required the explanation is that by virtue of personal union with the divine nature, the human nature is exalted in many ways but cannot have any properties, as such, which are not human properties or give up any such properties, otherwise it would be a tertium quid, a third something else, somewhat similar to some expressions of the ancient Eutychians.

(8) Eighth Proposition. Relations between the three Persons of the triune God do not supply parallel to relationship of the divine nature and human nature of Christ. There is a serious flaw in applying terms which properly belong to the inner relation of the Trinity to the relations of the two natures of Christ—circumincession (Latin), perichorēsis (Greek), also intercommunicatio, circulatio and others. These terms were used by the ancient theologians to describe the inner relations of the three Persons of the triune God. As taught by Scripture, formulated by the creeds and confessed by orthodox believers ever since, there is one and only one divine nature possessed fully by each of three Persons, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. The First is distinguished by paternity, the Second by filiation, the Third (the Holy Spirit) by procession from the First (Father) and the Second (Son). They, however, are present in one another in a manner not known to us. This intercommunion of the Persons (not of their distinctives) is what the theologians designated by perichoresis and circumincession.²¹

Somehow, unwisely, these two words came to be employed of the divine and human natures of Christ. It is certainly correct to say that all the attributes of deity, though employed under the conditions of voluntary humiliation (Phil. 2:5–9), were possessed by the Person of Christ: likewise all the attributes of created, unfallen human nature. But it is doubtful in the extreme if the deity assumed the attributes of flesh. (‘Veiled in flesh the Godhead see, Hail the incarnate deity’ is better.) Nor did the flesh assume the attributes of omnipotence, omniscience and omnipresence.

This issue was debated vigorously without meeting of minds in the Reformation epoch. The followers of Luther insisted upon the veritable communication of the divine attribute of omnipresence to the body of Christ in His risen and ascended state, thus literally, though invisibly and intangibly present in the Eucharist (Lord’s Supper). No other branch of Christianity—Protestant, Roman Catholic or Eastern Orthodox—holds to this view. Luther’s insistence on a supposed ubiquity of the body and blood of Christ in His risen and glorified state is consequential upon his doctrine of the ‘real presence’ of the body and blood in the ‘sacrament of the Lord’s Supper.’ He rested his case on ‘this is my body’ in the words of institution. Paul Althaus shows how this doctrine, unique to Luther and his followers, grew in Luther’s mind in the process of his controversies.²² A. B. Bruce in the midst of the Kenosis debates of the nineteenth century showed how small was the basis of the enormous doctrinal weight—comparing it to a pyramid resting upside-down on a pebble.²³ See also David Wells’ The Person of Christ, pp. 133–135. Philip Schaff points out how the Kenosis problem, on this account twice in Lutheran history led to internecine Lutheran controversy.²⁴

The justly celebrated Christian Dogmatics of the late Francis Pieper of Concordia Theological Seminary devotes 150 pages in one section²⁵ to this communication idiomata and in dozens of other pages throughout the three volumes plus three and a half columns of index.²⁶ The Lutheran authorities back to Luther are cited at length. Pieper obviously thought this an important matter.

I have had some interesting experiences with my Lutheran neighbors and pastor-friends in this regard. The Formula of Concord statements of the Person of Christ (Article VIII) could be endorsed by any Protestant theologian. Calvin or Beza or even John Owen could have written them. The attributes are clearly not to be exchanged. The human attributes (including ‘to be finite and circumscribed’) ‘neither are nor ever become attributes of the divine nature’ (VIII. iv). The Epitome of the Formula of Concord says of the divine and human that ‘each retains its essential properties and that they never become properties one of the other nature’ (Art. VIII, affirmative 2). Yet ‘Because of the sacramental union [‘this is my body,’ etc.] they [bread and wine] are truly the body and blood of Christ’ (Epitome, VII, aff. 2). This to non-Lutherans seems to exclude the physical presence (visible, invisible, ‘eucharistic,’ ‘non-spatial’ or otherwise) in the ordinance. But the Formula and Epitome say the body and blood are ‘really’ there because of personal union in the Logos. The Formula clearly affirms that to deny the ‘real’ presence, as they understand it, of Christ’s flesh and blood, with the sacrament is to deny the plain teaching of Scripture, viz.: ‘God’s right hand is everywhere’ hence the flesh and blood may, like God in Christ be present in a ‘mode’ neither local nor spatial. Charles P. Krauth makes this point in his definitive work, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology,²⁷ as does Francis Pieper, the major Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod theologian.²⁸

Yet some Missouri Synod pastors have told me the presence of Christ’s body and blood in the Supper is ‘spiritual presence.’ Others insist it is physical. In either case, it would seem that those who have difficulty accepting the strict Lutheran view ought to be admitted to communion, because the Epitome states,

We believe, teach and confess there is only one kind of unworthy guest, namely, those who do not believe ... no genuine believer, no matter how weak he may be, as long as he retains a living faith, will receive the Holy Supper to his condemnation, for Christ instituted this Supper particularly for Christians who are weak in faith... The entire worthiness of the guests at this heavenly feast consists solely and alone in the most holy obedience and complete merit of Christ, which we make our own through genuine faith (Epitome VII, affirmation, 8, 9, 10).

(9) Ninth Proposition. As asserted above, the human nature was made the vehicle of the use of certain powers of the divine nature, as for example the power to announce the forgiveness of sin (Luke 5:24) and to live a sinless human life. Throughout His earthly years Jesus was able not to sin (potuit non peccare). But good theology affirms this does not fully account for His sinlessness. Adam also was able not to sin, yet even though he was ‘not deceived’ (1 Tim. 2:14 kjv) by temptation, he did sin by free choice. He was not yet confirmed in righteous behavior. Jesus ‘did no sin’ (1 Peter 2:22). He was ‘holy, harmless, undefiled’ (Heb. 7:26 kjv). According to a persistent, but not invariable feature of orthodox theology, by virtue of the union of the divine and human, Jesus was not able to sin (non potuit peccare). Shedd defends this version of the impeccability doctrine.²⁹ C. Hodge rejects it.³⁰

Strictly speaking, impeccability ‘means not merely that Christ could avoid sinning, and did actually avoid it, but also that it was impossible for him to sin because of the essential bond between the human and divine natures.’³¹

The New Testament teaches that the human nature of Christ received a special conferral of the Holy Spirit enabling human nature to be a sufficient and holy vehicle of the divine works (miracles) and to endure ‘the sufferings of Christ’ after the beginning of His public ministry. This is the meaning of the descent of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove, upon Jesus at His baptism by John.

The descent of the Spirit as a dove and the voice of the Father in approval after the baptism by John are without precedent in Jewish history.³² Jesus and John were the only human witnesses. From the beginning His public career and redemptive work were specially guided and empowered by the Holy Spirit. The first effects were to support Jesus in the forty days of temptation immediately to follow and to assure Him anew that indeed in Him the work of the Servant-Son of Jehovah prophesied by Isaiah would be carried successfully to conclusion (Isa. 42:1–4; 53:10–12; 11:1 ff. with John 1:29–34; Matt. 3:13–17). Afterward Jesus was led into the wilderness by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 4:1) then out of it and on to the victory at Calvary. No miracles are reported in the New Testament to have been performed by Jesus before the descent of the Spirit; afterward only by His specially authorized messengers upon whom either He or His ministers plenipotentiary (Apostles) laid their hands. I find no exceptions to this in the New Testament.³³

This endowment enabled the Apostles to perform the mighty works associated with the first stages of Christianity in the apostolic age (Heb. 2:1–4; Rom. 15:18, 19). Christ was guided by the same Spirit into reliance on the Holy Scriptures in resisting temptation (Matt. 4:4, 7, 10) as later every true believer would be: ‘the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God’ (Eph. 6:17). Through all ages except the epochs of Moses, Elijah and Elisha, the time of Jesus' ministry and of the Apostles, God's use of authentic miracles has been rare.

(10) Tenth Proposition. The union of the divine and human in Christ's Person are necessary to enable Him to be 'mediator between God and men,' being himself man (1 Tim. 2:5). Names and titles are found in Scripture designating His divine and human natures and His work. Some of these 'titles of office' are Alpha and Omega, Last Adam, Captain of Salvation, and several more; most in one way or another express His work as bringing God to man and man to God, in a word, mediation.³⁴ Hence, though Jesus is called Mediator (Gr. mesitēs) only four times (1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24), the idea is a comprehensive term for all He came to be and to do.

The idea of mediator in Scripture in reference to Christ's work has little to do with arbitration of disputes or negotiation of differences, which always imply compromise. Christ as Mediator in the offices of prophet, priest and king effected everything as the Theanthropos, God-man. He could answer Job's plaintive hope for an 'umpire' 'who might lay his hand on us both' (Job 9:33), where the LXX renders Heb. Mokhi-ah by Mesitēs, the New Testament term for mediator. As the ascended mediatorial intercessor in heaven He fulfills the human longing for the human face in God put so poignantly by Robert Browning cited earlier, 'my flesh in the Godhead! I seek and I find it ... A Face like my face' (lines 307, 308 of Saul).

It is not too much to say that the idea of mediation, culminating in Christ, the Mediator, enabled to be such by incarnation of God in man is 'the key to the unity of the Bible.'³⁵ The Mediator is the title of the English translation of what is perhaps Emil Brunner's most faithful and enduring work of theology. When it appeared in 1947 it seemed to be pointing toward a return to orthodoxy among elite theologians. It remains a masterful 'Study of the Central Doctrine of the Christian Faith' (title page). Stripped of some lingering concessions to liberalism and krisis (or existential) presuppositions it remains today an excellent treatment, fully expounding the incarnation as the 'key to the unity of the Bible.'³⁶

Conclusions and Reflections

There never will be a complete resolution of all the questions and problems of thought which arise in contemplation of the 'mystery of godliness, God ... manifested in the flesh.' I close this section by referring the inquirer to the Quicumque Vult (Athanasian Creed) and the Definition of Chalcedon, for in these formulas of the early church, orthodox Christianity has answered most of the questions raised by the mystery of the incarnation. I add some brief comments on certain questions that arise out of the ancient and persistent doctrine of the impassibility of God.

God, in Scripture, is said to be perfectly 'blessed' and changeless (immutable) as well. He did not create man in order for God either to be happy (blessed) or to suffer unhappiness. Though He is said frequently to be angry, repentant, sorry, have regret and the like, this must be assigned to His treatment of sinners and only by analogy, true of God Himself. These statements set forth something really present in God's being which is analogous or similar in some way to something in us (analogy of proportion) or perhaps only commensurable (analogy of proportionality, Thomas Aquinas' terms).³⁷ (Full discussion of Thomas' distinction would require a long detour.)

Theologians were quite uniform on this point until recently. Now several (notably Karl Barth and those influenced by him in this regard) wish to lead us to abandon the ancient doctrine of God's impassibility. Impassibility means incapable of the changes, which, in human beings, either accompany or constitute emotion or any kind of suffering.

Furthermore there has always been the question, granting the impassibility of the Godhead: Did not God the Father suffer when He abandoned the Son to suffering and death (Matt. 27:46)? A partial answer has been furnished in the assertion that Jesus suffered only in the human nature. Shedd put the matter this way:

While ... the acts and qualities of either nature may be attributed to the one theanthropic person, the acts and qualities of one nature may not be attributed to the other nature. It would be erroneous to say that the divine nature suffered, or that the human nature raised the dead; as it would be erroneous to say that the human body thinks, or that the human soul walks. The man, or 'person' whose is the body and whose is the soul, both thinks and walks; but the natures by whose instrumentality he performs those acts do not both of them think and walk. One thinks, and the other walks.³⁸

This subject will come up for attention as we deal with the work of Christ.

The values for Christians of the fact that our Lord Jesus Christ was and is in heaven today, God incarnate, the Theanthrōpos, or God-man will be discussed in 'Our High Priest in Heaven,' the last chapter of Christology. His works as prophet (revealing God), priest (sacrifice, sacrificer, intercessor) and king (Lord) all hinge on the fact of the incarnate God in the Person of Christ. The fact of the incarnation also shows that man, the image of God, is in nature commensurable with God's nature. Though the gulf between Creator God and man, His creature, is immense it is not infinite, and contrary to some dialectical theology, is not exclusively qualitative. The incarnation proves it so or God could not be in personal union with one of our race as in Jesus. And similarly the incarnation proves sin not to be normal in human kind. Quite to the contrary, normal humanity (all it was created to be and was at the beginning) is sinless. He who is impeccable was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, but being in 'fashion as a man' still 'holy harmless and undefiled.' 'To err is human' is a false statement. 'Great indeed ... is the mystery of godliness. God was manifested in the flesh' (1 Tim. 3:16 kjv). This mystery will remain just that for eternity for reverent contemplation.

¹ David F. Wells, The Person of Christ: A Biblical and Historical Analysis of the Incarnation (Westchester, IL: Crossway Books, 1984), traces and summarizes these developments in accurate, readable prose. See pp. 148–170.

² Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom ii, 1919 (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, repr. n.d.), pp. 68, 69.

³ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 232, 233; cf. W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology i (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), pp. 268–275.

⁴ Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology ii (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), p. 172.

- ⁵ As cited by W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), p. 318.
- ⁶ Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion ii, 14.1 (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960).
- ⁷ ibid., vol. ii, p. 482, n. 2.
- ⁸ J. T. McNeill (ed.), ibid.
- ⁹ Wilhelm Niesel, The Theology of Calvin (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1956), pp. 115–119.
- ¹⁰ Francois Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (New York: Harper and Row, 1963), p. 215.
- ¹¹ ibid.
- ¹² Raymond E. Brown, Anchor Bible, The Gospel According to John (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966), p. 537.
- ¹³ Brook. F. Westcott, The Bible with Commentary, New Testament, ii (London: John Murray, 1899), p. 140; comment on John 8:5.
- ¹⁴ Brown, Anchor Bible: John, p. 367.
- ¹⁵ Brown, Anchor Bible: John, pp. 433–438.
- ¹⁶ Calvin, Institutes, ii, 14.1.
- ¹⁷ ibid.
- Institutes* John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes
- ¹⁸ Calvin, Institutes, iv, 17.
- ¹⁹ See the lengthy note, vol. ii, p. 483 of the Westminster Edition of the Institutes and the Second Volume of Tracts and Treatises by John Calvin, 592 pages in the English translation of Henry Beveridge, Edinburgh: 1849.
- ²⁰ Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom vol. iii, 6th ed., p. 852.
- ²¹ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 332, 334; cf. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology i, pp. 194, 267–275, 300.
- ²² Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1966), pp. 375–403, et passim.
- ²³ Alexander Delmonico Bruce, Gurrieham Lecture 1876, published as The Humiliation of Christ and ²⁴ Alexander Balmain Bruce, Cunningham Lecture 1876, published as The Humiliation of Christ and oft quoted, 2nd ed. (New York: George H. Doran, n.d.).

²⁴ Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge i, based on the Real-Encyclopaedia of Herzog, Plitt and Hauck, ed. by Philip Schaff (New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co., 1891), pp. 461, 463.

²⁵ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950–1957), pp. 129–279.

²⁶ ibid., iv, pp. 147, 148.

²⁷ Charles P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology (Philadelphia, PA: Lippincott, 1875), chap. xiv, pp. 755–830.

²⁸ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics iii, pp. 290–393.

²⁹ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii, pp. 330–349.

³⁰ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1886, 1960), p. 457.

³¹ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1941, 1979), p. 318.

³² R. D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Baker Books, 1976), pp. 60–73.

³³ I have discussed this matter somewhat at length in ‘Apostles and the Apostolate in the New Testament,’ Bibliotheca Sacra, April–June 1977, pp. 131–143.

³⁴ L. D. Bevan, art. ‘Offices of Christ,’ in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, ed. J Orr (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1939, 1943), p. 616.

³⁵ D. M. Edwards, art. ‘Mediation, Mediator,’ in ISBE, p. 2025.

³⁶ Emil Brunner, The Mediator: A Study of the Central Doctrine of the Christian Faith, trans. Olive Wyon (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1947).

³⁷ Aquinas, Summa Contra Gentiles (London: University of Notre Dame Press, 1975), Book One, chaps. 32–35; Summa Theologica (Westminster, Maryland: Christian Classics, 1911, 1981), Book i, Q. 13, arts. 5 and 6.

³⁸ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology i, p. 323.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (492). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

This chapter is designed to introduce the saving work of the incarnate Son of God on earth. Previous chapters of this Christology have related to His Person, who and what He was and is. They answer Jesus' demand of Peter, 'who do you say I am?' in a fuller way than the dawning awareness of Peter would have understood or accepted at that time. We can now answer Jesus' question more fully in the full light of all subsequent written revelation and reverent reflection. It is a daunting project. In this and subsequent chapters we will be looking at our Lord's work on earth as the Theanthropos, the God-man. This chapter will try to lay out the ground to be covered in this challenging project.

Person and Work Distinguishable but Not Separable

As asserted early in introducing Christology, the work of the Lord may not be separated from the God-man who performed it. Noteworthy also is the fact that not one word of any ecumenical creed suggests that the chief significance of Jesus was that of teacher of a new religion (or even the best teacher of an old one), nor example of ethical rectitude, nor revelation of the highest humanity, etc., as modern religionists frequently misrepresent His significance. Christians will readily acknowledge many of these compliments to their Lord, but will still insist that they are off target, for 'the Father has sent his Son to be the Savior of the world' (1 John 4:14). Thus the doing was part of the being; His work was not to tell us what to do but as the Theanthropos to do something for us.

We do not here attempt what some recent theology calls 'Christology from below.' The theory is that a theology of Jesus' Person and work should be composed of inferences, deductions and conclusions drawn from His actions, behavior and accomplishments. Rather, we start where John does: 'In the beginning was the Word... And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us' (John 1:1, 14). Such reflection on His behavior as might theoretically be advisable or even necessary for Christology has already been done for us by that most reflective author of the latest Gospel (the fourth) and by the authors of the New Testament Epistles who intended precisely to interpret Jesus to the churches scattered about the Roman world of the middle decades of the first century. Only in this way can our theology possibly be rescued from the interminable fruitless excursions into the imaginative searches for the historical Jesus and critical reconstructions of the New Testament of recent decades. Let us give our reasons (in 'answer to every man,' 1 Peter 3:15 kjv) when asked but, for now, academic search for the 'historical Jesus' and Gospels criticism will have to wait in favor of attention to the Lord Jesus Christ of the Bible, who is both an historical Person and the object of our faith.

Jesus As Worker

The work of Jesus Christ on earth was to accomplish the Father's purposes in sending Him. We now direct attention to what Jesus did to accomplish those purposes.

Jesus was a working Man from the beginning—not a nine-to-five denizen of the union halls but more like the blackened smithy of Longfellow's poem and the muscular farmers who, in the days of our great-grandfathers, scythed standing grain by hand—in midsummer heat—and cultivated endless rows of corn (maize) from dawn to dusk with a hoe. God Himself has set the example as Jesus reminds us: 'My Father is working still' and then added, 'and I am working' (John 5:17 rsv).

Jesus as ‘worker’ has direct connection with the Old Testament prophecies of ‘the Servant of the Lord.’ Throughout the Hebrew Bible the usual word for a servant is ‘evedh, a noun derived from the verb ‘avadh, which means to do work. Permanent Hebrew servants (or slaves) were by law always voluntary slaves. A man might pay off a debt by six years of servitude to another, but no more than six years according to the law of Exodus 21:1–4. Nevertheless ‘if the slave plainly says, “I love my master ... I will not go out free,” then his master shall bring him to God, and he shall bring him to the door or the doorpost. And his master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall be his slave [‘avadh, do work for him] for ever’ (Exod. 21:5, 6). This willing obedience is a prominently recurring motif in the Servant passages of Isaiah 40–53, especially 50:4–9 and 53:1–12 which applies to our Lord’s Person and work and to no other.

Jesus was the disciples’ ‘Lord and Master,’ and among them He was ‘one that serves’ and set the example in washing their feet (John 13). Yet the Scriptures plainly say He was God’s willing servant, not mankind’s. He bowed to God’s will but stood up straight before Pilate, the high priest, and Herod. He was no sheep on the way to shearing in His fierce denunciation of ‘scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites’ on the last day of His public ministry (Matt. 23). In the Patmos vision He appears now not as servant of the churches but as their glorious Lord (Rev. 1–3). Such words as servile and subservient, though they contain ‘serve’ do not describe Jesus’ temperament at all.

In this light we understand ‘My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to accomplish his work [emphasis added]’ (John 4:34). Jesus was on earth to work—about His ‘Father’s business’ from His earliest years and onward.

His mission to do business, to perform God’s holy will and purpose, at whatever price, gives great poignancy to His last words on the cross, just before committing His spirit to God: ‘It is finished.’

The Nature of His Work

What was to be the nature of His work? Four sayings from Jesus Himself provide some specifics of the work He came to perform.

[T]he Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost (Luke 19:10).

[T]he Son of Man came not to be served but to serve (Matt. 20:28).

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to proclaim good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim liberty to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those who are oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor (Luke 4:18, 19).

[T]he Son of Man came ... to give his life as a ransom for many (Matt. 20:28).

1. To Seek and Save

To seek and to save lost people was His work. And how He threw His heart into it! ‘When he saw the crowds, he had compassion for them’ (Matt. 9:36) and more than once figuratively described them as the plenteous harvest and called on His disciples to pray for ‘laborers’ to reap it (Matt. 9:38).

Jesus considered ‘The woman at the well’ of Samaria and the crowd of her fellow villagers as a field ‘already ripe for harvest’ where godly men would labor to sow and reap (John 4:35–38).

2. To Serve or ‘Minister’

[T]he Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister (Matt. 20:28 kjv).

He came to be a minister in the sense of ministering to others. The proximate goal was to minister to His own nation. He made that very clear in the incident with the Canaanitish woman of Phoenicia (Matt. 15:21–28), saying as He refused her request for ‘ministry’ or ‘service’: ‘I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.’ A bit earlier He had instructed the Apostles in their first itinerant mission to ‘Go nowhere among the Gentiles, and enter no town of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Matt. 10:5, 6). Yet, as everyone should know, His ultimate goal was to provide a gospel of salvation to the whole world. Jesus explained this cryptically to the disciples in His last public discourse after certain Greeks requested an audience with Him (John 11:20–24). Jesus also used the occasion to emphasize again that those who would serve Him would, like Him, be servants, i.e. ‘ministers’ in the same sense Jesus came to do the work of ministering. ‘He went about doing good’ is how Peter explained His public service (ministry) to the Gentiles listening to Peter’s first fully Christian sermon (Acts 10:38).

3. To Proclaim the Good News

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to proclaim good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim liberty to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those who are oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor (Luke 4:18, 19).

This public announcement of Jesus at His home synagogue in Nazareth explains more specifically what Peter meant when he told the household of Cornelius that Jesus ‘went about doing good.’ The mistake of the Jewish leaders and people of the time was to separate the material benefits, political and social improvement, from the spiritual requirements of the good news. The good news was designed for sinners only, but only repentant sinners. The ‘social gospel’ of yesterday and the liberation theology of today (and who knows what human betterment in Christ’s name of tomorrow) seem rightly to find some grounding in Jesus’ proclamation.

The Old Testament prophetic vision of a visible reign of Messiah over all the earth is implicitly present (Pss. 2 and 72; Isa. 2:1–4; Isa. 35; Ezek. 40–48; and similar passages). These projections see every human wrong righted, every yoke of oppression broken, every captive victim free, knowledge of God covering the earth as the waters cover the sea. And Jesus here claimed the whole program.

Viewed from the standpoint of our Lord’s death, resurrection, ascension and session at God’s right hand we know the passage must be interpreted eschatologically. It is not a complete formula for either Jesus’ personal earthly work or ours as a church. Which brings us to the next point.

The Main Task

4. A Ransom for Many

‘[T]he Son of Man came ... to give his life as a ransom for many’ (Matt. 20:28). This is our Lord’s own explanation of what it would mean for Him ‘to minister’ (kjv), ‘to serve’ (esv, rsv, niv, et al.). The explanation of emphasis on the death of Christ in apostolic ministry is found, in part, in the leading place it has in the Christian gospel. Christianity is a missionary faith; it has a message of eternal salvation to proclaim. Those united with Christ are urged to set their hearts on heaven, not earth. Any program of human betterment is secondary. That message (gospel, preaching, Gr. kerugma) is what, when received by men, saves them: ‘It was God’s good pleasure through ... the thing preached to save them that believe’ (1 Cor. 1:21 asv marg). This gospel is ‘of Christ’ (Rom. 1:16 kjv), that is, His Person and work. Its content is (1 Cor. 15:1–3; Acts 10:36–43) Christ’s Person and work, i.e. who He was and His redemptive career, especially His atoning death.

Old Testament Predictions of His ‘Work’

The distinctively Christian value of the Old Testament is found in the predictions therein of the Savior. This goes far beyond interesting details like the place of His birth, residence in Nazareth and the like, for the Old Testament also furnishes the vocabulary and categories for interpreting the Savior’s career. At several junctures in the Gospel narratives of the Lord’s last days before Calvary, the ruling force of Old Testament prophecies in shaping those events of Passion and death is introduced. When, at the time of His seizure by Jewish authorities, Peter thought to defend Jesus with a sword, ‘Jesus said ... “Do you think that I cannot appeal to my Father, and he will at once send me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then should the Scriptures be fulfilled, that it must be so?” ’ (Matt. 26:52–54). (See also Matt. 27:9; Mark 14:27, 49; Luke 22:37; John 12:37–41; 15:25; 17:12; 19:24, 28, 36, 37.) During the forty days before the ascension of Jesus He frequently interpreted the events just past as fulfillment of Scripture, even upbraiding His disciples for failing to see this (Luke 24:25–27, 44–46).

After the ascension, during the early period when the apostolic church remained near Jerusalem, Peter preached several sermons in which He connected the betrayal, Passion, death and resurrection with specific Old Testament prophecies (Acts 2:23–36) and even went so far as to say that ‘all the prophets,’ i.e. the whole Old Testament, was a foretelling of the death of Christ (Acts 3:17, 18, 24).

Many years later, addressing a synagogue, Paul startled his audience by declaring, ‘For those who live in Jerusalem and their rulers, because they did not recognize him nor understand the utterances of the prophets which are read every Sabbath, fulfilled them by condemning him’ (Acts 13:27; see also 28–41). In fact, invariably arguments used by the Apostles in appealing to Jews were based on the Old Testament prophecies of the Passion, death and resurrection of Jesus.

Furthermore, as indicated above, the Lord Himself and His Apostles held that Old Testament prophecy, ritual and history interpreted the meaning of the crucifixion and related events. Isaiah 52:13–53:12, a comprehensive prophecy of the Lord’s suffering and dying Servant, lies in the background of interpretation of Jesus throughout the New Testament, from the words of the Father at the beginning of Jesus’ ministry (Matt. 3:17; cf. Isa. 52:13; 53:4; Matt. 12:15–21; cf. Isa. 52:13; 42:1 ff.) to the apostolic interpretation of His suffering and death (1 Peter 2:22; cf. Isa. 53:9 and 2 Cor. 5:21; 1 Peter 2:23; cf. Isa. 53:7; Heb. 12:3; 1 Peter 2:25; cf. Isa. 53:6). Millions of Bible-reading Christians have read the Gospels and then later read Isaiah 53 only to say, Isaiah has drawn a picture of our Savior’s death in our place. Literature on this subject on every level of scholarship and exposition and from many perspectives frequently appears. My own efforts in this direction, based on lectures I gave over several years to second-year Hebrew students in seminary are gathered together in my book, The Sufferings and the Glory.¹

So merely ‘doing good’ (as Peter said in Acts 10:38) was a prelude to rejection, betrayal, denial, denunciation, condemnation and execution by crucifixion. A major part of each of the Gospel narratives relates the story. His death is clearly the main subject of ‘the good news’ or gospel. Repeatedly the Gospel writers report how Jesus punctuated His talks to the disciples during the final months with forecasts of this ghastly consummation. Let us take note of some of them.

Jesus’ Steady Purpose

Immediately after the climax of recognition as ‘Son of the living God’ which gave Jesus much joy (Matt. 16:16, 17) all three Synoptics say: ‘From that time Jesus began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things from the elders and the chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised’ (Matt. 16:21; cf. Mark 9:31; Luke 9:22). Any effort to deflect Him from this ‘must go ... and suffer’ He regarded as from Satan. Shortly thereafter as the little party of four descended the Mount of Transfiguration He mentioned it again (Mark 9:9; Luke 9:44, 45). At the mountain top only minutes before, Moses and Elijah had discussed with Him His ‘departure’ (‘decease’ kjv, Gr exodus) which shortly would take place in Jerusalem (Luke 9:31). Later as they ‘passed through Galilee’—evidently repeatedly and on different occasions—He taught His disciples and said to them, ‘The Son of Man is going to be delivered into the hands of men, and they will kill him. And when he is killed, after three days he will rise’ (Mark 9:31).

The same Gospel reports state that none of the disciples understood what Jesus was saying. Their minds could not countenance the notion that Jesus might fail in His mission as they understood it. Who in his right mind would join up with a leader who deliberately planned to fail? Each of the Gospels tells His story in such a way that the successful work of redemption by the blood of the cross is the denouement. When it was all over the Son and the Father each made an impressive announcement that it was so: ‘Jesus uttered a loud cry,’ ‘It is finished’ (Mark 15:37; John 19:30)—‘And behold, the curtain of the temple was torn in two, from top to bottom’ (Matt. 27:51).

This steady purpose to accomplish the mission to give His life a ransom for many, to be the Lamb of God in a divine ritual of sacrifice of cosmic significance, is held to be the Christian’s ideal example of steady purpose. We are exhorted to ‘run with endurance the race that is set before us, looking to Jesus, the founder and perfecter of our faith’ (Heb. 12:1, 2).

The Role (Function) of Mediator

Though ‘role’ is derived from the French word for the roll of paper containing a dramatic actor’s part and, in English, primarily means an actor’s part in a play, we do now use the word role (or role) to specify the proper function of someone or something. The work of the Theanthropos (God-man) as Mediator was certainly no playacting (even though a great spectacle to men and angels).

‘For there is one God, and there is one mediator [Gr. mesitēs] between God and men, the man Christ Jesus’ (1 Tim. 2:5 kjv, rsv and esv).

Mediate, mediation and mediator are well-known words in common use, especially in labor-management disputes. Mediation is very difficult work in labor-management disputes, legal tangles in domestic quarrels and the like, and we all know about this. We know that truth and justice are frequently violated, perverted or at least slighted in mediation of human disputes. Compromises of principles seem necessary for perceived success. We are apt therefore to misunderstand the work of Christ as Mediator. Truth and righteousness are served perfectly in His mediatorial work. The work of the Theanthropos as Mediator was precisely to avoid compromise, viz.: ‘to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus’ (Rom. 3:26 niv).

The function of mediation between people frequently occurs in biblical narrative, though there is no special Hebrew word for it. Job (Job 9:33) expressed desire for a mokiaḥ, ‘one who could judge’ (hiph. act. part. of yakaḥ) ‘between us,’ i.e. between Job and God. ‘But even though the LXX renders be-ne-nu (lit. between us), by mesitēs (‘mediator’ in 1 Tim. 2:5) it is a tendentious mistake.’² Oepke insists it was employed to tickle the ears of educated Gentiles, not to give precise meaning to a Hebrew word. ‘There is no single term for “mediator” in the Hebrew or Greek Old Testament.’³ TDNT devotes twenty-six densely furnished pages to a faithful recital of the background of the word mesitēs, mediator. It is a legal term, the essential idea of the noun and corresponding verb mesiteuo, it being to achieve reconciliation between two alienated parties. The verb is used only once (Heb. 6:17) and not in the usual sense of ‘act as mediator.’⁴ But mesitēs (mediator) is none the less important in spite of its rare occurrence for two reasons. First, because it is the comprehensive word for all Christ has done and continues to do to bring lost men to God (1 Tim. 2:5). Second, because in Galatians Paul makes special use of it in two verses, showing what he means by the word. Theologians did not use the word mesitēs much in ancient times in Christology. In those days the Person of Christ loomed larger than any other question. It occupied the theologians until the close of the epoch of antiquity.

The Mesitēs in Paul’s Theology of Redemption

‘[I]t [the law] was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator [mesitēs]’ (Gal. 3:19 kjv; ‘intermediary’ esv). Moses, of course was the ‘mediator.’ And it was the hand of Moses which held the tablets of the ‘law’ (Decalogue) inscribed by God when, after forty days on ‘the mount’ with God, he descended to the people (Exod. 32:15, 18). Nearly forty years later Moses, describing the mighty events attending the giving of the law said, ‘At that time I stood between the Lord and you.’ So we know a mesitēs in Paul’s thought was one who stood between the Lord and people in imparting revelation. Moses was a mediator in arranging the Sinai covenant (‘negotiating’ is the wrong word when one party is the divine Judge of the world) between God at the top of Mt. Horeb and Israel camped at the foot.

No doubt Moses is our prototypical, biblical mesitēs (mediator) and we know what he did. In the first place, he functioned as a prophet, mediating divine revelation, as the last four books of the Pentateuch abundantly relate. In the second place, as a priest, Moses occasionally offered sacrifice to God for the people (Heb. 9:19–22) and famously served as their successful priestly intercessor with God (Exod. 32:31–35). Thirdly, Moses was a ruler, in every respect as much as ‘kings’ such as Saul or David in the normal Hebraic sense. Stephen said, ‘This Moses ... God sent as both ruler and redeemer' (Acts 7:35). A. J. McClain comments:

It is true that Moses is never spoken of as a king. But that is true of more than one great figure in history who have ruled as absolute monarchs over various nations. The great difference between Moses and these other rulers is that in the case of the great law-giver, the regal authority was exercised under God and His direct control. Dr O. T. Allis is right in saying that 'Moses exercised the office of king; he represented the invisible King' (Prophecy and the Church, 1945, p. 59). The testimony of Acts 7:35 is decisive.⁵

'Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one' (Gal. 3:20 kjv). This verse has hundreds of variant interpretations. The English Standard and New International Versions' renderings suggest a partial answer: 'Now an intermediary implies more than one; but God is one.' The one God employed no mesitēs (mediator, intermediary) in announcing a covenant to Abraham (see preceding vv. 15 and 16). Abraham received divine promises also called a covenant. God (who is one, all in all) spoke directly to Abram without a mediator (Gen. 12, 13, 15, et al). The law associated with the name of Moses was by a mediator between two. Moses was the go-between. God gave the commands and conditions. Moses passed them on to the people. He didn't adjust differences he simply served as messenger—which in Greek usages was one of the connotations of mesitēs among Greek-speaking Jews. 'Angel' is the Greek word (aggelos, pronounced angelos) for messengers of God in mediation of the covenant.⁶ So this verse rests on the concept of Moses' prophetic activity (organ of revelation) as mesitēs.

The Three Offices of the Mediator of Redemption

The Old Testament is indispensable for a full understanding of the work of Christ. We refer to His threefold office of prophet, priest and king. It will help to understand this triplex office to observe several things. First, the comprehensive nature of His work as the God-man is indicated by a comprehensive term, 'mediator.' This word designates no single aspect of Christ's work of redemption but every aspect—'For there is one God, and there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all' (1 Tim. 2:5, 6). Notice His mediatorial work is traced especially to His death as a 'ransom.' Second, 'Christ' is another comprehensive term for all He came to be and do. Though Christ came later to be used as a name for Jesus, it served first as His title as the predicted Messiah of the Old Testament. The nation of Israel observed the custom of inducting official men connected with their commonwealth into office by the ceremony of anointing with oil. This is first mentioned in Scripture in connection with the Aaronic priests (Exod. 28:41). It is mentioned also in connection with the induction into office of Israel's first king (1 Sam. 9:15; 10:1). Though the practice is seldom mentioned in that connection, prophets were also sometimes so inducted into office (1 Kgs. 19:16; cf. Gen. 20:7; Ps. 105:15).

Now, the Hebrew word 'to anoint with oil' is mashaḥ; the derived adjective mashiah, anointed, becomes in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, Messias, whence the English word 'Messiah' comes. A step further, the Greek translation of this work is Christos (derived from Chrio, to pour oil). This is transferred to Latin as Christus and from Latin to English as Christ. Hence the title Christ points directly to the threefold office of Christ: prophet, priest and king.

Prophet

The function of a prophet is to convey a written or spoken message from God to men: i.e. he was to teach with divine authority. Jesus did just that. In His Person, words and deeds He revealed the Father (John 8:26; 14:9; 17:8). And He taught the people (Matt. 5–7). He was declared to be a prophet and was said to have done a prophet's work (Deut. 18:15; cf. Acts 3:22; Matt. 13:57; Luke 13:33; John 6:14). In keeping with the requirements for a prophet (Deut. 18:9 ad fin; and 13:1 ff.) He produced the signs of a prophet (He was a Hebrew, performed miracles, made near-term predictions which were fulfilled and fully honored the Mosaic covenant, Deut. 18:15–22). There can be no doubt that Jesus' work as Messiah, the Christ of God, included everything germane to His office of prophet.

Priest

Jesus also fulfilled the office of anointed priest. O.T. priests had civil functions such as supervision of medical and sanitary affairs (Lev. 11–15; cf. Luke 5:14), on stated occasions taught the Law to the people (Lev. 10:11; Deut. 33:10; 2 Chr. 15:3) and pronounced blessings (Deut. 21:5; Num. 6:23–26). The chief biblical function of a priest was to mediate religiously between God and man in two ways: the offering of sacrifices (especially bloody sacrifices at the brazen altar) and to make intercession. Of these two, in the Mosaic ritual system, offering sacrifices was exclusively the priests' duty and right. The priest was mediator in a sense the prophet and the king were not, it being his function to represent God to the people in the functions at the altar and likewise to represent them to God in prayer.

That Jesus fulfilled both these functions and did so as divinely appointed priest is explicitly stated in Hebrews 7:24–28. In connection with a 'priesthood,' which He holds 'permanently,' He 'always lives to make intercession for them' and 'once for all ... he offered up himself.' Jesus was both victim and sacrificing priest. This is the work of redemption to which, in a sense, all other is ancillary and supplemental. To it this study shall return.

King

The third aspect of His office and work is that of king. So Nathanael could confess, 'You are the King of Israel!' (John 1:49); Jesus could speak of His kingdom (John 18:36), and when Pilate asked, 'You are a king, then' Jesus could answer, 'You are right in saying I am' (John 18:37 niv). In the great prophecy of Psalm 2:6, the Lord God says of Him, 'I have set my King on Zion, my holy hill.'

Likewise, in Psalm 110, a prophecy Jesus appropriated for Himself as Messiah, God proclaims, 'Rule in the midst of your enemies' (v. 2). This Messianic rule, though it began before His ascension among His disciples, was formally inaugurated at the session at God's right hand (Eph. 1:19–23). That reign focuses, in the present age, on the church, a kingdom of grace and spiritual power. It shall expand to a visible kingdom, when at His Second Coming, He assumes the throne of David, over Israel (Ps. 72) and from that throne rules all the nations as King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 19).

This Old Testament background of the title of office, 'Christ,' explains the confession of Peter (Matt. 16:16) and of Mary (John 11:27). Both, 'You are the Christ, the Son of the living God' and 'you are the Christ, the Son of God, who is coming into the world' were spoken by pious Jews steeped in the Old Testament religious outlook. They could hardly have understood the title in any other way than that of designating one or all aspects of the threefold office of prophet, priest and king.

The New Testament clearly indicates that Jesus fulfilled all three designations of the title, as we shall see. (See also Acts 4:26, 27.)

To summarize then, as Moses the great lawgiver and mediator of the ‘old covenant’ functioned in three offices of prophet, priest and king (as we have seen above) so Christ the Mediator of the ‘new covenant’ (‘testament’ kjv) (Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24) functions in the same three mediatorial offices. In the work of salvation as prophet He is the Word of God to men, as priest He is offerer and offering at the sacrifice of Calvary, and as king He presently reigns at the right hand of the Father. This threefold characterization is more than a mere convenient way to arrange what Christ did, does and shall yet do for our salvation. It is the biblically furnished structure of biblical truth.⁷

The very title Christ (Anointed, Messiah) implies an authoritative structure. Jesus is ‘the Anointed’ prophet, priest and king, fulfilling the Old Testament promises and types, bringing the Mosaic institutions to consummation in Himself—thus furnishing authoritative structure for interpretation of the Person, life and work of the Mediator.

A Jewish author points out that ‘the Anointed of the Lord’ gives the proper bearer of the title a special sanctity, just as Christians find their New Testament says it should be with our Lord:

[T]he person of ‘the Anointed of the Lord’ came to be considered sacrosanct; to harm him, or even to curse him, was a capital offense (2 Sam. 19:21). A further development of this concept can be seen in the belief that God provided special protection of His anointed king. The Psalms contain several references to the idea of divine intervention for ‘the Anointed of the Lord,’ the idealized Davidic king: ‘Now I know that the Lord saveth His Anointed [mashiah], He will answer him from His holy heaven with the mighty acts of His saving right hand’ (Ps. 20:7). The Lord is a strength unto them, and he is a stronghold of salvation to His Anointed (Ps. 28:8).⁸ [Patai might have added Ps. 105:14, 15.]

Eusebius, the most important historian of the pre-Nicene and Nicene age (fourth century) devoted chapter 3 of the first book of his Church History to elaboration of this point. After full elaboration of the Scripture precedents and types he summarizes:

[A]ll these have reference to the true Christ, the divinely inspired and heavenly Word, who is the only high priest of all, and the only king of every creature and the Father’s own supreme prophet of prophets.⁹

The expectations of godly folk at the Advent of Christ seems to evidence this same understanding of the three offices of ‘the Coming One’ (Gr. ho erchomenos). Even the Samaritan woman at the well of Sychar (John 4:19, 25, 26, 29) knew about the coming anointed Prophet and Jesus confirmed her information (John 4:26).

I can think of no such specific expression of expectation for a future anointed priest in the Gospels. The intertestamental literature, especially the Dead Sea literature, proves there was a lively expectation of a priest-Messiah, not necessarily however the same person as the prophet or king-Messiah.

Messiah [Anointed One] at Qumran and the Dead Sea Documents

Several of the documents from Qumran refer to the lay messiah (Messiah of Israel, or anointed king) and the priestly messiah (Messiah of Aaron) and in one striking passage, they are mentioned together with ‘the Prophet’ (i.e. of Deut. 18:18; John 1:21). In apparent expectation of a soon arrival of all three The Manual of Discipline says of certain specially holy men (presbyters): ‘Until the coming of the Prophet and of both the priestly and the lay [royal] messiah, these men are not to depart from the clear intent of the Law,’ etc.¹⁰

The ‘Amazing Dead Sea Scrolls’ show just how fervently the Jewish people in the decades just before the Savior’s birth—at least the most zealously religious of them—relished the coming of ‘the Lord’s Anointed’ king, prophet and priest. They were not certain if one Messiah would hold all three offices, or two men or three. The subject is too large to enter these pages at length, for the scholarly literature of the subject is staggering in volume. (First came reports in Biblical Archaeologist and the Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research as the early discoveries unfolded. Then came the journalistic literature of interpretation and something of a war of publication and custody of the delicate Qumran remains. It is a whole area of specialized study.) Two small books by F. F. Bruce will guide the inquiring reader to scholarly discussion of Messianic expectation of prophet, priest and king in the scrolls published before 1974.¹¹

The long-sequestered but recently published (1991, 1992) literary remains of Qumran and its environs are available in text and translation in R. Eisenman and M. Wise. These documents portray vividly the ethical and spiritual character of the expected Messiah’s coming work. Many of the texts which the Qumran community employed as prophecy of Messiah’s prophetic, royal and priestly work are the same as those cited in the New Testament. These authors offer a chaste and reserved appraisal. They say:

Interestingly, we do not have the two-Messiah doctrine in a few of the texts from the early days of Qumran research ... but rather the more normative, single Messiah most Jews and Christians would find familiar.¹²

Simeon and Anna, Zechariah and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary would have been quite at home in the Messianic discussions of their own time at Qumran.

Post-exilic Expectations Carried to Jesus’ Time

In the early years of the post-exilic Restoration, Ezra directed the people to postpone certain matters ‘until a priest with Urim and Thummim should arise’ (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65). The Apostles expressed no surprise therefore when Jesus spoke of His ‘flesh and blood’ as spiritual life (John 6) and said in the Upper Room of the Eucharistic wine, ‘This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many’ (Mark 14:24). Even the high priest was aware of this priestly aspect of Old Testament prediction of Messiah (John 11:47–50) and John confirms that Caiaphas spoke truly (John 11:52). Nathanael’s exclamation, ‘Rabbi, you are the Son of God! You are the King of Israel!’ (John 1:46) is sufficient to establish existence of a pious hope for a Messianic king. Hence, though many theologians have employed the division of the mediatorial offices into three—prophet, priest and king—it is much more than a convenient rhetorical flourish of theologians, rather it is a seldom stated but inherent feature of biblical teaching about the Messiah of Israel, Redeemer, Revealer, Lord of His people.

There is a reason, almost unnoticed, why the offices of prophet and king are usually lightly touched in writing Christology. That reason is, in first place, the Old Testament types (sacrifice and festival system) and prophecies lay clear emphasis on the Savior's atoning death for sin, His priestly work. Secondly, Jesus' prophetic ministry of revelation has been, as such, not a matter of as much controversy (liberals, for example, reduce Jesus' significance to being a prophet, that is a good teacher or example). Orthodoxy readily acknowledges Jesus as the last great prophet (Heb. 1:1 ff.) but does not exalt this above the priest who both offers sacrifice for sin and is Himself the sacrificial victim. Thirdly, His direct prophetic work in the sense of direct teaching was completed during His public ministry (Matt. 28:20; Luke 4:18; John 1:18; Heb. 1:1; Luke 13:33), while His present reign as 'King of the nations' (Rev. 15:3) is presently out of sight and the public rule and reign are in the future. His priestly work of atonement, to reconcile the world to God (2 Cor. 5:19; Matt. 20:28; Rom. 5:10; 1 John 2:2) is finished; yet it is that saving work He came most specifically to do. The Apostles made 'Jesus Christ and him crucified' (1 Cor. 2:2) the spear-point of everything they had to say. Atonement by the blood of the cross therefore always has been and always will be the theme of theology of sacraments (i.e. ordinances of the Lord's Supper and baptism), sermons and especially of worship on into the future when all the saints of all the ages gather about the throne of God with the 'four living creatures,' 'seven spirits' of God, 'twenty-four elders' and all the holy 'angels' to sing praise to the 'Lamb who was slain' (Rev. 4:1–11; 5:1–14). The same was glimpsed by Daniel the prophet (Dan. 7:13, 14), whose prophecy got Jesus in trouble with the Jewish Sanhedrin (Luke 22:66–71).

¹ Robert D. Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory (Moline, IL: Christian Service Foundation, 1958, republished at Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock, 2001). Based on this work I prepared the article on 'The Servant of the Lord' for the Revised International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, but on account of delays in publication and changes in editorial supervision my article was lost track of and another was used.

² Oepke, in Kittel, Gerhard and Friedrich, Gerhard, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament iv, trans. and ed. Geoffrey W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), p. 601.

³ ibid.

TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

⁴ Arndt and Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament & Other Early Christian Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967).

⁵ A. J. McClain, The Greatness of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1959), p. 59.

⁶ See TDNT, vol iv, p. 617—Gal. 3:19.

⁷ Pieper, Francis, Christian Dogmatics ii (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950–1957), p. 333.

⁸ Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1979), p. 22.

⁹ Eusebius, in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers i, Second Series, ed. P. Schaff, 1886, repr. (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), p. 86.

¹⁰ T. H. Gaster, The Dead Sea Scriptures, rev. ed. (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1964), p. 67.

¹¹ F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins Outside the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1974), p. 72; also Bruce, Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts (London: Tyndale Press, 1960), pp. 46–55. Cf. also a more up-to-date opinion by James C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), pp. 161–162. Perhaps the most measured and competent brief assessment is Jack Finegan, ‘Relationships with Early Christianity,’ in Light From the Ancient Past: The Archaeological Backgrounds of the Hebrew-Christian Religion vol. ii (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969), pp. 288–293. There is an immense technical literature on this subject which cannot be entered here.

¹² Robert Eisenman and Michael Wise, The Dead Sea Scrolls Uncovered (New York: Penguin, 1993), p. 17.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (501). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

Humiliation and Exaltation: Two States of the Incarnate Life of the Son of God

Making this distinction is a return from the emphasis of nineteenth-century discourse about an alleged kenosis or self-emptying of the Son of God to the more biblical teaching of the two states of our incarnate Lord: humiliation and exaltation. Before going on to that let us take brief notice of the kenosis doctrine of Gottfried Thomasius (1802–1875) and his successors.

The complete story of the rise of the ‘kenosis doctrine’ cannot be told here. During the nineteenth century in Germany and somewhat later in Britain, several scholars attempted to bridge between rationalist criticism and an orthodox view of Christ as God incarnate. The several incidents and sayings of Jesus where He expressed lack of information (as of the time of His second advent and of what was going on about Him) or seemed to lack power (as when requiring the aid of angels and the like) were interpreted as loss of the divine attributes of omniscience and omnipotence. These scholars seized upon the word ekenosen, from kenoō, to empty, in Philippians 2:7, rendered ‘made himself of no reputation’ in the kjv, to support the idea of a Jesus limited essentially by the opinions of His time. Thus Jesus’ testimony to the inerrant authority of the Old Testament and His belief in demons and the like is negated. He simply had given up divine omniscience and omnipotence and hence didn’t know any better. The sincerity of many of the early advocates need not be doubted. Some of these scholars earnestly desired a way to remain orthodox and to go with the flow of what was deemed to be scientific truth about nature and about the Bible as an inspired book not necessarily true in every respect.

D. Baillie, who was certainly no rigid fundamentalist as orthodox theologians go, pointed out that the kenosis (self-emptying idea) seems so very promising to many theologians today ‘because it apparently enables them to combine full faith in the deity of Jesus Christ with a completely frank treatment of His life on earth as a human phenomenon, the life of a man.’¹ Baillie, in this famous book shows that the kenosis doctrine envisions a wholly humanized God without divine attributes. Louis Berkhof furnishes a guide to the subject from a wise orthodox perspective.²

The literature on this subject—almost all modern and recent—is amazingly large and keen minds have been devoted to it. I have read many books and articles about it, some very recently. Student papers in my classes have explored it as well as graduate theses I have had a part in directing. I do not hesitate to regard the ‘kenosis theology’ as a cul-de-sac, a wrong turn, one which we may now safely avoid though we shall make further notice of it in the following discussion.

Let us come to the point immediately. The discussion begins with ‘made himself of no reputation’ (kjv), “made himself nothing” (esv and niv), ‘emptied himself’ (rsv) at Philippians 2:7. The word so rendered is ekenosen (third person singular aorist one) from keno-ō. This verb is used only six times in the New Testament. A. H. Leitch put the term in right perspective in a brief article noting ‘the fact that the other uses of the word ekenosen (Rom. 4:14; 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:15; 2 Cor. 9:3) are uniformly figurative in their context and will not bear the weight of literal usage which the Kenoticists demand of the same word in Philippians 2:7.’³ Some English Versions and commentators have (unwisely, good authorities say) put He ‘emptied himself’ in the text of Philippians 2:7. The nineteenth-century orthodox Anglicans who struggled to explain our Lord’s supposed (or real) ignorance were very competent scholars whom I admire greatly, but mistaken; present slight revivals are due to carelessness, in my opinion.

Usage of keno-ō in the New Testament so far from indicating the notion that the preexistent Logos gave up any attribute that constituted Him ‘very God of very God’ show exactly the opposite. Let us see.

If keno-ō sometimes means to empty or reflexively to empty oneself of some aspect or part of oneself, Philippians 2:7 is the only one of the six New Testament occurrences where it is so. (See Rom. 4:14; 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:15; 2 Cor. 9:3; Phil. 2:7). TDNT shows that in non-biblical Greek usage keno-ō means a) ‘to deprive of content or possessions, to be desolate, etc., and b) to ‘nullify’ or ‘destroy.’⁴ TDNT says the first sense (giving up possessions) is the sense of Philippians 2:7 and in the others the sense is to nullify or invalidate something. Another standard authority says the idea in Philippians 2:7 is ‘to divest himself of privileges.’⁵

If the translation He ‘emptied himself’ is allowed to stand it should be understood metaphorically, as the ancients for whom Greek was their native tongue did. In theology, as A. H. Leitch asserted, ‘the term [kenosis] was used first in Patristic literature and ... in Christian theology from about the first century, usually as a synonym for the incarnation itself. It is concerned with an emphasis on Christ’s humiliation or condescension.’⁶ Leitch goes on rightly to observe that Paul’s teaching in Philippians 2:6–8 is parallel with the same author’s comment ‘that though he was rich ... he became poor’ (2 Cor. 8:9).

There is a minority opinion among scholars—I think likely the correct one—that the whole notion is that the pre-incarnate Son, ‘existing in the form of God’ is the subject of the clause heauton ekenosen (he emptied himself, rsv and most recent translations). These words are immediately followed by morphēn doulou labōn rendered usually ‘taking the form of a servant’ (an aorist, active participle of labanō, to take). The usual Versions, most commentators consenting, regard the taking of the form of a servant as following the act of emptying Himself. However, the participle, being aorist, may be rendered ‘having [previously] taken the form of a servant,’ etc. If so, then ‘having taken the form of a servant’, He emptied Himself. In such a case the incarnate Son, Jesus of Nazareth, is the subject of ‘he emptied himself.’ A note to myself in my file on this subject, quoting an article by Robert B. Strimple, reads: ‘C. F. D. Moule ... says he has found [now quoting Moule’s An Idiom Book of New Testament Greek, 2nd ed.]⁷ in the New Testament [there is] no exception to the rule that an aorist participle denotes an action prior to that of the main verb, with the possible exception of two passages in Acts.’⁸ Philip Schaff in an important article says, ‘The kenosis, or self-humiliation cannot refer to the incarnate Logos, who never was en morphē theou, but must refer to the preexistent Logos ...’⁹ The matter deserves renewed study.

It does not seem profitable in this chapter to discuss modern ideas of kenosis further except to recommend some excellent treatments of the subject. Relatively recent and very helpful are: D. M. Baillie; Paul K. Jewett and A. H. Leitch. L. Berkhof and A. H. Strong¹⁰ are very good guides to the subject as well as all of Vincent Taylor’s writings. (Several recent academic theologians interested in some rapprochement with process theology—entailing that God is finite and changing—and ideas of the Trinity as a model of human society, community or family are reviving interest in the kenosis doctrine, leading to the translation of an 1856 essay of I. A. Dorner, leading German kenotic theologian: Divine Immutability.¹¹)

Doctrinal Development of Humiliation-Exaltation

In Early Lutheran Theology

The formal distinction between two ‘states’ of Christ dates back to Lutheran theology of the immediate post-Luther era. Lutherans taught the doctrine of the ‘real presence’ of the body and blood of Christ with the Eucharistic bread and wine. This was explained by asserting that the attributes of deity, including omnipresence, were communicated to the human nature and (rarely and with some hesitancy) the attributes of humanity to the divine nature, in the incarnation. This is a form of the doctrine of communication of attributes, unique to Lutherans. All orthodox theology holds to the communion of attributes in the Person of Christ. According to the Lutheran teaching, however, the risen Christ’s body and blood are presented to communicants at the Lord’s Supper in an invisible mode along with the visible elements of bread and wine. For example, hundreds of pages in the Lutheran book of Systematic Theology by F. Pieper are devoted to this doctrine.¹²

Francis Pieper states, ‘The teaching of the Formula [of Concord] on the humiliation and exaltation affects only the human nature of Christ. It is blasphemous perversion to refer them to the divine nature.’¹³ Most of the rest of orthodox Christendom—Protestant, Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox—would assert that on the contrary it was the divine Second Person of the Godhead, the Logos of John 1:14, the One who existing ‘in the form of God ... humbled himself’ (Phil. 2:6–8), the One who ‘was rich’ and ‘became poor’ (2 Cor. 8:9), who experienced the humiliation and the glory.

I mean no lack of respect for historical Lutheranism in offering the opinion (widely held both in and out of Lutheranism) that the doctrine of communication (as opposed to communion) of attributes and the notion that the humiliation and exaltation of Christ relates to the human nature of Christ rather than the divine Person have always been tightly grasped only to defend the teaching, unique to Lutherans, that the ‘real presence’ (i.e. true body and blood) of Christ is in (or with) the material elements of the Lord’s Supper. Reformed Christians, as well as some believing Lutherans, and Protestants in general, are convinced the real presence of Jesus is spiritual and the elements symbolical of the Lord’s body and blood. The Roman Church teaches that the elements are in essence transubstantiated into body and blood though the accidents (taste, smell, texture, etc.) remain bread and wine. This subject must be refined further in connection with the doctrine of ordinances, or sacraments.

Lutheran-Reformed Debate

The debates over this issue between Lutherans and Reformed in the Reformation Epoch became increasingly bitter. There was a great desire on the part of Melanchthon and sympathizers (Lutheran) and all the Reformed in Germany and Switzerland, represented by Calvin, to come to agreement and thereby present a united front to the dangerous force of the Roman Church as well as to promote a charitable Christian unity among all evangelicals. After Melanchthon’s death Joachim Westphal (1510–1574), defender of the most extreme forms of Lutheran orthodoxy, fiercely opposed the Reformed. Calvin was discouraged beyond measure, greatly dismayed there was no longer an entreatable Melanchthon to address. (For the most important Reformed literature of that time on the matter see pp. 199–579 of volume II of Calvin’s Tracts, Beveridge translation.¹⁴) This issue first arose in the decade following 1517 in what historians call ‘The Sacramentarian Controversy’ in which Luther and Zwingli were chief participants and Bucer the unsuccessful harmonizer. The controversy sadly simmered on until actual persecution of Calvinists in Mary’s reign in England drove a group of Reformed Christians to northern Germany where they were treated almost as badly by the Lutheran magnates as by their Roman Catholic Queen ‘Bloody Mary.’ This is what called forth Calvin’s bitter responses. The episode is one of the saddest in the history of ‘evangelical’ theology, necessary as it seemed to be to the participants at the time.

Calvinists entered into debate in early attempts to resolve this difference and present a united face to Roman Catholic Europe. ‘Real presence’ could be accepted but not body and blood (or ‘flesh and bones’), which ascended to heaven (Luke 24; Acts 1) and would remain there till ‘the time for restoring all ... things’ (Acts 3:21).

Yet the distinction between the two states of Incarnate Son of God articulated by Lutherans was quickly adopted by leading Calvinists and on to the present. This is at least some positive fruit of the unhappy controversy.

The distinction between Christ’s states of incarnate humiliation and incarnate glory became subject for careful definition and extended debate only in post-medieval, Reformation times, but it had been always believed by orthodox Christians because it is pervasive in Scriptures. Christ Himself sharply reproved some disciples on the first Easter as ‘foolish ones’ and ‘slow of heart’ to miss it in ‘all that the prophets have spoken’ about how it was ‘necessary that the Christ should suffer ... and enter into his glory’ (Luke 24:25, 26; cf. 45, 46). Peter represents the humiliation-glory matter as a subject of both interest and puzzlement for those prophets of the Old Testament who made those predictions (1 Peter 1:10, 11). They knew of the contrasting suffering and glory and which came first but were mystified as to how to put the two together.

The States of Christ in Old Testament Prophecy

Aspects of the humiliation and glory are, as Jesus said, to be found in ‘the Scriptures’ ‘beginning with Moses and all the Prophets ... all the Scriptures’ (Luke 24:27). The Apostles using this sort of exegesis treated the whole Hebrew Bible as a Christian book—not just a few Messianic passages. I have presented the matter somewhat at length in other writings.¹⁵

Isaiah 52:13–53:12 is the most explicit and extensive of Old Testament passages pointing specifically to these two states of Christ’s incarnate life. Franz Delitzsch points out how stages of Christ’s humiliation and exaltation are somewhat cryptically prophesied. The Lord first exclaims ‘Behold, my servant’ (Isa. 52:13); then He details how ‘my servant’ is destined to succeed (‘prosper’) ‘be exalted’ (resurrection) ‘and lifted up’ (ascension) and ‘shall be high’ (the session or enthronement on high). Yet all this, as Delitzsch goes on to say, shall happen to a Servant whose ‘appearance was so marred, beyond human semblance,’ and His form so degraded in the Passion and crucifixion, that it no longer looked the part of a normal male of our species (Isa. 52:14).¹⁶

The Caesura—‘Wherefore ... therefore ... yet ... but’: several passages in each Testament strikingly emphasize the break between the state of humiliation and the state of exaltation by a ‘wherefore,’ ‘therefore’ or the like—similar to the pause or break in a poetic line which scholars of poesy call a caesura. Examples are the ‘Therefore’ after ‘he shall bear their iniquities’ and before ‘I will divide him a portion with the great’ (Isa. 53:11, 12 esv margin). Similar are the ‘Therefore’ or ‘Wherefore’ (kjv) of Philippians 2:9, the ‘it behoved’ of Luke 24:46 (kjv) and the ‘And now’ of John 17:5 (see Berkouwer, The Work of Christ, chapter 3).

The stages of the humiliation and of the exaltation have been variously traced. Whether as various doctrinal-exegetical scholars propose there are four, five or eight stages downward and three or four or five upward, it seems to the present writer the burial marks the caesura or break between them, belonging to neither and yet to both. The ultimate stage of humiliation was death by Roman execution. After the thrust of the soldier’s spear the Savior’s body ‘the hands of lawless men’ (‘wicked hands’ kjv) (Acts 2:23) never touched Him again, inasmuch as His body was solely in the hands of loving friends and His human spirit had already taken flight to the Father in heaven into whose ‘hands’ He on the cross committed His spirit (Luke 23:46). Some suggest (perhaps with good reason) the several references to the ‘hour’ when He Himself was to be glorified is not the crucifixion but the ‘glory’ that was to follow. True, He embraced the coming agony with enthusiasm (Luke 12:40, 50), yet His exaltation was not in the shame of the cross but in ‘the subsequent glories’ (1 Peter 1:11). Perhaps Hebrews 12:1–3 should guide us here. There it is clear He ‘endured the cross, despising the shame’ because of ‘the joy that was [still] set before him ... and is seated at the right hand ... of God.’ Only in this view of the matter, it seems to me, can Jesus be our example: ‘looking to Jesus, the founder and perfecter of our faith’ of Hebrews 12:2.

Further, observe that the devil's last proposal (in Matthew's account) during the forty days of temptation was to bypass the suffering on the way to glory.

Doctrinal Statement of the Humiliation

We have already taken notice of the fact that some of the changes for the Son of God in assuming (adding) a human nature to the divine nature were temporary. However, assuming human nature is not one of the temporary aspects of incarnation. He is still a man at the right hand of God and exercises His priestly ministry in heaven as God en sarki,—in flesh. Our Lord is a Man in the state of exaltation as well as the state of humiliation. Further, human nature by creation in God's image and by virtue of its being pronounced blessed (Gen. 1:28) and receiving the very breath of God (Gen. 2:7) cannot in itself be base or inestimable.

The event of 'humbled himself' (Phil. 2:8 esv, kjv, rsv, niv), the leading idea in 'The Humiliation,' is not therefore in becoming man (anthrōpos) or a man (anēr) but that 'as man' (hos anthrōpos) 'he humbled himself by becoming obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross' (Phil. 2:8). In a quite different sense Psalm 113:5, 6 (kjv) says that in His providential care of creation God 'humbleth himself.' In comment on God's care of even sparrows, Calvin comments, 'Surely if the flight of birds is governed by God's definite plan, we must confess with the prophet that he so dwells on high as to humble Himself to behold whatever happens in heaven and on earth' (Institutes, I, 16.5). It is true that He was 'for a little while ... made lower than the angels' (Heb. 2:9) and if so, as Man, lower than God, but this is not what Paul means by 'he humbled himself.' Rather as Man, already a little lower than the angels 'he humbled himself,' becoming (genomenos) 'obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross' (Phil. 2:8).

Further, as we have earlier insisted, 'he made himself of no reputation' is approximately the right sense of heauton ekenosen in Philippians 2:7 (kjv). The clause has no reference whatever to self-emptying of the self. One's self cannot divest oneself of self. The act is set in contrast with self-aggrandizement, as the preceding context (Phil. 2:5, 6) makes perfectly clear.

No more should be put in the meaning of Philippians 2:4 ff., than the author put in. Paul is citing the ethical example of Jesus to enforce the duty to think and live for others rather than self. Ernst Lohmeyer introduced the idea that verses 5–11 were a pre-Pauline hymn incorporated into the text of Paul's letter (Kyrios Jesus: Eine Untersuchung zu Phil. 2:5–11, (Heidelberg, 1928)). We need to remind ourselves that this notion, though widely accepted, is only a theory without any direct historical evidence. Rather, it seems to me, that Paul could find no greater example of such unselfishness than the incarnation and humiliation of Christ and employed the same not only here but also in 2 Corinthians 8:9. The exalted prose of both passages is quite characteristic of many of Paul's famously high rhetorical flights (e.g. Eph. 1:15–23; Rom. 8:31–39). There is no reason in the world why, if indeed Philippians 2:5–11 is a poem—and no one can be certain it is—Paul himself should not be regarded as the author. In my judgment the passage is simply exalted prose.

The incarnation as such does not therefore consist of a divine nature giving up something, but of adding something to a divine Person: that something being a human nature. We are to believe, therefore, that specifically the condition of the humiliation involved two matters only: surrender of visible divine glory, and obedience. Berkhof comments:

On the basis of Phil. 2:7, 8 Reformed theology [and most orthodox theology except some Lutherans] distinguishes two elements [only] in the humiliation of Christ, namely, (1) the kenosis ... consisting in this that he laid aside the divine majesty [or glory], the majesty of the sovereign Ruler of the universe, and assumed human nature in the form of a servant; and (2) the tapeinosis (humiliatio), consisting in that he became subject to the demands and to the curse of the law, and in his entire life became obedient in action [active obedience] and suffering to the very limit of a shameful death.¹⁷

That glory as God was laid aside is plain from the fact that people whom He met viewed Him as described in Isaiah 53:1–3, a rustic carpenter, a quite ordinary specimen of a town of bad reputation, nothing noble or regal about Him.¹⁸ The moral glory of Christ was apparent only to those to whom God saw fit to reveal it (Luke 19:42; John 12:37–41). In Jesus' prayer of John 17, He prayerfully longed for the restoration of that pre-incarnate glory soon to be restored (John 17:5).

‘[O]bedient to’ (hupeko-os mechri) has reference to His life of submission to God's law and God's special will for Him throughout life, often designated ‘active obedience’ and second, obedience in accepting ‘death, even death on a cross’ (Phil. 2:8). The latter is sometimes called ‘passive obedience,’ though the distinction is not fully correct for the Gospels relate that He actively embraced the destiny of death and might have called upon legions of angels (Matt. 26:53) to deliver Him if He had so willed. There are active and passive elements in all His obedience, though we shall accept the distinction for purposes of having a commonly accepted verbal medium of reference.

Two More Questions

It would greatly lengthen this chapter here to introduce the various views of the so-called kenosis and the history of the views from the Reformation to recent times. Let us limit remarks first to the question of how Christ can clearly appear not to be omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent (divine attributes) in the Gospels and yet as God-man possess those attributes. Second, to the idea of humiliation as active and passive obedience.

Omniscience, Omnipotence and Omnipresence in the State of Humiliation

The Gospel reports say that Jesus grew in wisdom as a child (Luke 2:52), yet during the ‘last week’ apparently expected a fig tree to have some fruit when it had none (Matt. 21:19, 20). Jesus sometimes appears to have asked questions to gain information (Luke 8:45, 46) and said He did not know the time of His second advent (Mark 13:32), information known only to the Father. The reports do not seem to represent Jesus as always on every occasion being consciously omniscient.

The same reports say that Jesus grew in physical stature, that He was wrapped in ordinary infant clothing, the cultural equivalent we may suppose, of diapers (Luke 2:7)—was weary (John 4:6), hungry (Matt. 4:4), thirsty (John 19:28), tempted by the devil (Matt. 4). The Gospels do not present Jesus as manifesting omnipotence on every occasion. We may be certain He slept regularly because He was weary and, on occasion, exhausted (Mark 4:38).

The same reports make plain Jesus was never in more than one place at the same time. His parents carried Him from Bethlehem to Egypt and thence to Nazareth. He made the thrice-yearly journeys afoot from the family home to the central sanctuary the same as every other Jewish male. The Jesus of the Gospels occasionally makes unusual movements—escaping crowds and attackers, walking on water, but no manifest omnipresence.

These observations really only emphasize the point the creeds make: that Jesus was very man. Not that in important ways He was not also a uniquely different Man (He was, for example, without sin). Nor do they show that He was a mere Man. They show that even though the Person was the Logos, the Second Person of the Godhead, as that Person, He did not employ all the powers of deity in the state of humiliation, and as regards the human nature, He renounced the use of the transient (or relative) attributes the divine nature possesses except as specially occasioned by the Father's will. We shall examine such occasions in the chapter on the deity of Christ.

This is not the way some of the kenotic theologians of the nineteenth century would interpret the renunciation of Philippians 2:7, 8, for they asserted that the Son of God either divested Himself of the relative attributes of omnipotence, omniscience and omnipresence (F. Delitzsch and Thomasius) or even gave up all the distinctly divine attributes and became man in the sense of metamorphosis (Godet and Mackintosh). Nor does this view even quite represent some orthodox writers who, at least on the matter of our Lord's omniscience, deny He knew less in the state of humiliation than in preexistence or exaltation.

Vincent Taylor's Contribution

No writer has given more reverent attention to understanding the incarnation than Vincent Taylor. In contrast with much then current 'Jesus of History' speculation Taylor tried to interpret what the records (all the New Testament) really say. He found no contradiction in belief between the primitive church and the writing of the New Testament, observing: 'Primitive Christology ... is not a stage merely antecedent to St Paul ... it is the Christianity of the common man both before and after the time of the great writers.'¹⁹ Taylor was convinced Jesus was conscious of His deity but stops short of trying either fully to understand or explain a mystery which transcends human categories. He observed rightly that no human being's personal consciousness is open to full understanding—even self-understanding. He thought many areas of Christology would remain mysteries, concluding with this:

The NT writers do not solve the problems, as indeed theology has not solved them yet and will not solve them to its full satisfaction, but, in their thinking and teaching, they addressed themselves to the vital issues which are involved, and they did so in such a manner that what they ... teach has proved to be inspiration of all subsequent Christian thought.²⁰

Taylor seems to find Jesus' sayings about what He knew or did not know as conscious self-limitation to what the condition of life among men in the historic process involves. The God-man possessed the divine attributes (or would have ceased to be God) but did not employ them in any way to disturb the historic process. (I would add, that if Jesus said He did not know this or that, He certainly did not believe or teach any untruths. 'If it were not so I would have told you' is the rule.) Taylor heartily endorsed the historic creeds and states:

The Christology which seems most in accord with the teaching of the NT is ... that in becoming man, the Son of God willed to renounce the exercise of the divine prerogatives and powers, so that in the course of his earthly existence, he might live within the necessary limitations which belong to human finitude.²¹

I cite Taylor with the caution that some of his Christology makes concessions to kenoticism, the idea Son of God in humiliation did not possess all the attributes of deity in His humiliation. The late Dr Taylor's works on various topics related to the Person, life and work of Christ would fill a long shelf.

A. H. Strong's Admirable Summary

A. H. Strong's treatment of 'the State of Humiliation' is correctly and admirably concise and has the virtue of brevity. It has been honored by wide adoption among evangelical teachers and writers. He added just enough (one word) to the usual orthodox statement to solve the problem of why sometimes Jesus seemed to be omniscient and omnipotent and sometimes did not. The word is 'independent.' Let me quote:

Our doctrine of Christ's humiliation will be better understood if we put it midway between two pairs of erroneous views, making it the third of five ...: (1) Gess: the Logos gave up all divine attributes; (2) Thomasius: the Logos gave up relative attributes only; (3) True view: the Logos gave up the independent [emphasis added] exercise of divine attributes; (4) Old Orthodoxy: Christ [i.e. the theopneutos] gave up the use of divine attributes; (5) Anselm: Christ acted as if he did not possess divine attributes.²²

The views cited are views of theologians considered orthodox, not heretical as regarding an actual incarnation.

That in the state of humiliation the Lord surrendered the independent exercise of the attributes of the divine nature takes cognizance of His submission to the special divine will for the Mediator as well as divine law for all members of our race, also of His life of active and passive obedience.

Strong's formulation has been widely accepted among American evangelicals and adopted as almost standard evangelical orthodoxy. Though practically endorsing Strong's view, Lewis and Demarest rather sharply criticize Strong's phrasing of the doctrine. They say that since His use of divine power had always been in harmony with the Father and the Spirit, 'To say that Jesus gave up a contrary [their word, not Strong's] use of His powers seems like reporting that a husband quit beating his wife when in fact he had never beaten her.'²³ This seems capricious to me. Strong did not say 'contrary exercise of the divine attributes,' he said, 'independent.' He obviously did not mean contrary use by independent use. Jesus plainly spoke the language of dependent power and dependent will when He said, 'I can do nothing on my own ... I seek not my own will, but the will of him who sent me' (John 5:30). Lewis and Demarest go on to say: '[T]he Son voluntarily gave up the continuous use of his divine powers and any contrary uses of his human capabilities.'²⁴ This is harmless, but did the Son 'give up contrary uses of ... human capabilities' when 'existing in the form of God?' When He did not have any such capabilities as yet? Perhaps Strong got the message exactly right after all. (It is not without significance that recent orthodox Lutheran theologians of repute find frequent occasion to quote Strong's insightful formulation of Christological doctrine—e.g. F. Pieper

Christ's Active Obedience As an Aspect of Humiliation

Both Calvin and Luther explained Christ's work of redemption as a work of obedience. Calvin did not separate active and passive obedience sharply in using these terms, but the distinctions are there.²⁶ I think he spoke most comprehensively as follows:

How has Christ abolished sin, banished the separation between us and God, and acquired righteousness to render God favorable to us?... He has achieved this for us by the whole course of his obedience [emphasis added] ... proved by Paul's testimony: As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by one man's obedience we are made righteous [Rom. 5:19].... Paul extends the basis of the pardon that frees us from the curse of the law to the whole life of Christ [cites Gal. 4:4, 5]. Thus in his very baptism, also, he asserted that he fulfilled a part of righteousness in obediently carrying out his Father's commandment [Matt. 3:15] ... from the time when he took the form of a servant, he began to pay the price of liberation in order to redeem us.²⁷

In this and other passages Calvin relates Christ's obedience to God's law in Scripture as active obedience throughout life and obedience to God's special will for Him as passive obedience (though He actively embraced it) through Passion and death.

Luther commented on Galatians 4:4, 5 saying: 'In a twofold manner Christ put himself under the Law. First he put Himself under the works of the Law ... circumcised, presented and purified in the temple ... subject to father and mother ...; yet ... not obligated to do this for he was Lord of all laws. But he did so willingly.... In the second place, He also put himself under the penalty and punishment of the Law willingly' (Sermon on Galatians 4:1–7, cited by Thomas Oden).²⁸

Some Details of the Humiliation in Active Obedience

To describe in detail Jesus' unflinching obedience to the will of His Father would be to tell the story of the life of Christ. This is not the sphere of theological Christology. I have published a book of over 300 pages on that subject and will not repeat it here.²⁹

It is the state of humiliation, the humbling aspect of that life, which pertains to the present discussion—'no reputation ... humbled himself ... for your sakes became poor.' From the standpoint of the Bible God is so high He must humble Himself even to look down 'to behold the things that are in heaven'—much more the things 'in the earth!' (Ps. 113:6 kjv). It must therefore be proper to think of the Creator (John 1:1, 2) as humbled greatly to assume the created nature of man, even if in the normal condition of holiness rather than our abnormal condition of sin—starting right off associating Himself with sinners in the womb of a virgin, who like every other mother beginning with Eve, was a sinner. The doctrine of the virgin's immaculate conception is utterly without biblical support. Jesus' accompanying with sinners began early, in fact, before He was born.

(Some Protestant authorities claim there was a 'purification' of the human nature of Christ in the mother's womb. This seems to me about as unlikely as the 'immaculate conception' of the mother, Mary, and introduces a needless miracle. Let us use ‘Occam’s Razor’ on this theological excess of refinement. The angel’s ‘therefore [emphasis added] also that holy thing’ (Luke 1:35 kjv) traces the holiness (sinlessness) of Christ to ‘the power of the Most High’ and the ‘Holy Spirit,’ i.e. the power of God Himself in the conception without a male parent, as we show in the chapter on the virgin birth of Christ.)

Though announced by angels He was delivered to a simple peasant maiden and her poor husband, visited first by rustic shepherds and cradled in a manger for animals. His first lengthy residence was in Egypt, symbol of corruption and disease throughout Scripture; boyhood in a disreputable town, growing up like a plant suckling from a root in very dry social and economic ground, without recognized nobility or stately accoutrements (Isa. 53:1, 2). Let us try to think of the Lord of Glory as weighing only six to ten pounds, crying for a diaper change, suckling at a woman’s breast, babbling in His cradle, learning to talk, contending with neighborhood bullies, subject to unlettered parents (Luke 2:40, 52), known only in the neighborhood and that as son of a village tinker and taking his trade; and in our supposedly educated society let us try to understand the One called the very ‘wisdom of God’ (1 Cor. 3; Prov. 8) as arriving at maturity with less than a sixth-grade education (John 7:15).

Once He said, ‘My Father works and I do too.’ Adam’s work was to till the ground until sweat ran off his nose (Gen. 3:19) and until he would die and return to the ground. Like Adam, He labored, He sweated and He died.

‘If it be possible, let this cup pass from me’ was Jesus’ prayer in the Garden. But Calvary was only the final and most bitter of cups in His public life of humiliation. He made Himself of no worldly reputation. He became obedient to rules made for the gainsaying and disobedient, for little minds and sinful people, until He had fulfilled every one of them. That was what it meant to be ‘made’ of a woman not only ‘under the law’ but subject to ‘every ordinance of man.’

He was to be granted no exception from any humiliating legal requirement for good conduct. The law prescribed circumcision and participation in the whole ritual and sacrificial system, including three trips every year to the central sanctuary. Every one of these Mosaic requirements related to the Israelites as sinners. Jesus was innocent of any sin whatsoever, yet as ‘under the law’ He patiently went through all the motions without protest.

Dawn of Messianic Consciousness

No one knows precisely when the human nature of Jesus became aware of His divine nature and mission of humble obedience. From the incident of being left behind by His parents (Luke 2:41–52) we have at least a terminus ad quem. I quote the following:

We learn that by His twelfth year, for sure our Lord was aware of the nature of his mission. He knew that the temple was His Father’s house and that the ritual there and the Law with its interpretation were His Father’s business. We would like to know if and when Mary and Joseph told Him of the remarkable circumstances surrounding His birth, and if not, how and when He learned of His divine mission. When did the eternal Logos, eternal Son of the Father, become self-conscious in Jesus, the carpenter of Nazareth? People have always wondered. Many learned books have been written about it. Really no one can know for sure, but most readers will agree with James Stalker who wrote: ‘With His reply to His mother [‘Did you not know that I must be about my Father’s business?’] before me I cannot trust myself to think of a time when He did not know what His work in this world was to be.’³⁰

Christ’s Passive Obedience in Passion and Death

For reasons already given we turn quickly from the active obedience of Christ to the passive obedience, which will receive even briefer treatment, but as indicated earlier, for a different reason. His Passion is the closing part, especially the last week, of His life story. It is the subject of Matthew 21–26; Mark 11–15; Luke 19–22; and John 12–18 and so very productively considered in connection with exposition of those passages or in an organized way as the life of Christ.

The Passion and death of Christ are therefore the next major considerations. They were designated by Jesus as the chief reasons for the incarnation as we have already noted and shall see fully demonstrated later in this section.

His Passion and death are, as such, what theologians have designated His passive obedience. Recent popular theology and preaching have paid scant attention to (though not completely overlooked) the active obedience. Buswell explains that it was almost a discovery for him late in his theological exertions.³¹ I myself never heard of it in the ordinary course of church attendance and it was omitted in my seminary education. It was a casualty of the intense effort of the loyal orthodox (now disparagingly called fundamentalists) a few decades ago, to rescue blood atonement, one of ‘the five fundamentals’ from the oblivion to which it was being assigned by the prevalent social gospel theology of salvation-by-being-good propaganda in the historic Protestant churches. Even A. H. Strong, who was a Baptist and conservative in almost all his theology, fully competent and historically aware, mentions the distinction specifically on only two pages of his great work of systematic theology, as far as I can determine. Buswell provides an interesting discussion of ‘active obedience of Christ’ among the theologians.³²

‘Descended into Hell’: Did it Happen?

Renewed use of the Apostles’ Creed in worship has sprung up even among churches that traditionally eschewed anything like a traditional liturgy. I have witnessed it even in a Baptist church that did not use it in the previous ninety years of its history. This development makes appropriate some attention to the clause ‘he descended into hell’ (Hades, spirit world) after ‘was crucified dead, and buried.’ The clause has been a problem for theologians as far back at least as Calvin. Recently there was a lively exchange of opinion in Christianity Today magazine about it—a ‘free church’ thorough condemnation of the clause and a Lutheran, Missouri Synod, defense of it. The clause has been and remains an obstacle to general use of the Apostles’ Creed. Can we justify its presence in a confession which in public worship answers the question, ‘Christians, what do you believe?’

Some Lutheran theologians have interpreted 1 Peter 3:18 ff. as meaning that immediately after being quickened in the tomb, therefore in ‘soul and body,’ the Lord went and preached a message of condemnation to the unsaved in Hades.³³ Lutherans are quite prudent to reject any notions of a preaching in Hades to offer a second chance to receive the gospel. The doctrine is officially affirmed in Article IX of the Formula of Concord. It is taught, these authorities say, ‘by the clear teaching of 1 Peter 3:18–20.’

Roman Catholic doctrine, though acknowledging the clause to be a fifth-century addition to the Apostles’ Creed³⁴ holds that ‘after his death, Christ’s soul, which was separated from his body [not in ‘quicken body’ and soul as in the Lutheran view], descended into the underworld and did so to proclaim the deliverance of the righteous dead from Limbo.’³⁵ Both the Lutheran and Roman Catholic views seem overrefined and unnecessary.

There is another understanding of 1 Peter 3:18–20 which commends itself to many, including this writer, as a preaching by Christ ‘in the spirit’ through Noah ‘in the days ... while the ark was being prepared’ to ‘spirits’ now in prison (hell) but then alive and rejecting the preaching of ‘the spirit’ through Noah—an interpretation advocated by many commentators and fully compatible with the Greek text of 1 Peter 3:18–20.

If one wishes to recite the presently received form of the Creed including ‘descended into hell’ one may understand it of His burial—as with Bucer, Calvin’s example and teacher at Strasburg, and Beza, his successor at Geneva—or Calvin’s own view that it refers to the Passion and pains He suffered (divine abandonment) on the cross. The latter is my preference.

Lutheran readers of this page can point out that Luther himself cannot be cited as clear authority for Article IX of the Formula of Concord. Paul Althaus shows that ‘Christ suffers hell and wrath of God and overcomes them with the power of his love of God. This is how Luther understands the Article [pre Formula of Concord by several years] of Christ’s descent to hell. It is part of Christ’s death agony. Through it Christ gains the victory over hell. Luther took this position in all stages of his writing.’³⁶ Althaus notes that in what appears as self-contradiction ‘Luther also teaches a descent of Christ into hell after his death’ and observes it got him ‘into difficulty.’ Melancthon took the view given confessional authority in the Formula of Concord. Althaus concludes this way: ‘Lutherans for the most part opposed the Reformed understanding of the descent into hell as part of the humiliation without realizing that they were also polemicizing against Luther.’³⁷

It is evident one may be a good Lutheran and still reject this view of Melancthon and the Formula. This is one of the rare cases where Calvin is more similar to Martin Luther than to his esteemed friend Philip!

Now, having seen something of the full scope of Christ’s work, let the field of inquiry focus on the stages of His work rather than the aspects of His work. These, as related to our subject, are Jesus’ sinless life, His suffering (Passion), death for sinners, burial, resurrection and post-resurrection ministry (the forty days), His ascension, session at the Father’s right hand, and His present ministry in heaven as our Great High Priest.

¹ Donald M. Baillie, God was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1948), p. 95.

² Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, Fourth and Enlarged Edition (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, reprint 1979), pp. 327–329.

³ A. H. Leitch, art. ‘Kenosis,’ Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible iii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1975), p. 784.

TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

⁴ G. Kittel and G. Friedrich, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament iii, trans. and ed. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), p. 661.

⁵ Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1957), p. 429.

⁶ A. H. Leitch, Kenosis, ZPEB, iii, p. 784.

⁷ C. F. D. Moule, An Idiom Book of New Testament Greek (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1959), p. 100.

⁸ Robert B. Strimple, ‘Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Studies, Some Exegetical conclusions,’ Westminster Theological Journal, xvi, 2, Spring, 1979.

⁹ Philip Schaff, ‘Christology,’ art in A Religious Encyclopedia or Dictionary of Biblical, Historical, Doctrinal, And Practical Theology, edit. Philip Schaff, New York: 1891, vol. i, p. 460. This article, pages 453–467, surveys and summarizes the history of the subject from the apostolic age through the kenosis controversies of the nineteenth century in a manner that does great honor to its author.

¹⁰ Baillie, God was in Christ (New York, 1948), pp. 94–98; Jewett, ‘Kenosis,’ in Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia ii (Chicago: Moody Press, 1975), pp. 986–988; Leitch, Kenosis (ZPEB, 1975), p. 784; Berkhof, Systematic Theology (1941), pp. 327–332; Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 701–706.

¹¹ I. A. Dorner, Divine Immutability: A Critical Reconsideration (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress Press, 1994).

¹² Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St. Louis: Concordia Publ. House, 1950–1957), pp. 129–304 and elsewhere.

¹³ Ibid., p. 282.

¹⁴ John Calvin, Tracts Relating to the Reformation, trans. H. Beveridge et al (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1844 onward), II, pp. 199–579.

¹⁵ R. D. Culver, ‘The Old Testament as Messianic Prophecy,’ Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society, 1964, pp. 91–97; R. D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1976, 1991), pp. 19–24. There is however a focus on Isaiah 52:13–15; 53:1–12; and related prophecies of the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah 42–53 (treated at length in Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory, (see Bibliography).

¹⁶ Franz Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah vol. ii, trans. James Martin (Edinburgh: T and T Clark, 1877), pp. 304–307.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹⁷ Berkhof, Systematic Theology, p. 332.

¹⁸ Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory, pp. 39–59.

¹⁹ Vincent Taylor, The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (London: Macmillan Co., 1958), p. 216.

²⁰ ibid.

²¹ ibid., p. 287.

²² A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 704.

²³ Gordon Lewis and Bruce Demarest, Integrative Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1990), p. 285.

²⁴ ibid.

²⁵ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, iv, Index vol., p. 992; J. Th. Mueller, ‘Have We Outmoded Chalcedon,’ in Christian Today magazine, 7 December 1959, pp. 11, 12.

²⁶ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), II, 12.7; II, 16.5; III, 11.12; 19.4; 8.5.

²⁷ ibid., II, 16.5; see also ii, 12.7; iii, 11.12; 19.4; 8.5.

²⁸ Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology ii (San Francisco: Harper, 1992), p. 359.

²⁹ Culver, The Life of Christ, pp. 84, 91.

³⁰ James Stalker, The Life of Jesus Christ (Westwood: Fleming H. Revell, Co., 1949), p. 22. The above paragraph is adapted from R. D. Culver, The Life of Christ, pp. 59, 60.

³¹ James O. Buswell, Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1962, 1971), p. 112.

³² ibid., pp. 110–113.

³³ Pieper, Christian Dogmatics, pp. 314–320; John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St Louis: Concordia Publ. House, 1934), pp. 296–298.

³⁴ Henry Denziinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St. Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954, 1957), nos. 1–12; Ludwig Ott Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, trans. L. P. Lynch (Rockford: TAN Books and Publ., 1954, 1974), no. 12, pp. 191, 192.

³⁵ Denzinger, SCD, pp. 429, 385; Ott, FCD, no. 12, pp. 191, 192.

³⁶ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 207.

³⁷ ibid.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (510). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

The Sinless Life of Jesus

In Europe, the Renaissance epoch (say 13th–15th centuries) merged into the ‘age of discovery’ (15th–16th centuries) in the midst of which came the Reformation. As the Reformers died off, their system of theology was refined about as far as it could go, by Protestant schoolmen (hence Protestant Scholasticism, so-called). This was followed by a time of somewhat anti-theological, anti-supernatural temper in Europe and Britain, called in Europe ‘the Enlightenment’ (‘Aufklärung’), and in Britain, the ‘Age of Reason.’ For many of the intelligentsia of this latter age, Jesus was cherished as an example of human goodness and the religion He founded as valuable to promote the godly life as they conceived it. Already in Luther’s time the outlook of Erasmus, whose Diatribes Luther answered in The Bondage of the Will, was a forerunner of the Enlightenment outlook. For these people, the special value of Jesus was not His work of atonement for sin but His marvellous example of a holy life. Hence the sinlessness of Jesus was no problem, at least not on the face of the issue. Thomas Jefferson in America is a shining example of this thinking (somewhat inaccurately also called deism). The very opposite of Marcion’s canon which reduced the New Testament to a few of Paul’s Epistles, his abridged New Testament gave full space to Jesus’ good life and teaching as Jefferson understood them, but no place for His divine nature or miracles.

This religious outlook moved with the increasing anti-supernaturalistic temper of the nineteenth century to become liberal Protestantism. In Europe A. Harnack (1851–1930), in his History of Dogma, tried to demonstrate that Christian doctrinal formulation had been wrong from the beginning with its fixation on the Person of Christ (deity, incarnation, etc.) and the supposed atonement by vicarious sacrifice of Himself. The essence of Christianity is the founder’s example of true goodness and His teachings. ‘How often,’ Harnack (1851–1930) asserted, ‘theology is only the instrument by which religion is discarded’ (in What is Christianity?).¹ Those teachings he was sure could be ‘exhibited in entirety’ under ‘any one’ of three heads: ‘Firstly, the kingdom of God and its coming.

Secondly, God the Father and the infinite value of the human soul. Thirdly, the higher righteousness and the commandment of love.² Hence for the liberal Protestants, then and now, Jesus' importance for religion is the superb example of His life of genuine goodness and His teaching, with miracles and other supernatural elements removed. Not willing to give Jesus up as a moral teacher of the race, the vogue of writing lives of Jesus sprang up in the nineteenth century. Some, as for instance, Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah were thoroughly orthodox and of enduring value. Most of them, however, were laid to rest near the century's end by devastating criticism from their own ranks of liberalism. See David F. Well's remarks on Kenoticism.³

For the neo-orthodoxy which emerged from liberalism in this century (Barth, Brunner, Tillich, the Niebuhrs two, MacQuarrie, et al.), Jesus is valuable to us as One who is a shining example and teacher of authentic existence (with varying acceptance of some features of orthodox Christology).

For process theology of the contemporary scene, Jesus seems to have approached the Omega point of God's own development, hence His example of authentic being, His arrival at high degree of excellence, is of value.

Practical Urgency

There is good reason for avoiding any unnecessary prolixity in dealing pastorally with this topic. As we shall see, the hearts of believing sinners cry out for assurance that when they need help in their own struggle with sin, a sinless Savior is there beside them to help. Yet they feel unable to lean heavily upon Him unless they also know in their hearts that He understands from experience something of the distress and grief of a desperate struggle. Many songs of Christian devotion, not the great doctrinal hymns, but the folk songs that sprang out of the struggles of common people, express this common feeling. A personal note: I lived with a dear wife and mother of my three children for thirty-seven years, who for various reasons related to early experiences and perhaps some physical defect, was never quite free of strange pains accompanied with feelings of despair—this coupled with love of God and trust in His saving grace. Though never an invalid, she never seemed fully well. She was often in doubt if I or any human being or even Jesus really understood. She asked me more than once how Jesus, a Man who was also God, however sympathetic, could really understand.

We are dealing here with a question both pervasive and perennial. Answers require some cogent understanding of Jesus' sinless life as taking place in conflict with genuine trial (or temptation) as the Son of God and a son of Man.

The sinlessness of Jesus is not introduced to the New Testament record just to show that His condemnation was unjust, or to explain problems of faith, but to show that He who was slain by 'wicked hands' was God's authentic sacrifice for sin—in the language of the sin-offering and the Passover sacrifice employed by John the Baptist, 'the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world' (John 1:29). (The lamb of the Passover had to be without blemish: Exod. 12:5; Lev. 22:18–20; cf. 1 Peter 1:19; Heb. 9:14. The same was true of the sin-offering.) This, His active obedience to the law and will of God (as theologians say), qualified Him to be the perfect and sufficient sacrifice for all human sin. He being an infinite Person thus qualified Himself later, to use Paul's striking language, to be 'made ... sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him' (2 Cor. 5:21 kjv). This matter will call for attention in connection with discussion of Jesus' death.

The Fact of His Sinlessness

Christians are so unanimously convinced of Jesus' sinlessness that it has never been a matter of serious controversy. Only a few early heretics and certain modern dabblers in the borderland of criticism and theology have questioned or denied it. Most believers think in terms of an unarticulated syllogism: God is sinless; Jesus Christ is God; therefore Jesus Christ is sinless.

This does not mean we do not wonder about certain verses in the Bible where at least the possible inference of some moral defect is present (harsh words to His mother, exasperation with His disciples, frustration over a barren fig tree, etc.). But we give Him the benefit of any doubt and suspend judgment as to the meaning of the text until we understand the passage better.

The sinlessness of Jesus is an emphatic affirmation of heaven on earth at the very moment of announcement by Gabriel who was 'sent from God ... to a virgin' named 'Mary.' The messenger from heaven spoke to her of conception by 'the power of the Most High' of 'a son' and 'therefore the child to be born will be called holy [emphasis added] ...' (Luke 1:26, 27, 31, 35). Two ideas present in the biblical concept of holiness are present in the word holy here: transcendence and ethical purity. As Son of God He is transcendent and as immaculately conceived by 'the power of the Most High' (Luke 1:35), ethically pure as God is pure.

Christian reflection from earliest times has found the reason for the absence of the corruption of original sin in the fact of the 'immaculate conception' (of Jesus, of course, not the dogma of immaculate conception of the virgin mother).

Some argue there was a purification of the human nature of Jesus in the womb by 'proleptic' application of the benefits of Calvary, or by some other means. Though proposed by great theologians whom I greatly respect, I find these efforts unnecessary and merely scholastic, without basis in either Scripture or compelling reason and in neglect of Gabriel's 'therefore,' which connects Jesus' pure humanity directly with conception by 'the power of the Most High' not some post-conception purification. The usual method of conception by sexual insemination by a man is not, as such, either a cause of sin or sinful but, being polluted by Adam's sin, the seed of natural propagation cannot avoid the perpetuation of original sin—viewed as corrupt nature in the offspring. No further explanation seems necessary.

Tertullian (ad 145–220) pointed out that generation by a human father is not necessary to complete, perfect humanity, citing the case of Adam, as follows:

[R]emember that Adam himself received this flesh of ours without the seed of a human father, so also was it quite possible for the Son of God to take to Himself the substance of the selfsame flesh, without a human father's agency.⁴

Augustine, who was a bit hung up on some supposed necessary connection between sexuality and sin said,

Begotten and conceived ... without any indulgence of carnal lust, and therefore bringing with him no original sin, and ... united ... in one person with the Word ... a son by nature, not by grace, and therefore having no sin etc.⁵

Augustine is perhaps right about the hypostatic union but far off base on the other matter.

An early twentieth-century ‘father of the church’ put it better. Christ’s sinlessness:

can only be made credible by a creative miracle in Christ’s origin ... a sinless personality implies a miracle in its production. It is precisely because of this that the modern spirit feels bound to reject it. In the Gospels it is not the Virgin Birth by itself that is invoked to explain Christ’s sinlessness but the supernatural conception by the Holy Spirit.⁶

New Testament Witnesses to Jesus’ Sinlessness

Jesus’ Challenge to Accusers

It is striking that men so intimately associated with Jesus would guilelessly, and without irony or embarrassment, pass on His seemingly extravagant claims of sinlessness. John, for example, reports a bitter controversy with the Jews over purity and fatherhood—possibly with undertones of gossip about His own mother’s claims to have conceived her Son as a virgin (John 8:25, 33, 39, 41, 48) wherein Jesus pointedly accused His audience of various sins and challenged them with these words, ‘Which one of you convicts me of sin?’ (v. 46). He had already told them, ‘I always do the things that are pleasing to him [the Father]’ (v. 29). How fitting this should immediately follow the story of the woman taken in the ‘very act’ of adultery, which left Jesus alone with the woman after all her accusers had left!

Divine Approbation

On three prominent occasions supernatural occurrences gave God’s own verdict on the pure life and holiness of character of Jesus. On the very occasion of His baptism, when He formally associated Himself with sinners in public life and Passion and atoning death, the voice of God came from heaven saying, ‘This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased’ (Matt. 3:17). Near the end, on Palm Sunday, as Jesus prayed, ‘Father, glorify your name’ there came a voice from heaven speaking in approval: ‘I have glorified it and I will glorify it again’ (John 12:28). ‘I have glorified it’ perhaps referring back to that earlier glorifying of Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration when the Father spoke words of His unalloyed pleasure in the moral character and resolution to finish the course, at which time Moses and Elijah ‘appeared in glory’ with Him (Luke 9:31) and the three disciples ‘saw his glory’ (Luke 9:32). Many years later Peter spoke of this and the Father’s attestation, claiming the disciples were ‘eyewitnesses of his majesty’ and His ‘glory’ that day and of the approving voice of God (2 Peter 1:16–18).

Apostolic Attestation

Three features of the apostolic attestation of Jesus’ sinlessness contribute to its convincing force. 1) These men were mostly peasant-class Jews, characteristically skeptical of uppity people who make large claims for themselves. Their high opinion of Jesus developed over a period of two to three years of intimate association with Him day and night and in a great variety of situations. As Peter said, ‘the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he was taken up from us’ (Acts 1:21, 22).

2) The deep conviction of their Master’s holy character and utter purity bears greater weight precisely because they never expressed their conviction as proof of something or as a proposition to be defended, rather simply as an unquestioned datum of observation cited for comfort or exhortation.

3) This conviction overcame the certain doubts of orthodox, practicing Jews versed in Old Testament certainty that no human being is sinless. Among the solemnities of Solomon’s prayer of dedication for the new temple the king stated that there would be confessions of sin directed there in future days, saying, ‘If they sin against you—for there is no one who does not sin ...’ (2 Chr. 6:36). Psalm 14:3 was quoted by an Apostle; ‘no one does good, not even one’ (Rom. 3:12). Let the several apostolic sentences speak for themselves. Of Peter: ‘you denied the Holy and Righteous One, and asked for a murderer to be granted to you, and you killed the Author of life’; ‘your holy servant Jesus, whom you [God] anointed’; redeemed ‘... with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot’; ‘Christ ... committed no sin’ (Acts 3:14, 15; Acts 4:27; 1 Peter 1:19; 2:21, 22). Of Stephen, who was associated immediately with the Apostles: ‘they killed those who announced beforehand the coming of the Righteous One’ (Acts 7:52). Of the apostolically written or sponsored author of Hebrews, ‘Jesus, the Son of God ... one who in every respect has been tempted as we are, yet without sin’ (Heb. 4:14, 15). Of Paul, Him ‘who knew no sin ... he hath made to be sin for us’ (2 Cor. 5:21). Of John’s vision of the Lamb in heaven (comparing John 1:29 and Peter’s testimony above), the Lamb, who is also Lion of the tribe of Judah and the root of David (Rev. 5:6), is, like God, ‘Worthy’ (Rev. 5:12) and thereby adequate to purchase men of every tribe, tongue, people and nation (Rev. 5:9) and, like God Almighty, One who receives worship in heaven (Rev. 5:13).

Impressions of Enemies and Disinterested Observers

The opinions expressed by Pilate (Luke 23:14, 15), Pilate’s wife (Matt. 27:19), Herod (Luke 23:15), the centurion in charge of the crucifixion (Luke 23:47) and of the repentant thief (Luke 23:41) are well known. They are impressions only, and of differing levels of insight. Pilate knew that ‘for envy’ of excellence not on account of evil, leading Jews had denounced Him. So Pilate found no fault worthy of death. Pilate’s wife was deeply impressed that He was a ‘righteous man,’ presumably before Roman law. Herod’s opinion was similar to Pilate’s. The centurion, being a superstitious pagan saw in Jesus virtues he could associate with his own deities, but hardly the ethical purity inherent in theology of biblical religion. We do not know how precise was the repentant thief’s understanding. He knew Jesus had broken no law—‘nothing wrong’—and speaking the religious language of a Jew expressed new faith in the prophecies of a Messianic kingdom (Luke 23:42).

These testimonies and opinions lend more support to obviously correct public behavior and civic righteousness than sinlessness as such. The value of their testimonies is in the fact that as really disinterested observers they saw nothing to contradict the claims Jesus and His disciples made. The Pharisees, scribes, elders and priests accused Him of the crimes of Sabbath-breaking and blasphemy, but they were false accusations arising out of perverted understanding of the documents of their own religion and the true spirit of it, as expressed in the prophets (whom their ancestors slew) and out of complete incapacity to understand Jesus’ Person and mission. Their accusations were and remain worthless.

No one did more to set the record straight regarding the Jesus of liberalism of a century ago (and in a measure still today) than James Orr. I refer to his great work on the incarnation.⁷ He wrote concerning Jesus' sinlessness:

The sinlessness of Jesus is a datum of the Gospels. Over against a sinful world He stands as a Savior who is without sin. He is the one life in humanity in which is presented a perfect knowledge and unbroken fellowship with the Father, undeviating obedience to His will, unswerving devotion under the severest strain of temptation and suffering to the highest ideal of goodness. The ethical ideal was never raised to so absolute a height as it is in the teaching of Jesus, and the miracle is that, high as it is in its unsullied purity, the character of Jesus corresponds to it and realizes it. Word and life for once in history agree. Jesus, with the keenest sensitiveness to sin in thought and feeling as in deed is conscious of no sin in Himself, confesses no sin, disclaims the presence of it, speaks and acts continually on the assumption that He is without it [emphasis added]. Those who knew Him best declared Him to be without sin. The Gospels must be rent in pieces before this image of a perfect holiness can be effaced from them.⁸

Critical Challenges to Christ's Sinlessness

We are here not concerned to state and respond to the literature created by the several massive 'searches for the historical Jesus' of recent times. There have been three waves of this scholarly obsession—great talent devoted to fruitless endeavor. I was assigned to conduct a seminar course in 'Christologies' a few years ago in which thirty students each prepared a paper on one of about twenty different 'Christologies' by that many recent authors. I started them off with some guidance on the various theories of Gospels' origin, and then over two months they presented the papers and we discussed them. I closed with two or more weeks of lectures on historic orthodox Christology. We learned nothing from the new Christologies to contribute substantially to the historic orthodox understanding of the Person and work of Christ and no reason to abandon a straightforward acceptance of the Christology of Scripture, of the ancient undivided church, and, in the main, of Eastern Orthodoxy, of Roman Catholic, Calvinist and Lutheran churches today—as well as orthodox Baptists, Wesleyans, Quakers and Independents.

Philosophical objections have been raised, based on the notion that sinning is a necessary stage on the way to perfection for all moral beings, or that sin is a normal aspect of human life, not a departure from integrity of being. These are a priori judgments of people convinced on grounds that have nothing to do with Christian origins, theology or Bible interpretation and need not detain us.⁹ Millard Erickson presents a good, brief but lively discussion of some of these objections.¹⁰

Yet history has furnished a few authors who at least have claimed to accept the New Testament at face value and tried to make a case against Jesus' perfect sinlessness with scriptural evidence. In most cases the supposed obstacle lies not in the biblical text but in the reader's misunderstanding either of the text or of Jesus Himself. Some of the claims may be rooted in the flawed character or logic of the objectors. The New Testament has something to say about wresting Scripture and unqualified aspirants to the teaching office. We will briefly address some of the alleged scriptural evidences against the sinlessness of Jesus. And following Berkouwer's example in The Person of Christ,¹¹ arrange them in three groups.

1. ‘Why do you call me good? No one is good except God alone’ (Luke 18:19). Mark 10:18 is identical in sense, though Matthew 19:17 renders the question in such a way as to make the question about the nature of goodness.

We may assume that originally Jesus spoke these two sentences in the Aramaic language of Palestine. In such a case each evangelist rendered his recollection or oral source into Greek as he thought best. We shall not consult the endlessly circuitous and imaginative ingenuity of the form critics and redaction critics to find out why, for none of them knows or has an opinion some equally qualified critic does not challenge. In any case the inspired text is in the Greek sentences of Matthew, Mark and Luke, not some real or imagined Vorlage.

The plain facts are that the ‘Rich young Ruler’ had addressed Jesus as ‘Good Master.’ The Greek word for good, agathos, has as broad a range of meaning as does English ‘good,’ but as an adjective with reference to God it means perfect.¹² Such is the case here in Jesus’ answer to the young man. Used of a crowd of people gathered at random (Matt. 22:10), agathos means the opposite of ponēros, bad, but each only in a relative sense. The young man probably meant estimable, exactly as we still somewhat frivolously speak of a teacher as ‘Good Doctor’ or of a woman as ‘Good Wife.’ But Jesus chose to use the man’s question as occasion to teach lessons that are of enduringly great importance, continuing His discourse on the subjects raised by the incident for some time (Matt. 19:16–20:16). So Jesus used the man’s word ‘good’ in the absolute sense of moral perfection.

Berkouwer explains it well, pointing out that the Rich Young Ruler came with a ‘plainly superficial view of the good. He believes he has fully accomplished’ all the law requires of him yet ‘cannot meet the demand which Christ makes upon him.... Whoever would deduce from this answer a denial by Jesus of his [own] sinlessness must ... isolate it from the context ... and from all those pronouncements of Christ in which he shows himself fully conscious that he is doing the will of his Father.’¹³

Plainly, the subject of this pericope has nothing at all to do with Jesus’ relation to sin or to God but to the subject of human sin in general, particularly the superficial view of it held by the Jews of Jesus’ time and by a ‘certain ruler’ (Luke 18:18 kjv) as well as by the rest of us who like to prop our egos with low views of God and His holiness. Objections to Jesus’ sinlessness based on Jesus’ immediate responses to the Rich Young Ruler flow from a superficial understanding of the texts of the three reports.

2. ‘John appeared, baptizing in the wilderness and proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins’ (Mark 1:4); ‘Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee and was baptized by John in the Jordan’ (Mark 1:9). The juxtaposing of those two verses might seem to make apparent that Jesus needed repentance for forgiveness of sins and submitted to baptism in recognition of the same, if (a very big if) there were no New Testament context to show the exact opposite. As pointed out elsewhere in this volume, Jesus’ baptism was an act of identification with sinners ab extra, from outside the realm of sin altogether. The devil had ‘no claim on me [Jesus]’ (John 14:30). His baptism signified full obedience to the Father’s will and constituted public dedication to the course of active and passive obedience terminated at Calvary with the cry, 'It is finished.' Only by a priori rejection of any unifying integrity among the authors of each of the four reports of the life and career of Jesus, including the baptism, can any exception to their uniform testimony to Jesus' holy, sinless character be discovered in this initial event in Jesus' public career. It is of a piece with His circumcision, presentation at the temple—which involved sacrifices and His participation in the ritual sacrificial system all of which called for expiation for human sin. This of course is what called forth John the Baptist's initial objection to baptizing Jesus (Matt. 3:13–15).

3. '... he learned obedience through what he suffered' (Heb. 5:8). Is it possible that John 1:14 and Philippians 2:6–8, where Christ is presented as incarnate, holy God from the first are inconsistent with a Christ who had to learn obedience to the will of God as Hebrews 5:8, quoted above is thought to indicate? To settle such a question one would have to consider whether the author of Hebrews so understood the matter—which he evidently did not. For, later he says that from before the beginning of Jesus' earthly life His settled purpose was precisely to perform the will of God. Hebrews 10:5–7 reads, 'Consequently, when Christ came into the world, he said ... Behold, I have come to do your will, O God, as it is written of me in the scroll of the book' (quoting Ps. 40).

This supposed problem involves the mystery of the incarnation, particularly the union of the two natures. In no case is it necessary to suppose that to 'learn obedience' to God is any more inconsistent with holiness than any other aspect of His humiliation. Speculations on this matter should not divert or confuse us in any manner. Those really are not inconsistencies between the clear New Testament affirmations of Christ's sinlessness and the equally clear presentations of God manifest in the flesh as a great mystery (1 Tim. 3:16).

Was Christ Impeccable?

Impeccabilitas is a Latin word literally saying no-sin-ability. The proposition that Christ was able not to sin (posse non peccare), His moral power being fully competent and successful in living a holy life without sin, was not seriously doubted at any stage of Christian doctrinal development. The related proposition that He was not able to sin (non posse peccare) was put before the Sixth Ecumenical Council (680–681) in the form of the question of one human will and one divine will (ditheletism) in the Theanthropos or only one (monotheletism). From the distance of thirteen centuries the problem may seem trivial and perhaps incapable of solution anyway. That the divine nature had a will was not a matter of dispute. Yet the Council did decide that the human nature also had a will. The decision is evidently correct, as Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane ('Nevertheless, not my will, but yours, be done,' Luke 22:42) seems to make plain.

In coming to decision on this matter the Sixth Ecumenical Council¹⁴ referred to Augustine's comment on the passage:

It shows truly that his will was subject to the Father.... For that the Lord said this in his human nature, anyone will quickly see who studies attentively.... For therein he says, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death.' Can this possibly be said of the nature of the One Word?'¹⁵

Augustine (quoted by the Council) goes on to answer the objection that the nature of the Holy Ghost

‘groans’ (hence a divine nature could have a human-like will) and concludes:

For had he not been made man, the Only Word could in no way have said to the Father, ‘Not what I will.’ For it could never be possible for that immutable nature to will anything different from what the Father willed. If you would make this distinction, O ye Arians, ye would not be heretics.¹⁶

Numerous N.T. passages relate that Jesus was steadily committed to doing the Father’s will. He came into the world for that purpose (John 6:38; Heb. 10:7). The Third Council of Constantinople (680–681, Sixth Ecumenical) states the orthodox doctrine in this manner:

And so we proclaim two natural wills in Him, and two natural operations indivisibly, inconvertibly, inseparably, unfusedly ... but the human will following and not resisting or hesitating, but rather even submitting to His divine and omnipotent will. For it is necessary that the will of the flesh [i.e. human will] act, but that it be subject to the divine will according to the most wise Athanasius.¹⁷

At this late date let us not seek to correct the decree of the Council. Yet let us make the reservation that ‘not resisting or hesitating’ should not be understood as without struggle. Our Lord struggled mightily in the Garden or else the Agony (Matt. 26:36–44) is reduced to pantomime. ‘[H]is sweat became like great drops of blood falling down to the ground’ (Luke 22:44) in the struggle. Further, so great were His struggles with the devil that angels sometimes came to His aid (Matt. 4:11; Mark 1:13).

Whatever may be the best way to think of the human will and the divine will in Christ, the Theanthropic union guaranteed the precedence of the divine will, hence the certainty of impeccability. There was never any contest of strength. In such a case it seems that it is correct to affirm with a respected Roman Catholic scholar, ‘Christ has not merely not actually sinned, but also could not sin.’¹⁸ A majority of leading Protestant theological scholars agree, including John Walvoord who devotes major space to the topic and makes a good case for impeccability.¹⁹ Shedd wrote at length in support of impeccability,²⁰ though C. A. Hodge thought otherwise.²¹ In my judgment Hodge meant to say Christ’s soul had capacity for sin or righteousness as a human being. Such is my own modest opinion. Every man, whether John Doe, Jesus or Adam has moral capacity. It does not seem correct to say with J. O. Buswell that Jesus never ‘felt inducement to evil.’²² The story of the three temptations by the devil seems to be precisely about inducements and how could He have a ‘feeling of our infirmities’ (Heb. 4:15 kjv) otherwise? In Adam’s case he was holy but used the moral capacity wrongly in response to temptation, because he was not yet confirmed (as the theologians say) in holiness and in that condition employed moral capacity wrongly. Jesus as human had the same capacity, but by virtue of union with the divine nature, which always exercised pre-cedence, i.e. going before, could not ever sin.

F. Pieper (Lutheran) ‘emphatically’ denies it was possible for Jesus to commit a sin ‘according to His human nature,’ relating his argument in a convincing way to the temptation and to the means Christ used in His ‘freedom’ to resist sin.

Some object that impeccability would exclude temptability, would make of Christ’s temptation a sham. However, Matthew 4:1 ff. does describe a real battle. Moreover, the objection is invalid even under purely human circumstances. One may be very sure of gaining the final victory and yet inflict hard blows upon one's opponent. [And receive hard blows as well.] Even so the temptation of Christ, although the outcome was never in doubt, was a real battle in which Satan attacked the soul of Christ with allurements and temptations [enticements] and in which Christ not seemingly, but actually fought; by grasping the Word ['it is written'] in faith. The assertion that 'freedom' must always involve the possibility of sinning operates with a false conception of freedom, etc.²³

I personally have a certain uneasiness about the word impeccability as used of our Lord's human nature. I wonder if the question (was Jesus not able to sin or able not to sin?) is phrased rightly. The Bible is clear that Jesus did not sin. His holiness as man, joined in permanent union with the divine nature, could not be corrupted. His holiness as Man is traced to conception by 'holy Spirit' i.e. the divine Spirit of God in the O.T. sense, the One whom the seraphim proclaim to be 'Holy, holy, holy' (Isa. 6:3). '[T]herefore the child to be born will be called holy' (Luke 1:35).

I have set the arguments for impeccability before the reader, but would leave the subject with the more cautious language of number fifteen of the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion:

Christ is in the truth of our nature made like unto us in all things (sin only except), from which he was clearly void.... He came to be the Lamb without spot, who by the sacrifice of Himself once made, should take away the sin of the world: and sin ... was not in Him ... and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us.

See advice of the Wesleyans, McClintock and Strong (Encyclopedia IV, 561).

A related question: If Christ was a true man, descended from Adam, whose sin brought guilt, corruption and punishment on the whole race, was not Christ therefore a sinner like the rest of us and partaker of the common sinful nature (as Barth asserted)? In answer we may point to evidence cited earlier that the miracle of the immaculate conception of Christ in (not of) the Virgin Mary was the instrument used to exempt Christ from that connection; second, to the several passages of the Bible which specifically deny that He was in any sense whatsoever a sinner; and third, to Romans 5:12–21 where Christ, in several relevant ways, is declared to be different from Adam except in respect to the fact that each is a 'head' of the race, Adam by imputation and genetic connection; and Christ by imputation and, according to Philippians 2:7ff. and 2 Corinthians 8:9, by virtue of His willing and merciful act of incarnation whereby He joined our race.

Luther pointed out that Mary as well as every other member of our race had a sinful nature. He made a big point of her descent from Judah's incestuous intercourse with Tamar, his daughter-in-law (Gen. 38), to show Mary's natural 'flesh' was extraordinarily polluted. It was not virginal conception, as such, which stopped the passing down to her Son of the pollution of a very sinful branch of humanity, 'But in the moment of the virginal conception the Holy Spirit cleansed and sanctified the sinful substance' etc.²⁴ Though Luther as usual speaks as though he were certain of his view, other Lutheran theories have been propounded. Pieper is judiciously noncommittal: 'Leaving aside ... the question of the how, the fact that Christ was exempt from original guilt is clearly revealed in Scripture' (Pieper, II, p. 75).

Does Sinlessness Exclude Physical Desire?

Ordinary Christians are quite ready to accept Jesus' sinlessness as a fact and the difficulties of His humiliation (active and passive obedience) as 'temptation' or trial in which He was 100 per cent victorious. But, along with the theologians they also ask (and that frequently) if in His inner life as a Man, male (anēr), He had the usual desires for the opposite sex we are all very familiar with. A passage everyone seems to know says He 'in every respect has been tempted as we are, yet without sin' (Heb. 4:15) and another, 'But each one is tempted when he is drawn away by his own desires and enticed' (James 1:14 nkjv). Both male and female understand those verses all too well as regards sexual impulses, even though perhaps in somewhat different ways. Did Jesus have those desires? Even if we oldsters do not ask the questions our sons and daughters and grandchildren do, we want to know: If He did, was that sinful? And what did He do about those desires? Take a cold shower or swallow some saltpeter? An answer is demanded and I propose the one given in this volume early in the section on the doctrine of sin. Let us extract some of that.

First, let us acknowledge that desires which are part of being normal 'man' (anthrōpos) are necessary to stay alive, from the moment an infant first nurses its mother's breast onward. But not everyone has quite every desire. '[T]he desires of the flesh,' or physical desire is normal to everyone, but not quite every physical object 'in the world' (see 1 John 2:15–17) is desirable to everyone. 'One man's meat is another man's poison.' Some people 'live to eat' but others only 'eat to live.' As for sexual desire, some perfectly normal people, as Jesus indicated, never develop the mating urge, but remain like pre-adolescents all life long (Matt. 19:12, 'eunuchs who have been so from birth'). A healthy, happy, successful, hard-working Christian bachelor now over ninety years of age whom I have known for over sixty years is such a person as Jesus described. This is not usual or average. But it is a narrow judgment of prejudice to say this is not normal or to be less than fully human. In this age of psychobabble it is very easy to throw around newly manufactured words and novel meanings for old expressions to hang on people whose standards, accomplishments or thoughts make us feel uncomfortable—maladjusted, out of sync, a little off, eccentric, deviant, etc. People who are 'born eunuchs' should not marry other people who were born with sexual desire, some so strong it is said to 'burn' (1 Cor. 7:9). That does not mean the unmarried state without the burning of sexual desire is not a superior or at least equal state with the married state. The Apostle Paul may have been in that class, though more likely he had 'the gift' of continence. In any case he recommended the unmarried state as Jesus did also (1 Cor. 7:7, 25–40; cf. Matt. 19:12).

Jesus therefore did not necessarily feel specifically sexual attraction to women. On the other hand perhaps He did. No text of Scripture says He did not. If He did it was as innocent, if controlled in harmony with 'the will of the Father,' as temperate indulgence in food and drink, non-covetous possession of his own (not another's) pocket knife or another's gift of expressing joy in song.

The record shows that many women, both 'good' and 'bad' were attracted to Jesus. We know the names of some of them. Yet there is no hint (prurient-minded commentators notwithstanding) there was anything specifically sexual about His attraction for them. They recognized Him as a Savior from their sins by most accounts, and admired the purity of His Person and teaching.

Christians of the early centuries had a very lopsided view of this matter, or at least so it seemed a generation ago to modern Christians. One famous ancient Christian scholar (Origen) even castrated himself to destroy desire (epithumia). After prolonged youthful sexual indulgence, the converted and saintly Augustine came to teach that even sexual intercourse in marriage was sinful—a large subject.

In the pagan ‘soused-with-sex’ atmosphere of today one can again understand the deep, moral concern of the first generations of Christians and sympathize.

(See the treatment of James 1:12–15 in The Doctrine of Sin for more extended discussion of desire [epithumia] as innocent in Adam and Eve before the fall and in the uncorrupted human nature of Jesus, but in our fallen race always tainted [hence called concupiscence].)

Jesus As Sinless Example

The example of Jesus as a way to the Modernist version of salvation has turned out to be, as David said of God’s attributes, ‘too wonderful for me.... I cannot attain it’ (Ps. 139:6). ‘What would Jesus do?’ is not quite the appropriate model of behavior in every situation unless one is very selective among Jesus’ words and deeds. Yet Paul did say, ‘Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ’ (1 Cor. 11:1) to give force to an exhortation to avoid unnecessary offense to other people and to bring glory to God. Peter cited the quiet, unprotesting behavior of Jesus in response to the wholly unjust treatment by Jewish and Roman courts on His last day, saying ‘ye should follow his steps’ (1 Peter 2:18–25 kjv). Jesus, however, overturned the tables of rapacious ‘money changers’ on at least one occasion and publicly pronounced ‘woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites’ in the fiercest denunciation in any language (Matt. 23:13–36).

So as the ancient proverb wisely says, ‘Circumstances alter cases.’ The quiet, submissive Jesus is not the only Jesus in the N.T. Nor is 1 Peter 2:18–25 a blanket guide for response to persecution for righteousness’ sake in every situation, for Jesus recommended flight in some circumstances (Matt. 10:23) and sometimes to ‘talk back’ before heathen ‘governors and kings’ (Matt. 10:18, 19) as Paul did many times and as Stephen paid with his life for so doing (Acts, chapter 7). Even Jesus Himself was not exactly supine and compliant always in response to false accusation. Yet He did not respond to vicious accusation in a vengeful way. His choice of submission and silence on some occasions and of denunciation and resistance, even aggressive physical action, on others depended on the situation and the purpose to be served. The mission of Calvary hung on His not calling the ‘legions of angels’ but adhering to the mission to die for sinners. When He comes again, as ‘King of kings and Lord of lords,’ He will be accompanied by an army of angels forcefully to execute judgment and to compel obedience (Matt. 13:40–43; Jude 14, 15 niv ‘holy ones,’ i.e. angels; Rev. 19:11–21). So we, especially when any sort of physical resistance to evil persecutors would spell defeat for our effort to help or save others, should follow Jesus’ example of silent submission as Peter states. Isaiah 53:7 says ‘like a sheep that before its shearers is silent, so he opened not his mouth’ and as Pilate observed with dismay (Matt. 27:12–14). I have dealt at length with the ‘non-resistance’ and pacifist doctrines and ‘theology of the cross’ issues in my book *The Peacemongers*²⁵ and in Civil Government: A Biblical View.²⁶ It is not always a sin to resist the devil when he stands before you as a violent robber or a wicked magistrate.

The Sinless Pathfinder Jesus As Model of Perseverance

Let us take note that perseverance in faith—not sinless perfection—is necessary to salvation. ‘[T]he one who endures to the end will be saved’ (Matt. 24:13) indirectly applies here. In this respect Jesus is our perfect model.

Therefore, since we are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us throw off everything that hinders and the sin that so easily entangles, and let us run with perseverance the race marked out for us. Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author [space forbids pursuit of the somewhat mysterious but meaningful word for Jesus’ relation to us here—Greek archēgos, variously translated leader, ruler, pathfinder, originator, founder] and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider him who endured such opposition from sinful men, so that you will not grow weary and lose heart. In your struggle against sin, you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood (Heb. 12:1–4 niv).

As the Sinless Victor Over Enticement to Sin Jesus Is Now Our Able Helper

For this reason he had to be made like his brothers in every way, in order that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in service to God, and that he might make atonement for the sins of the people. Because he himself suffered when he was tempted, he is able to help those who are being tempted (Heb. 2:17, 18 niv).

As the Enticed, Yet Sinless Great High Priest, Jesus Enables Us to Come in Prayer to a Throne Where Grace Reigns

Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need (Heb. 4:14–16 kjv).

¹ Adolf Harnack, What is Christianity?, 1900 (New York: Harper and Row, 1951).

² Karl G. A. von Harnack, History of Dogma (New York: Dover Publications, 1961), p. 51.

³ David F. Wells, The Person of Christ: A Biblical and Historical Analysis of the Incarnation (Westchester: Crossway Books, 1984), pp. 133–141.

⁴ Tertullian, On the Flesh of Christ 16, in Ante-Nicene Fathers iii, repr. of US edn. 1885, ed. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), p. 536.

⁵ Augustine, The Enchiridion on Faith, Hope and Love, ed. H. Paolucci with analysis by A. von Harack (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1966), p. 51.

⁶ James Orr, ‘Jesus Christ.’ in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, ed. J. Orr (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1939, 1943), p. 1636.

⁷ James Orr, The Christian View of God and the World (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1947) and his eighty-eight column article ‘Jesus Christ,’ in ISBE, iii, pp. 1624–1688.

⁸ ibid., p. 1630.

⁹ G. C. Berkouwer, The Person of Christ, trans. J. Vriend (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1954). In the 365 pages of this large work, he disdains to discuss such objections, though some older writers do so at some length in response to Socinianism, Unitarianism, and the German and English rationalists. See J. McClintock and J. Strong, art. ‘The Sinlessness of Jesus,’ in Encyclopedia of Biblical Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature II (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1968–1970), pp. 265–268.

¹⁰ Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1989), pp. 718–721.

¹¹ Berkouwer, Person of Christ, pp. 242–254.

¹² Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1967), sub, agathos, p. 2.

¹³ Berkouwer, Person of Christ, p. 243.

¹⁴ This was the Ecumenical Council that condemned as a heretic a previous occupant of ‘St. Peter’s’ throne at Rome, Pope Honorius. This event, of course, has been a great embarrassment for the Roman Church’s doctrines of an infallible church and an infallible pope. See H. R. Percival’s pertinent remarks in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers XIV, ed. P. Schaff (repr., Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), pp. 351, 352. Also “The same council condemned Pope Honorius as a Monothelite heretic, and his successors confirmed it. This undeniable fact figured conspicuously in the Vatican Council (1870) as an unanswerable argument against papal infallibility, and was pressed by Bishop Hefele and other learned members of the council, although they afterwards submitted to an infalible modern pope and councils” (Philip Schaff, art. ‘Christiology’ cited earlier in this chapter).

¹⁵ NPNF, Second series, xiv, p. 334.

¹⁶ ibid.

¹⁷ Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. Deferrari (St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co., 1957), para. 290, p. 114.

¹⁸ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, trans. Patrich Lynch (New York: Herder & Herder, 1955, 1974), p. 169.

¹⁹ John F. Walvoord, Jesus Christ our Lord (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 145–152.

²⁰ W. C. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1888), pp. 220, 240.

- ²⁰ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1888), pp. 330–349.
- ²¹ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1960), p. 457.
- ²² James O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1971), p. 61.

²³ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St Louis: Concordia Publ. House. 1950–1957), p. 76.

McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

²⁴ Luther's Exegetical Works iv, pp. 173 ff., cited by Pieper in Christian Dogmatics ii, pp. 14, 15.

²⁵ R. D. Culver The Peacemongers (Wheaton, IL: Tyndale House, 1985).

²⁶ R. D. Culver Civil Government: A Biblical View (Edmonton, AB: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 2000), p. 308.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (520). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

13

The Passion and Death of Jesus

The Passion and Death Belong Together

All Christians agree that the suffering (Passion) of Jesus and His death are together of central importance in definition of what we believe about Jesus. Among the earliest efforts to list distinctively Christian beliefs in a creed-like fashion is a passage in Irenaeus: 'The Church believes ... in ... the birth from a virgin, and the Passion, and the resurrection,' etc.¹ Here 'the Passion' (Gr. to pathos) obviously includes both the sufferings of His last day and the painful death under the words 'the Passion.' Later in the same book he enlarges only slightly: 'and having suffered (passus) under Pontius Pilate and rising again.'² In both cases 'the Passion' or 'suffered' includes His death on the cross.

Tertullian, at about the same time, lets 'crucified under Pontius Pilate' stand for His suffering and death; also in a similar list which he calls 'The Rule of Faith' concerning Veiling of Virgins.³ The Apostles' Creed affirms that Jesus 'suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried.' Here the Passion and the death are distinguished. The Creed of Nicea (ad 325) subsumes Jesus' death under 'suffered' though the revision of ad 381 says 'was crucified ... he suffered and was buried.' (The earlier [ad 325] creed is called the The Creed of Nicea to distinguish it from the revised and permanent form issued at Constantinople in ad 381. The latter is called either the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed or the Nicene Creed.) It is clear that in those times no important distinction, certainly no separation, between Jesus' suffering and death was made.

Religious custom in medieval times came to emphasize the sufferings of Christ on the last evening and day of crucifixion. Hence 'the Passion' came to refer to the events of the Last Supper, the institution of 'the Eucharist,' agony in the Garden, the trials, the via dolorosa to Golgotha, the crucifixion, the agonies on the cross and finally death.⁴

Evangelical theology, following the scriptural narrative, has tended to treat the Passion and death as essentially one subject, and not two. For some reason many Protestant works of doctrinal theology which treat the atonement at great length make no mention at all of ‘the Passion’ or ‘the Great Passion’ leading up to it. Reaction against the somewhat maudlin observances, lay and clerical, about the fourteen Stations of the Cross probably accounts for this. In Puritan and Reformed company, all ceremonies connected with the medieval Christian liturgy and calendar were either de-emphasized or rejected altogether. There is a precedent for treating Jesus’ suffering and death as one subject in 1 Peter 1:11, which reads the prophetic ‘Spirit of Christ’ in the Prophets (Isa. 52:13–53:12 especially), testified beforehand ‘the sufferings [including the death] of Christ and the subsequent glories.’

We proceed to consider first the sufferings, but by no means to separate them from the death, which consummated the sufferings and has enormous meaning in redemption all its own.

The Passion of Christ

Question 37 of the Heidelberg Catechism (1563):

What doest thou understand by the word suffered in the Apostles’ s Creed?

Answer: That all the time he lived on earth, but especially at the end of his life, he bore in body and soul, the wrath of God against sin of the whole human race, in order that by his passion, as the only atoning sacrifice, he might redeem our body and soul from everlasting damnation, and obtain for us the grace of God, righteousness, and eternal life.⁵

This venerable affirmation, testifies that the Passion of Christ has no importance to Christians apart from its culmination in death. Christians witness to this by their frequent use of the expression, ‘the suffering and death’ of Jesus.

This suffering had its beginning in the treatment He received from His own household and neighbors. Long before ‘Passion Week’ his own brothers rejected Him (John 7:5). At a point very early in His ministry the men of His home village, when they heard Him speaking in the local synagogue, ‘rose up and drove him out of the town,’ and, except that He escaped them, would have killed Him by throwing Him over a nearby cliff (Luke 4:28–30).

For awhile He gained a sympathetic hearing among the common people, but for various reasons He lost their support. Before long ‘he began to teach them that the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and the chief priests and the scribes and be killed’ (Mark 8:31). And though all the elements of martyrdom-seeking were absent from Him, Jesus always understood that it was ‘written of the Son of Man that he should suffer many things and be treated with contempt’ (Mark 9:12). He explained to ‘his disciples’: ‘The Son of Man is going to be delivered into the hands of men, and they will kill him’ (Mark 9:31). While walking toward Jerusalem for the last time, ‘taking the twelve again, he began to tell them what was going to happen to him, saying, “See, we are going up to Jerusalem, and the Son of Man will be delivered over to the chief priests and the scribes, and they will condemn him to death and deliver him over to the Gentiles. And they will mock him and spit on him, and flog him and kill him ...” ’ (Mark 10:32–34).

Finally, even His disciples ‘all left him and fled’ (Mark 14:50)—only a few women supporters and a youth (the youngest Apostle) showed up for the crucifixion.

Three things made the suffering most acute: it was inflicted by those whom He loved and whom He had come to save; it was endured alone; the final blow was dealt by His Father—‘it was the Lord’s will to crush him and cause him to suffer’ (Isa. 53:10 niv).

Now, all Christians accept a great deal of unfathomable mystery in this. The mystery is simply an intensified form of the mystery of the providential government of God over all things. They glory in it, knowing that existence would hold no depth of hope, only very obvious hopelessness, without this mystery. They see the power of God ruling and overruling, making the wrath of man to praise Him. They see Christ as ‘The stone that the builders rejected’ nevertheless by God’s providence, ‘become the cornerstone.’ And though not excusing the hands of wicked men (Acts 2:23) for their violent deed, Christians nevertheless proclaim, ‘This is the Lord’s doing; it is marvellous in our eyes.’ (1 Peter 2:7; cf. Ps. 118:22, 23).

The Death of Jesus: What Happened?

As indicated above, though the Gospels justify us in finding some distinction between the Lord’s suffering and death, they lead us as they did the patristic authors and the Confessions cited, to discern the consummation of our Lord’s suffering in His atoning death. In fact, though, all life long He was ‘a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.’ When His cross was less than eighteen hours away He spoke of His suffering as still ahead—‘I have earnestly desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer [emphasis added]’ (Luke 22:15, 16). The suffering consummated in and found its meaning and purpose in His death.

The nature of the death Jesus experienced is no special problem to explain once a fully biblical view of His Person—incarnate God, fully God, fully Man, as the ecumenical creeds also state—is taken. Death has three aspects: physical death, spiritual death, and—yet ahead for lost humanity, that event utterly horrible to contemplate—‘second death’ (Rev. 20:14), involving eternal exclusion from the presence of God. That physical death of the God-man took place has never been seriously doubted by Christians except for a few heretics ancient and modern—and of course, Islam. He bowed His head and commended His spirit to God (Luke 23:46). Shortly thereafter a spear was thrust in His side; whereupon gushed out blood and water, evidence that a separation of vital fluids in the heart region had taken place. The centurion testified to Pilate early in the evening that Jesus was ‘already dead’ (Mark 15:42–45; John 19:38–42).

Spiritual death, that alienation from God which is the invariable effect of sin, also took place. This alone, as has been generally understood, accounts for Jesus’ agony in the Garden and His many remarks about revulsion from His ‘cup’ (Matt. 26:39, 42, 44; Mark 10:38). The misguided efforts of certain recent commentators (Oscar Cullmann and disciples) to show that Jesus’ agony arose simply out of fear of non-existence (contrast with Socrates’ last hours has been noted) is shortsighted, unbiblical and disrespectful of what the Bible says about the nature of man. The idea that the agony in the Garden was caused by resistance to efforts of Satan to kill Him prematurely then and there seems bizarre, even though sponsored by at least one reputable theologian.⁶

Spiritual death was the immediate consequence of sin in the first pair. It is the state into which all men are now naturally born (Eph. 2:1–3; 4:17–19). This alienation, which took place in those moments when the Lord took upon Himself our guilt and penalty, described in prophecy as making Himself ‘an offering for sin’ (Isa. 53:10) and in 2 Corinthians 5:21 (kjv) as becoming ‘sin for us’ is expressed in the Savior’s heartbroken cry, ‘My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?’ (Matt. 27:46). No other godly man has ever been forsaken by God at the time of death (Ps. 23:4). ‘Forsaken then, by God and men, alone his life he gave.’ The precise nature of this alienation from the Father cannot be fully defined. It could not be metaphysical separation because the Trinity of the Godhead cannot be suspended; nor moral, for nothing was more in harmony with goodness and righteousness; nor was the Son ever more loved by the Father than while He hung on the cross. Two scriptural phrases come as close as language can to definition: ‘becoming a curse for us’ (Gal. 3:13) and ‘made him to be sin for us’ (2 Cor. 5:21 kjv).

Heidelberg Catechism, Question 39: ‘Is there something more in his having been crucified than if he had died some other death? Yes, for by this I am assured that he took upon himself the curse which lay upon me, because the death of the cross was cursed by God (Gal. 3:13). Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us—for it is written, Cursed is everyone who hangs on a tree’ (cf. Deut. 21:23).

Did Jesus experience the ‘second death’ also? Was it ‘eternal?’ If it was a substitutionary death (and it was) and if second death is the destiny of unrepentant men (and according to the Bible it is Rev. 20:11–15) then His death was in some sense ‘eternal’—or as might better be said—of infinite value in the remission of sin. As Anselm (Cur Deus Homo) argued and as orthodox interpreters usually agree, since He was an infinite Being as Second Person of the Godhead He could suffer eternal punishment in moments. We shall discuss this matter at length in the chapter immediately to follow. A certain amount of repetition in developing themes gathering around the death of the Savior cannot easily be avoided in these pages.

The Central Importance of the Death of Christ As Atonement for Sin in Biblical Religion

Canon Dyson Hague said truly, ‘The importance of this subject is obvious. The Atonement is Christianity in epitome. It is the heart of Christianity as a system; it is the distinguishing mark of the Christian religion.’⁷ Leon Morris likewise: ‘The atonement is the crucial doctrine of the faith. Unless we are right here it matters little, or so it seems to me, what we are like elsewhere.’⁸

In the Reports of Jesus’ Career

We have already had occasion to observe how Jesus announced that His mission on earth was to ‘give his life a ransom’ and tried over a period of several months without success to explain to the disciples and convince them of the necessity of His Passion and death. We have also noted how early the first Christians made His death, interpreted as a sacrifice for sin, a matter of public testimony even to an unbelieving world. The Gospel writers promote this theme steadfastly, sometimes subtly, sometimes explicitly and occasionally almost unconsciously, with gathering force. The specter of violent death appears in the earliest stage of the Gospels’ narrative even in the literary neighborhood of the joyful announcements of the infant Jesus’ birth. The aged Simeon is reported to tell the mother, ‘(and a sword will pierce through your own soul also), so that thoughts from many hearts may be revealed' (Luke 2:35). Is this not an intended broad hint of the career of a 'man of sorrows' ending in violent death in Mary's presence? Many careful exegetes and commentators have thought so, though Alford was a notable exception.

In Fulfillment of the Suffering Servant Prophecies of Isaiah 42–53

The relationship of the Servant prophecies of Isaiah to Christ's suffering and death has been of great interest to scholars in modern times. 'At the outset we take the ground that no one can clearly apprehend this great theme who is not prepared to take Scripture as it stands, and to treat it as the final and authoritative source of Christian knowledge, and the test of every theory.'⁹ This is the view taken by orthodox Christianity in general and will be pursued here. Some Christian scholars who do not concede real prediction of real events in Scripture nevertheless employ the prophecies to interpret Jesus' Person and death. H. Wheeler Robinson asserts that:

The shadow of that Cross fell over His path long before he reached it, and was accepted by Him as part of the inscrutable will of God. But where did He gain His confidence that this was the will of God, so as to declare it beforehand to His disciples if not from the suffering of the Servant? Even if some of the references of this kind are due to the later attestation of the Gospel story from the Old Testament by the interpretive faith of the early Christians, yet we have still to account for the acceptance of death by Jesus as part of the Messianic mission, and there is no explanation so simple and direct, as that He was profoundly influenced by 'the Servant of Yahweh' before and in and after the baptismal hour.¹⁰

This author seems to say that while Isaiah (or 'II Isaiah') might not have been speaking of the personal Messiah in Isaiah 40–53, Jesus accepted the references to the Suffering Servant as prediction of Himself. Robinson seems to think the New Testament writers placed some of Isaiah's words in Jesus' mouth, so to speak. There are other scholars who reject predictive prophecy yet profess strong Christian belief and have a similar view. Among them are W. Zimmerli and J. Jeremias.¹¹ Literature of this sort is quite extensive. A common Jewish view is that 'the whole people of Israel in the form of the elect of the nation gradually became the Messiah of the World, the redeemer of mankind.'¹² Another Jewish author, Raphael Patai traces Jewish interpretation of 'The Suffering Messiah' citing many rabbis.¹³ My own study of the subject is The Sufferings and the Glory of the Lord's Righteous Servant.¹⁴

The recurring connection of events in Jesus' career with prophecy of the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 42–53 shows that the death of Jesus was 'for the transgression of my people.'

This was never out of the Gospel writers' minds as they wrote. I submit the following list of references for those interested in examining the evidence in some detail. The references in the Gospels by allusion and quotation of the Servant prophecies of Isaiah show how extensive and pervasive the connection really is (Matt. 3:17; cf. Isa. 42:1; Matt. 5:18; cf. Isa. 53:4; Matt. 12:17–21; cf. Isa. 42:1–6; Matt. 20:22; cf. Isa. 51:17; Matt. 21:5; cf. Isa. 62:11; Matt. 21:13; cf. Isa. 56:7; Luke 2:30; cf. Isa. 53:10; Luke 2:31; cf. Isa. 42:6; 49:6; Luke 5:20; cf. Isa. 43:25; Luke 18:31 cites 'Isa. 53, Ps. 22, etc' indicating these Old Testament chapters are prophecies of Passion Week; Luke 22:27; cf. Isa. 53:12; John 12:38; cf. Isa. 53:1; Matt. 26:38, 39; cf. Isa. 53:12; Mark 10:33, 34; cf. Isa. 52:3; John 1:10, 11; cf. Isa. 53:3; John 19:7; cf. Isa. 53:4; Matt. 26:63 and 27:11–14; cf. Isa. 53:7; Matt. 27:12, 14; and Mark 15:5; 14:61; and Luke 23:9; and John 19:9; cf. Isa. 53:7; Matt. 27:57–60; cf. Isa. 53:9; John 1:23; cf. Isa. 40:3; John 1:29; cf. Isa. 53:10; John 10:14–18; cf. Isa. 53:11; Matt. 26:38, 39, 42; cf. Isa. 53:12).

The same is true of the rest of the New Testament, though more by way of reflection on the meaning of Jesus' death than on the event itself. See 2 Timothy 2:24 and compare the Servant of the Lord in Paul's thought with Isaiah 42:1 ff. and 52:13. (Likewise Rom. 15:21; cf. Isa. 52:15; Isa. 53:1; cf. Rom. 10:16; Isa. 53:5; cf. Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:3; and Heb. 5:8; cf. Isa. 53:5; Isa. 53:5, 6, 9; cf. 1 Peter 2:24, 25; Acts 8:32, 33; cf. Isa. 53:7; John 1:29; cf. Isa. 53:10; John 10:14–18; cf. Isa. 53:11; Phil. 2:9–11; cf. Isa. 52:13, 53:12; 2 Cor. 5:21; cf. Isa. 53:6, 11, 12.)

In the Structure of the Gospels' Story and Jesus' Warnings

The Gospels each in some degree or other and by different literary devices early on show that the crucifixion and related events were to be the climax and denouement. Mark and Matthew do so in connection with Peter's great confession. This momentous declaration by Peter took place in the areas about Caesarea Philippi on the slopes of Mt. Herman, the highest mountain of the area (Mark 8:27–31; Matt. 16:13–21).

At the Transfiguration a week later, Moses and Elijah 'were talking with him ... and spoke of his departure [Gr. exodus], which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem' (Luke 9:30, 31). At about the same time He introduced the subject of His death and resurrection to the disciples (Mark 9:1–10; Matt. 17:1–9).

Luke places this great divide, so to speak, slightly later in the story and not in connection with the Petrine confession, but with a fearfully ominous sentence, 'And it came to pass, when the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Luke 9:51 kjv). Uttered moments before His party headed southward through Samaria, presumably to attend one of the three mandatory Festival Feasts at Jerusalem (Luke. 9:52). Jesus was looking past the humiliation to the exaltation, beyond the suffering to the glory, in this verse, the ascension. We are reminded that as Pioneer and Perfector of our faith He, for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame (Heb. 12:1, 2); also reminded that in a prophecy of Isaiah 50:6, 7. He who would give His back to smiters and His cheeks to them that plucked off the hair and not hide His face from shame and spitting said also, 'But the Lord God helps me; therefore I have not been disgraced; therefore I have set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be put to shame' (Isa. 50:6, 7).

There is no such dividing point in John's Gospel—the movement toward Calvary is right up front from verse 11 of the first chapter: they that were 'his own received him not' (kjv) and moves right on to His baptismal dedication to die and the Baptist's proclamation, 'Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world' (John 1:29).

As I researched, meditated and wrote in producing a Life of Christ I was gripped by the sudden gathering of the powers of darkness at the point of the Gospel narrative, especially as Luke gives it—made aware that 'it pleased the Lord to bruise him ... to put him to grief.' It seemed wrong that it should be so. But inexorably the story picks up speed from this point on, hastening to the denouement.

Jesus is fully aware, even if the Twelve are not, of the growing power of darkness about to envelop them all and to kill Him; that as He now sets out for the Feast of Tabernacles, He will not even have a certain roof (Luke 9:58) or a pillow for His head, to sleep. The disciples who look back disqualify themselves for the kingdom of God (Luke 9:62). As He steadfastly set His face to go to Jerusalem to die, He must have felt too, now having put His hand to the plough, He must never look back. The purpose of Christ, formed in eternity, enforced and rendered explicit at the baptism and through temptation, would be sorely tested, but He would not fail nor be discouraged till He had set righteousness in the earth (Isa. 42:4).

The steady conviction that Jesus' death 'for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures' is fulfillment, in part of Isaiah 52:13–53:12 must reflect Jesus' attitude, no doubt communicated to the disciples at a time when they did not yet understand it but which struck with great force after His resurrection—along with much more that He said of His coming Passion, death and resurrection. (See, e.g. John 2:18–22: 'his disciples remembered that he had said this, and they believed the Scripture'; also Acts 8:31–35.)

It is not likely that Jesus entirely postponed informing the disciples of His violent death until after the incident near Caesarea Philippi. In the conversation with Nicodemus He referred to it obliquely in the saying, 'as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up' (John 3:14), unless this is John's commentary rather than Jesus' express saying. The great discourse in or near a Capernaum synagogue falls earlier than Peter's confession (John 6:25–71). In that great discourse on the bread of life He said, 'the bread that I will give for the life of the world is my flesh.' The discourse at Jerusalem, about the Good Shepherd who 'gives his life for the sheep' (John 10:1–18) probably occurred later, when Jesus and His company attended the Feast of Tabernacles as indicated in Luke 9:51 ff. above.¹⁵ If so, Jesus did not cease speaking of His approaching death in the ensuing months.

That Christ said much more about His death than is recorded cannot be doubted. Yet if He had said only a little or nothing at all to prepare the disciples for the seeming tragedy the reason is apparent—He came not to talk about death, His own or any others, but to 'give his life as a ransom for many.' After that the death of Christ came to be the heart of Gospel proclamation.

Other Old Testament Specific Predictions

Other Old Testament passages which in 'so many words' say something directly about Jesus' death are few. Though not quoted in the New Testament as prediction, Isaiah 50:4–9 can hardly be given a reading friendly to belief in predictive prophecy without seeing therein a portrait of the Savior. Daniel 9:26, speaking of a Messiah (Anointed One), who shall be cut off after 483 years has always been regarded from earliest times as a specific prophecy of Christ's death by violent means. Psalm 22 is close to the same quality of specific prediction. 'They will look on him whom they have pierced' (John 19:37; see also Rev. 1:7) seems to take 'they look on me, on him whom they have pierced' (Zec. 12:10) as a prediction of what John 19:34 says really happened—'one of the soldiers pierced his side with a spear.' John 19:37 says this fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah 12:10. Whatever one may think of prediction and fulfillment in these passages, the impression of specific reference is hard to escape. See the cross-references between the Old Testament texts and New Testament texts noted above and in good cross-reference Bibles (asv and nab are especially helpful).

Importance in the Rites and Sacraments Prescribed by Christ for the Church

Authority for baptism starts with the Lord Himself who made it the initiatory rite for every believer (Matt. 28:19). We have also the example of the complete apostolate in the Jerusalem church who baptized the first new believers on 'the same day' when the Spirit inaugurated the new age. Peter urged the anxious crowd on that first post-Easter Pentecost to be 'baptized ... in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins' (Acts 2:38). Because 'Christ Jesus died for our sins' making way for the baptism in the Spirit John had promised many months before (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16). This example (with modifications of time, mode, place) prevails to the present. The meaning of the rite (in part) is found in the way it represents the death, burial and resurrection of Christ, with which every genuine believer is now identified and united as says Romans 6:3, 4.

Authority for what Christians call the Eucharist, the Lord's Supper or Communion Service likewise was instituted by Jesus on the night of His betrayal (Matt. 26:26–29; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:15–20). It was explained by Jesus Himself as a perpetual observance to keep alive in Christian disciples' memory (see also 1 Cor. 11:25) their Savior's death for sins and to 'proclaim the Lord's death,' as Paul explains, until He comes again (1 Cor. 11:26). The rite may mean more than this, but whatever else it may signify, the heart of it is, as both Jesus and Paul say very clearly, 'remembrance' of the death of our Lord for our sins.

Importance As Fount of Every Blessing

Jesus is 'fount of every blessing' because 'He ... interposed His precious blood' as the hymn says (Come Thou Fount, R. Robinson). 'He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all, how will he not also with him graciously give us all things?' (Rom. 8:31, 32). Here in apostolic logic, all our blessings as believers are guaranteed by the death of Christ.

As Major Emphasis of New Testament Epistles and Revelation

The major Epistles and Revelation as well give major emphasis to the death of Christ: it is more than just a keystone in the arch of Christian doctrine for all Paul's letters. It is in some paramount way his sole message (1 Cor. 2:1, 2). The atoning, propitiating, expiating, reconciling, justifying, sanctifying, work of Christ on the cross is suffused through all the other themes of Romans and Galatians, scarcely less Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon. It supports the doctrine and exhortations of the Corinthian Letters and the Pastorals. Hebrews is hardly about anything else in the central chapters, bringing all the Old Testament religious ritual and calendar to bear on the significance of the incarnation and death of the Son of God. The Epistles of John and Jude relate the death of Christ to Christian faith and obedience, while the Revelation presents the One who was 'pierced' as the main speaker through the first three chapters and as the slain 'Lamb of God' through all the rest.

Importance in the Interest of the Denizens of Heaven

Scripture provides one glimpse of how even the angelic denizens of heaven, who no doubt have many interesting matters to think about, have special interest in the Passion of Christ as it relates to our salvation. According to the man who once tried to talk Jesus out of the whole idea of suffering, crucifixion and resurrection (Matt. 16:22, 23) the holy angels desire to 'look into' the sufferings and the glory (1 Peter 1:12 kjv). Angels of heaven need no salvation and would be ineligible if they did.

Although the Son ‘took not on him the nature of angels’ (Heb. 2:16 kjv) the holy angels nevertheless, as spectators from ‘outside the loop,’ are fascinated with matters surrounding the salvation effected for the race of man through Jesus’ humiliation, death and exaltation.

Importance in the World to Come

Two permanent human residents of heaven, Moses and Elijah, each of whom had rather spectacular entrances to the celestial estate, came down to earth to discuss our Lord’s coming ‘exodus’ via events at Jerusalem at the coming Passover season (Luke 9:31; cf. 28–32). This conference with the transfigured Jesus, on what may have been a slope of the same mountain where Peter sought to dissuade Jesus, shows the very supreme importance of the death of Jesus in the scheme of redemption by the ‘Lamb slain from the foundations of the world.’ Good scholars suggest the purpose of the Transfiguration and conference with Moses, the great messenger of the law, and Elijah, the greatest of the prophets, was to associate the work of Jesus with the meaning of Old Testament Scriptures and to encourage Him in facing the trials ahead. Yet others well observe that Moses and Elijah as representing the interests of saints of previous dispensations, all being saved ‘on credit,’ so to speak (Rom. 3:25, 26; Heb. 11:39, 40), were neither uninterested nor disinterested observers of the coming enactment of ‘eternal redemption’ (Heb. 9:12) ‘for us’—both those looking forward to Calvary and those looking back toward it.

In the heavenly world to come projected by The Apocalypse, the slain Lamb of God is a prevalent feature. The bride (the saved) will become ‘the wife of the Lamb’ (Rev. 21:9); the twelve foundations are ‘the twelve apostles of the Lamb’ (Rev. 21:14); together with the Lord God Almighty the Lamb is the temple of the city (Rev. 21:22), ‘its lamp is the Lamb’ (Rev. 21:23); all our names ‘are written in the Lamb’s book of life’ (Rev. 21:27); and the ‘throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it, and [we] his servants will worship him’ (Rev. 22:3).

Was the Death of Christ Necessary?

Let us approach this question with two truths about God and the world firmly established beyond question.

The first truth has regard to the fact that while God, Himself, is a necessary Being, He does nothing necessarily. ‘Creation is a free act of God, not necessary on His part.’¹⁶ Of the God of the Bible the record says ‘Our God is in the heavens; he does whatever he pleases’ (Ps. 115:3 rsv).

The second truth has regard to the fact that God having created the world sustains and rules it in perfect harmony with His counsel, His will and His character. God is perfectly free but ‘he cannot deny himself’ (2 Tim. 2:13).

These two principles will be of decisive force in answering the question,: Was the death of Christ necessary?

It is probably idle to speculate if God might have created a world in which a different set of circumstances would prevail. No one knows if God’s character, will and counsel might have produced a world in which sin would not occur and redemption would therefore be unnecessary. An aspect of God's character is wisdom; so we may be sure that what He did create was 'only wise.' Yet, as Paul says, in God 'are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' (Col. 2:3)—hidden except as He deigns to reveal them.

Logical Necessity?

Among God's creations are laws of logic. Philosophers speculate that logic is simply an aspect of reality for God, as well as for all His creatures. If so, logic is simply a name for God thinking. There is such a thing as logical necessity. In this world of sinners do laws of logic render the death of Christ necessary? If so, the Bible does not trace any necessity of our Lord's death to anything like the product of a syllogism. As we shall see, Paul does not depart from logic in presenting the necessity of Jesus' death for sin, but he draws his arguments from other sources than logic.

Moral Necessity?

Philosophers and theologians distinguish between physical necessity, which belongs to the realm of nature and material things, and moral necessity, which applies to the actions of free beings who make choices. Material necessity, inasmuch as it operates in a world of many causes and effects, is also called contingent or consequent necessity. Example: a bullet from the barrel of a rifle necessarily goes in the precise direction the barrel is pointed, except as a crosswind or gravity affect (necessarily) its passage. People being free beings with moral capacity are under moral necessity always to do what is right, no exceptions. Was Jesus simply morally obligated to go to the cross? There are those (among them A. H. Strong) who have said once the Logos assumed our human nature He was under that obligation, that as Man He was obliged by unity with our race to pay our debt.¹⁷ This, however, is only a fallible theologian's opinion, influenced by Strong's metaphysics of personal, idealistic pluralism. The Bible nowhere says the fact of incarnation per se placed Christ under moral necessity to die for the sinful race.

No Necessity?

The nominalists of the Middle Ages thought all generalizations of a universal sort were only mental constructs. So along with later Socinians they denied any necessity at all for the death of Christ. God did not need to demand satisfaction for sins. For modern liberal theology any satisfaction for sin is an error and even some Arminian-Wesleyan theologians, otherwise quite orthodox (Richard Watson, for example), think of the cross as a demonstration of God's government rather than strictly substitutionary satisfaction. However, Thomas Oden, a living Wesleyan, makes a strong case for substitutionary atonement.¹⁸

Absolute Necessity or Hypothetical Necessity?

In philosophy and theology 'a thing is said to be absolutely necessary when without it a certain end cannot possibly be reached' (G. M. Sauvage, 'Necessity,' The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. x, p. 733). Hypothetical necessity, or relative necessity, is such as depends on an a priori matter of some sort.

As to the necessity for the death of Christ for our sin, whether absolutely necessary or relative (i.e. because God so decreed), theologians have differed and wavered.

No one can doubt that the ‘moving cause’¹⁹ is God’s love (John 3:16; John 4:9, 10), grace (Rom. 5:6–10), mercy (Titus 3:5), wise purpose (Eph. 1:7, 8; 3:10).²⁰ ‘The scheme of redemption, as formed in the eternal mind and council of God, is called ‘the manifold wisdom of God.’²¹ But this leaves unanswered whether there was or was not some other possible way for God to save lost mankind. If there is no other way the cross is an absolute necessity for man’s salvation, if there are other possible ways (‘God can do as He pleases’) then the cross is a relative or hypothetical necessity. Calvin clearly opted for the latter,²² as did Athanasius, Augustine and Aquinas.²³ Irenaeus of the ancient church, Anselm in Cur Deus Homo and most more recent Reformed writers opt for the former, absolute necessity.

A Proposed Resolution

Jesus addressed the necessity of the cross. He told His disciples many times, beginning even before the Transfiguration ‘that he must go ... suffer ... and be killed’ (Matt. 16:21); ‘The Son of man must suffer ... be rejected ... and be killed’ (Luke 9:21, 22).

Jesus ascribed the necessity to several causes, first to divine foreordination (predestination in God’s will and counsel). This is prominent in His Gethesemane prayers (Matt. 26:38, 39, 42, 44) to which Peter adds ‘the lamb foreknown before the foundation of the world’ (1 Peter 1:20). This is not different from tracing necessity to the ‘command’ of the Father to which Jesus referred more than once. Secondly, Jesus explained that His own purpose in coming into the world was to die precisely as He did: ‘for this purpose I have come’ into the world (John 12:27; cf. Matt. 20:28). By receiving baptism He submitted to the plan and dedicated Himself to this purpose. During the temptation in the wilderness He resisted the devil’s effort to dissuade Him from His voluntarily assumed destiny. Thirdly, Jesus said He had to die to fulfil the manifold prophecies of the Old Testament (as has been noted earlier in this book). See especially Matt. 26:52–54 and Luke 24:26, 27, 44–46. And fourthly He had to die if He was to share His life with us. Like the brazen serpent He ‘must’ be lifted up to heal the deadly wounds of sin (John 3:14, 15) and like a seed of grain, ‘except it’ fall to the ground to die, it will never germinate, come to life and produce the fruit of multitudes of the redeemed (John 12:20–24).

However, none of this information about Jesus’ understanding of necessity takes us logically prior to the divine decree. Left unanswered is the question: Was there no other way—i.e. absolute necessity?

Prior to all the subsequent and dependent reasons furnished by Christ for His own death for sin is God’s purpose and will. Yet the will of God was not capricious or arbitrary in this or any other matter, but ‘rooted in the very nature of God and is in harmony with [all] the divine perfections.’²⁴

Christian orthodoxy has always affirmed that neither love nor holiness (justice, righteousness) is alone in this respect. As we hope to demonstrate, holiness is primary, but never alone in God.

According to Duns Scotus and the nominalist party in the late medieval debates, the atonement was not inherently necessary, only the way God sovereignly decided to secure salvation. God could have accomplished the result in any number of ways He might select.

To the contrary, in the wisdom of God, once His decree to create man and to permit the fall were in place, the decree to elect some fell in order; but to save the elect (or all who believe) it was absolutely necessary that the Lamb of God be slain to take away the sins of the world. Within the created order the death of Christ became an absolute necessity. That is to say, holiness required that if God was to be righteous in forgiving sins deserving punishment it was necessary for punishment to be executed.

This seems to be the argument of Romans 3:21–26, which says God set forth Christ Jesus to be a propitiation in order to show God’s ‘righteousness’ (of character and deed) in ‘passing over’ sins of earlier ages of man and ‘that he [God] might be [both] just, and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus’ (Rom. 3:26 esv, also compatible with kjv, asv and niv). ‘There were two purposes to be answered; the vindication of the character [not the will] of God in passing by former sins, and in passing them now.... The death of Christ vindicated the justice of God in forgiving sin in all ages of the world [inasmuch] as those sins were by the righteous God, as Olshausen says, “punished in Christ.”’²⁵

A rather fierce debate in academic circles has sought to ‘correct’ the Reformation message of justification by faith alone, on the ground of Christ’s propitiating work alone (by the blood). Space does not allow a full report of the debate.²⁶ Several articles in the Journal of Biblical Literature since 1985 have attacked the usual Protestant understanding of propitiation and justification in Romans. It has also broken out in literature from and critical of Westminster Theological Seminary.

The plain argument of Paul (Rom. 1:18–3:26) presents two truths within whose ambit the question of the necessity of Calvary must be placed: 1) the holy character of God made Calvary necessary if sinners were to be forgiven and 2) God’s love made Calvary possible. No man can explain to another why God created a world in which sin could and would condemn creatures made in His image. And He has not deemed it wise to tell us. We do not need to know and it may be presumptuous to ask. It may well be that a sovereign God could have made a different kind of world if He chose. But He did not so choose. End of discussion.

The will of God (plan, purpose, decree) is of course an expression of His holy being. Hence both the will and the nature (character, essence, being) were involved in the permission of sin in our world and in the cure for it. (Passages affirming a connection of Calvary with both the eternal plan and the divine will are John 12:27; Matt. 26:38, 39, 42, 44; and Heb. 10:5–7).

This is not all that needs to be understood about the necessity of the death of Christ. As far as Jesus Himself was concerned, the necessity was not simple fate, though He had said ‘it is necessary’ (Matt. 16:21 and parallels in Mark and Luke), using de-i, a very strong impersonal verb for absolute necessity. He as God had part in the divine foreordaining of ‘the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.’ ‘He humbled himself’ to being ‘found in human form.’ His talks with the disciples were not just to prepare them (as a sickly parent would small children) for the parent’s untimely death. Rather it was self-imposed acceptance of the necessary expense of a lutrōsis, ransom, of the world of mankind from the power of death and sin. He ‘gave himself’ a ransom (lutron, price paid for redemption). As the Good Shepherd He ‘lays down his life for the sheep.... No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord’ (John 10:11, 18). Every recent generation has produced books and articles proposing some skeptical theory to explain how it happened, every one imposed on rather than derived from the only authentic reports available.

As we have already taken note in this digression on necessity, there are hints as to what both the remote and the proximate reasons were. Such sayings as ‘in accordance with the Scriptures’ (1 Cor. 15:3), ‘how then would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen in this way?’ (Matt. 26:54 niv) and ‘it behoved,’ etc., of Luke 24:44–46 (kiv) suggest that the meaning of all previous revelation, the whole Old Testament, would have remained an unfinished book without the fulfillment of its types (about this more later) and prophecies in this true ‘Omega Point’ (to borrow a phrase from Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, an evolutionary Roman Catholic philosopher-theologian).

Further, if the Son of Man after a long life on earth had simply ascended to heaven alone, He would, in the language of John 12:23, 24 have dwelt there ‘alone,’ for the kernel of wheat must be planted and die to bear fruit. It was precisely to share His own eternal life with men that He ‘descended into the lower parts of the earth’ and to give ‘gifts to men’ (Eph. 4:8, 9).

We now turn to examine the meaning of the death of Christ, designated in preaching and theology as The Atonement.

¹ Irenaeus, Against Heresies l.x.1, in Ante-Nicene Fathers iii, ed. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, repr. of U.S. ed. 1885 (Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994). p. 330.

² ibid., iii, iv, e, p. 417.

³ ibid., iv, p. 39.

⁴ The Catholic Encyclopedia: An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church VIII (New York: The Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), pp. 382, 383.

⁵ Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom vol. iii, The Evangelical Creeds, repr. of 1877 ed. of Harper & Bros. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), p. 316.

⁶ James O. Buswell, Jr, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1962, 1971), pp. 61–65.

⁷ Canon Dyson Hague, ‘At-One-Ment by Propitiation,’ in The Fundamentals (Bible Institute of Los Angeles, 1917), p. 78.

⁸ Leon Morris, The Cross in the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), p. 5.

⁹ Hague, in Fundamentals, p. 78.

- ¹⁰ H. Wheeler Robinson, The Cross of the Servant, book 2 of The Cross in the New Testament (London: SCM Press, 1955, 1965), pp. 100, 101.
- ¹¹ Walther Zimmerli and Joachim Jeremias, The Servant of God (London: 1941), pp. 98 ff., cited by Leon Morris, op. cit., p. 31.
- ¹² Joseph Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel, trans. W. F. Stinespring (New York: Macmillan, 1955), p. 163.
- ¹³ Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts, Jewish Legends of Three Thousand Year (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1979, 1988), pp. 104–116.
- ¹⁴ R. D. Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory of the Lord's Righteous Servant (Moline, IL: The Christian Service Foundation, 1958). Republished by Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2001.
- ¹⁵ A. T. Robertson, Harmony of the Gospels (New York: Harper & Bros., 1950), pp. xxxiii, 119.
- ¹⁶ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St Louis: Concordia Publ. House, 1950–1957), p. 480.
- ¹⁷ A. H. Strong, 'The Necessity of the Atonement,' Philosophy and Religion (collected addresses, essays and sermons) (New York: C. A. Armstrong & Son, 1888), pp. 213–219, and Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 715, 716.
- ¹⁸ Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology ii, The Word of Life (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1989), pp. 318, 373–379.
- Catholic Encyclopedia The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes
- ¹⁹ John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978), p. 6.
- ²⁰ ibid., p. 7.
- ²¹ ibid.
- ²² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion ii, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans, and ed. F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), 12.1.
- ²³ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 4th rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 369.
- ²⁴ ibid., p. 368.
- ²⁵ Charles Hodge, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, repr.

1993), pp. 97, 98.

²⁶ See The Romans Debate, ed. K. P. Donfried (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1991), note W. S. Campbell, ‘Romans II’s As a Key to the Structure and Thought of the Letter,’ pp. 251–264.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (530). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

14

The Meaning of the Death of Christ (I): How to Explore the Revealed Mystery

A Christian Consensus

There are some differences between the main branches of historic Christianity regarding the significance of Jesus’ death, but the differences are tiny compared with the measure of agreement. This is a remarkable fact in view of severe differences in some other areas of doctrine. The ancient creeds define the Person of Christ and make statements about the main events in His career—birth, life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, etc., but say almost nothing about their understanding of the permanent significance of Jesus’ death—only ‘and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate’ (Nicene Creed of ad 381) ¹ and ‘who suffered for our salvation’² in Quicumque Vult (the Athanasian Creed),³ nothing at all in the Definition of Chalcedon.

Yet the cross on which Jesus died early became the most widely employed symbol of Christianity, witnessing to His death as the most meaningful event in His career on earth.

The apparent reason no important creedal statement developed is that no widely spread heresy involving interpretation of the saving significance of the Savior’s death arose prominently, as did arise in connection with His Person.

Such development of a doctrine of ‘atonement’ as took place up to the sixteenth-century Reformation did not lead to any rupture or serious controversy. At the time of the Reformation the death of our Lord, interpreted as atonement somewhat after the manner of Anselm and Aquinas, was as important in Rome and Paris as in Geneva and Wittenberg.

The following from an acknowledged Roman Catholic authority is correct.

[T]he Atonement was not one of the subjects directly disputed between the Reformers and their Catholic opponents. But from its close connection with the cardinal question of justification, this doctrine assumed a very special prominence and importance in Protestant theology and practical preaching... In their general conception of the Atonement the Reformers and their followers happily preserved the Catholic doctrine, at least along its main lines. And in their explanation of the merit of Christ’s sufferings and death we may see the influence of St Thomas and the other schoolmen.⁴

The Greek orthodox church from ancient times has delighted to speculate on mystical redemption by the incarnation and criticizes Western (both Roman and Protestant) theology for alleged legalism; yet underneath there appears to be much essential agreement with us. An important catechism of the Eastern church, after affirming Jesus Christ was crucified ‘for us,’ asks ‘How does the death of Jesus Christ upon the cross deliver us from sin, the curse and death?’ and answers, in part:

... as in Adam we had fallen under sin, the curse, and death, so we are delivered from sin, the curse and death in Jesus Christ. His voluntary suffering and death on the cross for us, being of infinite value and merit, as the death of one sinless, God and man in one person, is both a perfect satisfaction of the justice of God, which had condemned us for sin to death, and a friend of infinite merit, which has obtained him the right, without prejudice to justice, to give us sinners pardon of our sins, and grace to have victory over sin and death.⁵

With minor adjustments this speaks for Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Calvinists, Anglicans and Methodists, Baptists, Independents, and all the rest of orthodox believers. This would not be the case in many other areas of doctrine. In evaluating the Eastern Orthodox insistence on theosis, that is, deification, as salvation, and its seeming to slight the atonement in favor of the incarnation, this confession must be kept in mind. An Eastern Orthodox publication called The Christian Activist, in a polemical mood, liked to point to contrasts between evangelicals and orthodox. A recent article reads like Protestant liberalism, denying death is a punishment for sin and rejecting any penal aspect of Christ’s death (‘The River of Fire,’ Dr Alexander Kalomiros, Winter—Spring 1997). But this is not quite typical.

According to the Scriptures

Paul was quite representative of all writers of the New Testament Epistles when he said he would know nothing among the churches save ‘Jesus Christ and him crucified.’ The cross, as we saw earlier, was also the climax toward which each Gospel moved. ‘The Lamb of God’ has the same central place in the Apocalypse from chapter 5 onward. Paul interpreted the death of Christ for all Christians when he defined his gospel as ‘first of all’ ‘that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures’ (1 Cor. 15:3). This is not the same ‘spin,’ as we say, on the crucifixion that Pilate or the high priest or Saul of Tarsus might have put on the crucifixion of Jesus. This sentence by which Paul introduces his great chapter on resurrection, Christ’s and ours, is the matrix from which all discussion of the meaning of the death of Christ must spring. 1) What transaction took place? 2) How do the Scriptures define it? And 3) where in ‘the Scriptures’ is it so written? These are some of the questions we now address.

The chief biblical meaning of the death of Christ (‘for sin’ ‘for our sins,’ etc.) is defined by the need of every man for rescue from the condemnation of death for sin from which by ourselves we cannot escape. Those who, like the ancient Pelagians, sixteenth-century Socinians and modern ‘Enlightenment’ theologians deny the need, quite naturally find no cure. If there is no wrath of God and no created structure of justice and law in the universe neither is there place for a final judgment and forgiveness. Hence ‘a survey of the theories which have proliferated across the centuries will show that the biblical data have been hammered into many conflicting shapes, often in forgetfulness of the mold which the word of God itself provides.’⁶ The materials are immense both in Scripture and in theological literature. I propose some principles for correct understanding of biblical texts relating to the meaning of the death of Christ as reported in the New Testament and as interpreted therein.

Principles for Interpreting the Death of Christ

1. The notion of slain sacrifice for forgiveness of sin, like every other major doctrine, has basic preparation in the Old Testament. The New Testament presumes throughout that a revelation perfect, sure, right, pure, clean, true and righteous exists already in the Scriptures of the Old Testament (Ps. 19:7–9). The teachings there are sufficient to convert sinners and make them to rejoice, be enlightened, to warn and to reward them (Ps. 19:7–11). This means that every Christian doctrine had its basic content laid out already, before a line of the New Testament was ever written, to complete the last chapter, so to speak (Heb. 1:1–2). Even in our Lord's own time He declared this to be so, frequently reproving purveyors of false views for not knowing the Scriptures or for misusing, misinterpreting or perverting what the Scriptures say. This aspect of Christian truth especially, being the major theme of the New Testament from beginning to end will never come to clear focus for any one who declines to become acquainted with the Old Testament. Its most forbidding passages—in Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers, which abound in tiresome details of Tabernacle and Temple, their furniture, vessels, materials, priests and ministers, rituals and calendar—are the very portions which one entire New Testament book (Hebrews) employs to explain the meaning of the cross. Passages from Psalms and Prophets turn up in dozens of New Testament explanations of the meaning of Jesus' death. 'Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures' cannot be understood apart from those Scriptures that had been in existence centuries before a line of the New Testament was composed.

Certain recent and current writers on hermeneutics, including biblical hermeneutics, draw a distinction between the horizon (i.e. total personal and cultural background) which the present interpreter brings to the task of interpretation and the horizon of the writers, also to a distinction between intended meaning of the writer for his first readers (perhaps) and significance for us the current generation. Some authors assume great differences. Whatever validity these refinements of the task of Bible interpretation may have—and they are not without merit—it is my opinion we must regard it as the first task of the interpreter to seek to understand the writer's 'horizon' and to adjust our outlook, whatever our 'frame of plausibility,' to it. Borrowing the language of A. C. Thistelton,⁷ joint authors W. W. Klein, C. L. Bomberg and R. L. Hubbard Jr rightly say: 'Genuine interpretation requires a fusing of the ancient and modern horizons where the meaning of the ancient text helps interpreters come to new understandings themselves.'⁸ This volume (An Introduction to Biblical Interpretation, Dallas, TX: Word, 1993) provides an extensive bibliography of hermeneutics annotated from the standpoint of reverent, believing scholarship. The significance (practical or theoretical) for our time builds on and absorbs the meaning of the original author. The words mean and signify, meaning and significance will be used interchangeably in the following discussion.

(Strange as it seems to ordinary folk, there are now several schools of academic philosophy which contend hermeneutics has little to do with the intention of the author of a text. These authors start with some form of depth psychology to plumb the depths of human 'existence.' They seek to explain why the author wrote what he did rather than the strict meaning of what he intended to say and what the reader is in the depth of 'being' or 'existence' before extracting significance for the reader.

E. D. Hirsch has been the leading exponent of the common-sense view that it is the task of interpreters of a text to find and expound what the original author meant.⁹

There are now (or have been) several self-acknowledged schools of a ‘new hermeneutic.’ This means simply to interpret a text from the standpoint of the presuppositions of the reader—Marxist, Freudian, feminist, liberation, theology of revolution, etc. These interpreters often seek to explain the prejudices of the author—say patriarchalism or feudalism, etc.—to explain the errors of his writing as prior to finding any significance for the modern reader.

2. A second principle is related to the first. The thinking of the authors of the New Testament had already been shaped by the Old Testament. They were Jews steeped in the history, liturgy and doctrine, as well as the language of the Old Testament. Their lives had been shaped by the moral and religious outlook of orthodox Judaism. Such writers naturally expressed themselves in patterns and terms already imbedded in their minds. There was a time when Britain and America were populated by millions who in church, home, school and workplace were similarly shaped in the same by the Authorized Version of the Bible. This national treasure of moral and intellectual capital is even now not completely lost.

Such being the case, the diligent student of Christian doctrine aspiring to be fed on meat rather than milk and perhaps to be a teacher of the Word, must pause on the way long enough to attain more than cursory acquaintance with the Old Testament, ‘beginning at Moses and all the prophets ... in all the Scriptures.’ To do otherwise would be like attempting calculus without knowing arithmetic. (To debate these matters with ‘scholars’ who have neither acquaintance with the Old Testament nor acceptance of its vocabulary of sacrifice is not very fruitful.)

In such a case, wherever one wishes to enter the thought-world of the New Testament, acquaintance with the Old Testament background of the idea is a necessary consideration.

(Some scholars have determined that, for example, about three-fourths of the book of Revelation consists in ideas, words, phrases, sentences from the Old Testament and allusions in slightly different phraseology. A sizeable modern literature has grown up on this subject by some of the best scholars of our time. The article, ‘How the New Testament uses the Old,’ by E. Earle Ellis treats the subject thoroughly and in the notes provides an excellent bibliography.¹⁰ See also TDNT; art. ‘Tupos’ [‘type’] by L. Goppelt.)

3. In the New Testament, Jesus Himself in the Gospels and all the authors of the remaining books regard the coming and kingdom of Christ as completion of events, institutions, revelations and history reported in the Old Testament, as was discussed in some detail in chapter 1. This clear feature of the New Testament itself is quite removed from imposing the meaning of New Testament revelation upon Old Testament stories or statements of truth. But it does mean that in the unity of biblical truth firstly, Old Testament teaching (as opposed to mere reporting of beliefs and practices) will not contradict New Testament teaching; secondly, a Christological interpretation of the Old Testament is a natural thing, not a cramped, contrived process whereby a Christian orthodoxy is imposed upon the Old Testament. Jesus was very clear: ‘... beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself ... “everything written about me in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled”.... “Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer and on the third day rise from the dead” ’ (Luke 24:27, 44–46). It is also written ‘Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures’ (1 Cor. 1:3). See further evidence cited in chapter 1.

Unity of the Two Testaments

This unity of the Testaments is related to several matters of great importance to sound interpretation of the death of Christ.

The unity that believers and theologians have found in the facts and meaning of Scripture has been under serious attack since the beginning of the Christian era. These attacks have come for different reasons and in different ways too complicated to present fully here. Any one of them if successful would have destroyed Christianity as a system of beliefs and practices, hence no ‘systematic theology’ or systematic anything else. This, of course, is where the various recent fads of ‘hermeneutics’ (principles of interpretation) would take us—there is a new one every three or four years.

On the other hand some unquestionably competent scholars have lent important support to the unity of the Testaments and the progress of redemptive history.

A welcome scholarly acknowledgment of the divinely intended preparatory and participating connection of the Old Testament ritual sacrifices with the sacrifice of the cross comes sometimes from unexpected sources. An acknowledged, perhaps paramount, recent modern authority on Hebrew (Old Testament) antiquities was Roland De Vaux. In the preface to his treatise on sacrifice this renowned Roman Catholic priest-scholar says,

The unique sacrifice of Christ has rendered obsolete the sacrificial rites of the Old Testament but these had played their part as an expression of the piety of our ancestors in faith and as a means of their sanctification. Moreover, the teaching of the Old Testament has not lost its value for Christians. By partaking in Christ’s sacrifice they fulfil the fundamental obligation of worship, thanksgiving and expiation, which the Old Testament sacrifices were already intended to satisfy.¹¹

The last four lines of the book comment on Isaiah 53:7. He concludes:

Thus is a door opened upon the New Testament Jesus as the ‘Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world’ (John 1:29), Christ knew not sin, God has made him a [sacrificial] victim for sin, hattat, so that in him we might become the justice of God (2 Cor. 5:21).¹²

Denials and Perversions of the Unity and Meaning

From ancient times there has been a tendency among some to find the Old Testament antithetical to the gospel of salvation by grace through faith on the ground of a bona fide sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ—prominently: 1) the various Gnosticisms of the earliest generations; 2) the Socinians of the Reformation era; 3) transcendentalists, Unitarians and Hixite Quakers of the Enlightenment heyday; 4) liberalism of the past 150 years; 5) the doctrine of reconciliation by incarnation sometimes advocated in mystical theology and inherent in the existentialism of neo-orthodoxy; and 6) the evolutionary pantheism of current process theology (called pan-en-theism). The last three of these compete for acceptance today.

These denials and perversions have been proposed to explain away what the New Testament really says about atonement for sin, especially any traces of vicarious sacrifice or special saving value of 'the precious blood.' To do so one must reject or reduce any New Testament approval of or connection with the Old Testament bloody rites of sacrifice, its God-directed wars of conquest (book of Joshua) and portrayal of the one true God as a God of wrath who visits punishment either temporal (pestilence, fire from heaven and wars of annihilation) or eternal such as Jesus threatened (Gehenna, Hades, hell) or the Apocalypse (book of Revelation) promises (lake of fire, second death).

1. Denials and perversion since the beginning of the Reformation have taken the form first, of an effort to combine integrity and acceptance of the Bible as a report of honest men about real things as they saw them, with rejection of traditional interpretations (Socinianism of the sixteenth century and to a degree even the Unitarians of the nineteenth century).

2. Then an effort to accept Christianity and the civilization permeated by it, but to improve on it by rejecting any elements of the Bible unworthy of modern, enlightened civilized people (many Enlightenment-Age-of-Reason folk: an example is Thomas Jefferson).

3. After that, treating Christianity as something begun by Jesus, an ethical religion (reflecting nineteenth-century evolutionary, optimistic liberalism), to interpret Jesus as founder of Christianity not the object of Christian worship and trust as Savior; His death as something caused by His own mistaken ideas about the kingdom of God, etc. In this system there is no place for a Savior from sin. Early in the twentieth century an effort was launched mainly to place Jesus' death in the context of a tragic, failed effort. His movement nevertheless caught on with His friends, who for some reason supposed He was alive again. Their converts in the second and third generations afterward gave us first Epistles, then Gospels with a doctrine of vicarious sacrifice based on misguided interpretation of Isaiah 53 and similar texts.

These efforts have not been successful on the basis of exegesis of what the texts of Scripture really are and truly say. There have been enormous expenditures of energy, notwithstanding, to overturn the plain sense of the O.T. and N.T. in regard to the meaning of the cross.

4. The unbelieving higher criticism of the nineteenth century postulated an evolutionary history of Israel to make the sacrificial rituals a late addition against better ethical advice by the prophets. Criticism also postulated a pre-historic amalgamation of Canaanites and migratory tribes known as Hebrews instead of a conquest, etc., rejected Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and canonized a Documentary, layered analysis of the Pentateuch. In effect, all the rest of Hebrew history is reconstructed according to several evolutionary scenarios. This approach prevails in liberal seminaries and the literature of the world of so-called Old Testament theology. In this enormous literature there is no plan for such interpretation of the Old Testament as Jesus, Paul, Peter, Hebrews and John give. My inclinations as well as duties as a professor first of Old Testament, then of theology in theological schools and colleges, as well as writing over a good many years have made me rather acutely aware of the harm to authentic Christianity this sort of attack from the academic quarter has had. It strikes at the heart of all biblical historic, orthodox witness that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures.

5. Add to the mix the confusion introduced by the extremes of literary (source) criticism of the Gospels, form criticism, redaction criticism, etc., the utter recklessness of the current search for ‘the historical Jesus’ and the reductionism of the ‘Jesus Seminar’ and its academic aftermath. As a result the Bible comes to mean nothing at all to those who are affected. I have lived with these developments as a scholar since before the present refinements of anti-orthodox and anti-supernatural biblical and theological teachings came to fruition in the moral and cultural calamities that overtook Christendom in the last several decades of the twentieth century, as well as general collapse of liberal denominations both in Europe and America.

We must do more than lament the collapse of liberal religion. Let us rather pursue the task mandated by Jesus Himself of finding the meaning of His Calvary work in the Scriptures.

(David F. Wells has provided a more extensive treatment of Christology in the hands of those who deny or pervert the New Testament message of ‘Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures’ in ‘The Enlightenment and its aftermath’ and ‘Twentieth Century Turmoil,’ chapters 7 and 8 in The Person of Christ: A Biblical and Historical Analysis of the Incarnation.¹³ Though faithful to the ‘Biblical’ this excellent work is devoted mainly to the ‘Historical.’ Thereby it serves to supplement most evangelical readers’ knowledge of the subject. Endnotes furnished by Dr Wells thoroughly document details of the report and analysis and are a guide to further study.)

Principles to Guide Interpretation of New Testament Doctrine of the Death of Christ

Accepting both the truthfulness of the whole Bible, and interpreting with due attention to figurative elements and several genera (Fr. genre) of literature and the unity of the message of the Great Book, three principles of understanding the meaning of its central focus on the passion and death of Jesus will help us get it right. Though not always specifically stated (and of course with variety of expression) they have guided the best orthodox writers for 400 years. The group who translated the Authorized Version of 1611 numbered many godly classical scholars who were eminently successful in producing relative accuracy and consistency in the words relating to sacrifice in the Old Testament and the Christological language of the New Testament. The relevance of rabbinical studies and of the language of sacrifice in the Talmud came to be appreciated in the eighteenth century (John Gill in Britain) and growing appreciation of the importance of the Septuagint, linguistic bridge from Leviticus to Hebrews, so to speak, followed. And in connection with the Septuagint, archaeology (papyri) contributed greatly to knowledge of the sacrificial language both of the LXX and the New Testament.

These developments of the latest generations were not required to get at understanding of ‘Jesus Christ and him crucified,’ only to refine and to correct some minor false conceptions which it would take a rather full history of exegesis to trace out fully. I state the most controversial principle first.

A. There is a typical connection between central features of the Old Testament ritual system and the events of Jesus’ redemptive career and the meaning of His life of obedience, Passion and death. This will be discussed at length later at an appropriate place.

B. The New Testament employs the very vocabulary of Old Testament ritual sacrifice to interpret the meaning of Jesus' life, Passion and death. This vocabulary was supplied by the Greek translation of New Testament times now known as the Septuagint, a translation used throughout the first-century Diaspora of Jews. This is the subject of the next chapter in this study.

C. The rabbinical writings of the Talmud and similar literature of orthodox Judaism preserve some of the religious ideas and language of sacrifice, prevalent in synagogue and synagogue schools of Jesus' time. The devout Jews of the apostolic circle would likely have employed some of this language, adapted to Christian understanding, in writing the New Testament. They could not easily avoid employing this treasury of vocabulary and patterns of thought in writing about a new covenant which they esteemed to be fulfillment of an old covenant. Aid from rabbinical Judaism is, however, seriously limited first, by reason of the fact there are almost no rabbinical writings of the first century now available. Furthermore, the teachings of the rabbis, except as preserved in the New Testament itself, were mainly preserved (fairly accurately, it is thought) orally. No one is certain when they were written in the Mishna, but it was several centuries later. Secondly, at the time of writing, the authors of Mishna had been reacting, for generations, against the claims of Christianity and its advocates. Hence there was reverse influence on rabbinical ideas and vocabulary from Christian sources as continues to the present.

I shall not refer often to the principles set forth in this chapter in the study to follow, but the reader should know that they are being employed.

¹ Henry Bettenson, ed., Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (London: Oxford University Press, 1963), p. 37.

² Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom vol. iii, The Evangelical Creeds (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966 repr. of 1877 ed. of Harper & Bros.), p. 69. Cf. The Catholic Encyclopedia: An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church ii (New York: The Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), left col., p. 34, and Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954, 1957), para. 40, p. 16.

³ Bettenson, Documents, p. 73.

⁴ W. H. Kent, O.S.C., 'Atonement,' in The Catholic Encyclopedia ii, p. 58.

⁵ The Longer Catechism (Moscow of 1839, Q sections 206 and 208), in Schaff, Creeds of Christendom ii, pp. 475, 476.

⁶ Vernon Grounds, 'Atonement,' Baker's Dictionary of Theology, ed. E. F. Harrison (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1960), p. 71.

⁷ A. C. Thistelton, The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Designation with Special Reference to Hiedeger, Bultmann and Willgenstein (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1980).

⁸ W. W. Klein, C. L. Bomberg and R. L. Hubbard Jr, An Introduction to Biblical Interpretation (Dallas: Word, 1993), p. 83.

⁹ E. D. Hirsch, Validity in Interpretation (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967) and The Aim of Interpretation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976).

¹⁰ E. Earle Ellis, 'How the New Testament Uses the Old,' in New Testament Interpretation, I. H. Marshall, ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1977, 1991).

TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

¹¹ Roland De Vaux, Studies in Old Testament Sacrifice (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1964), p. vii.

¹² ibid., p. 112.

¹³ D. F. Wells, The Person of Christ: A Biblical and Historical Analysis of the Incarnation (Westchester: Crossway Books, 1984), pp. 129–170.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (540). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

15

The Meaning of the Death of Jesus Christ (II): The Biblical Vocabulary of the Atonement

Earlier we have taken note of the centrality of the theme of atonement in the Bible and its steady presentation from Genesis 3 to Revelation 22. The fullness of scriptural representations of the meaning of the cross and variety of expression do not in any wise impair the unity of meaning everywhere in the Bible. The various expressions do not contradict one another. Rather they simply reflect the variegated, but comprehensive, organic unity of the biblical story of creation, fall and redemption. A sound understanding of God's nature and attributes (especially holiness and love in balance), His will and His law, man's nature as created and his condition vitiated by the fall must be brought to sound interpretation of the meaning of the cross, the central fact in the history of salvation.

By What Name?

It is no small matter to choose the right comprehensive name for the subject at hand. Many have struggled with it. The customary word in books, encyclopaedias, research articles, sermons and learned discourse is atonement. To atone originally in English meant to make or to be at-one: hence to reconcile and thereby at-one-ment, reconciliation.¹ And the one time 'atonement' appears in the English New Testament (kjv) (Rom. 5:11) it translates a Greek word which uniformly, in the rest of the New Testament Version of ad 1611, is rendered reconciliation. Reconciliation or at-one-ment, however, is only one of many aspects of the meaning of the cross as interpreted in the Bible.

Atone and atonement came to mean to make amends or reparations for wrongdoing, the satisfaction for wrongdoing—not unrelated to some reconciliations but not the same as reconciliation. There are at least a dozen other aspects of Calvary's meaning in Bible and theology, each designated by different words, so 'atonement,' the word as such, is not really a comprehensive term.

There is some law of language at work here. Scotland gets its name from a stray band of Irish Scots settled near the border with England; Greece gets its name from a small clan of Hellenes who happened to be near Italy; Asia, now the name for earth's largest continent, in Paul's time designated only a province in western Anatolia closest to 'civilized' Romans and Greeks—now called Asia Minor, and Africa was a tiny province directly opposite Sicily on the shore of a great unknown land mass now known in entirety as Africa.

So though it causes confusion we will go on speaking of the entire saving work effected by God in Christ at Calvary as the atonement, even though at-one-ment, or reconciliation, is only one of several aspects of that great accomplishment.

Devout Christians who get their theological vocabulary from familiarity with the sacred page know Jesus died, suffered, was obedient unto death, was slain, gave Himself, was a sacrifice for sin, was crucified, shed His blood and by many other turns of phrase know what happened. Each expression puts a slightly different slant on what the event was in and of itself and hence also some special meaning in the context of the citation.

Fulfillment of Divine Plan

Some of the best-known texts emphasize the significance simply as fulfillment of divine plans, especially as expressed in Old Testament prophecy with which believers then and now should be familiar and should understand. Thus He is 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. (Rev. 13:8 kjv); He 'Ought ... to have suffered' (Luke 24:26 kjv); and 'it was necessary for the Christ to suffer' (Acts 17:3). The Old Testament prophets certainly, if dimly, 'predicted the sufferings of Christ' (1 Peter 1:11). It is asserted many times and at various junctures that no one who understood Scripture should have been surprised that Jesus was destined by God to die. Jesus even called disciples 'foolish ones, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken' (Luke 24:25) for stupidity in this regard.

If 'Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures' and the Passion events were forecast 'in all the Scriptures,' a major feature of that forecast was in the sacrifices prescribed in Leviticus and Numbers. The very language of the four Evangelists, of Jesus Himself, of Paul, Peter, James and John is not only replete with references to the sacrificial system, but as we shall see, was shaped by its images. The New Testament language of atonement is almost totally obscure without knowledge of that system—in which our Lord fully participated, as did all the Apostles, including Paul.

The very language of evangelists and apostles, which we now think so plain is all derived and moulded from these ancient rites ... without [which] it would be exceedingly obscure.... These typical rites thus hold a place in the economy of revelation from which they cannot be spared.... The New Testament is necessary to a right understanding of them, but equally necessary are they to a right understanding of the New Testament.²

For Sin

The death of Jesus was ‘for sin’ (Rom. 8:3), ‘for sins’ (1 Peter 3:18). He ‘died for our [emphasis added] sins’ (1 Cor. 15:3), and His death ‘takes away the sin of the world’ (John 1:29) and ‘condemned sin’ (Rom. 8:3). It was to ‘put away sin by the sacrifice of himself’ (Heb. 9:26). He was ‘made ... sin’ ‘For our sake’ (2 Cor. 5:21). The death of Christ takes on great meaning as God’s means to save us from our sins and explains really why God sent Him (Matt. 1:21). The shed blood of Christ (as a name for His death) is God’s instrument not only to save us from the consequences of sins but to ‘sanctify the people through his own blood’ (Heb. 13:12)—not only ‘forgiveness of sins’ by His blood (Heb. 9:22) but the very purifying of conscience (Heb. 9:14).

This is the crux (another word for cross) of the matter. The death of Christ won salvation for sinners. In Pauline language ‘saving grace’ by definition has the meaning ‘for sinners only.’ He came to die for that purpose. If we do not get that straight nothing else will matter much.

That does not mean that a carefully articulated doctrine of the atonement is necessary before a man can be called a Christian... But it does mean that, whether we can put it into words or not, our relationship to Christ and therefore to God depends on the way we view the Cross.³

The Biblical Expressions

Theologians and exegetes have combed the New Testament for words and expressions that interpret (for sinners) the meaning of the cross. These New Testament terms are the vocabulary by which the Author of our salvation deigned to convey to sinners the significance of the means He employed. They are not mere cultural expressions. A thoughtful review of New Testament terms declaring the meaning of our Lord’s death renders the matter quite clear. My own rather informal survey turned up the following short list. It is both precise and plain. Christ’s death is an offering, presented or offered up as a sacrifice, a vicarious sacrifice, precious, a price paid for redemption, a ransom, redemption from bondage, deliverance from curse, reconciliation and propitiation. It is obedience to God or unto death. It is justification or salvation. ‘The Lamb’ and ‘the cross’ also figure in the biblical interpretation. None of these is precisely equivalent to another. Some are used frequently, some only once or twice. Some are comprehensive as in themselves including most of the others.

There are two main reasons why these and some other interpretive, biblical expressions of the meaning of Calvary must be understood precisely. To gain a soundly Christian understanding of the central fact of our religion is of course the chief reason. The other is to defend against the fierce attack of modern liberal theologians and their allies among academic exegetes of the liberal establishment and their caricatures of the historic orthodox consensus referred to earlier. Orthodoxy has always found the necessity for atonement in human sin and divine wrath—both understood biblically; efficacy is grounded in substitutionary sacrifice; reconciliation in propitiation of God’s wrath as well as expiation of sin’s guilt. Liberalism finds all these teachings objectionable—even corrupt and hateful. For these reasons we now proceed to examine the material laid out. There is much at stake—the very nature of Christianity. Christianity and liberalism are not really forms of one religion but two very different religions, even though each in a different way is related to Christian history. (Note: unless noted otherwise biblical terms and passages cited in this section are from the Authorized or King James Version, mainly because the discussion was originally framed in those words and is still usually carried on in them.)

Sacrifice

This is the most comprehensive term covering every aspect of meaning of our Lord's death. In connection with Jesus' death sacrifice invariably translates thusia. In the Greek Old Testament, however, thusia translates eight different Hebrew words for different kinds of ritual sacrifices. It occurs about 350 times. The corresponding verb, thuō is used once by Paul of Christ's death, saying, 'Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed [thuō]' for us (1 Cor. 5:7) and once, Christ has given Himself for an 'offering and sacrifice [thusia] to God' (Eph. 5:2). Hebrews employs thusia of Christ's death five times (5:1; 9:23, 26; 10:12, 26). Significantly the very same language is used frequently in the New Testament (e.g. Mark 9:13, 49) in reference to sacrifices of Old Testament times, even heathen sacrifices. The sacrifice offered to God by Jesus is said to be 'better' (Heb. 9:23), one and 'once for all', a sacrifice 'of himself' (Heb. 9:26), and that there can be no other sacrifice (Heb. 10:26).

If the meaning of 'the cross' is sacrifice we must establish the biblical meaning of sacrifice—the meaning of a meaning, so to speak. We will forbear entering the extensive old debates on that subject. A century and more of 'scientific' research and philosophical reflections on sacrifice and sacrificial customs among the world's peoples produced some very interesting literature, most of it no longer read (The Golden Bough by J. G. Frazer and The Religion of the Semites by W. R. Smith), and a whole school of writers on comparative religion. This 'scientific' research and philosophical reflection produced little specific to help us understand the idea of sacrifice in either Testament and is today mainly irrelevant to the meaning of Jesus' sacrifice. The recent past has been blessed with the extensive and more fruitful writings of men such as Leon Morris and Vincent Taylor employing historical and linguistic evidences from the standpoint of biblical theology. This present chapter is indebted to them (not to neglect the older work on The Death of Christ by James Denny and others).

Let me cite first some very helpful guides from a somewhat earlier time.

J. J. Reeve, after a careful survey of the Old Testament phenomena of sacrifice and nine competing theories of the idea and meaning of sacrifice wrote:

The theory that the sacrifices were a vicarious expiation of sin and defilement, by a victim whose life was forfeited instead of the sinner's is the only one that will complete the Levitical idea of sacrifices.⁴

Similarly A. H. Strong in a vigorous summary said:

The true import of sacrifice, as is abundantly evident from both heathen and Jewish sources, embraced three elements, first that of satisfaction to offended deity, or propitiation to violated holiness; secondly, that of substitution of suffering and death on the part of the innocent for the deserved punishment of the guilty; and, thirdly community of life between the offerer and the victim.⁵

Strong asserts ‘We may classify Scripture representations of the atonement according as they conform to moral, commercial, legal or sacrificial analogies.’⁶ Yet he goes on to devote only two pages to ‘moral,’ ‘commercial’ and ‘legal’ but eleven to ‘sacrificial’ analogies, demonstrating fully that the sacrificial aspect of Christ’s work of atonement is most prominent in Scripture.⁷

Sacrifice and sacrificial customs among pagan peoples around the world have been studied extensively over the past 200 years. It has contributed little to understanding the meaning of the Levitical sacrifices and their antitype in Christ. Most of this literature, though very interesting (e.g. Frazer, The Golden Bough), is no longer read. It is largely irrelevant to our pursuit here.

There is, however, a large literature—much of it from a few generations back—which interprets the Levitical sacrifices, their meaning in relation to those who lived by them, their relation to Christ’s sacrifice and of His to us. W. A. Van Germeren’s article ‘Sacrifices and Offerings in Bible Times’ (Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, pp. 788–792) is a sound but very brief guide to study of current literature on the institution of sacrifice. Recent evangelical works of Systematic Theology characteristically say little about sacrifice as such.

Sacrifice enters biblical history ages before the time of Moses. The Mosaic system incorporated forms of sacrifice already employed both by Israelites and their heathen neighbors. Hence some remarks from excellent summaries of extensive studies by some of our theological forebears will serve to enlarge and support a sound doctrine of sacrifice—preliminary to understanding the doctrine of atonement by the death of Christ. I cite first a paragraph from McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia:

[T]he idea of sacrifice is a complex idea, involving the propitiatory, the dedication, and the eucharistic elements. [Propitiatory has reference to appeasing the divine displeasure with sin. Dedicatory to presentation of the repentant offerer to God. Eucharistic refers to ceremonial action of religious value.] Any one of these, taken by itself, would lead to error and superstition. The propitiatory would tend to the idea of atonement by sacrifice for sin, as being effectual without any condition of repentance and faith; the self-dedicatory, taken alone, ignores the barrier of sin between men and God, and undermines the whole idea of atonement; the eucharistic, alone, leads to the notion that more gifts can satisfy God’s service, and is easily perverted into the heathenish attempt to bribe God by vows and offerings. All three, probably, were more or less implied in each sacrifice, each element predominating in its turn; all must be kept in mind in considering the historical influence, the spiritual meaning, and the typical value of sacrifice.⁸

Excellent for comprehensive brevity and technical exactness as well as practical value is Calvin’s explanation of ‘what I have meant throughout the discussion by “sacrifice” and “priest.”’ He concludes:

The sacrificial victims which were offered under the law to atone for sins [Exod. 39:36] were so called, not because they were capable of recovering God’s favor or wiping out iniquity, but because they prefigured a true sacrifice such as was finally accomplished in reality by Christ alone; and by him alone because no other could have done it. And it was done but once, because the effectiveness and force of that one sacrifice accomplished by Christ are eternal, as he testified with his own voice when he said that it was done and fulfilled [John 19:30]; that is, whatever was necessary to recover the Father's favor, to obtain forgiveness of sins, righteousness and salvation—all this was performed and completed by that unique sacrifice of his. And so perfect was it that no place was left afterward for any other sacrificial victim.⁹

Perhaps the most respected and most quoted orthodox scholar of the early twentieth century on the subject of the meaning of the death of Christ was James Denney. In comment on the concept in Hebrews as the One sacrificed for sins forever he said:

There is the same sacrificial conception in all the references in the epistle to the blood of Christ... In all these ways the death of Christ is defined as a sacrificial death, or as a death having relation to sin: the two things are one.¹⁰

After taking note of the variety of Old Testament sacrifices mentioned and the many details of 'sacrificial language,' he concludes:

[N]o emphasis is laid on the distinguishing features of these various sacrifices, they are looked at simply in the expiatory or atoning significance which is common to them all.

They represent a divinely appointed way of dealing with sin.¹¹

These authorities, each from a slightly different but biblically informed evangelical point of view, affirm truly what is meant when the New Testament tells its readers the death of Jesus was a sacrifice paid to God for sin. Rather than parse the statements let us move on to examine the vocabulary of the Bible's own interpretation of the meaning of our Lord's sacrifice. In this examination the bearing of the Old Testament, directly through its prophecies, indirectly through its history and institutions, must have a part.

Scholars who take the Bible at face value generally agree. Writers who take the low view of Scripture characteristic of liberal Christian religion and overt opponents of Christianity have proposed many other interpretations of Jesus' death by crucifixion. The proposals of scholarly unbelievers have been as varied as ingenious: sincere martyr to a just cause, love of God, or love of man, crushed fanatical advocate of several lost causes, failed victim of a 'Passover plot' are some of the commonest.

An Offering, Something Presented to God

This word as noun (prosfora) or as verb, to offer (prosferō), designates the death of Christ over twenty times in the New Testament. Sometimes it refers to Old Testament sacrifices (Acts 7:42; 21:26) but also figuratively as Christians employ 'offering' today, to prayers, acts of devotion such as giving money for Christian work or benevolences (Acts 24:17; Rom. 15:16). In the Septuagint (which furnished the New Testament vocabulary for such things) it often translates derivatives of qarav, to present something, usually a sacrifice, to God (though sometimes tribute or a gift to a human authority). This is the source of the word 'Corban ... a gift' (Mark 7:11) often used in reference to Levitical sacrifice in both Testaments. It adds to 'sacrifice' the factor of presentation, i.e. usually by man to God. Most of the New Testament occurrences of offer-offering are either to Old Testament ritual sacrifice or the sacrifice of Calvary.

Blood, Blood of the Covenant

Six times Paul says salvation or redemption was secured for us by the blood of Christ (Rom. 3:25; 5:19; 1 Cor. 10:16; Eph. 1:7; 2:13; Col. 1:20), Peter, twice (1 Peter 1:2, 19). Peter's reference to the 'precious blood of Christ' suggests the special value of Christ's shed blood beyond the blood of other sacrifices. Hebrews affirms the same three times (9:12, 14; 10:19) as well as the Epistles of John and Revelation (1 John 1:7; twice in 1 John 5:6 and in v. 8; also Rev. 1:8). Hebrews 9:19–22 connects the shedding of Christ's blood with the bloody sacrifices of the Old Testament, connecting it with 'remission [or 'forgiveness' in many Versions] of sin.' In the Levitical sacrifices—especially the sin-offering and the trespass-offering—the raison d'être was remission of sin, not to deny worship and 'sacramental' obedience as aspects of the sacrificial offerings.

'[T]he blood of the covenant' (Exod. 24:8) or 'of thy covenant' (Zec. 9:11 kjv) or 'of the everlasting covenant' (Heb. 13:20 kjv) is a peculiar expression calling for some comment. Jesus' words of institution: 'this is my blood of the covenant ['new covenant' kjv], which is poured out for many unto remission of sins' (Matt. 26:28 asv) is another similar expression seeming to connect all such references to the covenant of the Lord's sacrifice of expiation and propitiation at Calvary. Circumcision was accompanied by bloodletting, of course.

The covenant of circumcision admitted Jews to the Abrahamic covenant whereby they became part of a chosen people. This, however, can hardly be what Jesus, Paul, Peter and the author of Hebrews had in mind by the blood of the covenant, though Strack and Billerbeck (vol. I, pp. 991, 992) report such views in Jewish circles. Rather the expression reports (Exod. 24:8) and harks back (Heb. 10:29 and 13:8) to the parallel whereby just as the blood of animals was shed on the occasion of inaugurating the 'old' Mosaic covenant (or covenant of law, or of Sinai) and was applied, part to a special altar and part to the people (see Exod. 24:4–8), so the new covenant (or Testament) was inaugurated by Christ's shed blood. An entirely new epoch of God's dealing with the human race was inaugurated by the cross. God is not imputing trespasses just now, having reconciled the world to Himself—at least this seems to be the teaching of 2 Cor. 5:19. (See later chapter on 'The Extent of the Atonement.')

A Ransom, or Price Paid for Redemption

Lutron (noun) and lutroō (verb) and the augmented forms, apolutrōsis and antilutron are the New Testament words. In each appearance the basic idea is a price paid (ransom) for a certain result (redemption).

Lutron appears only twice in the New Testament, sixteen times if the derived and augmented lutrōsis (three), apolutrōsis (ten), antilutron (once) are included.

The tron ending on nouns from the most ancient times 'denotes a means' usually with 'the sense of payment for something' (TDNT, IV, p. 340), especially the money to release prisoners of war or to release someone from a bond or to gain freedom for a slave. Liddell and Scott, Lexicon cites passages in Pindar, Aeschylus and Plato where it is lutron haimatos (ransom price of blood) 'in expiation, an atonement' (sub lutron).

The Old Testament background is to be found chiefly in the passages where payment of money takes place. Examples are releasing a Hebrew slave (Lev. 19:20), remission of the death penalty for capital crime in certain cases (Exod. 21:30), or restoration of alienated family property (Lev. 25:24, 26, 51, 52), or from bondage of various sorts, including the lifetime obligation of Levites (Num. 3:12, 46, 48, 49, 51).

The word lutron in the Gospels appears only twice, both times in the saying of Jesus: ‘the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many’ (Mark 10:45 kjv; parallel Matt. 20:28). ‘[G]ive his life’ (in death, of course) emphasizes voluntary self-presentation. ‘For’ is the Greek anti, meaning in the place of or instead of, in the room of—the strongest Greek preposition for substitution of one person or thing for another. Morris makes this point strongly, summarizing his ten pages of discussion of the evidences:

The natural meaning of the ransom saying is that Jesus’ death was in the stead of the many, He was to give His life instead of their lives.... It may or may not be easy to integrate this into some way the atonement works, but either way we are not justified in evading the plain sense of the Greek.¹²

Lutro-ō, cognate to lutron, though translated ‘to redeem’ in the three New Testament occurrences, means to redeem in a certain way, viz.: to ‘free by paying a ransom’ (Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Lexicon). The occurrence at Luke 24:21 is not directly relevant. At Titus 2:14, which says Christ ‘gave himself [the ransom price] for us to redeem [lutroō] us’ seems to refer to the saying of Mark 10:45. The third and only remaining verse puts the ‘precious blood, as of a lamb’ in contrasting parallel with ‘gold or silver,’ the usual price in human redemption of various sorts—either in Roman practice or Jewish Old Testament practice. This shows that providing payment by one for another, or others, is the governing idea.

Lutrōsis. The ending sis in Greek nouns often as here indicates the result of whatever the corresponding verb describes, hence, ‘a ransoming,’ ‘being redeemed’ (Liddell and Scott, Lexicon). In two New Testament cases it refers to the redemption that is awaited by Israel or Jerusalem (Luke 1:66; 2:38) understood in context as ‘salvation from [national] enemies’ (Luke 1:71). The third and last time it is employed in the New Testament (Heb. 9:12) represents Christ as the Great High Priest who not through ‘the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once [for all] into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption [lutrōsis].’ Redemption, or as noted earlier in this paragraph, salvation, is by the blood of Christ, the lutron presented as sacrifice in the sense of the Levitical sacrifices presented to God in the Mosaic system. The latter were typical (predictive) of the former. Hence the Levitical sacrifices had fulfilled their purpose when Christ was crucified. Therefore on the afternoon of that transaction at Calvary God Himself rent the old temple veil and thirty years later wrecked the temple that housed it, bringing the typical system to an end.

Apolutrōsis, an augmented form of lutrōsis, has been a subject of controversy among scholars, a controversy which for present purposes must be passed by. It is cogently argued that the idea of price paid for redemption inherent in lutron is brought into the word and the apo (away from) only augments the meaning. Whatever the case may be, in Romans 3:24, where it is rendered redemption (‘through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus’) apolutrōsis seems clearly to point to the result of ransom payment. John Chrysostom, for whom Greek was his first language and thus should have known what apolutrōsis means, commented, ‘And he said not simple ransoming, but ‘ransoming away,’ so that we no more come into slavery’ (comment on Romans 3:24, 25 in Homilies on Romans, no. vii).¹³

Antilutron. In the single New Testament occurrence of this rare word the text reads literally, ‘who gave himself a substitutionary ransom [antilutron] on behalf of [huper] all’ (1 Tim. 1:6). I shall reserve further discussion of this to later treatment of the extent of the benefits (i.e. for whom the price was paid) of the atonement in the chapter entitled ‘The Extent of the Atonement.’

Purchase or Price Paid for Redemption

Agorazō and exagorazō. The marketplace of a Greek city (as in Matt. 11:16; eleven times in New Testament) was called an agora (Latin, forum) from the earlier sense of a gathering of people (hence the medical term, agoraphobia, fear of crowds).

Though originally meaning to frequent the agora (forum), in New Testament times agorazo meant to buy, purchase, and is so uniformly translated. Twenty-four times it is employed in the New Testament in connection with purchase of a field (Matt. 27:7), grave wrappings (Mark 15:46), food (John 4:8). Six times believers are said to be ‘bought,’ in obvious reference to the atoning work of Christ in His death (‘bought with a price,’ 1 Cor. 6:20 and 7:23; the ‘Lord who bought them,’ 2 Peter 2:1 niv; ‘purchased men for God,’ Rev. 5:9 niv; ‘purchased out of the earth,’ Rev. 14:3 asv; ‘purchased from among men,’ Rev. 14:4 asv [emphasis added]).

Exagorazō is used only twice. The prefix *ex-*conveys the sense of out from, hence ‘bought out from,’ or as in most Versions ‘redeemed’ from under or from the curse of the law. The legal-commercial figure is clearly understandable without elaboration. The analogy in these two words is drawn more from universal world culture than Old Testament Jewish culture.

Some writers take notice of peripoiēomai, still another word for purchasing, used once with reference to the atonement, by Paul in his exhortation to the Ephesian elders, saying ‘Take heed ... to feed the church of the Lord, which he purchased with his own blood’ (Acts 20:28 asv; only one other occurrence, 1 Tim. 3:13). (There is disagreement as to the spelling of the verb in lexicons.) ‘To make one’s own, get for oneself’ is the agreed sense.¹⁴ This puts a unique slant on atonement—the price paid by the heavenly bridegroom to obtain a bride—comes to mind. See peripoiēsis and peripoiēō in the lexicons and Leon Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, pp. 56, 57.

Reconcile, Reconciliation, Atone, Atonement

The Greek terms are the verb katallassō and cognates including the noun katallagē, rendered in the Bible as reconcile, reconciliation, atone and atonement. It addresses the problem of our estrangement—alienation, enmity—toward God and His toward us as sinners.

The history of the words ‘atone’ and ‘atonement’ in English usage indicates that in the century before the 1611 Authorized Version of the Bible the words were usually understood as at-one and at-one-ment. Hence, the meaning of ‘atone’ and ‘atonement’ was precisely the same as reconcile and reconciliation. Atone and atonement in the sense of making amends to offended parties or appeasing someone's wrath was coming into use, however, as the marginal reading of the Authorized Version at Job 33:24 shows. By the time of Blackstone's Commentaries on English Law (1768) the sense of appease, propitiate was apparently the common one (Oxford English Dictionary).

It is therefore important to keep steadily before the mind that when atonement is met in the Authorized Version (kjv) of Romans 5:11 (a very important text) it means the same as reconciliation at 2 Corinthians 5:18 and reconciling at 2 Corinthians 5:19. (Atonement [kjv] in Old Testament sacrificial ritual texts will be treated shortly in connection with propitiation.)

Inaccurately, atonement has been widely adopted as the comprehensive name for all our Lord did in His Calvary work, thus making this diversion necessary.

Reconciliation (Katallagē) and reconcile (Katallassō) are from a Greek word-group rooted in alassō. This root and all related words have to do with change or exchange. They are words of relationship—of changed relationship. The previous existence of alienation, enmity, is presupposed.

Paul's use of these words evidently came over from his experience in Greek-speaking Judaism where 'If God renounces his wrath and is gracious again ... this is called a kattalagēnai [reconciliation] of God' (F. Buechsel, TDNT, I, 254). So, Paul having spoken of God's wrath in Romans 5:9, declares we are 'now justified by his blood' (same verse) and goes on to say we 'were reconciled to God by the death of his Son' using the word katallassō for 'reconciled.' Divine wrath against us makes reconciliation necessary for salvation, a reconciliation effected by Christ's death.

Sin caused estrangement for us in many respects: primarily, of course from God, as David felt very deeply (Ps. 51:3, 4) and as Paul frequently lamented: 'alienated from the life of God' (Eph. 4:18), even become enemies of our Creator (Rom. 8:7), 'ungodly ... sinners' under 'divine wrath' (Rom. 5:6, 8, 9). This is where we all were Paul says, before 'we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son' (Rom. 5:6–10).

We are, as born sinners, also alienated from our own primeval, created goodness, viz.: 'being dead in your trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh' (Col. 2:13; Eph. 2:1).

And being sinners at heart we are alienated in heart from other people, as manifest in envy, jealousy, malice, lust, slanderous talk, all graphically detailed in biblical history and law—nowhere more vigorously than in Jesus' oral denunciations of scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 15:1, 7, 19–20) and in Paul's Epistles (Rom. 1:28–32).

The biblical name for God's alienation from sinners is wrath. A teacher who would ignore this fact is not a good guide and any sinner who rejects it is beyond help, for until one knows in the heart through conscience that God's wrath leads to judgment and punishment he will not repent. This wrath toward sinners is the steady state of the same God who 'loved the world' in this manner, that 'he gave his only begotten Son' (John 3:16 kjv). John goes on to say, 'he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath [Gr. orgē] of God abideth [remains] on him' (John 3:36 kjv).

If there is anything liberal theology is agreed upon it is that the frequent biblical references to God's wrath (anger, displeasure, indignation, rage, vengeance) must be interpreted down to mean something like frustrated love. Or failing in that, wrath is an automatic operation of impersonal forces a bit like Hindu karma.¹⁵ Liberalism in all its varieties is sure there is no propitiation of divine wrath. Love and sovereignty cover all.¹⁶ ‘God is love’ is the ruling idea in liberalism. Further history of theology to the present hour proves that often as not when any preacher or theologian announces doubt or rejection of the wrath of God and its correlates, final judgment and hell, he has started down the slippery slope.

God is holy; he totally ... distances himself from sin ... corruption, and the resultant filth and guilt. He maintains his purity and rejects, fights against, and destroys that which would offend, attack or undo his holiness and love. God’s anger and wrath must always be seen in relation to his maintaining and defending his attributes of love and holiness, as well as his righteousness and justice.... A consequence of his wrath is vengeance, punishment, and death.¹⁷

Later I shall seek to show how ‘in wrath’ God ‘remembers mercy.’ It is true that He was loving and merciful to the human race long before the Son of God appeared to reveal the mercy of the Lawgiver as lawful. Whatever we say on this subject should in no wise weaken the force of the many warnings to ‘fear him who has power to destroy both soul and body in hell’ of which the most fierce is probably Hebrews 10:26–31. I have never read it publicly without an evident response of shock in the audience.

Wrath is God’s reaction to the breaking of His law. ‘The law was given by Moses but Grace and Truth came by Jesus Christ.’ Law and gospel (i.e. grace in Christ) are in both Testaments and every dispensation, but God’s wrath over broken law is a more explicit theme in the Old Testament than in the New Testament (see John 1:14–17; Titus 2:11; 1 Tim. 1:9, 10; Titus 3:3–6). Not strangely, God’s warnings and judgments are mixed with grace and promise usually—like the rainbow after the Great Flood. But there will be no rainbow about God’s throne (as in John’s vision of Rev. 4 and 5) at the final judgment of the ungodly: ‘And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away’ (Rev. 20:11 kjv; cf. 12–15). The banishment of Adam and Eve from the Garden; the curse on Cain; the Great Flood; the awful judgments of the plagues of Egypt and the destruction of Pharaoh and his armies; the end of Belshazzar and his drunken lords; the names of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, Hophni and Phinehas, and Achan; the destruction of Jerusalem and captivities of both Samaritan and Judean kingdoms; the fiery judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, and much more witness overwhelmingly to God’s wrath. To the same may be referred the pronouncements of Jesus on the Jewish cities of the time; the terrible end of Judas; the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, of Herod; and the threats of damnation by Jesus, Paul, Peter, Hebrews and John. The means by which God brings about a new relation of reconciliation is propitiation. We next attend to that matter.

Propitiation (Appeasement)

This important word is used only three times in the English Bible (kjv) and not at all in some recent Versions, viz.: ‘Whom [Christ Jesus] God hath set forth to be a propitiation [hilastērion] through faith in his blood, to declare his [God’s] righteousness for the remission of sins’ (Rom. 3:25 kjv). The sense of ‘propitiation’ (hilastērion) here is propitiatory sacrifice. ‘He [Jesus Christ] is the propitiation [hilasmos] for our sins, (1 John 2:2). ‘God ... loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation [hilasmon] for our sins' (1 John 4:10).

If there is any word to focus the specific meaning of Jesus' death on the cross it is our word 'propitiate' (and propitiation)—as opposed say to a more general term such as sacrifice and a word of different specific meaning such as expiate. Propitiate means to cause someone unfavorably inclined to become favorably inclined. Synonyms are 'appease, conciliate (one offended) (Lat. propitari, render favourable).' ¹⁸

Confusion between expiation and propitiation will be avoided as long as it is kept in mind that sins (offenses, trespasses, etc.) are expiated. Wrath, or the person who is wrathful is propitiated. One does not expiate God; one expiates sin. Nor does one propitiate sin; one propitiates God or His wrath. Since the same act of offering sacrifice viewed from the aspect of sin is expiation and, from the aspect of God, propitiation, confusion arises. Every successful propitiation therefore is also an expiation but propitiation and expiation are not the same. A pound of salt may be seasoning to a batch of my dill pickles but as regard the weeds in someone's asparagus bed it is a herbicide. It is not herbicide in pickles nor a seasoning in an asparagus bed. So in the passages that speak of Christ as 'propitiation for our sins' it is not the sins that are propitiated. Rather with reference to the wrath of God occasioned by the sins, God is propitiated.

It is no accident that the words expiate and expiation do not appear even once in the Authorized Version of 1611. The three occurrences of propitiation (Rom. 3:25; 1 John 2:2; 4:10) clearly refer to the death of Christ as having specific effect on God's attitude toward sinners—a change from disfavor to favor. In 1611 about everyone was able to accept that God is a just law-giver who has a care even for His creatures who do not love or obey Him. He could also hate both sin and sinner (e.g. Mal. 3:1; Rom. 9:13) yet love the same creatures supremely (John 3:16).

Liberal theology cannot accept that men are depraved through and through, deserving hell, or that God is absolutely holy, One who cannot break His own holy law by failing ultimately to enforce its penalties. Orthodox evangelical doctrine, anchored in all the Bible, proclaims all of a text like Exodus 34:5–7, 'the Lord, a God merciful and gracious ... forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, but who will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers,' etc. (see Num. 14:18).

That expiation of sin is necessary to propitiation of divine wrath may not be denied. What we protest is the exclusion of propitiation (appeasement) of wrath in accomplishment of reconciliation of the world and in redemption.

In liberal thought (which tends also to reject divine immutability and impassibility) the redemptive suffering in atonement was not on the cross but 'the forgiveness of sins ... implies a redemptive sin-bearing, a costly atonement, in the heart of God.' ¹⁹ Atonement is finished only in a sense of demonstration, in this thinking. A combination of covenant and incarnation is Karl Barth's notion of atonement, ²⁰ incarnation and 'super-history' for Brunner. ²¹ Brunner denies that God is reconciled in the atonement. ²² In both Barth and Brunner the depravity of man and the holiness of God seem to be more metaphysical distance than personal moral-spiritual alienation. Hence incarnation and covenant can secure reconciliation apart from satisfaction of the legal requirement and the propitiation of the wrath of a personal God.

Biblically speaking, this polarity within the divine Being can be accepted and explained on the basis of penal, vicarious propitiation and in no other way. So the liberal bias against the total depravity of man, the absolute holiness of God and penal-substitutionary atonement has also removed propitiation of the divine wrath from Romans 3:25; 1 John 2:2; and 4:10 where expiation replaces propitiation in the Revised Standard Version and nrsv as also the Revised English Bible. Even the New International Version (in an apparent mood of accommodation) has the nonspecific ‘sacrifice of atonement’ at Romans 3:25 and ‘atoning sacrifice’ at 1 John 2:2 and 4:10.

The group of Greek words involved in the three texts and many more where the idea of propitiation is present includes hilaskomai (Luke 18:13), hilasmos (Heb. 2:17), hilasterion. Note the hilas element in each. TDNT has thirty-four pages on this word-group. L. Morris devotes 161 pages of the 280 pages of The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross to this word group, devoting extended proof of the prominence of ‘The Wrath of God’ in Scripture. Both these authorities demonstrate that the sense of appeasement or propitiation, cannot be expelled from the word. C. H. Dodd agrees, but thinks nevertheless that when the New Testament says propitiate it means expiate.²³

On the basis of Dodd’s studies, D. M. Baillie acknowledges that these words mean appeasement and propitiation throughout Greek literature. Yet he flatly states that such cannot be the case in the New Testament.

The rendering ‘propitiation’ is misleading, being in accord with pagan usage but foreign to Biblical usage.... [H]owever we translate those terms borrowed from the Jewish sacrificial system, it is quite plain (sic), they undergo a transformation of meaning because of the really extraordinary setting.²⁴

Let us close on this point with Leon Morris’ words in summarizing his lengthy study on propitiation:

[T]he process of propitiation envisaged in the Bible is one which involves an element of substitution. In both the Old and New Testaments the means of propitiation is the offering up [as a sacrifice] of a gift, the gift of life yielded up to death by God’s own appointment. The Scripture is clear that the wrath of God is visited upon sinners or else that the Son of God dies for them. Either sinners are punished for their misdoings or else there takes place ... ‘that self-punishment which combines the activities of punishing and forgiving.’ Either we die or he dies. But ‘God commendeth His own love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us’ (Rom. 5:8).²⁵

A Penal, Substitutionary Sacrifice

That death in the human race is the punishment for sin rather than simply the end of life in a natural process was treated at length and in detail in connection with hamartiology. That understanding is assumed here.

a) First, let us try to clarify the idea of penal substitution. We begin by taking notice of two clear Scripture texts affirming the vicariousness of Christ’s death. They clearly assert or imply He received the punishment due us for our sin and sins. Isaiah 53:6 (kjv) says, ‘the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.’ As discussed in hamartiology, ‘iniquity’ (Heb. ‘Awon’) is the specific Hebrew word for punishment or deserved punishment (guilt) for sin, so rendered, for example at Genesis 4:13, ‘My punishment is greater than I can bear.’ Galatians 3:13 says, ‘Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us.’ The curse of the law was, of course, the punishment for breaking the law prescribed by the same law.

As we shall note again later, Anselm put a rather special slant on the doctrine of substitutionary-propitiatory atonement and sometimes it is supposed he was the first to phrase the doctrine in any form. But the doctrine, derived of course from Scripture, was stated by many of the Fathers and perhaps never better than by Augustine (d. 430) more than half a millennium before Anselm (d. 1109). Augustine’s understanding of the vicarious sacrifice suits the modern mind better than Anselm’s somewhat medieval appeal to the dignity of persons. In the Enchiridion on Faith, Hope and Love, written near the end of his life of seventy-six years he said:

He was called sin [2 Cor. 5:21] that he might be sacrificed to wash away sin. For, under the Old Covenant, sacrifices for sin were called sins [i.e. the sin-offering of Leviticus (Hos. 4:8)]. And He, of whom all these sacrifices were types and shadows, was Himself truly made sin. Hence the apostle, after saying, ‘We pray you in Christ’s stead be ye reconciled to God,’ forthwith adds: ‘for He hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him ... That is, [God] hath made Him a sacrifice for our sins, by which we might be reconciled to God. He, then, being made sin, just as we are made righteousness (our righteousness being not our own, but God’s, not in ourselves, but in Him); He being made sin, not His own, but ours, not in Himself, but in us, showed by the likeness of sinful flesh in which He was crucified, that though sin was not in Him, yet that in a certain sense He died to sin, by dying in the flesh which was the likeness of sin; and that although He Himself had never lived the old life of sin, yet by His resurrection He typified our new life springing up out of the old death in sin.’²⁶

These words on the subject by one of the greatest theologians between Paul and the Reformation show distinctly that the doctrine of justification as the imputed righteousness of Christ was no more ‘invented’ by Luther to explain his experience of forgiveness than substitutionary atonement was invented by Anselm or some other theologian. Both are necessarily derived from Scripture.

The aspect of substitution, ‘the just [Christ] for the unjust [sinful people]’ (1 Peter 3:18 kjv) is present in each of the previously treated seven aspects of the meaning of Christ’s sufferings and death. Now, we direct attention to the chief biblical emphasis: Jesus the Son of God died on the cross in our place, being punished fully and exhaustively for our sins. I shall usually let the biblical statements stand by themselves, for quite apart from context or exegetical argument they speak plainly. Though neither the word substitutionary nor vicarious appears anywhere in our Bible, the idea of vicarious sacrifice fills its pages.

In the first place, direct, categorical statements of penal substitution (in kjv) of Old Testament prophecy, Isaiah 53, viz.:

‘[H]e hath borne our griefs’ (v. 4) ‘and carried our sorrows’ (v. 4), ‘wounded for our transgressions’ (v. 5), ‘bruised for our iniquities’ (v. 5), ‘the chastisement of our peace was upon him’ (v. 5), ‘with his stripes we are healed’ (v. 5). ‘The Lord hath laid [heavily] on him the iniquity [punishment] of us all’ (v. 6), ‘for the transgression of my people was he stricken’ (v. 8). ‘Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him’ (v. 10), i.e. God’s plan for redemption was to bruise the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. God made ‘his soul an offering’ (v. 10), ‘he was numbered with the transgressors’ (v. 12). ‘[H]e bare the sin of many’ (v. 12).

I once published a book of exposition of Isaiah 52:13–53:12—fruit of several years of teaching exegesis of the Hebrew text.²⁷ As I wrote my heart was made full of thanks to God for its clear presentation of the saving work of our Lord in His suffering and death ‘in my place.’ The heart of the passage is Isaiah 53:5, which for exegetical purposes I translate ‘And he was pierced for our transgressions; crushed for our punishment; the chastisement of our peace [reconciliation] was upon him, and by his welt healing is for us.’ My closing remarks on the verse, citing two famous authors, were these: ‘Dr. Albert Barnes ... said concerning these words that if it is possible for human speech to describe substitutionary atonement, these words do so. Franz Delitzch—than whom few more learned scholars ever lived—said that such is the only possible construction to be placed on these words.’²⁸

Five select categorical statements from the New Testament now follow. They are sufficient to make the point that the Bible categorically affirms that the Son of God was slain in the sinner’s place. ‘[I]f one died for all, then were all dead’ (2 Cor. 5:14 kjv). ‘For ... he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God’ (2 Cor. 5:21). ‘Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us’ (Gal. 3:13). ‘[Christ] himself bore our sins in his body on the tree’ (1 Peter 2:24). ‘For Christ also suffered once for sins, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God’ (1 Peter 3:18).

In each of these quotations ‘for’ is a rendering of huper, Gr. ‘on behalf of.’ The usual word for ‘in the place of’ is anti, which we will treat shortly. In later Greek authors huper often signified ‘in place of, in the name of’ (Euripides, Polybius, Josephus) and ‘in papyri very often ... to explain that the writer is writing as the representation of an illiterate person.... Sometimes the meaning in place of merges with on behalf of—examples being Romans 9:3, 1 Corinthians 15:29, 2 Corinthians 5:14 (Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich, Lexicon, sub huper, p. 846). See Morris’ one-page note presenting evidence for the substitutionary meaning.²⁹

b) In the second place is the employment of the preposition anti in our Lord’s paramount declaration of the purpose of His earthly mission ‘to give his life ... for many’ (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45). If there is any preposition whose normal and usual sense is ‘to indicate that one person or thing is, or is to be, replaced by another instead of, in place of’ it is anti (Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich, Lexicon, sub anti, p. 72). Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich go on to cite Matthew 2:22 and Luke 11:11 as defining texts, viz.: ‘in place of [in the room of, kjv] his father Herod’; ‘instead of a fish ... a serpent.’ Of course if Jesus died ‘in the stead of [anti] many’ it was also ‘on behalf of them’ as in 1 Timothy 2:5. But nothing should redirect the force of anti in the two reports (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45) of Jesus’ express purpose of becoming a substitutionary sacrifice for sinners. We shall return to these two passages in connection with the extent of the atonement.

c) In the third place, the Old Testament sacrificial system clearly teaches the principle of atonement by substitution. No text categorically says animals were punished vicariously for the sinful men who brought them to the altar and slew them there. Rather, the principle was assumed in the language describing the events at the altar and their meaning. Furthermore, the New Testament assumes the same in employing various aspects of Old Testament ritual sacrifice in interpreting Christ's death.

Many times the Mosaic law states that any animal designated for sacrifice must have no physical defect (Lev. 22:21, for example; cf. 3:1, 6; 22:18–20; Exod. 12:5, et al). Peter relates this to the sinlessness of Jesus, divine-human sacrifice for our sin (1 Peter 1:19; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7, 8; Deut. 16:3, 4; Lev. 2:11). Professor W. G. Moorehead of United Presbyterian Seminary called attention to the fact 'the same word which the Septuagint translators used for "without blemish" is applied to Christ.'³⁰

The offerer always laid his hands on the head of the sacrificial animal before slaying it, designating it as his ritual substitute in what followed in the shedding of the animal's blood, slaughter and burning some or all the flesh on the altar. This matter is discussed at great length in commentaries, biblical and systematic theological studies by scholars of every sort. Extreme liberals, who suppose religious practice in Israel must mean the same as similar practices in Canaan, Arabia or Mesopotamia, have said the whole affair was to supply food for the gods or, in Israel's case, for the Lord, or simply as a present. Others have said the animal was provided in this manner to furnish food for a communion meal with God—the Lord—eating His portion symbolically on the altar, the offerer, His family and the priests eating their portions in the vicinity of the altar. A festive, convivial, communion-with-God aspect of Old Testament sacrifice is prominent in the 'peace-offerings' (kjv), of course. There is scriptural support for the gift and communion aspects. Yet it is plain the main reason for animal sacrifice was atonement as the book of Leviticus says at least twenty-five times.

It seems necessary at this point to introduce the significance of the Old Testament sacrifices somewhat more fully and of their typical connection with Jesus' sacrifice in our place. I can do this best by adapting material from some unpublished lectures on the book of Leviticus.

The rites of the book must be explained as having at least a threefold significance. First, God designed to use them as a means of grace to mediate fellowship with Himself, i.e. personal salvation to all of Israel's commonwealth who accepted His revealed word by faith. Their first significance was as revelation of the designated saving means for the times. They remained so till Jesus rendered it all out of date by fulfilling their typical meaning. That salvation is by faith grounded in revelation needs no further proof here aside from a single text, Romans 10:17. That the sacrifices mediated forgiveness is stated over and over, as for example Numbers 15:27 and Leviticus 4:26. Second, they were intended as predictive symbols, that is, types of the perfect and final act of God whereby He provided redemption (salvation) for all who in faith receive it. The first (the type) was made possible because of the value of the second (antitype). Third, in a practical way the bloody sacrifices made known to human consciences of that age and ours, to heaven as well as earth, the absolute necessity of an act of redemption by 'the Mediator'—one both fully human and fully divine. As it is written: 'in these sacrifices there is a reminder of sin year after year. For it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins ... offering repeatedly the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But ... Christ had offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins' (Heb. 10:3, 4, 11, 12 rsv; see also Heb. 9:23–28).

This meaning of Old Testament Levitical ritual is advanced in the New Testament by five different terms. They refer to Mosaic ritual as: 1) 'a shadow [skia] [emphasis added] of the good things to come' (Heb. 10:1 rsv); 'only a shadow [emphasis added] of what is to come; but the substance belongs to Christ' (Col. 2:17 rsv); 2) 'a figure [or parable] [parabolē] [emphasis added] for the time then present' (Heb. 9:9 kjv); 3) though employed of a person (Adam) not a ritual, Adam is said to be 'the figure [tupos] of him that was to come' (Rom. 5:14 kjv). Usually this Greek source of our word 'type' does not designate a predictive symbol such as theology means by 'type'. Of sixteen New Testament occurrences only possibly here does it do so. (See John 20:25; Heb. 8:5, where tupos means mark or copy, reversing type-antitype.) Hebrews 3–10 in various other ways draws parallels between Old Testament and New Testament, frequently pointing to typical connections. 4) Hebrews 9:24 says the Jewish holy places were a figure (kjv) (antitupon) of the heavenly sanctuary. But this does not relate to Old Testament typology and the same is the case with 5) Hebrews 9:23, in which temple and its furnishings are said to be 'copies' (rsv) (hupodeigmata) of 'heavenly things.'

Perhaps the most impressive statement is that Christ in heaven is now 'a minister of the true sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man' (Heb. 8:2 kjv), showing an eternal meaning, as a copy of heavenly design, for the Old Testament ritual at the sanctuary, if not of its permanent existence. Still today we study the Tabernacle, its rituals, ministers and furnishings to understand spiritual truth of eternal value.

Much discussion of this large subject is not feasible here. Let us close on the matter by pointing out that as 'critical' and thoroughly competent an expert in such matters as Roland De Vaux argued that the laying on of the offerers' hands on the sacrificial victim indicated a representative connection [not his terms] if not identification or strict substitution (Ancient Israel, 1961, pp. 449, 433) and asserted, 'By sacrificial rites ... the guilt of man is taken away' (p. 451).

The ideas of substitution and predictive symbolism present in the Old Testament ritual is treated in page after page by Patrick Fairbairn, perhaps the most authoritative writer on the typology of Scripture. I quote two brief passages. As one reads hold in mind that expiation of sin in Fairbairn's views also included propitiation of divine wrath, both ideas being present in the Hebrew word Kaphar, to cover, usually rendered 'to atone.' Patrick Fairbairn summarizes:

To make our meaning perfectly understood ... we shall go at once to ... the very core of the religion of the Old Covenant—the rite of expiatory sacrifice. That this was typical, or prophetically symbolical of the death of Christ, is testified with much plainness and frequency in the New Testament.... Yet, independently of this connection with Christ's death, it had a meaning of its own, which it was possible for the ancient worshipper to understand, and, so understanding to present through it an acceptable service to God.... It was in its nature a symbolical transaction, embodying a threefold idea; first, that the worshipper having been guilty of sin, had forfeited his life to God; then, that life so forfeited must be surrendered to divine justice; and finally, that being surrendered in the way appointed, it was given back to him again by God, or he became re-established, as a justified person, in the divine favour and fellowship.³¹

Fairbairn also points out:

For, in him alone was there real transference of man's guilt to one able and willing to bear it—in his death alone, the surrender of a life to God, such as could fitly stand in the room of that forfeited by the sinner—and in faith alone on his death, a full and conscious appropriation of the life of peace and blessing obtained by him for the justified. So that here only it is we perceive the idea of a true, sufficient, and perfect sacrifice converted into a living reality—such as the holy eye of God, and the troubled conscience of man, can alike rest on with perfect satisfaction. And while there appear precisely the same elements of truth in the ever recurring sacrifices of the Old Testament, and in the perfect sacrifice of the New, it is seen that what the one symbolically represented, the other actually possessed; what the one could only exhibit as a kind of acted lesson for the present relief of guilty consciences, the other makes known to us, as a work finally and for ever accomplished for all who believe in the propitiation of the cross.³²

(For further study see C. F. Keil, Manual of Biblical Archaeology [Antiquities], sec. 43, I, 275–284; W. G. Moorehead, Studies in Mosaic Institutions, pp. 138–146; G. Vos, Biblical Theology of Old & New Testaments, pp. 172–189. All three are reverent evangelical scholars. Keil, however, seems to be in error on the meaning of the death of the sacrificial victims though he discusses the issues reverently and learnedly. Vos's treatment is brilliant, claiming no more or less than the Old Testament texts allow. Moorehead is succinct, readable, quotable and preachable. J. Barton Payne, The Theology of the Old Testament (pp. 380–394), I think claims too much support in Old Testament narrative and Law for the vicarious principle, but is helpful.³³ Vos, Moorehead and Payne lean heavily on the work of Fairbairn. In teaching biblical hermeneutics I found it necessary to collect and read a short shelf of books by recent and current authors. Every large treatment of biblical hermeneutics has a section on typology. Each has something to say about the typology of Old Testament sacrificial rituals—not greatly different from the older sources cited above, many cases citing the older works.)

¹ The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary (Oxford University Press, 1971), p. 540.

² J. A. Seiss, Holy Types; The Gospel in Leviticus; A Series of Lectures on the Hebrew Ritual (Philadelphia, PA: The United Lutheran Publication House, n.d.), pp. 23, 24.

³ Leon Morris, The Cross in the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), pp. 5, 6.

⁴ J. J. Reeve, 'Sacrifice, in the Old Testament' in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, ed. J. Orr (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1939, 1943), p. 2650.

⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 723.

⁶ ibid., pp. 716.

⁷ ibid., pp. 716–728.

McClintock and Strong Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, prepared by John McClintock and James Strong, 12 volumes

⁸ John McClintock and James Strong, art. on ‘Sacrifice,’ in Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature vol. ix (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1968–1970), p. 227.

⁹ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion ii, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), p. 1442.

¹⁰ James Denney, The Death of Christ, rev. ed. (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1911), p. 216.

¹¹ ibid., p. 216.

TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, 10 volumes, Eds. G. Kittel & G. Friedrich, Trans. G. W. Bromiley

Liddell and Scott A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

¹² Leon Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), p. 35.

Bauer, Arndt, Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

¹³ John Chrysostom, in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers xiv, ed. P. Schaff (repr. Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), i, 11, p. 377.

¹⁴ Zerwick and Grosvenor, Grammatical Analysis of the Greek New Testament (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1981), p. 483.

¹⁵ W. C. Robinson, ‘Wrath of God,’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), p. 1196.

¹⁶ D. M. Baillie, God was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement (New York: Charles Scriber’s Sons, 1948), chap. vii.

¹⁷ G. Van Gronigen, ‘Wrath of God,’ Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996), p. 845.

¹⁸ Oxford English Dictionary.

¹⁹ Baillie, God in Christ, p. 190.

²⁰ Karl Barth, as set forth in the four volumes on ‘The Doctrine of Reconciliation,’ in his Church

Dogmatics, trans. G. W. Bromily (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1956, 1974).

²¹ Emil Brunner, The Mediator: A Study of the Central Doctrine of the Christian Faith, trans. Olive Wyon (Philadelphia, PA: The Westminster Press, 1947), p. 504.

²² ibid., p. 519.

²³ Moffat New Testament Commentary, Romans, on Romans 3:24, 25 and The Bible and the Greeks (London, 1935), p. 95 as cited by Baillie, see below and Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, p. 178.

²⁴ Baillie, God in Christ, p. 188.

²⁵ Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, p. 185.

²⁶ Augustine, Enchiridion on Faith, Hope and Love, trans. J. F. Shaw, ed. Henry Paolucci (Chicago: Regnery, 1961, 1966), pp. 51, 52.

²⁷ Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory of the Lord's Righteous Servant (1958, 2001). See bibliography.

²⁸ ibid., p. 74.

²⁹ Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, p. 59.

³⁰ W. G. Moorehead, Studies in Mosaic Institutions (Dayton, OH: The Otterbein Publishing House, 1901), p. 140.

³¹ Patrick Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture i (Smith and English: Philadelphia, PA: 1854) vol. 1, p. 68.

³² ibid., p. 69, see also ii, pp. 299–317.

³³ J. Barton Payne, The Theology of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1962).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (546). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

16

The Meaning of the Death of Christ (III): Atonement by Vicarious Satisfaction

Sophisticated Rejection

At a certain stage of my education for the ministry I studied philosophy and religion for three years in classes under the very competent instruction of a recent Ph.D. from Yale Seminary and the University department of philosophy. By that time we held one another in some affection, so after class on the last day we spent some minutes in conversation. With my feelings (I suppose) exposed in body language and voice I asked this man a question designed to give me some assurance we were Christian brothers with common faith in the Savior: ‘Dr Miller,’ I inquired, ‘Can we agree that everything we are and hope to be forever was secured for us by our Lord’s death at Calvary?’ The kind professor paused for several moments in deep thought, then gave this reply: ‘It is true that the center of the Christian religion is the cross.’ I went my way sorrowful, for he had evaded an opportunity to confess Jesus, as a believer in the saving power of the blood of Christ. He went on to spend the remaining years (he was not yet thirty) until retirement in one of the most ‘liberal’ seminaries in North America and finally in ‘Seminex’ the theological seminary established mainly with professors expelled from Concordia, Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod of St Louis because of their liberal theology. We corresponded annually with Christmas greetings for several decades.

Layman’s Faith

Many years later I used to buy eggs from an aged, neighboring farm wife, who with her husband were (and are) devout Roman Catholics. ‘Ed’ always used my incursion into the even tenor of their way to raise the subject of religion, eternal life, death and heaven. Of course, as frequent opportunities came, I quoted the Scriptures about salvation and as skilfully as I am capable, presented the gospel. Then, I proposed to this earnest seeker, ‘Ed, will you agree with me that when you get safely to heaven you will not jump up and shout “I made it!” but you will think “I am here not by virtue of anything I have done for God but by what He has done for me. And He did it through my Savior Jesus Christ”?’ The old farmer soberly thought a moment and then with a bright smile softly spoke: ‘That is right. That’s the way it will be.’

The first conversation illustrates the gulf between Christianity and apostate, liberal Protestant religion, the second the much obscured but essential agreement of historical orthodoxy, deeply felt, about the meaning and importance of what our Lord did for us. The Council of Trent did not quite destroy that faith in the hearts of many of the people over whom its dogmatic counsels have reigned these 400 years.

Atonement by vicarious satisfaction is present to some degree in all New Testament interpretation of Calvary’s meaning even though there is great variety in the ways it is expressed. There are many passages in the Bible that in theological language define the doctrine essentially, but none comprehensively, as most theological writers agree. The Bible furnishes all the materials needed for theology, but it is a human task, under the Spirit’s illumination to formulate doctrines and to relate them to the whole counsel of God and to our lives. So it must be with the critical matter of the meaning of the death (and life as well) of our Lord.

The Protestant Achievement

We may perhaps regard the Protestant form of the doctrine of atonement as formulated early in the Reformation era and stated in several creeds, confessions and other summaries as the likely ne plus ultra of growth in the formulation of a thoroughly adequate statement of the doctrine. There is truly a consensus among evangelical Protestants, with some variations likely to remain moot. To parties in polemical debate no variation, of course, seems slight. The consensus is largely shared, as noted in chapter 11, with Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox theology. Though neither has uniform views held by all within the tradition, both tend to see the atonement as less than ‘perfect.’ It is the specific teaching of the Council of Trent ‘that original sin is removed by the merits of Jesus Christ only, and that through baptism the merits of Christ are applied to adults and children.’¹ Further, ‘[E]ternal life is both a gift or grace promised by God and a reward for his own good works and merits.’² Among Calvinists there is some disagreement as to whether the vicarious satisfaction was for the elect only or for every man, woman and child in the human race, and if so, in what sense. We shall have more to say about this Calvinist controversy in a later chapter.

Reformation theology was mainly about soteriology—provision of salvation wholly by God in Christ, reception wholly by faith. The main issue was justification and all the blessings of salvation with it. The growing desire of the time was experience of salvation in the heart, an inward conscious assurance of salvation that the paraphernalia of the medieval Roman Church was not providing because it did not preach a finished work of Christ and the sufficiency of faith to appropriate it.

Though stated in the main in the eleventh century (Anselm) and somewhat improved in the thirteenth (Aquinas) it was not well understood or preached by the church to the masses who were spiritually famished for want of it.

Luther’s Beginnings

Luther’s proclamation of justification by faith and faith alone, as far as man’s receiving it is concerned, is well known. This justification by faith rests precisely on an atonement by vicarious satisfaction that is finished as to time and complete as to its provisions for all damage caused by the fall. Though Luther never wrote a treatise on atonement by satisfaction, he referred to it constantly. Paul Althaus in his fine work The Theology of Martin Luther has shown with dozens of fully documented citations from the Weimar Edition of Luther’s Works and the English translation, Luther’s Works, that Luther held firmly to the theory of atonement by substitutionary satisfaction as we know it today.³ Martin Luther wrote more theology in his rather short life as an evangelical controversialist, preacher, pastor and professor than many in his profession today read in a lifetime. Yet, despite the wide range of his interest and variety of expression, his views can be summarized. Despite developmental stages there are constants in his doctrine of reconciliation and redemption.

He incorporates Anselm’s doctrine of atonement but improves it. A holy God cannot simply forget about His law and wrath for broken law and forgive sinners unless His righteousness is satisfied. Christ is the One who by taking the sinner’s place provides that satisfaction. As Althaus summarizes Luther:

Christ makes satisfaction for sinners in a twofold way. He fulfils the will of God expressed in the law; he suffers the punishment of sin, the wrath of God. Both are done in our place and for our benefit. . . . Christ has not only fulfilled the law, but he has suffered the punishment which the law pronounces over transgressors. Only this fully satisfies God’s righteousness.⁴

In Cur Deus Homo Anselm had proposed only two possibilities for satisfying the requirements of a holy God's righteous law—either punishment for breaking it or satisfaction by keeping it.⁵ Luther asserted that satisfaction took place through punishment—not of the sinner but of the sinner's substitute.

This is presented by Luther in a profusion of declarations of God's grace, mercy and compassion for the sinner's distress.

It has been pointed out that Luther took the position 'in all stages of his writing' that the article, 'descended into hell,' is part of the agony on the cross and that in this Calvin and most Reformed agreed.⁶ Yet 'Luther also teaches a descent into hell after his death'⁷ which brought him trouble later. 'In spite of this, there is no doubt that Luther's own personal understanding of Christ's descent into hell relates to his passion, Gethsemane and Golgotha.'⁸

Luther, like many pulpiteers before and since, sometimes portrayed the redemptive work of Christ as a battle against Satan and other demonic powers. Saint Paul, of course, does so also. God, he says, used these powers in His own service to bring about the events of Calvary—another ancient theme that we have already noticed. In Luther's large commentary on Galatians he expounds this understanding. Yet he does not advocate anything like a satanic ransom.

Luther also had very much to say about our being confronted with Christ's victory when we hear the Word preached; Christ meets the powers of evil in our hearts and we embrace Him by faith. Neo-orthodox writers refer to this as the 'contemporaneity' of Christ. They relish this aspect of Luther's teaching and employ it vigorously in promoting an existentialist interpretation of Christ's power to save us poor folk whose main problem is self-alienation. This of course is not what Luther intended.

This is the language of Lutheran orthodoxy to the present hour. As one who occasionally attends services in a congregation of the Lutheran Church Missouri Synod, I can assure the reader this theology is prominently proclaimed in the liturgy and enshrined in dozens of hymns (some singable!) and announced every month in the rite of the Lord's Supper. The well-marked pages of the orthodox Lutheran works in my library certify the continuing health of Luther's doctrine of atonement by vicarious sacrifice among orthodox Lutherans.

Melanchthon's Common Places (Loci Communes) and the Lutheran Confessions

Melanchthon, Luther's disciple and systematizer (d. 1560), in his summary of evangelical doctrines, Loci Communes (final ed. 1555),⁹ added little to Luther but put Lutheran doctrines in rational order and succinct language, as the Augsburg Confession (1530) did seminally, in a brief article on justification (Part I, art. iv).¹⁰

The Lutheran Reformation developed the essential elements of the Protestant consensus on atonement a bit ahead of the Calvinistic developments at Geneva and other cities of the Reformed. It appears in the Augsburg Confession (1530) in a section on justification by faith, saying in part: 'Men ... are justified by grace for Christ's sake through faith, when they believe that they are received into favor, and their sins forgiven for Christ's sake, who by his death made satisfaction for our transgressions. This faith God imputes for righteousness before him' (Augsburg Confession, Part I, art. iv). No mention is made here (or in Luther's Catechisms) of Christ's meriting eternal life for us vicariously by His doing God's will and keeping of His law (active obedience). Yet, Melancthon in several sentences (no extended treatments) implies this in Loci Communes. The Formula of Concord (1576), last of the primary Lutheran creeds, expressly, but without employing the words vicarious or substitutionary, many times affirms the full doctrine of substitutionary satisfaction.

One example among many declares that 'Christ is truly our righteousness ... the whole Christ according to both natures, to wit: in his sole, most absolute obedience which he rendered to the Father even unto death, as God and man, and thereby merited for us remission of all our sins and eternal life' and goes on to quote Romans 5:19 (The Formula of Concord, Art. III, par. I).¹¹

All the salient features of the Reformation doctrine of atonement are present in the Formula. God became incarnate Jesus Christ to mediate our salvation. He did so as God-man, Mediator of God to man and man to God. As God, He had no obligation to the law to meet the ritual and ceremonial requirements of law but did voluntarily fulfill them actively as our Substitute.

This is often designated Christ's active obedience. He also vicariously assumed the penalties for man's breaking of God's law by suffering and dying in our stead. The Formula of Concord mentions the resurrection after the obedience and the Passion to affirm that the resurrection brought the work of atonement to successful conclusion. Nothing more needs to be done. It is finished. Ne plus ultra. There is no further sacrifice for sins (Heb. 10:26).

It has been objected frequently that Christ's life of active obedience was for Himself as a member of the race, and therefore only His 'obedience unto death,' passive obedience, was involved in satisfaction for sin. I shall not enlarge this already lengthy discussion save to point to the twenty-seven pages of Berkouwer's book.¹² He surveys the history of the discussion through Protestant dogmatics. I endorse his view that the Bible 'designates the work of Christ as obedience' both by His life (Heb. 5:8) and by His death (Phil. 2:8).

Much of this was shared by the Roman Church, but the Reformation applied the logic of the finished work of redemption in rejecting the notions of reiteration, repetition, reapplication, etc., brought out to defend the so-called 'sacrifice of the [Christian] altar,' or the Mass. Any place for merit for salvation from sin—pre-baptismal, post-baptismal or otherwise—was also thereby thrown out. 'Jesus paid it all' making satisfaction for our sins by taking the penalty in our place and providing title to eternal life by obeying the law of God in our place.

Anselm worked out most of these features in Cur Deus Homo (why the God-man) 400 years earlier, though he held it was God's majesty that rendered sin's debt infinite rather than God's justice and said nothing of the lifelong obedience of Christ as an aspect of vicarious satisfaction. The Reformers do not reject Anselm's thought on the subject; they complement it.

It would take us too far into historical theology to trace out the origins and later development of the active obedience doctrine. The active and passive obedience of Christ are treated in Calvin's Institutes as aspects of one obedience (II.121–123, especially see 12.3).

Roman Catholic Response

In the Reformation era Rome responded to the Reformers' soteriology of atonement by making refinements of their doctrine of merit and of the sacrifice of the Mass. These developments effectively separated evangelical religion from Rome to the present—as far as formal theology is concerned. Four hundred years have found no via media or compromise and the future will likely find none, for the Reformation had rediscovered apostolic Christianity in a purer form.

Rome responded to the Reformers specifically at the Council of Trent (1545–1563). The severity of the language used does not detract from the great plainness of speech. Rome is as far as east is from west from the plain statements of Hebrews as to the perfection and once-for-all character of the atonement. The first three 'Canons on the Most Holy Sacrifice of the Mass' are herewith quoted from an authoritative source and speak for themselves.

Can. 1. If anyone says that in the Mass a true and real sacrifice is not offered to God, or that the act of offering is nothing else than Christ given to us to eat: let him be anathema.

Can. 2. If anyone says that by these words: 'Do this for a commemoration of me,' Christ did not make the apostles priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests might offer [in the Eucharist] His [Christ's] own body and blood: let him be anathema.

Can. 3. If anyone says that the sacrifice of the Mass is only one of praise and thanksgiving, or that it is a mere commemoration of the sacrifice consummated on the Cross, but not one of propitiation; or that it is of profit to him alone [the priest, sometimes others] who receives; or that it ought not to be offered for the living and dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities: let him be anathema.¹³

These canons are keyed to pronouncements of the Council, which purport to prove by arguments drawn from Scripture and tradition that the sacrifice of the Mass is 'a visible propitiation for the living and the dead.'

The chief text of Scripture relied upon by Roman theologians at that time was Malachi 1:10, 11, and more recently Hebrews 8:3. For the official pronouncements and arguments refer to Session xxii, 17 September 1562, chapters 1 and 2. For a recent pedagogical exposition in a text for instruction of priests see Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma.¹⁴

Ott cites the canons and decrees of Trent along with other dogmatic pronouncements. The new Catechism of the Catholic Church sets forth these teachings so very objectionable to all evangelical believers but does so without any of the anathemas and much more subtly—even sweetly. But on these points Rome has not officially budged, however much rapprochement may be advocated or even achieved by individual theological writers.

Socinianism (Revived Pelagianism)

Opposition to both Reformation and Roman anthropology arose early in the epoch of Reformation in the form of Socinianism. Socinianism represents the renaissance rejection of Augustinian anthropology professed by the Roman Church and recovered fully by both Lutheran and Reformed (Calvinist) theology and preached in both communions. Socinianism was essentially a revival of ancient Pelagianism and forerunner of the optimistic view of modern liberalism which views man as morally good at heart, to be saved by good environment, teaching, example, etc. All God requires for forgiveness is repentance by the sinner. In such a case atonement is unnecessary, even immoral. The pattern for salvation (forgiveness) is the Parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11–32) not the cross of Christ. This is to be found in the literature of ‘liberal’ religion from Socinus to John Hick (who espouses it vigorously).

Defining Factors in a Biblically Controlled Doctrine of Atonement

We are indebted to Jaroslav Pelikan for promoting the flash of insight that Christian tradition is essentially the history of exegesis of the Bible. We shall not seek to escape tradition in interpreting atonement in the New Testament. Vernon Grounds in an ingeniously structured and valuable article on ‘Atonement’ concludes with what he calls ‘postulates of New Testament Soteriology’—meaning factors that must be dealt with in a sound theology of atonement.¹⁵ These are all involved in the tradition Pelikan remembers¹⁶ and which we have been expounding in these pages. Let us try to sort them out. I acknowledge they somewhat overlap one another.

1. In the first place the doctrine of atonement taught in the Bible will not be grasped unless one mentally and spiritually enters the thought-world of the whole Bible. The comprehensive term for the event of Calvary is sacrifice. The idea of sacrifice must be understood as the Messiah of Israel understood it. He was sent initially only ‘to the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Matt. 15:24). Twelve Jewish Apostles, steeped in Old Testament rituals and ideas, were the ones to whom Messiah explained the idea (Matt. 10:6). ‘[The] oracles of God’ are ‘entrusted’ to ‘the Jews’ (Rom. 3:2) and we must learn from the Jewish Apostles who wrote our New Testament what the ‘life’ given ‘as a ransom for many’ (Matt. 20:28) truly means. Old Testament ritual religion was a religion which expressed itself in five kinds of ritual sacrifice, offered in elaborate ceremonies enacted every day at the national sanctuary and which consumed a very considerable portion of the ‘gross national product’ in required, stated, national assemblies three times a year, besides many other occasions.

2. In the second place to understand the doctrine of atonement scripturally one must bring to the project a ‘framework of plausibility’ which will admit the truth from whatever quarter and whoever speaks it—however previously unesteemed. All that Paul says about the foolishness of the cross to the worldly mind in the early chapters of 1 Corinthians is apropos Christ’s atonement in particular. Vicarious sacrifice, the presence in God both of love for sinners and hate for sinners, absolute holiness with everlasting love in the God of redemption: all these must be admitted to the framework of reality which one regards as plausible. The literate Pharisee must somehow become willing to heed the language of rustic Galileans, One of whom reminded them that (Matt. 21:16 kjv) ‘Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou [God] hast perfected praise.’

3. A sound soteriology (with atonement central to the project) must start with a sound anthropology, i.e. a doctrine of man and sin: created a holy being, in the image of God, but as fallen not only corrupt and guilty but under penalty of death, unable in any respect to save himself—not in a position to respond successfully to good example or good advice—utterly in need of a Savior not a self-improvement program. Rescue is necessary.

4. A sound soteriology (doctrine of atonement at center) will proceed with full acceptance of all the attributes of the divine nature, in particular not mitigating, reducing or slighting God’s holiness and justice (call it personal integrity) on the one hand nor His love and mercy on the other. God's intrinsic nature both calls for an atonement by vicarious satisfaction and explains it. The necessity for such an atonement was frequently affirmed by Jesus. Matthew 16:21 explains why He set His face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem. 'Love found a way' but it was holiness demanded it.

A. H. Strong introduced the cosmic Christ, or immanent Logos idea into late revisions of his Systematic Theology. The result was some glaring inconsistencies which must be rejected. This was the judgment of C. F. H. Henry in his doctoral dissertation.¹⁷ In spite of these elements in his discussion of atonement, Strong's presentation is of such excellence as to compel me to read it many times throughout the years I have taught Christology and soteriology. His way of stating atonement by vicarious satisfaction he called 'the Ethical Theory.' The following is the heart of it:

The ethical theory holds that the necessity of the atonement is in the holiness of God, of which conscience in man is a finite reflection. There is an ethical principle in the divine nature, which demands that sin shall be punished. Aside from its results, sin is essentially ill-deserving ... as there is an ethical demand in our natures that not only others' wickedness, but our own wickedness, be visited with punishment, and a keen conscience cannot rest till it has made satisfaction to justice for its misdeeds, so there is an ethical demand of God's nature that penalty follow sin.¹⁸

He goes on to cite Shakespeare's will and passages from seven of his dramas to demonstrate the commitment of that genius to salvation by Jesus' merit, not our own, and commends the excellent work of James Denney.¹⁹ Then he concludes:

In God this demand is devoid of all passion, and is consistent with infinite benevolence. It is a demand that cannot be evaded, since the holiness from which it springs is unchanging. The atonement is therefore a satisfaction of the ethical demand of the divine nature, by the substitution of Christ's penal sufferings for the punishment of the guilty.²⁰

Strong elsewhere points out, as have many others and each believer's conscience confirms, that only this kind of atonement sets the conscience free from perpetual feelings of guilt and remorse. He goes on to say, 'This substitution is unknown to mere law, and above and beyond the powers of law. It is an operation of grace that does not suspend the law, but ... fulfils it.'²¹

It is evident to me that this has been the understanding of the human predicament and what God has done to relieve it in every powerful revival, every vigorous missionary movement and successful Christian effort at moral improvement of individual people and of the mass of mankind.

5. Neglect no clear, specific biblical representation of the meaning of the cross of Christ. Some Scripture speaks of God as 'just and justifier' in achieving atonement for guilt or offenses or trespasses. These are juridical terms—i.e. related to law and jurisprudence. A large number suggest the condition of slavery and deliverance from it as ransom, purchase and redemption. A few speak of the work of atonement as conquest over the powers which oppress, corrupt, or suppress or terrify us—death, fear of death, the devil, etc. All of these modes of speaking accommodate eternal truths to the human scope of understanding, and when considered against the background of the whole of Scripture, convey plain truth.

6. Perhaps the most important mode of New Testament representation, especially in the Epistles of Paul is that of a human court. The idea of God as Judge (or better, ruler) is prevalent in the whole Bible (Gen. 18:25; Judg. 2:18; 11:27; Pss. 50:6; 68:5; and on to James. 5:8 and the great scenes in Rev. 5, 6, 20). (The Hebrew words rendered ‘judge’ refer to all the functions of rulers—legislative and executive as well as judicial. We think of civil judges only as presiding officers in courts of law.) The Last Judgment up ahead is similarly witnessed to in many texts (such as Ps. 1:6; Eccles. 12:14, etc., in the Old Testament; and Rom. 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:13–15; Heb. 10:27). Paul in presenting ‘the human predicament’ vigorously pursues the fact of universal human sin, corruption of being and guilt throughout his first chapters in Romans. He brings every class of mankind before the judgment seat of God where the whole world is pronounced guilty (Rom. 3:19, 23). At this point, in the latent atmosphere of a court room, Paul introduces the means whereby God, ‘who will by no means clear the guilty’ (Exod. 34:7; Num. 14:18), brought divine holiness and perfect justice into harmony with His mercy and love through the work of Christ on the cross—Romans 3:24–26:

... and are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as a propitiation by his blood, to be received by faith. This was to show God’s righteousness, because in his divine forbearance he had passed over former sins. It was to show his righteousness at the present time, so that he might be just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus.

The salient terms are all directly drawn from or applicable to legal affairs and court proceedings—grace (charis); redemption (apolutrōsis), ‘as a gift’ (‘freely’ kjv), i.e. without cost (dorēan); justified, i.e. declared innocent (dikaio-ō); justifier or ‘one who pronounces innocent’ (dikaiounta, present, active participle referring to God the Judge of all the earth). In this typically Pauline climactic, verbal crescendo the release from tension comes by announcement that God set forth Christ Jesus as a propitiation (propitiatory sacrifice, hilastērion). I have elsewhere in this section discussed what this word for atonement means. The point to be underlined here is that this paramount term in the New Testament interpretation of atonement falls in the context of a court of justice and is without a doubt the primary New Testament explanatory vehicle for atonement.

7. We must not fail to note that side by side with the legal representation of atonement Scripture also frequently represents the atonement as a change in personal relationships. In fact the very word ‘atonement’—though now usually signifying making amends, making up for wrongs done, appeasement—in the single occurrence of the word atonement in the Authorized Version (1611) means at-one-ment, as in Middle English.²² The same Greek word is elsewhere rightly rendered reconciliation. So, both propitiation of the wrath of the court and restoration of friendly relations with the Father God are proper to the atonement. Yet from Paul’s representation in Romans (cf. 3:24–26 with 5:11 and the rest of chap. 5) truth requires that propitiation be understood as cause and reconciliation (at-one-ment) as effect. Even if propitiation of wrath be reduced to expiation of sin (the cause of wrath) the connection remains the same.

8. There can be no diminution or dilution of the wrath of God, the background against which atonement was effected. This is true whether God’s wrath be considered in a legal sense (the wrath of the law of God) or personal (offended deity).

In the biblical proclamation love springs forth from the divine being spontaneously. ‘God is love.’ Wrath does not; it is called forth by the personal wickedness of His creatures. If there were no sin in the world there would be no divine wrath. Wrath is not an attribute of God but a name for the divine response to sin.

As reconciliation (at-one-ment) is on the personal level, so is the estrangement involved in the wrath pacified in propitiation. God is a truly offended party, even though he does not cease to love—yet. Divine wrath is a constant on sin and sinners, as John 3:36 says of those who disbelieve, ‘the wrath of God remains on him’—this only a few lines removed from ‘For God so loved the world, that he gave his only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life.’ ‘The most poignant word about God’s punishment is that it is the wrath of the Lamb who took upon himself and bore the sins of the world.’²³

There are sixty-five pages on the concept of divine wrath (orgē) in TDNT, almost all of it supportive of the views expressed above.²⁴ It should be added that those features of human wrath, which are sinful (‘Be angry and do not sin,’ Eph. 4:26), are of course not present in divine wrath, any more than sinful features of some human love. The steady age-long affirmation of ‘the impassibility of God’ is not likely to be reversed. God is always supremely ‘God over all, blessed for ever’ (Rom. 9:5). To speak either of the love or wrath (or hate) of God is to speak analogically. When the Bible says, ‘The arm of the Lord is not short’ the human analogy is called anthropomorphism; or ‘The Lord was sorry that he had made man,’ the analogy is called anthropopathism. Yet love and hate stand for that which is real and personal in a real and personal God.

Is it possible that the notion of divine wrath and propitiation of wrath are crude holdovers from Israel’s beginnings or imported ideas from the heathenism of the ancient world? ‘Wrathful deities are so vividly present in the consciousness of all peoples that attempts have been made to explain every cult as an effort to anticipate or soften the anger of the gods’ (H. Kleinknecht, TDNT, ‘orgē,’ V, p. 385). This was the case with the Greeks and Romans as any one who has read any of the classics knows. Augustine built his case for Christianity, in major part, on the foolish measures the pagans of ancient time took to appease the gods (City of God, Books I–VI). Augustine also took notice that several schools of philosophy, especially the Platonists, broke free of this superstition. Kleinknecht points out, however, the philosophers spoke only for themselves for ‘not only in poetry but also in popular belief ... the wrath of the gods demands expiation and expresses itself in punishments’ (TDNT, V, p. 387). The O.T. from beginning to end balances God’s wrath as response to sin with His readiness to forgive His people—even Ninevites—in response to repentance and obedience, always as a holy God. The New Testament vocabulary in discussing divine wrath pointedly avoids the words the Greek literature used for the wrath of pagan deities. G. Stahlin points out like the Septuagint ‘the NT never uses the terms of Greek poetry for God’s wrath’ (TDNT, ‘orgē,’ V, p. 422). The amazing coverage of this subject—sixty-five pages by six learned authors (TDNT, V, pp. 382–447)—shows that while divine wrath and propitiation of the same appear in all stages of biblical religion and in the polytheistic religions of antiquity, the wrath of Israel’s God is offended holiness. The wrath of the gods of Greece and Rome was rooted in the reflected passions of the people who worshipped them. The wrath of a holy God is, however, plainly holy wrath and greatly to be feared.

The doctrine of sin furnishes the traditional (and biblical) category of ‘sins that cry to heaven for vengeance.’ These are chiefly: (1) oppression of the poor and disadvantaged (Prov. 17:5; 21:13); (2) oppression of defenseless foreigners, widows and orphans (Exod. 22:21–24); (3) injustice to wage-earners (withholding wages) who need their earnings to procure daily bread (Deut. 24:14, 15); (4) sins of sexual impurity and perversion (homosexuality, bestiality) (Lev. 18:24–30), (5) the failure of civil magistrates to punish murder (Num. 35:31–33; Deut. 21:1–9); and (6) idolatry. The Lord is fierce in declaring His supreme anger at all idolatry and severest punishment for those who pervert worship by this means. This sin is the subject of the first two of the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20:1–6). ‘My glory I will not give to another’ (Isa. 48:11) is terse language. Giving veneration or obeisance to any material object repeatedly draws forth the fury of divine wrath in Old Testament history (Ps. 78; Judg. 2). It is condemned as the prime sin of the heathen world (Rom. 1:19–25) because it not only insults God but also violates the divine image in man by accompanying sins of perversion. It was this combination of idolatry and immorality that brought on the annihilation of Canaanites and Midianites in Old Testament history. Even more severe is God’s wrathful response to apostasy. (See Heb. 10:26–31 for a fearful example.)

It is the biblical teaching of ‘the wrath of God’ that renders reasonable the doctrine of propitiation as an aspect of atonement (see Walvoord, Jesus Christ our Lord, pp. 171–173).

9. Authors of good books and articles on atonement (J. Denney, V. Taylor, B. Warfield, L. Morris, A. Hodge, L. Boettner, G. Smeaton and others) all stress that the atoning work of Christ is something done, accomplished, finished. Another way of saying this is to say the atonement is objective. This is not to deny that contemplation of the atonement has subjective effects on elect believers—it melts their hearts and brings them to repentance and faith (Rom. 2:4). The opposite effect (as of all God’s benevolence) takes place subjectively in unbelievers as Romans 2:4, 5, a very sobering passage, says: Do you not know ‘that God’s kindness is meant to lead you to repentance? But because of your hard and impenitent heart you are storing up wrath for yourself.’ See 2 Corinthians 16, 17. ‘[W]hat an objective atonement means is that but for Christ and His Passion God would not be to us what He is.’²⁵

A valiant effort was made by D. M. Baillie to provide a mediating explanation of the atonement as both objective and subjective. He asks the question:

What then, is the divine Atonement, which is ... both historical and eternal? Is it an ‘objective’ reality, something done by Christ, something ordained and accepted by God, in ‘expiation’ of human sin, quite apart from our knowledge of it and its effects upon us? Or is a ‘subjective’ process, a reconciling of us to God through a persuasion in our hearts that there is no obstacle, a realization of His eternal love?²⁶

Having asked his questions in a manner suitable for the answer the author wants to present, Baillie goes on to say, ‘Surely these two aspects cannot be separated at all.... In theological argument on this subject we are apt to forget we are dealing with a realm of personal relationships and nothing else.’²⁷ But we must protest that Baillie is neglecting many features of the Scripture record. The Bible seldom if ever makes human response part of what happened at Calvary. He did it whether we respond or not. And more importantly, under number 6 above, the court of law where charges are made, forensic, legal processes, demands and judgments are carried through, is the paramount biblical representation of the atonement. There is of course a personal aspect in that as a result of the processes of justice personal reconciliation of God and man takes place.

Baillie goes on to destroy all vestiges of a distinct transactional event at Calvary, saying if Calvary was ‘a sacrifice made by God Himself, then it is part of the sacrifice that God is continually making.’²⁸

Thus the objectivity of Christ’s atonement is really swallowed up in subjectivity—God’s and ours, by the sort of theology of which, unfortunately, Baillie’s is an example.

10. The vicarious aspect of atonement must be noticed here even though the exegetical basis in Scripture has been discussed earlier. Vicarious atonement has been attacked at several junctures of Christian history from four quarters, i.e. that it is (1) unnecessary, (2) impossible, (3) immoral and (4) a denial of forgiveness.

Vicarious Satisfaction Said to Be Unnecessary

Ancient Socinians held vicarious atonement unnecessary because their view of man, sin and salvation was thoroughly moralistic. We are born into the world neutral regarding sin. Adam’s fall brought neither corruption of mind nor guilt upon any of his generations of progeny. We are born mortal, but not as punishment for anyone’s sin. Each of us forms his own character from ‘ground zero’ not in any manner affected by Adam’s apostasy except his bad example.

Because much of Christendom today is ruled by Pelagian views let us see how this outlook views sin and salvation. I cite the excellent summary of W. G. T. Shedd:

The general ... prevalence of sin in the world is accounted for by the power of temptation and the influence of habit. It is possible for any man to be entirely sinless.... The grace of the Holy Spirit is ... only relatively necessary in order to holiness; it renders its attainment easier.... Regeneration [is] the illumination of the intellect by the truth, the stimulation of the will by the threatenings of the law and promise of future rewards, and the remission of sins by the divine indulgence etc.²⁹

Shedd fully documents this summary. Pelagius was contemporary with Augustine, yet this sort of thinking rules in liberal religion and ‘newspaper religion’ still today. It is, of course, directly contradictory to all orthodox, biblical Christianity. There are millions of lost folk counting on the divine indulgence rather than the grace of God in Christ’s work at Calvary.

Vicarious Satisfaction Said to Be Immoral, Hence Impossible

Some objectors claim vicarious suffering of the innocent for the guilty is not justice at all but injustice. A. H. Strong answered this charge by saying in ordinary cases the charge is true only on the supposition that the Son bears the penalty of our sins, not voluntarily, but compulsorily; or on the supposition that one who is personally innocent can in no way become involved in the guilt and penalty of others—both of them hypotheses contrary to Scripture and to fact.³⁰

Granted there is mystery in how it could happen even with the best effort at logical explanation [of] the mystery of atonement. But an even greater mystery then follows as to how in justice a just God can grant unmerited pardon in a manner consistent with His holiness.

Granting then a strong element of mystery in atonement by substitutionary propitiation, apologetics does not refuse the task of defending it against attack. Nineteenth-century attacks on vicarious sacrifice by rationalistic and Unitarian writers evoked some strenuous responses. The orthodox did not attempt to prove what happened at Calvary for they accepted what Scripture says, only to explain how it was possible and morally right in light of the incarnation.

One of the most adept in such matters was Dr Shedd. He discusses divine justice at length in connection with the divine attributes.³¹ Justice he defines as ‘that phase of God’s holiness which is seen in his treatment of the obedient and disobedient subjects of his government.’³² At page 373 he begins discussion of ‘the possibility of vicarious satisfaction of retributive justice’ and continues through page 378. He proposes the relevance of Romans 1:18: ‘the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men’ (Shedd’s emphasis) and says, ‘The divine displeasure expressed in punitive justice is not aimed against the person as such, and distinct from his sin.’ He quotes Charnock: ‘God is not displeased with the nature of man as man, for that is derived from him; but the nature of man as sinful, which is derived from the sinner himself. God hates only the sin not the sinner; he desires only the destruction of the one, not the misery of the other,’ and Shedd adds, ‘God loves the person as such.’³³ He relies on an affirmation of Scripture about God, viz.: ‘As for God, his way is perfect’ (Ps. 18:30 kjv). God cannot be false to Himself.

The section of Shedd’s essay closes with a summary which states that, as in everything else, God is sovereign and free in respect to justice—yet not in relation ‘to the abolition, nor to the relaxation, but to the substitution of punishment.’³⁴ He asserts God in His sovereignty can satisfy the claims of justice in more than one way. ‘He has a choice of methods. He may inflict the full amount of suffering due to sin, either upon the sinner, or upon a proper substitute.... Divine justice ... is free to do either; but one or the other it must do. God is not obliged either to accept or to provide a substituted penalty’ but in either case ‘it is grace and mercy towards the actual transgressor ... permitting substitution and providing the substitute’ are acts of mercy in harmony with justice. ‘There is mercy in permitting another person to do for the sinner what the sinner is bound to do for himself; and still greater mercy in providing that person; and greater still, in becoming that person.’³⁵

This all means simply that a sovereign holy God will by nature do what is right. It is right therefore for Him 1) to allow substitution and 2) to provide the substitute and 3) to be the substitute. I am not sure any theologian has with full success explained the divine justice in vicarious satisfaction. The explanation just reported is only the best I know of. We may be certain that Scripture teaches substitutionary satisfaction of the requirements of divine law at Calvary and that God is just.

In Volume II Shedd has 112 pages on ‘Vicarious Atonement’ and there develops the theme (pp. 450–463) that ‘vicarious satisfaction of justice is the only mode of exercising mercy that is possible in a just Being’ (pp. 377, 378). Quite to the contrary is the rather uniform opinion among liberal theologians who assert that:

Vicarious Satisfaction Is the Contrary of Forgiveness

This is not unlike the Pelagianism that said satisfaction of divine justice is unnecessary. In recent times a Methodist bishop, echoing twentieth-century modernism in Protestant religion, laid the matter on the line so to speak, saying, ‘If Jesus paid it all, or if He is the substitute for me, or if He is the sacrifice for all the sin of the world, then why discuss forgiveness? The books are closed. Another has paid the debt, borne the penalty. I owe nothing. I am absolved. I cannot see forgiveness as predicated upon the act of some one else. It is my sin. I must atone.’³⁶ This is theology, again as we have noticed before, grounded more on the Parable of the Prodigal Son and a form of salvation by self-effort, neglecting the careful, New Testament explanations of our identification first with Adam, then of Christ with us and we with Him. The whole Bible as well as Christian hymnody stands against this new Pelagianism.

The faithful steward of the divine word of truth in the present epoch will be cautious about approving the doctrines of some very prominent recent theologians who adopt some of the language of atonement by vicarious satisfaction while really promoting another gospel. The theology I refer to here is often called neo-orthodoxy. It is part-way back from Pelagianism and liberalism to orthodoxy—close enough to make employment of orthodox language sound appropriate.

The teaching is not that the incarnate Son of God died in our place, rather that the Son of God became incarnate and by incarnation bridged the gulf between Creator and creature assuming thereby all our liabilities. Sometimes this is framed as a covenant of God with us. The innumerable, dense pages of Karl Barth³⁷ propose the covenant route and the eminently readable and persuasive pages of Emil Brunner’s The Mediator,³⁸ the incarnation route, to bypass the genuine, historical, Protestant orthodox doctrine. I was a young professor when I first read Brunner’s book, The Mediator, in a newly issued translation, about 1948 or 1949. As I read him then and as I read him now he seems to affirm expiation and propitiation, redemption, reconciliation, etc., and to relate their effectiveness for our salvation to a doctrine of real incarnation. He even affirms the obedience of Christ as an obedience of whole life in suffering and even says His death was ‘vicarious.’³⁹ Due to his fondness for paradoxical statement and existential assumptions about the structure of divine-human relations no single paragraph says exactly what he (and his disciples) mean. The following selected from three paragraphs seems to say Christ’s whole life of obedience made His death vicarious in the sense the whole human race was on the cross by virtue of the incarnation. There was no judicial action. It was all on the level of personal relations (as Baillie asserted above). The suffering was not penal. God was there and all of us were there getting our personal relationships (formerly alienated) straightened out.

It is only [his whole life of obedience in suffering] which makes his death vicarious ... the exact opposite of that which—not wholly wrongly—the doctrine of Anselm is taken to mean: an objective-personal [why not and personal?] substitutionary transaction. What we said above about sacrifice as an ‘equivalent’ is only protected from ‘false objectivity’ of this kind by means of vicarious offering. For vicarious offering (substitution) is something entirely personal; it is personal in that dual sense which characterizes the personality of the Mediator ... acting vicariously for man and for God. For the people he acts as their high priest, who brings the expiatory sacrifice in the name of them all ... Personal surrender can only be that wherein the personality is sacrificed.⁴⁰

His passion is not a transaction—as it certainly might seem to be in the doctrine of Anselm, a method of expiation ordained by God which gets its value from the costly nature of the sacrifice—it is a personal [only] act; ... real, vicarious, etc.⁴¹

For Brunner, then, the atonement came by the incarnation without any specific reference to His death except that death is part of the experience of being human. Hence the caveat issued here against being deceived by orthodox-sounding language to suppose orthodox doctrine is being promoted.

Karl Barth's neo-orthodox interpretation of the work of Christ at Calvary is distributed through many of his books, including several of the 13 volumes of Church Dogmatics, some of which run to over 850 pages. When theologizing, Barth seldom states precisely what he means and does so garrulously. No one, I think, ever mastered his thought—perhaps not even Dr Barth himself, certainly not I, though I have tried. On the other hand his ventures into biblical exegesis and history of ideas is as competent, straightforward and precise as his long-winded theology is obscure. But again, let us not be affected seriously by much theological talk. His orthodox statements are seldom his final word on anything.

Let us take note of three brief portions of Barth's Church Dogmatics where he employs the orthodox language of vicarious satisfaction: 'In this one man, Jesus, God puts at the head of and in the place of all other men the One,' etc., 'and does it all for all who are elected in Him.'⁴² Under the rubric 'the Judge Judged in our Place,' Barth speaks of penal suffering, and of propitiation:

Because He was the divine Judge come amongst us, He had the authority in this way—by this giving up of Himself to judgment in our place—to exercise the divine justice of grace, to pronounce us righteous on the ground of what happened to Him, to free us therefore from the accusation and condemnation and punishment.⁴³

He even skillfully enters the intricacies of the New Testament Greek prepositions related to the subject, turning in a competent discussion of anti, hyper (or huper) and peri and says the passages which employ them 'speak of a place which ought to be ours, that we ought to have taken this place, that we have been taken from it ... that we cannot add to anything he does there,' etc.⁴⁴

Yet, there is no consistency in other sections where Barth teaches, like Brunner, 1) atonement, or reconciliation, by the incarnation itself not His sinless life of obedience and death in our place and 2) the election of every man who ever lived to salvation (more about these matters later).

While the Fathers of neo-orthodoxy were moving off stage their disciples and a new generation found leadership in Rudolph Bultmann and his disciples. They set in motion a new search for the historical Jesus, pretty much dissolving all the supernatural elements in Jesus' story into myths. Yet these authors also usually claim to be Christians. Bultmann himself was a lifelong churchman. Hence, they, like the earlier neo-orthodox, prefer to employ traditional theological language. John Macquarrie, who presents himself as a disciple of Bultmann, pointedly uses the terms of traditional orthodox Anglican religion and has a chapter on 'The Work of Christ.' There is less subterfuge in Bultmannians, however. Macquarrie, for example, says plainly that he is reinterpreting Christianity in non-traditional ways though using traditional terms. One who reads these authors carefully finds the self-contradictions of neo-orthodoxy prevalent, because they do not always explain they have a new set of meanings for old words.⁴⁵ I shall not here attempt to trace developments from neo-orthodoxy on to the present splintered character of what goes for academic theology in the universities and seminaries.

An important matter remains to be discussed before the work of Christ in atonement by vicarious satisfaction is laid aside. It has to do with the question, 'For whom did Christ die?' Was it for the elect only? Or, did He atone for the sins of every member of the human race? The answers given to the present time are so involved we shall have to limit the presentation severely.

¹ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, trans. P. Lynch, 4th ed. (Rockford: TAN Books & Publishers, 1974), p. 189. See also Henry Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St Louis: Herder & Herder, 1954, 1957), p. 790.

² Ott, Fundamentals, p. 264. See Denzinger, Sources, par. 809.

³ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. Robert C. Schultz (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1966), chap. 17, pp. 201–211.

⁴ Althaus, Theology of Luther, p. 203.

⁵ A recent complete English translation of Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became a Man) employed here is Anselm of Canterbury III, ed. and trans. J. Hopkins and H. Richardson (Toronto and New York: The Edward Mellen Press, 1976), pp. 43–137. Mr Hopkins taught philosophy at the University of Minnesota, Mr Richardson at the University of Toronto.

⁶ Althaus, Theology of Luther, p. 207.

⁷ ibid.

⁸ ibid.

⁹ Citations herein are from Melanchthon on Christian Doctrine: Loci Communes, 1555, trans. and ed. C. L. Manschreck, intro. by H. Engelland (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1965; paperback ed., Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1982). Loci Communes means Common Topics (of doctrine).

¹⁰ Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom vol. iii, 1877 (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), p. 10.

¹¹ Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii, p. 115.

¹² G. C. H. Berkouwer, The Work of Christ, trans. C. Lambregtie (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), pp. 314–327.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹³ Denzinger, Sources, nos. 948, 949, 950.

¹⁴ Ott Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma 'The Eucharist as a Sacrifice' nn 402–415

²⁴ Kittel, Gerhard and Friedrich, Gerhard, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament v, trans, and ed. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), pp. 382–446.

²⁵ James Denney, The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation, 1918, p. 239; as cited by Vernon Grounds in Baker's Dictionary of Theology, p. 77.

²⁶ D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1948), pp. 197, 198.

²⁷ ibid.

²⁸ ibid.

²⁹ W. G. T. Shedd on 'Pelagianism' in A History of Christian Doctrine ii (New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co., 1872; repr. Minneapolis: Klock & Klock, 1978), pp. 93, 94.

³⁰ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 738.

³¹ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology i (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), pp. 365–385.

³² ibid., p. 365.

³³ ibid., p. 375.

³⁴ ibid.

³⁵ ibid., pp. 377, 378.

³⁶ G. Bromley Oxnam, A Testament of Faith (Boston, 1958), p. 144 as quoted by Vernon Grounds in Baker's Dictionary of Theology, p. 76.

³⁷ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics, vols. ii. 2 and iv.1, 2 (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1957, 1976).

³⁸ Emil Brunner, The Mediator: A Study of the Central Doctrine of the Christian Faith, trans. Olive Wyon (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1947).

³⁹ ibid., p. 501.

⁴⁰ ibid., p. 501.

⁴¹ ibid., p. 495.

⁴² Barth, Church Dogmatics ii.2.123.

⁴³ Barth, Church Dogmatics iv, 1.223.

⁴⁴ Barth, Church Dogmatics ii.1.230.

⁴⁵ John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, chap. 13, ‘The Work of Christ’ (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1966, 1967).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (560). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

17

The Extent of the Atonement

The topic of this chapter is one ‘over which theologians have sorely vexed themselves and each other.’ The vexatious question (to which W. O. Carver refers in ‘Atonement,’ ISBE I, 324) is whether in His vicarious act of satisfaction of divine justice at Calvary Christ bore the sins of every human being of every generation or only the sins of the elect—the saved of all ages. What did God intend? A common-sense formula in Latin, coming down from the ancient church, has seemed adequate for most people, viz.: Christ died ‘sufficenter pro omnibus, sed efficaciter tantum pro electis’ (sufficiently for all, but efficaciously only for the elect). It is very important to note that in this original form, ‘for’ (Lat. pro) means in proportion to or in relation to, not in the stead of as the Greek anti (‘a ransom for many’ Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45) discussed at length earlier. The formula is saying simply the benefits of the atonement Christ made were sufficient for all, efficacious for only the elect. It says nothing specific about in whose place Christ died at Calvary.

Quite apart from the history of the question, once vicarious satisfaction of divine justice is accepted as the most adequate theory of ‘the atonement’ then a problem of right and wrong seems to intrude itself. If ‘Jesus paid it all’ at Calvary for every man, woman, child, ever conceived or born into the world, where is the rightness (justice) in a second punishment in hell? Stated otherwise, if the Son of God bore all the guilt and punishment, what is there left to pay? On the other hand if the sins of the non-elect, those who never hear or hearing never repent and believe, were not imputed to Christ at Calvary, there is no ‘double jeopardy.’ And when did the imputation of our sins to Him take place? Did it take place when Jesus suffered and died or does it take place at the moment of faith in connection with justification, the imputation of Christ’s righteousness? Perhaps it is impious even to inquire. In any case, these are the questions that this chapter addresses.

How the Subject Arose As a Vexatious Problem

General interest in the question of ‘the extent of the atonement’ did not arise among Protestants in Calvin’s lifetime. After Calvin’s death in 1564 leadership in the chief school for Reformed pastors (Geneva, Switzerland) passed to Theodore Beza, Calvin’s protégé, successor as professor, and biographer. Beza, a learned and persuasive man, with less of the grace and scholarly reserve of his teacher, rigorously carried some of Calvin’s teachings to lengths that invited reaction.

James Arminius (Jacobus van Hermann) (1560–1609) received his theological education under Beza but retreated from Beza’s explanation of the logical relation of the decrees of God known as Supralapsarianism. In this word, laps has reference to the fall and supra means previous to. The decrees of election and reprobation are said to be logically prior to the decrees of creation, fall and redemption (not necessarily in that order).

Arminius reacted against this somewhat newfangled refinement of the biblical and Reformed teaching of election of lost men to salvation, advocating in his teaching and preaching a system which at several points differed not only from Beza's but the whole Augustinian tradition and Calvin as well. He disseminated his views from his position as professor at Leiden in the Netherlands—a land scarcely recovered from attempts by the Spanish Catholic government to exterminate the Reformed Christians.

The result was strife in the whole church in the Netherlands and in the national life as well. In 1610 the Arminians presented a petition called a remonstrance, to the States of Holland and West Friesland, which set forth the Arminian theory over against Reformed doctrine, in five articles. A national synod was called in response to deal with the acute problem raised.

This synod, held at Dort (Dordrecht) in 1618 and 1619, should best 'be conceived as a body of divines holding Calvinistic views, believing those views to be true, and called for the purpose of condemning and prohibiting the contrary opinions' in their country.¹ Delegates from several other countries, among them some from Britain, sent by James I, were seated. It was this conference in an exceedingly tense, controversial setting that set forth the famous five canons, of which: the first related to total depravity; the second to unconditional election, that is, not dependent on foreseen faith; the third to particular atonement; the fourth related to the effectual grace that brings the elect to faith; and the fifth to their unfailing perseverance. It is a logical construct throughout. And in my judgment quite correct if, as the Synod did, we define atonement as particular, rather than as limited, as I shall seek to explain.

Particular Atonement Connected with Election

The subject of this chapter is of great interest mainly to those who are convinced of particular election or who are convinced to the contrary and wish to refute election of particular persons to receive the gift of faith (or the grace of regeneration). The doctrine of particular election is that out of the mass of lost humanity, before the creation of the world, God chose each individual person upon whom He would confer the benefit of salvation. This doctrine was taught by Augustine and true Augustinians (of whom there were few) through the middle ages and then by all the first rank of Protestant Reformers and the so-called pre-Reformers (Wycliffe, Hus).

Lutheran theology quickly dropped some of Luther's early passionate insistence on election in the controversies that arose with the Reformed (Presbyterians). So from then till now the doctrine of particular atonement has been discussed almost exclusively by Calvinists (Reformed, Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists and others).

According to Arminians, God foreknew who would believe and persevere and, on the basis of that foreknowledge (prescience), elected them to salvation. Believers' self-election is hence logically prior to God's election.

Attempts to clear God of arbitrariness in electing some to salvation and ‘passing by’ others by interpreting election ‘according to the foreknowledge of God’ (1 Peter 1:2) as ‘based upon foreknowledge’—(i.e. planning His own acts in conformity with what He knew men with ‘free will’ would do) are very old. Early on even Augustine succumbed to that rather ‘weak line of thinking’ (J. Pelikan). Commenting on ‘Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated’ (Mal. 1:2, 3; Rom. 9:13), ‘he had suggested that the basis for the difference lay in the divine foreknowledge of the two.’² Later, having struggled through the Pelagian controversies, Augustine retracted that suggestion, ‘because any such differentiation between the saved and the damned would be a negation of the priority of grace.’³ See Jaroslav Pelikan.⁴

The Scripture says election is ‘according to the foreknowledge’ of God but never that election is based upon what God foresaw would happen anyway. In the treatment of election in the Soteriology section of this book I point out that election is parallel (kata) to God’s foreknowledge but neither foreknowledge nor election is based upon the other in Scripture. Augustinians insist that salvation from start to finish is all of grace. Even faith, ‘the hand of the heart’ which grasps the hand of the Savior, is ‘the gift of God.’ I discuss this matter at length in connection with soteriology.

Setting in ‘The Plan of Salvation’

Logically, the plan of salvation must be wholly related to the fact that every man is a sinner, dead in trespasses and sins. He is already perishing. He sees nothing interesting or desirable in the things of the Spirit of God because they are foolishness to him. Neither can he know them, they being discerned only when the Holy Spirit sovereignly and supernaturally enlightens him, being born again not by the corruptible seed of rational arguments (for which he has no adequate capacity in connection with spiritual matters), but ‘through the living ... word of God’ (1 Cor. 1:18; 2:14; 1 Peter 1:23). The agency of the Holy Spirit in this new birth is wholly by the Spirit’s sovereign, purposeful initiative (John 3:5–8). Faith does not induce new birth. It is the other way around. Apparently the Word accompanies new birth but the Spirit enables the understanding and reverses the will—again sovereignly. The soul is the receptor not the initiator of regeneration. As Jesus told Nicodemus, the Spirit moves where the Spirit ‘listeth’ (desires). Like the wind one can hear it but one cannot tell from whence it is coming or whither it is going. ‘So is every one that is born of the Spirit of God.’ ‘How to be Born Again,’ if Jesus is to be believed, is not the proper subject of a research project. ‘Reasons for Faith’ would be a more proper project.

The plan of salvation therefore is wholly about a rescue operation not a how-to-achieve-it project. The subject of the rescue, being ‘dead in the trespasses and sins’ (Eph. 2:1), does not know he is in need of rescue and resents the notion that he might need it until God restores real liberty of will, rescuing him from the bond-slavery of a depraved inclination away from God.

The Arminian Challenge

Arminius’ reflections led him to propose that indeed mankind are born dead in sins, as his Calvinist teachers said, but as a matter of justice (i.e. of fairness by a God who Arminius thought must not give less than equal treatment to everyone), God has restored to everyone power to believe in Christ and thereafter to be born again.⁵ ‘All unregenerate persons have freedom of will and a capacity of resisting the Holy Spirit, of rejecting the proffered grace of God ... without any difference of the elect and the reprobate’ (emphasis original).⁶ This teaching in the Netherlands, where it began, quite logically rapidly moved toward the doctrine of universal salvation, and the followers, known as Remonstrants, ceasing to be a part of orthodoxy, simply died out. These ideas, with some modification, found a home in Britain among some Anglicans even though the Thirty-Nine Articles of Anglican beginnings is thoroughly Augustinian in this regard. Much later, John Wesley, while holding to many of the teachings of Calvinist orthodoxy, accepted Arminius’ doctrine of universal restoration of fallen man’s freedom of the will. Yet Wesley said God out of pure grace restored freedom of the will to every human being through the power of His death on the cross. The Arminians had said God must restore this ability or He would be unjust, Wesley, because God is gracious. The very slim basis of this amazingly bold assertion is said to be John 1:9, the Word ‘was the true Light which gives light to every man coming into the world’ (John 1:9 nkjv).

Restoration of ‘Plenary Ability’

This Arminian-Wesleyan teaching of universal restoration of a healthy will to all mankind assumes the universal application of the atoning work of Christ on the cross. This would mean not merely that the death of Christ made salvation possible for every human being but that it already has, in part, gone into effect in everyone. It should not therefore be surprising that this doctrine among the followers of Arminius (less so among Wesleyans) quickly turned into universal salvationism.

The Augustinian-Calvinist view of the matter is that this universal enablement of the will to respond favorably, whether of grace or out of justice, has never taken place. Paul says of the Ephesian believers that they were all formerly dead in their trespasses and that they ‘walked’ in them; they were even ‘past feeling.’ In other words, something happened to some residents of Ephesus, now believers, when Paul first preached there, which did not happen to the other people of their city. This may be called enlightenment, special calling, even new birth (as narrowly defined). In other words, only those Ephesians in whom the atonement went into effect were the ones who became believers. None of the population of Ephesus had their darkened consciences enlightened except the elect, the believers.

A World Reconciled to God for Now

But that is not the whole of the matter. Chapters 1 and 2 of 1 Corinthians must be read with chapter 5 of 2 Corinthians. The Corinthians believers were told the preaching of the cross, though it was foolishness to the perishing (1 Cor. 1:18), and the very power of God to those being saved (1 Cor. 1:18, 21), the cross nevertheless has some benefits for everyone in the world: ‘... in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them’ (2 Cor. 5:19). The world in this context means what we usually mean by the world (kosmos), this earth with all the people on it as presently organized and rationalized, ‘the present evil age’ (Gal. 1:4). The New Testament does not present a single clear case where ‘the world’ means only God’s people, the saved, the elect or any similar designation.

It is very important to take note that John Calvin himself and B. B. Warfield—an outstanding Calvinist of the twentieth century—take this view of the meaning of world in 2 Corinthians 5:19 as well as in 1 John 2:2: ‘He is the propitiation for [Gr. peri, about, concerning (not anti, in the stead of)] our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world,’ and several other related texts. Warfield wrote voluminously both on Calvin and Augustine as well as many books and articles on the work of Christ. Probably no man who ever lived was acquainted with these matters more thoroughly than he. In addition to these books and articles is his lengthy introduction and survey of the Anti-Pelagian Writings of Augustine in the Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers. I have read that lengthy introduction and spent some hours in Augustine's anti-Pelagian corpus. I have found no evidence in any of Warfield's writings or in Augustine or Calvin himself that they deny a distinct, divinely intended reference to the whole world in the work of Christ on the cross. Of course, I may have missed something.

Particular and General Aspects of 'Atonement'

This suggests that we are here dealing with one of the many paradox-like aspects of the whole of revealed truth. There is a particular aspect of Christ's work on the cross and a general aspect. This is not to say this truth is one of the New Testament biblical mysteries. The kingdom of heaven is often called a 'mystery' in the Gospels. Paul uses the word mystery twenty-one times: of the hardening of Israel's hearts, of the change in our bodies in the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:50), of the incarnation (1 Tim. 3:16), of certain elements of his own preaching (1 Cor. 4:1), of the highest stage of doctrine (Eph. 2:7) and of the church (Eph. 5:32). Rather, there are truths that are in harmony as God sees them and may be partially understood by us, yet which we in our limited capacity cannot quite clarify. Much about the Calvary work of Christ falls into this category of the inexplicable, as Christian theology has always acknowledged, even though Scripture nowhere calls that work a mysterion.

Calvin's 'Paradoxical' Solutions

How could the obedience and death of one man have such high value as to save multitudes? Luther answered, on the basis of the union with the divine nature, saying the divine participated in the sufferings of the human nature although 'in an inconceivable and inexplicable manner' as in sermons on 1 Peter 1:18 and other texts.⁷ Calvin addressed the problem too, probably not fully satisfactorily.⁸ There is no place in Calvin's theology for outright contradiction of one truth or fact by another. Yet Calvin often acknowledges limits to his and others' logic with a 'so to speak' or 'as though' indicating a breach between the divine and the human point of view. Calvin allowed many of these 'dialectical differences' in the final form of his writings.

In my judgment therefore one must not think of Calvinism as a theological extreme to be balanced by some other extreme, the truth lying somewhere in-between. He did not really build a tight system around some central ruling idea to which all else had to conform. I cite Wendel to show why Calvin must not be saddled with responsibility for some of the extreme views of some of the theological followers who claim his name for their work. In Wendel's summary conclusion, this very fair authority on Calvin's thought says:

Calvin's is not a closed system elaborated around a central idea, it draws together, one after another, a whole series of biblical ideas, some of which can only with difficulty be reconciled.⁹

Calvin was only following sound precedent. He would have agreed with the opinion that if someone should hear an angel say $2 + 5 = 9$ he would have soot on his wings. In other words, the law of non-contradiction is a fact both in heaven and on earth, even if omitted or denied in the devil's list of axioms. Yet, there is a history in sound theology of acceptance of certain truths that seem at odds with one another, because they are not understood fully as God understands them. Also there are truths (as Jesus' 'the last shall be first') that teach a single truth by a paradoxical form of statement. Among such 'paradoxes' we all accept are: the presence in God of both justice and mercy, of unrelenting hatred of sin and sinners with love for sinners (never quite adequately explained). Pelikan devotes ten pages to tracing the pervasive presence of paradoxes, as I have defined them, in Latin (Western) theology up to the end of the thirteenth century. He points out how many diverse and unsystematic elements there were in what he calls 'the plan of salvation' in that long period and, significantly for what I have written earlier in this paragraph about Calvin and Strong, Pelikan ends with this summary:

[B]ut as this period set out to deal with 'the question of what that redemption of ours through the death of Christ may be and in what way the apostle declares that we are justified by his blood' (Peter Abelard), it worked with the presuppositions of its heritage about the being of God, about the nature of man, and about the mystery of the incarnation of the God-man.

Each of these presuppositions [for a doctrine of redemption] had acquired definite form by this time [1300], so that there was no dogma of the atonement as such, no theory of redemption as such that overlooked any of these presupposition, or appeared to slight one or the other of them, would be deemed acceptable.¹⁰

Calvin on the Extent Of 'Atonement'

One therefore should not be surprised to find that most of Calvin's discussion of atonement in the Institutes relates it to the elect—without commenting at length on how Christ's atonement relates to the world of mankind at large. In Calvin's commentaries on the Bible, however, he acknowledges a reconciliation (at-one-ment) of all mankind. Let us look at some of these passages.

On Matthew 26:28 and Mark 14:24: 'blood ... poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins' Calvin explains, 'By the word many He means not a part of the world only, but the whole human race.'¹¹

On John 1:29: 'the Lamb ... who takes away the sin of the world' he comments, 'And when he says the sin of the world he extends his favor indiscriminately to the whole human race.'¹² On John 3:15, 16: 'whosoever' (kjv) etc., Calvin carefully explains:

He has employed the universal term whosoever, both to invite all indiscriminately to partake of life, and to cut off every excuse from unbelievers. Such is the import of the term world; for though nothing will be found in the world that is worthy of the favour of God, yet He shows Himself to be reconciled to the whole world, when He invites all men without exception to the faith of Christ, which is nothing else than an entrance into life.¹³

Note that Calvin does not say more than that God was reconciled to the world at the cross. At-one-ment occurred, interruption of God's enmity in a reconciliation. A truce was effected.

On John 3:17: 'not ... to condemn the world, but in order that the world might be saved' through him.’ Here quite contrary to the sometimes strident insistence of some advocates of ‘limited atonement’ (for the elect only), Calvin comments on the presence of ‘world’ (kosmos) twice in the verse: ‘the word world is again repeated, that no man may think of himself wholly excluded ... showing that he here includes all men in the word ‘world’ instead of restricting it to comprise the elect alone.’¹⁴ This is about as specific a rejection of ‘limited atonement’ as propounded by some ‘high’ Calvinists, by Calvin himself, as can be imagined.

On Romans 5:18: ‘Therefore, as one trespass led to condemnation for all men, so one act of righteousness leads to justification and life for all men.’ C. A. Hodge, a strong supporter of atonement limited to the elect only seeks to prove that the first ‘all men’ means the human race but the second only elect believers.¹⁵ Hardly the best logic in a great book on Romans! Calvin, however, who did not find world-reconciliation to God objectionable, gave a quite contrary view, finding the whole world of mankind in ‘all men’ in both clauses of the sentence, saying God

... makes his favour common to all, because it is propounded to all, and not because it is in reality extended to all [i.e. through their hearing about it]; for though Christ suffered for the sins of the whole world, and is offered through God’s benignity indiscriminately to all, yet all do not receive him.¹⁶

From this it should be apparent that Calvin held to a doctrine of universal reconciliation, if not universal redemption (as I shall explain shortly).

In comment on Colossians 1:14 Calvin asserts, ‘by the sacrifice of His death all the sins of the world have been expiated.’¹⁷

A. H. Strong cites Calvin’s apparent grounding of a message of salvation for the whole world in a ‘propitiation’ for the whole world.¹⁸ The source, Strong says, is Calvin’s ‘Commentary on 1 John 2:2 ...’ as follows:

Christ suffered for the sins of the whole world, and in the goodness of God is offered unto all men without distinction, his blood being shed not for a part of the world only, but for the whole human race; for although in the world is found nothing worthy of the favor of God, yet he holds out the propitiation to the whole world, since without distinction he summons all to the faith of Christ.¹⁹

I do not know the source of Strong’s quotation of Calvin. It is not that of John Owen—perhaps the most strident defender of limited atonement ever—whose translation is The text of the Calvin Translation Society (Edinburgh, 1855). Owen has Calvin saying: ‘Then under the word all or whole, he does not include the reprobate, but designates those who should believe as well as those scattered through various parts of the world.’²⁰

Particular Atonement in the Institutes

Calvin’s systematic treatment of atonement in the Institutes is chiefly in Book II chapters 16 and 17 and the sections on election in Book III chapter 21, especially section 5 and his refutation of charges against election in III.23, sections 1–14, especially section 5. Here the focus of his discussion is not damnation of the reprobate but salvation of the elect. He focuses on the atonement of Christ as being God's loving work through Christ for the elect.

It is important here to note that in Calvin's zeal to show that atonement secured the salvation of all the elect he never denies that Christ's work on the cross had some reference also to those who would never even hear that Christ died. He does not deny universal reconciliation.

Any one who believes God chose him in Christ in eternity will not need to be convinced that atonement was specifically (particular atonement) for him—not just a provision made in the unlikely case he might hear the gospel and might believe.

Warfield Advocated a Form of General Reconciliation

I have said the subject of atonement as limited to the elect in some important way is chiefly a Calvinist concern. Yet I know of no classic Calvinist who doubts Christ died 'sufficiently for all, but efficaciously only for the elect.' Calvin himself says so in comment on 1 John 2:2. Further, the outstanding Calvinist writer of the twentieth century, B. B. Warfield, specifically interprets the passages in the New Testament which speak of the world or all men as included in Christ's Calvary work of reconciliation (at-one-ment) as meaning just that. Yet he does so in such a way as not to deny particular redemption.

There is something singularly important here. Warfield wrote very extensively about Augustine and Calvin and the theology that the latter received from the former and passed down with both refinement and improvement to succeeding generations. Yet Warfield managed to do this without ever in any decisive way discussing the third point of the so-called 'five points' of Calvinism. Among Warfield's very latest works, revised not long before his death, is The Plan of Salvation.²¹ He discusses the differences between all the major groups of Christendom and treats particular, unconditional election, of course. Yet for some reason in this small work Warfield never mentions atonement for the elect only. On the last page is this striking statement: 'There is no antinomy, therefore, in saying that Christ died for his people and that Christ died for the world.'²² Nor do I find reconciliation for the elect only anywhere in the writings of Augustine. R. C. Sproul claims Augustine debated 'limited atonement' with Pelagius and C. A. Hodge asserts that it was periodically discussed through the Middle Ages. But the history of the period seems to furnish only Gottschalk of Orbais (805–868) and those immediately influenced by him. There may have been others.

One of the first scholastic systematizers of the results of the Synod of Dort was Francis Turretin (1623–1687). He says,

Among the ancients, the Pelagians and semi-Pelagians contended that Christ died for all men; hence Prosper, in his letter to Augustine, concerning the remains of the Pelagian heresy, says, 'Those who embrace the Pelagian heresy, profess to believe that Christ died for all men universally, and that none are excluded from the atonement and redemption which the blood of Christ has effected.' Among those errors which they attribute to Augustine, they find this: 'the Savior was not crucified for the redemption of the whole world.' Faustus [presumably F. Socinius founder of the Unitarianism of the Reformation era] says, 'They wander far from the path of piety, who assert Christ did not die for all.'²³

Turretin goes on to refer to Gottschalk and the controversy of his time as mentioned elsewhere in this chapter. Turretin, without documentation, says Augustine and his disciples Prosper and Fulgentius defended the doctrine that the non-elect were not included in Christ's work of atonement.²⁴

The Ninth, Eleventh and Thirteenth Centuries and Late Reformation Periods

The ninth century, beginning with the reign of Charlemagne, was a time of a modest revival of theological learning. The interested reader will find excellent history of the discussion of election in this period in Pelikan (vol. III, The Growth of Medieval Theology 600–1300, pp. 80–90) and of the corollary, redemption by Christ limited in some sense to the elect (pp. 90–95). Most of the issues raised later by Arminius and the Remonstrants and discussed at Dordrecht (1618, 1619) were raised there by Gottschalk and his detractors, including his insistence that our Lord made satisfaction only for the sins of the elect. This was centuries before the delegates at Dordrecht met to discuss the plan of salvation.

Anselm (eleventh century) and several others of his time echoed Augustine's thoughts on election and to a degree also on atonement. Thomas Aquinas (thirteenth century) took as strict an Augustinian view of election, free will and grace as Augustine, Luther or Calvin. A large section of Summa Contra Gentiles, might almost be transferred to the Institutes of Calvin or Luther's Bondage of the Will without seeming at all out of place (especially Book Three, chaps. 157–163). His views of atonement make some advance on Anselm, but I find nothing of 'particular atonement.'

Hence, I think it proper to say that the doctrine of particular atonement, though a valid logical inference from the doctrine of election, was an inference seldom made in the history of Christian thought until the controversy among the Calvinists of the Netherlands in the last part of the sixteenth century over the whole plan of salvation.

R. C. Sproul asserts, 'Limited atonement was a major focus of debate between Augustine and Pelagius in the fourth century.' He does not document the claim. He also says limited atonement (as he defines it) is 'classical Augustinianism.' My limited investigation has not found it so. He insists, 'The Calvinist holds it [atonement] was only for the elect'.²⁵ C. A. Hodge makes similar broad statements.²⁶ I think both Hodge and Sproul may be in error on this particular point. There are many with perfectly sound Calvinist credentials who would say that while the work of Christ on the cross was particular in purpose and effect, securing the full redemption of all the elect (not merely making their salvation possible), it was also general, effecting reconciliation of God to mankind and of mankind to God—'in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself.' Even Hodge acknowledges a 'special reference' to those 'elected to everlasting life,' I suppose parallel to a 'general reference' to the whole world. Perhaps it is only a slip of the pen.

I do not find Sproul's assertions supported by the literature. Perhaps I have missed something but I have found nothing about 'limited atonement' in Augustine's writings in the sense Sproul espouses and Calvin seems mainly to ignore the notion while affirming world reconciliation and even a propitiation for the world's sin if not specifically of it (see above).

Adherents to Calvin's Calvinism—of whom I generally admit to being one—can be cited on both sides of this subject. C. H. Spurgeon (who was a predestinarian Calvinist) as cited by Lewis and Demarest²⁷ held to general reconciliation and against limited reconciliation (at-one-ment), as also cited by N. F. Douty.²⁸ I have not been able to check their references. I think it is correct to say, as many Baptist Calvinists, it was ‘scholastic Calvinism’ which ‘narrowed the intent of the atonement and claimed that Christ died solely for the purpose of saving only the elect.’²⁹ In my judgment scholastic Calvinism in this matter goes beyond the relevant portion even of the Canons of the Synod of Dort, which wisely cautions against ‘vainly attempting to investigate the secret ways of the Most High.’³⁰ Also A. H. Strong said, ‘Much that is called Calvinism would have been repudiated by Calvin himself even at the beginning of his career, and is really the exaggeration of his teaching by more scholastic and less religious successors.’³¹ John Gill—perhaps the most influential of all Baptist theologians—advocated a strict limited atonement doctrine.³²

Why Not Before 1619?

Why did this almost unprecedented refinement of doctrine occur at the time and place it did, and not in the French-speaking world of Calvin but in the Netherlands where the Reformed church had become the state religion? In the first place the Dutch theologians were part of an embattled nation, recently delivered from threatened annihilation by Spain, the greatest Roman Catholic power in Europe. This had cost the Dutch people enormous national effort and loss both of civilian and military life. They rightly saw ‘universal atonement’ as advocated by the Remonstrant party as opening the door wide to a doctrinal enemy as dangerous as the Pope and his party. The rapid slide of the Remonstrants to the teaching of universal salvation justified their alarm.

Secondly, the enemy of orthodoxy in soteriology always is some form of self-salvation as in the unacknowledged Semi-Pelagianism of the Roman Church of the time and to a lesser degree in Arminius’ doctrine. The Arminian form of the doctrine of plenary ability of fallen man was supported by a doctrine of universal atonement, as is also the case in Wesleyanism. Most Wesleyan theology to this day does not fully accept vicarious atonement but prefers a modification of the governmental theory. The Assembly at Dordrecht rightly saw that universal atonement was being employed to support a form of ‘plenary ability’ to the denial of a sound doctrine of sin (total depravity) as in all Augustinian theology. They were not mistaken in this and took what they deemed the proper step to correct it.

Thirdly, Lutheran theology had taken a turn away from Augustinian views of election. The Netherlanders and delegates from other lands wished to lift a standard of atonement to enforce the specificity and controlling force of election.

Fourthly, the evangelical revival that we call The Reformation was all about sound biblical, orthodox doctrine and all the evangelical part of Europe had paid an enormous price. (The French evangelicals were again at the time of the Synod of Dort in danger of life and limb and forbidden by their king to send delegates to the Synod.) Hence, no aspect of the doctrine of salvation seemed to be among ‘the adiaphora’ (non-essentials). These threatened Dutchmen and the other assembled delegates had the patience to sort through the problem and thereby to come to what they deemed to be logically sound, biblically correct and in step with the faith of the Apostles. It was not an epoch like our own of merely feel-good religion. They were of the conviction that universal redemption, as Arminians of the day (and some later Wesleyans) understood it, led to the doctrine of universal salvation, so they did not shrink from affirming that the specific, effective work of Calvary was for the elect alone. Let us see exactly what they said about it.

The Second Canon of the Synod of Dort

The ‘Second Head of Doctrine’ treats ‘Of the Death of Christ, and the Redemption of Men thereby’ (not redemption ‘of the elect,’ but ‘of men thereby’). First are several paragraphs on divine justice, grace, the perfect satisfaction in the sacrifice of Christ, its ‘infinite value,’ promise of the gospel, sufficiency of the ‘sacrifice of Christ’ even for those who do not repent or believe in Christ, and a sentence reaffirming salvation wholly by grace. Then the critical Article VIII follows.

Art. VIII. For this was the sovereign counsel and most gracious will and purpose of God the Father, that the quickening and saving efficacy of the most precious death of his Son should extend to all the elect, for bestowing upon them alone the gift of justifying faith, thereby to bring them infallibly to salvation: that is, it was the will of God, that Christ by the blood of the cross, whereby he confirmed the new covenant, should effectually redeem [emphasis added] out of every people, tribe, nation, and language, all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation, and given to him by the Father; that he should confer upon them faith, which, together with all the other saving gifts of the Holy Spirit, he purchased for them by his death; should purge them from all sin, both original and actual, whether committed before or after believing; and having faithfully preserved them even to the end, should at last bring them free from every spot and blemish to the enjoyment of glory in his own presence forever.

What Dort Did Not Say

The critical words are, ‘it was the will of God that Christ by the blood ... should effectually redeem ... all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation.’ The governing phrase is ‘effectually redeem’ and the decisive term is ‘effectually.’ This sentence moves in the previously announced territory of Articles III and IV which says Christ’s death was of ‘infinite worth ... sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world.’ The sentence affirms nothing and denies nothing about the design of atonement as regards ‘the whole world.’ The sense is that Christ’s blood effected salvation of the elect ‘only’ and was designed of God to do so. This was Dort’s 1618 response to the second Arminian article of 1610 which asserts the ‘Savior of the world ... obtained for ... all men and for every man, by his death on the cross, redemption and forgiveness of sins.’³³ It was evidently not of interest to the delegates at Dordrecht to specify further what God had done or had not done for the non-elect in the death of Christ. They were at pains to make plain that divine election was not conditioned by anything except God’s sovereign will. They also made plain the salvation of these elect and accomplishment of salvation by particular atonement of particular people, the gift of faith to those same people, and their perseverance. This gift is a sovereign, gracious bestowal on the elect only.

In a series of ‘articles’ Arminius set forth the system of original ‘Arminian’ theology. In the fifteenth article Arminius constructed an order of the decrees of God.³⁴ In it election depends on foreseen faith. In the seventeenth article Arminius affirms, ‘All unregenerate persons have freedom of will and capability of ... rejecting the proffered grace of God ... without any difference of the elect and of the reprobate'³⁵ but they are condemned because God has given everyone 'sufficient grace' to believe, but the non-elect do not use it. This 'sufficient grace must necessarily be laid down [i.e. conferred by God]'. 'Were the fact otherwise, the justice of God could not be defended in his condemning those who do not believe.'³⁶ This is of course really a denial of by 'grace alone' in salvation. If to be fair (just) God 'must necessarily' do something for sinners condemned already (John 3:36) then it is not of grace at all. In Arminius' view 'restored ability' is a claim every sinner may justly demand of the Creator.

This was the kind of thinking Reformed Christianity had to expunge from its collective body or ultimately retreat to the Pelagianism from which by the Reformation it had escaped.

Yet in doing so the Canons of Dort do not deny general reconciliation (at-one-ment). They only proclaim 'particular redemption' as a necessary logical accompaniment of particular election, an election not based on the mans wise choice nor 'on human will or exertion, but on God, who has mercy' (Rom. 9:16).

In my judgment, the leading present advocates of a misapprehended limited atonement are correct in what they affirm but err only in what they deny. I think in the effort to deny any kind of reconciliation of the world to Christ in His Calvary work they err in explaining away plain texts, sometimes grotesquely.

W. G. T. Shedd's Suggestion

W. G. T. Shedd was one of the most thoroughly, theologically, historically informed and biblically competent theological writers of modern times. Early in his treatment, Shedd explains the doctrine of particular atonement in a manner quite compatible with 'general reconciliation.' A. H. Strong, another competent Calvinist, seems to regard particular atonement in a manner consistent with his acceptance of an Augustinian form of election doctrine. Yet his brief defense of general reconciliation (at-one-ment) is convincing and, I think, correct.³⁷

Let us look further at Shedd's contribution just noted. He points out that much disagreement is unfortunately caused by failure to agree on the words employed. Specifically, if applied to intended application, the extent of the atonement is limited to the elect, and there is no disagreement. 'If the word means value, then the atonement is unlimited.'³⁸

Shedd goes on to make what I regard to be a correct and helpful distinction: 'Atonement must be distinguished from redemption. The latter term includes the application of the atonement.' Then turning to the 'statements that speak of the work of Christ as limited by ... election' he points out the Westminster Confession (often held to teach limited atonement) really speaks of limited redemption (Westminster Confession, VIII. viii) and goes onto say, 'Accordingly the Scriptures limit redemption, as contradistinguished from atonement, to the Church [i.e. the elect].'³⁹ Then noting 'redemption includes reconciliation' he cites Bible passages which speak of Christ's work on the cross as effecting redemption specially for those who have faith, 'his people,' 'thy congregation,' 'the church of God,' etc.⁴⁰ He adds, 'Since redemption implies the application of Christ's atonement, universal or unlimited redemption cannot logically be affirmed by those who hold that faith is wholly the gift of God, and that saving grace is bestowed solely by election.’⁴¹ So Shedd, along with many who claim to be Augustinian or Calvinist, affirms atonement (at-one-ment, reconciliation) is unlimited, and redemption is limited. Shedd goes on in his usual thoroughly biblical-exegetical manner to expound and to defend particular redemption.

This does not, however, quite close the discussion, for some will not accept the distinction and perhaps can point to difficult texts. More seriously, some who insist on unlimited redemption and deny particular, personal (not based on foreknowledge) election believe universal salvation is assured by universal atonement. This, of course, is thoroughly unbiblical and anti-Christian. Arminians (Wesleyans) hold that faith foreseen is really logically previous to election and therefore see no place for any real atonement that is not universal. Election is subsequent in logical order to ‘deciding for Christ’ and everyone has some power at least to co-operate with the Holy Spirit in making that ‘step of faith.’

Richard Watson (1781–1833) systematized Wesley’s thought and published it in two large volumes. A long section presents ‘Redemption—Farther Benefits.’⁴² Here he develops the doctrine that by virtue of universal redemption entire sanctification is attainable in the present life as a ‘farther benefit’ of Christ’s work on the cross. This has been carried on by later theologians of Wesleyan persuasion in various holiness and ‘entire sanctification’ movements.

The Word of Life, volume two of *Systematic Theology*⁴³ by Thomas Oden, brings evangelical Methodist theology up to date. It is a major contribution to theology. The distinctives of Wesleyan thinking are not emphasized in Oden’s book. Pages 390–392 treat ‘The Extent of Beneficial Effects of His Death.’ I have diligently read these pages several times to find what Oden’s view might be. He quotes the Russian Catechism, Church Dogmatics by Barth and works of Bancroft, Gerhard and Schmidt, Aquinas, and cites Turretin and Fuller. Yet he makes no clear statement of his own view of the controverted question of particular redemption. Perhaps this is not to be faulted in view of Oden’s apparent intent throughout his three volumes of Systematic Theology to direct attention to the history of believing writing on theology rather than fine-tuned statements of his own on every question.

Agreement in Prayers and the Hymn Book

It does seem, however, whatever the logic of the ‘ordo salutis,’ all evangelical believers become Augustinians in prayer for the lost and in the hymn book.

The hymns and prayers of all evangelical parties to the debate imply not universally restored plenary ability but total inability of ‘natural man,’ most famously perhaps in Charles Wesley’s fine, ‘hangs my helpless soul on thee’ (from ‘Jesus, Lover of My Soul’). Often on opposite page is arch-Calvinist Augustus Toplady’s ‘Rock of Ages’ (‘Thou must save, and thou alone’). Isaac Watts, third or fourth generation Calvinist preacher, appears in the Methodist Hymnal (1905) in hymns laced with the theology of Dort—‘How sad our state by nature is ... Satan binds our captive souls ... the voice of sovereign grace ... the gracious call’ (no. 668). In another by Charles Wesley he prays to the ‘Son of God’ to ‘Speak with that voice that wakes the dead,/ And bids the sinner rise,/and bids his guilty conscience dread/ The death that never dies.’ This sounds much more like ‘total depravity’ and ‘total inability’ than universally restored freedom and power of the will to turn to God ‘without further divine aid.’ In the foxholes we all become believers that God alone can save.

A Note:

Some of the clearest statements of Reformation theology, including redemption and universal at-one-ment (reconciliation) current today are emanating from authors not associated with traditional ‘Reformed’ denominations. A. W. Pink (Baptist) in all his writings expounds these matters in full loyalty to biblical truth. Dr Curt Daniel, Ph.D., Edinburgh University (Reformed Bible Church) has produced a very helpful booklet Biblical Calvinism: An Introduction to the Doctrines of Grace.⁴⁴ These and many others are self-publishing some excellent literature for which the main-line presses have not found room. May their tribe increase! We seem to be returning to the most effective propaganda arm of the Reformation of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, pamphleteering on paper and in cyberspace.

¹ Article, ‘Dort, Synod of’ McClintock & Strong, Cyclodedia, vol. ii, p. 870.

² Augustine, Exposition of Certain Propositions from the Epistle to the Romans, pp. 60, 61.

³ Augustine, Retractions 1.22.2.

⁴ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine iii (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971–1989), pp. 274, 275.

⁵ James Arminius, The Works of Arminius ii, trans. James Nichols (Auburn & Buffalo: Derby, Miller & Orion, recently repr. 1853), art. xvii. p. 497.

⁶ ibid., p. 497.

⁷ Francois Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought, trans. Philip Mairet (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), p. 227.

⁸ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian ii, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), ii. 17.1–6.

⁹ Wendel, Calvin, pp. 358, 359.

¹⁰ Pelikan, Christian Tradition, ‘The Growth of Medieval Theology 600–1300,’ p. 118.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹¹ John Calvin, Harmony of Matthew, Mark and Luke ii, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1949), p. 214; new trans., iii, 1972, p. 139.

¹² John Calvin, Commentary on John’s Gospel (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1949), I, p. 64; new trans., iv, p. 32.

¹³ ibid., pp. 74, 75.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 75.

¹⁵ C. A. Hodge, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1886 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1947, 1993), pp. 171–173.

¹⁶ John Calvin, Commentaries on the Epistle of Paul to The Romans, trans. & ed. John Owen, (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1849), p. 211.

¹⁷ John Calvin, Commentary on Philippians (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1949), p. 148; new trans. xi, p. 308.

¹⁸ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 777, 778.

¹⁹ ibid., p. 778.

²⁰ John Calvin, Commentaries on the Catholic Epistles, trans. & ed. John Owen, (Edinburgh: The Calvin Translation Society, 1855), p. 173.

²¹ B. B. Warfield, The Plan of Salvation, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1973).

²² ibid., p. 104.

²³ Francis Turretin, The Atonement of Christ, trans. J. R. Wilson, 1850, new ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1978), p. 115.

²⁴ ibid., p. 116.

²⁵ R. C. Sproul, The Cross of Christ (Orlando: Ligonier Ministries, 1989), pp. 68, 69.

²⁶ C. A. Hodge, Romans, ii, p. 545.

²⁷ Gordon Lewis and Bruce Demarest, Integrative Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1990), p. 381.

²⁸ N. F. Douty, The Death of Christ (Swengel: Reiner, 1973), pp. 109, 110.

²⁹ Lewis and Demarest, Integrative Theology ii, p. 381.

³⁰ Philip Schaff, ‘First Head of Doctrine,’ in The Creeds of Christendom iii, 1919, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), art. xiv, p. 584.

³¹ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 778.

³² John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978), pp. 11–32.

³³ Schaff, Creeds, p. 546.

³⁴ Arminius, art. XV, ‘On the Decrees of God which Concern Salvation,’ Works, ii, pp. 494, 495.

³⁵ ibid., pp. 497, 498.

³⁶ ibid., art. xvii, para. 12, p. 498.

³⁷ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 771–773.

³⁸ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), p. 464.

³⁹ ibid., p. 469.

⁴⁰ ibid., pp. 469, 470.

⁴¹ ibid., p. 470.

⁴² Richard Watson, Theological Part ii, chap. 29, vol. ii, pp. 450–469.

⁴³ Thomas Oden, Systematic Theology (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992).

⁴⁴ Contact P.O. Box 422, Mt Olive, MS 39119, USA.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (572). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

18

Further Benefits and Accomplishments of the Death of Christ in our Place

The entrance of sin to the world in Satan and its extension to the human race whom God had created for His glory set loose a principle of disorder at the heart of the created order. The cross set things right, in principle, again. It is therefore to be expected that the cross which provided redemption for us poor, lost sinners should produce immense effects for good, setting things right again, throughout creation. Once the soul of the sinner, by the cross has been set free from bondage to fear death (Heb. 2:15) and the power of the devil, he is able unselfishly to contemplate the effects of redemption as far as the effects of sin had gone. Once set free from dread of the future the redeemed sinner is able to think of the cosmic environment in other ways than how it affects his health and his happiness. The entire created cosmos reaped a deliverance by Calvary. There were special gains for the Son of God as well as for the Father. The benefits of Calvary provide power for Christians to live victoriously and buoyancy to enjoy the victory.

These matters do not always gain the attention of theologians if their art is pursued only controversially, but ordinary devout believers relish the thoughts and blessings connected with our Lord's victory at the cross. Books of Christian devotion, like the New Testament itself, put the cross at the center of Christian piety.

The accomplishments of our Lord through the cross extended to the created cosmic order, to Christ Himself, to the Godhead and to the regenerate believer. They shall be discussed in that order.

Benefits for the Cosmic Order

1. The atonement for sin wrought at Calvary reorganized the cosmos in some unexplained mysterious way—a manner that is reported in Scripture, but never explained. We know of it only by allusion. In Romans 8, one of Paul's great rhetorical flights, 'the whole creation' is said to have been unwillingly subject to 'futility ... bondage ... decay ... groaning' (Rom. 8:18–23), to be fully delivered in the future at the time believers receive their resurrection bodies. No one knows exactly what this means, but evidently the fall of man harmfully affected 'the whole creation.' In his Epistle to the Colossians (1:19, 20) it is indicated that final deliverance of the whole creation is by a reconciliation which Christ has already effected 'by the blood of his cross,' 'through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether on earth or in heaven.'

Just how or why anything 'in heaven' should need to be 'reconciled' is not clear, yet Hebrews affirms that His 'better sacrifice ... of himself' (9:23, 26) 'purified ... heavenly things' in a manner analogous to the Old Testament priestly purification of things in an earthly sanctuary. Perhaps, as Calvin remarks about God's condescension in all biblical language, God is using baby talk here, accommodating to Jewish patterns of thought. Even so, the point is plain that Calvary's work left nothing in earth or heaven quite the same. The full integrity of the cosmic order of things was restored. He who 'inhabits eternity' had righted His time-bound world (Isa. 57:15; 66:1) in some way.

Older generations of believers, the ones who composed the lyrics for the hymn books most Christians still use, understood some of this. They were greatly interested in the subjective effects of 'the blood of Christ' on their character as we shall see, but they were fully aware of the universal effects of the transaction as well. Emphasis in recent religion has turned to how we feel about things rather than how matters really stand. Perception of reality not reality itself is the thing today! So the blood has been dropped from most recently composed religious music. Perceptions of reality rarely penetrate to the awful blot that called forth the wrath of God vented on the Son at Calvary.

2. Yet the New Testament emphasis, like our old hymns, is utterly unashamed of the bloody trace of redemption's story in personal salvation. The great C. H. Spurgeon in a sermon preached Sunday, 9 September 1888 met similar objections to the grim realities of what is derisively called 'slaughterhouse religion' with a warning:

Remember, that Christ viewed as living, and not as having died, is not a saving Christ. He himself saith, 'I am he that liveth and was dead.' The moderns cry, 'Why not preach more about his life, and less about his death?' I reply, Preach his life as much as you will, but never apart from his death; for it is by his blood that we are redeemed.¹

A partial list of the accomplishments specifically traceable to ‘the precious blood’ (1 Peter 1:19) will help to support the emphasis of this chapter: justification (Rom. 5:9), redemption (Rev. 5:9; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14), remission of sin (Heb. 9:22), forgiveness (Col. 1:14), loosing from our sins (Rev. 1:5), purging of conscience (Heb. 9:14), cleansing (1 John 1:7), sanctification (Heb. 13:12), reconciliation (Eph. 2:13), blotting out charges (Col. 2:14), Christian triumph over sin and Satan (Rev. 12:11; Col. 2:15), communion (1 Cor. 10:16). The blood has ‘purchased’ the church (Acts 20:28 kjv), it speaks ‘a better word’ (Heb. 12:24), it has been ‘sprinkled’ (Heb. 12:24). The blood of Christ is ‘imperishable’ (1 Peter 1:23), precious (1 Peter 1:19), supremely holy (sanctified) (Heb. 10:29) and innocent (Matt. 27:4).

‘The blood of the Lamb’ appeared almost as often in the hymn books of past generations as in the New Testament. Being ‘washed in the blood,’ however, falls offensively on the modern ear, now a generation or two removed from even dressing a chicken for Sunday dinner. So the hymns and the homiletical appeals made in connection with the hymns have fallen out of use. Let us take care the biblical doctrine which the blood signifies does not likewise disappear.

3. Closely allied with cosmic reconciliation, noted above, is the benefit, through Christ’s death, for the whole human race, whether they ever hear of Christ or not or whether hearing the gospel they receive it in faith or not. Before we proceed I call attention to the fact that even some of the strongest advocates of ‘limited atonement’ agree with us on this matter, at least in part. Two strong, though reserved, advocates of ‘limited atonement’ are C. A. Hodge and John Murray. Hodge nevertheless acknowledges: ‘Augustinians readily admit that the death of Christ had relation to man, to the whole human family, which it had not to the fallen angels.... It ... secures to the whole race at large, and to all classes of men, innumerable blessings, both providential and religious ... There is a sense, therefore, in which He died for all.’² Further: ‘He died for all, that He might ... secure for men the innumerable blessings attending their state on earth.’

Likewise, J. Murray states:

The unbelieving and reprobate in this world enjoy numerous benefits that flow from the fact that Christ died and rose again.... The benefits innumerable which are enjoyed by all men indiscriminately are related to the death of Christ and may be said to accrue from it in one way or another.³

I shall not repeat what was stated in chapter 14 on the extent of the atonement, save to say the reconciliation of Calvary for ‘the whole world’ is based squarely on this text: ‘... that is, in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them, and entrusting to us the message of reconciliation’ (2 Cor. 5:19).

In my judgment this ‘reconciliation,’ in part, affects God’s treatment of the sons of Adam from Eden onward. If God had ‘imputed’ (kjv) ‘their trespasses against them’ fully the full execution of death would have put an end to the human race. Now, since Calvary, it is clear why. The reconciliation in promise only (Gen. 3:15, the protoevangelion) became fulfillment at Calvary. There is a ‘purpose and grace, which he [God] gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began, and which now has been manifested through the appearing of our Savior Christ Jesus, who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel’ (2 Tim. 1:9, 10). In doing so God’s grace brought salvation for ‘all people’ (Titus 2:11). I think it takes a remarkable degree of exegetical gymnastics to restrict ‘all people’ here to ‘every kind of people’ or ‘elect people.’ Paul made a bona fide offer of salvation to all and in God’s name ‘commanded all men everywhere to repent’ and believe.

Calvary secured a reprieve on the penalty of eternal death for sin until the Judgment Day. Meanwhile, because of Calvary, execution is held in abeyance, ‘not counting their trespasses against them’ means God does not presently hold anything against sinners. ‘[T]he grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation for all people’ (Titus 2:11). And ‘whosoever will’ may ‘Come’ (Rev. 22:17 kjv). The basis is the blood of Christ. The specific language of 1 Timothy 2:1–6 is helpful in resolving the obvious tensions of this doctrine. I think it points the way to avoidance of the error of the universal redemption doctrine of universalism and the error of some forms of limited atonement doctrine. I note: we are urged to pray ‘for all [emphasis added] people [anthropon, male and female], for kings,’ etc. These are both believers and unbelievers, elect and non-elect. ‘This is good, and it is pleasing in the sight of God our Savior, who desires all people to be saved’ (1 Tim. 2:3). It amounts to a kind of special pleading to suppose ‘all people’ in verse 3 to be only the elect when the whole human race is designated by the same Greek words in the first part of the paragraph (v. 1). Of course in verse 4 ‘who desires [esv and rsv; ‘Who will have’ kjv, Gr. thelō] all people to be saved’ has no reference to God’s predestination, for which the usual verb is proorizo, or election (ekloge, eklektos) or purpose (several Greek nouns and verbs). Paul is speaking of God ad hominem (i.e. a human manner of speaking) as indeed we all must. Paul knew no more of God’s mind in such matters than we do. He disclaimed such specifically (Rom. 11:33–35).

In John 12:27–34 we find Jesus early in the Passion Week predicting His imminent death and being ‘lifted up [on the cross] from the earth’ and somewhat enigmatically saying that ‘when’ that happens ‘I ... will draw all people to myself’ (John 12:32). Up to that time He had spoken of the Father as the power which draws men to Christ in faith (John 6:44 and 65). Perhaps there is major reference here to some special enlightenment short of the call of Romans 8:28, 29 which renders one also sanctified and glorified. In view of the natural blindness of the children of Adam we may be sure no one ever came to saving faith unless in a supernatural way he is ‘taught by God’ (John 6:45). We have to be made willing to come by the new birth of Word and Spirit. This was not changed by the ‘It is finished!’ of Calvary. Yet now, after Calvary, from the ascended Son and the Father came the Spirit (Acts 1:1–5) just as the Baptist said (Matt. 3:11) and Jesus promised (John 14–16). That Spirit of the Son would now be diffused through the church through whose witness Christ would draw men to Himself. It is also a fact that preaching of the cross is the specific spear-point of the gospel which penetrates, woos and wins.

4. The Bible teaches that the victory that Christ won at Calvary delivered a permanent blow to Satan and all evil angels and spirits. It is a source of amazement to modern people—that is, to those few who take the trouble to discover it—how seriously Scripture takes the doctrine of satanic and demonic personal powers, especially their interference in worldly affairs. Daniel represents holy archangels Michael and Gabriel as in conflict with evil spiritual beings known as the prince of Persia and the prince of Greece, and they as delaying the arrival of the holy angel for three weeks (Dan.8:16; 9:21; 10:13, 21). Paul speaks of evil spirits in such a way as to suggest a hierarchy organized to do Satan’s work (Eph. 6:12; Rom. 8:38). That Christ’s Calvary victory over them was manifested at His ascension (past), sitting at God's right hand (present) and Second Advent (future) is noted at Philippians 2:6–10; Colossians 1:20; 2:15; and 1 Peter 3:22; and elsewhere. Perhaps, as some competent exegetes suggest, the 'elementary principles of the world' (Gal. 4:3, 9; 'elements' kjv) should be understood as 'elemental spirits' (e.g. O. Cullmann, *The State in the New Testament*⁴). Several leading European theologians of the twentieth century, beginning with Martin Dibelius (De Geisterwelt in Glauben des Paulus, 1909), Karl Barth and O. Cullmann have supported the proposition that the 'powers that be' (Rom. 13:1 kjv) and 'rulers of this age' (1 Cor. 2:6, 8; 'princes of this world' kjv) are satanic spirits. They might not accept the New Testament as correct in asserting the existence of such unseen spirits, though ready to demythologize them into some human spiritual or psychic syndrome, personal or collective. In any case, they acknowledge the New Testament as teaching these things.

Martin Luther made much of Christ's victory over the devil at Calvary—as is well known. Calvin treats the subject somewhat at length.⁵ John 12:31–33 seems to say Satan was judged at Calvary and Hebrews 2:14, 15 that the devil, as regards his 'power of death,' was destroyed 'through death,' i.e. Christ's. In that connection all of us must be thankful that Jesus 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. 1:10). Hebrews 2:15 seems to say both saints and sinners before Jesus' death and resurrection were in bondage to fear of death. Likewise, though all men naturally 'fear death' believers in Christ have been delivered from 'bondage' to that fear. Because He died and yet lives so shall we.

Benefits for Christ Himself

5. For Christ Himself the crucifixion was the last stage of the humiliation and the vestibule of the first stage of exaltation (if one accepts the burial as the first stage, see earlier discussion). When He committed His spirit into the hands of His Father we may be sure the 'joy that was set before him' (Heb. 12:2) began. There were many reasons for joy (Heb. 12:2), not least that His part of an 'eternal covenant' had been completed (Heb. 13:20). He had gained a prophetic vision of a numerous seed (Isa. 53:10; Ps. 72:15–17)—'many sons' whom He would bring 'to glory' (Heb. 2:10). By the cross He earned a crown (Phil. 2:9; Isa. 53:11, 12; 1 Peter 1:10, 11).

6. The cross represented for our Lord a finished work. 'After making purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high' (Heb. 1:3). There is more in this sentence than the session as installation in a reign. His earthly life had been a ceaseless 'cross-bearing' from conception onward. 'The Son of Man came ... to give his life a ransom' and at the end of that Passion it was all over. Now He could, as it were, sit down. The 'session' in heaven signifies the completed work of redemption. So there was a finality of Calvary for Christ Himself. '[W]hen Christ had offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God' (Heb. 10:12). '[H]e did this once for all when he offered up himself' (Heb. 7:27; cf. 1 Peter 3:18). There will be no second engagement.

The final, never to be repeated, never to be reenacted, never to be renewed character of the sacrifice of Calvary was in a large way the lynchpin of the Reformation of the sixteenth century—a corollary of justification by faith.

The teaching of Rome regarding 'the sacrifice of the mass' in the sixteenth century is still maintained by official authority to the present day. Rome both affirms and denies the finality of the cross in regard to human sin. ‘The Papal Mass, A Sacrilege by which Christ’s Supper Was Not Only Profaned But Annihilated’: so is chapter 18 of Book IV of Calvin’s Institutes entitled. The Roman Church has insisted to the present day that the bread and wine of the Eucharist are changed in substance to the veritable (i.e. real) body and blood of Christ. This is known as transubstantiation (change of substance). The ‘accidents,’ i.e. properties, remain those of bread and wine, hence they can be received and ingested as food. The bread is said to remain the body of incarnate God after the ceremony of the Mass is completed and may be (and frequently is) ‘reserved’ in a suitable receptacle (‘the tabernacle’) and elevated appropriately above or near the table (‘altar’) where the ceremony with the elements is conducted. This reserved sacrament is often formally adored by ‘religious’ personnel who address it and even pray to it. Many Roman Catholic sanctuaries have a special chapel where such a practice is perpetuated daily, even twenty-four hours a day. In Roman Catholic countries the sacramental elements are often borne in procession through the streets for the worship of crowds lining the way.

The one who performs the rite is called a priest precisely because the Mass is held to be a genuine sacrifice calling for a priestly (not a presbyterial) function. Hence, also the piece of furniture whereon the elements (i.e. the sacrifice of body and blood of Christ) are placed is called (and regarded as) an altar—a place of sacrifice. (Which is not to be confused with a communion table, or other surface sometimes metaphorically called an altar because gifts—offerings of money, food, flowers, fruits of harvest, Bibles, etc.—are placed there.)

Rome steadfastly perpetuates and defends the doctrine of the Mass. Masses are held to be meritorious for salvation of the offerer (priest) and attendees. Masses may be ‘said’ (performed) for the dead or living to aid in their salvation in some way. In large basilica-type church buildings there may be many altars with attending priests for each altar. The faithful pay for Masses to be said at these altars—especially for ‘poor souls in purgatory.’ This was a grievous offense to all the Reformers of the Reformation era and remains so to this day for any one sensitive to perversion of gospel purity.

These remarks are not intended to denigrate or condemn the believers in Christ who have been caught up in this system, which buries the gospel almost out of sight in unscriptural traditional observances. The Reformers regarded this feature of the papal church as the part which most severely vitiated the true gospel, making it, in the hands of zealots, an anti-gospel. This is why they chose the adjective ‘evangelical’ (good-news-preaching) as a name for their message and movement. They wished specifically to reject the notion of salvation by merit or even of gracious enablement to merit salvation. It is also why we must heartily reject the papal system grounded in the doctrine of repeated sacrifices and any cloying teaching or practice that distorts the Christian religion.

This discussion must not be extended, but I wish to emphasize the point that the offering of the body of Christ was a one-time event, plainly declared by Jesus Himself and competent apostolic authority never to be repeated. I will quote somewhat at length one of Calvin’s pages as not likely to be improved upon and let the matter rest. Remember Calvin originally addressed much of what he had to say about the false sacrifice of the Mass to evangelical believers who were forced to worship clandestinely lest they be apprehended by the Inquisition. It was at a time when civil authority was daily killing those discovered to be evangelicals and at a time when Calvin was advisor also to the thousands of Reformed, evangelical believers in the Netherlands whom the Emperor and his chief general, the Duke of Alva, sought to exterminate. After citing affirmations of Christ's once-only, sufficient sacrifice (Heb. 9:26; 10:10, 14, 18, 26) he goes on to say:

Christ also signified this by his last words, uttered with his last breath, when he said 'It is finished.' We commonly regard the last words of the dying as oracles. Christ, dying, testifies that by his one sacrifice all that pertained to our salvation had been accomplished and fulfilled. Are we to be allowed daily to sew innumerable patches upon such a sacrifice, as if it were imperfect, when he has so clearly commended its perfection? When God's Sacred Word not only affirms but cries out and contends that this sacrifice was performed only once and all its force remains for ever, do not those who require another sacrifice accuse it of imperfection and weakness? But to what purpose is the mass, which has been so set up that a hundred thousand sacrifices may be performed each day, except to bury and submerge Christ's Passion, by which he offered himself as sole sacrifice to the Father? Who, that is not blind, that it was Satan's boldness that grappled with such clear and open truth? Nor am I unaware of the tricks by which the father of lies is wont to disguise his fraud: that they are not varied or different sacrifices, but the same one often repeated. But such smoke clouds are easily dispersed. For in the whole discussion the apostle contends not only that there were no other sacrifices, but that this one was offered only once and is never to be repeated.

Subtler men escape through a more secret chink—that it is not a repetition but an application. But it is just as easy to refute this sophism also. For Christ did not once for all offer himself up on condition that his sacrifice would be ratified by new oblations each day, but that the benefit of it should be communicated to us by the preaching of the gospel and the administration of the Sacred Supper.

Thus Paul says, 'Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed' [1 Cor. 5:7], and he bids us feast [1 Cor. 5:8]. This, I say, is the means whereby the sacrifice of the cross is duly applied to us, when it is communicated to us to be enjoyed, and we receive it in true faith.⁶

Though Martin Luther also is on record with very extended remarks similar to those of Calvin, let us cite the confessional documents he inspired. The Lutheran Augsburg Confession (from Luther's time) rejected transubstantiation as well as any notion that the 'mass,' i.e. the Lord's Supper, was a sacrifice for sin, saying, 'The passion of Christ' is the sufficient oblation and sacrifice and citing Hebrews 10:10 adds, 'The Scripture also teaches that we are justified before God through faith in Christ, when we believe that our sins are forgiven for Christ's sake.' Then significantly, 'Now, if the mass do take away the sins of the quick and the dead [in purgatory] ... then justification comes by the work of Masses, and not by faith; which the Scriptures cannot endure.'⁷ As C. P. Krauth, perhaps the greatest American historian of Lutheran doctrinal developments, says of the Lutheran doctrine on this point (in the Augsburg Confession, tenth art.):

The body and blood of Christ cannot be reserved, laid up in monstrances, or carried in procession, any more than the Holy Ghost can be laid upon a Bible, or carried about in one ... we worship Christ there ['at His table'] in no other mode than we worship Him everywhere.⁸

I have extended these quotations from standard sources of unquestioned authority for evangelical Protestants for a very pressing reason and beg the reader's attention and indulgence. Periodically waves of opinion among devout Protestants (and Roman Catholics) for rapprochement, or even 'healing of the breach,' rise high. On the personal level, Christian fellowship across the breach is taking place increasingly. On the personal level, I myself have been a part of this effort and approve heartily. Yet there has been no real movement at all in the papal hierarchy in this doctrinal area as recent Vatican documents, decrees and publications, including 'The New Catholic Catechism' of 1994, amply prove. There have been concessions toward the various kinds of liberal biblical criticism of the sort evangelicals must reject. In fact most Catholic biblical scholars of note today accept the documentary-development theories of Old Testament origins developed originally by Protestant, evolutionary Old Testament scholars over the past 200 years. Some of the most prominent negative New Testament critics of the left teach and write as Roman Catholics, as in some volumes of the Anchor Bible series. So though there is ample room on personal local levels for interaction and even co-operation and fellowship, the heart of the gospel is as much at stake today as in 'the breach' of the Reformation nearly 500 years ago.

Benefits for the Godhead as a Vehicle of Revelation

7. Sound orthodox theology from Augustine of Hippo and Hilary of Poitiers to late Reformation times rejects all notions of suffering in the nature of the eternal 'God over all, blessed for ever' (Rom. 9:5); 'the One who is high and lifted up, who inhabits eternity' (Isa. 57:15); 'with whom there is no variation or shadow due to change' (James 1:17). The contrary assertion of 'the passibility of God' is almost entirely a modern notion. It was God the Son, according to the Scripture, not the Father God in heaven, who suffered in His human nature on Good Friday. Let us have none of the new Patripassianism.

Yet there was and is marvelous revelation of God in the cross. The cross made several explicit revelations about God. God was 'showing through' the supernatural darkness of the day and the rending of the veil. I shall present some of the scriptural evidences, summarize and attempt to draw some conclusions in a brief manner, even though books have been published on each.

(a) Calvary revealed the gracious purpose of God for sinners. Scripture says, [God] who saved us and called us to a holy calling, not because of our works but because of his own purpose and grace, which he gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began, and which now has been manifested through the appearing of our Savior Christ Jesus, who abolished death [cross and resurrection] and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. 1:9, 10).

Take note: God's 'grace ... now has been manifested through the appearing of our Savior.' The good news was dimly revealed in antiquity to Abraham (Gal. 3:8), but the chief revelation of Old Testament history and legislation is of God's holiness and truth. '[T]he law was given through Moses; grace and truth came ['came' is a very strong word in this context] through Jesus Christ' (John 1:17; cf. v. 14). The grace of God was present at every stage of Old Testament history, yet His holiness and righteous judgment often overshadow the grace. Think of the Great Flood; the death of Nadab and Abihu; the slaughter of Amelekites, Midianites and Canaanites; the Babylonian Captivity; and the story of Achan's execution. Quite to the contrary grace (in the sense of the unmerited favor to the undeserving) is prominent in everything about Jesus—incarnation, life, teaching, etc., but especially in His death. 'O the love that drew salvation's plan, O, the grace that brought it down to man, O, the mighty gulf that God did span at Calvary.'

(b) Calvary revealed the love of God. '[B]ut God shows ['commendeth' kjv; 'demonstrates' nab] his love for us in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us' (Rom. 5:8). The Greek word sunistemi (shows) has the root meaning of 'bring together' and by extension 'to demonstrate, show, bring out something' (Bauer, Arndt and Gingrich) 'render prominent' has been suggested. If ever the love of God was in doubt or obscure, the incarnation-for-immolation of the Second Member of the Godhead made it positive and plain (John 3:16).

(c) Calvary revealed the righteousness of God. According to Romans 3:25 (kjv) and context God 'set forth [Christ Jesus] to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare [Gr. eis endeixin, as a proof, demonstration of] his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past.' God's own personal righteousness in forgiving sins in previous ages without evident even-handed inflection of the penalties of law was 'justified' at Calvary. Substitutionary atonement (propitiation) enabled God righteously to carry out the penalties of His own law in forgiving sinners in ages before Christ's death. He simply remitted 'sins that are past, through the forbearance' looking ahead to the propitiation of sins at Calvary. So Calvary declares 'his righteousness at the present time ... just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus' (Rom. 3:26). Love of God for sinners meets His wrath at Calvary and nowhere else is fully explained. 'Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other' (Ps. 85:10 kjv).

(d) Calvary revealed the wrath of God against sin and sinners. '[W]hy have you forsaken me?' (Matt. 27:46; Ps. 22:1) is explicable only as our Lord Jesus, once our sins were imputed to Him (2 Cor. 5:21), could not be spared the rod of divine abandonment. (See earlier discussions of atonement by vicarious sacrifice.)

(e) Calvary revealed the wisdom of God in providing a way to forgive sinners without relaxing the law of God or His justice in carrying out its penalties. As Romans 3:26 puts the matter, Christ became a propitiation through His blood 'To declare ... at this time his righteousness: that he [God] might be [both] just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus' (Rom. 3:26 kjv). 'Oh, the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God!' (Rom. 11:33).

8. Benefits of the Cross for Useful, Holy Living

It is of great significance for a proper understanding of the nature of the Christian life that the first time Jesus in literal language spoke of His early death He immediately spoke of Christian discipleship in figurative language as taking up one's own cross and following Jesus (Mark 8:31; cf. vv. 34, 35). This is what He said: 'the Son of Man must suffer many things and be rejected by the elders and the chief priests and the scribes and be killed,' etc. Then after Peter tried to talk Jesus out of the whole repulsive notion Jesus went on to say to 'his disciples' in company with 'the people': 'If anyone would come after me [i.e. be a genuine disciple], let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me.' Earlier He had said in connection with the first preaching mission of the Twelve, ‘whoever does not take his cross and follow me is not worthy of me’ (Matt. 10:38); then much later, en route to Jerusalem for the last time, ‘Whoever does not bear his own cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple’ (Luke 14:27).

[W]hile he dwelt on earth ... his whole life was nothing but a sort of perpetual cross ... the reason: that it behoved him to ‘learn obedience through what he suffered ... why should we be exempt ... since he submitted to it for our sake to show us an example of patience in himself.’⁹

The cross, in areas of the world ruled by Rome, was a symbol of social stigma and disgrace. For people in ancient Palestine who had seen a condemned criminal bearing each a cross and who had perhaps seen the same miserable man hanging in some public place the cross would have inspired terror as well. Any one seen bearing such a cross would have been on his way to public execution. No wonder therefore that the message of the cross, the central feature of the Christian proclamation, was a scandal to the Jews and foolishness to Gentiles! Yet the cross both in redemption and in Christian discipleship is both God’s power and wisdom (1 Cor. 1:23, 24).

Our Cross and His Yoke

‘Take my yoke upon you ... For my yoke is easy’ (Matt. 11:29, 30). ‘Whoever does not bear his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple’ (Luke 14:27).

A yoke usually joins two things, persons, animals. A yoke may have a bucket at each end, the burden on the carrier’s shoulder; or it may rest on the necks of two oxen, the burden suspended between the mid-point of the yoke. In the case of persons, the figure is to share a burden as two oxen under a common yoke. Sometimes we are enjoined to cast all our care upon the Lord (1 Peter 5:7) but in the context of Matthew 11:29 Jesus means that the burdens of our life should be brought to Him where we share them with Him. There we find rest unto our souls. We still have the burden and with it Jesus’ yoke—but the yoke is easy and the burden light. The key to this paradoxical teaching is to ‘learn from me’ the meekness He had. The ‘meek’ are the blessed ‘for they shall inherit the earth.’ Some suggest the burdens were the legalistic demands of the Scribes enforced upon common people. The Old Testament ritual system was indeed described by Peter at the Jerusalem conference as ‘a yoke on the neck of the [new, Gentiles] disciples that neither our fathers [Jews] nor we have been able to bear’ (Acts 15:10). Of course Jesus did finish off that burden, though not the legalisms that we impose upon ourselves or upon others. It is likely Jesus was referring to the burdens of Hamlet’s soliloquy—‘the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune ... the heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to ... the whips and scorns of time.’

To take up this end of our yoke with Christ, in the sense of entering into the ‘fellowship of his suffering, being made conformable unto his death’ is no different essentially from bearing each his own cross as we follow Christ. As an old gospel song says, ‘He always takes the heavy end and leaves the light to me’.

More specifically, to bear each his own cross means first, to enter into suffering because we are Christ’s, i.e. suffering brought on specifically because we have taken His name and second, to accept the sufferings that Providence sends our way meekly, without bitterness. The Reformation era was a time of fierce persecution of evangelical believers in all of Europe, hence a large literature about cross-bearing, suffering for the Lord's sake and martyrdom arose. Until very recently those books were widely read among English-speaking peoples: Fox's Book of Martyrs, for example.

It was also a time when sickness and death were frequent visitors to nearly every family circle. Quite naturally an expositor like Calvin related much of his commentaries to willing acceptance of what Hamlet (Shakespeare) called 'the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune' as the refining chastisement of a loving Father God. The Institutes III. 8. i and all of III. 8.1–11, eleven pages in the Westminster Edition, develop this theme. Every generation has produced such literature for our profit.

I propose that what Christ said in a nutshell—as each disciple taking up his own cross as the way to Christian integrity, maturity, wholeness, holiness—is expounded and explained in four respects by Paul, one by John and one by the author of Hebrews.

(1) The righteousness of conformity to divine laws is 'fulfilled in us,' precisely because 'God ... sending his own Son ... for sin, he condemned sin in the flesh, in order that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us' (Rom. 8:3, 4).

(2) Our standing as saints and to be presented to God some day 'holy and unblameable and unproveable in his sight' (kjv) is precisely because 'he has now reconciled [us] in his body of flesh by his death' (Col. 1:22).

(3) Specifically, self-denial (or unselfishness) is enjoined by the fact that 'he died for all, that those who live might no longer live for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised' (2 Cor. 5:14, 15).

(4) A biblical 'separation from the world' (a very unpopular item in our day of stepping to the world's tunes and conforming to its standards and styles) finds its support in Christ's cross: 'far be it from me,' Paul told the world-conforming Galatians, 'to boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world' (Gal. 6:14).

(5) The 'water and the blood' of Christ, who thereby Himself overcame the world, is our power of victory (1 John 5:4–6). This depends on a right doctrine of the cross. Christianity in integrity means the orthodox Christology of Nicea and Chalcedon and the vicarious satisfaction of divine justice at Calvary, i.e. propitiation of the divine wrath as well as expiation of the evil of sin. Nothing can set the conscience free from the accusation of conscience and consequent weakness at the emotional and ethical center unless the sinner, having been made aware of the debt of sin he owes to God, is also made aware the debt has been paid in full by the vicarious sacrifice of the God-man at Calvary. There is no Christian moral victory without conviction that 'Jesus paid it all.' (See previous comments on revelation at Calvary and discussion of reconciliation and propitiation.) Francis Pieper commenting on 'Christianity as the Absolute Religion' says, '[T]he Christian religion is absolutely perfect because it is not a moral code instructing men how to earn the forgiveness of sin themselves, but rather it is faith in that forgiveness which was gained through Christ's vicarious fulfillment of the Law and his substitutionary suffering of our punishment.'¹⁰ Luther spoke often of this. As Calvin also remarked, our assurance that 'God remains kindly disposed and favorable to our works is not grounded in some nebulous belief in the loving character of God, but specifically the love of God manifested at Calvary.'

‘God’s unconditional love’ may be an unfortunate expression. I think it is. Calvary proves God’s love is great, but not unconditional at all. ‘[Y]ou hate all evildoers’ (Ps. 5:5); ‘The Lord is in his holy temple ... his soul hates the wicked and the one who loves violence’ (Ps. 11:4, 5). ‘There are six things that the Lord hates ...’ (Prov. 6:16–19—including a false witness and ‘one who sows discord among brothers’). God does not love the reprobate, as such, at all and He loves no one unconditionally. Even the elect He loves conditional upon His grace, which for reasons known only to Him has not been equally extended to everyone on earth, granted the gospel is addressed to all without distinction. Let the unconvinced read the passages in Scripture about the eternal state of the lost and God’s jealous anger over unrestrained and unpunished murderers, idolaters, fornicators, etc. See notes herein on ‘sin to high heaven’ in hamartiology.

(6) In the language of Hebrews 9:14, for one who in faith knows that the blood of Jesus Christ is enough to clear the record of all sin, the cross sets the conscience free for service to God. ‘... how much more will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish to God, purify our conscience from dead works to serve the living God.’ Our human heritage provides two hands. If one must be employed to keep salvation intact the other will do little in the service of God or man on account of anxiety. ‘Would you do service for Jesus your king? Would you live daily his praises to bring? There’s wonderful power in the blood’ (hymn by L. E. Jones).

The early Christians found that their crucified Lord was an obnoxious offense to the pagan world of their time. Paul speaks of ‘the offense of the cross.’ The cross therefore separated the Christians from the world of their time. Paul spoke of how by the cross ‘the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world’ (Gal. 6:14)—they became mutually irreconcilable. These expressions and others like Hebrew 13:12–14 assert this world is not our ‘city’ at all. The Lord expects us to go outside the city of the world to suffer outside the gate with our Lord.

These teachings must be balanced with other biblical teachings—we are to be in the world, not of it; to plant our vineyards, settle down, rear our families and seek the peace of our respective cities of residence, being salt and good savor and sweet odor in our journey to the eternal city.

It remains to be noted that the cross has opened the way of direct access in prayer, for we have ‘boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus’ (Heb. 10:19 kjv).

¹ C. H. Spurgeon, Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit (London: Banner of Trust, 1965), vol. 34, no. 2043.

² C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1960), pp. 545, 546.

³ John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1955), pp. 61, 62.

⁴ O. Cullmann, The State in the New Testament (London: SCM Press, 1963), p. 77.

⁵ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion i (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), I. 14, paragraphs 13–18.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

⁶ Calvin, Institutes iv. 3, p. 1432.

⁷ Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom iii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), p. 37.

⁸ C. P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology (Philadelphia, PA: Lippincott, 1875), p. 622.

Bauer, Arndt and Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

⁹ Calvin, Institutes iii. 8.1.

¹⁰ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics i (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950s), pp. 33–40.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (583). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

19

The Doctrine of Atonement Before Anselm

In this chapter we shall see how through the centuries various aspects of the atonement by Christ's death on the cross were discerned by Christian teachers, yet all the while a doctrine of satisfaction by vicarious sacrifice was understood, even if dimly at times and often stated obscurely. In other words, the evangelical doctrine was never a novelty imposed upon the Scriptures. In every age it was at least partially understood.

I propose Anselm's work, especially his tract, Cur Deus Homo?, as the breaking point in sound interpretation of Christ's work of atonement, for several reasons. For one, he formulated and passed down to later generations the great idea of objective, finished accomplishment—a done deal as my lawyer says. For another, he saw that Scripture roots both 'the sending in the likeness of sinful flesh' and 'for sin' in the very nature of God. Anselm found both holiness and justice (righteousness) taking no back seat to His love. Further, as far as I can determine he was among the first scholastics to start with full approval of the ancient orthodox creeds and awareness of their incompleteness. His proposal of vicarious satisfaction of penal justice toward the infinite majesty of God, though needing some qualification, gave rational coherence to a theology of atonement. Evangelical theology has improved on Anselm but not rejected his accomplishments.

There is something of a consensus on this matter. 'In closing this brief skeleton of Anselm's theory of the atonement' said W. G. T. Shedd,

It is evident that if his views and experience, as exhibited in the Cur Deus Homo? could have become those of the church ... the revival of the doctrine of justification by faith in the Lutheran Reformation would not have been needed.... But the soteriology of Anselm, though exerting no little influence through his immediate pupils, did not pass into the church at large.¹

This was because Britain and Normandy, where Anselm served, were then on the perimeter of Christendom. The city clergymen of Europe and the Roman bureaucrats were neither very pious nor interested in thoroughgoing theological reflection. J. L. Neve says, ‘Anselm is gifted with genius.’² Shedd remarks of Cur Deus Homo? ‘It is remarkable ... bursting forth of a new spirit of inquiry, the dawning of a new era after five hundred years of stagnation and darkness.’³ Geoffrey W. Bromiley claims Anselm’s tract was ‘epoch making.’⁴

During the first four centuries after the publishing of the last book of the New Testament the catholic (world-wide) church came to a consensus about the Person of Christ. This was expressed in the Apostles’ Creed, the Nicene Creed and the Athanasian Creed. Yet little formulation of theology was directed to definition of Christ’s work of redemption.

The Nicene Creed (ad 325, 381) simply says the Lord Jesus Christ ‘for us men and for our salvation’ ‘came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made a man; and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate; he suffered and was buried; and the third day,’ etc. The creed does not, however, say how those events in our Lord’s career effected ‘our salvation,’ even though it states He came ‘for ... our salvation.’

In a very thorough treatment of ‘the Pre-Nicene Theology’ J. N. D. Kelly finds it ‘useless to look for any systematic treatment either of man’s lost condition, in need of redemption or of how redemption in Christ was brought about’ among second-century writers. He notes ‘while taking it for granted that men are sinful, ignorant and in need of true life, they never attempt to account for their wretched plight.’⁵ They ‘nowhere co-ordinate their main ideas or attempt to sketch a rationale of salvation.’⁶

The second century was a time of severe attacks upon the new faith from at least three quarters—Gnostic heretics, Judaism, and the pervasive, official and popular heathenism. The few of the second century who wrote to defend Christianity and whose writings are extant today wrote in the Greek language and are known to history as ‘the Greek Apologists.’ Of these the most important are Justin Martyr, Tatian and Athenagorus. They did not choose to treat doctrines in addressing their adversaries. Hence, ‘These writers treat Christianity predominantly as a body of teachings relating to religion and morals.’⁷ Their thoughts therefore on the work of Christ for fallen men were ‘shot through with ambiguity.’⁸ Kelly goes on to say, not until the third century, i.e. after ad 200, was there a beginning of a systematic doctrine of salvation, even ‘the germ of a doctrine of substitution.’⁹

Salvation by Recapitulation—Irenaeus

(Throughout the rest of this chapter ‘Salvation’ alternates with ‘Atonement’ and related words because the ideas were not clearly separated in early Christian times.)

Irenaeus of Lyon (ad 120–202) is known for his soteriology of recapitulation, also called assimilation and imitation of Christ. Passages usually cited are from Against Heresies (5. 16.2 and 3; 2.22.4; 3.18.1 and 7; 3.16.2), a long treatise. Irenaeus engaged ‘in a life-long struggle against the heresies that ... came in, like locusts, to devour the harvests of the gospel.’¹⁰ Irenaeus’ idea of defense against heresies was defense and exposition of truth, such as is found in his famous work, Against Heresies, a book of 252 pages in ANF. In meeting the minds of his time, both pagan and Christian, Irenaeus enlarged upon the central mystery of the faith, the incarnation. God the Logos assimilated (accommodated) Himself to Adam (the human race) and in His life, from birth to death, recapitulated every stage of human life. This doctrine was based on a rather shallow exegesis of Paul’s doctrine of the First and Second Adam. His notion never made much impression, even on Irenaeus himself, for, as he acknowledged. Jesus did not live through middle and old age and He was never a husband or parent. He called for imitation of Christ as our example. God accommodates to us; Jesus recapitulates Adam (us, all sinful men); He is our example whom we are to imitate.

Yet the energetic bishop must not be accused of anticipating the modernist heresy of salvation by following Christ’s good example. For, in book 5, chapter 16, paragraphs 2 and 3, after stating the solidarity of the Logos both with God and man he adds that He, the Lord, manifested Himself by His Passion in which by His obedience on a tree (cross) He took away the effects of Adam’s disobedience at a tree (in Paradise). He concludes, ‘In the second Adam, however, we were reconciled, being made obedient even unto death. For we were debtors to none other but to Him whose commandment we had transgressed at the beginning’ (Against Heresies XVI, 3, ANF 544). So Irenaeus apparently had at least an inkling of reconciliation (at-one-ment) by the death of Christ, after all. This is vicarious satisfaction in different words.

The relation of Jesus Christ to the Godhead and of the divine and human in His Person were matters of intense debate and careful definition in the early church, but the saving work—even though it was certainly the chief burden of evangelism and Christian nurture in the churches—was apparently never formally defined.

Savior

However we explain the absence of an explicit soteriology, the church pervasively called Jesus Soter, Savior. We may be sure the meaning of that word was understood as something more profound than victor over Satan, teacher, prophet, fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies of Messiah or example, though all those ideas also were present in the writing of the apostolic Fathers.

The apostolic Fathers (the first writers after the close of the New Testament) failed ‘to grasp the significance of the death of Christ.’¹¹ Even Justin (about ad 100–165), for example, says little or nothing about it. Yet as one of the most influential and most critical interpreters of Justin pointed out, ‘It is equally certain that Justin’s own faith was nourished more by that which the congregation confessed and taught concerning Christ its Lord than by that which he himself interpreted in a theoretical way.’¹²

Substitutionary Suffering

Historians of the period quite regularly point out that the cross, interpreted as substitutionary suffering by reference to the prophecies of the Servant in Isaiah 42–53, especially chapter 53, was imbedded in the church’s liturgy of the time. It could hardly be otherwise in view of the regular, frequent observance of the Eucharist (or Lord’s Supper), always accompanied (as frequently still today) by liberal readings of the relevant words of institution, comments on the same in the Epistles and other Scripture. The language of the authors of the sub-apostolic period and on to Nicea (ad 325) reflects the liturgical language of the Supper and the story of Passion and cross.

Perhaps, as some say, the soteriology of Irenaeus, Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria did draw much from the prevalent Platonism in interpreting the Scriptures. Similarities to modern neo-orthodoxy’s doctrine of salvation by the incarnation of the Son of God rather than by His sacrificial death are present in their writings. There was also an early appearance of what not long ago was called ‘modernism.’ ‘The Logos assimilated himself to man and man to himself in his life and passion,’ etc., etc. These notions have reappeared with differing emphases from time to time, but blessedly never were widely endorsed. It was probably more ‘private speculation’¹³ than church dogma. Yet the language of leading proponents shows ‘that neither the teaching nor the example of Christ could be isolated from the message of the cross’¹⁴ and according to Pelikan, there is reason to believe that the saving power of the suffering and death of Christ was more explicitly celebrated in the worship of the second century than formulated in the faltering, initial attempts at theologizing of the time.¹⁵

Satisfaction of Law and Justice

Tertullian (ad 160–230) seems to have introduced the important word ‘satisfaction’ to Christian theological language, in a treatise on repentance. He did not, however, use the word in connection with the Calvary work of Christ. He probably derived the term and the idea it represented from Roman law (Tertullian had been a lawyer) ‘where it referred to the amends one made to another for failing to discharge an obligation.’ In one of Tertullian’s treatises he spoke of God as One to whom in repentance ‘you may make satisfaction’ (On Penitance 7.14) and the desire to make satisfaction is a reason for confession (On Penitance 8.9). Though Tertullian did not use ‘satisfaction’ in explaining the Godward meaning of Christ’s sacrifice on the cross he apparently introduced this heavily freighted word into the vocabulary of Christian theology. Furthermore, Tertullian understood what later was implied in ‘satisfaction’ saying in his treatise On Modesty (22.4), ‘Who has ever redeemed the death of another by his own, except the Son of God alone?... Indeed, it was for this purpose that he came—to die for sinners.’ Only a little later than Tertullian, Hilary of Poitiers (ad 300?–367), a most competent and articulate theologian, became the first known to equate ‘satisfaction’ with the ‘sacrifice’ of Christ and to interpret the death of Christ as the ‘act of reparation to God on behalf of sinners’ (Exposition of the Psalms, on 53:12–13). Here in the translation of H. F. Stewart are the significant statements of one of the greatest of the early Christian theologians. Hilary said Jesus’ suffering on the cross ‘was intended to fulfil a penal function’ and he received the ‘penalty.’ He relates the penalty to ‘the sacrifices of the Law’ and then interprets the work of Christ in these words,

It was from this curse that our Lord Jesus Christ redeemed us, when as the Apostle says: ‘Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, for it is written: cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree [Gal. 3:13].’ Thus He offered Himself to the death of the accursed that He might break the curse of the law, offering Himself voluntarily a victim to God the Father ... offering to God the Father.¹⁶

This is the doctrine of satisfaction by substitutionary sacrifice many centuries before Anselm, Thomas and Calvin.

Sacrifice

References to the death of Christ as a sacrifice appear among the apostolic Fathers. The Epistles of Barnabas (about ad 100) sees in the sacrifice of the red heifer, without blemish, slaughtered outside the camp, its blood sprinkled before the sanctuary, the flesh, blood and offal burned, its ashes mingled with water employed for purifying (Num. 17:1–22) a type of Christ's death.¹⁷ He even has an incipient phraseology for imputation.

Cyprian of Carthage (d. ad 250) in his 63rd epistle was already calling ministers of the Word, priests and the elements of the Lord's Supper, oblations and sacrifices (ANF. 364, 365), so his reference therein to the death of Christ as a 'sacrifice' may be faint support for this term. I do not think it likely, however, as some do, that he derived the term from the 'liturgy of the altar' considering how the Old Testament ritual sacrifices were regarded widely as types of Christ's offering of His life to God. (In Scorpiace [Antidote for the Scorpion's Sting] Tertullian produces some shaky theology on the basis of the LXX rendering of Proverbs 9:2, praising martyrdom.)

Not much later Tertullian seems to assume everybody should understand the typical connection between many Old Testament people, institutions and events as well as prophecies of the Passion and death of Jesus.¹⁸ He expounds on the typology of Christ in 'wood' and 'tree' in the Old Testament, which he invariably traces to the Lord's Passion. The wood Isaac carried typified Christ's cross. But unlike Isaac, for whom a ram was substituted, Christ was hung from His 'wood,' adding this important sentence: 'For him it behoved to be made a sacrifice on behalf of all Gentiles, who was led as a sheep for a sacrificial, victim.'¹⁹ Of course the New Testament says 'Christ our Passover has been sacrificed for us' and it seems to me was quite sufficient grounds for the scripturally versed Fathers of the church to interpret the death of Christ as a sacrifice for sin offered to God. Historians who suppose a late date for New Testament writings find little there to explain the sacrifice interpretation in these early writers. Pelikan calls such descriptions of Christ's death as a sacrifice 'liturgical echoes,' a meaning derived from the Eucharistic liturgy of orthodox Christianity, which in turn, opponents of orthodox Christianity say borrowed from heathen language of sacrifice and the Jewish temple worship. In view of the dissemination of Gospels and Epistles before Cyprian and Tertullian, and perhaps before Barnabas, I see no need at all to find the source anywhere except in the New Testament.

Ransom

This way of explaining the meaning of the Lord's death on the cross was common, being based on sayings of Christ (Matt. 20:28), Paul's use of the term in this way (1 Tim. 2:6) and the suggestive language of Isaiah 53:5, 6. The Epistle to Diognetus (about ad 130–150) uses this language in a gospel preachment worthy of George Whitefield, saying 'He Himself took on Him the burden of our iniquities, He gave His own Son as a ransom for us the holy One for transgression ... capable of covering our sins [with] His righteousness ... we, the wicked ... O sweet exchange.'²⁰

The writer of the Epistle to Diognetus does not say to whom the ransom was paid, but many over the second and third centuries, including Origen,²¹ said it was paid to the devil. Yet, Gregory Nazianzen, while promoting the thoroughly biblical doctrine of the death of Christ as a payment for release or ransom, ridiculed the notion that it was paid to the devil. God the Father accepted the blood of the cross ‘on account of the incarnation, and because Humanity must be sanctified by the Humanity of God’—in answer to the question, ‘To whom was that blood offered which was shed for us, and why was it shed?... the precious ... Blood of our God and High priest and Sacrifice?’²² In the brief chapter 22 he mingles ransom with sacrificial and victory metaphors, yet he obviously did not think of the atonement as any sort of ransom paid to the devil. Neither does any other widely accepted creed that has come to our attention over the span of centuries before the Reformation of the sixteenth century. This is quite amazing, for the Reformation for the first time made soteriology—how one can be saved and know one is for certain—the very center of the storm which swept Europe and propelled Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, Cranmer and all the rest into the mighty shaking of 1517–1648.

Christus Victor (Victory Over All Enemies, His and Ours)

As Pelikan observes, modern Western Christians might see some formation of ‘the orthodox doctrine of vicarious atonement’ in these writers of the second and third centuries, ‘but it is their emphasis on the saving significance of the resurrection of Christ that he will find most unusual.’²³

Irenaeus and Origen were among the earliest advocates of the “Christus Victor” doctrine. This emphasis in the theology of many early Fathers that the victory over all enemies, Christ’s and ours, at Calvary is sometimes called the classic theory of the atonement.²⁴ Yet this is an overstatement of its importance.

There is sufficient biblical evidence for this view that Gustaf Aulen’s book (Christus Victor, 1969) has received favorable notice from even competent, conservative, evangelical quarters (Walvoord). Barth from a neo-orthodox perspective, Cullmann from his own unique perspective, and J. H. Yoder from a liberal pacifist outlook, have given this view currency in our era. They have found Scripture support chiefly in the promise of Genesis 3:15 concerning the crushing of the serpent’s head and the bruising of the heel of the woman’s seed and the supposed similar reference to the binding of the devil (‘strong man’) at Matthew 12:22–29.

Athanasius argues through chapters 21–25 of the Incarnation of the Word that the resurrection after a public death on a cross was intended by God’s design to prove victory over death and the prince of the powers of the air.²⁵ Athanasius uses the figure of a good wrestler who lets his public foes choose his opponent (as Jesus’ enemies chose a cross). ‘He was to prove Conqueror of Death in all of its forms.... He defeated the “Prince of the powers of the air” in his own region.’²⁶ We now look to some of the outstanding theologians of the fourth to tenth centuries for clear statements of a doctrine of atonement.

Substitution and Satisfaction

Athanasius (d. ad 373), of his time, the paramount exponent of orthodox Christology, composed nothing on the atonement, yet in his polemics with Arians he plainly expressed the substitutionary character of Christ's work on the cross. Shedd shows that in his writings on the Trinity he incidentally maintained 'the expiatory nature of Christ's work' and cites passages containing the substance of that doctrine of plenary satisfaction of divine justice 'by the theanthropic sufferings of Christ which acquired full scientific form in ... Anselm, and which lies under the whole Protestant Church and [its] theology.'²⁷ Athanasius shows that the modern liberal notion that God sovereignly forgives any sin upon the sinner's repentance, without the need for any punishment, vicarious or otherwise (of which the story of the father's forgiveness of the prodigal son is supposed to be illustrative), was current in the fourth century. And Athanasius utterly rejected it, using language that Calvin might have used (and perhaps did use).

Suppose that God should merely require repentance in order for salvation? This would not in itself be improper did it not conflict with the veracity of God. God cannot be untruthful, even for our benefit. Repentance does not satisfy the demands of truth and justice. If the question pertained solely to the corruption of sin, and not to the guilt and ill-desert of it repentance might be sufficient. But since God is both truthful and just, who can save, in this emergency, but the Logos who is above all created beings. He who created men from nothing could suffer for all and be their substitute. Hence the Logos appeared.... He saw how inadmissible it would be for sin to escape the law, except through a fulfillment and satisfaction of the law.²⁸

In this quotation I have highlighted the ideas characteristic of the Anselmic-Protestant consensus: God's veracity and law must be honored in forgiveness; penalty must be paid; satisfaction (the key word) of justice must take place. There is no reference here to the divine majesty or infinity as in Anselm, or to the divine holiness as in Calvin, and the Protestant writings on the subject, but reference to God's veracity, law and justice (which are similar ideas).

Origen (born at Alexandria ad 185, d. ad 254) was a rare combination of great learning with little wisdom, deep piety with some truly weird behavior. The church is still greatly in his debt for his work on the text of the New Testament and in translation of the New Testament. His zeal to defend Christianity was unsurpassed. Though the greatest textual scholar of the ancient church, he went to such extremes the church finally denounced him as a heretic. He had a way of carrying good ideas to dangerous extremes. Yet even Origen was one of the many writers of the time who quoted Isaiah 53 to explain the connection between the death of Christ and the forgiveness of sin 'healed by the passion of the Savior.'²⁹

Revelation

That Christ came to reveal the one true God is a plain fact of Scripture. Passages in the writings of Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, Clement of Alexandria and others seem to refer to Christ's work as Revelator constitutes Him as the Savior; it is doubtful if they intended this to exclude His mission to deal with the guilt of sin.

Apparently Origen alone among the Fathers carried the idea of redemption by Christ to the extreme of universal salvation. He thought even the devil will ultimately be saved.

Churchgoers of those times, however, were not forming their theology by reading the erudite writings of the above-mentioned scholars. Their theology was formed by what they received from the Bible-readings and liturgy of worship services and catechisms. Popular theology then, even more than today, was so derived, because copies of the Bible were rare and printed study materials non-existent. Therefore, in spite of many rudimentary and confused ideas about Christ's work of redemption, the Bible-centered worship of the church insured widespread understanding that the death of Christ on the cross procured forgiveness of our sins.

Deliverance

Little if any advance in putting together the biblical elements of a comprehensive summary of a doctrine of atonement is to be found in Augustine. Augustine's energetic mind, directed in part by his introspective nature (The Confessions) and the Pelagian controversy, was expended on the doctrines of man and sin. Yet he accepted and promoted what was best in his predecessors. Augustine developed no profound doctrine of atonement to compare with his accomplishments in many other areas. Even so, incidental comments here and there show unmistakably that he was convinced of atonement by vicarious satisfaction, though not well defined or free from inconsistencies. He did not always distinguish between the judicial side of redemption and the renewing work of Christ in our sanctification. He does not therefore advance beyond his predecessors and shares some of their confusion. Two of Augustine's best statements follow.

For the devil, having deceived the woman, and through her brought about the downfall of the man was laying claim to all the descendants of the first man as sinners by the law of death; in a wicked desire to do harm, indeed, but none the less by a most equitable right. This power of his held good until he put to death the Just One, in whom he could show nothing deserving of death; but also because he was born without that lust [i.e. by virgin conception], to which the devil had subjected those whom he had taken, so that whatever was born of it he would retain as if it were fruit of his tree; by a wicked desire to possess it indeed, but yet with a right that was not unfair. And so he is most justly compelled to let go those who believe in Him whom he put to death unjustly [Adam and all his descendants]; so that dying [in Christ's death] in this world they cancel the debt, living eternally they live in Him who paid for them [us] what He [Christ] did not owe.³⁰

Augustine, like his predecessors, was overpersuaded of Satan's claims, but his emphases are justice, the holy character of divine law, substitution, and, in a strange way, the sinlessness of the Substitute.

Harnack once remarked that 'Whoever looks away from the formulas to the spirit will find everywhere in the writings of Augustine a stream of Pauline faith.'³¹ This is apparent in the quote to follow. It is the clearest statement about Christ's redemptive work on the cross from Augustine I know of. He is answering the charge of Faustus the Manichaean that Moses stupidly cursed Christ.

Christ has no sin in the sense of deserving death, but he bore for our sakes sin in the sense of death as brought on human nature of human sin. This is what hung on the tree; this is what was cursed by Moses [Deut. 21:23]. Thus was death condemned that its reign might cease and cursed that it might be destroyed. By Christ's taking our sin in this sense, in condemnation is our deliverance, while to remain in subjection to sin is to be condemned.³²

These and other passages in his writings show indisputably that Augustine understood the work of Christ on the cross as a substitutionary satisfaction for the sins of mankind. He did not quite shake free from notions of deliverance from Satan and the demonic. The pervasive presence of idolatry, which Paul associates with worship of demons (1 Cor. 10), and the remarks of Jesus about Satan's being 'cast out,' and Jesus' awareness of the powers of darkness with the Hebrews chapter 2 teaching of deliverance from fear of death and 'him that has the power of death, that is the devil,' account for this. Theologians became aware that the overcoming of death (personalized or not) and power of the devil (whom Jesus said 'has nothing in me') are fruits or results of the atonement, not of the essence of it.

Salvation by a Penal Offering to Justice

Gregory the Great (540–604), bishop of Rome and recognized as pope (590–604), is said to be like the double-headed Janus of Rome—looking back upon the patristic age and bringing it to an end while also in the midst of the collapsed civilization of antiquity, stepping out in the dark age that lasted until the beginnings of the revival of learning in the eleventh century. Though he preserved the Christological and Trinitarian consensus of the Ecumenical Councils—as medieval folk understood them—he also rendered official and almost unchallengeable many superstitions and practices of the popular culture.

Pope Gregory ruled the official thought of the Western church without serious challenge for the next 500 years. His theology is still dominant in the Roman Church—Trent and Vatican II notwithstanding.

Aptly described as 'a wise and energetic churchman, a shrewd politician, a lovable ... shepherd of souls,'³³ his theology is 'a hodgepodge.'³⁴ He was not only a man for his time but of it and things did not change for 500 years. It may be laid to the kindness of divine providence that his writings echo an Augustinian doctrine of atonement, partially defective as it was. It was possible for people of western Europe to hear the theology of Romans chapter 3 verses 24 and 25 at least on occasion and we may hope many thoughtful folk grounded faith and hope in the finished work of Christ on the cross.

It is a providence of God that Gregory carried into the medieval epoch a sound conception of the atonement so far as it had been stated up to his time. Gregory is the first outstanding representative of 'the hierarchical spirit which was now to mould and corrupt Christianity for a thousand years. We are naturally surprised to find in the writings of one whom some regard as the first pope, representations of the atoning work of Christ so much in accordance with the Pauline conception of it.'³⁵

Gregory, though he aided and abetted the errors and abuses that much later brought on the sixteenth-century Reformation, was also a cogent advocate of the central doctrine of Scripture we describe as atonement by vicarious satisfaction. Among his voluminous writings is his Moral Discourses of Job, wherein he stresses that 'guilt can be extinguished only by a penal offering to justice. But it would contradict the idea of justice, if for the sin of a rational being like a man, the death of an irrational animal should be accepted as a sufficient atonement.' He follows, saying the sacrifice must be a man, a man unstained by sin. 'Hence the Son of God ... assumed our nature without corruption ... made himself a sacrifice for us ... a victim without sin, and able both to die by virtue of its humanity and to cleanse the guilty, upon the grounds of justice' (Book XVII, 46). Gregory in thinking of ‘justice’ meant in the sense implied in vicarious satisfaction—i.e. divine justice. He does not say to whom the sacrifice was offered, but it seems to be implied it was to God, not to the devil as in some older theology.

So down through the generations of the ‘dark ages’—and there was surely darkness enough—there were bound to be glimmerings, even shafts of the light of the gospel, in spite of ignorance, moralism, formalism, legalism, sacramentalism and corruption. It was received by those whose hearts were touched.

Of course the ‘dark ages’ were not entirely dark at any time. Wherever the Word of God is known, faith is apt to follow (Rom. 10:17); ‘the entrance of thy work giveth light.’ The ecclesiastical records of those centuries assure that matters of doctrine and Scripture interpretation were the subject of many synodical meetings and ecclesiastical decrees.

Atonement received some enlightened attention in the ninth century in the person of Gottschalk of Orbais (c. 806–868). (Gottschalk was a participant in a flurry of serious theological debate in ninth-century Europe. Chapter XI, ‘Conflicts at Corbie’ of G.W. Bromiley’s Historical Theology: An Introduction provides a dependable summary of this important episode in the development of a theology of the atonement.) Through his studies of Augustine this monk (Benedictine), later a secular priest, discovered that the ecclesiastical system of the time had a near-Pelagian heart beneath a cloak of professed Augustinian beliefs. Augustine’s views, drawn from Scripture, regarding the depravity of man, and the priority of the divine at all levels of salvation, led Gottschalk to a doctrine of unconditional (i.e. not based on foreseen faith) election and to propose that Christ died only for the elect. Gottschalk came to be a thoroughgoing Augustinian and in spite of suppression preached these views with enough success to receive prelatical rejection and martyrdom. He obviously viewed atonement as vicarious, penal satisfaction. The story of Gottschalk demonstrates that a doctrine of the atonement of Christ that satisfied God’s justice and law fully was viable if not quite healthy in the darkest period.

Gottschalk aroused sufficient attention to the issues of election, grace and the nature of atonement that the practical Semi-Pelagianism of the Roman Church was made official in public pronouncements—from which it has never quite retreated. That is not to say there were not scholars who to a degree embraced true Augustinian views.

For these reasons Roman Catholics can never be certain of salvation, because no one can know when he has sufficient merit—additional to Christ’s. Hence—at least in the past—their funerals lack the note of assurance and peace usual in funerals of devout Protestants. Alcuin and even Bede the Venerable are medieval English ecclesiastics who are said to have held similar notions of soteriology. Not surprisingly the career and writings of Gottschalk have been the subject of modern studies.³⁶ The seventeenth-century Jansenist movement within the Roman Church, whose most famous convert was Blaise Pascal (1623–1662), revived these features of doctrine promoted by Gottschalk.

Scholars speculate that where and when monasticism existed at its best, soteriological doctrines similar to those of Athanasius and Augustine may have been accepted. Be that as it may, during the eleventh century, the beginning of the age of scholasticism (i.e. formal school theology in the new universities and other centers of revived learning), a widespread interest in an adequate understanding of Christ's work of atonement arose. It may be that scholarship and speculation in the monastic period of 900 to 1100 were bypassed by devotional practice and piety, which in the Rule of Benedict of Nursia put nothing ahead of the love of Christ. Monastic writers vied with one another in promoting just that in literature still read today. Eventually theology caught up with this piety in 1098 when Archbishop Anselm, a Benedictine exiled from Canterbury, composed Why God Became a Man? (or Why the God-Man,—in the original Latin, Cur Deus Homo).

Anselm's brief work 'read as an essay in ... divinity ... was a virtuoso performance with few rivals in the history of Christian thought' (Pelikan). Anselm's purpose was to produce a rationally organized and supported view of the Person and work of Christ that was in full harmony with the authority of Scripture and ancient dogma as well. He succeeded so well that his positive contribution, with one adjustment (divine holiness where Anselm put majesty) and one enlargement (active obedience of Christ), has not been superseded to the present.

Anselm was not alone at the time or without predecessors in godly endeavor to understand the work of Christ in redemption. Peter Damian, Bruno of Segni, Guilbert of Nogent and to a degree even Abelard (who challenged Anselm's view) created extant works which demonstrate that Anselm's Why the God-Man? was in part the fruit of common theological discussion. Both the piety of the time and speculative theology were synchronously at work and moving in the direction Anselm brilliantly expressed. Theology had treated the work of Christ as prophet, priest and king for a long time. It was in the dogmas (decrees of councils, synods, etc.) but now theologians sought 'to make explicit what had been implicit.'

¹ W. G. T. Shedd, The History of Christian Doctrine ii (New York: Scribner, Armstrong and Co., 1872), p. 216.

² J. L. Neve, A History of Christian Thought i (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg Press, 1946), p. 191.

³ Shedd, op. cit., p. 273.

⁴ G. W. Bromiley, Historical Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1978), p. 177.

⁵ J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, rev. ed. (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978), p. 163.

⁶ ibid., p. 163.

⁷ G. P. Fisher, History of Christian Doctrines (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1927), p. 61.

⁸ Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, p. 168.

⁹ ibid., p. 177.

¹⁰ A. C. Cox, in Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. Roberts and Donaldson (American Edition, 1885, repr. Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), p. 309.

- ¹¹ T. T. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers, repr. 1959, p. 37, cited by Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, vol. i, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971), p. 143.
- ¹² Moritz von. Engelhardt, The Christianity of Justin Martyr, Goettingen, 1878, cited by Pelikan, Christian Tradition, p. 143.
- ¹³ Pelikan, Christian Tradition, p. 141.
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 146.
- ¹⁵ ibid.
- ¹⁶ Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers ii, ed. Schaff and Wace, 1890 (repr., Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), vol. 9, pp. 246, 247.
- ¹⁷ Epistle of Barnabas in ANF i, chap. 8, p. 142.
- ¹⁸ Tertullian, An Answer to the Jews in ANF iii, chaps. 10–13, pp. 164–172.
- ¹⁹ ibid., pp. 171, 172.
- ²⁰ Epistle to Deognetus, chap. ix, in ANF i, p. 28 or Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (New York: Macmillan, 1898), p. 501.
- ²¹ Origen, Commentary on Matthew, in ANF ix, Bk 16, chap. 8.
- ²² Gregory Nazianzen, Second Oration on Easter xxxv.22 in NPNF vii, p. 431.
- ²³ Pelikan, p. 149.
- ²⁴ John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, 2nd ed. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1966, 1977), pp. 318–321.
- ²⁵ Athanasius, Incarnation of the Word, chaps. 23–29, in NPNF iv, pp. 48–52.
- ²⁶ Editor's summary of chaps. 24 and 25, NPNF iv, p. 49.
- ²⁷ W. G. T. Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, p. 242.
- ²⁸ Athanasius, The Incarnation of the Word, chap. 6, Dorner's trans., quoted by Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine ii, pp. 242, 243, preferable to NPNF iv, pp. 39, 40.
- ²⁹ Origen, Against Celsus i. 54, 55, in Pelikan, The Christian Tradition i, p. 153.

³⁰ Augustine, The Freedom of the Will, iii. 10, trans. C. M. Sparrow (University of Virginia Studies, Charlottesville, VA: University of VA Press, 1947), p. 112.

³¹ Cited by G. P. Fisher, History of Christian Doctrine, 2nd ed. (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1896, 1927), p. 180, from Harnack, Dogmengeschichte ii. 71.

³² Augustine, Reply to Faustus the Manichaeon, xiv. 3, In NPNF, 1st Series, 4, p. 208.

³³ Juergen L. Neve, History of Christian Thought ii (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1946), p. 173.

³⁴ ibid., p. 173.

³⁵ Shedd, ii, p. 263.

³⁶ See articles about Gottschalk's in The Catholic Encyclopedia vi: An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church (New York: The Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), vol. 6 and Britannica, 11th ed., xii and bibliography of nineteenth-century studies.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (592). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

20

The Resurrection of Christ (I)

Death and Resurrection Together

We have already taken notice that the earliest preachers and writers of the ancient church had very little to say about the meaning of the death of Christ apart from His resurrection. This is already evident in the Acts and Epistles of the New Testament: ‘Again and again the apostolic message calls our attention to both the crucifixion and the resurrection. The fact of the cross is followed by “the fact of the empty tomb.”’¹ ‘But God raised him from the dead’ follows hard on His death and burial, ‘they took him down from the tree and laid him in a tomb’ (Acts 13:30). This ‘but’ announced the fact of Jesus’ resurrection and explained to Paul’s audience at Pisidia the reason why he and Barnabas were travelling around the world telling Jews: the old Mosaic epoch is now over; a new epoch now prevails when real forgiveness of sins can be preached—just as the prophets said (vv. 38–41). This is common evangelistic procedure in the book of Acts (Acts 2:23; 3:11 ff.; 4:10; 13:29). In Paul’s address at Mars Hill in Athens, to a Gentile audience, he never even mentions the unique meaning of Christ’s death but proclaims His resurrection as the proof of His message and God’s demand for repentance (Acts 17:30–32). Peter’s initial message to Gentile ‘God-fearers’ placed the death and resurrection side by side and, like Paul at Antioch of Pisidia, Peter mentioned the witness of Old Testament prophets saying, ‘All the prophets testify about him’ (Acts 10:43 niv). Nevertheless ‘They killed him by hanging him on a tree, but God raised him from the dead on the third day and caused him to be seen’ (Acts 10:39, 40 niv). Also like Paul, Peter made these events the ground of future judgment by the same Man (Acts 10:42; cf. 17:31).

Reduced to definitive gospel simplicity, the message of the physical resurrection of Jesus is a sine qua non for saving truth. As an event of first-century history it must be believed in the heart to be saved (Rom. 10:9) if Peter and Paul are to be credited with truth-saying. In parallel with ‘that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures, that he was buried,’ the further statement ‘that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the Scriptures’ is part of ‘the gospel ... by which you are being saved’ and ‘in which you stand’ (1 Cor. 15:1–4).

Resurrection and Ascension

The scriptural connection of the resurrection with the cross is matched with a similar, if less highlighted, connection with our Lord’s ascension from earth to heaven, as incarnate ‘Son of Man.’ In fact the prophecy of Christ as Son of Man in Daniel 7 is of the ascended Son of Man now ‘coming’ again, this time in judgment rather than in grace. Believers in former ages saw this clearly, as in the earliest form of what is called the Apostles’ Creed (before ad 341), ‘crucified under Pontius Pilate, and buried; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead’ (Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom, I, 47, 48).

Medieval Christianity paid more attention to the events of Christ’s career in calendar, ritual and preaching than we moderns do. Pelikan points out ‘it was characteristic of the piety and theology [of that time] ... that the resurrection of Christ was inseparable from His ascension into heaven.’² Though the cross and the crucifixion came to occupy a unique place ... in which the plan of salvation achieved its fulfillment.... One reason for rejecting what was taken to be Abelard’s notion of the cross as primarily the decisive revelation of the love of God and the announcement rather than the achievement of redemption was that the resurrection performed this function of making known that the plan of salvation had been carried out by the crucifixion.³

In other words, if our salvation were to be dependent on a demonstration, then the Passion and death would be sufficient, no resurrection necessary.

For those who think (as some appear to do) that ‘gospel’ preaching came to an end early in the age of Constantine only to revive a thousand years later with the Reformation, or perhaps only with the Anabaptist wing of it, it comes as a correction to learn that some of the most justly revered names of the era were fervent preachers of the true gospel of grace. No doubt God was not in any Christian epoch without such evangelists. Certainly Bernard of Clairvaux was one of them. Peter Damian was another. They preached the evangel in a manner fitting to the time when most of their hearers were illiterate. Bernard emphasized the ‘finished work of Calvary.’ In a sermon on the Song of Solomon he said, ‘the soul seeks the Logos but it had previously been sought by the Logos ... “Our merits” are really “signs of a hidden predestination, and foretokens of future bliss.” But “our merits” are not a basis for the divine act of justification, whose basis lies in God, not in man.’ He remarks in another sermon on the Song: ‘The righteousness of God consists in his not sinning, but the righteousness of man consists in his being forgiven of God.’⁴

Bernard's gospel ministry survives to the present day, as the following incident evidences. One sunny, comfortable day in May I happened to take a seat in one of the old carriages of the Chicago Transit Authority on Chicago's north side. I quickly found myself visiting with half a dozen Polish Catholic oldsters who were exchanging short religious tracts and printed poetry. They were a happy bunch, none at great remove from the end of life. They gave me copies of those tracts and poems—almost all by Bernard of Clairvaux. I was humbled but glad to discover the message of every one was the gospel of faith in what Christ the crucified and risen has done for us, not what we can do for Him.

These facts of the history of Christian thought suggest that though resurrection, ascension and enthronement on high are properly treated as stages of the one exaltation of Christ and, though the Calvary work was a finished work of substitutionary satisfaction for sin, His resurrection has an essential function in connection with the work of Christ as a unity. What was necessary and finished had necessary sequels if the finished purchase of redemption was to be carried into effect.

Apologetics of the Resurrection of Christ

There is an abundance of modern, believing literature about Christ's resurrection. Much of it is apologetical literature, designed to refute attacks of unbelievers and half-believers. I myself have written and published in that connection with recent controversies. Yet the message of the resurrection of Jesus as it lies plainly in the Gospels provides its own attestation as an event of ancient history. The Gospel reports speak powerfully to the mind and heart of all who are willing to be convinced. The fact of the resurrection may profitably be preached to any audience without reserve.

In my experience, however, apologetics in defense of the resurrection must be handled with great care. There was a time when I taught apologetics—sometimes as much as three sections of thirty-plus students in 'Evidences' and as many more in 'Philosophy of Religion.' There was always some time spent defending the resurrection. It was worthwhile, of course, but I am still somewhat in shock from an incident in one of my classes. I had assigned to the class the reading of a book on the subject of proofs of the resurrection by a renowned author. Then one day a young man in this class for seniors at Wheaton College showed up unannounced at my office, the book in hand. He sat down opposite me, and with tears, falteringly spilled out his anguish: 'I feel terrible. I never had any doubt of the resurrection of Jesus until I read this book.' Then I felt terrible too. He belonged in a course in Romans, rather than a course in apologetics.

The Resurrection As Gospel

Belief 'that God raised him from the dead' is presupposed here and shall not be defended. The resurrection simply as reported is itself the central proof. For now, the task is to discuss what happened and what it means for our salvation, not to defend or explain the unique miracle of all time. The apostolic demand is not 'Defend the resurrection!' Quite the contrary, it is to believe it and to proclaim it—'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead ... as preached in my gospel.' So the senior pastor at Ephesus on a preaching mission instructed his assistant left behind at Ephesus (2 Tim. 2:8). As J. Schep asserts:

The resurrection provides the glorious evidence that Jesus is the Son of God (Rom. 1:4); it means the abolishment of death and the victory of life and incorruption (1 Tim. 1:10); it is the basis of the Christian faith and hope (1 Cor. 15:14 ff.; 1 Peter 1:3) and the guarantee of our future resurrection in glory (Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 15:20, 49; 1 Thess. 4:14).⁵

I. The Resurrection of Christ in Old Testament Typology and Prophecies

In a rather subtle manner the New Testament declares that information about death and physical resurrection and related facts about personal immortality is obscure in the Old Testament. It comes in where Paul is writing the young interim pastor at Ephesus about the power of God and the gospel as antidote to ‘a spirit ... of fear’ (2 Tim. 1:7). Then he goes on to say, God has ‘saved us and called us to a holy calling, not because of our works but because of his own purpose and grace, which he gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began, and which has now been manifested through the appearing of our Savior Christ Jesus, who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light [emphasis added] through the gospel’ (2 Tim. 1:9, 10).

Robert B. Strimple draws out the meaning in an exceptionally well-composed essay:

Many Christians have been puzzled by the meagerness of Old Testament revelation about what lies ahead for believers after they die, and many false teachers have taken advantage of this paucity of information to fashion elaborate tales of the shadowy world of hades and of Christ’s “harrowing of hell” after his death.... But attempts to establish a contrast between the afterlife of Old Testament saints and that of New Testament saints are misguided. The simple truth is that very little was revealed about the afterlife before our crucified and risen Savior conquered death and “brought to light” what had been previously shrouded in deep darkness. Praise God for the light that has burst forth from the empty tomb! Praise God for the bright beam of the gospel! The progressive nature of redemptive revelation is nowhere more clearly seen than here.⁶

In a sermon to Jews in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia Paul preached the ‘good tidings’ of Christ’s resurrection as something ‘written in the second Psalm’ (Acts 13:33) and wrote to the largely Gentile church of Corinth that Christ was raised from the dead ‘in accordance with the Scriptures’ (1 Cor. 15:4). What were the ‘Scriptures’ Paul had in mind and what do they say?

Christ’s Resurrection in Old Testament Types

Let us first look at Old Testament types. A bit later we shall take note that the book of Hebrews at length discusses how Christ’s past redemptive work and present ministry in heaven fulfill the elaborate ceremonial of the Old Testament—the sanctuary, priests, sacrifices and rituals. Early in this Christology we saw how these are said to be types, shadows, patterns, divinely instituted for that purpose. Those types, then, are not mere pictures of abstract truths, but of events now taking place in heaven. Our Lord would not be there except for resurrection, ascension and session at the right hand of God—all predicted in Old Testament types and prophecies. I do not doubt Paul had these typical institutions in mind in saying ‘in accordance with the Scriptures.’ Paul does not say much about the types of Christ’s post-ascension work, but it occupies many verses in Hebrews.

Having said this, much alleged typology of the resurrection is unconvincing to modern minds, including my own. Some alleged types are Adam’s awakening from sleep after ‘anaesthesia and surgery' at the creation of Eve, deliverance of Isaac from the dead 'figuratively speaking' (Heb. 11:19; 'in a figure' kjv), the burning bush (Exod. 3) which was not consumed, Aaron's dry rod that budded, the release of a living bird at the ceremony of cleansing for plague of a house (Lev. 14:53). Some have 'discovered' a type of the three days in Genesis 22:4. Jesus told the Jews that Jonah was a 'sign' in that as Jonah was three days and three nights in the 'whale's belly' so He would be three days and three nights in the ground (i.e. buried). Yet Jesus did not say Jonah's experience was a symbolical prediction of His resurrection, that is, a type.

Christ's Resurrection in Old Testament Prophecies

It must be acknowledged that the search for direct verbal predictions of Jesus' resurrection in the Old Testament has not discovered much outside the few passages cited in the New Testament. These, however, are very important.

We must distinguish between predictions of a future, final resurrection of the dead from prophecy of Christ's resurrection. As to the former, there is no doubt that in Jesus' time there was firm conviction of a resurrection 'on the last day' on the part of most Jews, apart from Sadducees (John 11:24; Acts 23:6–8). Paul quoted three Old Testament prophecies of Jesus' resurrection in his sermon at Pisidia—Psalm 2:7 (Acts 13:33); Isaiah 55:3 (Acts 13:34); and Psalm 16:10 (Acts 13:35).

There is disagreement over the first of these citations of Paul. Let us look closely. Having said just previously, 'God raised him from the dead,' Paul says, 'And we bring you good news that what God promised to the fathers, this he has fulfilled to us their children by raising Jesus, as also it is written in the second Psalm, "You are my Son, today I have begotten you"' (Acts 13:30, 32, 33). The esv and rsv follow the division of thought in most editions of the Greek text. In this case the resurrection was God's proclamation of the sonship of Christ prophesied in Psalm 2:7. Romans 1:4, 'declared to be the Son of God in power according to the spirit of holiness by his resurrection from the dead,' falls in line with this common understanding.

There is another view, supported by the way the niv punctuates Acts 13:33, which has 'raising up Jesus' refer to His birth and life rather than His resurrection. A period is placed in the middle of verse 33 after 'raising up Jesus.' 'As it is written in the second Psalm' is then made to introduce a new thought having no connection with the raising up of Jesus in the first part of the verse. '[R]aising up Jesus,' then, refers to His conception, birth and life, just as in verse 22 of the same chapter God 'raised up David to be their king' (esv). Strangely, niv reads 'made David their king' quite obliterating the connection, if any, with 'raising up Jesus,' and thus obscures what the Greek text really says.

In favor of the esv/rsv/kjv (and many other Versions) which clearly declare the resurrection of Jesus was predicted in Psalm 2:7, I point out several pieces of evidence. First, is the fact that 'raised up' David (Acts 13:22) employs egeirō whereas in 'raising up Jesus' the word for the action is anistēmi the usual Greek word for raising someone from the dead in the Septuagint and New Testament (per contra Acts 3:23; 7:37). Second, the last part of verse 33 'as also it is written,' etc. disappears from Paul's evidence for anything. This is one bad result of the niv shortening of New Testament Greek sentences to please modern readers. Third, the primitive church saw the fulfillment of the words of Psalm 2:7 in the resurrection of Christ. (See F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles,

The Greek Text with Commentary, 1952, p. xix.) For history of views see J. P. Lange's Volume on Acts, pp. 250, 251. Luther favored the first view, Calvin the second.

The second and third Old Testament passages quoted as predictions of Christ's resurrection follow immediately after verse 33. We now quote Acts 13:34 and 35 and comment briefly.

‘And as for the fact that he raised him from the dead, no more to return to corruption, he has spoken in this way, “I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David.” [Isa. 55:3]. Therefore he says also in another psalm, “You will not let your Holy One see corruption [Ps. 16:10].” ’

The importance and meaning of these prophecies are enhanced by the fact that they are part of a sermon Paul preached on a ‘sabbath day’ at the invitation of the leaders in a Jewish synagogue (Acts 13:13–16). The audiences were already well acquainted with the whole Tenak (or O.T.). So Paul addressed these Diaspora Jews with a view to showing how the Old Testament promises to David and other patriarchs had so far failed except that God had worked marvels in events connected with the death of Jesus. Further he made them aware that Jesus' death had been caused by the wicked, misguided actions of their own leaders up at Jerusalem not many years earlier.

The sense of Paul's argument is: 1) the resurrection of the Messiah-Jesus took place as was fully proven by witnesses to the event (v. 30). 2) The event showed that Jesus was the Son of God foreseen by the prophecy of Psalm 2:7. 3) The ‘sure mercies’ (v. 34 kjv), or Messianic blessing vouchsafed to and through David (as he goes on to say in v. 36) did not come to David who died and went to corruption in his grave. 4) These ‘sure mercies’ came to us living Jews in the One whom the Jewish leaders had killed, who was raised by God as prophesied in Psalm 16:10 and who never did see corruption and never will. 5) These ‘sure mercies’ (blessings) from ‘this man’ (v. 38) are forgiveness of sin and freedom (‘from which you could not be freed by the law of Moses’) (v. 39).

In speaking of ‘sure mercies,’ Paul quotes the Septuagint which has the words ta hosia, meaning pious, devout, supremely holy; in neuter plural here, mercies has the sense of ‘the pledged bounties.’ These sure mercies, or pledged bounties are, of course, every promise of salvation in connection with salvation through David's greater Son such as are found in the Immanuel prophecy of Isaiah 9–11.

By David is meant Christ, as he often is called in OT prophecy, and by his mercies the blessings of the covenant of grace, which are in him; so called because they flow from the grace and mercy of God; and which being put into his hands are sure [‘sure mercies’] ... and particularly through his resurrection from the dead; for had he died, and not risen again from the dead, the blessings ... would not have been ratified and confirmed.⁷

A section of Peter's address on the Day of Pentecost employs a large part of Psalm 16 (vv. 8–11) as prophecy of Jesus' resurrection, His ascension (by implication, Acts 2:34) and enthronement (Acts 2:25–35). There are complications of translation from Hebrew to Greek and difficulties that puzzle interpreters to this day, but nothing could be plainer than the precise language of the prophecy applied to the fulfillment in Jesus' resurrection (Acts 2:29–35). And it was convincing as the flood of 3,000 public conversions at the end of the day shows.

Some scholars find a prediction of Christ's resurrection and of the ‘many bodies of the saints who had fallen asleep were raised’ of Matthew 27:52 in Isaiah 26:19 though others refer it to the resurrection of 'the last day.' Hosea 6:2 is also cited. Yet in all candor, if specific 'proof texts' of prophecy of the resurrection of Christ be sought, it must be said there are few to seize upon besides the ones already discussed here.

According to the Scriptures

What one would not give for a transcript of Paul's lectures on the resurrection of Christ in Old Testament prophecy at Thessalonica! It was there he spoke in the synagogue for 'three sabbath days' and reasoning 'with them from the Scriptures [emphasis added], opening and alleging that it behooved the Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead' (Acts 17:2, 3 asv). Of course the primary text must have been Isaiah 53, which is the paramount Old Testament passage on that subject.

Let us therefore see what, if anything, Isaiah 53 has to say about the resurrection of Christ, the causes and meaning of whose death it supremely expounds. Verses 10 to 12 speak of the Servant's reward (exaltation as opposed to humiliation) after the Passion. As important aspects of the Servant's reward, 'he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of Jehovah shall prosper in his hand' (part of Isa. 53:10 asv). I comment:

The second element in His prosperity is to be great length of life ... 'he shall prolong his days.' Great length of life, as among all ancient peoples, was among the Hebrews of Isaiah's time regarded as evidence of God's favor. Long life was promised for obedience to parents ... (Exod. 20:12), as a reward for honest dealings (Deut. 25:15), and promise to the son who kept the commandments of the Lord (Prov. 3:2). In Jesus' case it was almost an insoluble mystery for three days between His death [at the age of about thirty-two or thirty-three] and His resurrection that God would give him 'length of days.' But the resurrection morning solved the mystery. This explains the Apostolic claim that His resurrection was 'according to the Scriptures.'⁸

There is a kind of epitome of Isaiah 53 in the last three verses of chapter 52. They introduce the whole poem of fifteen verses, five stanzas of three verses each. In a sense verse 13 of chapter 52 summarizes His entire future career as the Servant and the reward God will give Him. The Servant 'will act wisely' and as a result 'he will be raised' (resurrection) 'and lifted up' (ascension) 'and highly exalted' (the enthronement at the right hand of God). I have been fully persuaded of this understanding of Isaiah 53:12.⁹ The niv, cited above, is a quite exact rendition of the three words yarum, nissa' and gavah m'odh, as inflected in the text. The passage is at one with Isaiah 53:10-12, of course, but also with the exalted language of the several New Testament passages which speak of the Lord Jesus' exceeding great exaltation (Phil. 2:9-11; Eph. 1:20-23; etc.). These three expressions are at least 'a veiled reference' to Jesus' resurrection followed by ascension and enthronement. I doubt if Paul at Thessalonica would have failed to mention it to the folk who 'were persuaded and joined Paul and Silas' (Acts 17:4) after he alleged 'that it behooved the Christ ... to rise again from the dead' (Acts 17:3 asv).

II. The Fact of Jesus's Resurrection As Event in History

Christology Without a Physical Resurrection?

The last century has furnished Christendom with several prominent writers of theology who think a Christology without the virginal conception of Jesus and without a genuine physical resurrection of Jesus is a more authentic Christianity than the orthodox teaching. Survival of the conscious personal spirit or ‘continuity’ is how to interpret the ‘myth of bodily resurrection.’ They have no following to speak of among the millions who publicly worship the Lord Jesus Christ on Sundays, but the amount of literature they have produced (and recent PBS specials) is amazingly large.

There are many who wish to associate themselves with historic Christianity, yet because of modern assumptions reject anything they think violates the authority of modern science. Many of these would properly be labeled neo-orthodox or Bultmannian. Let Emil Brunner speak for them. He has the distinction of a courteous spirit and understandability. Most of the distinctive marks of neo-orthodoxy appear in the following. It is theological double speak.

Emphasis upon the Empty tomb led to the medieval conception of ‘the resurrection body,’ with its drama of the Last Day, and the opening of the graves, which has also been inserted into the Apostles’ Creed (the main features of orthodox, biblical eschatology are not original with Christ and the New Testament)... Resurrection of the body, yes: Resurrection of the flesh, no! The ‘Resurrection of the body’ does not mean the identity of the resurrection body with the material (although transformed) body of flesh; but the resurrection of the body means the continuity of the individual personality on this side, and on that, of death.¹⁰

Brunner then in typical orthodox-sounding language with heretical meaning says ‘Jesus Christ is Victor over death ... Risen Lord ... Christ ... God-Man ... could not remain subject to death.’ But Jesus’ victory ‘is connected not so much with the fact of Easter as with the fact of Good Friday ... for there the Incarnation of the Son of God—paradoxically—reached its climax [redemption by incarnation without satisfaction for sin].’¹¹ Similar thinking is to be found in the writings of many: Rudolph Bultmann;¹² Günther Bornkamm;¹³ Paul Tillich.¹⁴ Karl Barth is critical of Bultmann but in his discussion of Jesus’ resurrection never seems plainly to affirm the reality of the resurrection of the flesh of Jesus.¹⁵

It has been in the line of my duties over the years to read many of these books and articles and to conduct courses that examined their ideas in some detail. But that has very little bearing on orthodox, evangelical Christian theology. I have no inclination whatsoever to spread their assertions or arguments further on these pages. ‘The barkings of the ungodly ought, I repeat it, to be disregarded; for we see that the apostles were also assailed by these barkings’ (Calvin on 1 John 4:2).

Disregard the Barkings of the Ungodly

An outstanding older author made this point in a different way. In the opening pages of a 300-page book about the resurrection of Jesus, William Milligan employed six pages to show why, in the first place, ‘It is not my intention to make any appeal to those whose views of God and His relation to the world exclude the possibility of miracles,’ and in the second place it is ‘not my intention to discuss the authenticity ... of any [portions of] Scripture which contain ... the evidence of the fact before us.’¹⁶

To argue with those in whose eyes the miraculous and the historical exclude one another is a fruitless venture in theology. Debate with scholars who reject the authenticity and truthfulness of the New Testament reports seldom settles anything. '[T]hese are written' said John 'that you may believe'—speaking of 'signs' (miracles of meaning) which 'Jesus did ... in the presence of the disciples.' Of himself John wrote: '[W]e know that his testimony is true' and that he wrote of 'That which was from the beginning ... which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and have touched with our hands, concerning the word of life' (John 20:30, 31; 21:24; 1 John 1:1). We must trust the witnesses; otherwise we really know nothing at all about Jesus, or even if He ever lived.

While I heartily reject his lamentable opinion that the resurrection body of Christ was not 'of flesh,' George Ladd said truly: 'The witness of the New Testament is that an objective event took place in a garden outside of Jerusalem in which the crucified and entombed Jesus emerged from the grave into a new order of life.'¹⁷ He not only came forth from the grave 'in the body in which he suffered and died but consorted with those who had been with him' beginning with the baptism of John (Acts 1:2). 'To them he presented himself alive after his suffering by many proofs, appearing to them during forty days and speaking about the kingdom of God' (Acts 1:3).

The Resurrection Appearances

Samuel Andrews has summarized and indexed the appearances over those forty days in a brief and clear way.

The number of our Lord's appearances after the resurrection during the forty days following ... is generally said to be nine. Of these five were on the day of resurrection, one on the Sunday following, two at some later period, and one when he ascended.... [F]ive were in Jerusalem, one in Emmaus, two in Galilee, and one on the Mount of Olives. If we to these add that to James, mentioned only by St Paul (1 Cor. 15:7), which was probably at Jerusalem, we have ten recorded [emphasis added] appearances. We may well believe that these were not all [the appearances] ... 'appearing unto them by the space of forty days, and speaking the things concerning the kingdom of God,' clearly implying that the Lord met the apostles often for instruction.¹⁸

The Resurrection Story; Facts Attested

The resurrection story is told by four Gospel authors, obviously independent of one another, without the slightest hint of any artful attempt to prove anything—only to report things seen and heard. Nor is there any sign they wrote to refute or anticipate beliefs or objections to belief, as a major part of the amazingly abundant current literature of New Testament studies (so-called) and negative Gospels criticism assumes. Nor did they write to stimulate the sort of celebrity-adoration prevalent in the colossal amphitheater cities as Ephesus ('Great is Diana of the Ephesians' Acts 19:28, 29 kjv) and Rome.

Many good scholars point to several facts attested by the Gospels which summarize the central fact of the resurrection. First, Jesus was dead. Second, the hopes of the disciples were also dead. Third, the disciples' discouragement and frustration was suddenly and abruptly transformed into confidence and certainty. A fourth fact is the empty tomb.

A fifth historical fact is the resurrection faith. The disciples believed that Jesus arose from the grave.

They believed that their teacher and master, who was dead and buried, was alive again. They were confident that they saw him once again, heard his voice, listened to his [further] teachings, recognized his features. They believed his presence was not a ‘spiritual,’ i.e. nonmaterial ‘ghostly’ thing but an objective bodily reality. This was the faith that created the church. That which brought the church into being and gave it a message was not the hope of persistence of life beyond the grave, a confidence in God’s supremacy over death, a conviction of immortality of the human spirit. It was belief in an event in time and space.¹⁹

¹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, The Work of Christ, trans. Cornelius Lambregtse (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), p. 180.

² Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition iii, The Growth of Medieval Theology (600–1300) (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), p. 153.

³ ibid., p. 133.

⁴ ibid., pp. 155, 156.

⁵ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964), p. 164.

⁶ Robert B. Strimple, ‘Hyper-Preterism on the Resurrection of the Body’ in When Shall These Things Be? A Reformed Answer to Hyper-Preterism, ed. Keith A. Mathieson (Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 2004), p. 239.

⁷ John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity i (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978), p. 583.

⁸ Robert Culver, The Sufferings and the Glory of the Lord’s Righteous Servant, pp. 112, 113.

⁹ See Franz Delitzsch’s rather brief survey of the history of interpretation, Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1877), pp. 304, 305. See also Culver, Sufferings, pp. 19–37.

¹⁰ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption, Dogmatics ii (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1952), p. 372.

¹¹ ibid., p. 372.

¹² Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology, p. 15, and Theology of the New Testament i. p. 45.

¹³ Gunther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. Irene and Fraser McLuskey with James M. Robinson

(New York: Harper & Row, 1960), pp. 183–185.

¹⁴ Paul Tillich, Systematic Theology i (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1951, 1963), p. 56.

¹⁵ Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics iii. 2, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936–1975), pp. 446–511.

¹⁶ William Milligan, The Resurrection of Our Lord, 4th ed. (London: Macmillan Co., 1901), pp. 2, 3.

¹⁷ George Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1974), p. 319.

¹⁸ S. J. Andrews, The Life of our Lord Upon the Earth, rev. ed. (New York: Scribners, 1891), p. 596.

¹⁹ Ladd, Theology of NT, p. 320. (For a valuable sketch and summary of views of the resurrection as a fact of history see G. R. Habermas's 'The Resurrection of Christ,' Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, pp. 938–941; also initial guide to the literature at end of Habermas's article and Ladd, Theology of NT, p. 315.)

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (601). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

21

The Resurrection of Christ (II)

III. Six Features of the New Testament Witness to Jesus' Resurrection¹

Among the many features of the New Testament witness to Jesus' resurrection let us devote attention to several which ought to be noticed at least briefly to help us know what happened and what it all means.

1. In a remarkable rhetorical passage Scripture declares the enormous amount of power employed by God in raising Jesus from the dead. The resurrection of Christ called forth 'the surpassing [Gr. hyperbolic] greatness of His [God's] power' (dunamis 'dynamic'). This was 'in accordance with the working [energeia 'energy'] of the strength [kratos] of His might [ischuos] which He wrought [ergeō] in Christ, when He raised [egeirō] Him from the dead and seated Him at His right hand in the heavenly places' (Eph. 1:19, 20 my translation). There is no more fertile ground for exegesis of the wording of Scripture than these two verses. The resources of human language seem exhausted to express the 'surpassing greatness' of God's omnipotence in the event of the resurrection of Christ, exceeding even the energy required to create the world.

That the barrier between death and renewal of life had now been breached in anticipation of the resurrection of the 'last day' was marked by the resurrection of the bodies of many 'saints who had fallen asleep' after His resurrection (Matt. 27:52, 53).

2. Jesus came forth from the grave in the same body laid in the grave. The incarnation (in-fleshment) of the Son of God that began at the conception of Jesus is permanent. An incarnation without flesh is a contradiction of terms. That is why the grave was empty. That body was and is a permanent part of our Lord's human nature, in which He ascended to heaven and shall return, as the messengers of heaven rendered certain at the time of His ascension (Acts 1:10, 11). The ancient creeds make a special point (perhaps in response to Gnostic and Manichean heresies already prevalent) that His was a resurrection of 'the flesh' or 'in the same body' (in parallel with 'suffered in the flesh; and rose again').²

The literature and creeds of Christendom through ancient, medieval, Reformation and post-Reformation epochs echo and re-echo the doctrine of the resurrection, emphasizing the permanence and perfection of 'the flesh' of Christ. N. L. Geisler quotes Irenaeus, Tertullian, Justin, Athenagoras, Rufinus, Epiphanius, Cyril and Augustine among the ancient writers; Anselm and Aquinas of the medieval period; and seven modern creeds. (The Battle For The Resurrection, Updated Edition, Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1992, pp. 51–63.) They all agree.

I quote one of the plainest, Article 4 of the 'Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion' (Anglican) of 1562: 'Christ did truly rise again from death and took again His body, with flesh bones, and all things pertaining to the perfection of Man's nature; wherewith He ascended to Heaven, and there sitteth, until He return to judge all men at the last day' (emphasis added).

The leading modern exponent of this, the historic orthodox doctrine, is J. A. Schep.³ He also wrote the articles 'Resurrection' and 'Resurrection of Jesus Christ' in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible. In the first article he wrote:

The resurrection of the dead in a body of flesh is guaranteed by Jesus' resurrection in a body of 'flesh and bones,' with scars of his wounds visible, capable of being touched and of eating food (Luke 24:38–43; Acts 10:41). At His ascension Jesus did not discard this flesh-body, as is clear from Acts 1:11; Philippians 3:21; Revelation 1:17. Since the resurrected believers will be like the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:49; Phil. 3:21; 1 John 3:2), they too will be raised in their bodies of flesh (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35–42). Only in this way is man saved in his totality, and able to live on a new earth (Isa. 65:17 ff.; 66:22; Matt. 5:5; Rev. 21:1–3).⁴

3. Not only did Jesus rise from the dead in the same body laid in the grave but that body in 'perfection' (completeness) as a part of His authentic human nature, is united with the God-man forever. In the New Testament Jesus is at every point after the resurrection a physical Being. He was present to the disciples in a structured figure of flesh and bones (Luke 24:39); He left behind no body; that is why the tomb was empty (Matt. 28:6). The Man Christ Jesus alive again was a body-soul unity; in that body-soul unity He ascended to heaven (Acts 1:10, 11). He is the Mediator in heaven now, still the theanthrōpos in His office as Great High Priest ministering on our behalf. His wounds will be visible and recognizable in that same body when He returns to earth (Acts 1:10, 11; Rev. 1:7).

An influential creed which predates the completion of the Nicene Creed (ad 324, 381), the Second

Creed of Epiphanius, plainly says of the Lord Jesus Christ that He ‘suffered in the flesh; and rose again; and went up to heaven in the same body, sat down gloriously at the right hand of the Father; is coming in the same body in glory.’⁵

The permanence of our Lord’s human body was not a matter of great controversy among Christians at the time of the Reformation. Yet the French Confession of Faith prepared by Calvin and De Chandrieu, approved by Beza and approved at synods in 1559 and 1561, affirms it strongly: ‘although Jesus Christ, in rising from the dead, bestowed immortality upon his body, yet he did not take from it the truth of its nature, and we so consider him in his divinity that we do not despoil him of his humanity.’⁶ The Belgic Confession (1516) teaches the same: ‘And though He hath not changed His human nature; for as much as our salvation and resurrection also depend on the reality of His body.’⁷ The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, the Westminster Confessions, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and others before 1800 confess the same.

4. The Bible itself makes confession of the permanent and complete humanity (i.e. infleshment, or incarnation), body and soul, of the risen Son of God, the supreme test of orthodoxy. The two critical texts are plain in the King James Version, though exegesis of the Greek text enlarges and cements the meaning. They now follow: ‘... try the spirits.... Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God ...’ (1 John 4:1–3). ‘For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist’ (2 John 7).

In recent years these verses have become very important in dealing not only (as in ancient times) with acknowledged heresies such as Christian Science and the ‘Jehovah’s Witnesses’ but errors arising in evangelical seminaries and books from the evangelical book business. I have been personally involved in some of the controversy generated thereby. For that reason I cite the words of an acknowledged scholar whose major contribution has been to this subject rather than my own, as follows:

1. John does not say that Christ came into the flesh (which would refer to the historical fact of the incarnation) [i.e. the past event], but that he has come into the world en sarki (in the flesh; lit. in flesh), i.e. as one (the divine Word) clothed with flesh; one who is as truly human, man of flesh and blood, as he is divine. [footnote: The absence of the article emphasizes the quality: Christ adopted human FLESH.]

2. The perfect participle is used (eleuthota). This means, according to John, not only that Jesus Christ once came in the fullness of time as one clothed with flesh, but that thus He is still present. What happened at the incarnation has not been undone. He is a Christ who ‘is come, who came and who abides in the flesh.’ The last 10 words are quoted from A. Ross in the New International Commentary.⁸

Schep goes on:

In the second passage, 2 John 7, the anti-Christian deceivers are portrayed as men who ‘confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh.’ The expression ‘in (the) flesh’ is the same as in 1 John 4:2, but it is remarkable that the present participle has replaced the perfect participle. This is generally understood as a timeless present, having virtually the same meaning as the perfect of 1 John 4:2.

Some say, notes Schep, the phrase denotes the Second Advent, and that certainly is possible. ‘In either case the consequence ... is the same: Christ is still in the flesh.’⁹ A thorough check of many critical commentaries plus two grammars (Robertson, Dana and Mantey) on the verbal and grammatical forms employed divulged little variation from Schep’s sources. He is not mistaken. Any theory which claims that the glorified body of our Lord is immaterial or non-fleshly is not scriptural. And the Judgment of Scripture is very severe—‘not of God,’ ‘of the world,’ ‘deceiver ... antichrist.’

It is, of course, incorrect to say affirmation of our Lord’s present incarnate state (in flesh, en sarki) during the forty days, at ascension and Second Advent, rests on two verses in John’s Epistles. It rests on multitudes of texts and merges with other doctrines. If Jesus Christ is not today in flesh in heaven then the integrity of His incarnation has been forfeited. It would be strange to contend that He is still incarnate (from in plus carnis, the Latin for flesh) if He has no flesh. In such a case we have no true Mediator (1 Tim. 2:5).

From a certain point of view incarnation (Lat. incarnatio) is only a word. In this case it is a word with a history going back to the Latin theologians of the fourth century, and the Greek word it translates goes back to the very beginning. For en sarki, in flesh (1 Tim. 3:16) and ‘became flesh’ (John 1:14) fix the idea in language. It means complete human nature. In Scripture this figure of speech (synecdoche, a part put for the whole) is used for the whole man as when David says his flesh cries out for the living God. Would it not be strange to speak of Christ as incarnate God if He has no flesh?

This truth has inspired great poetry (unfortunately presently neglected by professional, lay and academic literature). Let us share a few precious lines from Robert Browning’s poem, entitled Saul.

‘Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for!/ My flesh that I seek/ In the Godhead!/ I seek and I find it, O Saul it shall be/ A face like my face, that receives thee; a Man like to me,/ Thou shalt love and be loved by forever;/ A hand like this hand/ Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee!/ See the Christ stand!’ (Saul, lines 304–312).

5. The body of Christ’s resurrection is ‘the same’ in identity as His crucified body but is in certain respects a changed body. The emphasis in the Gospels is far greater on the sameness than on the differences. Jesus seems to have exhausted the possible means for demonstrating the numerical identity of the ‘new’ body with the ‘old.’

To this end Jesus ‘showed’ His ‘hands and his side’ to the assembled disciples on Easter Day (John 20:20) and a week later challenged Thomas to put his finger in the nail prints in His hand and put his hand on the site of the wound in His side (John 20:27, 28). To the same effect He prepared a meal of fish and bread for them, as reported in John 21:1–23. Note especially the expressions ‘It is the Lord’ (John 21:7) and ‘They knew it was the Lord’ (John 21:12). For the same reason He even ate a piece of broiled fish before them on Easter Day, asking for the food in order to demonstrate the reality of His physical presence among them. Luke says He ‘he presented himself alive after his suffering by many proofs, appearing to them during forty days’ (Acts 1:3). Proofs of what? The clear implication is proof of the reality of His physical presence in a living condition.

Some of the differences between the body nailed to the cross and the risen body that interpreters think they find are not necessarily true. There is no proof, for example, that Jesus did not enter the room of the assembled disciples by opening the ‘locked’ (John 20:19, 26) door. Even if locked, at this late date we do not know if it was the door to the Upper Room, the door to the building or the gate to the enclosed court. Even if locked, Jesus, certainly, would have been up to the challenge of opening a lock that would have been easy for any skilled burglar. At any rate it seems as likely the disciples’ ‘fear of the Jews’ and disconcerted condition of mind is the reason for the locked door’s being mentioned in John’s report, not that the risen Christ walked bodily through a stone wall or wooden door.

There is indeed an element of mystery about the way the risen Lord could suddenly appear and disappear. This has been discussed with various conclusions by Bible interpreters over the centuries. Passages pertaining to these mysterious appearances and disappearances are Luke 24:31, 36; John 20:19, 26. Calvin, commenting on John 20:19, would not deign to discuss the possibility of Jesus’ body passing through stone walls or wooden doors; in comment on John 20:19 he pronounced the idea a ‘childish trifling, which contains nothing solid, and brings along with it many absurdities.’ Schep is correct in the following extended quotation:

The fact is, however, that nowhere in the Gospels is it said that Jesus’ body passed through closed doors. The only thing we are told is that he suddenly appeared while the doors were closed. It is certainly implicitly suggested that there was something mysterious and miraculous in his entering the room, but how he did enter is not mentioned at all ...

How did Jesus enter? Nobody knows, and the numerous suggestions made by commentators are all mere guesses. We do not even know whether ‘the doors’ mean only the outer door of the building itself, or the inner door to the room where the disciples were gathered, though the former interpretation seems more plausible.¹⁰

Paul writes much about the changes in our bodies at the resurrection, in 1 Corinthians 15. They will be ‘like his glorious body’ (Phil. 3:21), hence Paul’s description of our resurrection bodies is applicable to Jesus’ body. ‘A description of the one is therefore a description of the other.’¹¹

Transformation

By the word ‘must’ in 1 Corinthians 15:53 he shows some change will be necessary for deceased believers as well as for translated, living ones. ‘This perishable body must put on the imperishable and this mortal body must put on immortality.’ This is required to enter the new ‘eschatological’ world of perfection and glory (1 Cor. 15:47–49). We are even now being transformed morally in preparation (2 Cor. 3:18). We may now ready ourselves in varying degrees (Dan. 12:3; 1 Cor. 3:14, 15; 2 Cor. 9:6). The great chapter 15 of 1 Corinthians shows that we, as frail and mortal, cannot enter that new world without being adapted to it ahead of time, becoming no longer frail but strong, no longer mortal but immortal, no longer humiliated but glorious. The transformation of our bodies will occur at the Second Advent of Christ (1 Thess. 4:16, 17; 1 Cor. 15:50–54). This is not in any way to deny ‘the resurrection of the flesh’—the usual phrase in the creeds—objectionable as the phrase has become to some.

Glorification

The crucified body of Christ was raised a 'glorious body.' 'There can be no doubt,' says J. A. Schep, 'that according to the New Testament the body in which our Lord appeared to his disciples during the forty days between the resurrection and the ascension was a glorified body of flesh.'¹² He is making the point the glorified body was flesh, and that the flesh was glorified during the forty days. He acknowledges that not all good scholars agree but stands by the statement.

Three main views have been taken as to the time our Lord's body became glorified. The first and most common is that the glorification took place at the moment of resurrection but that the glory was veiled during the forty days and no longer. Paul was confronted with the fully glorified Christ on the Damascus road as also was John on Patmos. Among famous authors who agree is William Milligan, who said,

[T]he Glorification of Jesus began at His Resurrection, not at His Ascension ... and when ... 1 Timothy 3:16 gathers together six parts of 'the mystery of godliness,' he does not say 'received up into glory,' but 'in glory,'—the glory was already there.¹³

Another truly great theologian wrote of the resurrection body of Christ:

It was raised very glorious, of which his transfiguration ... was an emblem and pledge: and though he did not appear in so much glory immediately after his resurrection, and during his stay with his disciples, before his ascension, they not being able to bear the lustre of his countenance it really had; yet now, being crowned with glory and honour, his body is a glorious one, according to which the bodies of the saints will be fashioned, at the resurrection of the just, Phil, 3:21.¹⁴

The second view, advocated notably at the present time by Millard Erickson, is that it came about in two stages, the resurrection and ascension.

God is in a different dimension of reality, and the transition from here to there requires not merely a change of place, but of state. So, at some point, Jesus' ascension was not merely a physical and spatial change, but spiritual as well. At that time Jesus underwent the remainder of the metamorphosis begun with the resurrection of his body.¹⁵

C. A. Hodge's treatment of Christ's resurrection occupies only four pages of his great three-volume Systematic Theology. He insists on a real resurrection of the 'flesh' of Christ, in which also He ascended. Yet his treatment of the subject is sketchy. He ventures the appearances were 'preternatural' and that 'it appears from the transfiguration of Christ that His body while on earth, was capable of passing from one state to another without losing its identity. Such was the state of our Lord's body during the forty days.... It then, passed into its glorified state.'¹⁶ This very briefly stated and almost wholly undeveloped opinion is apparently about the same as Millard Erickson's.

The third view, advocated by several nineteenth-century theologians, is that the glorification occurred progressively between the resurrection and the ascension. Among the best known are Julius Mueller and the commentators on the New Testament, Godet and Meyer.

There is no evidence I know of, for either the second or third views. There is no trace of stages, two or gradual, in the record. We know that during His years on earth His glory, while inherent to the divine nature, was veiled, only occasionally partially disclosed (e.g. John 2:11 at Cana and more obviously at the Transfiguration).¹⁷

Limitations

The limitations of our Lord's human nature, including a material body, were not erased by resurrection and ascension, whatever new powers it may have. He is still locally present in only one place at a time; He was not ubiquitous or omnipresent in the human nature before or after resurrection. 'He is not here, for he has risen, as he said. Come see where the Lord lay' (Matt. 28:6). There is no proof that His body levitated from the tomb or passed through grave clothes like a vapor. He certainly did not appear unclothed before the female witnesses or on the way to Emmaus, etc. The wrapping of His head He removed, perhaps folded it and laid it in an orderly manner where John later noticed it (and the grave wrappings likewise John 20:7). He appeared twice to the disciples in a closed room (Luke 24:36; John 20:19, 26), but it is gratuitously assumed He passed through the walls or the closed door. He may have simply opened the door, something even burglars and magicians are good at. 'To conclude from the mysterious and miraculous features that since the resurrection the Lord's human nature partakes of the divine omnipresence seems unwarranted.'¹⁸

This exegetical oddity (omnipresence or ubiquity of the risen body of Jesus Christ) is sometimes brought forth to support the Lutheran form of the 'Real Presence' doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Jesus had a way of appearing and disappearing without His entrance or exit being observed even during His years of ministry, whether by natural or supernatural means we do not know. Skillful operators' on a purely natural level (magicians, prestidigitators, etc.) do seemingly similar things. He walked on water, supernaturally, during His days of natural human existence. He passed through crowds unrecognized to escape injury. He also stilled storms while in a local, natural body.

6. His resurrection body is immortal in the sense of never dying, incapable of dying. In this case immortal should not be considered the opposite of mortal as usually understood. Mortal as understood ordinarily ('all men are mortal') means subject to death. In the usual course of events every man is mortal, destined to die—'The living know that they will die ... says the preacher.' It is appointed unto man once to die.' This 'appointment' is the punishment for original sin. '[D]eath spread to all men, because all sinned' (Rom. 5:12). But Jesus was not under the curse of death at all until He voluntarily assumed it. He did that as man in solidarity with our race. In the sense that 'it is appointed unto man once to die and after that the judgment' Jesus was not mortal, i.e. subject to death.

Some theologians assert that in assuming solidarity with the human race He became locked into all our liabilities, including, death and return to the ground. No sentence of Scripture says so. If it were true then from conception onward He was mortal in the same sense we all are. To the contrary, at various points of His spoken record He seems clearly to state He voluntarily undertook, as man, the task of dying in our place, in obedience to His Father's will and in accordance with His declared purpose (Matt. 20:28).

He was not Man in any sense until the incarnation took place, though some even find a subsistence (as opposed to existence) of the human Jesus in the Logos from eternity past and man's creation in the image of that subsistence. 'The God-man subsisted in heaven before the world.... Christ was the Son of Man in heaven, secretly before God, before he became the Son of Man openly in the world.'¹⁹ Though not without precedents, this view is highly speculative and as far as I can see is not supported by any direct affirmation of Scripture unless one assumes, as Pink and many of the ancient Fathers, that 'Wisdom' in Proverbs 8 is no less than the pre-incarnate Logos rather than as elsewhere in Proverbs an hypostasization of the (feminine gender) Hebrew word hokma for wisdom.

He was totally free from sin except as He assumed ours. So He was not 'mortal,' even though He was capable of death and did die. But after resurrection He said 'I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore' (Rev. 1:18 kjv).

IV. The Theological Meaning of the Resurrection of Christ

Though godly and learned scholars have written at great length concerning the theological meaning of Christ's resurrection, the matter can be stated in fewer words, and satisfactorily, mainly in the words of Scripture.

A sound theology at this point will avoid two errors. The one might be termed the orthodox zealot's error, viz.: the resurrection of Jesus is important chiefly for its value as evidence for the truth of Christianity. This did not begin with the fundamentalist movement of the twentieth century. It has been characteristic of too much preaching throughout the modern era. It seems to be regarded as though it were an addition to redemption rather than as an integral part of the work the Father had in mind when He 'sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.' It is not incorrect, but inadequate. The other is the liberal or Modernist error, that Christianity can exist quite apart from dependence on the event of the physical resurrection of the body of Jesus; we can have Jesus as example and teacher (prophet) and lord (king) but He did not die as a sacrifice for sin as the mythologizing Gospel writers and Paul suppose and there really was no resurrection of the flesh—for which this line of thought has proposed a number of weak and mutually contradictory alternate theories.

The Meaning of Christ's Resurrection for Redemption

In the first place, Scriptures show that Christ submitted to death as the penalty of sin, and by His resurrection from the grave gave proof that the penalty of sin was exhausted (see Rom. 4:24; 6:9, 10; 8:3, 10, 11; Gal. 3:13).

In the second place, the resurrection is the specific factual basis, whether addressed to heathen skeptics or unconvinced Jews, for the imperative mood in gospel proclamation: to heathen 'intellectuals', 'God ... now he commands [apaggellō, to announce, notify, command] all people [anthrōpoi, members of the human race, male or female, child or adult] everywhere to repent, because he has fixed a day, on which he will judge the world in righteousness by a man whom he has appointed; and of this he has given assurance to all by raising him from the dead' (Acts 17:30, 31). To unconvinced Jews, Peter at the first Pentecostal preachment, reported the resurrection event, with extensive 'proof' from Old Testament prophecy which ended with this: 'Therefore let all the house of Israel know for certain that God has made Him both Lord and Christ' (Acts 2:36 nasb). The spectacular results are well known. The same technique was followed in all teaching and preaching reported in the book of Acts (Acts 2:24–33; 3:12–15; 10:34–43; 13:22–30; 17:30, 31; 23:6; 24:21;

The Meaning for God Himself

Romans 6:4, ‘Christ was raised from the dead by [emphasis added] the glory of the Father’ (dia with genitive, instrumental case), is to be matched with Philippians 2:11 ‘to [emphasis added] the glory of God the Father’ (eis with accusative of purpose). This means God’s attributes and perfections are manifest in the resurrection. He was not overtaken by events. The event fulfilled the prophecies and types and came together at the right time: ‘what,’ as Paul told Agrippa, ‘the prophets and Moses said ... that the Christ must suffer and [be] ... the first to rise from the dead’ (Acts 26:22, 23 rsv). God is seen to be true and faithful to His promises, also gracious, wise, just and benevolent, able to finish what He starts (see 1 Peter 1:21).

The Meaning for the Son of God

(a) The resurrection was, for Him, the fulfillment of the Father’s commandment, willingly assumed and obeyed. ‘For this reason the Father loves me, because I lay down my life that I may take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord.... This charge have I received from my Father’ (John 10:17, 18). The two parts of His mission, to lay down His life and to take it up again may not be separated. Resurrection was ‘not a mere consequence’ of laying down His life but with the life which followed ‘the true goal of that race which he was to run’ (Milligan, p. 124).

(b) The resurrection was God’s answer to our Lord’s most anguished prayer petitions and relief of the most deeply felt anguish—for One who is ‘life’ and ‘prince of life.’ It has been pointed out that the true rendering of ‘Father, save me from [emphasis added] this hour’ (John 12:27) employs ek, ‘out of,’ not apo ‘away from.’ Hence, the prayer is for deliverance from death after He would be in its power, not from dying itself. The point is important enough to quote the scholarly source:

... when we observe this the whole aspect of the prayer is changed. It is not the same prayer to avoid the bitterness of divine wrath as in Matthew 26:39 and parallels. Hence, Our Lord prayed ... that he might pass through it to a glorious deliverance—in the context of John 12:27, wheat is sown ... not for death but for the harvest for the sake of which Jesus came to that hour.²⁰

(c) Through resurrection Jesus was proclaimed ‘both Lord and Christ.’ This is the force of Peter’s final words at Pentecost, beginning at Acts 2:32, ‘This Jesus God raised up’ and concluding ‘therefore ... God has made him both Lord and Christ’ (Acts 2:36).

(d) As first born of the dead God has declared Him Head of the church and King of creation. This is set forth in exalted, dramatic prose at Colossians 1:16–18; Ephesians 1:19–23; and Hebrews 1:1–3.

(e) He also was ‘declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead’ (Rom. 1:4 asv). There is a convergence of scholarly opinion that, in this place, ‘spirit’ (lower case ‘s’) lies in balanced contrast with ‘according to the flesh,’ i.e. human nature, in verse 3. Hence, ‘spirit of holiness’ designates the divine nature of Christ. The article ‘the’ has no basis in the Greek text. The phrase could properly be rendered ‘a spirit of holiness’—no reference to the Third Person of the Godhead. Everyone of His time and place knew Jesus to be a descendant of King David. Even the blind knew it and addressed him as ‘Son of David’ (Matt. 12:27; see 15:22; 20:30, 31; Mark 10:47, 48; Luke 18:38, 39). The crowds proclaimed him Son of David at the ‘Triumphal Entry.’ Yet there is no evidence any one was convinced of His divine sonship until late in his ministry Peter made his great confession (Matt. 16:16), and Thomas did not believe it until a week after Easter he was convinced ‘by sight’ of the reality of our Lord’s resurrection (John 20:24–29). So the resurrection made known to all the universe that the humble carpenter of Nazareth was also ‘the Son of God in power,’ as several sermons in the book of Acts claim and the Epistles and Apocalypse repeatedly proclaim.

(f) The resurrection was the Father’s answer to Jesus’ prayer for restoration of His power and glory with the Father (John 17:5). There is a significant conjunction of statement in 1 Peter 1:11 and 21 relative to Christ’s resurrection, previous Passion and subsequent glory. Verse 21 states how that God ‘raised him from the dead and gave him glory’ and verse 11, that the prophets of old knew of ‘the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glories.’ Passages such as Isaiah 53:10–12 and Philippians 2:8, 9 speak first of His obedience and suffering, then after a ‘therefore,’ that God rewarded Him with glory and honor. Peter supplies the link between them. The resurrection was necessary for Him to enter into the glory He rightly deserved and concerning which He prayed: ‘glorify your Son... Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed’ (John 17:1, 5).

(g) The resurrection and ascension were necessary to the later special Advent and effusion of the Holy Spirit that constituted the believers a church, the body of Christ. These are the reasons for the forty days of meetings with Jesus and the ten more of tarrying of Acts 1:1 ff.: ‘it is to your advantage that I go away, for if I go not away, the Helper will not come to you. But if I go, I will send him to you.’ (John 16:7)

The Meaning for God’s Own People

As joined with the death of Christ His resurrection is the very heart of redemption and the whole plan of salvation. Beyond this, Scripture calls our attention to several aspects of meaning of the resurrection for us. There are several special particulars.

First, ‘the surpassing greatness of His power toward us who believe’ is measured by ‘the working of the strength of His might which He brought about in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead’ (Eph. 1:19, 20 nasb). As noted earlier in this chapter, Paul seems to have searched the Greek language for the most superlative terms available to characterize the power turned loose for our benefit when God raised Jesus from the dead. Four of them come across to our language as hyperbolic (‘surpassing’), dynamite, dynamic (‘power’) and energy (working). In Philippians 3:10 Paul prays that he may know Christ both in fellowship with His suffering (daily cross-bearing) but also in the power of His resurrection. In this way all the blessings of the whole plan of salvation (or the covenant of grace, if one prefers that form of expression) are hinged to the resurrection of Christ. I shall not attempt the daunting project of examining all the blessings here. That belongs to the next section of systematic theology, subjective soteriology.

Second, He was ‘raised for our justification’ (Rom. 4:25). This is followed immediately by reference to the benefits that accrue to every believer justified ‘by faith’ (Rom. 5:1–5). Reformation Christianity in the Augustinian tradition rejoices to proclaim that these benefits are not attainments to be achieved en route to justification on the Judgment Day, but already secured by faith in Christ’s work certified as finished not only on account of His sixth saying from the cross (‘It is finished!’) but by the victory of the resurrection (Rom. 1:4). Every sin past, present and future has already been forgiven. The justified are possessors of the imputed righteousness of our crucified, risen and ascended Savior. Beginning with ‘peace with God’ (another name for reconciliation), we have access, standing, joy in hope, joy in suffering, endurance (which one must have to be saved, Matt. 24:13), experienced character, no disappointment in God’s love and finally God’s Holy Spirit.

Third, since ‘It is God who justifies’ (Rom. 8:33) there is none to condemn us. Christ that died and who has risen again is making intercession for us (another benefit of the resurrection). Therefore nothing any one can think of now or ever shall separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. 8:34–39).

Fourth, we are already ‘risen with Christ’ (Col. 3:1 kjv). From the divine point of view our salvation began with union with Christ in election and foreknowledge, then continues onward in Him or with Him onward to glory. It is all by grace alone and has us, from this perspective, already sitting together with Christ in His ‘session’ at the right hand of God (Eph. 2:5, 6). The Letter to Colossians, however, brings us down to earth by exhorting believers who accept this state of affairs, at the present time, to think about our ‘standing’ in our present ‘state’ and to set our affections up there where Christ is presently enthroned in present fact. ‘If then you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God,’ etc. (Col. 3:1–3), knowing His destiny is also ours (v. 4). This is the highest kind of motive for holy living (v. 5 to the end of the Epistle).

Fifth, for believers, Christ’s resurrection is the sufficient ground of our own hope of resurrection (‘Because I live, you also will live’ John 14:19).

Finally, the resurrection body of Jesus Christ is the pattern of the believer’s resurrection body in eternity up ahead. ‘For the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a cry of command, with the voice of an archangel, and with the sound of the trumpet of God. And the dead in Christ will rise first’ (1 Thess. 4:16), ‘who will transform our lowly body to be like his glorious body’ (Phil. 3:21); and ‘Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven’ (1 Cor. 15:49). Our hearts are comforted because ‘we know that when he appears we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is’ (1 John 3:2).

¹ This chapter begins where the preceding chapter left off.

² Creed of Ephiphanius ad 374, in Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom I, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), p. 37.

³ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964); unfortunately out of print as of this writing.

⁴ J. A. Schep, ‘Resurrection’ in Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, ed. Merrill C.

Tenney (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), chap. V, p. 74.

⁵ Schaff, Creeds of Christendom ii, p. 368, 369.

⁶ ibid., pp. 404, 405.

⁷ ibid., pp. 368, 369.

⁸ Schep, Resurrection Body, pp. 71, 72.

⁹ ibid., p. 72.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 141.

¹¹ C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology ii, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1970), p. 628.

¹² Schep, Resurrection Body, p. 145.

¹³ William Milligan, The Resurrection of Our Lord, 4th ed. (London: Macmillan Co., 1901), pp. 16, 17.

¹⁴ John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity i, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978), p. 587.

¹⁵ Millard J. Erickson, Christian Theology (Baker Books, 1985), p. 778.

¹⁶ Hodge, Systematic Theology ii, p. 628.

¹⁷ See Milligan's discussion, The Resurrection of Our Lord, pp. 16, 17 and 244.

¹⁸ Schep, in ZPEB v, p. 82.

¹⁹ A. W. Pink. 'His Glory as the Son of Man' from Gleanings in the Godhead, repr., in Free Grace Broadcaster #162, Fall, 1997, pp. 26 and 28.

²⁰ Milligan, The Resurrection of our Lord, pp. 124, 125.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (608). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

22

The Ascension of Christ

In most Christian circles, where we discuss what teachings our denominations or theological parties have in common, the ascension receives little notice. At an early stage of the sixteenth-century Reformation, however, the nature and qualities of the body of the ascended Christ became a matter of very serious difference between Reformed and Lutherans. Luther and Lutherans since his day define the ‘the real presence’ of Christ as bodily presence, in and with the elements of the Lord’s Supper. The body is said, by virtue of union with the divine nature, to be ubiquitous, that is, present where and whenever the words of institution are properly pronounced over the elements of the Eucharist, or the Lord’s Supper. In the time of Calvin and Melancthon (Luther’s colleague) they and others like-minded desperately wished to overcome this difference and with great regret gave up on the matter. Strict and unrelenting Lutheranism, in disagreement both with Roman Catholicism and Protestantism in general on the mode of the presence of Jesus’ flesh and blood in the Eucharistic meal, has pursued its separate way on this matter to the present day. This colors many pages of Lutheran books of theology. It has also produced a rather severe separatist Lutheran outlook toward other Christians. Living as I do in the ocean of Lutheran Christendom in America’s upper Midwest I have been made acutely aware of this regularly.

The sixteenth-century debate from Calvin’s side is reported in large part in Tracts Containing Treatises on the Sacraments, Volume II of the Tracts, trans. by H. Beveridge, Edinburgh, 1849, recently reissued. For the history of the Lutheran doctrine see C. P. Krauth, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology. For a more recent orthodox Lutheran presentation see Francis Pieper in Christian Dogmatics, pp. 323–330,¹ as well as many other places throughout discussion of Christology and sacraments, likewise J. Th. Mueller.²

The ascension of Christ, like His resurrection, has been impossible for the theology of liberalism to accept. There are several explanations proposed by those who reject the plain sense of Scripture as to why the narrative, brief as it is, appears on the pages of the Bible. These need not detain us at this stage of discussion but all should be put on notice that denials and perversions of the orthodox, biblical doctrines of our Lord’s resurrection and ascension now frequently occur in otherwise orthodox settings. This commonly has gone unnoticed by church groups and their schools. There consequently have been some irruptions of severe controversies on account of this aberration.

In our seminaries systematic theology is usually taught by professors trained in the history of doctrines and in the exegetical basis of them. They understand the necessary connections of the several loci of doctrines. This, lamentably, in this age of striving for academic respectability, is not uniformly the case among professors in all departments. In which case it is not uncommon for the current inheritance from neo-orthodoxy (halfway back to orthodoxy from liberalism) to be taught in the New Testament department in regard to our Lord’s resurrection and ascension. The professor may never have taken a course in theology and be quite unaware he is planting a strange seed. In this way unsteady Christology (with good intentions) is passed on to the people of our churches and thereby theological instability and susceptibility to ‘every wind of doctrine.’ The literal, bodily ascension of Christ as taught in the ancient creeds and the evangelical creeds and confessions of the Reformation era is grounded in the Scriptures, especially Luke 24:50 and 51 and Acts 1:6–11. It is as genuine a part of ‘the catholic faith’ as any teaching. Vincent of Lerins’ criteria of ‘ubique, semper, ab omnibus’ (everywhere, always, by all or universality, antiquity, consensus) are fully met by this doctrine. Along with Good Friday, Easter and Pentecost Sunday, Ascension Day is still observed in the ritual calendar of our Lord’s last weeks on earth. What does Scripture demand that we believe?

The Fact of the Ascension

There are several points generally acknowledged as true by a fair reading of Scripture with minor shades of difference. The church has believed, confessed and taught the following:

1. The ascension of Christ was expected by Christ and foretold by Him. Most of the information is in John's Gospel.

At His last attendance at the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus spoke of a coming flow of 'rivers of living water' (John 7:38), about which John comments, that Jesus was referring to 'the Spirit' and adds, 'as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified' (John 7:39). John's comment is inexplicable apart from the ascension story, even though John did not say 'Jesus ascended,' he seems to have assumed it.

In the next chapter Jesus 'said to them [i.e. to the temple crowd] again "I am going away, and you will seek me, and you will die in your sin. Where I am going, you cannot come"' (John 8:21). John reports that even though this obvious reference to Christ's departure for heaven was misunderstood completely by the temple throng, 'As he was saying these things, many believed in him' (v. 30).

2. The Upper Room Discourse furnishes three distinct prophecies of the ascension. They are oblique, not understood till later, being explained like very much of biblical prediction only by fulfillment. The three are 'Yet a little while and the world will see me no more' (John 14:19); 'You heard me say to you, 'I am going away,' etc. (John 14:28, 29); and 'But now I am going to him who sent me,' etc. (John 16:5). These sayings do not refer to Jesus' death but to a departure of the Man, Jesus, as going on a journey. How John remembered these fine turns of cryptic phraseology is explained only by the special work of the Spirit, to 'bring to your remembrance all that I have said to you' (John 14:26).

Certain parables of Jesus near the end of His life pointedly allude to His 'departure.' In the Parable of the Talents the Lord of the house is 'a man travelling into a far country' (Matt. 25:14 kjv). In the Parable of the Pounds 'A nobleman went into a far country' (Luke 19:12) precisely to indicate our Lord's absence from earth in heaven.

A Question: Is the Ascension Anticipated in the Old Testament?

The stories of Enoch, Elijah and Moses are not quite parallel, though one acquainted with the Old Testament cannot help but be reminded of them. Several 'Royal Psalms,' which treat the elevation of 'David' or his Son to universal authority, imply the session at the right hand of the Father and by implication the ascension, and may be involved in Paul's 'in accordance with the Scripture' in 1 Corinthians 15:1-5. Some of these Psalms are 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 61, 72, 89 and 110. Some good interpreters have found rather fanciful (according to contemporary thinking) connections between Old Testament Psalm texts and the ascension. Psalm 47:5 says 'God has gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet'. John Gill suggested that since Jesus will come again with shout and trumpet (1 Thess. 4:16), perhaps the ascent of Immanuel (God with us) is predicted in the Psalm. Psalm 110:1 implies the ascension by speaking of the session at God's right hand as Peter showed (Acts 2:34, 35). (I find no necessary connection with the ascension of Christ in any of these Psalms or Daniel 7:13, 14 and Micah 2:13 which are sometimes cited.)

Another Question: Were There Two ascensions?

One on Easter or shortly thereafter and another later? There was a time when popular exposition of the Bible was more affected by assumptions based on Old Testament types than today. This goes back at least to Puritan times in Britain and America. Without endorsing the view, the Scofield Bible reports how the supposed typology of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) required the ascension of Christ to present the blood of His Calvary sacrifice in heaven shortly after emerging from the tomb. It is supposed He had not yet ascended to make this presentation, when He commanded Mary ‘Touch me not; for I have not yet ascended to my Father’ (John 20:17 kjv), but He had ascended and returned when later He invited disciples to touch Him.³ Commentators have ruminated over the problem in every age as far back at least as Augustine and Chrysostom.⁴ John F. Walvoord points out that Hebrews 9:12 says Christ entered into the holy place ‘through’ (dia with the genitive) His own blood not ‘with’ it as though He carried it to heaven.⁵ There is no suggestion in Scripture that the blood of Christ ever was transported anywhere beyond the cross itself. This question has been warmly discussed in pulpit and lecture over the years, but not now for a generation because ‘typology’ has fallen out of favor. (Actually the tense of the Greek verb [present imperative] with the negative implies that Mary was already touching Jesus physically. He is saying, ‘stop hanging on to me.’ This is reflected in the esv ‘Do not cling to me’ or rsv ‘Do not hold me.’) Among the many published treatments of the critical verse (‘Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father ... I ascend unto my Father,’ etc., John 20:17 kjv) Everett F. Harrison stated the sum of good scholarship briefly and I think well. I quote in part:

[Jesus] was already glorified [when Mary met Him on Easter morning]. He belonged now to the heavenly realm, even though he was willing to tarry for a time to meet with his friends. I am not yet ascended. The implication was that Mary would not be able to touch Jesus in some sense after the Ascension, i.e. she would touch him by faith in the blessed life of the Spirit. The closeness of that new relationship is attested by the fact that he spoke of his followers as brethren (cf. the anticipation of this in Matt. 12:49). Even in the intimacy of the new order, however, Christ retained his own special relationship to God the Father. My Father is the language of deity; my God is the language of humanity.⁶

In Ephesians 4:8–10, Paul quotes Psalm 68:18 and applies it to the ascension of Christ. Paul’s version of the Psalm quoted is unique to him: ‘When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men’ (Eph. 4:8 kjv). A comparison of the passages raises several difficulties. The greatest one is that the Psalm says when the Lord ascended ‘the high mount’ he received gifts among men not that he gave gifts to men as Paul renders it. The Hebrew O.T. and the Greek O.T. (LXX) agree in this reading. Why does Paul use edoken, ‘he gave,’ rather than elabes, ‘you took’ as in the LXX? The Apostle has recast the passage.

The Psalm cited is a song of triumph perhaps, as some scholars think, when the Ark was brought up the hill of Zion in ceremonial procession. Therefore as a Messianic Psalm, Alford’s comment seems adequate; ‘Every part of that ark, every stone of that hill, was full of spiritual meaning. Every note struck on the lyres of the sweet singers of Israel, is but part of a chord, deep and world wide, sounding from the golden harps of redemption.’⁷ He adds ‘Christ received, upon his ascension, gifts for men; [but] he received them in order to give them.’ This may explain the shift from second person (‘thou didst receive’) to third person (‘he gave’).

The Ascension of Christ Described As an Historical Event

One does not read far in recent literature about the exaltation of Christ at His ascension to learn that there is presently a movement away from acceptance of the literal truth of what the record in Acts 1:9–11 says and the rest of the New Testament writers directly or indirectly accept. The alternative views are not always clearly stated, but out of the welter of opinions these emerge. I shall not enlarge upon them greatly.

a) The ascension is a parabolic sort of action, something like Jesus’ cursing of the fig tree, performed to teach believers who must continue to live in a realm of time and space that Christ would no longer be visibly present with them. The real departure of the risen Christ for that other dimension took place at the moment of the resurrection. Murray J. Harris presented this view, prevalent among neo-orthodox theologians, in two books, Raised Immortal (1983) and From Grave to Glory (1990). In the latter he supports the idea that the Lord may have returned from heaven to earth to enact the ascension reported in Luke 24 and Acts 1.⁸ He writes:

The ascension vividly dramatized Christ’s earlier exaltation to God’s right hand. It was a parable acted out for the benefit of the disciples as a visible and historical confirmation of a spiritual reality.⁹

b) The ascension is the report of a tradition only, a tradition which had developed among Christians of the first and second generation to explain Jesus’ absence among them. Both views a) and b) were common among neo-orthodox writers.

c) The ascension story is a myth. This view has taken various forms from Strauss (The Life of Jesus) to Bultmann. The resurrection of a dead body has never taken place, so neither has the ascension. I cite Emil Brunner as a clear example. Emil Brunner, in his later work, clearly relegated the ‘forty days’ and the ascension to unhistorical tradition. He wrote of these two parts of Luke’s testimony (Luke 24; Acts 2):

[O]nce more we stand at a point where theology must have courage to be ready to abandon the ecclesiastical tradition. For Paul the Exaltation of Jesus is identical with his Resurrection.... While the exaltation of Christ and his session at the Right Hand of God belong to the fundamental keryma of this witness in the New Testament, the exaltation as ‘Ascension’ plays no part in the teaching of the Apostles.¹⁰

d) F. F. Bruce held that Jesus ascended to heaven immediately from grave to glory in a ‘body of glory.’ He goes on to say,

The resurrection appearances, in which He condescended to the disciples temporal conditions of life, even giving so far as to eat with them, were visitations from that exalted and eternal world.... What happened on the fortieth day was that this series of visitations came to an end with a scene which impressed on the disciples their Master’s heavenly glory!¹¹

To the contrary, throughout the New Testament the ascension from Olivet is assumed and referred to as quite as much a happening at the end of Jesus' earthly career as His birth at Bethlehem at its beginning and His crucifixion outside the wall of Jerusalem at the climax. The book of Hebrews could never have been written if the author along with people addressed had not believed Jesus had bodily ascended to heaven and was there exercising royal authority and presently carrying on a ministry of intercession.

Objections to the ascension are really more severe than those offered to the resurrection. Why so? The resurrection involves the great miracle of restoring life to a dead body. The ascension involves the miracle of apparent suspension of the law of gravity—perhaps a greater miracle. Both are rejected by anyone who denies the supernatural altogether. The ascension seems to its objectors also to require two errors of fact: first that the cosmos is stacked in layers, with the heaven where God dwells being far above earth; whereas really 'up' changes direction from any given spot as the earth rotates. Second, the ascension of the material body of Jesus requires a 'space,' for the body to occupy, hence presumes that heaven is a place in a space of some kind. These two 'problems' puzzle us all, of course. The two are really the same. Do God, the angels and 'the spirits of the righteous made perfect' (Heb. 12:23) reside in a different dimension (as many orthodox acknowledge), a dimension perhaps unrelated to space, or, is there a region in space where, with the risen Christ, Elijah, Enoch and Moses dwell? The Bible says heaven shall come down to earth and that Christ shall reign here over His people (Isa. 65, 66; Rev. 21, 22). Jesus said He would go away 'to prepare a place' (John 14:2). I refer the reader to the last section of this volume, eschatology, the portion on heaven and the final destiny of the redeemed.

Peter Toon, a contemporary British orthodox theologian, has given the church a thorough presentation of the ascension and its meaning. On the point of heaven as a place he has written:

Evangelicals have traditionally believed ... that heaven is both a place and a state ... on heaven being a place, not primarily because they did not have a modern, post-Einstein view of cosmology, but because the Scriptures require such belief (e.g. Deut. 4:36; 12:5, 11, 21; 26:15; Acts 1:11; 3:21). Heaven, as the dwelling place of God, the holy angels, and saints, was seen as 'above' the starry heavens. Thus Christ has passed through the physical heavens and has been raised 'higher' than them (sic, they) (Heb. 4:14; 7:26; 9:11, 23, 24). In insisting that heaven is both a state and a place, Christianity has usually been careful to deny any knowledge of its particular and specific characteristics or of its precise relation to the physical universe.¹²

Lutheran theology embraces a rather special view of Jesus' ascension. And, since there are about 60 million Lutherans in the world—including a major fraction of them in the American north central section—Christian charity would require that we try to understand them in this matter. The problem relates in part to the rather technical matter of whether there is communion of properties in the incarnate Son or communication of properties between the divine and human natures.

In the Lutheran confessional documents and in most Lutheran works of doctrinal theology as well as pastoral preaching (there are some exceptions), the attributes of the divine nature omniscience, omnipresence and omnipotence are said to be communicated to the human nature. In most orthodox theology, Reformed and other, it is understood the attributes of both natures are communicated to the one Person, not the natures one to the other. This means that if the Spirit of Christ, i.e. His Person, is present in the Eucharistic elements, then His body and blood are also—hence Lutherans insist (as noted several times earlier in these pages) on the real presence, by which they mean the flesh and blood of Christ in, with or under the bread and wine. It remains to be said some Lutheran theologians make it a point to deny human attributes are communicated to the divine nature. To most non-Lutherans this seems like a partial rejection of the Definition of Chalcedon of 451 (‘without mixture’ of the two natures) and a partial acceptance of the Eutychian party condemned at that Council. Shedd provides an excellent discussion.¹³ Lutheran theologians tend to be very defensive—and write at great length—about this matter as we have noted earlier.

Charles Hodge’s final thought on the subject of the ‘place’ (John 14:2) to which Jesus went when he ‘was lifted up, and a cloud took him out of their sight’ (Acts 1:9) says about as much as it is possible for us time-and-space-bound mortals to say. Heaven means:

the place where God dwells, where the angels and the spirits of the just are congregated; whence Christ came, and to which he has returned. He told his disciples that he went to prepare a place for them (John 14:2). In this sense the word is used when the Bible speaks of God as our Father ‘in Heaven’; or of heaven as his throne, his temple, his dwelling place. If Christ has a true body, it must occupy a portion of space. And where Christ is, there is the Christian’s heaven.¹⁴

Summarizing and Concluding

1) In all such matters of fact and meaning we mere human beings are limited to such knowledge of ultimate matters as God has seen fit to reveal. If some of His revelation is accommodated to human limitations of understanding, so be it. We are unable to think of non-spatially related substance in any clear way. Let us accept that: a) the Bible represents heaven, as we have seen, as the ‘place’ of God’s special manifestation. In Solomon’s great dedicatory prayer he proposes, ‘But will God dwell indeed with man on the earth? Behold, heaven [of birds, clouds] and the highest heaven [stellar spaces] cannot contain thee; how much less this house which I have built’ (2 Chr. 6:18 rsv). Wise people of ancient times knew the Creator of time and space is not ‘contained’ there. Yet Solomon goes on to speak of a ‘heaven thy dwelling place’ from which God answers prayers. Wherever and whatever this heaven is, it is the place of God’s special manifestation as opposed to the whole creation, where He is generally manifest. We can say no more.

2) Our Lord’s leaving the disciples and scenes of earth is described as an ascent to heaven with clouds; and ‘he went up.’ He is said elsewhere to have ‘passed through the heavens’ (Heb. 4:14). Paul implies a plurality of heavens, to the third of which He, ‘this man was caught up.’ This third heaven he equates with Paradise (2 Cor. 12:1–4). How he knew it was Paradise—thence Jesus and the repentant thief arrived at death (Luke 23:43)—he does not say. He reports that there he ‘heard things that cannot be told, which man may not utter’ (2 Cor. 12:4) and presumably saw sights indescribable, quite like what John the Revelator says of his transport to heaven (Rev. 4:1). Though John rather plainly indicates he was ‘in the Spirit’ (Rev. 1:10; 4:2), which we may suppose means he never physically left the Isle of Patmos. Concerning Paul’s remarkable experiences, he plainly states he does not know and cannot say if he was in the body or out of it. If Paul could say nothing reportable about heaven and John does not say he was literally there, at this distance from them and in want of further dependable revelation we best say no more about the geography of heaven.

3) In condescension to our inability to conceive of such a place, the Bible persistently represents ‘heaven and earth’ as opposed realities, upward and downward. The last two chapters of the Bible teach that after the resurrections and judgments with which the present order shall end a new Jerusalem will come down from God out of heaven. In an important manner therefore we may expect that the earth and heaven will no longer be polar opposites. It is not said the tabernacle of men will be with God, but the other way around. The souls of martyrs presently in heaven, near to God, are dissatisfied with their disembodied condition, for they cry ‘how long’ (Rev. 6:9–11).

4) Joseph Seiss, a prolific, widely read and learned Lutheran writer of a century and more ago, insisted that heaven is a place, however mysterious for the present, where human beings in physical bodies will feel at home. We are each, he said, ‘a being who is not mere spirit—who knows only to live in a body.... Did men but learn to know the difference between a Paradise of sense and a Paradise of sensuality ... that there was a material universe before sin was’ and shall endure after sin is washed away from it, etc.¹⁵ Heaven is normally a topic of eschatology, yet in thinking about our Lord’s ascension one must form some clear idea about the destination of His ascension. Our conception cannot be as distinct and precise as one might wish, for though the heaven of God to which the Son of God returned is previous to the material creation, it is nevertheless ‘true that our Lord returned to the Father not as he came, but forever united with human nature, the Word made Flesh.’¹⁶ H. B. Swete states the obvious: heaven must be a place ‘user-friendly’ for our Lord and all the redeemed, whose physical bodies are permanently restored to them.

5) Let us observe that the Apostle Paul regarded the ascension (‘taken up in glory,’ 1 Tim. 3:16) as part of the mystery of Christ. When we are caught up to heaven at His coming, as He was at His ascension, we probably still will not fully understand, any more than we fully understand the appearance of firmness composed of innumerable atomic and sub-atomic particles of the whole periodic table of the elements.

The Importance of the Ascension

The ascension of Christ is mentioned by Paul, as just observed, in his great summary of the mystery of Christ (1 Tim. 3:16). As we have seen, Jesus made a point of predicting it several times. The ascension furnishes a pattern of how the Lord shall appear ‘the second time ... unto salvation’ (Heb. 9:28 kjv).

The ascension of Christ, says the author of Hebrews, marks the second of three ‘appearances’ of Christ in the flesh and in history—two of these appearances past and one yet future: ‘Christ has entered, not into holy places made with hands ... now to appear in the presence of God.’ He also ‘appeared once for all ... to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.’ In the future He ‘will appear a second time [on earth] ... to save those who are eagerly waiting for him’ (Heb. 9:24–28).

The church has professed belief in the ascension of Christ in its official creeds and confessions from the beginning. The ‘Apostles Creed’ places ‘he ascended into heaven’ between ‘he arose from the dead’ and ‘sitteth on the right hand of God.’ The most ecumenical in spirit of the Reformation documents, the Heidelberg Catechism, devotes four questions and answers to it. In the sketch to follow here, the great theological significance of the ascension will stand out.

The Theological and Practical Meaning of the Ascension of Christ

As for Christ Himself: 1.) It marked the end of His career of redemption for, ‘After making purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high’ (Heb. 1:3) where the inhabitants of heaven worship Him as conqueror of sin and death (Rev. 5 ff.). 2.) There at the ‘right hand of’ Father He has put all things under His feet and has made Him the head over all things (Eph. 1:17, 22) as reward for His redemptive suffering (Acts 2:34–36; Phil. 2:9–11; Isa. 53:12). 3.) The ascension enabled Him to be inaugurated into the high priestly work He now exercises in the heavenly sanctuary (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:24, 25; 9:11, 24–26), as Hebrews describes at length (Heb. 8:1–6), ‘exalted above the heavens’ (Heb. 7:26).

Millard J. Erickson’s widely used textbook of theology provides only a brief treatment of the resurrection of Jesus and that as a stage of His exaltation.¹⁷ He asserts that after the resurrection but before ascension His body ‘was something of a resuscitation, such as that of Lazarus, rather than a true resurrection as will be the case for us.’ He has already stated, ‘the body that he had at the point of resurrection was yet to undergo a more complete transformation at the point of the ascension. It was yet to become a “spiritual body.”’ He goes on to say, ‘So, at some point, Jesus’ ascension was not merely a physical and spatial change, but spiritual as well. At that time Jesus underwent the remainder of the metamorphosis begun with the resurrection of his body.’ Shortly, after brief attention to the absence of pain and presence of praise and glory in the ascended state this statement, strange to this reader, appears: ‘There is a difference in another respect as well. For now Jesus is the God-man.’ One must ask, has not our Lord been ‘the God-man’ from the first moment of incarnation? He affirms ‘a continuing incarnation,’ but ‘His [humanity] is not of the type that we have, or even the humanity that he had while he was here.’ These ideas are not presently usual in evangelical theology and differ in several ways from the discussion to follow here. H. L. Martensen, an influential Danish theologian set forth similar views,¹⁸ as did Charles Hodge.¹⁹

Again, let not the misbelieving, unbelieving and half-believing academic, critical scholars of our times deceive any one about the permanence of our Lord’s complete human nature, including His body of ‘flesh.’ Once more J. A. Schep speaks timely warnings in this connection.

But all these and other changes which the ascension brought about have nothing to do with a change in Jesus’ resurrection-body. It is in his risen, incorruptible, and immortal body of flesh that Jesus Christ in heaven exercises his all-embracing authority and performs his heavenly ministry as the exalted King, Priest and Prophet of the Church. Undoubtedly, his exalted position in heaven implies the possibility that he can display supernatural glories and appear in a splendour of light. So he appeared to Paul on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3), and so he will come at the end of the ages (Mark 8:38; 13:26; Matt. 24:30). But this gives us no right to regard the body of our risen and exalted Lord as being changed into a body consisting of some light-substance or glory. Much less does the manner in which he revealed himself to John in a vision (Rev. 1:13ff.) give any ground for such a conclusion.²⁰

As for believers: the ascension made it possible for Christ to send the Holy Spirit in His several special office works—agent to complete revelation of ‘all the truth’ to the Apostles (John 16:12–14; 15:26, 27), agent to convict men of their need of forgiveness of sin (John 16:8, 9), agent of regeneration (John 3:5–8), to be the believers’ Comforter (John 14:16, 17 kjv) and Intercessor (Rom. 8:26, 27), and, of course, to unite believers into a universal ekklēsia (Matt. 3:11; 1 Cor. 12:13 ff.) and much more.

The ascension also assures us that we have a sympathetic Advocate in heaven, ‘For Christ has entered ... into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God on our behalf’ (Heb. 9:24 also see Heb. 4:14–16). In a strange way His absence from us and presence with the Father enables us to perform greater works in Jesus’ name than if He were here in the flesh (John 14:12). In heaven our Lord has opened access for each of us even today in prayer ‘by the new and living way which He opened for us ... through his flesh’ and actual entrance to heaven at last ‘where Jesus has gone as a forerunner’ (Heb. 6:20). Contemplation of the fact that our Lord has ascended to heaven should produce many spiritual benefits: especially, strong interest in heaven and heavenly things—seeking ‘the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God’ (Col. 3:1); great assurance, for now we have a ‘hope set before us. We have this as a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul, a hope that enters into the inner place behind the curtain, where Jesus has gone as a forerunner on our behalf’ (Heb. 6:18–20).

When in the next chapter we assess the practical import of the ascension and heavenly life of the incarnate Son of God the truly amazing importance of our Lord’s passing into the invisible world, in the flesh, bodily, will be apparent.

This is all ground for assurance of a joyous eternal future, peculiar to evangelical Christian faith.

Just as a captain casts his anchor, so the soul of the believer casts his anchor, and just as the captain does not put his ultimate trust in his anchor but in the anchor ground, so the believer does not put his trust in his hope but in the ground of his hope, namely the promises of God which have been fulfilled by the forerunner and which will still be fulfilled.²¹

¹ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St Louis: Concordia Publ., 1951), pp. 323–330 and on ‘The Communicated Omnipresence,’ vol. ii, pp. 66 ff.

² John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St Louis: Concordia Publishing, 1955), pp. 295–309.

³ Scofield Bible, pp. 1141, 1142.

⁴ See survey of views in J. P. Lange A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures: Critical, Doctrinal and Homiletical,—Matthew, trans. Philip Schaff (New York: Charles Scribner & Co., 1870), pp. 610, 611.

⁵ John F. Walvoord, Jesus Christ Our Lord (Chicago: Moody Press, 1969), pp. 220, 221.

⁶ Everett F. Harrison, ‘The Gospel According to John,’ in The Wycliffe Commentary (Chicago: Moody Press, 1962), p. 1119.

⁷ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers, repr. (Chicago: Moody Press n.d.), p. 1229.

- ⁸ Murray J. Harris, From Grave to Glory (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1990), pp. 178–183.
- ⁹ ibid., p. 423.
- ¹⁰ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption, Dogmatics ii, trans. Olive Wyon (Philadelphia, PA: The Westminster Press, 1952), p. 373.
- ¹¹ F. F. Bruce, Commentary on the Book of Acts, rev. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1988), p. 129.
- ¹² Peter Toon, ‘The Meaning of the Ascension of Christ,’ 2nd of four articles on Christ’s Ascension in Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 140 (Oct.–Dec. 1983), p. 291.
- ¹³ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), pp. 323–327.
- ¹⁴ Charles A. Hodge, Systematic Theology ii. 630–635.
- ¹⁵ Joseph A. Seiss, Lectures on the Apocalypse, 3 volumes (Philadelphia, PA: Approved Book Stores, 1865). (Reprint: Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1964), loc. cit. Rev. 21 ff.
- ¹⁶ Henry B. Swete, The Ascended Christ: A Study in the Earliest Christian Teaching (London: Macmillan, 1916), pp. 8, 9.
- ¹⁷ Millard J. Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1985), pp. 776–779.
- ¹⁸ H. L. Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, 1864, p. 172, as cited by Toon, in Bibliotheca Sacra, p. 199.
- ¹⁹ C. A. Hodge, Systematic Theology, p. 628.
- ²⁰ J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964), p. 165.
- ²¹ Grosheide, Commentary on Hebrews, p. 187, as quoted by G. C. Berkouwer, The Work of Christ, trans. C. Lambregtse (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965), p. 208.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (616). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

23

Enthroned in Heaven at God’s Right Hand

Like everything else related to the New Testament message about Christ, the beginnings of the enthronement, or session doctrine, are found in the Old Testament either by preparation or prophecy, i.e. ‘in accordance with the Scriptures’ (1 Cor. 15:3, 4). The primary Old Testament passage is Psalm 110, though Psalms 2, 45 and 72 as well as every other text relating to the royal, Messianic office are related to the subject.

Christ's enthronement took place in heaven. It was not witnessed by human eyes on earth. Our knowledge of the session at God's right hand rests, first, upon two announcements by the new leader of the Apostles, Peter, by name. Second, upon the assumption through the rest of the New Testament that the enthronement had taken place.

The Fact of the Session at God's Right Hand

The apostle Peter was God's revelatory agent in making the fact known. The amazing phenomena of Pentecost had taken place early in the day—before 'the third hour' (Acts 2:15), about 9 o'clock. So 'Peter, standing up' as new spokesman for the apostolic college launched into a discourse to explain the amazing phenomenon of the tongues-speaking and how everyone understood in the language in which he 'was born.' Peter's audience numbered several thousands of Jews representative of 'every nation under heaven' (v. 5). It was an auspicious occasion for an announcement of cosmic meaning.

The announcement was introduced as the scriptural explanation of the events in Jerusalem early that morning.

This Jesus God raised up, and of that we all are witnesses. Being therefore exalted at the right hand of God, and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he has poured out this that you yourselves are seeing and hearing. For David did not ascend into the heavens, but he himself says, 'The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool.' Let all the house of Israel therefore know for certain that God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified (Acts 2:32–36 esv).

This is nothing less than official Christian interpretation of Psalm 110 as a prophecy of the enthronement of Christ which had now already taken place in heaven. It constitutes the very first example of a Christian theologian making a theological statement on the basis of Scripture interpretation. Peter told those Jewish listeners not only what had happened at the session but what it all meant, and did so in connection with Bible interpretation, as we shall see.

Many years later Peter wrote another report, of fulfilled prophecy as it were, speaking of 'the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who has gone into heaven and is at the right hand of God' (1 Peter 3:21, 22).

Hebrews presents the session more by way of reflection on accepted fact among the readers than as announcement. It was well known to them and a basis for exhortation.

The nearest thing to an 'eyewitness' testimony to the session is by Stephen, the first Christian martyr. At the close of his address to the Jewish council, Stephen 'full of the Holy Spirit, gazed into heaven and saw ... Jesus standing at the right hand of God' (Acts 7:55; see v. 57). Whether risen from the throne and standing in response to the threatened atrocity about to take place, as some think, or more likely, to receive Stephen's spirit to heaven we cannot know. Any comment is speculative.

Also Jesus prophesied of the session and His eschatological coming (the parousia) when under oath in the high priest's court: 'But I tell you, from now on you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Matt. 26:64). This was an outright claim to be the fulfillment of Daniel 7:14 and of Psalm 110:1. Peter no doubt was thinking of the connection in proclaiming 'this Jesus' whom the Jews before him had crucified 'God has made ... both Lord and Christ' as we noted in Acts 2:36.

Through the epistles of Paul and Peter and the book of Hebrews the event of enthronement on high is already, within a generation of Jesus' death, a matter of settled Christian knowledge and belief among the Christian assemblies of the Empire and is employed as grounds for Christian doctrine, comfort and admonition. This was no myth made up by the 'creative Gentile Church' in imitation of some late Gnostic myth as some practitioners of redaction criticism would have us believe.

The Old Testament Background

One can imagine how Jesus might respond to our incredulity about such unlikely events as the visible ascent of a Man up through the atmosphere and then out of sight to the very throne of God. Modernist theology rejects the factuality of the session altogether. Admittedly all of us must recognize that we are not on familiar ground. There is not much to be said except that Christian faith accepts what little the inspired documents say about Jesus' ascension and enthronement. Even Paul said it was not possible to describe heaven's language, geography and furniture, so to speak (2 Cor. 12:1-4). Might Jesus not say of the modern critics, 'O foolish ones, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken. Was it not necessary that the Christ should suffer these things and enter into his glory?'

That 'was it not necessary' includes His session and the prophecy of it in Psalm 110. 'The Lord says to my Lord: 'Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool'.... Rule in the midst of your enemies.... The Lord is at your right hand; he will shatter kings on the day of his wrath.' Peter's phraseology is clearly recognizable in later New Testament references to the session. Here at the fountain are the chief revealed elements of Christ's kingly reign, a beginning in which He is declared King and a reign which takes place at first 'in the midst of ... enemies' but which will later triumph openly over all other sovereignties.

Initial Appropriation of Power

The appropriation by Christ of His kingly power, won by death and resurrection, took place at His session at the right hand of the Father. This appropriation of power gives us the chief significance of the session. It marks the beginning of the reign of Christ. This is the meaning assigned, again by the Apostle Peter: 'Jesus Christ.... has gone into heaven and is at the right hand of God with angels, authorities, and powers having been subjected to him' (1 Peter 3:21, 22).

This reign, as Psalm 110 says, is 'in the midst' of enemies and will progress until all of them are under His feet (Ps. 110:1). Although Jesus' reign is presently acknowledged on earth only by Christians, it will be enforced and become visible at His Second Coming. He will not only reign but rule as King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 5:6-14; 11:15; 19:11-21; Zec. 12-14).

This 'coming' (parousia) of Christ is described in part as securing justice for the poor, meek and needy: 'with righteousness he shall judge the poor' (Isa. 11:4a; and many similar passages). Yet in the passages cited in the New Testament in reference to the session, the context speaks of the exercise of coercive power. This is true both in the prophecy of Psalm 2 and in the vision of Patmos (compare Ps. 110:6 and Ps. 2:9 with Rev. 19:11 and Ps. 2 as a whole with Rev. 19:11–21). At that time will occur the resurrection of the righteous dead (Rev. 20:1–5), to be followed by Christ’s millennial reign (Rev. 20:4–6), if our understanding of the sequence of events prophesied in Revelation 19 and 20 is correct. Then ensue the resurrection and judgment of ‘the rest of the dead’ and their final judgment (Rev. 20:7–15), including presumably also all wicked angels, demons and Satan. This will be succeeded (who knows how long?) by a merging of the reign of Christ with that of His Father, ‘For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet’ (1 Cor. 15:23–25; Phil. 2:9–11). (The above remarks are not intended to persuade on moot points of biblical eschatology among believers but as enforcing the literal assumption of royal, governmental power.)

The church’s present relation to the reign of Christ from the Father’s right hand and share in it are mentioned at Ephesians 1:20–23; 4:15; 5:23; and Colossians 1:18–20. Many rightly observe that the Christian confession, ‘Jesus Christ is Lord,’ is an acknowledgment of this reign and that this doctrine brings about inevitable collision whenever ‘Caesar’ seeks to replace Christ as the object of ultimate allegiance. Much of the preceding paragraphs is adapted directly from a Bible dictionary article by the present author entitled ‘The Work of Christ.’¹

Christ’s Present Reign As King

One’s understanding of the present reign of Christ has significant bearing on how one interprets the numerous passages of Scripture which speak of ‘the kingdom of God,’ or ‘of heaven’; and terms like ‘eternal life,’ ‘treasure in heaven’ and related ideas; also on how to interpret the New Testament in relation to Christ’s present and future reign at God’s right hand.

Let us address this matter, taking as starting point the Lord Jesus Christ’s words about the first preaching mission of the twelve Apostles: ‘And proclaim as you go, saying, “The kingdom of heaven is at hand” ’ (Matt. 10:7).

Question: Was there a Postponed Kingdom of Power?

A commonly held theory holds that Jesus specifically meant, ‘I am offering you the kingdom. Accept it and all the Old Testament promises about a coming reign of Messiah on earth will ensue immediately. Reject it and I will withdraw the offer and present it on another day. Meanwhile I will substitute a different program, the church, a unique new thing.’

It is difficult to deny that there was a legitimacy in the obvious expectation of a visible, physical reign of the promised ‘Messiah of David’ in the pious hearts of those who truly expected the Christ to come in their generation and who recognized Jesus of Nazareth to be that Person. Many saintly people were aware of the clear Old Testament prophecies of the reign of Him ‘that is to come.’ Among these prophecies were the very passages (Pss. 2 and 110) Peter used in announcing the enthronement of Christ. John also (Rev. 19:11) announced the Second Advent, this time as ‘King of Kings and Lord of Lords’ on earth. There are many similar Old Testament promises such as Psalm 72; Isaiah 2:1 ff.; Micah 4:1–5; Amos 9:11–15; and Jeremiah 31:31–34 are only sample texts which appear in Christmas liturgy and preaching and other ‘high days’ in the Christian year. Jeremiah frequently spoke of this future kingdom when a descendant of King David would ‘execute justice and righteousness in the land’ at a time when ‘Judah will be saved, and Israel will dwell securely’ (Jer. 23:5–8).

Let us acknowledge that the angel Gabriel rightly strengthened this expectation in Mary’s heart when he affirmed to her ‘amazement’ ‘the Lord God will give to him the throne of his father David’ (Luke 1:32). The throne of David was not a throne in heaven as certain rather strident opponents of any doctrine of a future reign of Christ on earth seem to think, for David’s throne is certainly not at God’s right hand in heaven. That wise and gentle young lady reflected quite a literal understanding of Gabriel’s announcement in her ‘Magnificat’ several weeks later (see Luke 1:46–55). She took the announcement literally, not to disregard features that speak of the spiritual quality of Messiah’s kingdom as well. The same literal expectations are present in the ‘Benedictus’ of Zechariah (Luke 1:69–74), with the spiritual aspect present also. Jesus did not rebuke the mother of James and John for looking ahead to an earthly kingdom in which her two sons might have prominent positions, but for her selfish desires (Matt. 20:20–23).

In view of Jesus’ plain prediction that His Apostles would in the future ‘eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel’ (Luke 22:30) it is not surprising that some of the disciples, in the last moments before the ascension, asked Jesus if He would ‘at this time restore the kingdom to Israel’ (Acts 1:6). Further it is not true, as it is often said, that the Lord rebuked that expectation. Rather Jesus informed the disciples (cf. Matt. 24:36–43 and parallels) that ‘It is not for you to know times or seasons that the Father has fixed by his own authority’ (Acts 1:7). This hope was neither morally nor factually defective only deficient of information which Jesus immediately supplied (Acts 1:7, 8).

The Old Testament predictions of Messiah’s coming and of His kingdom do not present any clear delineation of or distinction between His two Advents. The Old Testament prophets therefore were puzzled by their own predictions of ‘the sufferings of the Christ [at the First Advent] and the subsequent glories’ (1 Peter 1:11). Even up till the events of Acts 10 and 11 Peter himself did not catch on to the distinct character of the present epoch of world evangelism to intervene before the coming of Christ in His ‘kingly power’ (Luke 23:42; Rev. 11:15), i.e. in His manifest glory.

But God knew and progressively revealed this in apostolic times to Apostles (John 16:12–16) and they have made clear to us in the New Testament Scriptures, which they wrote, what could not be clarified to Mary, Zechariah, the mother of Zebedee’s children, and the disciples, not even Peter, without the passing of several years, much growth in spiritual perception and special revelation in the visions of Acts 10:1–16, to Cornelius and to Peter respectively.

No, their pious expectations of Christ’s manifest kingdom and glory in a visible rule over the earth were not, as such, mistaken. The invisible reign of Christ from heaven now intervening was known to God and made known to them and us when the time was ripe. Nothing at all on God’s predestined and foreknown schedule was postponed.

There is a better way of looking at the matter than the postponed kingdom idea on the one hand or, on the other, denial of any future reign of Christ on earth at all—a view that many think is fully compatible with the conviction that the church is unique and new, not simply a new Israel or a substitute heir of Israel’s promises.

This can be seen by looking at ‘kingdom’ in the context of New Testament usage where ‘kingdom’ usually signifies kingly rule rather than territory. It means ‘reign’ in most of the contexts. ‘The kingdom’ is God’s kingship working salvation, ‘His government as a living and powerful Divine action, revealing itself in ever new forms of self-manifestation, in the course of many dispensations and periods’ (George Ladd). Although the reign of God will ultimately take visible form on earth, it is not simply a future kingdom, millennial or otherwise.

By virtue of special calling and election and through a series of covenants Israel became a chosen people, an elect nation in special relation to Jehovah. In Scripture the Old Testament rule of God in Israel is sometimes termed the ‘kingdom’ of God. But that kingdom as a special sphere of God’s saving action was taken away from the nation of Israel because of their unbelief (Matt. 21:43) and given to others. The new ‘nation’ producing the ‘fruits’ of the kingdom (Matt. 21:43) is no particular nation at all, but all of the nations, i.e. the Gentiles. During the present age, the church, the instrument of extension of God’s reign in saving power, is called ‘the kingdom of God.’ The eternal heavenly kingdom that sinners will not inherit is also called ‘the kingdom of God’ (Gal. 5:21). In the parables of the kingdom (Mark 4; Luke 8; Matt. 13) the sphere of Christian profession, i.e. Christendom, is called the kingdom of heaven, as is commonly acknowledged.

Thus every member of the body of Christ belongs to the kingdom and every true citizen of the kingdom belongs to the church. Every true Christian believer is a citizen of that kingdom (Eph. 2:19; Phil. 3:20; Col. 1:13). Even those who are Christians only by profession are referred to by Christ as being in the kingdom (Matt. 7:21; 13:41; 22:11–14). Yet sometimes the New Testament acknowledges only the genuine believers as members of that spiritual kingdom (John 3:5). Both the true and the professing church can be referred to as the kingdom of God if it is kept in mind that this is not a permanent arrangement.

In the future, members of the true church will ‘inherit’ the kingdom of glory and power (Matt. 25:34; cf. 1 Cor. 6:10; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5); they will enter into it (Acts 14:22). It is the goal of the present earthly pilgrimage to which they have been called (1 Thess. 2:12) and it is their reward (2 Thess. 1:5). If the future kingdom of God, when He is ‘all in all’ (1 Cor. 15:25–28), is thought of as the perfected kingdom of God, the church will be a sphere within that larger sphere. The idea of ‘the kingdom’ is so fluid in the New Testament that in one chapter, Matthew 19, the kingdom is roughly equated with ‘eternal life’ (v. 16), ‘treasure in heaven’ (v. 21), ‘enter[ing] the kingdom of heaven’ (v. 23), ‘enter[ing] the kingdom of God’ (v. 24), ‘be[ing] saved’ (v. 25) and ‘inherit[ing] eternal life’ (v. 29)—all with no sense of inconsistency with ‘the regeneration,’ a future visible reign of Christ from a throne (v. 28).

These ideas have a common core: Jesus’ royal rights to every man’s worship in a world He owns, won by His redemptive career. This is manifest in many related ideas and, of course, in the words whereby the Bible presents them. Any one who throws away some of these so as to make one idea or term regulative for all the rest does not understand the reign of Christ from His throne in heaven or the New Testament message about the kingdom of Him who is ‘Lord and Christ.’

I have developed my thinking on this subject more fully in several other books: Daniel and the Latter Days, Chicago: Moody Press, 1977, pp. 112–114; ‘The Work of Christ,’ in Young’s Bible Dictionary, Wheaton, IL: Tyndale, 1984, pp. 134, 135; A Greater Commission, Chicago: Moody

This evidence forms a basis for affirming that the gospel of grace as found in Romans 1:16–17; 1 Corinthians 15:1–8; and throughout the New Testament is accurately described as the good news of the kingdom of God. It seems evident that Paul so understood it (see Acts 20:24–25; 28:31; see also pp. 58 and 59). There is a reign of God in the here-and-now, God’s present kingdom of grace in the church, but there also will be a future manifest kingdom and hence Christians can be ‘fellow workers for the kingdom of God’ (Col. 4:11). (The preceding five paragraphs are adapted from the author’s book A Greater Commission, pp. 14 and 15.)

I treat the matter of the kingdom of God and the church much more at length in the later section of this book entitled, ‘Ecclesiology or the Doctrine of the Church.’

The Present Reign of Christ and the Christian Gospel

I have elsewhere expounded the thirteenth chapter of Matthew (with parallels in Luke 8 and Mark 4) as a ‘seminar’ on the subject of principles of the mission of world evangelism (A Greater Commission, pp. 40–113). In this discourse seeds are emblematic of the Christian gospel. Jesus once specified ‘The seed is the word of God’ (Luke 8:11) and that the work of the missionary is to sow the ‘good seed’ (Matt. 13:24, 27). Jesus also specified that the gospel seed is ‘the word of the kingdom’ (Matt. 13:19) thus showing how receiving Christ as Savior involves acknowledging His reign or Lordship (Rom. 10:9, 10).

Thirty-five years later Paul’s understanding of the Word that was to be preached was no different—even though articulated more fully on the basis of completed redemption (and completed revelation, John 16:7–15). Near the end of his third journey in an address of great pathos to the elders of the church of Ephesus he declared: ‘... I have gone preaching the kingdom of God [emphasis added]’ (Acts 20:25 kjv), ‘to testify to the gospel of the grace of God [emphasis added] (v. 24). It consisted of ‘testifying both to Jews and to Greeks [i.e. Gentiles] of repentance towards God and faith [emphasis added] in our Lord Jesus Christ’ (v. 21). What Jesus spoke of in general terms, Paul spoke of in specifics (this paragraph adapted from Culver, A Greater Commission, pp. 62, 63).

Calvin, without any chiliastic expectation nevertheless had a marvellously inspiring way of distinguishing between the present and future aspects of His kingdom—the present kingdom of grace in the earth and His future reign over the universe. Specific comments will be found in his Commentaries on Psalm 2:8; 21:8; 25:57; 45:16; 72:8; 110:2; Matt. 12:31; 16:10; John 13:31. I cite a few lines from his comments on ‘thy kingdom come’ the second petition of ‘the Lord’s Prayer’:

Therefore God sets up his Kingdom by humbling the whole world, but in different ways. For he tames the wantonness of some, breaks the untameable pride of others. We must daily desire that God gather churches unto himself from all parts of the earth; that he spread and increase them in number; that he endow them with gifts; that he establish a lawful order among them; on the other hand, that he cast down all enemies of pure religion; that he scatter their counsels and crush their efforts. From this it appears that zeal for daily progress is not enjoined upon us in vain, for it never goes so well with human affairs that the filthiness of vices is shaken and washed away, and full integrity flowers and grows. But its fullness is delayed to the final coming of Christ when, as Paul teaches, ‘God will be all in all’ [1 Cor. 15:28].²

What inspiring encouragement to Christian nurture of every sort, personal and family witnessing, missionary evangelism, and pastoral preaching!

Christ the Head of the Present Kingdom of Grace

Though the Lord Jesus Christ reigns from His throne in heaven, part of His realm is on earth in the here-and-now. That rule is the present ‘kingdom of grace,’ both in individual believers and collectively in the church—a church of which a familiar hymn explains: ‘Yet she on earth hath union/ With God the three in one/ And mystic sweet communion/ With those whose rest is won.’

So the larger number of the Lord’s kingdom of grace are in His presence in heaven. As to the members of this kingdom still living on earth, our relation to Christ the King is conditioned by the fact we are vitally united with Him and already ‘in Him,’ even ‘raised with Christ.’ In this relation:

1. He is ‘the head of the body,’ the church and ‘pre-eminent’ (Col. 1:18). Therefore ‘we are to grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ’ (Eph. 4:15). There is a practical domestic implication: ‘Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its Savior’ (Eph. 5:22, 23).

2. As Head of the church, His body, He is our constant ‘Savior’ (Eph. 5:23) and we are therefore ‘safe,’ ‘and no one will snatch them out of my hand’ (John 10:28). In that security none shall ‘condemn’ us (Rom. 8:33, 34), none ‘shall separate us from the love of Christ’ (Rom. 8:35, 39), nor shall any overcome us, because ‘we are more than conquerors through him who loved us’ (Rom. 8:37).

3. As the Head of the body Christ is our ‘Master and Lord’ (John 13:12–14 kjv). This also has practical implications within that portion of the church that is still on earth, for example, for the wealthy class: ‘Masters, treat your slaves justly and fairly, knowing that you also have a Master in heaven’ (Col. 4:1; cf. Eph. 6:8, 9).

4. Finally, this truth should direct all Christian thought, life, affection and interest heavenward, as it is written, ‘If then you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God. Set your minds [affections] on things that are above, not on things that are on earth. For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God’ (Col. 3:1–4).

Some Clarifications and Cautions

Immense areas of theology are opened up in connection with the inauguration of the reign of power and grace at the enthronement, or session of Christ. Some brief statements, therefore, must be made about some of them and some cautions issued.

1. The inauguration of Christ as King at His session has reference only to the installation of the theanthrōpos, God-man, as Ruler of His mediatorial kingdom. As Second Person of the triune God

He has been from all eternity, and remains, Almighty King of creation. Of Him the Psalms say, ‘The Lord reigns, he is robed in majesty.... Your throne is established from of old; you are from everlasting.... O judge of the earth’ (Ps. 93:1, 2; 94:2). His inauguration is anticipated in Jesus’ post-resurrection proclamation: ‘All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me’ (Matt. 28:18).

2. There is a difference of opinion with respect to the idea of a future reign of Christ on earth. Revelation seems plainly to state that we ‘saints’ ‘shall reign on the earth’ (Rev. 5:10). Revelation 20 would lead us to expect this in a future millennium after a resurrection of the righteous dead (premillennialism). But many evangelical theologians hold that the reign of Christ with His saints is during the present age and takes place in heaven (amillennialism). The same theology says there is to be no future national restoration of Israel. Yet Jesus promised the disciples, ‘Truly, I say to you, in the new world, when the Son of Man will sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel’ (Matt. 19:28). I have not thought it proper to enter a full-scale discussion of the matter here. I do this in connection with ecclesiology (the church) and eschatology (last things). *My Daniel and the Latter Days*³ treats the subject from a standpoint similar to what has come to be called ‘historic premillennialism,’ i.e. without the presuppositions of dispensationalism. Many treatises are available. A fair introduction to the major views is presented by Louis Berkhof.⁴ He himself defends amillennialism which he deems to be ‘the most widely accepted’ and ‘the prevalent view in Reformed circles’⁵ but fairly presents what he calls ‘Premillennialism of the Past,’ ‘Premillennialism ... of the Present’ (dispensationalism) and ‘Postmillennialism.’

I do not regard his refutation of premillennialism as adequate. Nevertheless it seems best to reserve my further discussion to later loci of theology.

¹ Young’s Bible Dictionary (Wheaton: Tyndale House Publ., 1984), pp. 122–136.

² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion III, ed. McNeil, trans. and ed. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press ed. ii, 1960), 42, p. 905.

³ Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1954, rev. 1977, and rev. by author and republished as The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People, 1998).

⁴ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1941), pp. 406–411; 708–719.

⁵ ibid., p. 708.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (623). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Except for groups with direct roots in the Reformation of the sixteenth century and who still observe the Christian year, most Protestants hear little about our Lord's ascension and enthronement in heaven at God the Father's right hand after the 'forty days' (Acts 1:3). Similarly, pulpit and theology have not often up to the present said much about the present work of Christ in heaven.

Perhaps this is because we know very little of the unseen world of 'the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem' where Jesus serves still as 'the mediator of a new covenant' as Hebrews 12:22–24 describes it. Perhaps modern preoccupations with material realities—assumed and genuine—have made heaven too far away to be interesting.

Yet we know our Lord in heaven does not spend His time (Is there time in heaven?) merely receiving praise from the 'innumerable company of angels' and 'the general assembly and church of the firstborn' (Heb. 12:22, 23 kjv) who dwell there, to the neglect of His permanent work as Mediator.

The truths of Christian faith form a consistent system, which means Christ's work has integral connections with every locus of doctrine. His work goes on in the church as well as for her: being present in all church life and assemblies, the vital source of all true church life, the Head who rules in all her normal activity. '[A]part from me you can do nothing' is no less true now than when Jesus spoke the words. However, to avoid unnecessary lengthening of this book and to avoid unnecessary repetition we reserve such topics for ecclesiology, later on in the order of systematic theology.

The theme of the present heavenly high priestly work of our Lord Jesus Christ is unique to the book of Hebrews. That ministry, as such, is mentioned nowhere else in the Bible. Paul, quite remarkably, never once calls Christ a priest, nor does Peter, who even speaks of ordinary Christians as 'a royal priesthood.' The book of Revelation, though it refers to 'us' as 'priests unto ... God' and presents Jesus as the '[sacrificial] Lamb of God,' never once refers to Him as a priest. Hence, however valid and useful to theology dissection of Christ's mediatorial work into prophet, priest and king, that is not precisely how the New Testament authors present it. Only the book of Hebrews (chaps. 2–10, where it is the major theme) describes the present activity of Christ as that of our heavenly High Priest.

Since only the author of Hebrews speaks specifically of our Lord's present ministry in heaven as our Great High Priest it seems only sensible to view the subject as he viewed it. This present treatment will therefore be a consideration of a biblical theology of nine chapters of Hebrews.

High Priest More Than a Metaphor

The New Testament appropriately employs much metaphorical language in conveying the Person and work of Christ. He is 'light' and 'the living bread'—but only in figure. When, however, His attackers heard Him refer to Himself as 'a man [anthrōpos] [emphasis added] who has told you the truth' (John 8:40) they had to take Him literally, as do we. He was 'every inch a man.' He also said, 'I am the vine,' and Paul that He is 'head' of every human being (1 Cor. 11:3), 'head' of the church (Eph. 5:23), etc., but each of these is a figurative expression. When the author of Hebrews speaks of Christ as priest or High Priest throughout the first ten of thirteen chapters of his book, we may concede he is making some concession to human custom and understanding; yet the sense is close to literal. He is more literally a priest than light, a vine or living water.

As he proceeds, the author of Hebrews himself explains his ideas of what a true priest of God is as he portrays Christ's present work in that capacity.

The present task must be to learn how the author of Hebrews, himself, regards Christ as High Priest and how he portrays His work in that capacity. Useful as the rubric, 'prophet, priest and king' is to theology, it does not provide either a key to understanding Hebrews or a template for explaining the present work of Christ in heaven as uniquely formulated in the Epistles to the Hebrews.

The Unique Religious Culture of the Epistle

The religious and cultural atmosphere of the Epistle to the Hebrews is different from any other book of the New Testament. We are here in the world of Old Testament biblical religion—not of post-biblical Judaism and its rabbinical regulations. Scholars point out that the standpoint is even previous to the temple of Solomon, because the assumed situation of the ritual actions is the encampment of the twelve tribes in the wilderness around the Tabernacle. The rituals are performed by the sons of Aaron under a lawfully constituted high priest, not the politically appointed Sadducees of New Testament times and on to the destruction of the second temple.

Hence, no sacrificial or hierarchical (priest rule) precedents from the heathen priesthods of the Roman world enter the thought-world of Hebrews. The first readers probably were Hebrews who from birth had been nurtured to regard the pagan priests, their rituals, sacrifices and temples with revulsion—'abominations of the Gentiles.' Perhaps Paul, whose readers included a majority, perhaps, of converted Gentiles, did not feel his Gentile readers would be able to understand Jesus' present work as a priestly ministry without telling them more about the Old Testament background than his rather brief letters allowed him to say. So perhaps he never referred to Jesus as priest or High Priest for that reason.

The Old Testament Hierarchical Background

The use which the author of Hebrews makes of the Levitical institutions (the Tabernacle and its furniture, priests, rituals, etc.) goes far beyond mere parallels of the sort modern anthropologists think they find between religious forms in different religions. F. Delitzsch well said:

But surely the Old Testament high-priesthood, and its sacrifices, were for the sacred writer something far more than mere illustrations; on the contrary, they were types [symbolic prediction] of a future reality, and preliminary forms of its manifestation, being as closely connected with that reality as the shadow with the body by which it is cast.¹

1. The Tabernacle Complex

Seen from above, the Tabernacle complex would have been seen as a rectangular tent within a rectangular curtained court on an east-west axis. The dimensions of the court were 100 cubits (c. 150 ft) long and 50 cubits (c. 75 ft) wide. The Tabernacle, which was set in the west half of the court, was 10 cubits (15 ft) by 30 cubits (45 ft). Entrance to the court was through a curtained opening at the east and could be entered by lay worshippers and priests. Immediately ahead lay a large, bronze-covered, square altar where almost all sacrifices, slain or otherwise, were offered. After passing the altar, and to the north (right hand), was a large bronze tank, basin-shaped. Here there were facilities for the priests to wash themselves and for the required washings of certain sacrifices. Then immediately ahead at about the mid-point of the court was the curtained opening to the sanctuary, or Tabernacle. The tent had a large front room 15 ft by 30 ft and a second room 15 ft by 15 ft, the two separated by a heavy veil which kept the innermost room in darkness.

Upon entering the tent, to the left stood a seven-branched lamp-stand whose oil lamps were tended by priests and kept burning perpetually. To the right the light shone on a small rectangular table on which were constantly displayed twelve loaves of unleavened bread changed once each week. Immediately ahead was a small altar whereon incense was burned at stated intervals.

Beyond the heavy veil, which shut off the innermost ‘holy of holies,’ no one ever entered except the high priest and he only on one day a year, the autumnal ‘day of atonement’ (Heb. Yom Kippur). The room was empty except for a wooden, gold-covered chest (Ark) in dimension about 27 inches tall (the height of our desks and tables) about 45 inches long and 27 inches wide. Thereon lay a lid of the same materials, called a mercy-seat (Heb. kapporeth, place of propitiation), surmounted with gold cherubs, one at each end with wings extended so as to meet over the mid-point of the mercy-seat. Within the Ark were the two tables of the Ten Commandments, the pot of manna and Aaron’s rod which budded.

The high priest typified the Lord Jesus Christ as our Great High Priest and His ministry on the annual Day of Atonement. This is featured in Hebrews. He wore special holy garments and bore many emblems representative of various aspects of the many rituals. These matters occupy lengthy portions of Exodus and Leviticus plus portions of Numbers and Deuteronomy. We shall introduce the few pertinent details only as the author of Hebrews does so in presenting the priesthood of Christ. Since the author of Hebrews concentrates on the priestly aspect of the Lord’s work, he says much about Christ’s death and exaltation to heaven but little about His resurrection. The Old Testament priestly ritual of the annual sin-offering on the Day of Atonement focused first upon the slaying of the victim in the court of the temple and subsequent presentation of the blood in the innermost room of the sanctuary. As F. F. Bruce says:

In the antitype of these two moments [slaying the victim and presentations of the blood] were seen to correspond to the death of Christ on the cross and His appearance at the right hand of God. In this pattern the resurrection, as generally proclaimed in the apostolic preaching, finds no separate place.²

2. The Priesthood of Aaron As Typical of Christ’s Priesthood

The author of Hebrews also assumes acquaintance by his readers with the sacred literature about priests who served at the Tabernacle—who they were, their qualifications and what they did. Also, and very important to the Christology of the book, though Christ is priest of the order of Melchizedek, not of Aaron, Hebrews does not hesitate to draw typical parallels from Aaron’s priesthood to Christ’s priesthood. Melchizedek was typical of Christ in one way, Aaron in another way.

The Special Call to Priesthood

‘For every high priest chosen from among men,’ says our author, ‘no one takes this honor for himself, but only when called by God, just as Aaron was’ (Heb. 5:1a, 4). He is referring to God’s directive to Moses: ‘Then bring near to you Aaron your brother, and his sons with him, from among the people of Israel, to serve me as priests—Aaron and Aaron’s sons ...’ (Exod. 28:1; cf. 1 Chr. 23:13). Moses also was a priest, called to be such by God. Of Moses’ priestly work it is said he served in God’s ‘house as a servant, to testify to the things that were to be spoken later’ (Heb. 3:5). His service, like Aaron’s, was only ‘a shadow of the good things to come’ (Heb. 10:1).

So also Christ ‘did not exalt Himself to be made a high priest’ (Heb. 5:5), i.e. did not appoint Himself in a pretentious manner, but to the contrary, the Lord God appointed Him. The author of Hebrews demonstrates this by recourse to two acknowledged Messianic prophecies: ‘You are my Son; today I have begotten you’ (Ps. 2:7) and ‘You are a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek’ (Ps. 110:4).

Thus Moses’ special call and priestly service, as well as Aaron’s, pointed ahead to Christ’s special call, God’s special ‘Apostle,’ or minister plenipotentiary and ‘High Priest of the religion we profess’ (Heb. 3:1 neb).

The Special Ordination and Purification Ceremonies for Aaron and Sons

Most of four long chapters (Exod. 29, 40; Lev. 8, 9) describe in great detail how Moses was to install (ordain kjv) Aaron and his sons in the priestly office. The entire congregation in the wilderness were to be gathered ‘at the entrance of the tent of meeting’ with the five men (Aaron and his four sons, Nadab and Abihu, Ithamar and Eliezer) to be installed. Moses himself washed their entire bodies to symbolize their moral cleansing. Then came investment with official garments, followed by anointing with specially prepared oil.

After that Moses performed an elaborate ritual slaughter of an unblemished young bullock. The five ordinands first laid their hands on the animal’s head. Whereupon Moses slaughtered it as a sin-offering, sprinkled the horns of the Great Altar with the blood and executed the rest of the complicated ritual (Exod. 29; Lev. 9).

Then the basic ritual was repeated with a ram, except that this time Moses placed some of the blood on the tips of the five right ears of the five men, the thumbs of their five right hands and the great toes of their five right feet (Lev. 8:22–24).

There was much more, which need not concern us here. Leviticus 8:30 ff. seems to indicate the men spent a whole week at the Tabernacle, the bloody rituals being repeated each day. And apparently the Tabernacle and furnishings were similarly consecrated at the same time.³

Next, according to Leviticus, Aaron made sin-offerings, peace offerings and burnt offerings for himself as priest and ‘for the people’ (Lev. 9:7). Only after that did Moses accompany Aaron into the Tabernacle ‘and when they came out they blessed the people.’ Only then a ‘fire came out from before the Lord and consumed’ the pieces of flesh and fat on the altar (Lev. 9:23, 24). The rituals were now in operation.

Points of Contrast Made by the Author of Hebrews

1) In the first place, no such purification ceremonies were appropriate for Christ's installation. His installation was wholly by Jehovah's decree. He was already the 'Lord' (Ps. 110:1). True, He 'offered himself' to God, but not for purification of self, for He was already 'without blemish' (prefigured by the absence of physical blemish in the animals) (Heb. 9:14).

Further, Such a high priest meets our need—one who is holy, blameless, pure, set apart from sinners (Heb. 7:26 niv)—because He was 'made in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin' and 'numbered himself with the transgressors.' Our author sums up, 'The high priests made by the Law are men in all their frailty, but the priest appointed by the oath [of the Lord, Ps. 110:4] which supersedes the Law is the Son, was made perfect [in the school of suffering where He learned obedience, Heb. 5:8] now for ever' (Heb. 7:28 neb).

2) In the second place, Aaron's sons inherited their office by physical descent. Christ came to His High Priestly office by virtue of the Lord's solemn oath (Ps. 110:4). Our author says this made Christ's priesthood perpetual. The somewhat periphrastic rendering of the neb makes the matter clear: 'There was no oath sworn when those others were made priests; but for this priest an oath was sworn' (Heb. 7:21 neb).

3) In the third place, Christ's priesthood is perpetual, as Scripture says of Him:

The Lord has sworn and will not change his mind, "You are a priest for ever" [Ps. 110:4]. How far superior must the covenant also be of which Jesus is the guarantor! Those other priests are appointed in numerous succession [one generation after another], because they are prevented by death from continuing in office; but the priesthood which Jesus holds is perpetual, because he remains for ever ... he is always living ... (Heb. 7:21–25 neb).

So in contrast to Aaron's priesthood Christ's was by divine oath and it was eternal whereas Aaron's was by physical descent and interrupted at each generational change.

Our Great High Priest's Preparation in the Outer Court for Service in Heaven

On the Great Day of Atonement Aaron carried out the ritual ceremonies (described in Levi. 16) which the author of Hebrews employs to explain the High Priestly ministry of Christ. The author is selective. Not everything in Aaron and his priestly work is typical. Some does not apply at all. And some seems to be implicitly included even though unmentioned in Hebrews.

Upon entering the outer court with the proper materials for sacrifice he moved to the altar and killed a 'bull for a sin offering for himself.' Then representing himself and the people he entered the holy place and on into the holy of holies to perform the service of God before the Ark.

So our Lord first is seen in Hebrews preparing to do His High Priestly work in heaven: 'He is the radiance of the glory of God and the exact imprint of his nature, and he upholds the universe by the word of his power. After making purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high' (Heb. 1:3). The priestly work was to be done in heaven, but before He ascended there as eternal Son who shared with us our 'flesh and blood' (Heb. 2:14) He offered sacrifice, not for Himself as Aaron did, 'But ... he has appeared once and for all at the climax of history to abolish sin by sacrifice of himself' (Heb. 9:26 neb).

Four aspects of Christ's Person and career appear with emphasis and in close connection in the early part of Hebrews: the incarnation, the sacrifice, the ascension and the session. 1) The Incarnation. In all the New Testament it has its most detailed presentation (nature and purposes of it) in Hebrews 2:5–18. This is to show that 'he had to be ['it behoved Him to be' kjv] made like his brothers in every respect, so that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God ... For because he himself has suffered when tempted, he is able to help those who are being tempted' (Heb. 2:17, 18). 2) Sacrifice. 'After making purification for sins ... suffering of death ... taste death for everyone ... to make propitiation for the sins of the people' (1:3; 2:9a; 2:9b; 2:17). 3) Ascension and 4) Session. '[S]at down at the right hand of the Majesty on high ... Sit at my right hand' (1:3, 13). Thus Hebrews starts off showing how our Lord by virtue of who He is and what He did at the cross prepared Himself for His High Priestly work in heaven.

An Interruption: the author interrupts his theme by a lengthy direct address to his 'holy brothers,' first readers of the Epistle (3:1–4:13), charging them to consider the superiority of Jesus, the Apostle and High Priest of their confession, to heed His voice, to encourage one another and to rest in His promise. Then he resumes the theme of our Lord's present priestly work at Hebrews 4:14.

Moving On from Altar Sacrifice to Sanctuary Service

The Old Testament Type

After completing the sacrifice of the altar, Aaron shall take a firepan full of coals from upon the altar before the Lord, and two handfuls of finely ground sweet incense, and bring inside the veil [of the first chamber]. And he shall put the incense on the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of incense [in the inner chamber] may cover the mercy seat that is on the ark of the testimony, lest he die. Moreover he shall take some of the blood of the bull [of the sin-offering for himself] and sprinkle it with his finger on the mercy seat on the east side; also in front of the mercy seat and in front ... seven times (Lev. 16:12–14 neb).

Then Aaron was instructed to slaughter 'the goat of the sin offering which is for the people, and bring its blood inside the veil, and do with its blood as he did with the blood of the bull, and sprinkle it on the mercy seat and in front of the mercy seat' (Lev. 16:15 neb). So after the high priest had slaughtered one animal to propitiate for his own sins he took the blood into the holy of holies where he sprinkled it at and on the propitiatory (mercy-seat) and again a second similar performance with the goat slaughtered for the sins of the people.

The New Testament Antitype

Following the typology of these opening ritual actions of Yom Kippur our author says, 'Having then a great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens' (Heb. 4:14 asv), 'through court after court of the spiritual precincts, the Tabernacle not made with hands, until He reached the presence-chamber of God. There, in the inmost sanctuary, He now ministers.'⁴ 'For Christ has entered, not into holy places made with hands, which are copies of the true things, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God on our behalf' (Heb. 9:24). It would be a mistake to suppose the author proposes a literal structure of successive areas and rooms in heaven overarching earth where they found earthly shape in Israel's Tabernacle and temple. Nor does he ever say Jesus literally bore the blood of Calvary above to a heavenly altar. Our author claims no special knowledge of heavenly geography or architecture. He is employing 'earthly things,' as Jesus did (John 3:12), to help us understand 'heavenly things,' related to Christ's present priestly ministry. We call this analogy.

The neb is somewhat a paraphrase, but very plain:

Nor is he there to offer himself again and again, as the high priest enters the sanctuary year by year with blood not his own. If that were so, he would have had to suffer many times since the world was made. But as it is, he has appeared once and for all at the climax of history to abolish sin by the sacrifice of himself (Heb. 9:25, 26, see 23–28).

The author of Hebrews lets us know our Lord now also occupies a throne at God's right hand even though ministering in heaven's temple's inmost precincts, as we shall see. He finds no problem in harmonizing the two spatial figures nor should we. What should interest us is in that place, remote from us just now, the throne is a throne of grace and the ministry in the sanctuary are both 'on our behalf.' Hebrews at this point is not prescribing elaborate new duties for believers to perform, rather informing us of how Jesus our 'great high priest' is presently working in heaven for our benefit.

Aspects of the Great High Priest's Work

What Does a High Priest Do?

Theologians properly turn to Scripture to find several normal priestly functions—more than the author of Hebrews makes use of in his exposition: to offer sacrifice, to make intercession, to bless people.⁵ H. B. Hackett points out 'the duties described in Exodus and Leviticus are the same as those recognized in ... Chronicles ... [and those] the prophet Ezekiel sees in the Temple of the future.' These duties were to care for the Tabernacle vessels, to assist the high priest, watch over the perpetual fire on the great altar, to feed the lamp of the outer chamber, offer the stated daily sacrifice. 'These were the fixed, invariable duties.' Higher ethical duties were to teach the people and to bless them at every solemn meeting.⁶

The author of Hebrews, however, has his own list of the priestly duties of Old Testament priests, not necessarily all the duties discoverable to theologians. He finds each one perfectly fulfilled in Christ. He also finds in each a reason for the necessity of the priesthood of Christ and of the supplanting of the priesthood after the order of Aaron by the priesthood of One 'after the order of Melchizedek.'

He Has Made the Required Propitiation

As High Priest he has already made propitiation for the sins of the people. 'Wherefore it behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people' (Heb. 2:17 asv).

This is the first direct mention in the entire Bible of Christ as a priest or High Priest. It appears early in Hebrews immediately after the most extensive specific biblical discussion of the incarnation and its purposes. The last-mentioned purpose is to that He 'helps the offspring of Abraham.' Here Abraham stands representatively for all believers (Gal. 3:7). Yet the author is still thinking in Hebrew terms.

The rest of Hebrews on through chapter 10 explains how, as High Priest, the incarnate Son gives that help. God had determined to solve the problem of sin in the world and did so following a pattern He had set in the Old Testament Tabernacle and the ‘things pertaining to God’ dealt with there. Everything about the sanctuary had to do with removal of the sin of people, which is the obstacle to ‘the chief end of man ... to glorify God and enjoy Him forever.’

The author is thinking of the ‘things pertaining to God’ (Heb. 2:17; 5:1 kjv) in the rituals of Tabernacle and altar. The readers were not only acquainted with the Exodus and Leviticus manual of procedures but some perhaps had participated in the rituals before conversion to Christ. In the wilderness setting, where everyone was in walking distance from the altar, many adults must have been in or near the court of the altar many times each month. The prescribed sacrifices and purification rituals required it. Three times a year every male adult was required by statute to appear ‘before the Lord’ (Exod. 23:14, 17) at the central sanctuary no matter where in ‘the Land’ his residence was. Even sexual copulation, birth of babies, sickness, under certain circumstances, required an offering for sin at the altar. The word kapper (atonement, expiation, propitiation, cover, in our Versions and regular forms of hilaskomai, propitiate, expiate in the Greek O.T.) appears over and over again. The ritual rules were ‘a yoke ... that neither’ the Hebrews who read this letter nor ‘our fathers ... have been able to bear’ (Acts 15:10).

The most noted official, head and responsible director of all this ritual slaughter ‘to put away sins,’ was the head of the clan of the sons of Aaron called ‘the high priest’ (Lev. 21:10; Num. 35:25; many times in Hebrews). Thus by a bold stroke this author begins his exposition of Christ as the fulfillment of the typology of the Old Testament rituals of propitiatory bloody sacrifices.

The central ideas of propitiation, expiation and reconciliation have been dealt with in our chapter, ‘The Vocabulary of Atonement’ and it shall not be repeated here. Let us restrict our thoughts simply to how the book of Hebrews expands the matter.

The author interrupts his thought to exhort his readers (‘holy brothers’ 3:1) directly (chaps. 3 and 4) and then hastens on to point out that the religious services of the priest included ‘both gifts and sacrifices’ (voluntary or votive offerings and required ones). He notes that this was a never-ending process. The sacrifices went on from year to year, generation to generation (10:1). As one generation of priests died off another took its place. But the ceremonies were only ‘a copy and shadow’ of heavenly realities (8:5). The Tabernacle was ‘a figure for the time then present’ (9:9 kjv). These ‘fleshly’ ordinances had been imposed ‘until the time of reformation’ (Heb. 9:10), that is to say, the new Christian era.

‘[I]t is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins’ (10:4). ‘But when Christ appeared as a high priest ... by means of his own blood ... securing an eternal redemption’ (9:11, 12). His sacrifice accomplished genuine propitiation and expiation, actual removal of the guilt of sin and its defilement which the rituals of the altar only typified and by their repetition testified to their own inadequacy except as they fulfilled the divine command and pointed ahead to a better arrangement.

‘The blood of Christ’ sets the heart of the believer free from self-accusation. The forgiven sinner is now free from guilt in any formal sense. Therefore, not only is the record clean but the ‘conscience’ is cleansed, freed from frantic effort to please God with ‘dead works’ but rather to serve the living God in grateful freedom.

How does Hebrews relate Christ’s sacrifice to the present service of our Great High Priest? ‘What have you done for us lately’ is the question. Our author finds answers in the typology of Aaron’s acts on the annual Yom Kippur.

He Has Introduced a New Covenant or Law or Covenant System

As High Priest ‘after the order of Melchizedek’ ‘The Lord’ has replaced the obsolete ‘law’ or covenant which was founded on the Levitical priesthood. This accomplishment merits first mention because it encompasses all the other priestly duties now being carried out by Christ as High Priest. It is basic to all He now does from His ‘place’ in heaven. Our author states this as follows:

Now if perfection had been attainable through the Levitical priesthood (for it is on this basis that the people were given the Law), what further need would there have been to speak of another priest arising, in the succession of Melchizedek, instead of the succession of Aaron. For a change of priesthood must mean a change of law (Heb. 7:11, 12 neb).

Thorny problems of Greek syntax underlie this clear, somewhat periphrastic rendering, but it essentially agrees with how Delitzsch, Meyer, Bruce and most commentators construe the sense. The Levitical priesthood was the basis that supplied operational structure for the entire covenant system of Mosaic law. The mediatorial work of priests was necessary to make every ritual, every feast and festival, every sacrifice—the very structure of Israelite society—work. Yet, David in Psalm 110:1–6, several hundred years after the Levitical system began, announced that the even earlier priesthood of Melchizedek, who lived in Abraham’s time (Gen. 14:17–20), would supersede the temporary regime of the Levitical priesthood. ‘If God had intended the Aaronic priesthood to introduce the age of perfection, the time when man would enjoy unfettered access to Him, why should He have conferred on the Messiah priestly dignity of His own—different from Aaron’s and by implication superior to Aaron’s?’⁷

Our author points out several types and parallels between the Levitical system and the new one, but at this point he is spelling out contrasts. This begins with the choice of a Greek word rendered ‘another’, another priest (7:11). The word is heteros, another of a different kind, not allos, another of the same kind. More differences are pointed out in verses to follow.

The most comprehensive (‘necessity’ asv) change connected with a new order of priesthood is this, namely ‘a change in the law’ we are discussing (7:12). In this case ‘law’ refers to a basic structure of religious observances, not a new moral order. The Levitical priesthood was as necessary to make the Mosaic religious system operate at the central sanctuary. When, as happened visibly in ad 70, the temple disappeared, so did the visibly constituted priesthood. God had replaced them both forty-plus years earlier when our Lord ascended to heaven and took up His mediatorial ministry in the ‘tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man’ (Heb. 8:2 kjv). If the priesthood of Aaron was designed for a temporary purpose, to be terminated when the new dispensation arrived, so also the law that the priesthood executed. F. F. Bruce comments, ‘So by his own independent line of argument our author reaches the same conclusion as Paul: the law was a temporary provision, “our tutor to bring us unto Christ” ’ (Gal. 3:24).’⁸

Paul argued that the law of Moses served to make sinners aware of their sins but was powerless to produce justification before God. Hence, the very failure pointed to Christ. Hebrews argues in a different way that the Levitical sacrificial system, in its failure really to remove guilt for sin, pointed to Christ whose sacrifice does. Each was thinking of the whole law, though Paul’s argument rested on the moral element in the law and Hebrews on the ceremonial element.

The new ‘law’ of Christ (Heb. 7:11, 12) has more effective moral power because its priesthood rests not on ‘a system of earth-bound rules’ (7:16 neb) but upon the power of the new Priest’s ‘indestructible life’ (7:16). Paul says much the same thing (Rom. 5:9, 10).

He Prays for His People

As Mediator of a new ‘Law,’ or new ‘covenant’ (as the author of Hebrews more frequently calls it) it is our Lord’s priestly service to pray for his people: ‘he is able to save to the uttermost those who draw near to God through him, since he always lives to make intercession for them’ (Heb. 7:25). The Lord’s intercessory work for His people is not a major New Testament theme, for it is mentioned specifically only twice; yet it is important as the following shows.

Melchizedek ‘priest of God Most High’ in whose order of priesthood the risen Christ serves, prayed blessings on Abraham and brought forth ‘bread and wine’ (Gen. 14:18–20). In the prophecy of Psalm 2, the Lord directs the Son: ‘Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage’ (Ps. 2:8). The final sentence of the ‘Golden Passional’ of Isaiah 53 joins our Lord’s atonement with His intercession: He ‘was numbered with the transgressors; yet he bore the sin of many, and makes intercession for the transgressors.’ For the wicked people who crucified Jesus He prayed, ‘Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do’ (Luke 23:34) and in the Upper Room He prayed for all the disciples and those to be won through their word (John 17:15–21).

It is beyond the scope of this treatment to treat the Old Testament types fully as does John Gill,⁹ yet one outstanding type cries for attention.

[T]he high-priest going into the most holy place, with the names of the children of Israel on his breastplate, and bearing their judgment before the Lord, and taking away the sin of the holy things, typified Christ as the representative, in heaven, of his people; appearing in the presence of God for them, presenting his sacrifice for the taking away of their sins, even of their most solemn services.¹⁰

We are reminded that although our Lord’s priesthood is of Melchizedek, not Aaron, yet the ritual of the Levitical sanctuary ‘throws light,’ by typology, ‘upon the Lord’s priestly ministry in heaven.’¹¹ No passage of the Bible specifically says it was a duty of priests to make intercessory prayer for the people of Israel. As the numerous examples show, it was probably too obvious to require special command. Well known examples of priests who were also intercessors are Moses (Exod. 32, 33), Aaron (Num. 16:41–50), Samuel (1 Sam. 7:5; 12:19, 23), Ezra (Ezra 9:1–10), and Jeremiah, a priest, who constantly throughout his book is praying to God for the wayward nation.

Though it does not call Christ a priest, Romans, like Hebrews, says Christ is presently ‘at the right hand of God’ where He is ‘interceding for us’ (Rom. 8:34) placing that word, intercession, quite strategically between our justification (8:33) and our perseverance (8:35 ff.), for both are assured by His unending intercession.

We earthbound sinners wonder if our Lord prays ‘out loud,’ sometimes prostrate (Matt. 26:39) ‘with loud cries and tears’ (Heb. 5:7) as during His life on earth. In answer: it would be ‘inconsistent with his state of exaltation.’¹² He does not pray to deflect God’s wrath, for God is already propitiated. Nor is our High Priest engaged in any court-of-law-like procedures, though He is represented in Scripture as Advocate, One who pleads our case as Counsellor at law. These questions arise from our human, earthbound orientation. It is enough to know that he appears in the presence of God for us (Heb. 9:24), that His ‘blood and righteousness’ have already procured our justification and sanctification, that His wounds are ever in heaven as evidence that redemption’s price has been paid already (Rev. 5:6). His prayers were typified by the sweet smoke of the incense accompanying every presentation of the blood in Aaron’s time. The prayers of God’s people (Rev. 8:3, 4; Heb. 13:15; 1 Peter 2:5) are said to be the ‘sweet incense’ of the Christian epoch and are welcomed by the Father. Our prayers are offered with His, for His Spirit interprets them (Rom. 8:26).

There are additional benefits for believers from our ascended Lord in heaven, which apparently could have no specific typical counterpart in Aaron’s priesthood. This is not surprising since the Old Testament priests were only human mediators of God’s mercy on earth. Our Mediator is the theanthrōpos in heaven.

As Priest He Hears our Prayers

The presence in heaven of a High Priest who was tempted and tried in every way His people are, illuminates the Christian understanding of prayer. The joy of hope in lifting hearts and hands to heaven is greatly enlarged over previous epochs. The author of Hebrews explains:

a. In heaven there is now a ‘new’ understanding of human needs. ‘For we do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but one who in every respect has been tempted [tried, tested] as we are, yet without sin.’ (Heb. 4:15). A Christian’s child may then be taught to pray, as soon as the child does anything with understanding, as in Luther’s Cradle Hymn, knowing Jesus too was once a baby. The child’s grandmother with her last breath may pray confidently as Jesus did, ‘Into your hands I commend my spirit,’ or as Stephen, Christ’s first martyr, ‘Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.’ Whether God now knows more about our feelings and infirmities than before Christ’s Passion may be debated, but there is no question believers have more assurance ‘He understands and cares.’

b. We now have an ‘advocate’ in heaven. Advocate is not the word employed in Hebrews, but the idea is prominent: ‘For Christ has entered, not into holy places made with hands, which are copies of the true things, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God on our behalf’ (Heb. 9:24). The priests made entrance into the first ‘holy place’ every day, but into ‘the holiest’ only on the Great Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur).

On that one day a year he actually entered beyond the veil to stand before the mercy-seat (place of propitiation) and exited at least three times—first with coals from the great altar whereon he put sweet incense ‘that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat ... so that he does not die’ (Lev. 16:12, 13). His second was with blood of a slain bullock, a ‘sin offering ... atonement for himself and for his house’ (Lev. 16:11). The third was with the blood of a goat slain as a sin-offering ‘for the people’ (Lev. 16:15) and, if Jewish tradition is correct, he entered and exited a fourth time to retrieve the vessels of the incense. According to Leviticus 16:15–17 these (and many other rituals of the day) were to make atonement not only for the uncleanness of the priests and the people but also for the sanctuary itself inasmuch as it remained among the people ‘in the midst of their uncleannesses.’

Aaron and his successors in office entered the inmost chambers of the earthly sanctuary only one day of the year. In contrast, Christ our High Priest is now continually advocating our cause in the heavenly sanctuary. As the author of Hebrews several times reminds us, his readers, the offering of Christ was once and for all time, never to be repeated, its value infinite for propitiation, expiation and reconciliation. ‘Who shall bring any charge against God’s elect?’ (Rom. 8:33). ‘[I]f anyone does sin, we have an advocate [paraclete] with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous’ (1 John 2:1). The Holy Spirit is ‘another Helper [paraclete]’ (John 14:16). Hence we have one divine Advocate in heaven and another (allos, of the same kind) on earth.

He Is Permanently ‘The Lamb of God’

The ascended Christ remains the ‘propitiation for the sins of the people’ (Heb. 2:17). It is always right to exclaim as John the Baptist did, ‘Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!’ (John 1:29). Hebrews devotes several chapters to what 1 John 2:2 (nkjv) states in a single short sentence: ‘And He Himself is the propitiation for our sins.’ It follows the acknowledgment that even though sin no longer has dominion over us, if we think we have no sin, ‘we deceive ourselves’ (1 John 1:8). It is for believing, forgiven sinners that ‘He is the propitiation for our sins.’ John departs from the more common omission of the word ‘to be’ in 1 John 2:2 where ‘is’ is estin, present tense, not past tense. John is emphasizing that Jesus is today and every day the propitiation for our sins. He is relating present sins of believers to our present Advocate: ‘if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father’ (1 John 2:1).

Aaron day by day regularly and once a year on Yom Kippur made repeated ‘propitiation for the sins of the people.’ In our Lord’s present appearance as our Advocate with the Father He pleads our case on the ground of His one and only act of propitiation, as our author says: ‘For Christ has entered, not into holy places made with hands ... but into heaven itself, now to appear [emphasis added] in the presence of God on our behalf’ (Heb. 9:24) as our Advocate.

The author of Hebrews goes on plainly to say that Christ did not, like Aaron’s repeated sacrifices, ‘offer himself repeatedly’ for ‘then he would have had to suffer repeatedly since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the ages to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself’ (Heb. 9:26).

It is a ‘plain contradiction to the emphatic teaching of this epistle’ (F. F. Bruce) to teach that Jesus is eternally offering Himself in heaven with the corollary teaching that in the Mass (Lord’s Supper) His sacrifice is ‘re-offered’ or ‘re-presented’ or ‘re-enacted’ by human priests on earth. The Roman Church is in plain conflict with Scripture on this point. (Anglican authors have pursued exposure of this error. See Swete, op. cit., N. Dimock, Our One High Priest On High: The Present Sacerdotal Function of Christ in Heaven. What it is Not and What it is, 1910.)¹³ This rare book is a priceless, scholarly, condensed treatise (only eighty-eight pages). It demolishes Roman Catholic claims of scriptural support for their claims of valid sacrifice in the Roman Mass. Calvin's scornful rejection of papal non-sequiturs on the subject are about as up to date as Vatican II and its defenders.¹⁴ A sample:

When God's Sacred Word not only affirms but cries out and contends that this sacrifice was performed only once and all its force remains forever, do not those who require another sacrifice accuse it of imperfection and weakness.... Nor am I unaware of the tricks by which the father of lies is wont to disguise his fraud: that these are not varied or different sacrifices, but the same one often repeated.... Subtle men escape through a more secret chink—that it is not a repetition but an application.¹⁵

Is Jesus Advocate-Intercessor for All Mankind?

It is true that Jesus said 'I am praying for them [Apostles]. I am not praying for the world.... I do not ask for these only, but also for those who will believe in me through their word [believers through the Christian era]' (John 17:9, 20). Yet in 1 John 2:1, 2, John says our Advocate with the Father 'is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world.'

I have proposed in chapter 16 that there is a special reference of Christ's propitiatory work to the elect only. Careful theology says that as full redemption this aspect of atonement is particular, for elect only. Particular election implies particular redemption, redemption effected, not merely made available. Yet as reconciliation, a truce in God's enmity for sin and sinners has been effected at Calvary. Execution of sentence has been delayed. '[I]n Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them' (2 Cor. 5:19), apparently not one person left out. The world is operating in an armistice. John says the propitiation is peri holou tou kosmou. Peri with the genitive (of the whole world) as here, with most 'verbs and expressions [means] with regard to, with reference to, etc'¹⁶ John does not say Jesus' propitiation was in the stead of (anti) the sins of believers and unbelievers in this text, but that what He did took adequate care of the sin problem of all the world for now. In this sense Jesus is 'the Savior of all people' though 'especially of those who believe' (1 Tim. 4:10). Let us refer again to 1 Timothy 2:6, which I translate, '[Christ Jesus] gave himself a substitutionary ransom [anti-lutron] for the benefit [huper] or advantage of all.' It certainly seems reasonable to interpret Paul as meaning that there is a divinely designed benefit for all men in the substitutionary ransom provided by Christ that is temporary, that opens the door of salvation even to those who refuse to go through the door. Hence the atonement is in one respect particular redemption, in another, world reconciliation.

In this sense Christ is at present in heaven the Advocate, or Guarantor, that the truce is still effective for the whole world. When He returns to the earth the truce will be over and will end with fiery judgments.

¹ Franz Delitzsch, Epistle to the Hebrews i (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1887), p. 141, n.1.

² F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964), p. 32.

³ Philo, 'Life of Moses,' ii. 136 ff. (The Works of Philo, pp. 502, 503). See bibliography.

⁴ Henry B. Swete, The Ascended Christ: A Study in the Earliest Christian Teaching (London: Macmillan & Co., 1916), p. 37.

⁵ W. G. Moorehead, 'Priest', in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia iv, ed. Orr (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1939, 1943), pp. 2439, 2440.

⁶ H. B. Hackett, 'Priests,' Smith's Dictionary of the Bible iii (New York: Hurd & Houghton), pp. 2581, 2582.

⁷ Bruce, Hebrews, pp. 143, 144.

⁸ ibid., p. 145.

⁹ John Gill, Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity i (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1978 repr. of 1839 edition), pp. 612–614.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 614.

¹¹ Swete, Ascended Christ, p. 40.

¹² Gill, Complete Body, p. 615.

¹³ N. Dimock, Our One High Priest On High: The Present Sacerdotal Function of Christ in Heaven. What it is Not and What it is, intro. H. C. G. Moule (London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1910).

¹⁴ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion iv, ed. McNeil, trans. and ed. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press ed. ii, 1960), 18.2–18.

¹⁵ ibid., 18.3.

¹⁶ Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. and adapted from 5th German ed. by W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), sub peri, p. 650.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (629). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 5

SOTERIOLOGY

Salvation Applied

Preface

The subject of this section has been of great interest to this author as a preacher since his earliest faltering efforts as a pulpit evangelist. Now, after taking courses in the subject in theological schools and teaching ‘salvation’ in the context of a whole theological system, I find it as attractive as ever. Yet this book is no theological memoir. I shall try to convince the reader of the truth of the doctrine of salvation (soteriology) presented and to do so with the breadth, balance and scriptural insight exemplified by a Calvin or Whitefield, the conviction of a Spurgeon or Wesley, and the clarity of a Warfield. These pages will not read like ruminations. Matters of eternal life are too critically important to aim at anything less than what a messenger told Cornelius about Peter’s message: ‘a message by which you will be saved, you and all your household’ (Acts 11:14).

A sound theology of the classroom must be theology of the gathered assembly also. If I seem to be excessively ‘dogmatic’ it is only because I wish to be clear, economic in use of language and as brief as consistent with completeness. If the intelligent, devout, adult, believing reader or listener cannot understand it, the logic propounded is defective, the formulation of the matter obscure or otherwise incompetently presented. Apart from clear presentation, the best argument in the world is always obscure and thereby ineffective. On the contrary the most convincing argument for truth is often a clear presentation in and of itself.

Theology is to be preached. ‘Until I come’, said the great itinerant Apostle to his assistant at Ephesus, ‘devote yourself to the public reading of Scripture, to exhortation, to teaching [“doctrine” kjv]’ (1 Tim. 4:13). The Epistles specially addressed to the preacher in a pastoral setting (1 and 2 Tim. and Titus), ring the changes on the importance of regular proclamation of sound doctrine. Paul is so unafraid of doctrinal certainty that he once recommended ‘the form [emphasis added] of sound words’ (2 Tim. 1:13 kjv). Doctrine is the central feature of Paul’s only specific mention of training of pastors (2 Tim. 2:2). Our thoughts, then, as writers of theology and as students are no less bound to Jesus Christ and the Christian revelation than as pastors and preachers.

This book is first exegetical. The fruits of study of the Bible in its original languages will be on display, though not the procedures. It is traditional in the sense that tradition is the history of exegesis through the ages (J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition). It is theological before philosophical. I intend that sound logic, the principles of analysis and synthesis, and the usual categories of all good philosophy shall be employed, although I make no commitment to any metaphysics or theory of knowledge (epistemology) except the common-sense realism one finds in the Bible and common people everywhere. We must look beyond mere appearances of reality but be careful not to abandon our senses and the restraints of logic and disciplined intuitions in doing so.

The structure of theology (as most theologians, even the least traditional, find it) will be employed—not out of deference to tradition but to orderly thinking. We cannot do without logic: soteriology (salvation) belongs after anthropology (man), hamartiology (sin) and Christology (redemption), in that order, and before ecclesiology (church) and eschatology (last things).

One must use some technical terms related to the study of biblical languages and of the history of thought. This preface has already used more than will appear in some of the chapters to follow. Explanations and definitions will usually accompany first use. Part of theological education consists of exposure to the special terms of the discipline and the special use of common expressions. ‘Anthropology’, for example, was a special term of theology, long established, before social science tried to take it away from us.

With due fellow feeling for some feminist concerns, I still think it is simply wrong to write ‘they’ when the antecedent is a singular noun, nor can I bring myself to give up some use of the generic he, him and his when appropriate—though I make some effort to find other modes of expression in order to avoid injury to sincere feelings. This usage is common to every one of the several European and Semitic languages most of us know anything about. Technical writings today still employ these generic, masculine pronouns pretty much as though radical feminism had never taken over the Modern Language Association.

Documentation I do lightly—to support arguments, give credit to sources, but not as a full guide to the literature of soteriology. ‘Get to the point’ takes priority, even though background must not be neglected.

In addition to several English Versions of the Bible I employ a few translations of my own. If there is some reason for doing so the Version being quoted will be indicated.

1

Introduction to the Doctrine of Salvation

‘I wish you’d worry less about my soul and more about the house I live in.’ The words are those of a thin small black boy who appeared in a political cartoon in the Minneapolis Star. He is pictured, with school book and ruler tucked under his frail arm, as he looks up to a grotesquely caricatured Senator Everett Dirksen glowering down over his glasses while he holds in his hand, resting on an ample paunch, his ‘school prayer amendment’. This occurred at a time when social welfare legislation and the loss of ‘religion in the schools’ were high in public interest. The cartoon says eloquently: mankind’s present needs, that is, our physical welfare, are more important than any future salvation of our souls. It also suggests that the Christian religion does not have much to do with human welfare, whether individual or collective, in the present life.

The chief defect of this line of thinking is not in its interest in human social welfare but like most pronouncements emanating from universities and popular social commentators these days, it is shallow, unaware of what human condition in the world and before God really is. The true shape of human situation and thereby knowledge of our needs is set forth in two Christian doctrines: creation and fall.

Already the reader of this page has been encouraged to think beneath the appearance of things—for even though on warm spring days the world seems lovely to the healthy and the young, mature adults know such days are rare in most climates.

‘[W]hat is man’? David sang of him that God ‘made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honour. You have given him dominion over the works of your hands; you have put all things under his feet’ (Ps. 8:4–6). These verses are a poetic summary of the teachings of Genesis, chapters 1 and 2, about the greatness of mankind by creation. As one of the great evangelical creeds says:

After God had made all other creatures, he created man, male and female (Gen. 1:27), with reasonable and immortal souls (Ps. 8:5, 6; Luke 23:43; Matt. 10:28), endued with knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness after his own image (Gen. 1:26; Col. 3:10; Eph. 4:24), having the law of God written in their hearts (Rom. 2:14, 15), and power to fulfil it; and yet under a possibility of transgressing, being left to the liberty of their own will, which was subject to change.¹

These matters were considered earlier in anthropology, the doctrine of man. They cannot be treated fully here except to add that all human greatness—in art, science, industry, social relations, all our deepest yearnings and passions—root in our marvellous createdness. We are creatures formed by God in His own likeness.

Since the foregoing is pleasing to contemplate and on the surface apparently consonant with the way things really are, it is easy to accept as the whole truth—which it is not. The same book of Psalms has another page wherein after a lovely peroration on the marvels of creation suddenly there intrudes this startling sentence: ‘Let sinners be consumed from the earth, and let the wicked be no more’ (Ps. 104:35). Mankind did not remain as they originally were. They became ‘sinners’, deserving to be ‘consumed from the earth’. The same Confession of Faith cited above goes on to say:

Our first parents, being seduced by the subtlety and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit (Gen. 3:13; 2 Cor. 11:3; Gen. 3:1–14).... By this sin they fell from their original righteousness and communion with God (Gen. 3:7, 8; Gen. 2:17), and so became dead in sin (Rom. 5:12; Eph. 2:3), and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body (Gen. 6:5; Jer. 17:9; Rom. 3:10–19; Rom. 8:6–8; Ps. 58:1–5).²

The doctrine expressed in this typical evangelical confession was treated earlier in the doctrine of sin, hamartiology from a Greek word for sin.

As we shall now immediately explain, the doctrine of sin (hamartiology) is a central issue of any doctrinal formulation of a doctrine of salvation (soteriology) that in a serious, sincere manner seeks to be fully biblical and Christian.³

There are many other doctrines that produce a gulf of distance between Buddhism or Islam, for example, and Christianity. But to the extent that there are differences of teaching in regard to aspects of soteriological (salvational) doctrine among orthodox Christian believers those differences mainly arise from differences in the way they understand the condition of man as sinner. It would be pleasant to avoid discussion of these differences but a serious study of Christian doctrine may not do so. All agree that a fall took place, that when the Gospel first strikes one's ear, the ear is the receptor for an invariably sinful heart, i.e. understanding vitiated—as the old theologians say—by sin. Granting that this is important and far enough to go with our research and formulation under certain conditions (let us say co-operative evangelism), it is not far enough to enable us to understand lost people or saved people, nor that we truly understand all that salvation is, nor what God had to do to bring us to Himself.

Traditionally, the orthodox Roman Catholic view of 'original sin' is about as follows. When it is said that God created man in His 'image' (Gen. 1:26) that means man, like God, has powers of reason, moral capacity, aesthetic and scientific appreciation, and similar 'natural' capacities—though not to the degree or perfection that God has, of course. The fall did not affect these. They remain fully intact both in your favourite novelist or the teacher of your Bible class or George Washington, the same as in Adam and Eve after the fall. When it is said God made man in his 'likeness' (Gen. 1:26) it means that in addition to natural capacities 'supernatural' gifts were granted Adam—such as holy will, love of God, righteous inclinations, etc. When the fall took place these supernatural gifts, and only these, were affected. They were lost. So according to Romanist doctrine, men today are as able to reason rightly in all things as were their first parents, even though apart from divine grace they cannot love God. Their reasoning powers are intact as ever even if their moral and spiritual faculties are not sound.

Evangelical (i.e. Protestant), orthodox doctrine of all varieties has generally held that man's lostness, his depravity, to use the harsher word, is much more serious. All parts have suffered debilitating injury by the fall, both body and soul: emotions, intellect and will. They have not ceased to exist, of course, but they have all suffered 'vitiation', again to use the old fashioned theological term. This is what is meant by 'total depravity'. We do not mean, for example, that such relatively good things as mother love or filial piety do not exist among unbelievers. It means that even mother love and filial piety are to a serious degree affected by the fall. God does not have His rightful place in thinking or loving or feeling or working. So far, so good. No informed evangelical Protestant disagrees.

There are many Protestants, however, who think the Scriptures carry the doctrine of sin and the fall a stage further. The fall of the race not only seriously injured all parts of man, but from a certain biblical point of view, fatally. If so, then when the gospel is preached, it is heard by people who are not only sick in sin but 'dead in trespasses and sins'. If God is going to save such sinners He will do much more than simply provide the Savior and tell us about Him. He will also do something to dead hearts to enable them to respond favourably. In the Bible, quite differently from common figurative use in our language, the 'heart' is represented as the seat of understanding, of knowledge, of discernment. It is not merely the seat of emotions. So, for example, 'believe in your heart' (Rom. 10:9) means in the mind. In theological-biblical discourse 'head knowledge' is not in contrast with 'heart knowledge'. The 'bowels' or 'kidneys' are often put for emotions in Scripture, but rarely if ever the heart. The heart stands for the whole 'inner man'. 'Heart, in fact, is associated with what is now meant by the cognitive, affective and volitional elements of personal life.'⁴

When the doctrine is stated thus, believers generally, after a bit of reflection, agree, for the following texts are quite plain as to man's helplessness in the lost condition: 'For the word of the cross is folly to those who are perishing' (1 Cor. 1:18); 'The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned' (1 Cor. 2:14); and in referring to the former condition of believers, '... dead in the trespasses and sins in which you once walked, following the course of this world ... sons of disobedience—among whom we all once lived in the passions of our flesh, carrying out the desires of the body and the mind, and were by nature children of wrath, like the rest of mankind. But God ... even when we were dead in our trespasses, made us alive' (Eph. 2:1–5).

These passages clearly say we all are born without power to obey God, to love God, to want to love God, unable even to have any inclination to do so. Hence, God must take the initiative not only in providing the Savior but also in getting people to receive Him. At this point some not negligible differences have surfaced. Some seem willing simply to ignore the above texts and to assume that people can be persuaded of their need for the Savior, much as they can be persuaded to go to Fort Lauderdale or San Diego for a winter vacation or to buy Bayer's rather than some less expensive brand of aspirin. There are sentences in Charles Grandison Finney's Lectures on Revivals which read like that. Yet even Finney gave a large place to prayer in winning the lost, so he wasn't always a hardliner on the point of 'plenary ability'. Others have asserted, on what appears to be very weak evidence, that though all men are conceived totally depraved, unable in their own power to turn to God, immediately after the soul comes to consciousness, in a supernatural way, God restores the power of completely competent use of the reason in spiritual matters and power of free choice. Those who say God does this as a matter of justice were mainly among those followers of Arminius, a sixteenth—seventeenth century Dutch theologian, who came to be called Remonstrants. Those who say God does this as a matter of grace (certainly much more in harmony with sound doctrine) are usually influenced by the thought of John Wesley. Those who are convinced Paul in the passages cited above is describing the condition of all people of any time of life until God moves individually (particularly) and personally to enlighten them are commonly called Calvinists, though, as Dr G. C. H. Berkouwer in his book on Election shows, at the present time most evangelical thinkers of all stripes accept the present inability of all men to turn to Christ except in response to special personal activity of the Holy Spirit ordinarily operating through the Word. Another writer, Dr James I. Packer (Evangelism and The Sovereignty of God), has pointed out that when evangelicals of any theological stripe pray for the conversion of sinners they assume that God must enlighten the sinner's darkened mind before he can repent and believe.

Another very important teaching of Scripture is also basic. Sinful people, for whom the Savior did and does His saving work, are sinners in need of salvation because of their heart condition, previous to and quite apart from individual acts of sin. Put as an aphorism: people commit sins because they are sinners, not in order to become sinners. Quite apart from arguments about the fall of man there is a large number of texts which teach or imply that men are congenitally wicked, i.e. they are so conceived and born. To take one example, the sin of theft, proscribed in the eighth commandment (Exod. 20:15), develops out of the sin of covetousness, proscribed in the tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17). And why does covetousness arise so easily and quickly in human hearts? Let Paul answer: 'But sin, taking opportunity through the commandment, produced in me coveting of every kind' (Rom. 7:8 nasb). There is an immediate resentment against the revealed law (i.e. will) of God when the sinner learns of it. Paul is aware of a ‘sin that dwells within me’ (Rom. 7:17), which is innate (inborn), not produced by acts of sin but rather producing them. See all of the seventh chapter of Romans and James 1:14, 15. Men are guilty and deserving of eternal death (see Rom. 5:12–19) on this account more than for the many overt sins, major and minor, which they actually commit.

An interesting quotation from Martin Luther will serve to enforce this matter:

These two sayings are true: ‘Good, pious works never make a good, pious man, but a good, pious man does good, pious works. Evil works never make an evil man, but an evil man does evil works’. As Christ says: ‘A bad tree bears no good fruit, a good tree bears no bad fruit’. Now it is obvious that the fruit does not bear the tree, nor do the trees grow on the fruit, but again the trees bear the fruit, and the fruit grows on the trees. Now as the trees must be there before the fruit, and the fruit makes the tree neither good nor bad, but the trees make the fruit, so must man first be pious or evil in his person before he does good or evil works. And his works do not make him good or evil, but he does good or evil works.

The discourse of Jesus cited here by Luther will be found at Matthew 7:15–20. This line of argument may seem obvious or even simplistic. Yet the point made is not generally understood. Several major theological works devote many pages in demonstration of two things: 1) that men commit sins because their hearts are wicked not the other way around; 2) that an evil disposition is more culpable and blameworthy than the evil deeds which give expression to it.⁵

Evil intentions, desires, purposes, dispositions are therefore the chief reason why ‘the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men’ (Rom. 1:18). Though men commit all manner of wickedness, their prior and more blameworthy characteristic is that ‘they did not see fit to acknowledge God’ and they have a ‘debased mind to do what ought not to be done’ (Rom. 1:28). God judged the world by a flood in Noah’s time, not simply because people were doing many wicked things but because ‘all flesh had corrupted their way’ (Gen. 6:12); because ‘the intention of man’s heart is evil from his youth’ (Gen. 8:21).

Mankind’s catastrophe in sin is pervasive, manifold and complete. They are without love of God, without desire to learn to love God or choose Him. This is why salvation must be manifold—cleansing, restoring, recreating all that man is, body and soul; past, present and future. This is why if any human being is ever to be saved God must take the initiative not only in providing salvation but in applying it—why salvation must be God’s work—entirely, wholly, completely. God will not let man present any merit for it, work any co-operation with it or claim any credit for it. Salvation is of the Lord.

Synergism (from Greek, to work with) or ‘co-operationism’ is the name the Reformers, Luther and Calvin gave to the theory that God provided and offers salvation, but that the sinner co-operating with the promptings of Word and Spirit, comes to God for salvation. They insisted on the contrary that God chose him, finds him and brings him—as Jesus Himself says in John 6:40, 44, 65. Many balked at this doctrine when Jesus announced it: to which He responded, ‘This is why I told you that no one can come to me unless it is granted him by the Father. After this many of his disciples turned back and no longer walked with him’ (John 6:65, 66).

This is not the place to introduce all the scriptural reasons why each individual member of the human race is blameworthy (culpable, guilty) for his disposition to flee from God and ‘to work all manner of unrighteousness’. The evidence, however, is overwhelming. For two reasons major theological works on the doctrine of sin (hamartiology) by evangelical authors almost invariably devote their keenest strokes to this aspect of the subject. In the first place, the evidence (as noted above) is overwhelming both in Scripture and practical experience; because in the second place it arouses the sharpest disagreement in every mind not won over already ‘to receive’ the ‘engrafted word with meekness’.

The student will therefore be prepared to understand that salvation, while simple enough as preached in the gospel—‘everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved’ (Rom. 10:13)—is very complex. To illustrate, a man with a match rifle laid across a sandbag, prone on the ground, sighting it carefully at a target 500 yards away does a very simple thing to shoot the rifle. He simply squeezes the trigger. But behind the creation of that seemingly unremarkable event are hundreds of years of scientific refinement in the compounding of gunpowder, the casting of bullets, the fashioning of cartridges, the shaping of the barrel, rifling of the same, etc. The chemistry, physics and dynamics of detonation of cap and powder, treated scientifically, fills thousands of pages of books, while hundreds of people spend much of their time seeking to understand and improve it. The mysteries of thermonuclear physics are even remotely involved. So to squeeze a trigger is a relatively simple act (if you also neglect the human part of the equation), but the firing of a rifle in such a way as to hit a target (and we haven’t mentioned ballistics and windage) is bafflingly complex. It can, however, be explained if teachers of the subject are both informed and skillful and if learners are intelligent, interested and patient. It is the purpose of the present study to explore in some detail, compactly, biblically and as scientifically as possible, just what happens when a lost man is saved. It has been a topic of interest for a long time and in strange places, for Peter said not only ancient Hebrew prophets but also angels in heaven (of all places) have desired to ‘look into’ it (see 1 Peter 1:10–12).

¹ Westminster Confession IV. 2.

² Westminster Confession VI, 1, 2.

³ What follows through the rest of this chapter is a non-technical summary of Hamartiology, the Doctrine of Sin treated at length earlier in this volume.

⁴ O. R. Brandon, ‘Heart’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed., W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), p. 497; see Gordon Clark, The Doctrine of Man (Jefferson: The Trinity Foundation, 1984), pp. 78–88.

⁵ Among the several available the one which convinced me and recently all the students in several classes preparing to be ‘biblical counselors’ is A. H. Strong’s discussion in Systematic Theology (Valley Forge: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 552–557.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (639). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

2

What Salvation Is

In this chapter we must clear the ground for later topics by doing a number of things. First we shall make some definitions and draw some distinctions. Then we shall discuss some theories and opinions about how salvation is conveyed to mankind and how it is appropriated by them. We seek to derive our doctrine from Scripture and to bring our convictions to the judgment of Scripture. After that we shall observe how each person of the triune God worked in providing our salvation, noting particularly the prominence of the Second Person, the Son of God, in redemption. Finally preliminary attention will be directed to the two salient features of evangelical theology of salvation, namely: grace and faith.

Distinctions and Definitions

Objective and subjective salvation. By objective salvation is designated those things which exist in God’s great providence which have made possible our personal redemption. Everything which relates to the Savior’s person and work, securing for us atonement for sin, redemption of our persons, eternal life with God, is sometimes designated ‘objective soteriology’ (salvation), sometimes the ‘doctrine of redemption’, sometimes ‘the person and work of Christ’.

‘Subjective soteriology’ designates the actual occurrence in the sinner of the fruit of all Christ’s work. This is salvation in the narrow, ‘proper’ sense. When we speak of being ‘saved’, ‘born again’ or of having become a ‘believer’ we are thinking of what relates to an individual human subject, hence, ‘subjective’. Sometimes good authors refer to these two major divisions of the subject as ‘the provision of redemption’ and ‘the application of redemption’ and this does not exhaust the number of theological and scriptural terms.

Important Words and Concepts in the Original Languages of the Bible

The manner of speaking about salvation and the terms employed, quite apart from the quaintness of English terms used for centuries in the language of prayer, devotion, worship, preaching and doctrine, are in many cases very common terms: ‘calling’ and ‘assurance’, for example. Others are terms mainly used only in specialized professions or trades, ‘justification’, from printing and law, being an example. Some are very rarely used outside of Christian doctrinal discussion—‘sanctification’ being one. It seems there is no practical way to change this vocabulary of salvation. The same situation prevailed when certain Greek words regularly used to translate the Old Testament Hebrew Bible into Greek were employed to write the New Testament. The New Testament can be read with some understanding by almost any one, but to make it read like the daily newspaper is to betray it. Some of its mysteries must be explained by the advanced teacher (see Acts 8:26–39, especially v. 31). There are aspects of the New Testament which cannot be fully understood without recourse to the Old, not only its narrative but its legal, poetic and prophetic language, even vocabulary and syntax.

(Paraphrases of the Bible may be very useful but they should not be employed in establishing doctrines and in the proper sense are not translations or Versions. The latter word as used of Bible translations should always be spelled with an initial capital letter, as Version in King James Version. The Living Bible, for example, was published as a Paraphrase of the Bible not a ‘Version’.)

A large number of these terms are concentrated in a single passage, Psalm 72:12–15, a prophecy of the saving work of God’s Christ, our Lord Jesus. We shall treat each briefly, concentrating finally on the single most important of them. These words are deliver (v. 12), spare and save (v. 13), redeem and be precious (v. 14), live (v. 15), (all references in asv)—six terms in all.

Deliver. The Hebrew word (nitsel) in secular context means to move away from threatened danger or to extricate from it when once involved. The Greek Bible uses a word (hruomai), which appears over and over again in the New Testament as the term for our salvation in Christ as well as in secular contexts. When Jesus is mockingly challenged to ask God for deliverance from the nails and spikes of His cross this is the word used (Matt. 27:43); Peter uses it of the rescue of Lot from Sodom’s destruction (2 Peter 2:7); Paul of escape from ‘every evil deed’ (2 Tim. 4:18). Examples of its use to signify the sinner’s rescue from sin, its punishments, pollution and power will be found at Romans 7:24; 11:26; 2 Corinthians 1:11 (three times in one verse); Colossians 1:12, 13, ‘... the Father ... has delivered us from the domain of darkness’. The last text is an example of rescue from harm or oppression already existing while still another, 1 Thessalonians 1:10 (‘Jesus ... delivers us from the wrath to come’), is from threatened danger in the future. This word emphasizes that salvation is a true ‘rescue operation’ in which drastic emergency measures, so to speak, must be undertaken.

Spare. (Ps. 72:13 kjv and asv, ‘He shall spare ... and shall save the souls of the needy.’) The Hebrew word hus means to withhold an act of destruction or injury when it is easily possible—and usually with cause—to inflict it. Thus God’s eye or His hand is said to spare (or have compassion on) the needy sinner (Neh. 13:22; Jon. 4:10). The results when God does not spare (pheidomai, Gr.) may be seen by reading 2 Peter 2:4, 5 ff., viz. ‘... God did not spare angels when they sinned ... he did not spare the ancient world, but preserved [saved] Noah ...’ Here spare is a synonym for save.

Redeem. (Ps. 72:14 kjv and asv, ‘He shall redeem their soul’.) The word is ga’al, a very special one, designating what in customary law a benevolently inclined kinsman does for some member of his family when he is in distress of any sort. Its essential, primary meaning is to act the part of a kinsman (Ruth 3:13; Num. 5:8). What should a kinsman do? He should buy back forfeited family real-estate (book of Ruth, especially 4:4 ff.). He should avenge, i.e. bring legal punishment by the best means available, when a kinsman is murdered (avenger, Deut. 19:6, 12 et al). He should seek to vindicate his kinsman in court when that kinsman is unjustly charged (Job 19:25 asv margin). In salvation, Jesus, our kinsman (see Heb. 2:14 ff.) does all these things and more, everything a loving, strong, dutiful kinsman could possibly be expected to do.

Be precious. Hebrew yaqar, to be dear, esteemed, precious. (Ps. 72:14 kjv and asv ‘... precious shall their blood be in his sight’.) The idea, as later developed in the New Testament, is that the lost sinner is important to the Savior. He is not consigned to the trash bin but picked up for special attention and care.

For while we were still weak, at the right time Christ died for the ungodly. For one will scarcely die for a righteous person—though perhaps for a good person one would dare even to die—but God shows his love for us in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us (Rom. 5:6–8).

Live. Hebrew, ḥayah, to live or come alive. The exact syntax of the Hebrew here is obscure. Exegetes have puzzled over what the rendering should be, whether ‘They shall live’ or ‘He shall live’. The asv ‘and they shall live’ (Ps. 72:15) is at least possible. At any rate salvation is everywhere in the New Testament the impartation of a new kind of life on the true spiritual level where there was only deadness before. In the Old Testament see Ezekiel 3:18; 13:18, 19; and 18:27. Though the present life is emphasized in much of the Old Testament, these passages ‘illustrate the way the Old Testament prophet refuses to divorce physical from spiritual life’.¹ The Christian who has taken only the very first steps in understanding Scripture truths knows how prominent this aspect of salvation is. (See the many texts on salvation as eternal life, John 3:16; 5:24; etc.)

Save. Hebrew, yasha (Ps. 72:13 ‘And the souls of the needy he will save’ asv). ‘Souls’ in these citations should be understood in the modern sense of persons. ‘Save’ is the most comprehensive term for God’s complete work on behalf of sinners. The Hebrew word is the root of the names Hoshea, Hosea, Jehoshua and Joshua—Jehovah Saves—and, of course, in Greek dress this name becomes Jesus, which explains the angel’s announcement, ‘you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins’ (Matt. 1:21). The root word yasha with its derivatives in Hebrew and, as cognate words in related languages such as Arabic and Syriac demonstrate, means ‘to be broad, ample, spacious’. Gesenius asserted, ‘To the Hebrews broad space, wide room is the emblem of liberty, deliverance from dangers and straits; as on the other hand narrowness of space, straits, is put for difficulty, distress, danger.’² The sense of self-help, self-rescue from distress or imprisonment is absent from the Hebrew word yasha (to save). One must think of a first person who is victim of a second person or thing being saved (rescued) by the agency of a third. ‘The thought is neither that of self-help nor of co-operation with the oppressed. The help is such that the oppressed would be lost without it.’³ Foerster in an article of fifty pages has shown that sōtēr (Greek for saviour) appears infrequently in the New Testament, and then usually in quotations of the Septuagint (OT in Greek).⁴ It is also used sparingly of Christ in writings of the post-apostolic Fathers. Among much other valuable information, Foerster suggests that the infrequency may be due to the fact that since the emperor (and many mythical beings) was called sōtēr, the Christians avoided confusion by avoiding the term—even though the word fits our Lord exactly. Says Foerster: ‘Nowhere in Christian writings does there seem to be any point of contact with sōtēr, as part of the style of imperial Rome, not even by way of antithesis.’⁵

A large amount of space here would be required fully to develop the biblical materials on this subject. Let us be content (1) to affirm that ‘salvation’, related of course to the word save, is the most comprehensive term for the subject of this division of systematic theology; (2) to recall that the name Jesus (Hebrew Jehoshua) means Yahweh (the Lord) saves—Matthew 1:21, ‘you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins’ (cf. Luke 1:31; 2:21); (3) to observe that Scripture adds ‘that the Father has sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world’ (1 John 4:14); and that (4) ‘the living God’, Himself, ‘is the Saviour of all people, especially of those who believe’ (1 Tim. 4:10).

Just as save is employed widely in connection with health (heal), political and civil oppression (rescue, deliver, set free), etc., in common discourse in English, so the equivalent expressions in Hebrew and Greek were used in the ancient world. In addition, at the time Jesus lived and the New Testament was being written the words save, salvation and saviour achieved very special meanings in civil-political society and in the mystery religions developing in the Roman world. New Testament and historical scholars have had great interest in these and related terms from Roman and Hellenic civilization of the time. As a result save (sōdzō), saviour (sōtēr) and salvation (sōtēria, sōtērion and sōtērios), all of which appear in the New Testament (especially numerous are save and salvation), have come in for great attention by scholars.

This scholarly energy, much of it directed against the integrity of the New Testament writings, has not always been fruitful for understanding save, salvation and savior in the New Testament and even less in constructing a sound theology of salvation, for a simple reason, viz.: from the beginning of the New Testament to its end (Matt. 1:21–Rev. 21:24) the idea is linked to the Old Testament history and promise. The first chapter of Matthew introduces ‘the coming one’ of Old Testament prophecy as named Jehovah (or Yahweh or the Lord) Saves, for such is the meaning of the name, Jesus. During His post-resurrection ministry Jesus Himself declared that the gospel of salvation through Him was the theme of every page of the Hebrew Bible (Luke 24:26, 27, 44–48). There is not a plain hint from Gospel or Epistle that the concept of save, salvation, savior owed a whit to Roman, Greek or other culture, though it may well be that pagan enemies of the Christians did find a false connection. For, since the emperor was beginning to be called Sōtēr (Savior) in eastern portions of the empire where the New Testament and Christian proclamation claimed ‘no other’ than Jesus to be the Savior of the world, the doctrine of salvation (sōtēria) by Christ the Savior (Sōtēr) brought the whole Christian movement into collision with the Roman world of the day. For this reason from time to time Christians were persecuted and slain in great numbers as subversive of public order.⁶

Comprehensive Character of Salvation

When a believing man receives salvation from God he receives much more than he could possibly initially understand—a multitude of blessings, which he only gradually understands and appreciates. He becomes initially vividly aware that God has spared him the dreadful punishments everywhere denounced over unrepentant sinners. He is aware that having fled to the Lord for refuge, ‘The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous man runs into it and is safe’ (Prov. 18:10); that ‘Since ... we have now been justified by his blood ... shall we be saved ... from the wrath of God’ (Rom. 5:9; cf. 1 Thess. 5:9; John 3:17). This accounts in part for the profound relief and deep peace so evident in the lives of new believers. As they read the Bible further, however, they learn that in the salvation received, God ‘has blessed us... with every spiritual blessing’ (Eph. 1:3) and that God’s ‘divine power has granted to us all things that pertain to life and godliness’ (2 Peter 1:3).

(1) So the salvation that every true believer possesses includes all the blessings one shall ever need. There is no call for agonizing prayer or seeking for further blessings and degrees of grace, even though there may be struggle enough in the disciplines of grace whereby we enter into these blessings. The divisive doctrine that there is a further stage of present-day salvation whereby those Christians who attain it live on a different level of perfection and access to God will be treated in later chapters.

(2) Salvation is comprehensive as to time also. There is a past aspect. ‘[H]e chose us in him before the foundation of the world’ (Eph. 1:4). There also came a moment in every believer’s past when God ‘saved us and called us’ effectively (2 Tim. 1:9). There are present aspects wherein God is now saving us (1 Cor. 1:18 Gr. ‘being saved’) and there are instances wherein Scripture speaks of our salvation as a future goal (Rom. 13:11; 1 Peter 1:5; Rom. 5:9, 10). Sometimes all three aspects will appear together as in Hebrews 9:24–28 (observe ‘now to appear ... appeared ... will appear a second time ... to save’ vv. 24, 26, 28).

(3) Another matter comes in for greater emphasis nowadays than in former times of less emphasis on the values of human physical and temporal existence, namely that in the Bible it is the whole man who is to be saved, not merely his ‘soul’, narrowly defined. When the Bible speaks of the ‘soul’ as safe or saved we should usually think of the whole being rather than his psychē (soul) or pneuma (spirit). In 1 Thessalonians 5:23 Paul specifies that at the last, believing men shall be saved ‘completely’ and specifies spirit and soul and body. Of course Christians sometimes suffer psychic disorders and all of us will die physically if Jesus does not come first, but we do nevertheless have the certain promise that ‘salvation is nearer to us now than when we first believed’ (Rom. 13:11), that though we may now ‘groan within ourselves’ (kjv) we may confidently await ‘the redemption of our bodies’ (Rom. 8:22, 23). We are at liberty, therefore, to think today of our loved ones, who may be deranged or depressed or chronically confused, as they shall be in the day of their resurrection.

As seen earlier the word ‘save’ (Gr. sōdzō) and salvation (sōtēria) in the New Testament in the context of physical illness means to be made whole; in case of insanity, to be made sane; in danger to be rescued; in prison to be set free. So the Gospel writers, knowing Jesus came indeed ‘to seek and to save that which is lost’—and every kind of ‘lost’—sometimes seem deliberately to impart ambiguous, or perhaps comprehensive, meaning to the word save. A familiar case is the story of the woman with ‘an issue of blood’ recorded by all three Synoptic Gospels. There must be some special importance for church and ministry about the story. It must contain the essential Christian preachment—which the form critics call the kērygma (Paul’s word for ‘preaching’ that saves, 1 Cor. 1:21). See the story at Mark 5:25–34 (or parallels in Luke 8:43–48 and Matt. 9:20–24). At the close of the story Jesus, in the hearing of an enormous crowd, pronounced to and over the chronically ill woman [author’s translation]: ‘Daughter, thy faith has saved [sesōken] thee. Go in peace [another word for wholeness] and be healthy of thy plague’ (a common word for the stroke of sin in the Old Testament). All the theology of Isaiah 53 should be entered here. Among the many writers who have drawn this lesson from Mark 5:34, perhaps the following puts it best:

What particular usefulness did such a story have for church work which led to its incorporation in the Gospel?... The story, like so many in Mark, is plain kērygma, and makes a marvellous sermon illustration for evangelistic preaching. Here is a woman with a disease which makes her ceremonially impure and increasingly weak physically. She has tried all the remedies that she knows, and was nothing bettered but rather grew worse. She hears of Jesus; she comes to Jesus in simple (if superstitious) faith that he can cure her or, as Matthew and Mark put it, that she could be ‘saved’ (Mark 5:28; Matt. 9:21). She was assured by Jesus that her faith had ‘saved’ her, and she went out into a new life of peace and wholeness. We have here a paradigm of Christian conversion in the apostolic church.⁷

The Triune God, the Author of Salvation

The pre-eminence of Christ as author of salvation is declared by a number of New Testament texts. He is ‘the founder and perfecter of our faith’ (Heb. 12:2). Jesus Himself said, ‘I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me’ (John 14:6) and Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, proclaimed, ‘there is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved’ (Acts 4:8, 12). Jesus is the only name whereby to be saved (Acts 4:12), the one true vine from which comes life (John 15:1–4), apart from whom we can do nothing (John 15:5).

Yet there is great emphasis in Scripture on the fact that each Person of the Godhead was involved in effecting our redemption. The industrious reader will find this woven into Paul’s marvelous peroration of redemption in Ephesians 1:1–14 (see especially vv. 3, 5, 7, 13). Another such passage is Titus 3:4–6. The formula that salvation is of the Father (as Planner), through the Son (as Mediator) and by the Holy Spirit (as Applier) is fairly consistent through the Scriptures wherever the subject is raised. The Father sent the Son (1 John 4:14; John 1:17); the Spirit proceeds into the world from the Father and the Son (John 14:26; 15:26; 16:7).

The Method by Which Salvation Is Brought to Men

This rubric may seem confusing at first but it will soon be seen that a vital truth is at stake. Some people seem to think that salvation is conveyed by the environmental influences of early life, e.g. many suppose the influence of catechisms, meetings, denominational slogans, religious exercises, etc. secure this salvation. Paul refers to such false trust in Philippians 3:4–8. Others either implicitly or overtly trust their family or national heritage—sometimes in ignorant rejection of the true meaning of their ancestral faith. I think of the many to whom I preach who I suspect of having little more depth to their religion than the sacred precincts of the building familiar from childhood. God has said, ‘who has required of you this trampling of my courts?’ (Isa. 1:12). We recall God’s demand by the prophecy of Isaiah when we observe crowds at church suppers and festivals but scarcely a pew full at meetings for prayer. Isaiah said, ‘Bring no more vain offerings; incense is an abomination to me. New moon and ... the calling of convocations ... solemn assembly ... my [God’s] soul hates ... even though you make many prayers, I will not listen ...’ (Isa. 1:13–15). The Old Testament prophets from Isaiah to Malachi inveigh against this. John 1:12, 13 specifically rejects such notions.

There are, however, only four formal theories known to the present author, views defended by doctrinal authorities. One holds salvation to be conveyed by an experience, something that happens in the heart through the direct operation of God without any means whatsoever. People of this persuasion—which goes technically by the name of ‘mysticism’—are fond of giving their listeners a precise year, month, day, hour and minute when ‘I was there when it happened and I ought to know’. There are both predestinarian and ‘free will’ varieties of this view. As we shall see, this outlook contains more than a germ of truth, but it is not an adequate explanation of the operation of God in bringing salvation to us.

Another view, Roman Catholic (and other) sacramentalism, holds that when the water of baptism is applied (with intent to baptize, and whether by ordained priest or layman) the guilt of original sin is removed and in the case of infants, if they die soon thereafter, salvation is complete. Four other rites of religion are necessary to save older persons.

A third view holds that in the case of infants the gospel is ‘preached’ to the heart of an infant by his baptism and that the heart of the infant truly hears and responds in faith at that moment and the infant is saved. So far as I know this doctrine is taught only by certain Lutherans. Regretfully, this author must firmly reject all three of these views in favour of what he is convinced the Bible distinctly teaches, in agreement with the vast majority of evangelical Christian scholars and lay believers of all ages.

The question of infant salvation is, of course, a problem which neither the Bible, itself, nor reflection upon the subject has fully answered. Every thoughtful Christian must be concerned about it. That baptism, however, is not the pole about which the question revolves is coming more and more to be acknowledged. This will be treated later in these pages.

The biblical teaching is simply that salvation is brought to sinners through the sole instrumentality of a message (the gospel)—this message, however phrased, being that God has effected a deliverance through His Son, that this message has its source in the Holy Scriptures and is governed wholly by the Holy Scriptures; it is addressed through the understanding to the heart, which is the seat of decision; that the understanding is enlightened by the Holy Spirit who also enables the heart to respond in faith. This matter also will be dealt with more at length later in connection with the doctrine of faith.

Let us close for now with some rather extensive Scripture quotations that clearly and distinctly teach that the gospel is God’s sole means of conveying salvation to sinners.

Faith follows hearing the gospel: ‘So faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ’ (Rom. 10:17); ‘In him you also, when you heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, and believed in him, were sealed with the promised Holy Spirit’ (Eph. 1:13).

The gospel itself is the appointed means: ‘For I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes’ (Rom. 1:16); the Spirit sent Peter to Cornelius, and the Spirit told Cornelius, ‘Send men to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter; Who shall tell thee words [hrēmata, the spoken word, i.e. the gospel], whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved’ (Act 11:13, 14 kjv). Starkly put, but correctly, there is an important sense in which we are saved by words.

The gospel, itself, has power (the Spirit of God accompanying) to produce the new spiritual life of the saved: after speaking of redemption by the ‘precious blood of Christ’ (1 Peter 1:18–20) and of his readers’ faith, Peter concludes that they are ‘born again, not of perishable seed but of imperishable, through the living and abiding word of God.... And this word is the good news [gospel] that was preached to you’ (1 Peter 1:23, 25). Finally, in this connection another text of Scripture advises that men ‘receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls’ (James 1:21 kjv).

C. A. Hodge, refuted by contemporary Robert Dabney, insisted that the Word, or gospel, accompanies but is not instrumental in opening the heart to believe. Hodge insisted God, by a sovereign act of omnipotence, opens the heart first, then the Word enters savingly. Dabney insisted that the Word is the instrument of opening the heart. It is a technicality which others have addressed, some favourably, some unfavourably. I think it may be a fruitless discussion. The Bible does clearly say ‘faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ’ (Rom. 10:17). The problem of the relation of Word and Spirit in regeneration and faith will recur again and again in following chapters, never achieving full solution.

All of God, All by Grace, All Through Faith

The three ideas in this heading have already appeared in the foregoing discussion. They deserve special note as characteristic features of the biblical way of salvation. It is of interest that even those denominations that assign a prominent place to the meritoriousness of good works as a procuring cause, formally endorse these ideas. Throughout the medieval period the papal church claimed to be a religion of grace and faith. The canons and decrees of the Council of Trent give formal service to the same. A sharp difference of interpretation of both grace and faith is glaringly exposed. Hence it is evident that the biblical meaning of grace and of faith is supremely important to a sound doctrine. This matter also will be discussed later in these pages in connection with grace and faith.

¹ E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1965), p. 13.

² William Gesenius, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of The Old Testament, trans. E. Robinson, 26th ed. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1891), sub. Yasha, p. 435.

³ Fohrer, ‘The stem yasha’ in the Old Testament’ TDNT, vii, p. 973.

⁴ Foerster, ‘sōdzō, sōtēria, sōtēr, sōtērios’, TDNT vii, pp. 965–1024.

⁵ ibid., p. 1019.

⁶ Among the several scholarly works treating the idea of salvation in the New Testament and the gospel which proclaims it, the volume by Green Meaning of Salvation is heartily recommended here.

⁷ E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation, p. 113.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (646). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

3

Ordo Salutis, or the Order of Salvation

In this chapter we consider several truths related to the whole scope of subjective soteriology, i.e. the actual effectuation in and for the sinner himself of all the fruits possible through Christ's finished work of redemption. We shall first consider just what the various elements of this 'personal' salvation are. Then come some minor but important controversies related to the logical and possibly chronological order of these elements. When Latin was still the language of scholarly discourse the term for this topic was ordo salutis. After that we focus on two aspects: grace and union with Christ which, as we shall see, are involved throughout at every stage, process, event or action.

The Aspects of Personal Salvation and Their Order

Think for a moment of the terms you have heard in sermons or have read in the Bible when salvation was being discussed. Words such as conversion, born-again, justification, repentance, regeneration, faith, grace, sanctification come to mind. Quite a list can be assembled. Classes of mine have in five minutes volunteered two dozen or more. Upon refinement some turn out to be synonyms for one another—new birth, regeneration, born-again for example. Some turn out to be subdivisions of others, i.e. acceptance of Christ being an aspect of faith; others have special overlapping relation—repentance and faith being the negative and positive sides of conversion. Some of the words are common everyday terms (faith); some are common to Scripture but rare elsewhere (sanctification); some are common but have rather narrow significance in Christian doctrine (perseverance). Not one, however, was specially invented as a peculiarly theological word. Good understanding of biblical doctrine does not usually require many special words, rather a thoughtful pursuit of the meaning and relationships of words people everywhere use. Some of them acquire a special, restricted meaning in the Bible and its doctrines. Christianity must be a 'faith' of the common man or it loses its genius. Our Savior was a carpenter by trade and several of the founding apostles were fishermen. For the most part the sublime and profound ideas in New Testament teachings are written in the language of fishermen, farmers and tradesmen—people, however, who 'went to church' regularly. They were not strangers to the language of biblical, religious devotion, because they had already been immersed in the vocabulary of the Old Testament and of the synagogue worship of Judaism. Throughout Christian history sincere, practicing Christians have learned that language—not from newcomers to faith but from advanced practitioners. If this is to continue then we must stop having one set of meetings for those with 'contemporary' tastes and another set of meanings for those for whom the practice of prayer and devotion, public and private, has already been learned. Since sin is manifold in its harmful effects in mankind—affecting everything that is human—salvation must also be manifold in its aspects and effects. St Peter writes that we are given ‘all things that pertain to [eternal] life and godliness’ (2 Peter 1:3). It should not be surprising then, that an analysis of the subject in Scripture should find many topics for consideration.

Furthermore, since the human malady of sin is ‘systemic’ the remedy must be systemic. One need not understand all of salvation to receive salvation’s benefits, but every wise ‘scribe who has been trained for the kingdom’, is like the good householder who ‘brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old’ (Matt. 13:52). If he does so he will have his treasures previously classified and stored in order to bring them out for use as needed for his guests and others who call at his door for help. So also it is helpful as wise stewards of ‘stored’ doctrinal treasures to have them ‘classified’ and ‘filed’ according to topic and scriptural sources.

John Murray puts the matter in another way. God is generous in everything he has done for the sustenance and comfort of man and beast. He cites Psalm 104 where the poet praises God that He has made the earth teem with good things for all: ‘These all look to you, to give them their food in due season’ (v. 27); ‘wine to gladden the heart of man, oil to make his face shine and bread to strengthen man’s heart’ (v. 15); ‘O Lord, how manifold are your works! In wisdom have you made them all; the earth is full of your creatures’ (v. 24). Murray adds: ‘The provision which God has made for the salvation of men is even more strikingly manifold.’¹ Murray is saying a discussion of the ‘parts’ in the ‘order’ of salvation is necessary to do justice to the amplitude of salvation by God through Christ.

This amplitude is not immediately apparent to convicted sinners like the Philippian jailor who asked, ‘what must I do to be saved?’ (Acts 16:30). For him it is sufficient for the moment to answer, ‘Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved’. This particular husband and father needed to know that the same offer extended to his whole household: ‘and your household’ (Acts 16:31). The jailor’s faith could not do vicariously for his wife, children, extended family and retainers. Each must do his own believing. Later on, such folk, if faith is genuine, will wish to know what the precious gift of eternal life cost someone else, and how they, ‘dead in trespasses and sins’, ever came to desire the gift of salvation of whose benefits they were not only ignorant but thoroughly indisposed to desire —‘For the word of the cross is folly to those who are perishing’ (1 Cor. 1:18).

As shall be seen, the order in which one conceives these aspects of the application of redemption decides which system of theology one adheres to, with great effect on the type of piety developed. Though there is a common quality to the piety of all Christian groups, the views that are adopted in this area of doctrine have profound effect on preaching and devotional practice.

The form of the arrangement below, while not fully original with me, first appeared in the present form in my lectures at Wheaton College about 1954. I have been flattered to see it copied exactly in a presently widely used textbook of systematic theology in evangelical seminaries and colleges.

The Ordo Salutis or Arrangement of Doctrines in Soteriology

‘It is the glory, the power, and the preciousness of the Protestant doctrine that it makes the salvation of sinners a matter of grace from the beginning to the end.’²

This outline (called, in technical theology, ordo salutis, order of salvation) is mainly a logical order, though there are chronological aspects.

Charles Hodge explains:

Logical order and chronological succession are different things ... the order of nature and order of time are not to be confounded. Many things are co-instantaneous which nevertheless stand in a certain logical, and even causal relation to each other. Christ commanded the man with the withered arm to stretch forth his hand. He immediately obeyed, but not before he received strength. He called to Lazarus to come forth from the grave; and he came forth. But this presupposes a restoration of life. So God commands the sinner to believe in Christ; and he thereupon receives Him as his Savior; though this supposes supernatural power or grace.³

The form of the chart indicates that all of applied salvation, from election by God in eternity past on to final glorification, is by God’s grace. While no argument is here presented in proof of this assertion the following passages of Scripture will persuade the reverent, industrious student: Romans 5:15, 20, 21; Ephesians 2:8; Romans 11:5; Galatians 1:15; Acts 18:27; 20:24; Titus 3:5; Romans 5:2; Ephesians 1:7; 1 Thessalonians 2:16; 2 Timothy 2:1; 2 Corinthians 12:3, 9; Ephesians 3:8; Hebrews 12:28; 1 Peter 3:19; 1 Corinthians 15:10. These passages show individually that one or another of the listed aspects (or some part of it) takes place by virtue of the grace of God. The essential working of divine grace is treated more at length in the next chapter.

Likewise there is a connection of every aspect of salvation with Christ’s life. All Christian salvation is ‘in Him’. The precise nature of this union whether forensic or vital will be discussed shortly. For the moment we only cite some of the texts that affirm the union. They relate to many aspects of ordo salutis: Romans 6:1–11; 7:4; Ephesians 2:10; Romans 8:1; Ephesians 1:6; 2:13;

Romans 6:4; 1 Corinthians 1:4, 5; 6:13–16; 1 Corinthians 10:16–18.

Some Important Distinctions Within the ‘Order of Salvation’

The outline of the order of salvation, with accompanying qualifying remarks, distinguishes three things as to the character of each of the eleven events or processes in the central column (election to glorification) involved in Christian salvation. Some are God’s act for man while others are God’s work in man. And while certain are man’s act, none is man’s work. Works are meritorious (they call for wages). Human acts are not meritorious. We think of such an event as a divine appointment, or thought, or forgiveness of sin, as an act. It is not a work, producing effects in the external world of things. A work, however, is an effect-producing event, as for example, God’s call whereby through Word and Spirit He reaches into the heart of a sinner and draws him to Himself. All works are, of course, acts, but not all acts are works.

Three items—repentance, faith and conversion—are man’s acts. Man repents and believes. God cannot and will not do his repenting and believing for him, though by grace God does enable some so to do. Yet, though in official Roman Catholic dogma faith is a work, a meritorious work, in the Bible faith has no merit: rather faith is the abandonment of the whole project of salvation by merit. To assign merit to any of these human acts is to deny grace: ‘And to the one who does not work but trusts him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness’ (Rom. 4:5; cf. 1–3); ‘And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work’ (Rom. 11:6, 7 kjv).

I once had the difficult task of counseling a Baptist young man and his devout Roman Catholic fiancée in preparation for marriage. The sessions came to an end this way: We had spent three sessions on the first three chapters of Romans. We went peacefully to that point. When we got to Romans 4:1–5 the young lady demanded a Roman Catholic Version of the Holy Bible. I sent her home with Father Knox’s New Testament. At our next meeting she firmly announced, ‘This cannot mean what it seems to say. I’m going to talk to Father _____’. With that the sessions ended and the marriage never took place—though she never returned my copy of Father Knox!⁴

Again the insight and clarity of C. A. Hodge instruct us: ‘It is the glory, the power, and the preciousness of the Protestant doctrine that it makes the salvation of sinners a matter of Grace from beginning to end.’⁵

If the reader does not immediately understand these distinctions let him keep an open mind to the proposition that no right preaching of gospel Christianity is possible without them. Pray for help and read all the texts and this part of this discussion again. These things come by spiritual vigor coupled with a sound mind. Fuzzy, good feelings can be no substitute for ‘the spirit of a sound mind’.

No construction of ordo salutis, including the one suggested here, should be regarded as wholly adequate. Justification is the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to the one who has faith, yet faith is the act of one who has been effectively called and to whom sufficient spiritual life and discernment have been imparted for one to repent and believe. These distinctions have borne the fruit of endless controversies, which do not appear fully capable of being settled.⁶

It seems obvious that regeneration cannot be separated either in logic or chronological succession from repentance and faith, which constitute conversion. Which of the spokes of a wheel starts first? Of course when the cart moves ahead all the spokes move together and do so simultaneously. The ray of light and the ray of heat arrive at the same time. Sensation and perception even though they occur simultaneously—for example, seeing this printed word and perceiving it as printed word—occur simultaneously, yet the sensation is the cause of the perception even though they occur simultaneously.⁷

The problem of ordo salutis or ‘the order of grace in the application of redemption’ has figured importantly in Protestant theology, especially in the period of Lutheran scholastic orthodoxy (seventeenth century) and to a lesser degree among the Reformed (the rest of us).

For Luther, faith was a prerequisite for baptism. He took one of his famous immovable positions on Mark 16, ‘whoever believes and is baptized will be saved’. It was one of his decisive theses that sacraments save only when they are received by faith.⁸ At first (and as late as four years after proposing the famous Theses of 1517) he declared the required faith was the faith of the believing sponsors of the infant at baptism. A year later he modified his ‘stand’—‘Baptism helps no one and is to be administered to no one [infant or adult] unless he believes for himself.’⁹ As a result Luther began to teach that the infant over whom the baptismal formula is pronounced and water applied in the name of the triune God does truly believe.¹⁰ He made only feeble effort to prove this from texts that so affirm. Rather, Luther argued, since the kingdom of God welcomes children and to enter that kingdom one must be ‘born again of water’ (John 3:8), interpreted as baptism, then the Scripture enjoins that little children are to be baptized. ‘He is certain that children believe because infant baptism is right and valid—and for no other reason.’¹¹

Many have written of the evolution of Luther’s thought in this area. The great Reformer’s thought developed as he sought pastorally to teach assurance of salvation to his own people. A recent friendly discussion shows how Luther’s response to Anabaptist rejection of baptismal regeneration figured in the development of his thought.¹²

When I have asserted these facts of Lutheran baptismal doctrine to students in theology classes—almost all evangelical but non-Lutheran—their faces fall in incredulity. I always carry copies of orthodox Lutheran authors (usually Mueller or Pieper) and follow my assertion by reading the appropriate pages. A corollary of infant baptismal faith is the Lutheran doctrine of baptismal regeneration. This introduces severe problems in aspects of the order of salvation, for the Reformers all insisted faith comes by the special work of the Holy Spirit ordinarily through the Word addressed to the understanding.¹³ How can the gospel be understood by an infant? Lutheran theologians usually refer to the case of John the Baptist, who, still in his mother’s womb, recognized the presence of the yet unborn Jesus in the womb of his mother (Luke 1:41). Luke, however, does not say the unborn child recognized Jesus, only that the appearance of the mother with Child in utero coincided with the ‘leap’ in the womb of Elizabeth.

J. A. Dorner traced the history of accommodating the schema of any sort of evangelical ‘plan of salvation’ when infant baptism is thought to follow faith and to confer regeneration. Dorner insists Lutherans have always believed that before saving grace changes a man’s heart from death to life he is enslaved by sin, that liberatum arbitrium (freedom of will) ‘must first be bestowed, to make repentance and faith (conversio) possible, and that then [emphasis added] faith receives justification’. Lutheran scholastic theology turned handsprings through the scholastic era of the theologians Chemnitz, Gerhard, Scherzer, Calovius, Koenig, Beier, Calixtus, Hollatz. A chief problem was how the system works in the case of baptized (regenerate and justified) Lutherans who fell away, lost their grace of baptism and then repented as adults. On the one hand, in order to give prominence to the distinctly Reformation doctrine of justification there was developed a doctrine of pre-temporal justification by God as a foundation for the whole process of application of redemption. On the other hand some held that all the several stages of the process exist simultaneously.¹⁴

To keep the allegiance of almost any group of thoughtful people, a religious faith must maintain some semblance of structure wherein tenets of belief fall in consistent logical order. Lutherans to this day have the same problem their namesake had in constructing a stable ordo salutis, precisely because of the somewhat incompatible wedding of baptismal regeneration of infants with a doctrine of the spiritual impotence of the unregenerate mind and of a faith that comes by hearing and hearing by the Word of God.

Among Protestants other than Lutherans, the matter of an ordo salutis took a somewhat different course, chiefly because few if any connected regeneration with baptism, whether of infants or those who reach the ‘age of discretion’.

The developments in soteriology had to do mainly with the place of election in relation to the decrees of God and the rise—more than a generation after Calvin’s death—of a developing system of ‘Covenant theology’ known also to later generations as Federal theology.

The fully developed covenant (Federal) theology, for many like me who while recognizing certain values in covenant theology do not adhere to it, seems to be speculative, scholastic over-refinement of what is otherwise already plain in the Scriptures. It seems remote from the scriptural simplicity of Calvin’s Institutes of the Christian Religion. Yet when it appeared in its first major development it was formulated as a correction to the growing Reformed Scholasticism. It was a reaction toward a theology drawn from Scripture rather than philosophical speculation. As a system of anthropology and soteriology it was first fully elaborated by a German named Cocceius (Lat. Cocceius) (1602–1669), professor first at Bremen, then Franeker and finally Leyden in the Netherlands. It has been said he invented a biblical theology that gave proper attention to the progress of revelation in the Bible and was perhaps the earliest post-Reformation theologian to find ‘room ... for a classification of history [in the Bible] into great periods or ages, governed by different principles’.¹⁵ Thus the modern recognition of dispensations or epochs of time in the ‘plan of salvation’ is seen correctly to have become important to Protestant theology not first in ‘dispensationalism’ but in covenant theology. Both are variant forms of the recognition of epochs not only in biblical history but in the divine administration of the same.¹⁶

¹ John Murray, Redemption: Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1955), p. 79.

² Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology iii, originally published 1871–1873 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1970), p. 174.

³ ibid., p. 173.

⁴ Shortly afterward, the girl married a ‘Catholic’ man of Mexican nationality. But after several years the centripetal forces of incompatible cultures and spread of educational backgrounds shattered the marriage. I don’t know the details, but now many years later the ‘Baptist boy’ and the ‘Catholic girl’ married and seem to have lived happily ever after.

⁵ Hodge, Systematic Theology, p. 174.

⁶ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), p. 517.

⁷ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), p. 793.

⁸ Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1966), p. 364; cf. p. 348.

⁹ ibid., p. 349, as cited by Althaus from Luther’s Works, ed. J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1955), pp. 32, 14.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 365: see also Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics ii (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1951), pp. 448, 449; also John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1955), p. 498.

¹¹ Althaus, Theology of Martin Luther, p. 365.

¹² ‘Was Luther An Evangelical?’ by Carl Trueman, The Practical Calvinist: An Introduction to the Presbyterian and Reformed Heritage, ed. P. A. Lillback (Ross-Shire, Scotland: Mentor/Christian Focus, 2002), pp. 131–148.

¹³ J. A. Domer, History of Protestant Theology Particularly in Germany ii, trans. G. Robinson and S. Taylor (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1871), p. 155.

¹⁴ ibid., pp. 155–165.

¹⁵ ibid., pp. 31–44.

¹⁶ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 612–616; also J. McClintock and J. Strong, ‘Federal Theology’ in Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature iii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books 1968–1970), pp. 515–520 (excellent); Robert Dabney, like Charles Hodge a Presbyterian and contemporary with him, thoroughly refuted Hodge’s Federal theory of imputation. Robert Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology, first published 1878 (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1972), Lecture xxix, pp. 337–351. This note could be enlarged, but further pursuit of this in-house debate among evangelicals in this venue would be a distraction.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (654). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Doctrine of Grace

I. Meaning and Use of the Bible Term Grace

The word for grace in the Greek New Testament is charis (pronounced car-ees). It appears at least 125 times, sometimes translated thanks, liberality, favour and such like. In general Greek literature of ancient times and in non-salvational references in the New Testament, it has as wide a range of meanings, as does grace in modern English (elegant living, pleasing decorative pieces; rhythmic, pleasing motion, etc.).

With reference to Christian salvation, however, charis (grace) always has the narrow technical meaning of the unmerited favour of God. We have already quoted Romans 4:4, 5 and 11:6 to show how grace and works-merit are utterly incompatible in the salvation event. To these add: ‘For by grace you have been saved through faith. And this is not your own doing; it is the gift of God, not a result of works ...’ (Eph. 2:8, 9). As we have already seen, every aspect of salvation, even men’s acts of repentance and faith are by the grace of God.

The matter may be further amplified, for in Scripture grace is declared to be an attitude of God in sending salvation (Titus 2:11), a gift of God imparted to believers (Eph. 4:7) and a power of God working in believers (1 Cor. 15:10). Grace as unmerited favour is a name not only for God’s method in salvation but the very realm of salvation. The latter is an extension of the former.

1) Specifically, grace is the method of God—apart from and in spite of all human merit or demerit and work or lack of it—whereby on the basis of redemption and upon the occasion of faith God saves sinful men. We shall have numerous occasions to advert to this, especially in connection with the doctrines of faith and justification, for sinful people are ‘justified by his [God’s] grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 3:24).

2) Grace is also the very realm wherein believing sinners, entering by faith, live out their earthly existence and shall abide forever. They have access to God by faith ‘into this grace’; they ‘stand’ (Rom. 5:2) and shall ‘continue in the grace of God’ forever (Acts 13:43). It is not an exaggeration to say that in Paul’s writings grace becomes a synonym for Christianity.

Two issues connected with grace, which have occupied some of the best efforts of some of the finest Christian thinkers, now come before us.

II. Grace and Law (or Law and Gospel)

Salvation has to do with deliverance from sin—its pollution, power and penalty; and sin is ‘transgression of the law’ (Gr. anomia, lawlessness, 1 John 3:4). Some treatment of what is meant by law is therefore appropriate. The following classic definition and explanation is helpful and submitted with approval:

‘Moral Law’ is that declaration of God’s will which directs and binds men, in every age and place, to their whole duty to him. It was most solemnly proclaimed by God himself at Sinai, to confirm the original law of nature, and correct men’s mistakes concerning the demands of it. It is denominated perfect (Ps. 19:7), perpetual (Matt. 5:17, 18), holy (Rom. 7:12), good (Rom. 7:12), spiritual (Rom. 7:14), exceedingly broad (Ps. 119:96). Some deny that it is a rule of conduct to believers under the Gospel dispensation; but it is easy to see the futility of such an idea; for as a transcript of the mind of God, it must be the criterion of moral good and evil. It is also given for that very purpose, that we may see our duty, and abstain from everything derogatory to the divine glory. It affords us grand ideas of the holiness and purity of God; without attention to it, we can have no knowledge of sin. Christ himself came, not to destroy, but to fulfil it; and though we cannot do as he did, yet we are commanded to follow his example. Love to God is the end of the moral law as well as the end of the Gospel. By the law, also, we are led to see the nature of holiness and our own depravity, and learn to be humbled under a sense of our imperfection. We are not under it, however, as a covenant of works (Gal. 3:13), or as a source of terror (Rom. 8:1), although we must abide by it, together with the whole preceptive word of God ...¹

Some exponents of dispensational outlook claim to be in formal disagreement with this common Protestant outlook, but in actual life-practice and preaching are in full conformity with it. It should not be a matter of important disagreement.

The situation is further clarified when we see the whole Bible, with due attention to dispensational distinctions, under the categories supplied by 2 Timothy 3:16: ‘... is breathed out by God and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness ... [to make us] equipped for every good work’. Paul, who certainly was no legalist, found it useful to lead people to Christ, i.e. to show them that they are helpless and condemned, utterly hopeless without grace (Gal. 3:19–22), and he found law’s righteous standards to be useful goals for Christian living (Rom. 8:4). Paul frequently brought ‘the Law’, that is the Old Testament Scriptures, especially the Pentateuch, to bear on Christian duties by such expressions as ‘also says the Law’ or ‘Moses says’ or ‘the Scripture says’ and similar ways of making the law relevant either as statute or mere information or as duty.²

The law of God is proclaimed in all parts of the Bible, that is, in the sense of the holiness of God expressed as the standard of all true goodness: ‘but as he who called you is holy, you also be holy in all your conduct [manner of living asv], since it is written, “You shall be holy; for I am holy” ’ (1 Peter 1:15, 16; cf. Lev. 20:7).

If this, however, were the sole emphasis of Scripture we would be utterly cast down, under condemnation and without hope. So beginning with the same chapter wherein man's first sin appears (Gen. 3) the gleams of divine grace appear also. The God of all true law who drove them from the garden precisely as He said He would, came seeking Adam, calling, 'Where are you?' graciously provided the clothing of animal skins and delivered the first promise of the coming Redeemer, the 'seed of the woman' (Gen. 3:9, 15).

When it is more appropriate, a fuller discussion of the 'proper uses of the Law' will be introduced. Understandably an important matter to the Reformers and the early Reformation churches, hence lengthy sections of their documents treat the subject. The Lutheran Formula of Concord (Art. VI, 'Of the Third Use of the Law'),³ sets forth the Lutheran view of the proper service of the law, both for unbelievers and for believers. Calvin's remarks in the Institutes of the Christian Religion are in essential agreement. Any one who considers all Calvin has to say on the subject will know for certain that he proclaims Gospel freedom from the law together with announcement of the importance of knowing God's revealed moral will as set forth in all parts of the Bible. His views are pretty well summarized in Book I, Chapter XI. The Westminster Confession, Chapters XXI, 'Of the Law of God' and Chapter XXII 'Of Christian Liberty, and Liberty of Conscience' (edition of Free Church of Scotland, XIX; XX in Presbyterian Church U.S.A. Edition) are in the main a model of sound doctrine worthy of the attention that many generations of preachers in preparation were asked to apply to it.

In the Scriptures even God Himself requires of Himself that He act in accordance with moral law—which is of course His own holiness, to be defined as His own 'self-affirming purity'.⁴ On this view of what the divine holiness is, there is no problem of supposing that God brings Himself to a standard. Most of the English and literature courses listed on my college transcript were taught by a learned gentleman (Levi Leedy Garber of Ashland College) who was also a debate coach. If someone had proposed the question: Is something right or wrong because God says so, or, does God say so because it is wrong? (medieval scholastics debated this question.)—Professor Garber would have instantly pronounced, 'Not a debatable question'. Of course God has a standard of right and wrong. He Himself is the standard. As a holy God He affirms His own moral purity and His own character defines what 'moral' is. This ancient 'problem' frequently dragged out is a pseudo-problem.

It is helpful, in understanding the relation of law to grace in assessing Christian duties, to be fully aware that there is a rather broad range of reference wherein Scripture speaks of 'law'. This is true of torah, the Old Testament Hebrew word and nomos the Greek word to translate torah in the ancient Greek translation (Septuagint) and consistently in the New Testament.

1. Torah is the moral instruction by parents. Proverbs 1:8 pairs the torah (law) of one parent with the musar (instruction) of the other.
2. It seems to be the whole divine revelation in Psalm 1:2, though perhaps the whole of written Scripture of the time.
3. In John 10:34 Jesus cites Psalm 82:6 as from 'your law' (that is the Bible of 'the Jews', our Old Testament). So the whole Old Testament is 'the law'.
4. Frequently 'the law' is matched with 'the prophets' or 'Psalms' and the Torah of Moses, the Pentateuch (Luke 24:44; cf. Matt. 11:13).

5. Sometimes as in Psalm 19:7 (cf. Ps. 23:3) torah of the Lord seems to be an element in the written Scripture parallel with other elements such as testimony, precepts, commandments and ordinances. In it God brings comfort to the soul. This has overtones of good news not bad news. Let us recall that the same twentieth chapter of Exodus that says God visits the punishment of fathers upon children to the third and fourth generation (Exod. 20:5) adds that He shows mercy unto thousands (Exod. 20:6). Among David's terms for elements in the law in Psalm 19:7–9, 'commandments' is not a comprehensive term for the whole either of the Pentateuch or the whole of the Old Testament.

6. In some cases in the New Testament 'the law' designates the ritual-ceremonial code (Heb. 10:1) embedded in the last four books of the Pentateuch.

7. Both Jesus and the writers of the Epistles frequently are thinking of the Ten Commandments as 'the Law', elaborated by the prophets (Matt. 22:36–40). Jesus says the decalogue may be summarized as duty to love God (the first four 'words') and duty to love man—one's 'neighbor' (the last six 'words'). When Paul says: 'therefore love is the fulfilling of the law' he specified love of God and love of neighbor and is referring specifically to the decalogue (Rom. 13:8–10).

The foregoing show that in some important sense 'the law' of God has relevance to Christian life 'under grace' as Paul characterizes the relation, even if 'we are not under law' (Rom. 6:15). Let us conclude that (1) the Christian has no covenant obligation to any part of the particular legislation laid down by Moses for the conduct both of national-religious and personal life such as Israel had, but (2) as 'training in righteousness' the whole of Old Testament Scripture remains both for us and to us. Whatever it reveals of God's will for men in general and believers in particular gives light to our path (Ps. 119:105) today, the same as it did when the unknown author of Psalm 119 sang 176 verses of praise to 'the law of the Lord ... testimonies ... commands ... precepts ... statutes ... judgments ... [God's] word ... ordinances' and asked the Lord, 'Open my eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of your law' (Ps. 119:18).

The Reformation discovered only three 'uses of the Law'. Robert Dabney, whose profound knowledge and practical wisdom enlightened Presbyterians of the American South during their most troubled years of the nineteenth century found five. God, he said, 'cannot but reveal Himself as He is. ... These precepts are the inevitable expression of a will guided by immutable perfections. It is therefore impossible that any dispensation, of whatever mercy or grace, could have the effect of abrogating righteous obligation over God's saints'.⁵ His five points are:

First, the law must, under every dispensation, be the authoritative declaration of God's character. Second, the law convicts us of our need of Christ. Third, 'The great end, the believer's sanctification, can only be attained by giving him a holy rule of conduct.' Fourth, as published today, 'its precepts' 'instruct conscience' 'even of the unrenewed' and thus 'lay a foundation for a wholesome civil society'. Fifth, 'The publication of the Law is preparatory for that use which God will make of it in the Judgement Day ... preparing to close the mouths of the disobedient in that day.'⁶

III. An 'Age of Grace'?

Is it legitimate and truly wholesome, in spite of the presence of both 'law and gospel' in both Testaments, to speak of the present age as 'the age of grace'? By all means, yes. Let us organize our reasons why, around a most pertinent text, Titus 2:11. 'For the grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation for all people'.

The actual 'appearance' of the grace of God had been long in coming. Grace began to operate when the God of our first parents spared them after their first sin in Eden. Both of them deserved to die, and except for the plan in the mind of God for the appearance of His grace they would have died. Later God gave a law through Moses to test and prove that grace is the only possible method of human salvation. Finally, when the grace of God came, thousands of years of human history had passed by.

The time of the 'appearance' of God's grace is no mystery. It appeared with the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. John tells us this:

And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we have seen his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father, full of grace and truth... And from his fullness we have all received, grace upon grace. For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ (John 1:14–17).

Paul is even more specific that grace was first made fully manifest in the coming of Jesus Christ. He refers to God 'who saved us and called us to a holy calling, not because of our works but because of his own purpose and grace, which he gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began, and which now has been manifested through the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus' (2 Tim. 1:9, 10).

Of course the grace of God existed and operated long before the birth of Jesus. Grace has always been the only method devised by God for the salvation of undeserving sinners. But—and this is the chief significance of the texts of Scripture just quoted—grace never became most prominent as God's method of dealing with sinners until Jesus came. The paramount facts about God, known to the people with whom God had evident dealings in those ancient days were His holiness, His wrath on sin and the righteousness of His law. Witness the forty years of wandering, the slaughter of Midianites and Canaanites and seventy years of captivity. Grace is not mentioned 'by name' in the Bible till in connection with Noah at the end of the first great epoch of human history. That the Old Testament saints, however, were fully aware of the grace of their God is evident both in their poetry (Pss. 32, 51, 130, 136) and their Prophets (the book of Hosea, for example). Nevertheless, the Old Testament narrative is in some respects a very grim tale and ends on a very discouraging note. See Nehemiah 13:23–31, perhaps later in time of completion than the last chapter of Malachi.

But everything about the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ manifests the grace of God. Grace with mercy and love are present in every incident connected with the coming of the Son of Man. God's grace is in the plan of the incarnation of the Son. The apostle Peter states that before the world was made, it was foreordained that the Son of God should become the 'Lamb of God' slain for the sins of the world (1 Peter 1:18–20).

Grace was always present in the teaching of Jesus. A prodigal insulted his father's generosity and concern by demanding his inheritance. After the granting of the wicked request and his turning a deaf ear to the father's importunate pleading he left home. In the city he squandered his money on 'wine and revelry'—devouring (as his brother said) his father's living with prostitutes—till at length he found himself penniless, hungry, sick and alone. In misery he repented and returned to his father's house. Upon his approach the gracious father ran down the road to meet him, kissed him, and restored him to a position of respect in the home. Jesus said that heaven is like that father—always rejoicing to receive a repentant sinner back home. A wicked publican (tax collector) truly repentant, 'beat his breast saying, God, be merciful to me, a sinner'. Jesus said, 'I tell you, this man went down to his house justified'. An adulterous woman, taken in the very act of the scarlet sin, was told by Jesus to 'go and sin no more'. Again, Jesus said, 'the Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost' (Luke 19:10, emphasis added). Truly grace was always prominent in the teaching of Jesus.

The grace of God was likewise paramount in the life of Jesus. If ever there was a nation that deserved the holy fire of the wrath of God it was the Israel of Jesus' day. They were thieving, murderous, stiff-necked, willful and mean. In the city of Jerusalem there lived the worst of them all, and in that city, their capital, He was to be falsely accused and condemned to die. Yet, 'when he saw the crowds, he had compassion on them, because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd'. And, when He looked on Jerusalem, He wept over the city because He foresaw the fierce judgments about to break upon it. The grace of God was, indeed, prominent in the life of Jesus.

It is one thing to teach grace as a doctrine; it is quite another to live graciously! We have all known some people who have gone so far as to make a hobby of the doctrine of grace—not always presenting it in balance with some other facts of biblical truth. People of this type sometimes, however, are quite ungracious in their dealings with others, even with others who agree with them in their special doctrines. It is a fine thing to teach that God saves men freely in spite of their merit of condemnation; it is even nobler to treat other sinners as God treats them—with compassion and grace.

To behold the crowning manifestation of the grace of God for sinners, of course, one should look neither at Christ's birth, teachings, nor life, but rather at His death. 'Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!' (John 1:29). Remember that grace is God's favor to men in spite of their meriting His disfavor. At Calvary is seen the sin of mankind, placed on the spotless Son of God. There, in the midst of the supernatural darkness of the day, when even nature seemed to turn her face from the horrid spectacle (darkness for several hours), is seen the full measure of the wrath of God which sinners deserve to bear throughout eternity, future in a fearful hell, exhausted upon the sinless Son of God. 'For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God' (2 Cor. 5:21).

This is at least part of what is meant in the sayings that 'the grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation' (Titus 2:11). 'The Law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.'

Oh, the love that drew salvation's plan!

Oh, the grace that brought it down to man!

Oh, the mighty gulf that God did span at Calvary!

We saw earlier in the discussion of the Fall of Man and the Doctrine of Sin that human nature in its entirety was ‘vitiating’ or corrupted by the Fall. Not only did the Fall affect the body, leading to physical death, but the soul, including our rational (thinking) and moral (conscience) powers was tainted. As Chrysostom wrote in comment on 2 Corinthians 2:14, we are not able to think in a fully correct way about common matters, much less the ‘things of the Spirit of God’. This outlook is expressed in the order of salvation (ordo salutis). God must not only provide salvation but cause one (any one who believes) to desire to be saved. God is initiator. It starts with the effective call with which, as Jesus said, the Father brings us to Christ. Thus grace—unmerited favour—is necessary at the start. Otherwise nothing would start.

IV. Grace in Roman Catholic Theology

Roman Catholic theology also holds to salvation by grace, but not by grace alone, and it does not conceive of grace in the same way evangelical (i.e. Protestant) theology does. This is why earliest ‘Protestants’ called themselves evangelicals. In Roman theology: 1) the grace of God does enable sinners to repent and believe but not ‘mere’ grace as the Reformers understood Paul to mean; 2) grace does not impart salvation to believing sinners but divine grace (acknowledged to be unmerited favor of God) enables believing sinners to merit salvation available only because of the infinite merit of the redemption wrought by Christ. This grace is mixed with merit in this system. The Decree on Justification of the Council of Trent, Session VI adds human merit to the merit of Christ in achieving personal salvation.⁷ Justification is said to be a growing process of gaining merit by the assistance of grace. Canon 24 on justification says:

If anyone shall say, that justice [Justification] received is not preserved and also not increased in the sight of God through good works but that those same works are only the fruits and signs of justification received, but not a cause of its increase let him be anathema.⁸

Canon 1., transposed to an affirmative form, this statement says divine grace is a process in which good works (not grace) increase the amount of justification.⁹ Grace is involved as enablement to gain merit for final justification.

In Roman theology grace is infused into us to enable us, if we use it rightly, to merit salvation. The Reformers heartily rejected this common perception as utterly unscriptural and the Council of Trent, while it tried to find a place for grace, only exacerbated the differences from evangelical doctrine.

Throughout Roman theology of salvation it is assumed that in the Fall, though Adam lost the gift of ‘likeness’ of God, given subsequent to creation in the divine ‘image’,¹⁰ the rational powers and moral capacity—including undiminished freedom of the will—are intact and unimpaired. Freedom of the will in Tridentine dogma means freedom unspoiled by sin. We have the same power to choose either good or evil that Adam had before the Fall.

Rome sees how important this view of the Fall is to its system. Therefore at every point in its system, original righteousness in our first parents (i.e. moral likeness to God) is defended as a supernaturally added gift and as such (‘in our likeness’) could be forfeited and was withdrawn when

Adam disobeyed. Man's natural mental powers (including free will, uncorrupted as such) remain in full integrity. To see how Rome insists on this, it is enough to read how Rome treated those who, like Cornelius Jansen (d. 1638), denied it, or to examine Ludwig Ott (Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma) and the anathemas of The Council of Trent.¹¹ The Catholic Encyclopedia places Jansenism along with Protestant doctrine in the category of heterodox doctrine.¹²

Yet Rome seems to think grace has something to do with bringing the sinner to faith in Christ. This is said not to be mere sufficient grace—which everyone who ever lived has—but efficient grace. If I understand the complicated explanations (and I have consulted Aquinas, the Canons and Decrees of more than one Council, and the deliverances of popes) of what is sufficient grace for everyone, in the case of the 'elect' it is also efficient grace. After all, Romanists know and cite the same Scripture passages Calvinists quote. This is a different route to about the same results Arminians and some Wesleyans attain. Arminians found restoration of power to come to Christ in divine fairness; the Wesleyans in divine grace achieved by the atonement. They all three essentially say God helps but the choosing power as well as duty is rooted in what we all are by a grace (infused) which everyone has in equal amounts. In each case grace and human 'free' will are said to co-operate in coming to faith. Luther condemned this view, Melancthon adopted it, though waveringly—and history named it synergism.

Rome, in fact, has a very elaborate accounting for grace in its system—much of it derived from the university scholars of late medieval times. This was the scholasticism so fiercely rejected by all the Reformers.

J. Pohle, author of an extensive article on grace in Rome's theology says grace is 'the pillar on which the majestic edifice [!] of Christianity rests in its entirety'.¹³ In the course of his exceedingly closely reasoned article, reference is made to actual grace, sanctifying grace, healing grace, illuminating grace, mediate grace, strengthening grace or the grace of inspiration. Pairs of graces are brought forward with a flurry of distinctions regarding how grace is related to free will. Preventing grace is said to precede 'the free determination of the will' and co-operating grace to follow it. The Thomists have efficient grace succeed in leading to faith because of God's infallible prescience or foreknowledge. This lame explanation of election and foreknowledge was rejected by predestinarian Jansenists. And there is dogma concerning 'the state of nature' and 'the state of grace'.

I recite these (and there are more) distinctions about grace not to clarify what one should believe but to show how complicated the task is for a system to affirm grace as unmerited favor while at the same time holding that, though saved by grace, one must also merit salvation: that though the merits of Christ are the ground of faith, one must also build a treasury of his own merits as well. Rome wishes to have it both ways. Hence, in the preaching of some (at least some of the time), salvation is wholly by grace through faith on the ground of redemption (Christ's merit) while others preach and their hearers (sadly) believe little differently from a pious Muslim as to the relation of works of merit to eternal salvation. In Rome's theology salvation is not mediated to sinners by a message but by efficacious ceremonies called sacraments, baptism as a minimum. This, however, may not literally always be the case, for, says Rome, if one should desire to have the benefit of the sacrament there is a 'baptism of desire'—no priest, no water, only earnest desire.¹⁴

Roman Catholic theologians, however, have not given uniform support to official dogmas of ‘infused’ grace. In Reformation and immediate post-Reformation times there were reversions to the voices of earlier pre-Reformation evangelical preachers: Jan Huss (1369–1415) martyred for his views of faith and grace, for example, Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), and Hugh of St Victor (d. 1140). All three lived in times when, if one did not attract too much attention, there was considerable liberty of doctrinal expression, especially in preaching. But after the Council of Trent (1545–1563) and following the invigoration achieved by the Inquisition there was more insistence on toeing the line. Grace therefore—always in salvation only as a partner of good works in salvation—was (and remains) a problem for the Roman Church.

At this point a discussion of Jansenism, Molinism, the flight from Augustinian, Thomism and the post-Reformation Roman Catholic Councils would be appropriate but difficult to achieve without writing a small book. Louis Berkhof’s summary of ‘The Doctrine of Grace in the Church’, though in general terms, is accurate and helpful.¹⁵ To see the Roman Catholic view from its own side, see Ludwig Ott, ‘Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma’ on ‘The Mystery of Predestination’ and the index to the same on Molinism and Jansenism.¹⁶

V. Grace in the Theology of Dispensationalism

That system of evangelical theology known as dispensationalism provided the atmosphere in which many older American evangelical pastors and professors took their first steps in theology—an inconsistency not worked out of the system related to how law is related to grace. Professor Alva J. McClain, a moderate dispensationalist, was also a thoroughgoing Calvinist in soteriology. In one of his lectures I once heard him say of his friend Louis Sperry Chafer’s writings: ‘Some of the things Chafer has written almost seem to say Old Testament people were saved by keeping the Law.’ Then he added that Chafer couldn’t possibly mean it. McClain was referring, I feel sure, to the following from Chafer’s Major Bible Themes (1927) written before the latter’s multi-volumed Systematic Theology. Chafer is expounding ‘The Biblical Meaning of the Word Grace’:

This word, which in salvation truth has but the one meaning of unmerited favour, represents a divine method of dealing with men which has obtained from Adam until the present time, except for the intrusion of the law system which was in force in the time between Moses and Christ [emphasis added].¹⁷

This sentence seems to say from Moses to Christ grace did not save but law-keeping did.

The author follows by interpreting Exodus 19:3–25 as a record of how Israel ‘passed from a grace relationship into a law relationship... God proposed the law to them, but did not impose the law on them ... which law the people accepted’.¹⁸

That Chafer had not yet thought the problem through shows up seventeen lines farther on, on the facing page, where he says what looks to many of his embarrassed successors as a direct contradiction:

God saves sinners by grace, and there is no other way of salvation offered to men... It is also necessary that every obligation be cancelled, and to this end salvation has been made an absolute gift from God.¹⁹

The same incongruity appears in the notes of the Scofield Bible on Exodus 19 and 20. This is not the case in the New Scofield Bible of 1967.

The problem is an aspect of the larger question of the relation of the Old and New Testaments. Scholars who espouse the dispensational scheme of biblical interpretation over recent years have gone divergent, if not quite separate, ways in treating this and related problems.

Darrel L. Bock, who is one of several who call themselves Progressive Dispensationalists, in 1994 identified three and perhaps four varieties of dispensational thought.²⁰ This has splashed over into the larger pool of literature on new forms of ‘Covenant Theology’.²¹ There is much ferment in this area of thought—an area through which I myself passed long ago and was reflected in my books Daniel and the Latter Days, A Greater Commission and The Life of Christ, and several articles read to the Evangelical Theological Society.²²

¹ J. McClintock and J. Strong, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature vol. v. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1968–1970), pp. 283, 284.

² B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1958), pp. 299–348.

³ Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, iii, 6th ed. rev. and enlarged (Baker Book House, 1966), pp. 130–135.

⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 268.

⁵ Robert Dabney, Lectures on Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, repr. 1972), p. 353.

⁶ ibid., pp. 353, 354.

⁷ H. Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St Louis: B. Herder Co., 1957), paras. 792a–810.

⁸ ibid., para. 834.

⁹ ibid., para. 811.

¹⁰ W. G. T. Shedd, ‘Tridentine Theory of Original Sin’, A History of Christian Doctrine (ed. Of 1872 reprinted Minneapolis: Klock & Klock Christian Publ., 1978), pp. 140–149.

¹¹ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, trans. L. P. Lynch (Rockford: TAN Books and Publ., 1974), pp. 106, 224, 240, 246.

Catholic Encyclopedia The Catholic Encyclopedia, An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, 16 volumes

¹² Catholic Encyclopedia: An International Work of Reference on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church vol. vi (New York: Catholic Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), p. 710.

¹³ ibid., p. 689.

¹⁴ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, pp. 311, 313, 314, 356, 114.

¹⁵ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerkmans, 1939, 1979), pp. 428–431.

¹⁶ Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, pp. 242, 243.

¹⁷ L. S. Chafer, Major Bible Themes (Chicago: The Bible Institute Colportage Association, 1927), p. 150.

¹⁸ ibid.

¹⁹ ibid., p. 151.

²⁰ Darrel L. Bock, ‘Charting Dispensationalism’, Christianity Today, 12 Sept. 1994, pp. 26–29.

²¹ The Journal Sounds of Grace (5317 Wye Creek Drive, Frederick, MD), ed. John G. Reisinger, and the volume New Covenant Theology by Tom Wells and Fred G. Zaspel published New Covenant Media at the same address.

²² Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1954, 1977), repr. under The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People by author, 1999); Robert D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1985, repr. 1999 by author); Robert D. Culver, The Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1976), The Earthly Career of Jesus, the Christ (Ross-Shire, Scotland: Mentor/Christian Focus, 2002).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (657). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

5

The Doctrine of Union with Christ

Though ‘nothing is more central or basic than union and communion with Christ’ according to John Murray, it is equally true ‘this mystery of Christ’s union with the devout is by nature incomprehensible’.¹ It is so much so that God ‘shows its figure and image in visible signs best adapted to our small capacity’, according to Calvin.² The importance of this union is clear in plain statements by Jesus such as ‘I am in you and you in me’ and ‘apart from me you can do nothing’. Eating and drinking the emblems of our Lord’s body and blood in the recurring ordinance of the Lord’s Supper brings home the importance of this union to those who observe the ordinance ‘with the understanding also’.

It is not quite correct to describe the union of the believer with Christ as an experience. It is rather a truth to be made known and by faith embraced. As stated by the learned preacher-missionary, L. L. Legters:

When a person begins to apprehend what it means to be united to the Son of God and what he has through this union, he will at once realize that his spiritual growth depends upon a clear understanding of truth rather than an experience.³

That Bernard of Clairvaux preached and wrote of the benefits of this union is cited by Calvin.⁴ Calvin was only one of many Protestant leaders to see the necessity of first knowing this truth, then of reflecting upon it and feeling in our hearts the comfort and power to be drawn from it. (Calvin discusses this union in over fifty paragraphs throughout the Institutes as well as in the Commentaries.)

For these reasons wise theology and fruitful response to the revelation of this ‘mystery, which is Christ in you, the hope of glory’ (Col. 1:27) do not treat it as an ‘intellectual puzzle’ to be explained. Like the mystery of the incarnation (1 Tim. 3:16), and of the church as the body of Christ (Eph. 5:32), we must humbly seek to master as much as scripture makes known about it and apply the same to our lives individually as individual believers (1 Cor. 6:17–20) and corporately (1 Cor. 3:16, 17) as members of His body, the church.

False Notions of the Union

Some utterly false notions about the presence of the divine—whether person or essence—in every person are abroad and imbedded deeply in some religious movements. ‘New Age’-isms bid their hapless seekers to find God within themselves. The same appears in the romantic and nature English poets in greater and lesser degree. William Wordsworth (1770–1850, Poet Laureate), for example, could hold in tension the notion that human mind could be spelled with a capital M, as a name for God’s presence in man, but also ‘Nature’s self, which is the breath of God’, also of human ‘Powers, forever to be hallowed’ along with orthodox faith in God’s ‘pure Word by miracle revealed’.⁵

‘Union with Christ’ in salvation must also be distinguished from the logos doctrine of universal presence of Christ in several theologies ancient and modern; also from the true doctrine of the immanence of God in all His creation. Scripture does say God is immanent in all creation (e.g. Ps. 139:1–10) and ‘In him we live and move and have our being’ (Acts 17:28). There is a divine efficiency that interpenetrates everything in all creation for God ‘works all things in all’ (1 Cor. 12:6 nasb) and Christ is said to ‘fill all in all’ (Eph. 1:23). But the scriptural doctrine that God’s elect are ‘in Christ’ and He in them must be understood as different and special. This is rightly said to be:

a union of life, in which the human spirit, while then most truly possessing its own individuality and personal distinctness is interpenetrated and energized by the Spirit of Christ, is made inscrutably but indissolubly one with him and so becomes a member and partaker of that regenerated, believing, and justified humanity of which he [Christ] is the head.⁶

Identification with Christ or Forensic Union in God's Counsel and in Redemption—to Be Distinguished from Vital, Spiritual Union

We have already noted that every aspect of the application of redemption is by grace and is 'in Christ'. From the standpoint of the eternal counsels of God and appointment of the Father, God 'chose us in him [emphasis added] before the foundation of the world' (Eph. 1:4). Before Jesus came we were already 'in Christ' for his name was to be called Jesus because He would 'save his people from their sins' (Matt. 1:21). From this heavenly point of view, that union is as ancient as eternity past, presently prevails, and, according to Romans 8:11 and 18–25, will never end. Yet as the last quotation above indicates, the union is actually effected together with regeneration and faith. It is in this sense that union with Christ ('The Mystical Union', as some tradition calls it) has a place in ordo salutis.

We may, therefore, correctly affirm that in the broad sense salvation has its origin in union with Christ in the mind of God. We were not elected one by one in isolation either from one another or from the Son of God. Rather, 'he chose us in him [emphasis added] before the foundation of the world' (Eph. 1:4). This union is previous to all else in the 'order of salvation', even to election. Not literally, of course, but in God's reckoning, in the history of procurement of salvation we were present 'with Christ' in His death, burial, resurrection, ascension, exaltation and seated at the right hand of power (Rom. 6:1–11; Eph. 1:7; 2:1–6; Col. 3:3, 4). As John Walvoord suggests, perhaps this relationship is better designated as 'identification with Christ' rather than union with Him.

'Hence', says John Murray:

we may never think of the work of redemption wrought once for all by Christ apart from the union with his people which was effected in the election of the Father before the foundation of the world ... we may never think of redemption in abstraction from the mysterious arrangements of God's love in wisdom and grace by which Christ was united to his people and his people were united to him when he died upon the accursed tree and rose again from the dead.⁷

As elect believers in Christ we have been identified with him at every stage of His redemptive work. We are said to be crucified with Him (Gal. 2:20), we died with Him (Col. 2:20), we were buried with Him (Rom. 6:4), made alive and raised up with Him (Eph. 2:5, 6). Presently we are positionally seated with Him in the heavenlies (Eph. 2:6).

We are ideally and de jure complete in Him, as it is written, 'And ye are complete in him' (Col. 2:10 kjv), defective and immature as de facto we are just now. As I look at myself and those I love with our syndromes of mental and physical defects—especially as for ten years I daily watched a precious wife deteriorate before my eyes, yet beholding her wavering but unfailing trust in God, I tried each day to see her as God presently beholds and shall bring to pass when we behold one another in the resurrection of the last day and the Marriage Supper of the Lamb for which the bride shall have made herself ready.

The Effected Union of Believers with Christ

Now as to inception of the relationship, the actual union with Christ occurs in the history of each believer. Exactly when is known to God but not necessarily in each case to us. The hymn writers have it right. There is a moment, however, when ‘silently how silently the wondrous gift is given, when God imparts to human hearts’ the gift of life ‘in Christ’. ‘I once was lost but now am found, was blind but now I see.’ Believers are reminded that even though ‘he chose us in him [emphasis added] before the foundation of the world’ (Eph. 1:4), as Paul wrote, the same people were once ‘dead in the trespasses and sins’ (Eph. 2:1). ‘But God ... even when we were dead in trespasses, made us alive together with Christ [emphasis added] (by grace you have been saved)’ (Eph. 2:4, 5 kjv). This happened in God’s time. In another Epistle Paul points out that ‘God is faithful, by whom you were called into the fellowship [emphasis added] of his Son’ (1 Cor. 1:9). This call is more than an invitation, rather a summons, like the Lord’s ‘cry of command’, the archangel’s ‘voice’ and ‘the trumpet of God’ on the day of our future resurrection (1 Thess. 4:16). It brings the one ‘dead in the trespasses and sins’ to life. Jesus spoke of this spiritual call and resurrection in John 5:24, 25, connecting this event with hearing the Word, believing it and passing from death to life.

From our human point of view—another point of view also to be found in Scripture—the call of God is an invitation like the one in Revelation 22:17, ‘let the one who desires take the water of life without price’ or Isaiah 55:1, ‘Come, everyone who thirsts, come to the waters ... without money’, etc. John the ‘Revelator’s’ version of the invitation appears to paraphrase Isaiah’s. Many of us are familiar with the ‘invitation hymn’ and moments for ‘decision’ at the end of church services and evangelistic meetings. Many ‘come to Jesus’ in such a setting. Yet in whatever setting one comes, upon reflection guided by Scripture, one must know he or she was brought to Jesus, even though the mind moved the legs to respond to the call to ‘come forward’ or perhaps to apply for Christian baptism.

How Is the Union Effected

The union is effected wholly by the Holy Spirit—One who is also called ‘the Spirit of Christ’ (Rom. 8:9). Similarly, ‘Whoever abides in the teaching has both the Father and the Son’ (2 John 9; cf. John 10:38). Therefore, though in some mysterious sense the members of the Godhead cannot be separated, in another sense they must be distinguished as to peculiar office. Throughout the Gospels and the first chapter of Acts the ‘coming’ of the Spirit is a promise. John 7:37–39 brings this into clear focus: ‘... Now this he said about the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were to receive, for as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified’. That complete glorification was future still when the risen Jesus last appeared to the disciples. They were promised, however, it would not be ‘many days from now’ (Acts 1:5). During His last evening before crucifixion, Jesus spoke at length of this future event.

Let us not confuse the clear teaching by supposing some single covenant of which Old Testament and New Testament are only two administrations. He plainly said that as believers, before the closing events of His life on earth, the Spirit had already been ‘with [emphasis added] you’ but when He should come the Spirit ‘shall be in [emphasis added] you’ (John 14:17).⁸ Further, it was necessary for Jesus to leave as to His personally incarnate self, otherwise the Old Testament stage of revelation and salvation history would remain in effect. He who had always been with His people and already 'dwells with you' (John 14:17) by the special coming of the Holy Spirit would not come in this way until the incarnate Son should depart for heaven. Here are Jesus' words: 'I will come to you' Jesus said (John 14:18). But it would be a 'spiritual coming' for He had just said: 'Nevertheless ... it is to your advantage that I go away, for if I do not go away, the Helper will not come to you. But if I go, I will send him to you' (John 16:7). The event of Pentecost was a scheduled, epochal, 'dispensational' event. The relation of believers then living and of all future believers was changed and improved. Together with the events of the previous fifty days it was and remains the hinge of salvation history.

The gift of the Spirit to the redeemed was quite as essential to the plan of redemption as the gift of the Son, as N. B. Harrison said:

[T]he two gifts are likened to the unfolding of the Father's plan. Of the Son it is said, 'When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son ... to redeem ... that we might have the adoption of sons' (Gal. 4:4, 5). And when He had accomplished redemption, and men could be brought as sons into his family, then [and only then, not before] 'God sent forth the Spirit of his Son' (Gal. 4:6) to make this an experimental reality.⁹

Near the end of that momentous day Peter publicly explained the amazing event by tracing it to the fact that Jesus, of whose death they were the cause and whose resurrection was well known had been 'by the right hand of God exalted' (Acts 2:33 kjv), had just now that very day 'poured out this that you yourselves are seeing and hearing' (Acts 2:33).

The Nature of the Individual Believer's Union with Christ

There is nothing spectacular about initiation of this union. There is no shaking of the house or mighty wind. Though sometimes there is great inward commotion, more often there is an immense tranquillity, both of mind and body. This leads us to consider what Scripture has to say about the nature of the union. In what does it consist and with what consequences?

It Is a Spiritual Union

Spiritual (a) in the Pauline sense, constituted and controlled by the Holy Spirit; (b) as opposed to physical or natural; (c) as opposed to a moral union of love or sympathy; (d) as opposed to union of essence; or (e) as opposed to sacramental union as held by Roman Catholic dogma and some Lutherans. Let us consider each of these points briefly.

a) The Pauline sense. Paul said, 'You, however, are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if in fact the Spirit of God dwells in you' and 'Anyone who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him' (Rom. 8:9). Also, in Ephesians 3:16 Paul affirms that we receive strength 'with power through his Spirit in your inner being' and in verse 17, 'that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith'. So as the 'spiritual body' of the resurrection is a body of flesh and bone empowered and directed by God's Spirit, a 'spiritual' person is one so directed and controlled by the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:13, 15, 16; see also 1 Cor. 12:13; 1 John 3:24; 4:13). A spiritual union is a union of the believer's spirit with Christ in virtue of the indwelling Spirit of Christ.

b) It is not that natural creaturely connection every human being has with the Creator by virtue of each being God's creation and object of preservation and providence. People everywhere are vaguely aware of this concursum inasmuch as Paul spoke of this as already known to the pagan Greeks at Athens—'In him we live and move and have our being as even some of your own poets have said' (Acts 17:28, 29), 'in him all things hold together' (Col. 1:17).

c) It is not a natural union such as various philosophers propose. In the view of G. W. Hegel (1770–1831): 'Spirit ... signifies not a metaphysical ghost, but that totality which is realized in each individual thing.'¹⁰ In several varieties of personalism from the logos philosophy of Heraclitus (480–410 bc), Anaxagoras (500–430 bc) and Protagoras (480–410 bc) the 'reason' or logos in each of us is a fragment of the divine logos (reason, word, logic, mind) which permeates every man—on to Rudolph Lotze (1808–1881) for whom the universe is a connected whole, by individual miracles, with the Monad.

d) It is not a union of mere sympathy, common love or loyalty, such a unity as the first believers of Jerusalem are said to have had: '[T]he company of those who believed were of one heart and soul ... they had everything in common' (Acts 4:32). Nor is it like the union of soldiers who go through a long series of battles together, a nation that unites against some common enemy, such as the British displayed in World War II. The unity of believers in Christ in the Upper Room discourse is of a far deeper sort, illustrated (not identical with) by the inter-participation of the Father and the Son: 'That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me ... that they also may be one in us' (John 17:21 kjv).

e) Nor is it a union of essence or substance. There is a streak of this false doctrine in Eastern Orthodoxy whereby the mystical tendency in oriental (i.e. Eastern) thought grasps the phrase 'partakers of the divine nature' (2 Peter 1:4) and develops out of it an ascetic, mystical theology. Salvation reaches climax, it is said, in enosis (union) with God or theosis (deification).

In the context of 2 Peter 1:4 the ascent of the soul is not mystical but practical and ethical, from root in faith developing through virtue, knowledge, temperance, endurance, godliness and brotherly kindness to love (1 Peter 1:5–7). The 'partaking of the divine nature' issues from 'God's precious and very great promises' (2 Peter 1:4). The purpose of the promises, says Peter, is for us to have 'escaped from the corruption that is in the world because of sinful desire' (2 Peter 1:4). The 'promise' relates not to a 'beatific vision' as climax to a life of moral and spiritual effort or self-denial but to the experience of the new birth, viz.: 'if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation' (2 Cor. 5:17); 'we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus' (Eph. 2:10). Though there is a 'mystical union' and some speak correctly of 'identification with Christ' in His death, burial, resurrection, etc., meaning a forensic union, yet as L. Berkhof warns, it is a 'dangerous error' to assert it is 'a union of essence, in which the personality of the one is simply merged into that of the other'.¹¹ The union Jesus described in John 14:23, 'we [the Son and the Father] will come to him and make our home with him', is entirely beyond our ability to explain—like all supernatural events.

The ascent is not to the solitary beatific vision of asceticism but to love of both man and God as a climax to growth in the company of other people. Nor is it a sacramental union, wherein by an ecclesiastical ceremony such as baptism or by consuming the emblems of our Lord's body and blood, faithful believers receive direct spiritual nourishment from the real presence of Christ's body and blood, whether in or with the elements (some Lutheran doctrine) or their real presence by mystic transformation of the elements (as in Roman Catholic doctrine). Both theories lack the support of Scripture and contradict the fact that the physical body of Christ is in heaven, where His local physical presence shall remain, as Peter said, ‘until the time for restoring all the things about which God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets’ (Acts 3:21).

It Is a Supernatural or Mystical union—If Properly Defined¹²

We relate the idea of mystical to the word mystery in the New Testament, not to mysticism. ‘Mystical’ is shorthand for something which ‘no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man imagined ... revealed to us through the Spirit’ (1 Cor. 2:9, 10). The specific scriptural basis usually cited is Colossians 1:24–29. Parallel texts in two of Paul’s other letters (Eph. 3:1–10 and Rom. 16:25–26) should be read with the Colossians text. The mystery in each of the three passages has to do with something unknown in former ages—that sometime in the future (the present age) Jews and Gentiles would be undifferentiated as members of one body and that therefore a mission was mounted to let all the peoples of the whole world know about it. Hence ‘Christ in you’ (Jews and Gentiles individually as saved persons and collectively as the church or body of Christ) is the mysterious (till now) union.¹³ L. Berkhof modifies this explanation: ‘Subjectively the union between Christ and believers is effected by the Holy Spirit in a mysterious and supernatural way, and for that reason is generally designated as the unio mystica or mystical union.’¹⁴ A. H. Strong prefers to call it ‘an inscrutable union’, cautioning, ‘If we call it mystical at all it should be only because, in the intimacy of its communion and in the transforming power of its influence, it surpasses any other union of souls we know, and so cannot be fully described or understood by earthly analogies.’¹⁵

The mystery of this union of the believer individually and of the church collectively—both the living and the dead—has some of the same indescribable mystery about it as the union of Father and Son in the Trinitarian relationship. I well remember my own puzzlement when I first heard the doctrine preached as a young adult. The preacher was no less than L. L. Legters one of the founders of what became Wycliffe Translators and the related enterprises now putting the Bible in dozens of languages around the world. He dragged a large leafy grapevine to the pulpit, tried to tear it apart and could not, explaining the unique intertwining of branches with the main stock. Then turning to John 17 (the union of Father and Son) and John 15 (the Parable of the Vine and Branches) he drew the lesson: ‘Without me you can do nothing’ (John 15:5).

Yet neither Legters or any other theologian can explain this union¹⁶ In addition to these two analogies Scripture also compares the union to that of the holy temple of God. Believers are the stones of which it is built; Jesus Himself is ‘the chief corner stone’; ‘apostles and prophets’ were its foundation and God Himself its resident (Eph. 2:20–22; 1 Peter 2:4, 5). The union is like the connection of a body of many members with its head (1 Cor. 12:2) and like that of husband and wife who are ‘one flesh’ (Rom. 7:4; Eph. 5:22–33).

Yet, as must be acknowledged by all, we only know by biblical revelation that the union exists; it is true for me only as I believe. Yet like all truth partaking of heaven and God, ‘though now we see him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable’.

James Montgomery Boice commented on these illustrations as follows:

In each of these cases the central idea is the same: permanence. Because Jesus is the foundation and is without change, all that is built upon him will be permanent also. Those who are Christ's will not perish but will endure to the end.¹⁷

Because of the danger of being understood in the context of ascetic mysticism, the term 'mystical union' should not be used, I think, unless with careful explanation. I have introduced the 'mystical' only to inform the reader how, when the term is met in discourse, one should understand the term. For us it has none of the connotation found in asceticism and mysticism as an approach to salvation.

It Is a Vital Union

That is another way of saying it is an organic union. One member of such a living body has organic, that is, reciprocal, relation to every other member-organ as well as to the whole. 'God gave us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. Whoever has the Son has life' (1 John 5:11, 12). In Christ's body one is not a replaceable part but of the essence, not merely juxtaposed to one another with Christ the chief engineer and architect. Christ works 'on' us from within, as the lifeblood, so to speak, of each of our spirits. We have 'come to fulness of life in him' (Col. 2:10 rsv).

It Is a Complete Union

This union is a complete union of the believer's whole being, body and soul, with his Lord. When the Spirit of God indwells me He dwells in all of me. This truth is the basis of one of Paul's most earnest exhortations. Many of the Corinthian believers had each harmed himself (not the church, per se)—as in our time, the loose mores of the ambient heathenism had found answer in the lusts of the flesh with the result of fornication (sexual immorality) in more than one Corinthian Christian. Paul addressed forty-eight verses in the heart of the first Epistle to this problem and brought forth this: 'Every other sin that a man can commit is outside the body; but the fornicator sins against his own body. Do you not know that your body is a shrine of the indwelling Holy Spirit, and the Spirit is God's gift to you? You do not belong to yourselves; you were bought with a price. Then honour God in your body' (1 Cor. 6:18–20 neb). Earlier it is said, 'Your bodies are limbs and organs of Christ' (1 Cor. 6:15 neb). Theft or murder or covetousness, etc. as the text says, of course, are pollutions of the spirit of man but have no debilitating effect or pollution of the body, but one can be a virgin only once. Unlawful sexual intercourse takes away unsullied purity of another sort forever—forgivable, but not restorable from the human side. David became an adulterer and then a forgiven one, and history has never forgotten the fact. Therefore the union of Christ with all of me or of you is a strong restraint against fornicating. The text of 1 Corinthians 6 provides much more of both comfort and threat for our age of the church.

The Union Is Permanent

It remains to be said that the union is permanent. The union of the Corinthian fornicator with a temple prostitute did not end his union with Christ any more than Peter's thrice denial of Christ ended his ties to the Lord. He showed up at the Upper Room on Easter evening with the other Ten. Judas had no spiritual connection and ended up in the city dump and incinerator.

There is, by the Spirit of Christ, a permanent connection with the One who ‘lives and reigns’ above, whose life is both with us and in us. As a result, Paul argues, ‘[I]f, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled [He holds nothing against us] shall we be saved by his life’ (en tē dzōē autou) (Rom. 5:10 asv marg.). The argument is from the greater to the less: Before we came to Christ—long before—He died for us. It stands to reason, therefore, that now alive and able, He will rescue us again and again from our sins and backslidings. For, ‘[I]f anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous’ (1 John 2:1).

It seems just to argue that we should give our bodies good care while we live and when we die our bodies should be interred in the ground (not cremated as in Roman custom) in something of the dignified posture of sleep. For there is no clear evidence the Holy Spirit resigns His residence in our bodies even in death. The Christian outlook is that the deceased Christian still sleeps ‘in Jesus’ (1 Thess. 4:14 kjv). The ‘dead in Christ’ (1 Thess. 4:16) shall rise. The believers in the Christian cemetery at Salonica of old, says the Bible, are ‘asleep’; they are ‘the dead in Christ’ and they ‘sleep in Jesus’. Christians through the ages have usually adjusted whatever funerary practice of their ancestors to these comforting facts and have interred their dead bodies, as the Jews before them, in the posture of sleep awaiting the shout, trumpet of God (1 Thess. 4:16) and the voice of the archangel on the resurrection morning.

Let this chapter end with a singular benefit of the believer’s union with Christ.

All self-effort toward transformation of character is futile. The vile pictures hung upon the walls of memory by indulgence in illicit imaginations, in obscenity, in habits of profligacy; the remorse that lingers from animosities, jealousies, ugly self-seekings—how have men sought in vain to purge their souls of these! How many suicides tell the tale of hopeless effort to be free from their relentless lashings. No, it is only the Holy Spirit of God who, coming into the life, can impart purity of mind and holiness of heart, where sin had wrought its havoc. To set sin’s captives free—this He has power to do; this He delights to do.¹⁸

¹ John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1955), p. 161.

² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion iv, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), art. 17.1

³ L. L. Legters, one of the founders of the Wycliffe Translation Mission, Union With Christ (Philadelphia, PA: Pioneer Mission Agency—forerunner of Wycliffe Translators, 1933).

⁴ Calvin, Institutes iii, 2.25.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

⁵ Wordsworth, The Prelude, Book v. line 45; lines 17, 221, 222.

⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 795.

⁷ John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied, p. 162, 163.

⁸ There is some textual evidence that ‘shall be’ (estai) should be ‘is’ (esti). Bruce Metzger, A Textual Commentary on The Greek New Testament (New York: United Bible Societies, 1975), p. 295, states: ‘A majority of the Committee interpreted the sense of the passage as requiring the future estai, which is adequately supported ...’ Authorities still are not in full agreement.

⁹ Norman B. Harrison, His Indwelling Presence (Chicago: Moody Press, 1928), page number lost.

¹⁰ ‘Philosophy of Hegelianism’, in Twentieth Century Philosophy, ed. D. D. Runes (New York: Philosophical Library, 1943), p. 168.

¹¹ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1938, 1979), p. 401.

¹² There is a long history of the notion of mystical union with God or Christ supposed to be superior to the union with Christ which all believers have. For a start, read D. D. Martins short article ‘Unio Mystica’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984, 1991), p. 1126.

¹³ The above explanation of appropriation of the term ‘mysterical’ in this connection agrees with John Murray’s thoughts (Redemption Accomplished and Applied, p. 166 ff.).

¹⁴ Berkhof, Systematic Theology, p. 447.

¹⁵ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 801.

¹⁶ Legters, Union With Christ, chap. v. ‘Scriptural Illustrations of Our Union’.

¹⁷ James M. Boice, Foundations of the Christian Faith (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1986), p. 395, commenting on ‘The Mystery of the Union’.

¹⁸ Harrison, Indwelling Presence, p. 22.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (664). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

The Doctrine of Election

Let us make clear at the outset that the doctrine designated ‘election’ is of persons to salvation rather than, as certain writers would incline us to believe, of groups (Israel, for example) to the privilege, if desired, of being saved, or of people in general to hell or to heaven.

First consideration is now directed to a sort of ‘neutral’ statement and evaluation—not from traditional enemies of the doctrine nor from controversial advocates, but from the venerable ‘Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion’, published by the Church of England Convocation of 1562 but resting on Archbishop Cranmer’s Articles of 1549. Minor changes were made up to 1571. ‘Since 1571 no change whatever has been made in the text of the thirty-nine articles.’¹ Leading Reformers, refugees from the Continent, influenced their formulation—John Lasko, Martin Bucer, Peter Martyr, as well as the writings of Luther, Melancthon, Calvin and others. These articles, the basic creed of the Church of England, were published nearly a century before the Calvinistic creeds usually cited in English speaking lands such as the Westminster Confession of the Puritan Revolution in Britain and earlier than the Savoy Declaration of Congregationalists in England (1658) and the several Baptist and Congregational confessions of Colonial American Baptists, Congregationalists and Reformed, all Augustinian-Calvinists and predestinarian.

Article XVII of the Thirty-Nine Articles of 1562, ‘Of Predestination and Election’, consists of three paragraphs. The first really treats both election and calling. I shall here quote only the first half of the article—on election—and reserve the second half for the chapter on calling. The second paragraph treats the values of the doctrine of election and the third offers advice on how to receive the doctrine. I shall quote that later. The source of the following is from Gibson’s volume, pages 459 and 465.

Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) He hath constantly decreed by His counsel secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation as vessels made to honour.

Anglican scholars say, ‘The sources of the article ... are thought to be to some extent in the writings of Luther ... and the language of the last paragraph ... to Melancthon. Still more important ... is it to notice that the description of predestination [in our terms, election] is to a very great extent couched in the language of Holy Scripture ... Rom. 8 and 9 and Eph. 1, and the correspondence is even closer in the Latin than in the English.’²

It will be news to some that all the first line of Reformers—Lutheran, Reformed, Church of England—endorsed a strong doctrine of election. Major controversy about it and rejection by a small segment waited at least two generations after 1517 (Luther’s 95 Theses). It was already a near-universally held Reformation doctrine for nearly a generation before Calvin (who was only about eight years old when Luther sounded the watch cries of the Reformation in 1517) produced the first form of the Institutes in the 1530s.

It will help to remove misconceptions which hinder fair treatment if some care is taken to clarify what the doctrine of election is not and in what context of ideas it is presented in Scripture before addressing ourselves to definition and elaboration.

Election is strictly a salvational (soteriological) term. In connection with the doctrine of God and His works, the Bible presents a doctrine of what are styled ‘decrees’. God is presented as in charge of history, planning it, overtaken by no surprises, including man's free choices and what philosophers call contingency. But this, though related, is not the same as the doctrine of election. Further, though 'predestination' sometimes means the same as decrees, sometimes it is used to designate God's purposes regarding fallen men only (whether elect or not); it is only rarely used as applying only to the believing, or elect. Hence, there is a much greater breadth of meaning to 'decree' and 'predestination' as used by theological writers than to 'elect' and 'election'. These two latter terms are used (twenty-one times) in the New Testament as follows:³ Eklegō (to elect), twice of God's choice of the Jewish people (Acts 13:17); of Mary's choice of the 'better part' (Luke 10:42); finally, in the largest number of cases of God's choosing (election) of individuals to everlasting life (John 15:16—perhaps belonging to one of the first category above—1 Cor. 1:27, 28; Eph. 1:4; James 2:5). Eklogē (election) appears only seven times: once of choice to the apostolate (Acts 9:15); once abstractly to 'the election of grace' (Rom. 11:7); but in every other case of God's act of choosing His people to salvation (Rom. 9:11; 11:5, 28; 1 Thess. 1:4; 2 Peter 1:10). A linguistic analysis of related terms could be introduced, but sufficient has been presented to show that 'elect' and 'election' are in the New Testament uniformly used for benign choice. Hence it will always be incorrect biblically speaking to speak of God as 'electing' someone to hell. The Bible simply never says it. To repeat, election is a soteriological term and should be used only in connection with salvation, not with damnation, which is its opposite.

Some further qualifications and cautions will be helpful in resolving problems and irrelevant objections.

a) Election is a revealed truth of Scripture not a philosophically derived notion. Calvin, for example, approached the teaching from Scripture in all writings wherein he discussed it. Election was not a philosophical presupposition of his teachings, not a point of departure in theological formulation, but of arrival in submission to scriptural theological formulation.

b) It is a biblical teaching not a sectarian dogma, for election was in the Bible long before any one made either a 'hobby' or a 'whipping boy' out of it. One is commanded to believe it. Try to understand it without 'yes, but'. Biblical texts which establish the truth will be discussed later.

c) It must not be associated with certain pagan or philosophical notions such as kismet, Islam, karma, Moirra or fate. These notions from several ethnic religions have far different bases and are really antithetical to the doctrine of God's gracious election.

d) An all-wise, gracious, loving, Father-God is the author of election—One more wise, gracious and loving than any human being can hope to be. Some objectors appear to conceive of themselves as more gracious than the God of the Bible. They suppose their own hearts to be more compassionate than the heart of the Father who sent His only Son to die for us while we were yet sinners.

e) In seeking to understand election we must not seek to shave off its troublesome difficulties. Such efforts lead to the same kinds of errors which similar efforts with regard to the Trinity or two natures of Christ always create.

It must be 'swallowed whole'. The Nicene Creed swallows the doctrine of the Trinity 'whole' as the Definition of Chalcedon does the Theanthropic Person of Christ. Unitarians of all sorts are only tearing apart the indivisible.

f) It is misleading and a disservice to the whole counsel of God to make election the ‘spearpoint’ of one’s teaching. Contrary to common opinion, no truly great teacher of the past—certainly neither Augustine or Calvin, who sometimes are falsely so charged—ever did so. True, both wrote somewhat at length about election but only to clarify and defend it scripturally and logically.

It is true that Calvin, who in ignorant secular circles is blamed for imposing fatalism on the city of Geneva and all else he influenced, taught a soteriological doctrine of election. He also drew from Scripture and the logic of election to salvation a doctrine of ‘non-election’, which is about what he meant by anything he said about ‘damnation’ and ‘reprobation’. Actually he recommended acceptance of the ‘mystery of His will’ and no speculation at all about the unrevealed counsels of God. This is the judgment of some of the most careful, comparatively recent, scholarly treatments of Calvin’s life and doctrine. I recommend Wilhelm Niesel’s chapter ‘God’s Eternal Election’ in The Theology of Calvin.⁴ and Francois Wendel, Calvin on ‘Predestination’.⁵ Victor Monod, in a remark quoted by Mitchell Hunter, was precisely correct, in my opinion, in saying that Calvin’s doctrine of election (or predestination) is ‘a point of arrival not of departure’.⁶

Calvin did not begin his system of theology with the doctrine of ‘predestination’. In fact he shunned such a thing. The following lines from the very first paragraphs of Calvin’s formal treatment establish the absence of any centrality of election over other aspects of Christian doctrine. He continues after warnings against undue ‘curiosity’ and leaving ‘no secret to God’:

First, then, let them remember that when they inquire into predestination they are penetrating the sacred precincts of divine wisdom. If anyone with carefree assurance breaks into this place he will not succeed in satisfying his curiosity and he will enter a labyrinth from which he can find no exit. For it is not right for man unrestrainedly to search out things that the Lord has willed to be hid in himself, and to unfold from eternity itself the sublime wisdom, which he would have us revere but not understand that through this he also should fill us with wonder. He has set forth in his Word the secrets of his will that he has decided to reveal to us. These he decided to reveal in so far as he foresaw that they would concern us and benefit us.⁷

The sixty-eight pages on election in the Institutes (III, 21–24) are devoted not to speculation but to scriptural demonstration and answers to objections. Those sixty pages are recommended to all who either wish to learn about the scriptural doctrine or about the real Calvin.

g) Statements of the doctrine must not go to logical extremes to which the biblical texts lend no specific endorsement. Logical extremes have led to affirmation of tritheism instead of the Holy Trinity and dual personality or some other monstrosity rather than our one Lord Jesus’ two natures. The mysteries must be accepted.

h) Election must not be stated or understood in such a way as either to deny complete human responsibility for evil actions or the duty to choose Christ, nor in such a way as to empty the biblical warnings of their force.

i) It bears repetition: election is first, last and always, in Scripture, a soteriological term.

Statement of the Doctrine

The seventeenth article of the Church of England's Articles has already been given. I defer to a Lutheran at this point:

Election is the eternal act of God with respect to all who are saved, by which, out of pure grace and for Christ's sake He purposed to endow them in time with the spiritual blessings of conversion, justification, sanctification, and preservation unto eternal life.⁸

Mueller adds: 'This definition embraces all divine truths which Scripture presents in connection with the doctrine of eternal election', and so it does. Note he makes of it entirely a soteriological doctrine.

The Biblical Evidence

1. First there are direct categorical statements. Let us quote several with brief comments and give references for others. 'God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth' (2 Thess. 2:13 kjv). '[H]e chose us in him before the foundation of the world ... having been predestined according to the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will' (Eph. 1:4, 11, see context). 'And when the Gentiles heard this, they began rejoicing and glorifying the word of the Lord, and as many as were appointed to eternal life believed' (Acts 13:48). There have been objections raised to the relevance of these clear statements, but they still boldly stand there, saying clearly that each believer was elect ... chosen ... predestined in eternity past.

Romans 8:28–30 identifies in a single exclusive group 1) those who 'love God', 2) 'the called', 3) those God foreknew, 4) predestined, 5) sanctified, 6) justified, 7) glorified. There is a single circle, so to speak.

Some would create a situation that Paul here specifically rejects.

2. Among other texts directly teaching this doctrine are 2 Timothy 1:9, ‘who saved us and called us to a holy calling, not because of our works but because of his own purpose and grace, which he gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began’, and 1 Peter 1:1, 2, ‘elect ... according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in the sanctification of the Spirit, for obedience to Jesus Christ and for sprinkling with his blood’.

3. Many biblical statements imply the doctrine. Examples are Matthew 1:21 wherein it is said Christ came to save ‘his people’; Acts 18:10 wherein Paul is informed by God, before the evangelization of Corinth, ‘I have many in this city who are my people’; and Jesus’ prayer of John 17:2, that he may ‘give eternal life to all whom you [the Father] have given him’. This list could be extended indefinitely.

Election and its corollary, effective calling, are also necessary inferences from the developments connected with Jesus’ sermon on the bread of life to the crowd assembled in and outside the synagogue of Capernaum (John 6:24–59). The topic was suggested by the feeding of the 5,000 the preceding day (John 6:1–14). The crowd was, at first, frantic to catch His every word, but they were dull of heart and entirely missed the point when He announced, ‘I am the bread of life; whoever comes to me shall not hunger, and whoever believes in me shall never thirst’ (v. 35). Then, discerning that the crowd had nary a glimmer of His meaning, He said, ‘you have seen me and yet do not believe’ (v. 36).

In the following report of the sermon high points, at least four times, in varying language, Jesus specifically brought forth sovereign divine choice, and thereby occasion to explain, not why some believed but why the foolish crowd did not. They had already disbelieved, He says, and these are the reasons why ‘All that the Father gives me will come to me [divine sovereignty], and whoever comes to me I will never cast out [human duty and privilege]’ (v. 37).

Then after explaining the incarnation as ‘the Father’s will’ He puts the fact of election and calling in that relation, adding ‘[T]his is the will of him who sent me, that I should lose nothing of all, he has given me’ (v. 39).

The record goes on to say, ‘so the Jews grumbled about him’ on account of His momentous claim to divine origin; to which He responded, again stating that God is sovereign in personal salvation: ‘Do not grumble among yourselves. No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him.’ To the negative remarks about why many do not believe He adds an affirmative: ‘Everyone who has heard and learned from the Father comes to me’ (v. 45). This is special calling, a calling that effects willing faith.

As mere nominal disciples always do when faced with the challenge of their own corrupt hearts and the offense of the cross, His followers now began to desert Him. Before they departed, however, Jesus reminded them of something the Old Testament prophets often said: that faith is a spiritual gift through the Word of God (see v. 63). And with an oblique reference to Judas, the traitor in the midst, Jesus concluded His sermon, saying: ‘I told you that no one can come to me unless it is granted him by the Father’ (John 6:65). Again as at the Nazareth synagogue and still today, ‘After this many of his disciples turned back and no longer walked with him’ (John 6:66).

When as a young theology student, wavering in acceptance of the doctrines of election and calling, it was Professor McClain’s patient exposition of this passage which turned my heart and head forever to vigorous embrace of the biblical truth of divine election and calling. I pray the same for any reader patient enough to follow what I have written above.

The Ground of Election

‘God votes for you; the Devil votes against you; you have the deciding vote’—it is an attractive explanation, but really a denial of election.

‘God elected those whom he saw by their own power of choice would believe’. This is attractive but utterly mistaken as to the powers of fallen men (1 Cor. 1:18; 2:14; Eph. 1:1–3). This is the Arminian-Wesleyan view.

The Lutheran Formula of Concord (sixteenth century) is wholly scriptural in affirming:

The predestination, or eternal election of God, extends only over the godly, beloved children of God, being a cause of their salvation, which He provides as well as disposes what belong thereto. Upon this [election] our salvation is founded so firmly that the gates of hell cannot overcome it, John 10:28; Matthew 16:18.⁹

The esteemed Lutheran scholar John Theodore Mueller comments further:

God’s eternal election of grace did not take place in view of man’s foreseen final faith, but rather embraced this faith together with the whole way of salvation [all elements in ordo salutis], such as conversion, justification, sanctification, and final preservation. Hence the believer is not elected because of his foreseen faith; on the contrary, he has become a believer in time because of his eternal election to salvation. In other words, a person is brought to saving faith in time just because God from eternity has graciously elected him to salvation.¹⁰

He goes on to cite Acts 13:48; Ephesians 1:3–6 and Romans 8:28–30 cited above. The Presbyterian A. A. Hodge expresses the same in brief:

It is self-evident that the same actions cannot be both the grounds upon which election rests and the fruits in which election is said to result. Since the Bible teaches that ‘faith’, ‘repentance’, and ‘evangelical obedience’ are the latter [i.e. fruits]; they cannot be the former [i.e. grounds]. The Scriptures do so teach in Ephesians 1:4.¹¹

Hodge cites in addition 2 Thessalonians 2:13; 1 Peter 1:2; Ephesians 2:10.

It should be observed that Scripture specifically denies that God’s choice follows ours (John 15:16). ‘You did not choose me, but I chose you’, etc. It is important to acknowledge that most of the Lord’s remarks to the Eleven in the Upper Room and en route to Gethsemane related to the apostles directly rather than to believers at large. He was addressing them as they upon whom the church should be founded (Eph. 2:20). Yet John 15, the Parable of the Vine and the Branches seems to relate to ‘disciples’ (v. 8) at large, all the ‘Master’s’ (John 13:13, 14 kjv) ‘servants’ and ‘friends’ (John 15:12–15). So, it seems likely in verse 16, ‘You did not choose me’, etc., Jesus has reference to their call to be disciples as well as later to be one of only twelve apostles. There is a difference of opinion among exegetes on the question.

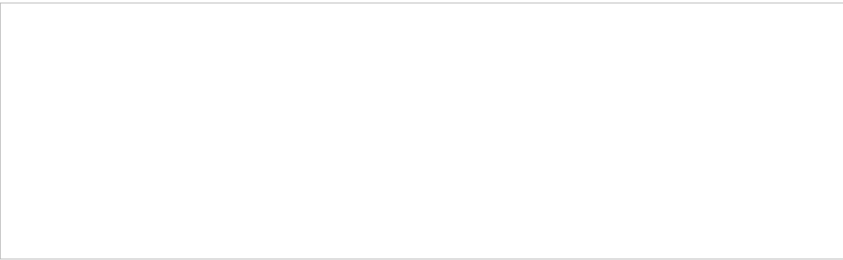

Nor do human acts of ‘willing’ underlie the initial conferral of divine mercy: God’s ‘mercy’ or ‘compassion’ ‘depends not on human will or exertion, but on God, who has mercy ... So then he has mercy on whomever he wills, and he hardens whomever he wills’ (Rom. 9:15, 16, 18). Nor are foreseen human events of any kind conditional to the divine decree. Second Timothy 1:9 focuses in on this, speaking of God ‘who has saved us and called us to [or “with”, esv margin and kjv] a holy calling, not because of our works [doing, choosing, willing] but because of [“according to” kjv; emphasis added] his own purpose and grace’.

The Bible states positively that election is wholly of grace, based on God’s good pleasure, will and purpose, not ours. As in Elijah’s time there are thousands of saints alive—a ‘remnant, chosen by grace. But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace’ (Rom. 11:5, 6). (See also Eph. 1:5, 6, 11; 2 Tim. 1:9; John 15:16, 19; Matt. 11:25, 26; Rom. 9:10–18.)

Election is likewise said to be ‘according to’ God’s knowledge or foreknowledge. Note: it is not on the basis of prescience (knowledge ahead of time) but in harmony, in consonance with it. When we read in 1 Peter 1:1, 2 that believers are ‘elect ... according to the foreknowledge of God the Father [emphasis added]’ the Greek kata, rendered ‘according to’, presents a picture of parallel, harmony. It would be diagrammed like this:

Not like this with election based on (which is not what the Greek word means) foreknowledge.

Likewise Romans 8:29 affirms that God ‘foreknew’ those whom ‘he also predestined’. Again, God did two things, He predestined and He foreknew, but the texts do not say one is based on the other. The basis is, as pointed out above, God’s ‘good pleasure ... purpose ... counsel ... will’ (Eph. 1:5, 6, 11).

Before moving on to other aspects of a doctrine of election, let the reader confront the many plain passages of Scripture quoted above. They make their own demands for acceptance in the plain English vernacular in which they stand. If swallowed whole, just as they stand, they will strengthen the whole body of truth. Election is a truth ‘to humble the pride of man, to exalt the grace of God in salvation, and to promote real holiness in heart and life’.¹² A famous British preacher-scholar said in a sermon: ‘The Bible teaches us to believe, God has been pleased from all eternity to choose certain men and women out of mankind, whom by his counsel secret to us, He has decreed to save by Jesus Christ. None are finally saved except those who are thus chosen’ (from a sermon by the nineteenth-century Anglican bishop, J. C. Ryle, one of the best evangelistic preachers and writers of his century).¹³

This truth is so strong and important that the New Testament frequently refers to the saved as ‘elect’, ‘the elect’, ‘God’s elect’, etc. In short, ‘God’s eternal Election is the first link in that chain of a sinner’s salvation of which heavenly glory is the end. None ever repent, believe, and are born again, except the Elect.’¹⁴

‘The days’ of the great tribulation, ‘for the sake of the elect [emphasis added], ... will be cut short’ (Matt. 24:22). In those days, if it were possible ‘false prophets’ would deceive ‘the elect’ (Mark 13:22 [emphasis added]). ‘[W]ill not God give justice to his elect’ (Luke 18:7, emphasis added)? And of ‘those who are in Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 8:1) the rhetorical question of Paul was ‘Who shall bring any charge against God’s elect’ (Rom. 8:33, emphasis added). For Peter true believers scattered about the East were ‘elect [emphasis added] ... according to [not on the ground of] the foreknowledge of God the Father, in the sanctification of the Spirit' (1 Peter 1:1, 2), whom he urged to make their 'calling and election [emphasis added] sure' (2 Peter 1:10).

God converts, renews, sanctifies and ultimately glorifies only the elect. Though we must do all our own repenting and believing, these human acts would be impossible to any 'sinner by choice and an alien by birth' (a choice line from an old gospel song, The Child of a King) apart from the regenerating work of the Spirit, who, as Jesus said, like the wind, moves where it wishes and no man can say whence it comes or whither it goes (John 3:8). As Jesus suggested to Nicodemus, he ought to have understood this as a 'teacher in Israel', acquainted with the prophecy of the dry bones (Ezek. 37). First, God 'will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live': only then do the dry bones stand 'upon their feet'.

It might weary the reader to introduce discussion of the numerous other texts—none denying the duty of every one to repent and believe the gospel—which either directly or by necessary inference teach that our choice of God, without any exceptions, is preceded by His choice of us with efficient grace to respond favourably. So I end the recitation here. The evidence is not a trickle but an avalanche.

The Purpose of Election

An examination of some of the relevant passages reaps the following fruit of teaching. Believers have been chosen by God 'to the praise of his glory' (Eph. 1:11, 12); to 'show forth the praises' of the One who called them (1 Peter 2:9 kjv); to live holy blameless lives (Eph. 1:4); to be fully sanctified, i.e. 'conformed to the image of his [God's] Son' (Rom. 8:28, 29); to 'go and bear fruit' (John 15:16). It is hence, an error to think of election apart from the high and holy ends which God had in mind when He did it.

The success of the plan of redemption could not be guaranteed—as all God's eternal counsels are—apart from divine initiative at every stage of the plan (ordo salutis). On account of sovereign election, God knew from the beginning who would populate heaven and a renewed earth. '[T]he Lamb' was 'slain' from 'the foundation of the world' (Rev. 13:8) and the inhabitants are 'those who are written in the Lamb's book of life' (Rev. 21:27). These facts of Scripture in no wise encourage any one to presume on God's grace in this regard, because divine sovereignty and human responsibility are juxtaposed in many a biblical declaration, perhaps never more starkly than in this verse: 'But God's firm foundation stands, bearing this seal: "The Lord knows those who are his", and, "Let everyone who names the name of the Lord depart from iniquity"' (2 Tim. 2:19).

Biblical Defence of the Doctrine of Election

Anything so palpably contrary to what sinners would like to think—'I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul' (Invictus by E. Henley)—has always had its objectors. But the Bible never excuses God for His apparent playing of favourites. God is not a democratic 'chairman of the board', but a mighty king. The Holy Scriptures were written long before 'Liberty, Equality and Fraternity' became eighteenth-century watchwords.

Hence, it is no surprise that the sovereignty of God in electing 'whom he will' is defended, already within the Bible, against its gainsayers. Note also the Lord's answer to the 'unfair practices' complaints in the parable (Matt. 20:1–16); 'Am I not allowed to do what I choose with what belongs to me? Is your eye bad because I am good?' (v. 15 esv margin). The reader will find Jesus defending God's right of sovereign choice—even preferring the relatively less good—from the facts of history and Jewish experience, even granting grace to a pagan widow in need of help, assisting a pagan soldier in need of healing, while passing over many equally needy Israelites (Luke 4:25–27). The citizens of Nazareth supposed their 'national election' to privilege as 'chosen people' qualified them to special treatment in every realm, including, one may suppose, personal salvation. Their soon-to-be most noted son reminded them, not so. God may choose Gentile widows for favour over Jewish widows and healed Syrian lepers over 'many lepers in Israel'. The response of the townsmen was not unlike the reception the doctrine sometimes receives today—even by some ill-informed Christians: 'When they heard these things, all in the synagogue were filled with wrath. And they rose up and drove him out of the town' (Luke 4:25–29).

This same insistence on salvation by grace from start to finish was essentially what made the religion of the Reformers of the early sixteenth century obnoxious to Rome which neither then nor now is able to see grace as God's way in salvation rather than an infusion of ability to merit what God can only give away 'without money and without price'.

We want human needs to dictate action, even God's action. This makes good socialist theory and is invincible political propaganda in times like ours, but God intends to be sovereign and let His own counsel stand; His will, grace and purpose decide. The same sort of defense of election is presented by Paul in the case of Jacob and Esau (Rom. 9:11, 12, see context). Jacob preferred the legitimate firstborn Esau, but God did not. Ultimately the Bible appeals to God's sovereign right. Read Paul's remarks about the potter and his clay (Rom. 9:19–23) and reflect again on the parable of Matthew 20:1–16.

Again, remember the situation starts with a race universally under divine wrath and bound for hell unless God intervenes. '[T]he wrath of God remains on him' (John 3:36); 'by nature children of wrath' (Eph. 2:3) is God's analysis of our character. God is to be praised that He has chosen some; why He did not choose everyone is His business, not ours. All about us lie evidences that God does not treat all men equally. He lets one child be born in a home where the mother is a drunkard and whose father was a visitor of the night in search of pleasure only; another in the same town is born to responsible, moral Christian parents who care for the child's every spiritual and physical need. Bangladesh and Somalia perish for hunger while America wallows in plenty. None has any choice as to what home or country is his birthplace.

Practical Spiritual Values of Election

Simple as taught in Scripture but difficult for natural man to believe, some of the remaining genuine qualms of Christians may be allayed by attention to some values of election for the Christian life.

A. First mention goes to the comfort and encouragement it provides believers. Number XVII of the Anglican Thirty-Nine Articles quoted, in part, earlier, adds:

As the godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love toward God, so, for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living no less perilous than desperation. [Our ancestors took long sentences in stride.]

The practical spiritual benefit of being confident they were chosen and kept secure by God—guaranteed by Jesus' promise 'they shall never perish'—is perhaps more appreciated by believers when severely persecuted. In Reformation times evangelicals in France and Bible printers (such as Tyndale) were being beheaded and burned. Dissidents from the Roman religion held their meetings in secret and pastors were on the run. Hence:

To a persecuted Protestant in Paris it must have been an unspeakable consolation to feel that God had a plan of salvation for him, individually, from all eternity, and that nothing that priest or king could do could frustrate the divine purpose on his behalf. Nor was it less a source of strength to one profoundly conscious of his own sinfulness to feel that his salvation was based on the unshakable rock of the decree of God Himself.¹⁵

Scripture never uses the word 'reprobation'—sometimes used by theologians ancient and modern for a proposed or supposed decree of damnation. But Scripture does speak frequently of God's hardening of hearts (e.g. the heart of Pharaoh, Exod. 7:13 and about a dozen times in Exodus). There are many in every age that blaspheme God in outrageously blasphemous ways as well as relentlessly pursue any who stand up to them. These will come to a spectacularly appropriate end. 'How long, O Lord?' is an echoing cry of those persecuted for righteousness' sake from the second Psalm to the martyrs under the altar of heaven after the breaking of the fifth of the seven seals (Rev. 6:9, 10; cf. Isa. 6:11)—'O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before you will judge and avenge ...?' This also is within God's plan and purpose: 'For the scripture says to Pharaoh, "For this very purpose I have raised you up, that I might show my power in you, and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth"' (Rom. 9:17). Pharaoh may have thought of that while drowning in the Red Sea. Similar statements relate to Eli's reprobate sons (1 Sam. 2:25) and the degenerate populace of Isaiah's time (Isa. 6:9–11 quoted three times in the New Testament).¹⁶

B. This doctrine exalts God, as the Scriptures clearly indicate He should be exalted. God decreed the existence of the world; He created it; He preserves it; He is governing it (providence). Election fits that biblical portrait of God and adds something to admire.

C. It compels some humility, for it 'pulls the rug' from beneath any man who thinks he can challenge or contest God. He who at the beginning 'spoke, and it came to be' (Ps. 33:9) will also have the last word—not only at the death of every unrepentant sinner but when the books are opened on the Judgment Day.

D. It adds a motive for evangelistic and pastoral work, as Paul says very forcefully in his final Epistle, near the end of a long life of energetic, effective, if oft-times painful, service in those very matters: ‘Therefore I endure everything for the sake of the elect [emphasis added], that they also may obtain salvation’ (2 Tim. 2:10). That intrepid apostle understood well what some advocates of this doctrine sometimes tend to forget: God who ordains ends also ordains all the means to those ends.

Paul, who is perhaps the most ardent practitioner of a planned programme of missionary evangelism of the New Testament reports, is for certain, except for Jesus Himself, also the firmest expositor of the doctrine of election. We have already introduced many of Paul’s statements of election. Let us also lay beside these statements some of the great missionary evangelist’s expressions of zeal to persuade, first his brethren in the flesh, the Jews, and then ‘the Gentiles’ to whom he turned several times after being convinced that for now the minds of Jews were hardened to the gospel. As for the Jews he told the church in Rome: ‘I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart. For I could wish I myself were accursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, my kinsmen according to the flesh’ (Rom. 9:2, 3). As for the Gentiles—the heathen world sunk deeply in corruption—perhaps the eighteenth chapter of Acts explains his ‘predestinarian zeal’ best: after testifying without avail to the Jews, ‘when they opposed and reviled him, he shook out his garments and said to them, “Your blood be upon your heads! I am innocent. From now on I will go to the Gentiles.” ... And the Lord said to Paul one night in a vision, “Do not be afraid, but speak and do not be silent ... for I have many people in this city.” ’ Paul was aware that even before they are converted, the Lord has already designated in His eternal counsels exactly who are His, their names already written in the book of life. Consequently, ‘he stayed a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them’ (Acts 18:5–11 rsv). To the numerous body of believers brought to Christ by that vigorous campaign of evangelism, Paul later contributed the largest section of the epistolary literature of the New Testament—1 and 2 Corinthians.

Scriptural Modes of Preaching and Teaching Election

See Calvin on the ‘Right manner of preaching divine predestination’¹⁷ and Augustine.¹⁸

Good theological writing has devoted large attention to how the doctrine of election should be presented. It is, of course, a mistake to make it the leading topic of any sustained programme of instruction or preaching. Nothing, it seems, is more likely to further alienate the mind already darkened by sin and if inclined to accept it as true, to drive to despair rather than faith for salvation. What follows here will be brief abstracts rather than extended exposition.

1. Teach election in its biblical contexts. Mueller has some very helpful advice from an orthodox, creedal Lutheran perspective.¹⁹ J. C. Ryle asserts, ‘It is one of Satan’s chief devices to make the Gospel odious by tempting men to distort it. Perhaps no part of Christian Theology has suffered so much damage in this way as the doctrine of personal election.’²⁰ Though I would not do so in a controversial situation, as a pastor I have consistently explained the doctrine in the course of Bible exposition (Rom. 9; Matt. 13; Eph. 1, 4, etc.).

2. Couple the doctrine of election with the universal offer of salvation. Here Jesus Himself is our best example. Matthew 11:25–27 is as strong a statement of special calling and election as to be found in any sermon. Yet it is immediately followed by Jesus’ most tender offer of salvation: ‘Come to me, all who labour and are heavy laden ... and you will find rest for your souls’ (vv. 28, 29). The sixth chapter of John is another such example of Jesus' method.

3. Usually, as in Scripture, bring out the doctrine of election after the offer of salvation has been made and hearers have decided for or against the Saviour. We have already seen how Paul did just that in Corinth. Near the end of the epiphany of Isaiah's call (Isa. 6:9, 10) God made known to him that preaching the Word to hardened sinners would (apart from a special call and election) only harden them. This passage is quoted five times in the New Testament to similar effect (Matt. 13:14, 15; Mark 4:12; Luke 8:10; John 12:40; Rom. 11:8), and similar language appears at Psalm 119:70 and Jeremiah 5:11. The New Testament quotations are all given as explanation of why hearers were rejecting the gospel. I discuss this more particularly in a book on theology of missions.²¹

4. Set forth the duty of evangelism with God's wisdom and the sovereignty of His election and the responsibility of man to respond in faith not as in any wise an intellectual problem or intrinsically mysterious.

Divine election is of the same order of truth as the existence of God.

Common Objections to and Questions About Election

These objections and questions are as old as the Bible itself. Some are both raised and answered there. The book of Habakkuk, for instance, raises and responds to an aspect of whether God is fair or consistent in electing, judging and sparing. In Romans 9:14 Paul rhetorically questions if God was righteous in electing Jacob and rejecting Esau. His answer is simply mē genoito ('let it not be'), a bad question deserving no answer. Verse 19 voices complaints that God is arbitrary and impossibly overbearing, simply a bully. Paul in a sense says, 'Be quiet! Who do you think you are?' (v. 20).

Teachers and preachers who saw election as a clear, biblical doctrine throughout church history met considerable reluctance among their audiences. No questions or objections or answers are new. Opponents of election in Augustine's time were not the heretics (Pelagians) but the Semi-Pelagian orthodox. The ground is pretty well covered in his Treatise on the Predestination of the Saints.²² Calvin dignified five more or less standard objections of his time by devoting eighteen pages to them.²³ A. H. Strong—whose Calvinistic, non-covenantal, Infralapsarian, Systematic Theology has been continuously in print for 100 years, after continuous refinement over the long life of the author, has the best summary of five main objections and answers I know of.²⁴

Dr Robert Reymond has a long section on election in relation to decrees (long a sort of Reformed playground of opinion) but does not address challenges to the whole idea of individual election: an excellent treatment.²⁵ Perhaps Dr Reymond hesitated to launch into such a tedious and lengthy task. Buswell makes some memorable remarks about 'reprobation' and 'double predestination'.²⁶ Millard Erickson, whose treatment of election, though brief, is strongly affirmative ('Grace is absolutely necessary.... In our Calvinistic scheme there is no basis for God's choice of some to eternal life other than his own sovereign will'),²⁷ has no section on objections.²⁸

If, as logic compels, one must include the damnation of the non-elect in the decrees and give it the name of reprobation, then as several (especially well put by W. G. T. Shedd)²⁹ suggest, we must regard election as an efficacious decree and reprobation as a permissive decree. The discussion by that prince of scholastic Calvinism, F. Turretin (1623–1687), is in his Institutes of Elenctic Theology I.³⁰ He is Infralapsarian. God is not the author of sins though He is the one who sustains all creation, including sinners and their father the devil plus all the angels that fell and left their first state.

Some objections to personal election call for very brief notice. I intend no disrespect to the unnamed objectors. Their arguments are as old as Pelagius and his disciple Celestius and the ancient Semi-Pelagians. Most of them can be found in a 1970 book by a Baptist minister named Robert Shank.³¹

1. Some Arminians and Wesleyans as well as Karl Barth say ‘Election is simply for believers to be “in Christ” who is God’s elect’.³² It is of course true the saved of every age before and after Christ are ‘in him’ as Ephesians highlights. Yet the doctrine of particular election is securely locked into the many passages which clearly say the same as Luke observed: Acts 13:48—‘And when the Gentiles heard this, they began rejoicing and glorifying the word of the Lord, and as many as were appointed to eternal life believed.’³³

2. Also, some Arminians and Wesleyans say divine election relates not to individuals but to national preference, to Israel per se as represented by ‘Jacob I loved’, etc., in Romans 9:6–13.³⁴ This was developed at length by Wesley’s great orthodox systematizer, Richard Watson.³⁵ I judge their lengthy arguments all crash on Paul’s plain statements in Romans 9 that 1) the election stands not of works but of God who calls (v. 11)—not applicable to a nation per se and 2) that (v. 16 kjv, cf. esv margin) election ‘is not of him [a person, emphasis added] that willeth, nor of him [a person] that runneth’. The people of a nation usually have not one will (or opinion) but many; nor do they expend effort in ‘running’. National will is never one but of several opinions or wills nor the effort of ‘running’ (Gr. trecho. fig. ‘exert oneself to the limits of one’s powers in an attempt to go forward, to strive to advance’ Romans 1:16). The emphasis is entirely upon the effort that a person makes.³⁶

3. An interesting variation of ‘group’ election proposes that Romans 9 refers to ‘ecclesiastical’ privilege, just as Israel was elected to the privilege of ‘opportunity of obtaining salvation ... as the Jews of old were God’s chosen people’ so now ‘every baptized member of the church [not necessarily saved] is one of God’s elect’. Second 2 Peter 1:10 is cited. The only truth I see in this view is that often the Scriptures, Old and New Testaments, address the Israelite or ‘Christian’ hearers on the basis of their profession, not strictly their spiritual condition.³⁷

4. It is objected that election is unjust to those not included. Answer: election deals not simply with creatures, but with sinful, guilty and ‘condemned already’ (John 3:36) creatures. God therefore is to be praised for His mercy in saving any at all. God can say to any, saved or otherwise, ‘Friend, I am doing you no wrong.... Am I not allowed to do what I choose with what belongs to me?’ (Matt. 20:13, 15). There is something to be said for a parent treating each child the same, but a sovereign ruler is not obliged to treat condemned rebels alike. God is not an egalitarian and never heard of ‘the declaration of human rights’ when forming His counsels.

5. It is objected that individual election represents God as partial. Answer: these objections, usually by those who propose that election relates not to particular persons but to national or ecclesiastical privilege, would relate as well to this sort of election as to particular election. But Scripture bases election not only in His sovereignty but also in His wisdom and mercy. In electing, scripture is, as we have seen, without regard to earthly privilege or station (Ps. 44:3; Isa. 45:1, 4, 5, 23–25; Luke 4:25–27).

6. It is objected that election of some people no more worthy than others is arbitrary. Answer: to the contrary, Scripture bases God's electing of sinners in His freedom, will and wisdom. That we do not know His reasons does not mean He does not have adequate reasons. Let us remember election is only of condemned sinners. God is not to be charged with anything wrong because He does not extend the grace of election and calling to all. We do not know all His reasons but we know some of them: a) to provide example that no sinner is beyond reach of His mercy (1 Tim. 1:16); b) to provide witnesses and martyrs (Acts 9:15, 16). Paul could be a witness to one class of folk, Peter to another. In any case the ultimate reasons lie in God's providence and grace, not in what we are in ourselves. Beyond these reasons—as every teacher of biblical doctrine worth his salt knows—there remains what Scripture calls 'the mystery of his will'.

A Postscript

Somehow the false impression is abroad that election is a denominational speciality peculiar to Presbyterians and Reformed theologians. Historically, the most numerous defenders of the doctrine in America have been Baptists, now in a state of recovery! The latter are only very recently reawakening to this their heritage. Besides A. H. Strong, whom I have cited frequently on this and related subjects, James Pedigru Boyce of Southern Baptist Seminary (Louisville, KY) brilliantly expounded the doctrine to several generations of pastors trained there. His great work, Abstract of Systematic Theology (1887), has recently been republished by Presbyterian and Reformed Publishers. I recommend it highly.

¹ Edgar C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England Explained with an Introduction, 8th ed. (London: 1912), p. 47.

² ibid., pp. 459 and 465.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

³ I am citing the analysis of A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1957), p. 215.

⁴ Wilhelm Niesel, The Theology of Calvin, trans. H. Knight (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1956), pp. 159–181.

⁵ Francois Wendel, Calvin, The Origin and Development of His Thought, trans. P. Mairet (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), pp. 263–284.

⁶ A. Mitchell Hunter, The Teaching of Calvin, 2nd ed. (Westwood: Revell, 1950), p. 94.

⁷ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion iii, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), art. 21.1.

⁸ John Theodore Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1934), p. 585.

⁹ Formula of Concord, Epit. XI, 4, Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii, p. 166.

¹⁰ Mueller, Dogmatics, p. 587.

¹¹ A.A. Hodge, Outlines, p. 219.

¹² On the masthead of Free Grace Broadcaster (2603 W. Wright St, Pensacola, FL, #173), Summer 2000.

¹³ J. C. Ryle, Old Paths (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1999, repr. of 1878), p. 461.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 461.

¹⁵ Williston Walker, John Calvin, The Organizer of Reformed Protestantism (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1909), p. 418.

¹⁶ Calvin, Institutes iii, 24.14.

¹⁷ ibid.

¹⁸ Augustine, Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers v, ed. P. Schaff and H. Wace, 1890 (Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., 1890, repr. 1994), p. 540 ff.

¹⁹ Mueller, Dogmatics, p. 589 ff.

²⁰ Ryle, Old Paths, p. 469.

²¹ Robert D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1985, repr. 1999 by author), pp. 74–78.

²² Augustine, Treatise on the Predestination of the Saints—NPNF v, pp. 497–519.

²³ Calvin, Institutes iii, 23. 1–14, Westminster Ed., pp. 941–964.

²⁴ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan: Revell, 1907), pp. 464–502.

²⁵ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson Publ., 1998), pp. 464–502.

²⁶ J. Oliver Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1962, 1971), pp. 154–156.

²⁷ Millard Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1985), p. 928.

²⁸ Louis Berkhof does not introduce election, as I do here and A. H. Strong et al, as an aspect of soteriology but in connection with decrees. His treatment, however, is sound, including a limited discussion of the question of the order of decrees as in a characteristic Calvinist scholasticism. As readers of these pages know this author has not found the order of God’s decrees a necessary part of systematics but rather an over-refinement, incapable of solution and more fruitful of controversy than sound teaching, and a waste of energy. There is more substance to the ‘five points of Calvinism’ (not of Calvin but of his scholastic successors). As those who have read the previous section of this volume on Christ’s work of redemption know I regard the TULIP as a structure to which I give reluctant assent because it became a necessary development in consequence of the hypercalvinism of Beza and others and the inevitable reaction of Arminius and the Dutch Remonstrants of late sixteenth century after the death of the far more moderate, biblical and balanced scholar, John Calvin 1509–164.

²⁹ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology i (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1969), p. 405 ff.

³⁰ Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology i, trans. G. Giger, ed. J. T. Dennison, Jr (Phillipsburg: P and R Publ., 1992), pp. 206–211, 341–373.

³¹ Robert Shank, Elect in the Son: A Study of the Doctrine of Election (Springfield: Westcott Publ., 1970), p. 240.

³² ibid., p. 242.

³³ Turretin, Elenctic Theology, pp. 206–211.

³⁴ R. Shank, Election.

³⁵ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes (New York: Lane & Sandford, 1850), chap. 26, in which he devotes twenty-six pages to Romans 9–11.

³⁶ Bauer, Arndt, Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon of New Testament (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), trecho, p. 833.

³⁷ See Gibson, 39 Articles, pp. 465–469. John Gill had met these views in his time and answered briefly and as well as any available today—John Gill, The Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity i (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, repr. of 1795, 1978), pp. 257, 258.

The Doctrine of Calling

The doctrine of calling is closely connected with the doctrine of election ‘those whom he predestined [elected] he also called’ (Rom. 8:30). Calling is God’s initial act of doing something in the sinner to effect the salvation prepared for him ‘from the foundation of the world’. Like election, calling is something in which the sinner has no active part. The initiative is all God’s. This affinity perhaps explains why John Murray, in a book on salvation places effectual calling first, before regeneration, and never treats election, so important to most Calvinists.¹

Calling is also closely connected with regeneration, as we shall see. Because the special call, which comes only to those whom both Paul and Peter call ‘the elect’ is identical with the initiation of regeneration.² Though the divine call to sinners is an invitation—‘Come to me, all who labour and are heavy laden’ (Matt. 11:28), for example—it is more than an invitation, for the call actually brings the elect to Christ. If left to themselves by the Spirit of God they would never come at all. The ‘heart of man is deceitful above all things’ and deceives itself more than any others. The affinity between effectual calling and regeneration in the mind of good scholars explains why Louis Berkhof has a separate short chapter on general and external calling followed by a chapter on regeneration and effectual calling, not distinguishing the one from the other.³

It is important that this be well understood, for otherwise spiritual pride will be generated among believers, especially new ones. Clarence, forty-two years of age, married, father of two, long-time worker in a foundry, was a new believer and a transformed man when I became his pastor in my first charge after seminary. When given opportunity he would ‘give a testimony’, sometimes saying something like this: ‘When I heard evangelist (name) preach I knew right away I was a lost sinner and had the sense to accept the Savior. I’ve been explaining this to the guys at the foundry and they are all too stupid to accept Christ too.’ Clarence soon learned ‘the rest of the story’, that it was not any superior wisdom of his own that enabled him to see himself as in need of the Savior and why he had the will to believe. He quickly grew in faith and knowledge and ‘in grace’, not ‘into grace’. He taught an adult Bible class for many years until well past eighty years of age.

The Bible distinguishes between a general invitation, a call of God that invites all who hear to come, and the special call which actually brings sinners to salvation. It is chiefly with the latter we are concerned here, but the former requires attention also.

The General Call

Some theologians speak of an external call or invitation as opposed to an internal call, others of a general as opposed to special call. For good reason the latter is to be preferred as shall be explained. Let us state the doctrine: Scripture speaks of a call of God which invites all who hear to come to Christ for salvation. For clarity’s sake some more specific distinction should be made.

1. This call should be distinguished from the natural light Scripture describes in such passages as Psalm 19:1–6 and the first two chapters of Romans and elsewhere. There is no promise or grace in this ‘general revelation’. The ‘light of nature’ tells something of divine benevolence as shown in ‘rains from heaven and fruitful seasons, satisfying ... hearts with food and gladness’ (Acts 14:17), but it is an ambiguous message, complicated by natural disasters, which to the natural mind might suggest divine wrath, more than divine grace. True, God is nowhere ‘without witness’, but nowhere with a saving gospel witness unless a messenger is present to speak it. It is said ‘if the heathen only live up to the light they have’ they will be saved. But the light is never lived up to. Such statements do not reflect an understanding of the fearful effects of original sin on the understanding and will of every member of our fallen race.

2. This call is to be distinguished from any real or supposed strivings or restraining or constraining general work of the Logos or Holy Spirit. J. O. Buswell writes, ‘[A]lthough I cannot cogently prove it from Scripture, I postulate that the convicting work of the Holy Spirit is absolutely universal in the human race in all ages and in all areas.’⁴ He cites Micah 5:2 and John 1:9. Buswell asserts (again without proof), that before any one’s death one receives opportunity to respond to a valid offer of salvation. A. H. Strong defines the general call as ‘to all men through God’s providence and Spirit’.⁵ But as he develops the subject later it is clear he sees no saving gospel in these influences. He does not agree with Buswell really.

3. As a call to salvation, this general call is only to those who actually learn the gospel through some mode of external proclamation. The gospel is a ‘preachment’, ‘it pleased God through the folly of what we preach [keryma, proclamation] to save those who believe’ (1 Cor. 1:21). This is the missionary theology of Romans 10:13–17 where Paul says ‘everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved’ but adds ‘they’ cannot call or believe on ‘him of whom they have never heard’; they cannot ‘hear without someone preaching’ for ‘faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ’.

4. Though universally valid, this call never has been universally proclaimed in any age. It is true that Isaiah, speaking for the Lord, proclaimed to the heathen whom he had been reproofing for their idolatry: ‘Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth! For I am God, and there is no other’ (Isa. 45:22). Does this say that a call has been issued and heard by all people without exception? I suggest three views of this matter:

a) One might take the view that God intended for Isaiah’s generation to go to the nations as Jonah did to Nineveh. This was certainly not the case, for Jonah’s commission to preach to the Gentiles has no Old Testament precedent or subsequent example.

b) Rather, God is saying, ‘If you in the remotest parts of a pagan world want to achieve salvation by worshiping a god, then, look to me, for I am the only God.’

c) It is a declaration of a future intention. For reasons we may only speculate about, God delayed proclamation outside Israel (see Matt. 10:5) until the events of Acts 8 and 10 (the Samaria and Cornelius episodes). Paul declared at Athens (Acts 17:29–31) that now God ‘commands all people everywhere to repent’, whereas previous ages of ‘ignorance’ God ‘overlooked’ (huperidōn, nom.

sing. 2nd aor. part. Huperoraō, overlook, disregard) (v. 30). That God did not leave Himself anywhere ‘without witness’ (Acts 14:17) does not mean there is a gospel witness in every area of the planet. The universal witness is the light of nature, the message of Psalm 19 and Acts chapter 14. Benevolence everywhere revealed? Yes (Acts 14:15–17). Grace and rest for the conscience? No.

Hence it seems the general call to be saved by grace through faith goes only as far as human means have promoted it and shall promote it—hence the prediction: ‘you will be my witnesses ... to the end of the earth’ (Acts 1:8) and implied command ‘to take the Gospel along, making disciples as you go’ (Matt. 28:18) and even to ‘send’ missionaries—‘How are they to preach unless they are sent?’ If God makes special cases of ‘calling’—as He did to Paul on the Damascus Road and perhaps several of the Twelve—who can deny or forbid it? We cannot count on it as relief from the duty to ‘proclaim the gospel to the whole creation’ (Mark 16:15).

5. The general call of God in salvation is addressed to all mankind who hear, whether numbered among the elect or not. Election is particular: ‘The Lord knows those who are his’ (2 Tim. 2:19). But this invitation is addressed broadly. Isaiah, whose oracles and sermons frequently anticipate the coming gospel age, cried: ‘Come, everyone who thirsts, come to the waters; and he who has no money, come, buy and eat!... without money and without price’ (Isa. 55:1). The last chapter of the New Testament echoes the same ‘everyone’ with ‘let the one who desires take the water of life without price’ (Rev. 22:17). Jesus’s invitation, ‘Come to me, all who labour’, etc. (Matt. 11:27–30), does not say ‘All you elect may come’, though some advocates of what they suppose to be Calvinistic theology argue He meant just that (R. C. Sproul, for one). It seems a mistake to me to suppose His compassion on the multitudes (Matt. 9:36) and appeal to His disciples to view them as a field ripe for harvest (John 4:35, 36) had only the elect in view. His words in John 7:37, ‘If anyone thirsts’, would have found response only in those ‘chosen’ in Him from the foundation of the world and drawn by the Father and given to Christ (John 6:39, 44, 45, 64, 65). It is equally true, as Jesus added, ‘whoever comes to me I will never cast out’ (John 6:37).

6. This general call may be successfully resisted even though God’s Spirit ‘strive with men’ and may be fatally rejected, as in the Parable of the Marriage Feast (Matt. 22:16) and as the pathos of ‘O Jerusalem ... how often would I have gathered thy children ... and ye would not’ (Matt. 23:37 kjv) sadly reflects. No doubt some of the Palestinian Jews who heard Jesus’ invitations and who were seen in the field of people ‘ripe for the harvest’ heard Stephen say: ‘you always resist the Holy Spirit’ (Acts 7:51). Nevertheless, God says in every age, ‘Today, if you hear his voice, do not harden your hearts’ (Heb. 4:7 referring to Ps. 95:7, 8).

7. People who hear are held responsible for rejecting this proclaimed call of God. (And if not addressed by the divine invitation how can they be held responsible for rejecting it?) When I preach the gospel I will speak with the authority the divine Author of salvation confers on all His servants. I will speak earnestly as Paul did, even threaten them as Jesus did (‘See, your house is left to you desolate’). As Stephen, I may even rebuke them: ‘You stiff-necked people’ (Acts 7:51) and ‘persuade others’ as Paul did (2 Cor. 5:11). I (or you) may even deliberately frighten ‘others’ ... to ‘save with fear’ (Jude 23 kjv). I myself should not be shy or afraid of their faces (Jer. 1:8). The preacher may rightly say with Paul, ‘I magnify my ministry ... and thus save some’ (Rom. 11:13, 14). I ‘have become all things to all people [elect or otherwise], that by all means I might save some’ (1 Cor.

9:22). If the ones I seek to save happen to be son or daughter I may go to my grave in grief if they do not respond to God's call, but I will not cease to pray they will respond.

It is significant that in the Parable of the Marriage Feast (Matt. 10) the ones who utterly and finally rejected the invitation were also severely and finally punished for despising it. The invitation is based on a redemption sufficient for all.

The Effectual, Special Call (Also Called an Internal, Spiritual Call)

We have had occasion many times in these studies to observe that man is alienated from the life of God and dead in sin. Therefore, if he is to be saved God must make the first move—something to cause 'us Greeks' who see only foolishness in 'the word of the cross' to see any sense in the cross of Christ (1 Cor. 1:18). This first move is the effectual call, sometimes quite accurately designated as 'illumination'. The latter term is accurate only if it is understood the soul (or understanding or reason) is illuminated, delivered from darkening, not the Word or the gospel. Some well-catechized, nominal Christians and atheistic scholars understand quite well both the sense of Scripture passages and evangelical theology. Their problem is that they dislike both. The gospel was a stumbling-block to some of the Jews of Paul's time and 'folly to Gentiles', precisely because they did 'get the drift' of Paul's teaching. Agrippa was informed by Paul but not persuaded (Acts 26:2, 3, 27–29). The cross is too bruising of pride to be welcomed apart from a change introduced within but wrought by 'power from above'.

Some unbelieving 'Jews and Greeks' handle the text quite objectively, having nothing to gain or lose wherever they come out in interpretation. A fairly recent commentary on the Hebrew text of the early chapters of Genesis by an Israeli Jew, unencumbered by two centuries of 'Christian' efforts to harmonize geology or evolution or some form of 'creationism' with the text, succeeds very well in extracting the intended meaning. As for the truth of the chapter and the wisdom of an evangelical theology of creation our contemporary scholarly 'Jews and Greeks' may not have a clue, or if they do may disregard it.

Poets, artists, mystics and even scientists speak of moments when influences and information are so brought together in the mind that all comes into clear focus. Then out comes a memorable poem, work of art, perhaps a new theory of 'natural selection' or 'a unified theory' of all material existence. Borrowing a term from Scripture and theology, some describe such a moment as an epiphany, Greek for a disclosure or unveiling. In the New Testament epiphany often designates the sudden glorious Second Advent of Christ and in ecclesiastical history His First Advent as in the January 6 'feast of epiphany'.

The internal, special call is not ordinarily an epiphany of this sort. Neither does it consist of a deduction or induction drawn from premises or evidences, nor is it simply the effect of hearing truth, but a change of the heart that makes it friendly to the truth. It may occur as a sudden overwhelming experience like Paul's or it may seem to develop toward a climax as with John Wesley and John Newton. In the case of many it occurs in childhood at a period of time so early one cannot remember and may seem to be a gradual development.

That there is a special call that not only invites the sinner but also brings him to salvation rests on no single particular scriptural statement, but is the assumption of the writers of the New Testament. A frequent name for believers or 'the elect' is 'the called' or 'called in Christ Jesus', etc. 'The called' would not distinguish God's people from any one else who had ever heard the gospel if only a general invitation were intended. In Romans 8:28, 29, those 'called' are the same as those who love God, foreknown and predestined by God and sanctified. In 1 Cor. 1:26 the 'calling' is something that came to 'brothers', not all the crowds (first of Jews and then of Gentiles, Acts 18:1–11) who heard Paul and his associates, Silas and Timothy, preach at Corinth. This call came only to those who responded with repentance and faith. Let us take note of several features of this effectual internal call.

1. The reasons for this call have nothing to do with human acts of will or works of faith whether foreseen or otherwise. Rather it is 'a holy calling, not because of our works but because of his own [God's] purpose and grace, which he gave us in Christ Jesus before the ages began' (2 Tim. 1:9).

2. It is a supernatural event like the creation of sight in the man blind from birth (John 9). In that case Jesus appears to have employed a means—a plaster of clay and spittle plus the water of a pool. We shall consider later if the Word (truth) is a means or only an accompaniment of special calling.

3. In any case this call is 'effectual'. All who receive it are among the elect. They are brought to Christ even though they also come to Him as invited in a general call. For them the call is special. 'Everyone who has heard and learned from the Father', Jesus replied to His objectors, 'comes to me' (John 6:45). Further 'No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him' (John 6:44).

4. Everyone so called comes freely, un-coerced and willingly, because the call restores the original normal desire to love God, and freedom from bondage to sin. God is at work in them 'both to will and to work' (Phil. 2:13). They are like Lydia whose heart 'The Lord opened ... to pay attention to what was said by Paul' (Acts 16:14). The Word is ineffective in and by itself to bring to 'belief, trust and commitment' until the heart is changed, i.e. until the effective 'call' comes. They are 'taught by God' (1 John 2:27; 1 Thess. 4:9) immediately by an inward work of the Spirit before they come to Jesus (John 6:45).

'You shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free' is a true saying in the context of John 8:2, but it is not truth itself that frees those in bondage until received as truth. In realms of personal life where inborn prejudice exists the truth about sin and grace staring one in the face does not in and of itself find a place in the center of being where commitments occur.

5. Finally, though the effective call of God is certain as to its success in bringing the called to final perfection (1 Thess. 5:22–24), each person so called has responsibility to pursue that final goal, being 'zealous to confirm your call and election' (2 Peter 1:10 rsv). '[C]hosen and faithful' go together (Rev. 17:14). As in every aspect of application of redemption, divine sovereignty and grace relieve no one of the responsibility of the 'great commandment' to love God with one's whole being. Failure to do so is the primary universal sin. If God is, He must be worshiped. The 'first and great commandment' is not optional.

How God Extends the Special Call and Makes it Effective

At this point our discussion moves to the difficult question of how the Word (truth, gospel) as means and the divine Spirit as agent join in producing the effectiveness of the special call. Some of the same mystery accompanies the first creation and most supernatural and miraculous events. The wind blew across the Red Sea when the waters were parted, for example. Did the wind part the waters or was it a mere accompaniment? The story does not say the wind had anything directly to do with it. As frequently celebrated by Israel's poets and prophets (Ps. 78:12, 13, for example) it is referred to as a sign or wonder brought about by God's power. The presence or absence of means is of no interest to the narrators. Again—how does God extend the special call and how does He make it effective?

Let us begin an answer with an important passage relating to the subject, the opening verses of the First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Paul and associates address 'the church of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 1 rsv). These 'chosen' (v. 4) have produced evidence of salvation by their work of faith, labour of love and steadfast hope [emphasis added] (cf. 1 Cor. 13:13) 'in our Lord Jesus Christ'. Hence Paul writes, '[W]e know, brothers loved by God, that he has chosen you, because our gospel came to you not only in word, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit and with full conviction' (1 Thess. 1:4, 5). The missionaries proclaimed the Word of God in the hearing of these Thessalonian people. The preached Word came with power in the Holy Spirit.

I think this is as near as we come to Paul's sense of the relation of the proclaimed Word with power when it comes to a group and of the Holy Spirit in the effective call of the chosen. To some of the hearers the Word is foolishness to be mocked, to others not a matter important enough to decide now (Acts 17:32). To a few the message comes with 'power', in 'the Holy Spirit and with full conviction', such as 'Dionysius the Areopagite and a woman named Damaris and others' (Acts 17:34).

The same elements of Word, power and Spirit are present in Paul's next letter to the believing folk at Thessalonica. In 2 Thessalonians 2:13 (kjv) Paul says 'God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation'—saved 'through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth'. In this case an effective change of heart such as Lydia's whose heart 'The Lord opened' (Acts 16:14) accompanied by 'belief in the truth'. He goes on to say, 'To this he called you through our gospel' (2 Thess. 2:14). It is not entirely clear that the Word, also called the Word of truth, was an instrument of calling but it was involved. The Spirit changed their hardened, heathen (idol worshipping, 1 Thess. 1:9) hearts to softened, believing hearts. They did not choose to change their 'evil heart of unbelief'—to be transformed at the depraved seat in the heart of man where moral habits reside and decisions are made—God did.

The Scriptures elsewhere make two categorical statements about the causes of effective calling (regeneration in its initiation). One says we are born again by the proclaimed Word of God, the gospel, as for example: 'you have been born again, not of perishable seed but of imperishable, through the living and abiding word of God ... this word is the good news [gospel] that was preached to you' (1 Peter 1:23, 25). So 'the word' is said to be 'living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing ... discerning' (Heb. 4:12). Further, God says His 'word' is 'like fire ... and like a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces' (Jer. 23:29).

Another set of passages says the transformation of the heart is caused by the Holy Spirit (or Christ, or the Father). Everyone is familiar with Jesus' counsel to Nicodemus to this effect (John 3:5, 8). It is probable that in 'born of water and the Spirit' (John 3:5), water stands for the Word as in Jesus' words to the woman at Sychar, in the very next chapter (John 4:13).

Francis Turretin (1623–1687) of the theological academy at Geneva, a century after Calvin, produced a large systematic theology in scholastic style (much like Thomas Aquinas'), recently published in an English translation. Turretin devotes a long section to the question of the relation of Word and Spirit in special calling. The various views of the subject are canvassed thoroughly in relation to what he says has been the orthodox doctrine.

Yet his conclusions are very reserved. His first proposition states:

The Ways of the Lord in grace as well as in nature are inscrutable. Nevertheless if we cannot understand the reason and the how of those things which God has willed to conceal from us, the thing itself and the fact, which has been plainly revealed to us, is not on that account to be denied by us.⁶

His last sentence on the subject, many pages later reads: 'There are innumerable things, the truth of which cannot be denied by anyone and yet their mode can evidently be understood by no one.'⁷

John Gill also comments with similar reserve:

The instrumental cause, or rather means of effecting vocation, is the ministry of the word. Sometimes, indeed, it is brought about by some remarkable providers, and without the word; but generally it is by it: 'Faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of God.' Christ stands in the gospel ministry, at the door of men's hearts, and having the key of the house of David he opens the heart by his power and grace, and lets himself in; and in this way, and by this means, the Spirit and all his grace, are received; men are called to grace and glory by the gospel, Gal. 1:6; 2 Thess. 2:14.⁸

The Blessings of Effectual Calling

This is a topic expounded at length in pastoral sermons and sermon literature, fruitful for edification of believers. The following is a summary of John Gill's treatment.

1. Out of ignorance, a state of great and gross darkness, into marvelous and surprising light (1 Peter 2:9). But in effectual calling, the eyes of their understanding are opened and they are made light in the Lord. When Paul was called by grace a light surrounded him and there fell from his eyes as it had been scales, as a token of inward enlightenment.
2. Out of bondage worse than Egyptian bondage into glorious liberty: 'brethren, ye have been called unto liberty' (Gal. 5:13 kjv), while seeking righteousness and life by law, a spirit of bondage.
3. From fellowship with men of the world 'called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord' (1 Cor. 1:9) and with others similarly delivered where there will be upward growth instead of downward.

4. God ‘has called you to peace’ (1 Cor. 7:15) whereas in a state of nature there is ‘no peace for the wicked’ (Isa. 48:22) because ‘the way of peace they have not known’ (Rom. 3:17).

5. God has ‘not called us for impurity, but in holiness’ (1 Thess. 4:7), ‘to glory and virtue’ (2 Peter 1:3 kjv).

6. ‘Into the grace of Christ’ (Gal. 1:6).

7. From the kingdom of Satan into ‘his kingdom and glory’ (1 Thess. 2:12).⁹

Summary and Conclusions

I have presented what I believe to be a biblically correct view of calling, first thought through, expounded and defended by Augustine, then recovered by the sixteenth-century Reformers and the chief representatives of evangelical theology. Through the ages four other views have been taken; these are:

The Pelagian

This (which called forth Augustine’s definitions of grace and faith) is outright rejection of any doctrine of inward grace in calling and regeneration. Pelagians ancient and modern do not believe man has anything so wrong with his heart and will that exposure to Scripture truth and persuasion cannot overcome. According to Pelagius, a fifth-century British monk, and a certain Celestius, his disciple and chief propagandist:

The grace of the Holy Spirit is not absolutely, but only relatively necessary to holiness; it renders its attainment easier.... Regeneration [or calling] does not consist in the renewal of the will by an internal operation of divine efficiency, but in the illumination of the intellect by the truth, the stimulation of the will by the threatenings of the law, etc.... God’s grace is designed for all but man must make himself worthy of it by honest striving after virtue [God helps those who help themselves].¹⁰

The Semi-Pelagian

This acknowledges the necessity of divine grace—not restored ability of the will but only special assistance. To receive this assistance one must first desire to be free from sin, to turn away from sin, and to desire God and holiness. If one does this one may expect God’s help.

As developed in the church first in North Africa in the early fifth century and—in spite of professed allegiance to Augustinism—as it has prevailed in the Latin Church thence onward, Semi-Pelagianism teaches:

Freedom of the will, in the sense of power to do good, is not wholly lost, but it is very much weakened. Man in his present condition is morally diseased. The imputation [guilt for] of original sin is removed in baptism, and without baptism no one attains salvation. Owing to his morally diseased and weakened condition, man needs the assistance of divine grace, in order to the practice of holiness, and the attainment of salvation. The moral freedom of man, or his power to do good, works in connection with divine grace. The two things are not to be separated from each other ... predestination to salvation or to perdition depends on the use man makes of the remainder of his freedom.¹¹

So it has been correctly asserted—Pelagianism says man is morally well, Semi-pelagianism that he is sick, Augustinism that he is dead.

Arminianism

As set forth in the works of Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) this was closer to Augustinian-Reformation theology of special-internal calling than Semi-Pelagianism, for Arminius accepted original sin and the deadness of the heart of man toward God and holiness. He differed in that he declared the moral center had been restored by Christ's atonement to the degree that without further divine aid it is within the power of every man to repent and turn to God. If God had not done this he would be unjust. So Arminius rooted this restoration in justice. John Wesley affirmed the same restoration but based it upon God's grace not on justice, hence he was closer to views of the leading Reformers and the churches descended from them.

A well-balanced Tyndale New Testament Lecture (British Inter-Varsity sponsored) by Francis Davidson made this insightful comment on the Arminian position on special calling.

This position refuses to distinguish between common grace, the operations of the Holy Spirit, universal in greater or lesser degree to all, and efficacious grace, which achieves its end in the conversion of the sinner. It is left to the moral ability of man to accept Christ and so escape eternal loss. The death of Christ is thus a fearful venture of God, uncertain as to its issue. On this view, God puts Himself at the mercy of something outside of Himself, since the divine foreknowledge, supposed to be its safeguard, is merely contemplative and not executive.¹²

Anglican thinking has tended to be Arminian (except at the very first), outside the Puritan party within the Church of England before the Puritan revolution. Gibson's comments on the Seventeenth Article (election, calling, perseverance) are Arminian. He criticizes Augustine for failure to balance the Scripture statement of predestination and election with those which employ not only human duties but ability to perform them and concludes on the 'Augustinian scheme': 'It is right in asserting that predestination is to life, and that the ground of it is inscrutable by us; wrong in denying that sufficient grace is given to all, and that salvation lies in the power of all men.'¹³

It is not wise to attribute any distinctive doctrine to the Church of England (Anglican, Episcopal). Says Jaroslav Pelikan: 'The Church of England—Lutheran in its intellectual origins, Catholic in its polity, Reformed in its official confessional statements [Arminian frequently in interpretation of the same], radical in its Puritan outcome, and, according to the old saw, "Pelagian in its pulpit, but Augustinian in its prayer book"'.¹⁴

¹ John Murray, Redemption: Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1955, 1973), pp. 7 and 88–94.

² A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 793.

- ³ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 2nd rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1939, 1979), Contents, p. 12.
- ⁴ James O. Buswell, Jr, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1962, 1971), p. 160.
- ⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 791.
- ⁶ Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology ii, trans. G. Giger, ed. J. T. Dennison, Jr (Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publ., 1992), p. 521.
- ⁷ ibid., p. 542.
- ⁸ John Gill, The Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, repr. of 1795, 1978) vol. i, p. 149.
- ⁹ ibid., pp. 125–127.
- ¹⁰ W. G. T. Shedd, A History of Christian Doctrine ii (Minneapolis: Klock & Klock Christian Publ., first published 1872, 1978), pp. 96, 97.
- ¹¹ ibid., pp. 109, 110.
- ¹² Francis Davidson (former professor in the seminary of United Original Secession Church of Scotland), Pauline Predestination (London: The Tyndale Press, 1945), p. 28.
- ¹³ Edgar C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England Explained with an Introduction, 8th ed. (London: Methuen & Co 1912), p. 489.
- ¹⁴ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine iii, Reformation of Church and Dogma 1300–1700 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984), p. 2.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (682). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

8

The Doctrine of Regeneration

Meaning and Theological Employment of ‘Regeneration’

In the Bible, regeneration and the Greek word it translates are used only twice. Readers of several recent English Versions of the New Testament will miss the scriptural origin of ‘regeneration’ present to everyone familiar with the King James Version and its revisions. The word renders paliggenesis, which does literally mean ‘again born’. The New International Version renders it literally—‘rebirth’ at Titus 3:5 but furnishes an interpretation, not a translation at Matthew 19:28, the only other occurrence of paliggenesis: ‘the renewal of all things’. Here, as in many aspects of theological discourse, the biblical origin of some of what otherwise might be thought to be invented, technical terms is lost on the reader. It is well to know that regeneration began its career in our tongue as a name for a religious event (Oxford Historical Dictionary) perhaps in Wycliffe’s translation of the Bible, not as what happens when a starfish loses a leg or a chameleon a tail. Modernity has co-opted and thereby diminished the usefulness of many words that formerly had distinct religious-theological-biblical meaning.

Regeneration first appears as the word Jesus used to designate that still future time promised by the prophets—‘the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory’ (kjv; esv also paraphrases ‘in the new world’) when His apostles shall ‘sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel’ (Matt. 19:28) a verse critical to millennial interpretation. The prophets had much to say of it, connecting it with the Messianic age. Peter seems to have connected it with the times of restitution of all things the prophets had predicted and to follow the Second Advent (Acts 3:21). In this case regeneration is cosmic renewal.

‘Regeneration’ appears a second and last time in the New Testament as one of Paul’s terms for the renewal of souls: ‘not by works done in righteousness, which we did ourselves, but according to his mercy he saved us, through the washing of regeneration [paliggenesis] and renewing of the Holy Spirit’ (Titus 3:5 asv). Except for those who teach baptismal regeneration, most evangelical theology understands ‘renewing of the Holy Spirit’ as either an explanation of ‘washing of regeneration’ or as appositive—‘even the renewing of the Holy Spirit’. ‘Washing of regeneration’ is something that happens in the hearts of all like those new believers at Thessalonica when they ‘turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God’ (1 Thess. 1:9).

Some other New Testament designations of this transforming event are: to be ‘born again’ (1 Peter 1:3), ‘created ... in true righteousness and holiness’ (Eph. 4:24), to be given life by the Son (John 5:21), to be ‘called ... out of darkness into his marvellous light’ (1 Peter 2:9) or ‘brought from death to life’ (Rom. 6:13), or ‘a new creation’ (2 Cor. 5:17), ‘born again’ or ‘anew’ (John 3:3, 7) becoming partakers of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4) or God’s ‘workmanship, created in Christ Jesus’ (Eph. 2:10). There are others. This idea is pervasive in the New Testament patently and, as we shall see, latently, in the Old Testament.

There is considerable uncertainty among us who teach theology as to whether Jesus meant ‘born again’ or ‘born from above’ (John 3:3) where He used the words gennēthē anōthen. Nicodemus understood ‘born again’. Perhaps the scholars who suggest Jesus was purposely ambiguous are correct. Jesus did not rebuke His visitor’s idea of a second or again-birth, but wished Nicodemus to understand what the Old Testament clearly teaches, that the prophesied new birth of the nation of Israel and necessarily of the individual people who would then compose the reborn Israel would be spiritual not physical. It would be caused by the Spirit of God, who is sovereign in method, means and timing.

So gennēthē anōthen and paliggenesis are near precise equivalents. Each word employs the same Greek root word for bearing a child, one in noun form (Matt. 19:28) and the other the verb form (John 3:3, 4, 5, 8). Palin unambiguously means again, another time; anō usually means above, but even so, perhaps once more is the sense of above in the Greek mind. The transition is natural. There is no question that the new- or again-birth Jesus intended is caused by divine power ('from above', if one so understands anō) for Jesus specifies a birth by water 'and the Spirit' in John 3:8.

'Regeneration' has been employed in a broad sense and in a narrow sense in Protestant theology. John Gill observes: 'Regeneration may be considered either more largely, and then it includes ... effectual calling, conversion and sanctification; or more strictly ... then it designates [designates] the first principle of grace infused into the soul.'¹ Calvin, James I. Packer notes, sometimes 'used the term "regeneration" to cover man's whole subjective renewal, including conversion and sanctification'.² For example, Calvin can 'interpret repentance as regeneration, whose sole end is to restore in us the image of God ... all but obliterated through Adam's transgression'.³ Yet he also held to the doctrine we designate regeneration by the narrow sense of the word.⁴

J. P. Boyce treated regeneration and conversion together—'unquestionably so intimately associated that it is difficult to separate them and point out distinctions between them'. He explains:

The Scriptures connect the two under the one idea of the new birth, and teach that not only is regeneration an absolute essential in each conversion, but that in every intelligent responsible soul conversion invariably accompanies regeneration... The Scriptures also teach that regeneration is the work of God, changing the heart of man by his sovereign will, while conversion is the act of man turning towards God with the new inclination thus given to his heart.⁵

After rejecting any regenerating power in baptismal 'washing' (Titus 3:5) Calvin goes on to say, 'It is therefore the Spirit of God who regenerates us, and makes us new creatures; but because his grace is invisible and hidden, a visible symbol of it is beheld in baptism.'⁶ In comment on 2 Timothy 2:11, Calvin says: 'Our salvation begins with regeneration, and is completed by our perfect deliverance, when God takes us away from the miseries of this mortal life.'⁷ See E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation.⁸

Regeneration as the awakening of the soul to life at the beginning of the application of redemption (Titus 3:5) is not as remote from regeneration at the cosmic renewal as it might seem. Our salvation as sinners is not complete renewal until the resurrection of our fully sanctified souls at the coming of the Lord (1 Thess. 5:23, 24). The complete deliverance of the remotest particle of the cosmos (ta panta 'all things' and 'the heavens and the earth') is scheduled for the same occasion. Paul found comfort for us all in bringing the full regeneration of the elect into future connection with full renewal of all creation. He sets this comprehensive vision of a completed redemption in a remarkable flight of exaltation. 'I consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed to us. For the creation waits with eager longing for the revealing of the sons of God' (Rom. 8:18, 19). Creation was subjected by the Creator to 'futility' (esv and rsv) ('corruption' kjv), presumably in connection with man's fall (Gen. 3). This 'connection' may be subject to degradation of energy and misuse on account of sin, suffering the same along with the sufferings of mankind. In the future, when our 'regeneration' in the larger sense is complete at the 'redemption of our bodies' the order of nature ('the creation') also shall be delivered from its 'bondage to decay'.

This seems to approximate Paul's expectation designed to give us 'hope' (vv. 24 and 25). Packer hints at such a connection in a short article:

The noun 'regeneration' (paliggenesia) occurs only twice. In Matthew 19:28 it denotes the eschatological 'restoration of all things' (Acts 3:21) under the Messiah for which Israel was waiting. This echo of Jewish usage points to the larger scheme of cosmic renewal within which that of individuals refers to [Titus 3:5] finds its place.⁹

In modern preaching and systematic theology, however, regeneration is employed almost exclusively with reference to the spiritual life of individual believers. This will be our only focus in this chapter.

A statement of Jesus to Nicodemus, the inquiring night visitor to Jesus during His first public ministry at Jerusalem, suggests that a good place to start the discussion of the idea of regeneration (renewal, spiritual cleansing and rehabilitation), is the Old Testament. Jesus had said, 'unless one is born again he cannot see the kingdom of God'. To which the shy, aristocratic night visitor responded, 'How can this be?' (John 3:9 rsv). To this the Master teacher rejoined, 'Are you the teacher of Israel and yet you do not understand these things?' (John 3:10). The clear implication is that any good teacher of the Hebrew Scriptures should know that Messiah's kingdom would be preceded by Israel's repentance and purification, that the nation would be purified in the hearts of its members as an aspect of the restoration of 'the kingdom to Israel' (Acts 1:6).

Paliggenesia (Regeneration) in Pre-Christian Literature

Non-biblical Vocabulary of Renewal

Paliggenesia, rendered 'regeneration' in both its New Testament appearances, like almost all theological religious New Testament terms, had a previous history in Greek culture. Briefly, it 'first seems to have acquired significance in Stoicism' (viz. Acts 17:18). In Stoicism its significance was first, the renewal of the world after a future ekpurosis (holocaust, purification of the world by fire). In a fragment of a pagan writer preserved in Augustine's City of God (22.28) 'paliggenesia is used for the new birth of individuals in a new period of the world, and this (new birth of individuals) is accepted as the general Greek usage'.¹⁰ Though used by ancient mystery religions, they followed Jewish and Christian usage.¹¹ When the word passed from Stoicism to Judaism its meaning changed. It is no longer a repetition of old existence but 'an existence in which righteousness dwells'. In Philo and Josephus, both of whom use the word, though it refers to a future world, it 'is filled with a new religious content'. A passage in Cicero, however, 'shows that even toward the end of the first century BC a present experience could be called paliggenesia'.¹²

So when the word appears in John's report of Jesus' conversation with Nicodemus its freight of individual transformation connected with a new principle of life 'had long since been used by the educated'.¹³ Yet the same could be said of Jesus' reference to the coming New World, the kingdom of righteousness and peace connected with the Parousia in Matthew 19:28. (See also 22:30 'in the resurrection' and similar references at Mark 10:30 and Luke 18:30 'in the age to come'.)

A sentence from the thorough work of James V. Bartlet in HDB shows how close Jesus' assumptions about the future were to the national expectation of a national 'birth-again', i.e.

restoration. National restoration is a sense found in Josephus (Ant. XI iii.9) “he anaktisis kai paliggennesis tēs patriδος” [“the new creation and regeneration of the fatherland”]; and this in the fuller sense of the Messianic renewal of Palestine’.¹⁴ Bartlet’s 8,000 word article is an abundant source (Contract 2½ columns in The Anchor Bible Dictionary).

Regeneration in Biblical History and Prediction

In Old Testament History

Theology which takes the ‘higher critical’ views of Old Testament literature and history finds no evidence of holiness in an ethical sense much before the pre-exilic prophets. Passages in the Pentateuch that relate to our subject of spiritual renewal, such as I will soon introduce, are supposed to come from the same epoch as the eighth-century prophets. On the word of Jesus, however, we accept what is evident anyway, that there are no compelling reasons to believe Abram, Isaac and Jacob were incapable of understanding a high level of ethical religion, however incomplete divine revelation may have been at the time. Recently my wife lifted her eyes from reading Genesis 32:22–32, where Jacob met God, left the encounter with a new name and a new limp, muttering, ‘Peniel, for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved’. Then she asked, ‘Do you think this is when Jacob was converted?’ I said, ‘Yes I do think so, as numberless old-fashioned preachers have declared.’ Conversion is sequel to regeneration. If this is ‘narrative theology’ let us have more.

It does seem clear, however, that spiritually the sons of Jacob scarcely rose above a coarse level of moral and spiritual outlook. The records of the time do not say anything specific about a personal level of fellowship with God. True, God spoke to Jacob and Joseph in dreams, but He also spoke to Pharaoh and eminently to a Philistine pagan king (Gen. 20:6, 7; 41:1 ff.).

Further, though the thousands of the nation of Israel in Egypt were redeemed by the blood of the Passover lamb, those same thousands showed slight evidence of personal regeneration. They, everyone twenty years old and upward, died, many in unbelief, and their ‘carcases’ as Numbers 14:29 (kjv) indignantly puts it, were buried in the sands of the wilderness. Whatever one may think their theology of the ‘Abrahamic Covenant’ and of righteousness by faith may have been, it did not seem to ‘take’ with them.

Yet Moses’ sermons to the next generation, delivered at the very borders of Canaan, breathe the spirit of religion of the heart. Much of the legislation earlier announced by him implies a heart to love God, His truth and a desire for His fellowship among those for whom the legislation was designed.

There are passages in Moses’ sermons at the border of Canaan, which shape some of the New Testament language about regeneration. Moses speaks of a renewed heart to be effected in the hearers at that time, as in Deuteronomy 10:12–22, especially the following: ‘[T]he Lord set his heart in love on your fathers and chose their offspring after them... Circumcise therefore the foreskins of your heart, and be no longer stubborn’ (Deut. 10:15, 16). With an important variation, in a later address at the border of Canaan, Moses spoke later of how God would effect such an inward spiritual renewal (Deut. 30:1–10), especially the following: ‘And the Lord your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your offspring, so that you will love the Lord your God with all you heart and with all your soul, that you may live’ (Deut. 30:6).

In the first paragraph the preacher exhorts the hearers themselves to circumcise their hearts but in the second he promises that the Lord will circumcise their hearts. In both cases obedience to God's will as expressed in the law is an accompaniment. Whether as consequence or as cause is obscure.

In any case the story of Old Testament Israel describes many obviously sincere people who approached the ideal of the circumcised heart set forth above. There are of course the prophets and David whose heart-love for God has such intensity that he is described as a man after God's own heart (1 Sam. 13:14; see also Ps. 119:10 and many passages pronouncing persons blessed). The devout people who inhabit the first two chapters of Luke had each the circumcised heart as much as any person ever has—Mary, Joseph, Elizabeth, Zacharias, Simeon, Anna. It has been argued that John was regenerate in the womb or he would not have responded (leaped kjv) as he did to the presence of his likewise in utero Lord (Luke 1:41), though this is a rather broad 'leap' of logic, if the pun may be pardoned. And there are Simeon and Anna. We should not neglect the Magi whom mysteriously God had invited to search out the Savior of the world.

These evidences—and much more—demonstrate that whether called regeneration or not, there were some, even innumerable multitudes, who were 'born again' before Jesus uttered the memorable words of John 3. Let us not forget about Melchizedek, Job and Moses' father-in-law who had passed from death to life through the immediate activity of the Holy Spirit.

I shall argue in the last chapter of this study of soteriology that there is no salvation except through Christ, and that other religions, far from being ways to salvation, are without exception obstacles to faith in the one true God. Yet it has always been true that the Spirit, like the wind, moves on whom and where He will, but also when He will.

Regeneration in Old Testament Promise

Regeneration has an organic doctrinal development in the whole Bible far too extensive in detail to develop on these pages. I and everyone who writes on the subject is debtor to the comprehensive article, 'Regeneration', by James Vernon Bartlet,¹⁵ Prof. of Church History, Mansfield College, Oxford University.

Much of Old Testament history and ritual is acknowledged by the New Testament to be typical of realities rather than the realities themselves as later revealed and explained in the New Testament. Paul, for example, employed the Red Sea crossing and wilderness wanderings as metaphor for Christian verities only partially partaking of permanent Christian realities (1 Cor. 10:1, ff.). Hebrews traces predictive symbolical connections (i.e. typical connections) between the Old Testament ritual shadows and New Testament realities. Among these are national election as a shadow of personal election. However, the passages concerning a national renovation, renewal, require the personal, spiritual renovation of the members of the nation.

In Jeremiah 31:17–20 the Lord says to Ephraim, leading tribe of the apostate northern kingdom, 'There is hope for your future' (v. 17), and goes on to describe a future chastening, repentance, divine mercy and permanent change of heart. '[T]his is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, declares the Lord: I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts ... they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest' (Jer. 31:32–34). The reader will recognize that New Testament writers borrow these texts specifically to describe the New Testament experience of regeneration and incorporation into God's family of non-Israelites (Heb. 8:8–12). These writers treat the passage as a prediction of the regeneration of persons in this age as well as the coming age of the cosmic regeneration specified by Jesus in Matthew 19:28.

The same can be said of Jeremiah 32:38–40 especially, 'I will put the fear of me in their hearts, that they may not turn from me' (v. 40). The same may be said of Ezekiel's several prophecies of future spiritual renewal: Ezekiel 11:19, 20, especially v. 19, 'I will give them one heart, and a new spirit I will put within them. I will remove the heart of stone from their flesh and give them a heart of flesh'. Also Ezekiel 36:24–30, especially verses 26 and 27: 'I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you. And I will remove the heart of stone from your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit [Holy Spirit?] within you', etc. See also the conclusion of the prophecy of restoring life to Israel's dry bones, chapter 37, especially the last verse (v. 14): 'And I will put my Spirit within you, and you shall live, and I will place you in your own land. Then you shall know that I am the Lord; I have spoken and I will do it, declares the Lord.'¹⁶

These are features of Old Testament prediction of and preparation for the New Testament teaching of regeneration. These Old Testament verities are without a shadow of a doubt, it appears to me, what Jesus had in mind when He sent Nicodemus back to his lodgings in a mood to rethink all his pharisaical presuppositions about the true religion of Israel as opposed to the official Judaism of the Palestinian synagogues. 'Are you the teacher of Israel and do not know about the necessity of being born again to enter the promised Messianic kingdom?'

Regeneration in the New Testament Presentation

a) Jesus' public teaching phrased the doctrine in the context of particular incidents. Jesus once called a child out of the crowd and said, 'unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven' (Matt. 18:3). In response to the grumbling objections of Pharisees and other 'experts' to the welcome Jesus put out to 'publicans and sinners', He told the story of the redemption of a prodigal son whose father twice pronounces at the denouement, 'this your brother was dead, and is alive; he was lost, and is found' (Luke 15:24, 32). When Peter made the great confession the Lord informed him he had not simply thought it up, but that God had made his heart know it (Matt. 16:17).

The parable of the four kinds of seeds of which only one manifest 'an honest and good heart, and bear fruit' (Luke 8:15) exposes regeneration in action. To these let us add all the evidence of the sixth chapter of John that faith is always taught by God.

Of course the primary teaching about regeneration is Jesus' response to Nicodemus to which we have referred and to which we shall turn later.

b) The word of James is still Jewish (James 1:1) and the Christian assembly still a 'synagogue' (James 2:2). James was interested, like his Old Testament prophetic predecessors in 'the collective quickening traceable to the divine initiative rather than the individual—though the latter is implied in the exhortation to receive the "inborn word" (the implanted word which is able to save your souls, James 1:21)'.¹⁷ James, the practical man, throughout his Epistle is addressing chiefly those who were already members of the persecuted 'sect of the Nazarenes' and of how regeneration of the heart will be manifest in observable manner of behavior. ‘Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures’ (James 1:18). He is aware that the true believer may be seated beside a merely nominal one (see James 2:1), but the two will show their true colours in the way they endure trials, bridle their tongues, show respect of persons or not, how they use God’s name in passion (curse or blessing), manifest meekness of wisdom, how they use money, and in concern for lapsed believers.

c) Peter, though an apostle to the circumcision and expressing much of his doctrine in metaphors drawn from the Old Testament, by the time he wrote his Epistles fully understood the doctrine of regeneration, as fully as Paul and John, though expressed in somewhat different language. Indeed, some of the most striking statements of the doctrine of regeneration are in the first chapter of each of Peter’s Epistles, e.g. ‘You have been born again’ (1 Peter 1:23) and ‘you may become partakers of the divine nature’ (2 Peter 1:4).

Peter’s expressive ‘partakers of the divine nature’ has been interpreted by various amateur theologians and by the entire Eastern church throughout Christian history as deification, theosis (Gr.), almost as though we partake of Christ’s divine nature just as He partook of ours. Despite some incautious language by perfectly orthodox teachers and preachers the theosis doctrine has never been held by informed evangelical people. Jaroslav Pelikan observes that even ‘Jonathan Edwards repeatedly quoted 2 Peter 1:4 to prove that “the grace which is in the hearts of the saints is of the same nature with the divine holiness”, adding the proviso that this would be only “as much as” is possible for that holiness to be, which is infinitely less in degree ... not to be taken to mean “that the saints are made partakers of the essence of God, and so are ‘Godded’ with God.”’¹⁸

d) ‘St Paul’s unique experience of the gospel as the power of God in the soul, and as an essentially present Salvation, marks an epoch in the New Testament doctrine of regeneration.’¹⁹ Paul’s experience of the spiritual illumination and quickening which he later called ‘the washing of regeneration’ was unique. Neither he nor Luke, his biographer, tired of relating it. Paul developed ‘the gospel that I proclaim among the Gentiles’ (Gal. 2:2) not by thinking it up or by borrowing, but ‘by revelation’. He ‘conferred not with flesh and blood’ (Gal. 1:16 kjv) in developing that proclamation (kērygma). That Peter learned some of what he knew from Paul, is clear from the Acts narrative and the second chapter of Galatians—as that impulsive converted fisherman acknowledged (Gal. 2; 2 Peter 3:14, 15). Though justification may be the center of Paul’s emphasis, regeneration is no less important. If Jesus declared the necessity of regeneration Paul explained why it is necessary.

e) Hebrews affirms but does not develop the idea of individual regeneration. The Epistle brings the promised national regeneration in Jeremiah (see Heb. 9:6 ff. and 10:15–18) to bear on the importance of perseverance in full acceptance of the Christian revelation in the work and words of Jesus. The author is zealous to prevent apostasy of the converted.

f) John, the affectionate disciple, contributes to the idea of regeneration not only Jesus’ pivotal words on the subject (John 3:3 ff.) but, from an aged pastor’s heart, informs those willing to be taught as little children how regeneration works out in life and how it may be verified in others and in the self (1 John).

The Nature of Regeneration As Revealed

I shall not repeat what was said about effective calling, the initiation of regeneration, all of which applies here. Nor can any one explain anything that is as such an immediate work of God. Let us come quickly to a definition and enlargement of the definition. In this section I acknowledge debt to B. B. Warfield.

Definition

Warfield defined regeneration as the ‘radical and complete transformation wrought in the soul (Rom. 12:12; Eph. 4:23) by God the Holy Spirit (Titus 3:5; Eph. 4:23), by virtue of which we become “new men” (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:9), but in knowledge and holiness of truth created after the image of God (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; Rom. 12:2)’.²⁰ This definition, though analytical, is also scriptural in language and more ‘doxological’, i.e. related to worship, than theoretical. It is useful as an index to the categories of the following discussion.

Let us keep in mind as we proceed that the characteristics of the effectual call, all carry over to regeneration, of which the call is only the initiation. We have already learned that 1) the person who is the subject of regeneration, though becoming active, is a receptor (passive) in regeneration. One receives Christ after gaining discernment and power to do so. 2) As in the paradigmatic case of Saul of Tarsus, effectual call and regeneration may not be successfully resisted. The poem of ‘The Hound of Heaven’ is true; God’s Spirit pursues us, not we Him. 3) There may be preparation in one’s inner experience (as in Saul’s case). Was his conscience accusing him and not excusing as he pursued his way to Damascus? Likely so, but regeneration in the narrow sense is instantaneous. 4) It is a complete work. One can neither be somewhat pregnant or somewhat regenerated. 5) It is permanent. Said Jesus: ‘I give them eternal life, and they will never perish’ (John 10:28). This latter point will be discussed further as an aspect of assurance and of perseverance.

1. Regeneration is wrought ... ‘by God’. God and God alone is the author of the new birth. In John 1:12, 13 we read: ‘... children of God, who were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God’. James 1:18 states: ‘Of his own will he brought us forth’. See also Ephesians 1:19, 20; 2:10; 1 Peter 1:3; 1 Corinthians 3:6, 7. This is in contrast with the views of certain Protestant leaders who have held that man co-operates with God in his own regeneration. This view, known as ‘synergism’, was belatedly advocated in the sixteenth century by Philip Melancthon (Lutheran), in the seventeenth century by Jacobus Arminius, and in the eighteenth century by John Wesley. Yet, happily, none of the three was consistently synergistic, each rejoicing to give all the glory to God and anxious to pray for God to act in converting sinners. None succeeded in squaring his view with Scripture.²¹

2. It is a change wrought ‘in the soul’. Sometimes we like to say the Word of God is empowered or illuminated and, understood as figures of speech, correctly. Yet the Word is always the same Word. As truth, it is not subject to change. The power or enlightenment involved in conversion of sinners is within the sinner not within the Bible. His mind (soul) is enlightened (special calling, prevenient grace) so that he can understand the gospel and his enfeebled will—really dead as regard to God—is strengthened to enable him to turn toward God. It would be quite as correct to say the change is in the sinner’s heart. This is what is meant by ‘new creation’ (2 Cor. 5:17) and new ‘nature’

(2 Peter 1:4), a ‘new heart’ (Ezek. 36:26) and new ‘spirit of your mind’ (Eph. 4:23).

We must, however, guard against supposing that some new ‘substance’ is added to the soul. Certain well-meaning Christians have argued that natural man has two parts alive—body and soul—and a third part dead—spirit. They have said that when the Spirit of God comes in He takes the place of the dead spirit, etc. This is near enough to the truth to be dangerous. It reminds us of Apollinaris (condemned at Constantinople, ad 381) who tried to explain Christ’s nature as two-thirds man (body and soul) and one-third divine logos (spirit, pneuma). True, the Spirit of God indwells the believer at regeneration, not to make him a divine being (the ‘union with Christ’ idea is pressed almost to this extreme sometimes), but to change the governing disposition. Man has the ‘faculty’ of love before regeneration. By regeneration it is redirected, away from improper love of self to a proper love of the self and of God.

3. Does the Spirit of God employ any instrument in effecting regeneration? This question has been discussed earlier in connection with effective calling, but must be raised again here.

There are those who suppose, resting on a misunderstanding of John 3:5 and Titus 3:5, that baptism effects regeneration in infants. We would contend that according to Scripture the water of baptism is not the instrument of regeneration but only its sign or ritual symbol. Many will agree, therefore, that baptism ought to follow regeneration, that only those showing credible evidence of new birth ought to be baptized. Those evangelical teachers who advocate baptism of those who by reason of infancy cannot believe (Lutherans excepted) often assign a quite different meaning to water baptism, such as a ‘sign of the covenant of grace’ or a ‘promise of the parents’ or ‘dedication’ of the infant by the parents or all three. Confessional Lutheranism affirms that infant baptism is believers’ baptism, that not palpably, but none the less genuinely, the ‘little ones’ do believe. With A. H. Strong we strongly assert to the contrary that:

Not external baptism, but the conscientious turning of the soul to God which baptism symbolizes saves us (1 Peter 3:2, the answer of a good conscience). Texts like John 3:5, Acts 2:38, Colossians 2:12, Titus 3:5 are to be explained upon the principle that regeneration, the inward change, and baptism, the outward sign of the change, were regarded as only different sides or aspects of the same fact, and either side or aspect might therefore be described in terms derived from the other.²²

It is correct to say that the Word of God, pricking the graciously enlightened conscience (special calling) moves the man to turn to God. We do not know exactly how, two texts are especially pertinent: ‘... love one another earnestly from a pure heart, since you have been born again, not of perishable seed but of imperishable, through the living and abiding word of God ... And this word is the good news that was preached to you’ (1 Peter 1:22, 23, 25) and ‘... precious and very great promises, so that through them you may become partakers of the divine nature’ (2 Peter 1:4).

4. Evidence of the new birth. There is small Scripture authority for demanding of one’s self or of another professed believer some proof of regeneration based upon subjective feelings at a certain time and place, though at certain times in Protestant history men have thought otherwise. There are, however:

a) Certain internal evidences, designated by Scripture, whereby we may make our own ‘calling and election sure’ (2 Peter 1:10). They are true belief in Christ (1 John 5:1), true love for Christ (John 8:42) and the witness of the Spirit (Rom. 8:16; 1 John 3:24). Our spirits will also receive assurance from the Spirit as we understand the scriptures. True love of Christian brethren (1 John 3:14) is both an internal affection and as manifested, an observable evidence. If we believe that God has direct access to our minds, then the witness of the Spirit may be in the form of a subjective feeling of assurance. Much has been written on the subject and many disagreeing opinions expressed. We need greater assurance than our volatile feelings supply. The regenerate man delights in God’s law (Rom. 7:22; Ps. 1:2).

b) Certain external evidences, designated by Scripture as ‘credible evidence’ of regeneration in other people than ourselves. They are practical righteousness (1 John 2:29), observable love of others (1 John 4:7), Christian victory over the world, i.e. lack of defeat by it or conformity to it (Rom. 12:1, 2; cf. 1 John 5:4), and observable discontinuance of sinful ways (1 John 5:18; 3:9).

To make one’s ‘calling and election sure’ as Peter says (2 Peter 1:10) is a very important matter for every Christian. A later chapter of Soteriology will treat the subject more at length under the topic of ‘Christian Assurance of Personal Salvation’.

Regeneration Expounded

Let us further expound regeneration more in the mode of a pulpit homily, guided by the London scholar-pastor, John Gill, much abbreviated. (Excluded by law, as a non-conformist, from the universities, John Gill was self-taught. Over a long life while continually serving a Baptist church in London he mastered the biblical languages and the languages of European scholarship. He was probably the only Gentile in Britain who could read the Talmud in the original Aramaic and Hebrew. His writings on all branches of theology are largely phrased in the very language of Scripture. His works, including the Body of Divinity, which I have adapted in the following are again recommended—not for the hyper-Calvinism at occasional junctures, but for the transparent, orderly, understandable theological and biblical integrity.)

What Regeneration Is, or What Is Meant by Regeneration?

1. It is to be ‘born again’ (John 3:3, 7), which presupposes a prior birth of sinful parents and in their image, the second of God and in His image.

2. It is to be ‘born from above’ as John 3:3 and 7 may be translated but, if not so translated, it is certainly implied in John 3:27; James 1:17; 18 and 1 Peter 1:3, 4. This of course indicates that God Himself causes regeneration and by that event we become His children.

3. It is commonly called ‘the new birth’ in theological discourse because it produces ‘newborn infants’ (1 Peter 2:2). The regenerate person is variously said to be a ‘new creature’, a ‘new man’ with a new spirit, new understanding with new desires, new delights and new joys.

4. They have been made alive (Eph. 2:1). Christ is their resurrection and life. The new man has new eyes (the eyes of faith); new ears, they hear the Word in a manner they never heard it before (Matt. 13:16, 17); also new hands, to handle the Word of life and to work with; and new feet to flee to Christ the new city of refuge. New ability to pray to God. There are in the regenerate man (which shows he is alive spiritually), cravings for spiritual food as a newborn infant craves the mother's breast and a spiritual taste (see Ps. 19:10–14).

5. Christ is formed in the heart (Gal. 4:2), His image stamped there 'after the image of its creator'. They have been predestined to be conformed to the image of Christ (Col. 3:10; Rom. 8:29).

6. They have become partakers of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4)—not of God's essence, for we are mere creatures of God. But in regeneration there is that wrought in the soul which bears a resemblance in spirituality, holiness, goodness, kindness, etc., and is therefore so called. The moral image of God restored.

7. Various other terms express regeneration where those born-again are said to be 'begotten again'. God's 'seed' is said to 'remain in him—and others'.

What Are the Causes or 'Springs' of Regeneration?

1. The efficient cause, of course, is not man. Scripture makes a special point of this. The natural man sees no need of it and does not want it (1 Cor. 2:14). They, as Jesus said, who think they are whole physically see no need of a physician—so it is in the spiritual realm. Nicodemus' wonderment at the notion shows how even a sincere, religiously informed, intelligent man could not even understand the notion by his own native but unrenewed powers.

2. The regeneration of a sinner is a 'creation' in the sense of bringing something new (not a new substance but a renewal of disposition) into existence, which is only God's to do. Spoken of as a resurrection from the dead—as soon might dead bodies quicken themselves, as men, dead in sin, raise themselves up to a spiritual life. It is something done to us, not by us or even with our co-operation. Like all else, even our acts such as repenting, believing, turning to God (conversion), regeneration is a gift.

3. Scripture expressly denies regeneration to be of men: not of the blood, or circumcision, the blood of ancestors, even the most holy (John 1:12, 13). Those who in Jesus' time boasted of being of Abraham's seed were unable even to give the idea a friendly ear.

4. The efficient cause is God only, hence we read 'who has been born of God' and 'everyone who is born of God' (John 1:13; 1 John 3:9; 5:1, 4). In this the Father begets us again (1 Peter 1:3 kjv). The Son, who is the resurrection and the life is the one of whom we are born (1 John 2:28, 29). But the Holy Spirit is the author or agent (as expounded earlier).

5. The instrumental cause of regeneration is the Word of God and the ministers of it. Gill makes a point of including the ministers of the Word as a properly and scripturally instrumental cause of regeneration citing 1 Corinthians 4:15: 'For though you have countless guides in Christ, you do not have many fathers. For I became your father in Christ Jesus through the gospel.' Further, Paul speaks of Onesimus as one whom he had 'begotten in my bonds' (Philem. 10 kjv). Gill is as unable as any other theologian to explain just how the Word as Scripture or gospel is an instrument, for as God immediately spoke the original universe into being so He creates life (speaking it into being) before the Word as message exerts any power.²³

The Subjects of Regeneration

They are neither good angels who have no need of it, nor evil angels for they are granted no share in it. John the Baptist said God could raise up sound, good children out of stones (Matt. 3:9; Luke 3:8) but He chose to operate thus on ‘rational creatures’ whom He regenerates. He does so not with all but such among mankind as are called and separated from the rest of the world of whom Peter speaks as ‘born again to a living hope’ and first described by Peter as ‘elect ... according to the foreknowledge’ (1 Peter 1:1–2, 3). Regeneration’s chief seat is the spirit or soul yet its influence is extended to the whole man, a fact to which Christians should give special attention (Rom. 12:1, 2) and through the Spirit put to death the deeds of the body of sin (Rom. 6:12, 13).

The Effects of Regeneration Are Four

1. The principal effect, perhaps an accompaniment, in any case not possible without new life, is participation (as all the first Reformers insisted) in repentance, faith, conversion and sanctification. Arminian and Semi-Pelagian theology puts faith ahead of regeneration in the order of salvation. But this supposes that men in the state of nature can initiate repentance and faith or at least co-operate with the Spirit in creating faith. Augustinians interpret 1 John 5:1 to say ‘whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ has been already born of God’. Love of the brethren (1 John 3:14), and all the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22, 23), develop out of regeneration not into it.

2. Enjoyment of all spiritual blessings follows upon regeneration. These blessings take place only ‘in Christ Jesus’ which union in history occurs at the moment of regeneration. The regenerate have been loved by ‘an everlasting love’ (Jer. 31:3). ‘[T]herefore’, says the Lord, ‘with loving kindness have I drawn thee’ (Jer. 31:3 kjv). They have been ‘chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world’, but this is not known by them till the gospel comes (special calling) not in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Spirit.

Justification was a sentence conceived in the mind of God from eternity; was pronounced on Christ, and his people in him, when he rose from the dead; but is not known to those interested in it, till the Spirit of God reveals the righteousness of Christ from faith to faith, and pronounces upon it the sentence of justification in the conscience of the believer; until he is born again, he has no knowledge of this blessing, no comfortable perception of it, nor can he ... nor have that peace and joy which flow from it.²⁴

3. The third effect is a fitness and capacity for performance of good works—see such passages as Ephesians 2:10; 4:24; 2 Timothy 2:21; Hebrews 9:6; Romans 8:8; Ezekiel 36:37; and Philippians 4:13.

4. Regeneration makes us ‘fit’ or ‘meet’ to enter the kingdom of God—whether one thinks of that kingdom as (in part) a true Christian assembly of believers or the future kingdom of glory. This was the main point of Jesus’ response to Nicodemus’ inquiries (John 3:3, 5). At the coming judgment which introduces the future kingdom the unregenerate—the ‘tares’ or ‘weeds’—will all be taken out and burned (Matt. 13:24–30; 23:15; 21:31, 43; see also 1 Cor. 6:9; Luke 12:32; Matt. 25:34).

It is hoped the reader who has followed carefully through the preceding adaptation of some theology of the Puritan-Baptist Paracelsus of the eighteenth century will see the value of minute and thorough mastery of the English Bible is necessary for a careful and complete theology. The Puritans did not resource their theology by ‘surfing the net’. They made their minds the net by prolonged, careful, resourceful study until the Bible was part of id, ego and superego. Only then were they ready to write systematic theology.

We turn next to the acts of the elect, called and regenerate, in conversion. In this they alone are active. They do all the repenting and all the believing.

¹ John Gill, The Complete Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity, vol. ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, repr. of 1795, 1978), p. 107.

² J. I. Packer, ‘Regeneration’, in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. A. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), p. 925.

³ John Calvin, Institutes iii.3.8, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960).

⁴ Calvin, Institutes iii.3.6–14.

⁵ James Pedigree Boyce, Abstract of Theology (Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Soc., 1878).

⁶ Calvin, ‘Commentary on Titus 3:5’, in Commentaries on the Epistles to Timothy, Titus & Philemon (Edinburgh: 1856), p. 334.

⁷ ibid., p. 217.

⁸ E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1965), p. 231.

⁹ Packer, in EDT, p. 925.

¹⁰ This is quoted and cited from Buechsel in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, vol. i, ed. G. Kittel and G. Frederich, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), pp. 686, 687.

¹¹ ibid., p. 689.

¹² ibid., pp. 688, 689.

¹³ ibid., p. 689.

HDB A Dictionary of the Bible, Ed. James Hastings, 5 volumes

¹⁴ James V Bartlet ‘Regeneration’ in Hastings Dictionary of the Bible iv (New York: Charles

James A. Grant, Regeneration, in Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, v. (New York: Charles Scribner & Sons, 1909), p. 214.

¹⁵ ibid., pp. 214–221.

¹⁶ ibid., pp. 214–216.

¹⁷ ibid., p. 217.

¹⁸ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine vol. v. Christian Doctrine and Modern Culture (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989), p. 163.

¹⁹ Bartlet, in Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, p. 220.

²⁰ B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), p. 351. I note that J. I. Packer's article on 'Regeneration' in EDT employs Warfield's definition.

²¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 815–817.

²² ibid., p. 821.

²³ Gill, Doctrinal and Practical Divinity vol. i, p. 115.

²⁴ ibid., p. 118.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (689). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

9

The Doctrine of Conversion

A few terms of theology are special and rare in ordinary speech. Conversion is not one of them. When contesting football teams change ends of the field and goalposts—a complete reversal of direction—it is called a conversion. This is strictly consonant with biblical and theological usage. To 'convert' from being a Protestant to being a Roman Catholic is not quite the same, I judge—a big change but not necessarily a complete reversal. Even so, this word conversion/convert is not in our vocabulary every day. Except in football or chemistry perhaps, we are more apt to speak of a reversal or to reverse directions. Nevertheless, the idea is prevalent, though we say convert or conversion infrequently in social intercourse.

So it is in theology. John Wesley once remarked, 'Conversion is a word I very seldom use, because it rarely occurs in the New Testament.'¹ The word conversion (or convert) occurs only fourteen times in the kjv—in recent translations usually translated 'turn' or 'return' or similar. The idea of a spiritual-moral reversal of direction—conversion—is endemic in the Bible from the Lord’s appeal to Cain (Gen. 4:7) to that tender appeal to all in the last chapter of the Bible (Rev. 22:17). In formal theology ‘conversion’ usually simply designates the turning of a sinner from sin, death and the devil to holiness, life and communion with God. The idea is a simple one. Every time the turn of a sinner back to God is commanded, discussed or reported, the subject of conversion is before the reader.

The Hebrew and Greek Words for Conversion

The word for this turning in the Hebrew Old Testament is usually shuv (or shuvav) which appears hundreds of times, usually with no theological connection, as for example, ‘Abraham returned [emphasis added] to his place’ (Gen. 18:33). It can be used either for turning away from God or of turning to God. It has no inherent theological sense. The Greek (Septuagint) translation of Jesus’s time usually rendered shuv and its synonyms with a form of strephō (turn) or, more commonly, epistrephō, a strengthened, more emphatic word for turning or returning. It occurs 579 times in the Septuagint, about three-fourths of the time translating shuv. Apostrephō, literally turn away from, is another variation of strephō, usually having spatial (from here to there) rather than theological importance. A few times it means ‘to be converted’ (John 3:8; Zec. 1:4; Isa. 30:15 et al) but sometimes both apostasy and conversion in the same text (Ezek. 18:21 and 24).

In the New Testament the idea of conversion or to turn away from sin, death and the devil to holiness, life and God is commonly conveyed by these same words, sometimes in the language of an Old Testament text where the biblical thought originated. The prophets were preachers of repentance for sins, urging the people of Israel and Judah to return to God from their chronic apostasies. Compare, for example, Jesus’ explanation of why His hearers were not converted (Matt. 13:15) by quoting Isaiah 6:10; see also John 12:40; Romans 11:26; Acts 3:26; cf. Isaiah 59:20, 21.

Special Importance of Conversion in Evangelical Devotion and Practice

Conversion has always been of great importance to Protestant evangelical ‘religion’. Biographies of our leaders will say of a theologian or other leader, ‘He was converted at such and such an age’, a datable event. This deserves some enlargement, especially for the benefit of twenty-first-century folk who aspire to be teachers and preachers or publicists. We need to be convinced of the importance of that personal change of thought, affection and life our Protestant evangelical Fathers all called ‘conversion’ and which we must have or be ‘false witnesses of Christ’. John Wesley (born 1703), a paramount evangelical of evangelicals—both evangelical and fervently evangelistic—though the offspring of generations of godly ancestors ‘was not to experience his “religious” conversion until 1725’.² Another random example: a certain William Clough, ‘an English Wesleyan minister was born ... May 30, 1799. He was converted in his 16th year’.³ The outstanding Puritan theologian, John Owen (born 1616), a precocious child, acknowledged his early ‘motive’ for study was ambition for eminence and power in the Church of England. In the progress of his studies he was awakened by the Spirit of God to higher thoughts and aspiration,⁴ as his later life demonstrated. Poignantly (for me at least) an editor of the volume you are reading stated to me at our first meeting, ‘I was converted in a Plymouth Brethren Assembly’, while only months earlier the ‘Brethren’ senior pastor in Nassau, the Bahamas, who had invited me to his pulpit made a point of telling me, ‘I was converted through the ministry of a Mennonite missionary.’

Members of Protestant groups who were baptized as infants and perhaps (or perhaps not) confirmed at onset of adolescence, are not always conscious of the necessity of that event of turning from sin to holiness, death to life, Satan to God. Luther certainly was aware of the necessity of conversion and both Zwingli and Calvin wrote of their conversions. This unpleasant fact was rather spectacularly thrust before ‘ecumenical’ churchmen and others a few decades past—not by a Baptist or independent revivalist, but by Emil Brunner, probably most effective spokesman of and to the ecumenical movement in America. In his book, The Misunderstanding of the Church, 1953, prepared for and addressed to the World Council of Churches, he denounced what he called the ‘Constantinian System’. In the third volume of Brunner’s Dogmatics, which he wrote about a decade later, he said:

Conversion to Christ is not a real possibility within the Constantinian church situation, since there everyone [in the parish] is a baptized Christian. This is why conversion is hardly mentioned there. This at once becomes clear when comparison is made with the Free [i.e. non-state] Churches of America. Here the concept of conversion is central. It is ... the historical reality which has kept the concept of conversion true to its Biblical sense.⁵

Brunner adds, therefore: ‘Europe ... is to be seen as a missionary situation’, and he rebukes the ‘typical’ European theologian because ‘he presupposes Infant Baptism as the normal beginning of life in the church while the pietists (who, like Wesley, Finney, Spurgeon, Moody, etc., are also the great evangelists of modern times) take as their starting point the new situation, that the attachment of the great masses of the population to the Church is only fictional [emphasis original].’⁶

Therefore, as I shall try to expound more fully at the end of this chapter, conversion is as important to the experience and ministry of every minister of the Word and genuine Christian witness as birth to a baby or oxygen to a fire. Without it we are nothing in the kingdom of God and, Jesus said, destined to be cast out of it and, like weeds in the wheatfield at harvest time, to be removed from the field and burned in fire where ‘there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth’ (Matt. 13:36–42). Matthew, whose controlling purpose in writing seems (in part at least) to have seen the future of missionary evangelism, took care to promote the necessity of genuine conversion for every Christian witness, reports this from Jesus’ mouth: ‘On that day many will say to me, “Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name, and do many mighty works in your name?” And then will I declare to them [as Judge], “I never knew you; depart from me, you workers of lawlessness” ’ (Matt. 7:22, 23).

The Nature of Conversion—What Is it?

1. Conversion viewed from the human point of view is the act of a sinner who turns from sin to the Savior but which viewed from the divine side is regeneration. Conversion is something the redeemed sinner himself does, but never prior to God’s work of regeneration in his heart. There must be acceptance of the synchronism if not full understanding of it.

2. There is ‘something to do’ in conversion. If it were not so, the amazing plethora of appeals to sinners to ‘turn’, ‘return’, ‘repent’, ‘turn back’, etc., would not appear in both Testaments. Neither would there be demands to do so such as Peter’s: ‘Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins' (Acts 2:38). The hearers wanted to know, 'What shall we do?' Answer: repent. Nor was this duty of repentance laid only on Jews as some early dispensational writers said. (A contrast is supposed with Paul's answer to the Philippian jailor's question in Acts 16:31). There had indeed been a time when few Gentiles heard the call to repentance, simply because the 'fullness of time' when God 'sent forth his Son' (Gal. 4:4) had not yet arrived. Heretofore God had not extended the command to Gentiles, but now says the apostle of the Gentiles: '[B]ut now he [God] commands all people everywhere to repent'—and He threatens dire consequences if they do not (Acts 17:30, 31).

3. There are two aspects of the act of the sinner in spiritual conversion for salvation—as in every form of conversion, or turning about. It may with propriety be said there are two aspects of one act—one is a negative aspect of turning away and the other the positive aspect of turning toward. The first is named repentance and the second faith. When 'the [pursuing] hound of heaven' finally catches up with the fleeing object of pursuit the pursued turns around and runs in the direction from which he fled away.

Again Peter helps us. Peter's second sermon (Acts 3) was to a crowd of 'people' who 'ran together' to Peter and John at Solomon's portico. Not to waste the opportunity to preach to an interested audience 'the apostle of the circumcision' began by delivering the bad news of how corrupt they all were at heart and how wickedly they had acted in killing 'the Author of life'. Then he spoke of how God had ruled and overruled in fulfillment of prophecy. The preacher never got to finish his sermon, because he was interrupted by the court police (Acts 4:1). He did, however, make a closing announcement: 'God, having raised up his servant [Jesus], sent him to you [Jews in Palestine] first, to bless you by turning every one of you from your wickedness' (Acts 3:26)—apostrephein (to turn or convert) apo tōn ponēpiōn humōn (from your wickedness). What wickedness, specifically? Primarily, what happened on Good Friday: 'But you denied the Holy and Righteous One, and asked for a murderer to be granted to you' (Acts 3:14). The international Jewish crowd assembled several weeks earlier to participate in Passover Week had stayed over for Pentecost and days following. They needed to repudiate their opinion of Jesus and what they had done to him seven weeks earlier. That is when 'as they were speaking' the police stopped the sermon. Let every sinner acknowledge, 'we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not.... But he was wounded for our transgressions ... bruised for our iniquities' (Isa. 53:3, 5 kjv). This is the repentance, the negative side of conversion.

Peter also helps us see faith as the positive aspect of what we do when we are converted. He had been ministering 'to the saints that lived at Lydda' where the chief airport of the state of Israel is now located. There, after another remarkable healing which caught the community's attention, Peter (presumably) preached again. This time, 'all the residents of Lydda and Sharon saw' the healed paralytic 'and they turned to the Lord' [emphasis added] (Acts 9:35)—epestrepesan epi ton kurion. In conversion, like love and marriage, 'You can't have one [turning from Satan] without the other [turning to the Lord]'.

These two aspects (or elements) in conversion for salvation are both apparent in many other passages. Romans 6:11, 'So you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus'; Colossians 3:3, 'For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God'; 1

Thessalonians 1:9, 'how you turned to God from idols'; Acts 26:18, 'turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins'. 'To turn' here is epistrepsai and should be understood actively, to convert or to turn, not to be converted or to be turned, emphasizing the regenerate sinner's active part in conversion.

4. The Scriptures recognize both the human and the divine aspects in sinners' turn to God. They both convert and are converted. It seems best to think of the divine act (or work) as regeneration and the human acts of repentance and faith as conversion. The King James Version of Jeremiah 31:18 is vivid in expressing both the human and divine movement in conversion: 'turn thou me, and I shall be turned'. The eight English words, two clauses, are only two words in the Hebrew, shuv, the word for reversing direction in each case. The first is in hiphil, the causative stem of the Hebrew verb, hashiveni, 'turn thou me!' Then, immediately follows in the qal, wea shuvah 'And I shall be turned'. Conversion is no works-righteousness, meritorious, synergism of God and man. They move together but God initiates it by regenerating the will or disposition. Again, in kjv of Jeremiah 31:18, 19 Ephraim says, 'Surely after that I was turned [by God], I repented; and after I was instructed [by God], I smote upon my thigh'.

The place of the divine and the human and their respective parts in conversion is to be decided squarely in consequence of the doctrine of sin. If the Fall rendered us all dead toward God, inclined away from Him at the center—our disposition or will, as well as intellect—then the initiative must be God's. The beginning of turning must be God's sovereign act, His choice not ours. Disagreement over this issue has broken out in every period of vigorous evangelism or reflective thought. This representation of the divine and the human side of conversion will seem scripturally, logically and theologically correct if we call to mind the following, First, that all the universe, 'the heavens and the earth' of Genesis 1:1, is preserved and governed (providence) by God—'In him we live and move and have our being'. This is true in evil acts and thoughts quite as much as in good acts and thoughts and whether of angels or men or demons. Theology calls this the divine concursum. Second, though in our natural state 'we have all gone out of the way' and 'there is none righteous, no not one' God can and does penetrate our spirits by His spirit without destroying any faculty of volition, rather by setting it free to make right choices. We may not be aware of who is working within and exactly what is happening. If we are ever to convert or to be converted we must will (choose) to turn to God and do so without external coercion. We probably know nothing of God's part in the 'turn thou me and I shall be turned' transition, though much earnest prayer for us may have been effectually lifted by many who love God even more than they love us.

Among recent writers who have seen this clearly was Emil Brunner. Extract some (not all) of the existential dialectical orientation from chapter 20 'Conversion' of the 3rd Volume of his Dogmatics and the truth about conversion remains. I extract a few choice lines about the event of conversion:

And when that happens God becomes present in me and I become present in God. Therefore here also the temporal moment of 'before' and 'after' is transcended. Before the event the call of the preacher is unambiguously imperative: 'Repent, be ye reconciled, believe in the Lord Jesus' (Acts 2:38; 2 Cor. 5:20; Acts 16:31) or 'Accept the invitation to the feast and make no excuses' (Luke 14:16ff), or 'Open the door to Him who knocks, and desires to come in unto thee and to sup with thee' (Rev. 3:20). After the event the word is: 'It is a pure gift. He alone has done it' (Rom. 5:1). In the event however, both elements are present in unity.⁷

Also Brunner urges:

The task of the missionary is, above all ... to proclaim the Word of repentance, because only through heart searching, ... coming to his own frontiers does man become ready for the message of forgiving grace.... Therefore in the New Testament as a missionary document the call is always ‘Repent and believe’. But for the theologian, who sees the whole thing in retrospect, the order is reversed. For he knows that this shub, radically understood can only reach its goal in the strength of the assurance of Christ.... ‘Before’ and ‘after’ become irrelevant where we have to do with the center, with the God who lays claim to us ... the new life is effected on the one hand only through the repentance of man, and on the other only hand only through the act and speech or the speech and act of God. Both are true: We must repent, and it is God alone who creates the new life.⁸

Per contra for a vigorous advocacy of the Arminian-Semi-Pelagian view of the subject, see Norman Geisler’s, Chosen But Free.⁹

5. To list the results of conversion in a comprehensive way is not feasible, in as much as faith is an element of conversion and faith opens the door to everything in salvation. If, however, we direct attention to what Scripture traces specifically to conversion several wonderful benefits are spelled out. Among these benefits are:

a) The converted’s sins are blotted out. Peter had charged his Jewish audience with guilt for the rejection and crucifixion of their Messiah but exhorted them to ‘Repent ... and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out’ (Acts 3:19 kjv). Later Paul spoke of ‘forgiveness of sins’ (Acts 26:18) as a result of conversion to Christ.

b) As a result of conversion, Peter added, ‘that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord [emphasis added]’ (Acts 3:19). Some of my teachers thought that meant a re-offer of the visible kingdom of Old Testament prophecy in times of Messiah and the immediate return of Christ. Others of similar dispensational persuasion said it meant simply the spiritual blessings that accompany personal salvation (Rom. 5:1 ff. et al). We cannot doubt that the audience, composed exclusively of observant Jews being addressed by a Christian, but observant Jew, all fully aware of the special Old Testament predictions of wonderful blessings in the Messianic age, would have thought in those terms. The ‘times of Messiah’ were already in process. The kingdom of grace had been inaugurated. Therefore I think they are correct who say that Peter was promising the spiritual ‘Refreshing’ (anapsuxis, respite, as in Exodus 8:15 the only Septuagint occurrence of this word) which Christians were already enjoying.¹⁰

‘The “times of Refreshing” are distinguished from the “restitution of all things” of verse 21, and would seem to be, as it were, the gracious preludes of the great consummation. The souls of the weary would be quickened by the fresh breeze of morning; the fire of persecution assuaged’. Israel as a nation did not repent, and therefore hatred and strife went on to the bitter end without refreshment (ad 70). For every church or nation or family, those ‘times of refreshing come as a sequel of true conversion, and prepare the way for a more complete restoration’ (at the resurrection).¹¹

Conversion does not deliver us from trials in this world. Like Bunyan's Mr Pilgrim, it sets us moving toward the Celestial City with spiritual blessings at every stage of the way—no trial being more than is common to man and such as by God's grace man can bear (1 Cor. 10:13).

c) The converted also have a great future 'inheritance' among other saints. In Paul's brief report of his conversion and call he was commissioned to proclaim to Gentiles a conversion from 'darkness to light' and 'from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive ... a place [klēron, lot] among those who are sanctified by faith' in Christ (Acts 28:18). This 'lot' is correctly interpreted further by Paul in Colossians as 'a share in the inheritance of saints'. This is a promise of results that ought to entice any sinner who hears of it to turn from his idols to serve the living and true God (1 Thess. 1:9). And so the benefit of a future inheritance has been set forth by evangelists through the centuries. It is one of the motives for repentance—'the goodness of God [that] leadeth thee to repentance' (Rom. 2:4 kjv).

d) A new spiritual discernment results from the change of direction and inner transformation. This is the meaning of the several 'from darkness to light' passages in the New Testament. Having referred to the blindness of the Jewish hearers of the law as having a veil over their minds, Paul says, 'But when one turns to the Lord, the veil is removed' (2 Cor. 3:16). Only God knows when the new discernment breaks through. Many nominally religious folk who, christened as infants and instructed for 'confirmation', will tell you 'It didn't mean a thing' until truly converted at a later time. The same, of course, can be said of some children in Baptist homes who always attended church, Sunday School, and as a matter of course or custom 'made confession' and were immersed in water 'in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost'—at about the same age as Lutheran children are confirmed and are admitted to 'first communion'.

e) Holding in mind that conversion is the obverse side of regeneration, two texts say the experience opens new hopes and promises. After conversion the Second Advent becomes more than a vague teaching about how the world will come to an end. '[Y]ou turned to God ... to wait for his Son from heaven' (1 Thess. 1:9, 10)—said to be a 'blessed hope ... and the glorious appearing' of the Saviour (Titus 2:13 kjv) for 'When Christ who is your life appears, then you also will appear with him in glory' (Col. 3:4). This is, of course, a great 'comfort' (2 Thess. 2:16, 17).

Some Questions and Problems and Observations About Conversion

1. In my treatment of the order of 'aspects' (Brunner) or 'elements' (Strong) in election, effectual calling, regeneration, repentance, faith and conversion, I have insisted: 1) repentance and faith are negative and positive aspects of one act of conversion. 2) Regeneration is the same event viewed as God's work of beginning to apply redemption to a sinner. 3) That the initiative for it all comes from God alone who has power to cause the sinner even to desire rescue from his lost condition. 4) That divine initiative (Emil Brunner's felicitous expression) first takes hold in 'illumination' of the soul or first planting of spiritual life, which first planting, from the perspective of entering the kingdom (John 3:3 ff.), is regeneration. It is important that God's 'role' as solely the one who saves be preserved if our outlook is to be evangelical and truly Protestant. Nothing a sinner can 'do' is a meritorious 'work'. Paul defends the grace principle with these words: 'Now to the one who works, his wages are not counted as a gift but as his due' (Rom. 4:4) and 'So too at the present time there is a remnant, chosen by grace [we did not choose God; He chose us]. But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace' (Rom. 11:5, 6).

Thomas Oden is correct in asserting 'Repentance in one sense goes before faith, in another sense accompanies faith, and in still another sense issues from and follows faith.'¹² It follows faith in the sense that one must believe there is a God to whom to convert (Heb. 11:6); for faith itself contains this intellectual element of assensus, 'I believe that'. Repentance accompanies faith in the sense that turning to God is the same act as turning away from God's enemy Satan. It precedes faith in the sense that the initial awakening of new life in effectual calling finds the sinner in his corruption from which he must turn. He cannot take his hate for God along with him into faith. He must repent of his aversion to God's holiness.

2. What is the place of confession in conversion? First, let us consider that initial confession 'unto salvation' in the words of the classical text, Romans 10:8–10: '(that is the word of faith which we preach): that if you confess with your mouth the Lord Jesus and believe in your heart that God has raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. For with the ... mouth confession is made unto salvation' (Rom. 10:8–10 nkjv). This was, Paul says, what he preached to those who needed to 'be saved' (v. 9). Let us change the word saved to 'converted'. In the context of evangelism they refer to the same event. The content of the confession in conversion in this bit of apostolic wisdom is 'the Lord Jesus' or as the English Standard and Revised Versions have it, 'Jesus is Lord'. This must be accompanied with acknowledgment that God has raised Jesus from the dead.

In the case of the raw heathen who makes this confession on the first presentation of the gospel and in a short time (in the middle of the night in the case of the Philippian jailor), to say 'Jesus is Lord' would mean simply to believe, I suppose, 'all authority in heaven and earth' is given 'to this Jesus'. We must presume, I think, that Paul or Silas explained that Jesus died on a certain day and three days later was raised from the dead by God. In this case the man made his confession by receiving baptism in 'the same hour of the night'. The missionaries had little time, I judge, to explain the Christian meaning of theos (God), a word familiar to the jailor. (He may like most Roman soldiers have cursed by the theoi.) How could Paul or Silas have traced its meaning through Scripture back to the 'God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob'? It is doubtful the two missionaries made a case with the bewildered jailor for the identity of the Son of God of the Gospels with the Lord (Jehovah) of the Old Testament, though as the jailor participated in the life and ministries of the Philippian church it would have been fully explained to him there at a later time (as the second chapter of Paul's letter to the Philippians explained profoundly). The jailor, after that night grew—not into faith, but in faith and the faith as well.

Other texts show that when people confessed Christ in baptism the confession was accompanied by 'confessing their sins'. If they have no sin they have no need either of Christ or forgiveness (Mark 2:17). John the Baptist required it (Matt. 3:6). Again, baptism being the mode of confession, Peter proclaimed to his Jewish audience, 'Repent and be baptized every one of you ... for the forgiveness of your sins' (Acts 2:38). In submitting to baptism, a ritual cleansing, one is confessing sin and sins. Like believing in the heart, therefore, repentance must be in the heart, otherwise baptism has no value as 'confession ... made unto salvation' (Rom. 10:10 kjv).

There is one case in the New Testament where we have absolute certainty the confession was from the heart and that the person was truly saved (converted). It is the one known to all as the case of the penitent thief on the cross.

When was the ‘malefactor’ converted? When in his heart he acknowledged, ‘We are receiving the due reward of our deeds’ and made this confession to the one on the other side who died cursing everything and everybody. The penitent in heart also believed ‘in his heart’ and acknowledged ‘Jesus is Lord’ and addressed the Savior that way. ‘Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom’ (Luke 23:42 kjv).

What knowledge is implied in that poignant confession-question? No one knows for certain. Did ‘Lord’ mean to him the ‘God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob’? Minimally he knew Jesus to be the Messiah, for that is implied ‘In thy kingdom’. (The Greek has in (en) not into (eis) at Luke 23:42. rsv correctly interprets en tē basileia as ‘in your kingly power’.) Perhaps he was Jewish, a backslidden son of a synagogue somewhere and knew much more, but that is by no means certain.

Other scriptural incidents and texts demonstrate beyond a doubt that a faith that sincerely confesses Jesus as Lord to God is saving faith. ‘Look and live’ is all there is time for sometimes at the end of a wasted life or in life’s extremity. The children of Israel were dying in threatening numbers by snakebite when ‘Moses made a bronze serpent, and set it on a pole; and if a serpent bit any man, he would look at the bronze serpent’ (which Moses had set on a pole) and he would live. Jesus used this incident to illustrate ‘saving faith’, promising: ‘as Moses lifted up [on a pole] the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up [on a cross], that whoever believes in him may have eternal life’ (John 3:14, 15). ‘Look and live!’ it is our privilege to say to sinners in any condition of awareness. Pastors who minister to the dying on the brink of eternity (as it has been my privilege to do several times) have witnessed that ‘look and live’ in the squeeze of a hand, flutter of an eyelid, a slight nod of the head, or a murmured ‘yes’, as we read ‘the Word of Life’ and asked, in the looming presence of death (like Jesus’ at Bethany), ‘Do you believe this?’

There is another kind of confession—that confession which is public acknowledgment of Jesus as opposed to denying Him. There were leading Jews like Nicodemus who came to Jesus by night to avoid publicity (John 12:42, 43) who ‘did not confess it [belief in Him], so that they would not be put out of the synagogue’. See also 2 Timothy 2:12 and Matthew 10:32, 33. In view of the Matthew 10:33 statement (‘but whoever denies me before men, I also will deny before my Father who is in heaven’) we well understand Peter’s distress of mind when he ‘wept bitterly’ (Matt. 26:75). From the stories of Peter who manifest weakness rather than outright unbelief, and of Judas, who manifest outright rejection at heart, we know that only God knows fully the meaning of our words either of confession or of denial.

John Foxe (1517–1587), author of The Book of Martyrs (1,082 pages in a one-volume edition), tells the enduring story of the innumerable confessors whose confession of Christ cost them their lives. In Britain many died trying to bring the Bible into print in the common language. Others died for even owning a copy. The Roman Church’s Inquisitions exacted the price of martyrdom from thousands over the centuries. They are the subjects of Foxe’s book. The reward of martyrdom is a prevalent theme of the book of Revelation. In this twenty-first century of the Christian era, martyrdom as the price paid for confessing Christ ‘before men’ is a continuing story.

Closing Thoughts: a Converted Pulpit and Pastoral Ministry

The true prophets denounced the false prophets in Old Testament times. A thoroughly discouraged Jeremiah proclaimed to his backslidden generation, ‘An appalling and horrible thing has happened in the land: the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests rule at their direction; my people love to have it so, but what will you do when the end comes?’ (Jer. 5:30, 31). We see the same ‘appalling’ situation in congregations throughout Christendom today. Amos’ prophecy has found another fulfilment in our own day—‘Behold the days are coming,” declares the Lord GOD, “when I will send a famine on the land—not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord” (Amos 8:11). At the present moment there are innumerable towns, villages and rural communities where there are many church buildings in which religious services are held but where, if there is even a preacher in the pulpit on a Sunday, there is no word from God that a prophet or apostle would recognize as such. Amos described this poisonous atmosphere too: ‘They shall wander from sea to sea, and from north to east; they shall run to and fro, to seek the word of the Lord, but they shall not find it’ (Amos 8:12).

The situation has many causes, but the immediate cause is lack of a pulpit and pastoral ministry that is both converted and committed knowledgably to the truth. The damage was so severe in Jeremiah’s time that a majority preferred the prevailing spiritual darkness—‘my people love to have it so’.

The reader of this page, if a minister of the Word or a minister in preparation, should be challenged to examine his own heart to see if the evidence of a genuine conversion is there. Why do you seek the ‘office of overseer’ (1 Tim. 3:1)?

¹ John Wesley, ‘Letter to Bishop Lavington’, Works, v, p. 368 as cited in John McClintock and James Strong, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature ii, first published, 1895 (repr. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1968–1970), p. 495.

² J. I. Packer, in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. A. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), p. 1163.

³ McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, xi, p. 990.

⁴ ibid., vii, p. 493.

⁵ Emil Brunner, Dogmatics iii: The Christian Doctrine of the Church, Faith, and the Consummation, trans. D. Cairns and T. H. L. Parker (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1962), p. 276.

⁶ ibid., p. 276, see also p. 107.

⁷ ibid., pp. 283, 284.

⁸ ibid., pp. 282, 283.

² Norman Geisler, Chosen But Free (Minneapolis: Bethany House Publ., 1999). Dr Geisler attempts to put faith and repentance prior to regeneration. He asked me to review the manuscript before publication privately, which I did, seeking to dissuade the author from publishing it. Dr Geisler is not ‘easily entreated’ on this issue.

¹⁰ See F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1988), pp. 83, 84.

¹¹ E. H. Plumptre, ‘The Acts of the Apostles’, in Ellicott’s Commentary on the Whole Bible vi, (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervans, repr. 1954), p. 19.

¹² Thomas C. Oden, Systematic Theology iii: Life in the Spirit (San Francisco: HarperCollins Publ., 1992), p. 102.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (699). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

10

The Doctrine of Repentance

Except for the doctrine of justification there is none for which the Reformation contributed greater understanding than the doctrine of repentance. The Reformers rescued repentance for sin from doing penance for sins. The true biblical doctrine had long been perverted from its evangelical bearings by incorporation into the system of salvation by sacraments. Baptism was thought to remove all guilt for original sin—not on the occasion of the contrite sinner’s faith but ex opere operato, by the very act of sacramental applications of water on the infant offspring of Catholic parents—i.e. baptism.¹

This has not changed to the present. The Catechism of 1994 in the section on ‘The Seven Sacraments of the Church’ states: ‘Through Baptism we are freed from sin and reborn as sons of God; we become members of Christ, and incorporated into the church and made sharers in her mission: “Baptism is the sacrament of regeneration through water in the word.”’²

In another sacrament, called penance or confession, sins committed afterward were to be made known to a priest; then the priest, employing powers conferred by the priest’s bishop in the sacrament of ordination, was thought to forgive the sins confessed. The priest in this scheme of things confers absolution, not declaratively in the sense of 1 John 1:9, but judicially, as a judge. Penance was then (and so still today) held to consist of contrition (genuine sorrow for sin), confession to the priest and satisfaction for sins committed. This satisfaction is not that wrought by Christ on the cross but some onerous work imposed by the priest to whom confession is made, supposed to satisfy divine justice for the sins committed. These acts of satisfaction are thought to effect two things, expiation of guilt for past sins and discipline of the spiritual life. Current Roman Catholic manuals stress the discipline aspect rather than expiation.

The occasion for Luther's posting the Ninety-Five Theses, 31 October 1517, was this perversion of repentance as 'doing penance' and the outrageous customs accompanying it by which the ecclesiastical engine gathered money for the Pope's building projects. Rome's system has not retreated from penance as a sacrament whereby forgiveness is brought up to date. The priest still concludes 'the rite of penance' with: 'I absolve you from your sins in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost'.³ Dr Geoffrey W. Bromiley has written:

Quite apart from the obviously non-scriptural nature of this whole system, five main evils may be seen in it: (1) it misunderstands the problem of post-baptism sin; (2) it deflects from the atonement; (3) it promotes related errors such as purgatory, masses, indulgences and invocation of saints; (4) it creates legalism and formalism; and (5) it gives rise to the moral evils of the confessional. The Reformers cut through the whole falsification of theory and practice by insisting that what the New Testament demands is not penance but penitence or repentance, though they saw a real value in the restoring of true discipline and of course the private counselling of those troubled in conscience as individually required.⁴

The Reformation era is customarily said to have ended with the Peace of Westphalia, 1648, when the Wars of Religion ended—as in the standard textbook, The Reformation Era: 1500–1650 by Harold J. Grimm.⁵ But doctrinal reform was extended in Britain on the subject of the divine and human in salvation, especially the nature of divine grace, the nature of regeneration, repentance, faith, justification and sanctification. The 'Puritan divines' of Britain and British America continued to refine the evangelical meaning well into the eighteenth century on both sides of the Atlantic.

William Haller, who has done as much as any man to recover awareness of the Puritan heritage in all English-speaking lands, says on the first page of the text of one of his several books on the Puritans:

[A]s a concerted and sustained enterprise of preachers for setting forth in the pulpit and the press [books and other literature] a conception of spiritual life and moral behavior ... Puritanism ... was not incompatible with any given ecclesiastical system, episcopalian, presbyterian or congregational so long as its promoters were left free to preach. It is in fact nothing but English Protestantism in its most dynamic form, and before it had run its course, it had transfused in large measure the whole of English life [emphasis added].⁶

These people, led by intelligent, devout, university-educated preachers, were among the most morally earnest, biblically informed and theologically literate people who ever lived.⁷ They pondered, reflected and compared (with earnestness painful for our flippant generation even to hear about) the nature and relationships of effectual calling, regeneration, repentance and faith. They debated whether the Word of God is a means or an accompaniment or catalyst in producing repentance, whether repentance or faith precedes in conversion. There seems to be nothing to say which they did not say.

My own professors of theology taught me some of the ripest thinking about these matters, even though they did not say that was what we were getting. Long afterward, when I began to teach seminary courses, I was made acquainted with the true Puritan history through the Puritan writers. What the reader is perusing here is the same as I received except I am notifying readers of some of my unpaid debts. Some of the Puritans (especially some eighteenth-century British Baptists) were Supralapsarians and I am Infralapsarian—if we must enter that realm of academic excess and over-refinement. Some of them seem almost to have left evangelism of the lost world out of the number of Christian duties. If there is no place for human works of righteousness in gaining salvation there is nevertheless something to do, action to take. God commands both repentance (Acts 17:30) and faith (Mark 1:15) as well as conversion (Acts 3:19).

I am not sure that one can ever state satisfactorily whether faith is prior to repentance or vice versa in conversion. Surely we should back off and acknowledge they all happen together. One will not turn away from sin unless he already knows in his heart that ‘he that comes to God must believe that (i.e. have faith as assent to fact) He is and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him’. On the other hand no one will believe as long as one’s attention is fixed on sin, Satan and the enticements of the world. Furthermore, none is able to enter the kingdom except he be born of the Spirit (John 3:5, 8) and the Spirit moves to produce new birth when and upon whom He will. The Spirit does not find faith. He creates it by ‘quickenings’, which means giving life.

The sola deo origin of faith, repentance, conversion and regeneration is joyfully celebrated in the hymn-song:

I know not why God’s wondrous grace

To me He did impart,

Nor how believing in His Word

Wrought peace within my heart.

I know not how the Spirit moves

Convincing men of sin,

Revealing Jesus in God’s Word,

Creating faith in him.

(Stanzas 2 and 3 of ‘I Know Not Why God’s Wondrous Grace’ by Daniel W. Whittle, 1840–1901).

I intrude once more with this seeming diversion about our Puritan predecessors for several reasons. First, so the reader will understand why those from that age of martyrs (many early Puritans were burned, hanged and beheaded for their faith) should be consulted.⁸ Second, to help the same reader to accept a fact, unwelcome to any one not taught by the Spirit of God, that salvation is wholly a divine rescue operation, not merely of people in great need, screaming for help, but who must by the immediate work of the Spirit be made willing to be rescued. ‘To humble the pride of man, to exalt the grace of God in salvation and to promote real holiness in heart and life.’

Definition of Repentance

Theologians of immediate post-Reformation times were acutely aware of the importance of a sound, biblical definition of repentance. Doing ‘penance’ in the papal system had thoroughly perverted the meaning of the biblical doctrine and dislocated it in the way of salvation. It is hard to improve on the following:

Repentance unto life is a saving grace (Acts 11:18), whereby a sinner, out of a true sense of his sin (Acts 2:37), and apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ (Joel 2:13), doth, with grief and hatred of his sin turn from it unto God (2 Cor. 7:11; Jer. 31:18, 19; Acts 26:18), with full purpose of, and endeavor after, new obedience (Ps. 119:59).⁹

The Greek and Hebrew Words

As will be seen, repentance or some aspect of it, is frequently indicated by several English words which in turn translate several different Hebrew and Greek words, each with more than a shade of difference in meaning.

In the Old Testament there are mainly two words translated ‘repent’ in our English Versions. One, naḥam, usually in simple passive (Niphal) form, is most frequently used of God’s repenting (thirty-five times, at least) of which Genesis 6:6 (kjv) is the first example—‘And it repented the Lord that he had made man’. Some recent translations render, the Lord ‘regretted’ or ‘was sorry’. The essential idea is emotional in sense. I think ‘regret’ is the best English translation. Yet usage shows that contemplated changes in action or treatment of another are indicated (see 1 Sam. 15:29; Ps. 110:4; Jer. 4:25). It is used only about five times of man’s repentance. This word is regularly translated by metanoēō and metamellomai (see below on New Testament Greek words).

The second Hebrew word is more basic to formation of the New Testament doctrine. It is shuv, as observed in the preceding chapter on conversion, a term related to volitions or choices and resultant action. Hence it may be rendered convert or conversion (of which repentance is a part): the Greek Old Testament regularly renders it by epistrephō. But it also is translated to backslide—a reverse, of conversion, as several times in Jeremiah 3, verses 6, 11 and 12—through a special doubling of the last consonant of the Hebrew word shuv to shuvav. This word (shuvav) is employed to make the backslide idea clear in verses 14 and 22 of Jeremiah 3. (kjv translates ‘backsliding’ in Jeremiah 3; esv uses ‘faithless’.)

In the New Testament the word metamellomai corresponds to the Hebrew naḥam and metanoēō somewhat to shuv (the equivalence is not invariable). Of these four words metanoēō (and the corresponding noun metanoia) is most important, for when used of ‘repentance unto salvation’ it gathers up the significance of the others. A roster of texts referring to saving repentance will display that metanoēō is usually the New Testament word employed—almost sixty times. Hebrews 12:17 is an interesting exception to soteriological use, referring as it does to Jacob’s repentance, not Esau’s. In this case the narrow sense, to change one’s mind, to reverse a decision, is paramount in metanoēō. Metamellomai is used only six times (Matt. 21:29, 32; 27:3; 2 Cor. 7:8; Heb. 7:21) but only once (Matt. 7:32) in salvational reference. So metanoēō is the word to study.

The theology of repentance among good writers makes no distinction between scriptural statements of or relating to the repentance of long-time believers and the person who is making initial repentance in initial conversion. The psychology of repentance, if we mean the processes of the moral faculties, or, better, the moral activities of the soul, are not different in kind or cause. Hence theologians who know the Bible well will turn to Psalms 51 and 32, the repentance of David, a ‘man after God’s own heart’ (1 Sam. 13:14; Acts 13:22) to illustrate biblical repentance, whether of saint or sinner. The same may be said of Peter’s repentance when as a true disciple he was ‘converted’ (Luke 22:32) from a backslidden condition in which he three times denied Christ.

Three Elements of Repentance

As we shall note later of faith, there are three elements discernable in the ‘repentance that leads to life’—the negative turn away from sin.

1. There is a change (turnabout) of thinking concerning sin, a change of opinion. When the preachers whom we meet on the pages of the New Testament call for repentance they do so after substantial efforts to persuade men’s mind that their previous opinions about religious truth and the good life are both erroneous and sinful (see e.g. Acts 2:38; 8:22; 17:30). David’s repentance was preceded by Nathan’s visit (2 Sam. 12; cf. superscriptions to Ps. 51 and Ps. 32:3–5), which made his mind aware of what his conscience was telling him. This is to say the change must be accompanied by the rational process of learning as well as a purely spiritual event.

The pattern of the preaching of repentance by the Old Testament prophets is illustrated by Jeremiah’s sermons to the citizens of Jerusalem and environs in the early years of the young prophet’s association with the youthful King Josiah, a genuinely repentant believer and reforming king. God commissioned the prophet ‘to pluck up and to break down, to destroy and to overthrow’ (four negatives) as well as ‘to build and to plant’ (two positives) (Jer. 1:10). As the young nabi (Hebrew word for prophet) set out to fulfill his commission he first cried ‘in the ears of Jerusalem’ concerning their wholesale departure from their covenanted moral obligations.

He pressed home knowledge of their sins. He used the metaphor of marital unfaithfulness, employing embarrassingly graphic language (like a mare ass in heat (Jer. 2:24) ‘on every high hill and under every green tree you bowed down like a whore’ (Jer. 2:20)). She went looking for partners in adultery, i.e. idolatry, and breaking the laws to which at Sinai they had made covenantal consent. They even had licentious tricks to teach the whores (Jer. 3). The desperately backslidden situation in the country, Jeremiah said, was through and through: ‘the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests rule at their directions; my people love to have it so’ (Jer. 5:31).

The young preacher addressed their minds with knowledge of divine judgment: ‘but what will you do when the end comes?’ (Jer. 5:31). After reminding them in the vivid language of sexual lust (Jer. 5:7, 8) he exclaims, ‘Shall I not punish them for these things? declares the Lord; and shall I not avenge myself on a nation such as this?’ (v. 9). The punishment will be withdrawal of any authentic priestly or prophetic ministry to them (vv. 10–13)—a famine ‘of hearing the words of the Lord’ as an earlier preacher (Amos 8:11) denounced on Israel.

The prophet repeatedly makes known divine appeals for repentance: ‘Return, faithless [backsliding kjv] Israel.... I will not look on you in anger, for I am merciful, declares the Lord; I will not be angry for ever.... And I will give you shepherds after my own heart, who will feed you with knowledge and understanding' (Jer. 3:12, 15). Repentance is preceded by understanding of divine ways.

The whole prophecy then becomes set in a context of divinely scheduled spiritual regeneration and repentance of the people after judgment (Jer. 3:15–18). The experiences of national Israel and the revelations concerning her become transformed into prophecies of individual experiences and truth for individuals in the New Testament revelation—so much so that New Testament authors employ the Old Testament texts in that way. We have already taken note of this in the chapter on regeneration in our Lord's words to Nicodemus.

The Bible simply does not support the irrationalism of existential philosophy wherein authentic existence is achieved by a 'leap into the dark'. Authenticity of being is achieved in part when sin is no longer seen as desirable or 'fun', but for what it is (Ps. 51, David's prayer of repentance). This is called 'knowledge of sin' and it comes by exposure of the mind to God's law (Rom. 3:20; Gal. 3:19–22). Hence true evangelistic preaching will devote some of its best effort to propounding God's standards. Again, the Reformers saw this plainly and acted accordingly as have authentic evangelists and Christian teachers in every epoch. An Old Testament example of such preaching is the preaching of Jonah. The writing prophets of the Old Testament made repentance their major theme as did also John the Baptist, the last of their line (Matt. 11:9–13; 3:1–12).

Experience of sin does not teach us 'knowledge of sin' in this sense; it only hardens our hearts. Nor is it repentance to call one's self harsh names, nor is overdone self-depreciation. As a pastor I have been first reader of two suicide notes which were self-depreciating to the point of black despair. Not every negative change of thinking (it may be called remorse, regret, sorrow) is in itself saving repentance. 'The sorrow of the world worketh death' (2 Cor. 7:10 kjv)—as the suicides of King Saul and of Judas illustrate. Judas decided he should not have betrayed Jesus for money (Matt. 27:4). 'I have sinned' was acknowledged by still hard-of-heart Pharaoh (Exod. 9:27), by vacillating Balaam (Num. 22:34) and an insincere Saul (1 Sam. 15:24), as well as by remorseful Judas. Pronounced by Jesus, 'son of destruction' (John 17:12), Judas repented in this sense only (Matt. 27:3 kjv; better 'seized with remorse' niv; or simply 'changed his mind' esv; metamellomai is used).

There is reason to lament the strange disparagement of the whole project of knowing truth among 'intellectuals'. In this they mimic their remote pagan ancestors whom God 'gave up' precisely because they 'refused to retain God in their knowledge' and became vain in their imaginations. Carl F. H. Henry, founding editor of Christian Today magazine in an article entitled 'The Crisis of Our Time' showed what current readers of college textbooks really want to know:

... a special sale catalog came in the mail from a large American publisher of ... university textbooks. Among the 1000 listings ... only one title was premarked 'sold out.' What volume, you ask, was in such special academic demand? The title believe it or not, was 'Understanding the Female Orgasm.'

He goes on to say:

An impenitent generation, the Apostle Paul tells us, receives its "due penalty," divine recompense proportionate to its own priorities. To suppress knowledge of God will skew right and wrong with devastating final consequences.¹⁰

Two more changes must accompany change of thinking.

2. There is a related turnabout of feeling concerning sin, an emotional change, ‘sorrow for sin as committed against goodness and justice, and therefore hateful to God and hateful in itself’. Let the inquirer read Psalm 51 and note how this element predominates in many lines (vv. 1, 2, 10, 14). In this experience, David found that what sudden passion esteemed delightful became a ‘groaning all day long’ (Ps. 32:3). He discovered God did not relieve him of his burden until he acted on his feelings of regret and his self-accusation: ‘I said, “I will confess my transgressions to the Lord”, and you forgave the iniquity of my sin’ (Ps. 32:5); after that came ‘shouts of deliverance’ (Ps. 32:7).

Paul calls this saving repentance ‘godly grief’ (or ‘sorrow’ kjv) (2 Cor. 7:10). The same apostle calls the mere feeling of sadness ‘the sorrow of the world’ and goes onto say it produces ‘death’ (2 Cor. 7:10). Compare the case of Judas and numerous suicides of people who have seen the fruitlessness of their own wicked lives as well as the bitterness and malaise of many others who never end their own lives (Hamlet’s famous soliloquy: ‘Thus conscience doth make cowards of us all’). When saving repentance is ripe enough its subject ceases thinking mainly of the deadly consequences of sins, or of the harm to others, and especially ceases excusing himself or blaming childhood miseducation and heredity. (All parents do make mistakes in the rearing of their children.) One rather, in ‘godly sorrow’, discerns a) that all transgression is of God’s laws—to sin (the Greek and Hebrew words for sin often have the narrow meaning of neglect or failure) is to come short of God’s holiness; b) that he himself is personally responsible—guilty and blameworthy—no other human person, not the devil and certainly not God; c) that sins of any sort are inwardly defiled and defiling; d) this means one has a new feeling for God’s interests. His newly informed conscience now directs him to think upon God and His interests. He sees God as spurned and rejected, that the sinner, God’s creature, has failed his Maker and ought not to have done so.

3. A redirection of the will occurs. Knowledge of sin in one’s self leads to a change of thinking which in turn leads to change of feeling and that to a redirection of will. Hence we speak of three elements—intellectual, emotional and volitional. The first two must be followed by the third. Again, the great repentance Psalm (51:5, 7, 10; cf. Jer. 25:4, 5) furnishes basic scriptural evidence. This decision will be decisive, thoroughgoing, permanent, described by Paul in relation to penitents of the church at Corinth: ‘ye were made sorry after a godly manner.... For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of [emphasis added] (2 Cor. 7:9, 10 kjv).’ The will now takes on a totally new direction.

‘Will’ in theology touched by Reformation theological thinking includes much more than the faculty of the soul for making decisions. When we say the will takes a totally new direction in repentance, the repentance is viewed in relation to the comprehensive change called conversion which includes faith as well as repentance. This is spelled out in an essay by a minister of the Church of Scotland at Leith:

In the moment of regeneration the Holy Spirit implants all spiritual and saving graces in the heart of the elect sinner, and among others faith and repentance. He implants at the same instant the root or principle of saving faith and of true repentance. He gives these two graces together and at once in respect of time; and therefore, though in our conception of them, they are to be distinguished, yet they are never to be separated from each other. The principle of faith in the regenerate soul, that is the capacity of acting faith is not in point of time before that of repentance, nor is the principle of repentance before that of faith. Every true believer in principle is at the same time a true penitent, and every true penitent in respect of principle is a genuine believer. An impenitent believer and a penitent unbeliever, are characters which have no existence but in the vain imaginations of some men.¹¹

In the sense employed here ‘will’ has reference to the basic disposition of the soul. In ‘natural man’ (1 Cor. 2:14 kjv) the will is selfish. It was made so by the fall of our race. ‘[T]he mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God, for it does not submit to God’s law; indeed, it cannot’ (Rom. 8:7). I have dealt with this matter at length in Anthropology, the doctrine of man, and elsewhere previously in this volume. Please refer to the work of W. G.T. Shedd and of A. H. Strong on the will of fallen man.¹² Our will is corrupt. It is even more wicked than our deeds which the will directs us to perform.

This third element, the change of will in repentance involves the first two. This element of change, unlike the other two, will immediately be manifest in a changed manner of life. There are works ‘in keeping with repentance’ which shall follow (Matt 3:8). Paul, in a remarkable passage, mentions all three elements as part of his message wherever he had gone—Damascus, Jerusalem, Judea and among the nations. He is addressing his captor Festus and the visiting King Agrippa: ‘I ... declared [i.e. made intellectually aware] first to those in Damascus, then in Jerusalem and throughout all the region of Judea, and also to the Gentiles, that they should repent [the emotional element, for this at least is reasonable to suppose in the context] and turn to God, performing deeds in keeping with their repentance [the volitional element]’ (Acts 26:19, 20).

Further Factors in Repentance

As is very frequent in the various aspects of salvation, repentance, though wholly man’s own act, is also God’s sovereign gift, His work in man. Most of the passages on repentance (with which we are familiar) emphasize that man, himself, must repent. Let one serve as an impressive example: ‘God ... now ... commands all people everywhere to repent’ (Acts 17:30). The speaker (Paul) goes on to threaten judgment. Yet saving repentance is God’s sovereign gift of grace as Peter unmistakably asserted: ‘God exalted him ... to give repentance to Israel’ (Acts 5:31). This giving of repentance was no mere opening of the gate to salvation to Israel. It had already been open for 2,000 years. The conferees at a Jerusalem meeting of leaders ‘glorified God, saying, “Then to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance that leads to life” ’ (Acts 11:18). If these two texts be denied relevance as having some dispensational rather than personal reference, the same is not possible on any ground for the following Pauline counsel to young pastor Timothy: ‘And the Lord’s servant must ... be ... kind to everyone ..., patiently enduring evil, correcting his opponents with gentleness. God may perhaps grant them repentance [emphasis added] leading to a knowledge of the truth, and they may escape from the snare of the devil’ (2 Tim. 2:24–26). Note the divine and human aspects both present in this citation. The divine Author of Scripture finds no contradiction between God’s sovereign bestowal (‘God may grant’, etc.) and human action (‘they may escape’, etc.) in the same act of repentance. Neither should we.

Motives for repentance are numerous. Scripture mentions or suggests several. Fear of judgment to come was cited by Paul (Acts 17:30, 31) and employed at least once by him with partial success (with Felix, Acts 24:24, 25). It is clear that this motive, though important in arresting attention, does not in itself constitute, or lead to, repentance. Men must turn to God and heaven as well as away from sin and hell! Hence, the value of repentance ‘for the forgiveness of sins’ (Luke 3:3). Furthermore the ‘goodness and forbearance’ of God, together with His ‘longsuffering’ tend more to break the hardened shell of the sinner’s heart, for ‘the goodness of God [Gr. kindness as opposed to harshness] leadeth thee to repentance’ (Rom. 2:4 kjv). In the last of the seven messages to the seven churches of Asia of the Apocalypse, professed believers are warned that if they do not repent God will bring severe providential chastening upon them (Rev. 3:19) and Jesus earlier said that if people do not repent they will perish (Luke 13:1–5).

Sometimes claims are made for dispensational distinctions with regard to repentance. One of the editors of the Scofield Bible, for example, used to claim that repentance was a Jewish message only, that Gentiles are only to have faith. This nowadays turns up only among ultra-dispensationalists. There is a fragment of truth to it. The Jewish people addressed by Peter (Acts 2) had taken a wrong attitude toward Jesus, even though they professed belief in the one true God, the God of Israel. When the sermon convinced them of their error in rejecting their Messiah and brought conviction of guilt for what they had done to Jesus seven weeks earlier, they asked Peter, ‘what shall we do?’ Thereupon they were told to ‘repent’—of their wrong assessment of Jesus (Acts 2:37, 38). Faith was not mentioned specifically but is certainly the central feature of the command to be ‘baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ’. As a matter of patent fact, therefore, repentance has a high priority rating among all Bible prophets and preachers from Enoch and Noah to the two martyr witnesses of those 1,260 last days of Revelation, chapter 11, and from the sixth chapter of Genesis to the last chapter of Revelation. It would take us far afield to show this—though any industrious student can do so with the assistance of a concordance.

Perhaps the reader will now be more fully prepared than at the beginning of this chapter to understand that repentance as a negative act of the sinner, joined with an accompanying (not necessarily subsequent) positive act, called faith, together constitute conversion. Sometimes in the New Testament repentance is overtly associated with faith: ‘repentance towards God and of faith in our Lord ...’ (Acts 20:21); and sometimes with conversion: ‘repent ye therefore and be converted’ (Acts 3:19 kjv). Repentance, faith and conversion are not stages in a process; they are aspects of a single step. In walking one picks up a foot, sets it down again, and the body moves forward, yet the several acts belong together and are inseparable, constituting one step. It is important as well as interesting to observe that Scripture, viewing an event of saving response to the gospel, from one aspect, may call it repentance, from another, faith, viz. Jonah 3:5 reports, so ‘the people of Nineveh believed God. They called for a fast’; but Jesus says, ‘The men of Nineveh ... repented at the preaching of Jonah’ (Matt. 12:41). Yet when faith and repentance are mentioned together repentance is usually put first (see Matt. 21:32; Mark 1:15; Heb. 6:1).

Concluding Reflection

For a generation or so—since the horrors of Second World War days—repentance has been a neglected teaching. Perhaps the general helplessness of the human race under threat of population-destroying atomic fission bombs and then hydrogen bombs, later the AIDS epidemic and more recent terrorist episodes has made us feel sinful humanity had been frightened enough. Man's mental confusion and spiritual alienation from himself and others may unconsciously have suggested the priority of preaching to social or psychological needs which for many years has been the regular fare in many pulpits. Sometimes social and psychological needs—all temporal—have seemed to take precedence over eternal life with God in the city He has prepared. These worthy, but comparatively paltry matters, really hinge on conversion, of which repentance is an aspect. Perhaps we shall approach closer to meeting human social and psychological needs if we give consistent attention to this overriding spiritual matter: human beings are sinners, rebels against their Maker. 'Repent, therefore and believe the gospel'.

¹ A current standard handbook of Roman Catholic doctrine states: 'The sacrament ... is more than a sign. It does not only remind us of the sacrifice of Calvary, or merely point to the interior and invisible action of Christ, but it does actually convey what it indicates', Jelsma Van Doornik and Van De Lisdon, A Handbook of the Catholic Faith (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1994).

² ibid., p. 312, para. 1213.

³ The Rite of Penance, a four-page folder, prescribed order published by Publication Office, U. S. Catholic Conferences, Washington D. C, 1974, 1986.

⁴ Baker's Dictionary of Theology, ed. E. F. Harrison (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1960), p. 400.

⁵ Harold J. Grimm, The Reformation Era: 1500–1650, 2nd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1954, 1973).

⁶ William Haller, Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution (New York: Columbia University Press, 1955), p. xi.

⁷ J. I. Packer, A Quest for Godliness: The Puritan Vision of the Christian Life (Wheaton: Crossway Books, 1990), 367 pages; entire book, especially the 'Introduction' and 'Afterword'.

⁸ Conservative evangelical theology never quite forgot its debt to the English and American Puritans. George Park Fisher in his History of Christian Doctrine (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1896, 1927), chapters vii and viii gives a sketch of an overview and the best Calvinist authors of the nineteenth century pay their respects, but the learned intelligentsia of the universities hated what little they knew of them. Perry Miller wrote: 'There is a pronounced disposition in America to resent the suggestion that the colonial leaders (for that matter, also the architects of the American Constitution) were intellectuals. In the vicinity of Boston [Harvard] one can encounter an aversion that amounts to settled hostility against any account implying that the founders of New England were primarily occupied with religious ideas, and even more against the supposition that they gave their days and nights to abstract speculation ... The New Englanders were correct in claiming they were not followers of John Calvin, because they honestly believed that they were reading the Bible with their own eyes. Yet in the historical perspective, their way of interpreting the Bible must be called Calvinist'. Perry Miller in the 1964 reissue of Errand to the Wilderness (Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press), preface to chapter iii, 'The Marrow of Puritan Divinity', pp. 48, 49.

⁹ This statement is the answer to Question 87 of Westminster Shorter Catechism. 'What is

- This statement is the answer to Question 87 of Westminster Shorter Catechism, 'what is repentance unto life?'

¹⁰ Carl F. H. Henry, 'The Crisis of Our Time', The Evangelical Beacon, (October 30, 1979), p. 4.

¹¹ The quotation is from a chapter in Evangelical Repentance by John Colquhoun, 1748–1827, a minister of the Church of Scotland at Leith. My source is a booklet published by Chapel Library, 2603 W. Wright St, Pensacola, FL 32505. This source republishes a large amount of hard to find Puritan and more recent literature of similar theological outlook. They invite new subscribers.

¹² W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology, ii. 'The Human Will' (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1969), pp. 115 ff.; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 504–513.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (706). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

11

The Doctrine of Faith: Linguistic Factors and Specific Elements

There are a large number of terms rather special to Christian doctrine and liturgy. Until recently these words were treated with respect for their place in the prevailing religion of the culture. Within the memory of older people, however, many of these words have been borrowed (prostituted?) by a backslidden, secular, but literate, culture. So a fine word like charismatic, for example, no longer reserved for a spiritual gift imparted to a Christian by the Spirit of God, is applied to any popular leader of people movements, whether good or evil. This is where 'litany', 'gospel', 'born again' (since Jimmy Carter) and many others have gone: and where the word 'faith' seems to be going. Dictionaries of the Standard English language reflect a deflation of value over the past century similar to the loss in value of our money. In 1900 a nickel would buy about the same as a dollar in 2000. The 1915 Funk and Wagnalls Desk Standard Dictionary provided a distinctly Christian sense to the first meaning of faith, 'A firm conviction of truth of what is declared by another, simply on the ground of his truth or faithfulness ... belief and trust exercised toward God and Christ.' By 1947 The American College Dictionary (Random House) listed a considerably weakened Christian definition as the eighth meaning and labeled it theological, i.e. a narrow meaning.¹ Nowadays, the confidence of Bristol-Meyers or General Motors in the integrity of their product (or of their customers) is more commonly understood as 'faith' than the Christian understanding.

Christians too are not consistent even in religious use of the word faith—'faith-healing', for example, may be what goes on at 'charismatic' religious revivals of a certain sort. In 'faith-based charities', faith is flattened out to mean simply 'religious'.

In these circumstances a careful examination of the biblical meaning of faith is a necessary preliminary to formal exposition of the doctrine of saving faith.

Since faith (the noun) and the correlate verb believe are now used in ordinary discourse about all subjects, both in the Bible and out of it, it has a broad range of application which must be given some consideration preliminary to discussion of the specific act of saving faith.

The Hebrew and Greek Words

We shall at this point confine our remarks to the words for faith and to believe in the original languages of the Bible. Since the New Testament advances very far beyond the Old, though building on the Old Testament words, we shall narrow the field of inquiry quickly to the New Testament Greek verb pisteuō and its correlate noun pistis. The Old Testament Hebrew word he'emin, 'to believe' (causative active of ʾaman, to be firm) does not tell us much in itself, even though the doctrine of faith is prevalent in the Old Testament history (and doctrine) of salvation. Paul's historical references (Rom. 4; Gal. 2–4) and chapter 11 of Hebrews demonstrate that. In the Greek Old Testament the Hebrew word he'emin (hiphil of ʾaman) is rendered by pisteuō. This latter is the term (with pistis, faith) regularly used in the New Testament to designate that religious relationship of trust in God through Christ which people enter, in response to the preaching of the gospel.

In classical usage pisteuō means (Liddell and Scott Greek-English Lexicon) a) to believe, trust, trust in, rely on a person or thing; b) to comply or obey; and c) in certain constructions, 'to believe that, feel sure or confident that a thing is, will be, has been', 'to dare to do a thing'; d) with dative and infinitive, to trust to someone information which he will keep in confidence, to entrust something to another, and, passive, to have committed to one.

In the koinē (common) Greek of the New Testament there is a very wide range of usage. Joining the noun pistis and the cognate verb pisteuō together, the following categories of meanings emerge.

1. Apparently by virtue of the fact that the several Hebrew nouns and adjectives derived from Hebrew ʾaman (and meaning faithfulness, fidelity, etc.) are in the Greek Old Testament rendered by pistis, our term pistis does very occasionally signify faithfulness. It is used thus of God's faithfulness (Rom. 3:3) and of man's (Matt. 23:23; Gal. 5:22; Titus 2:10). The meaning of Hebrew 'emuna (an inflected form of ʾaman) in Habakkuk 2:4 (whether human religious faith in God or God's faith) is in dispute, as is Paul's use of pistis which translates Habakkuk at Romans 1:17. There is growing weight of opinion that pistis means faithfulness in Romans 1:17.² This use, however, has only indirect relation to saving faith.

2. By what one good writer calls an occasional 'natural transition', 'the faith' (hē pistis) signifies the truths of Christianity, the body of truth believed.³ Thus Paul was said to preach 'the faith' he once destroyed (Gal. 1:23); Paul refers to the Christian life as 'obedience to the faith' (Rom. 1:5 kjv) and another New Testament author urged that men 'contend for the faith that was once for all delivered' (Jude 3). (See also 1 Timothy 4:1, 6 and possibly James 2:14.) Beginning about ad 180 this sense, what Christians believe, was phrased in Latin regula fidei, rule of faith. This was well understood in that early epoch when New Testament Scripture had not fully replaced recollection (passed down by word of mouth, tradition) of what the Apostles had taught. Churches known to be places where one of the Apostles ministered were regarded as special custodians of the apostolic faith. Shortly the rule of faith became a canon truth, 'the official church teaching which is in complete harmony with scripture and is a summary of it'.⁴

3. The most common use is of the act of belief or the state of believing someone or something to be true, authentic, real, worthy. Most of the New Testament appearances of pisteuō and pistis are involved.

4. Perhaps hardly to be dissociated from 3) is the use of the word faith (pistis) as a name for the religion of the New Testament. Taking faith as the outstanding characteristic of gospel religion, Paul by metonymy, putting a significant part for the whole, at least twice employs this ‘dispensational’ significance, saying, ‘Now before faith came, we were held captive under the law’ (Gal. 3:23); ‘But now that faith has come, we are no longer under a guardian’ (Gal. 3:25).⁵

The General Meaning of the Act of Faith (Pistis and Pisteuō)

In a common secular sense, but by reduction of the Christian sense, the New Testament writers will occasionally employ the word to indicate simple mental assent to facts. More than once the Gospels will use the word for the temporary, impulsive response to Jesus’ word and work (John 2:23 contrast v. 24; John 8:30, 31 contrast vv. 44, 45). (The folk at Jerusalem who witnessed some unspecified miracles believed in the shallow intellectual sense that they attributed some degree of validity to Jesus as a preacher, but they disbelieved in any full sense.) This is a case of the common diffuse employment of words of very special meaning and it happens every day in all languages.

A special sense, recognized by many scholars, is the attitude or expectation sometimes called faith, which occasioned special miracles from the Son of God during His days on earth. Nazareth was not a scene of many of His miracles: ‘And he did not do many mighty works there, because of their unbelief’ (Matt. 13:58), to which Mark adds: ‘And he could do no mighty work there, except that he laid his hands on a few sick people and healed them. And he marvelled because of their unbelief’ (Mark 6:5, 6). Many place His words about the faith that moves mountains, etc. (Luke 17:5, 6; Matt 17:19, 20; Mark 9:24; cf. 1 Cor. 12:9; 13:2), in this category. It is worthy of note that none of the ‘faith’ generated by Jesus’ miracles nor the ‘faith’ calling forth His miracles was genuine saving faith (cf. John 12:37–41; cf. Isa. 53:1 ff.; also Matt 7:22 ff.). Nor does saving faith ask for miracles (2 Cor. 5:7).

Another unmistakably different sense is faith, the special gift of faith, to certain believers. It is a gift to be used in the edifying of the churches (1 Cor. 12:9 is an unmistakable case, perhaps Phil. 1:29 is another). Every Christian apparently has some ‘measure of faith’ (Rom. 12:3) of this kind. It enables those who have it in prominent degree to lead others in difficult exploits of evangelism and of church enlargement; and all need it in the harsh moments of life, especially those hard moments when we are leaving ‘the land of the living’ to meet a God and Christ whom we have never yet seen (see 1 Peter 1:8).

There is finally (and most prevalently in the New Testament) the act of believing in Christ for salvation.

The Specific Nature of Saving Faith

In modern times faith has been wrongfully ‘rationalized’ and ‘psychologized’, just as in the medieval period it was ‘legalized’ and ruined by reduction to mere assent to facts.

Negatively, a saving faith is not merely a rational act, intellectual assent to words or propositions. Alexander Campbell, a founder of Disciples of Christ and The Christian Church, and some of his followers, have made faith along with repentance and baptism, steps to regeneration. It is supposed to be simply belief in the truth. If that were all faith is, of course faith would not be enough to save. The definition of faith at the Roman Catholic Council of Trent, wherein the evangelical doctrines were anathematized, practically equates faith with intellectual assent to truth only. As earlier noted, sometimes the New Testament does dignify mere assent to truth with the words faith and believe, but always makes clear that salvation is not involved. The case of Simon Magnus, who ‘believed’ but whose ‘heart’ was ‘not right’ (Acts 8:13, 18–31), is illustrative of this as well as the cases in the paragraph beginning at the bottom of page 715. (See also John 12:42, 43.)

Nor is faith a work of meritorious value for procurement of salvation, as in the Roman system. There are Roman Catholic confessional and theological documents which seem to support a proper biblical view but the ideas are overlaid with the teaching that grace is infused into the baptized, enabling them by various virtues and works, including faith, to merit salvation. Romans 4:4, 5, 16 and 11:6 specifically deny such a perverse interpretation. One of the great gains of the Reformation was clarification of this matter.

Schleiermacher’s ‘feeling of dependence’ theory of faith—the psychologizing and emotionalizing of faith—is unscriptural as well.

Positively: there are at least three historically useful threefold analyses of the elements of saving faith. There is one, stemming from post-Reformation orthodoxy, which speaks of notitia (a knowing, conception, notion), assensus (agreement, admission of reality) and fiducia (trust, confidence, reliance, assurance). This analysis is more related to confessional controversy than to strict biblical study.

A. H. Strong improves this analysis by finding (1) an ‘intellectual element’, recognition of the historical truth of the facts of Scripture but also of God’s revelation therein as to man’s sin and need for a Saviour; (2) an ‘emotional element’, inward awakening and assent to the revelation of the grace of Christ as needed and applicable to one’s soul; (3) a ‘voluntary element’, trust in Christ first as Lord (involving surrender, as guilty, to Christ’s Lordship) and as Christ (reception and appropriation of Christ for pardon and spiritual life).⁶

A third analysis, not in disagreement with the two above described, but simpler, more exact and understandable, joins linguistic to theological analysis:

a) Saving faith is primarily and simply the divinely appointed way for man to receive salvation, including all attendant blessings, from God. ‘[W]hat must I do to be saved?’ the trembling jailer cried. ‘Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved’ was all that Paul replied (Acts 16:30, 31). It is understood that man cannot make this response without divine enablement (see the doctrine of calling above), as Paul says elsewhere, ‘... no one can say “Jesus is Lord” except by the Holy Spirit’ (1 Cor. 12:3).

b) This act of a person in saving faith, though simple, is a comprehensive act of the whole person, certainly involving all that one is. This is what is meant by the analysis into intellectual, emotional and volitional elements. One must ‘believe in your heart’ (Rom. 10:9, 10). This does not mean ‘heart’ as opposed to ‘head’ as some well-meaning but very harmful interpretation has it, but means at the very center of being, involving the whole person. The implied contrast is between heart-faith and mere lip profession, not heart and intellect! ‘This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me’ as the ancient prophet reported (Matt. 15:8; cf. Isa. 29:13).

c) The first element, not to be neglected, is, indeed, intellectual assent—to the facts of biblical history and of redemption provided. This is sometimes called historical faith. This being true a correct evangelism will devote prime emphasis to the facts of biblical history (creation, fall, sin, examples of human situation, etc.) not hastening too overtly or quickly to the emotional. The content of every recorded sermon in Acts will amply justify this emphasis. We have already seen how intellectual assent to proposed statements, facts, etc., is a not uncommon meaning of posteuō-pistis (believe-faith).

d) A second element in saving faith is appropriation—of Christ as Lord and Savior. There is proof that such is the case in a very clear text which must now be discussed somewhat at length:

He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God (John 1:11–13 asv).

The passage begins by reporting God’s past offer of Himself to His own (the Jewish people) in the Person of the Word become flesh (1:1–3; cf. 14). His own people did not ‘receive him’. The Greek word ‘receive’ does not convey the more passive idea of admission, acknowledgment, etc. (in the Greek dexomai, often to receive a guest, 1 Cor. 2:14; Heb. 11:31), but is the strong active term lambanō. Though it is occasionally used as ‘a colloquialism’ in the sense of receiving (or taking) into one’s home (Arndt and Gingrich, Lexicon) the usual sense is active appropriation of something. With the negative here it means rejection. Isaiah 53:1–3 by way of prediction, tells how and why. The middle and later chapters in all the Gospels tell the sad story of His rejection by way of history. But certain people did ‘receive him’! The Greek tense (2nd aorist, active) points to an historic moment when it happened or happens and the sense is active—‘take ... take in the hand, take hold of, grasp’ (Arndt and Gingrich, Lexicon). Elabon, aorist active of lambanō, emphasizes an almost aggressive movement, which already in the simple present tense can mean to seize upon something. While He yet dwelt among men in His flesh, some seized upon Jesus so vigorously and decisively they ultimately died in His service. We know some of them as the Twelve Apostles. The Gospels’ narrative of their initial declarations of discipleship, of their faith in Him, and their growth in faith and knowledge instructs us in what it means to ‘receive’ Christ.

This active appropriation, in the same verse, is said to be faith: ‘as many as received him ... even to them that believe on his name’. Believe is present tense. The ones who believe (and keep on believing) are the ones who have appropriated Christ, i.e. believed ‘on his name’, for ‘there is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved’ (Acts 4:12).

The New Testament provides a number of vivid figures for appropriating Christ, some of them startling or even repugnant to contemporary people, but not to ancient people. It is being drawn by the Father to eat Christ's flesh; to drink his blood (John 6:35, 44, 54); to eat the bread of life (John 6:35); to drink the 'water of life' (John 4:14).

e) A third element in saving faith is commitment to Christ. Arndt and Gingrich give to 'entrust something to someone' as a third meaning of pisteuō and they list Luke 16:11; Romans 3:2; Galatians 2:7; 1 Thessalonians 2:4; 1 Timothy 1:11; Titus 1:3; 1 Corinthians 9:17 as furnishing examples—which, indeed, they do. A striking example is furnished by John 2:23, 24, viz. the miracles had produced a shallow assent to Jesus' claims, for which John employs pisteuō: '... many believed in his name when they saw the signs that he was doing'. Then he adds: 'But Jesus on his part did not entrust [commit kjv] himself [episteuen auton] to them, because he knew all people'. Thus the shallowest (assent to facts) meaning of pisteuō and the deeper (commitment to someone or something) are both exemplified in a single text. There are other words for commitment, and one of these is used parallel to pisteuō in another striking text, rendered poignant by the fact that the author expected soon to be executed: '... because I know whom I have believed [pisteuō in perfect tense], and am convinced that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day' (2 Tim. 1:12 niv). 'What I have entrusted' (committed kjv) renders tēn parathēkēn mou, my deposit (property committed to another for safekeeping), in this case all that Paul was, body and soul. Here, to believe is to commit one's self to the care and support of another. And that is exactly what a contrite sinner does, having been convinced in mind that Jesus is, indeed, the Savior, and having received the Savior to himself—he commits himself, his hopes, ambitions and things to Jesus. This element of faith becomes very prominent in living the Christian life (as seen in 1 Peter 4:19, 'So then, those who suffer according to God's will should commit themselves to their faithful Creator and continue to do good' niv).

When this aspect of faith is being emphasized, the New Testament frequently (though not invariably) employs pisteuō with the preposition eis (into) or en (in) followed by the noun indicating the object of faith. Or, the dative case may be employed. These features are not, however, invariable, and caution must be used in coming to doctrinal conclusions on the basis of them (cf. eis in John 3:16 with same in John 2:23).

As we have already seen, both in common English discourse and in Scripture, when a non-religious setting is the context, faith-belief (pistis-pisteō) frequently denotes mere intellectual assent to truth. As far as careful exegetes can determine James is the only New Testament writer so to employ the word in connection with salvation (James 2:14–26). Verse 24 seems to deny justification sola fide (by faith alone): 'You see that a person is justified by works and not by faith alone.' B. B. Warfield—along with many careful exegetes—points out that James does not intend in the least to say works are part of the payment we must make in order to be saved:

'James earlier had said "a sound faith lies at the very basis of the Christian life" (James. 1:3), and is the condition of all acceptable approach to God (James 1:6; 5:15)'. Let my reader look up these verses to be convinced. The great New Testament and theology professor-writer continues: 'It is not faith as he [James] conceives it which he depreciates, but that professed faith [James 2:14—"if someone says he has faith"] which cannot be shown to be real by appropriate works' and so differs diametrically from Abraham's faith (James 2:23) and from the faith of Christians. Evidently many of the recent Jewish accessions to the church had brought ideas of faith in the Judaism of the time along with them.

The defective faith of the new Jewish converts whom James is addressing is also diametrically opposed to James' own understanding, says our Princeton author, Warfield, and he cites James 2:1 and 1:3.⁷ Even demons give intellectual assent (historical faith) to the existence of God. James says they 'believe—and shudder' (2:19). But a Christian faith is much more than that. James agrees with Paul: 'faith working through love' (Gal. 5:6). James' exhortation to faith and examples of faith and non-faith are quite like Paul's (see 1 Tim. 5:8, 10; 6:18; 2 Tim. 3:17; Titus 2:7, 14; 3:14, 8) and Peter's (1 Peter 2:12) and that found in Hebrews (10:24).

Temporary Faith

The notion of a genuine faith, but not a saving faith, seems to be validated by Luke 8:13. Jesus is explaining the meaning of the Parable of the Seed and Four Soils and explains the rocky soil where the seed sprang up but it 'withered away, because it had no moisture' (Luke 8:6). Jesus explained, 'And the ones on the rock are those who, when they hear the word, receive it with joy. But these have no root; they believe for a while [emphasis added], and in time of testing fall away' (Luke 8:13). 'Believe' translates the usual word for the kind of believing that saves. '[A] while' translates kairos (season, specific or appropriate time) and the same word is translated 'time' (of testing, temptation) later in the verse. So, quite literally here is the biblically endorsed notion of a sincere but shallow, uncommitted, temporary faith. It obviously lacks the element of commitment.

It would be hazardous to say this is hypocritical faith, for both the text and observed behaviour of the folk for whom doing what feels good at the time and doing it with zest ('with joy' Luke 8:13) shows how sincere but volatile (i.e. 'for a while') their state of mind can be.⁸

This faith, it is safe to say, is not saving faith, though some elements of saving faith—with reservations—are present.

Such an one is without root in his inner being [emphasis in original], i.e. he is destitute of that faith (Eph. 3:16f.) which, as a power in the heart, is fitted to maintain and foster the life that has momentarily awakened by means of the word.⁹

Some theologians turn to Hebrews 6:1–8 as divine commentary on the temporary faith of 'the ones on the rock' (Luke 8:13). Warfield expands at great length on the subject.

It seems to this writer that the seed that 'fell among thorns' (Luke 8:7) does not represent temporary faith. Jesus does not say 'they were saved for a while'. I have written in a book of the theology of missions:

It would be pressing the details too far to insist on a special meaning for lack of fruit from the good seed planted in this soil rather than destruction of the seed and death of the plant as in the first two kinds of soil. It seems doubtful that Jesus meant to say some soil produces believers who endure but never bear fruit. Without being doctrinaire about it, it seems best to regard Jesus as saying that there is too much competition for interest in some peoples' lives for the gospel seed ever to lodge in their hearts long enough for

Some Biblical Refinements of Saving Faith

There are several refinements to our understanding of faith in salvation which the Bible furnishes, some of great encouragement to believers in the critical moments of life. Romans, chapter 4, furnishes several, as now follows.

a) Faith is in contrast to law-works in salvation (Rom. 4:14, 15). Law of any kind among fallen men in a moral universe leads to condemnation. '[T]he law brings wrath'. Paul is referring to Moses' law, but except by changing the verbal 'coin' of discourse (as some do when they point out that torah [law] means instruction and then say gospel as instruction is law), no law-works of any kind can do anything to save. To say the gospel is God's law of salvation is true enough, but confusing, and really ought to be proposed only with great care not to be misunderstood. Paul does say God's gospel does not operate lawlessly. Law may promote the sinner's consciousness of need for gracious salvation, but it points elsewhere than to itself for rescue. Law in Galatians is not the same in meaning as in Proverbs 1:8, where the torah of a parent does indeed mean instruction.

b) Faith looks to the past as furnishing the promises of God, on which promises faith rests. This was not only true of Abraham's faith, which is cited by Paul as an example (Rom. 4), but of all saving faith, for in this regard 'Abraham ... is the father of us all' who believe (Rom. 4:16). The connection between promise and faith is a frequent theme of Scripture, occupying much of Galatians chapter 3 (especially verses 19–25) and the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, wherein the patriarchal promise of God is clarified, being clearly specified as not merely a promise of earthly blessedness but of heavenly blessedness also—immortality and eternal life (especially Heb. 11:11–16; cf. Rom. 4:17). How this does refute and chasten a lot that is being said today about the Old Testament perspective of faith—'earthly only ... no true eschatological perspective ... no immortality', etc.! Jesus 'opened their minds to understand the Scriptures' (Luke 24:45). The Old Testament must always be allowed to speak for itself, of course. Yet, it is correct to say our Lord made 'the Scriptures' of the old covenant a Christian book on the afternoon and evening of Easter Day (Luke 24:25–27 and 44–48).

c) Faith is closely related to hope, though not identical with it. 'In hope he [Abraham] believed against hope' (Rom. 4:18); 'For in this hope we were saved. But hope that is seen is no hope at all. Who hopes for what he already has? But if we hope for what we do not yet have, we wait for it patiently' (Rom. 8:24, 25 niv). This hope is not mere optimism, as in 'newspaper theology', but confident expectation. Abraham, Paul's example of true saving faith in this connection, was 'fully convinced that God was able to do what he had promised' (Rom. 4:21). The sense is not that hope is a legitimate object of faith but those who genuinely have saving faith have hope also, i.e. sure expectation—a form of certainty—that what God has promised He will perform.

d) Closely related to hope in connection with faith is the unseen element in faith's object and support. Scripture declares: 'we walk by faith, not by sight' (2 Cor. 5:7). Does this mean, then, that faith itself is merely an intangible something in the mind? By no means. The teaching is that faith for eternal salvation cannot ultimately be directed toward any of the tangible things about us, religious articles, holy precincts, special people, not the beautiful leather cover of a 'Holy Bible', nor even the paper and ink which convey John 3:16! This may be at once the most elusive and the most difficult feature of biblical religion. Israel always wanted a visible image to trust rather than a spiritual Jehovah who intransigently refused to make Himself visible and who would allow no visible representation of Himself whatsoever. It took 1,000 years of biblical history to get the point across, for the Israelites never quite got over addiction to worship of idols until the exile of the sixth century bc. Yet, Abraham travelled toward a land he had not yet seen, ‘not knowing where he was going’ (Heb. 11:8) but trusting the divine promise, Moses, ‘By faith ... endured as seeing him who is invisible’ (Heb. 11:27). So it is with true faith today: ‘Though you have not seen him, you love him. Though you do not now see him, you believe in him and rejoice with joy that is inexpressible and filled with glory, obtaining the outcome of your faith, the salvation of your souls.’ (1 Peter 1:8, 9).

e) Faith’s involvement with promises of and hope in an invisible God imparts a certain desperate quality to saving faith—certainly not complete freedom from attacks of uncertainty and doubt. ‘When nothing whereon to lean remains; When strongholds crumble to the dust; When nothing is sure but that God still reigns; That is the time to trust!’ The book of Job illustrates this well. Many a faithful pastor has read passages of Scripture such as Psalm 23 to the dying, only to find their desperation turn to quiet confidence, that what God has promised He is fully able to perform (Rom. 4:21).

In the next chapter we will enter what might seem to be complicated intellectual territory—faith as a ‘theological construct’. It does sound somewhat formidable. Yet it is all about a very simple thing, the act of a sinner in giving up the project of self-redemption by one’s own effort and receiving salvation as a gift from God through Christ. In an important book entitled What Is Faith?, a great New Testament scholar with a profound grasp of ‘the whole counsel of God’ wrote two-thirds of the way through this famous book:

And faith in one sense is a very simple thing. We have been engaged, indeed, in a sort of analysis of it; but we have been doing so, not in the interests of complexity, but on the contrary, in order to combat the false notions by which simplicity is destroyed.¹¹

He goes on to say no one consciously or unconsciously understands or articulates the ‘mysterious ... chemistry of the soul, and a whole new world of thought’ in the ‘experience of faith that seems as simple as the falling of a leaf’ and concludes with the thought:

Certainly, at bottom, faith ... simply means that abandoning the vain effort of earning one’s way into God’s presence we accept the gift of salvation which Christ offers so full and free. Such is the ‘doctrine’—let us not be afraid of the word—such is the ‘doctrine’ of justification through faith alone.¹²

¹ Webster’s New World Dictionary, 3rd ed., 1988, happily recovered some of the original religious meaning.

Liddell and Scott A Greek-English Lexicon, Based on the German Work of Francis Passow, by Henry G. Liddell and Robert Scott

² W. B. Wallis, Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, vol. 16, no. 1 (1973), pp. 17–24, for an evangelical scholarly assessment.

³ J. I. Packer, ‘Faith’, in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. W. A. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI:

Baker Books, 1984), p. 400.

⁴ M. E. Osterhaven, EDT, p. 961. See J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, rev. ed. (San Francisco: Harper, 1978), pp. 39–44.

⁵ The extended discussion of the Greek and Hebrew words for faith in the Bible is excellently traced out in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament vi, ed. G. Kittel and G. Frederich, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), pp. 174–228 by none other than Rudolph Bultmann. Minus the now somewhat passé ‘Acts of God’ theology and Bultmann’s own special theories of revelation and eschatology it is as complete and useful a presentation of the biblical words, both Hebrew and Greek as available. See esp. pp. 208–217 on ‘Specific Christian Usage: The Relation of Christian Faith to that of the Old Testament.’ In his own strange way he concludes that in the New Testament ‘Now for the first time faith is religion and believers are Christians.’

- ⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 836–840.
- ⁷ Arndt and Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.
- ⁷ All of B. B. Warfield’s comments in Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), pp. 415, 416, are apropos, but many readers of our times have been weaned away from the compound and complex sentences of yesteryear by changes in society at large.
- ⁸ I have discussed this at length in Robert D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984, new ed. by author, 1996), p. 69.
- ⁹ H. A. W. Meyer, Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament i (New York and London: Funk & Wagnalls, 1884), p. 266.
- ¹⁰ Culver, Greater Commission, pp. 69, 70.
- ¹¹ J. Gresham Machen, What Is Faith? (New York: Macmillan, 1925, 1927), pp. 180, 181.
- ¹² ibid., p. 181.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (714). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

12

The Doctrine of Faith: The Theological Construct

In the preceding chapter the main features of the formal doctrine were discussed—the words for faith in the original languages, the general meaning of the act itself and the specific nature of saving faith. In this chapter we shall consider 1) some questions about how God acts in producing faith, i.e. how it comes to arise in sinners’ hearts; 2) the relationship of faith with reason; 3) some refinement of the teaching of Scripture on the identity of the precise object of saving faith; 4) the relation of faith with knowledge; 5) what it means to confess faith in Christ; 6) the scriptural manner in which the confession should be made; 7) some further correlation between confession, repentance and faith; and 8) further implications for evangelism.

The Origin of Saving Faith: What Are the Bases and Causes of Saving Faith?

The Place of Evidences, Proofs, Arguments

A lively debate has been going on throughout the Christian era as to the place of evidence, proofs, arguments, etc., in producing saving faith. To come immediately to issues, granting the doctrine of special calling (or call it efficient grace) that God must enlighten and quicken sinners before they can believe for salvation, do we have any information on how we are enlightened and quickened? How does God act in causing faith to arise? How does the Holy Ghost persuade? It seems it really should be possible to give a scriptural answer. And, it seems probable that much of the debate has been at least partially unnecessary and perhaps also irrelevant.

In the first place, in Scripture, we are directed to give ‘reasons’ for the faith we already have, i.e. we are to testify to it and defend it logically. We are not called upon to explain how we helpless sinners gained discernment and power to believe. There is considerable mystery about that which the Bible never fully dissolves. Isaiah’s famous challenges are for unbelievers to defend their unbelief, and the arguments in the great passage are God’s own not ours (see Isa. 40–46, especially 41:21–29). On the other hand, believers are advised to ‘be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear’ (1 Peter 3:15 kjv). I must, therefore, be prepared to plainly explain ‘why I hope in Christ’ rather than to prove ‘why you ought to share this hope’. My reasons may not be yours, yours might seem inadequate to me. In any case no spur of the moment impulse is a ‘reason’, nor is it a merely inherited opinion. Parents and teachers may supply reasons better than mere tradition or peer pressure to profess faith. The faith must be real, an ‘in you’ faith.

In the second place, answering the questions put by unbelievers—sincere or otherwise—while not expressly any part of evangelism (i.e. preaching the good news), if the reasons are cogent and adequate may 1) make the unbeliever appear quite foolish to himself and others and 2) may remove what he thinks are obstacles to faith. The Bible everywhere insists that there are no genuine, objective obstacles to faith, for the ultimate obstacles to faith root in the darkening of the mind due to sin. All of us find this embarrassing to discuss with unbelievers, but in very sober fact it is the uniform biblical position. Yet, for example, the man who tells himself that he cannot accept the gospel of the Bible because its histories are unreliable may be quite shaken up by a good lecture on archaeological evidences of the historical accuracy of the book of Acts. So God can use certain ‘evidences’ in evangelism. Even though only the Holy Spirit who moves sovereignly can open the heart to faith, He may use any means He chooses.

Thirdly, and specifically, we must reject the empirical approach, for faith is not the product of sense experience as such, however impressive in confirming faith. We have already observed the superficiality of faith aroused by seeing miracles and have noted the case of Simon, the magician of Samaria, in that regard (see Acts 8:9–24). Furthermore, says John, though ‘he [Jesus] had done so many signs before them’ the generation who witnessed them all ‘did not believe in him’ because ‘they could not believe’ as they had eyes that could not see and ears that could not hear (John 12:37–40). All the passages cited in the previous chapter, showing how the object of our faith is the invisible, apply. Something beyond mere human faculties in ‘the state of nature’ must bring it to pass: not ‘flesh and blood’ but the God and Father of the Lord Jesus (Matt. 16:17). A generation suckled and brainwashed on the so-called scientific method has difficulty at this point—especially if they happen to be recent graduates of the university, for nowadays even human consciousness and man’s soul are there assumed to be fully subject to purely empirical explanation. The laws and forces which erode mountains, rust iron pipes, produce atomic decay, are assumed to be no more ‘natural’ than the ones that constitute mother love and religious conversion.

Fourthly, the Bible also rejects purely rational explanations for faith’s origin. Though the Bible throughout assumes the rational aspect of the soul of man and pervasively appeals to men’s reasoning powers, it clearly teaches that reason’s reasons in fallen man will lead away from faith not toward it. Kant’s famous ‘Critique of Pure Reason’ may have been reasonable enough, but it excluded some of the data available, and hence produced a defective conclusion. Outside of purely logical and mathematical deductions and what philosophical logic calls tautologies (definitions) there is little that any human reason can establish with absolute certainty without help from experience or divine revelation. Of course $4 + 4 = 8$ either on the earth, under it in hell or in heaven above. Paul plainly says that faith does not ‘stand’ in the ‘wisdom of men’ and insists that the world’s wisdom does not know anything accurately about God (see 1 Cor. 2:1–5 and 1:21; Eph. 4:17 ff; and Rom 1:18 ad fin).

Finally the same negative judgment must be placed on historical proofs (see Acts 26:26–28). People will simply reject the historical proofs—even of the resurrection of Jesus. That did not keep either Paul (Acts 17) or Stephen (Acts 7) from citing history to support his message to unbelievers.

For over 200 years now (since Napoleon’s campaign in Egypt) archaeology has given Bible believers great encouragement. This is because archaeology has proven that many unbelievers’ charges of errors in the Bible (for example the existence of Hittites and more recently the existence of David) have been proven false charges. Also, archaeology has demonstrated the accuracy of many biblical, geographical, social and political statements—notably Luke’s geographical references and cultural references. This has not been decisive ‘proof’ that the Bible is true as revelation of God and the way to be saved—only that the Bible is a very good history book—if that is how you wish to read it. Furthermore, the mouths of insistent, learned opponents have not been stopped. They are the minimalists among recent ‘experts’. Their mouths will be stopped only by conviction of truth by God Himself (Rom. 3:19).

Though it is not correct to say that God may not employ empirical arguments, rational arguments and historical proofs to address us, it is incorrect to say they as such produce faith. The Bible makes very clear several things about how faith arises in human hearts.

The Instrumentality of the Word of God

This question of the use of truth or the Word as means was raised in connection with effective calling, the beginning of regeneration. It arises again at every stage of the application of redemption. We must, in due respect to the inability of the natural man, affirm the primacy of divine working, taking the initiative at each stage or aspect. Yet we puzzle over and again whether God employs a means. David wrote, ‘The law [torah] of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul’ (Ps. 19:7 kjv). Here torah or law must mean instruction as the parallel stichoi in Proverbs 1:8 suggests. It is not the ‘commandment’ of God that converts. Paul makes that plain—by the law in the sense of commandment, he says, ‘I died’. ‘[C]onverting’ is a participle of shuv, the usual Hebrew word for conversion or repentance. So by the Word, truth, instruction, the kerygma (the foolishness of preaching), ‘God chose to save them that believe’. Peter’s declaration to the effect we are ‘born again ... through the ... word of God’ (1 Peter 1:23) seems to be plain enough that regeneration, and with it faith, have some dependency on hearing the Word of God, normally spoken (conveyed by whatever means) by an agent—angel or man or the Lord Himself as in Paul’s case. Yet, there was an inward illumination (special call) within Saul of Tarsus’ soul that enabled him to see what none others present saw and heard with understanding (Acts 9:3–7; 22:6–11). What others detected only as meaningless sound, Paul, the author of all those statements about communicating the message (Word, preaching, truth, etc.), also was aware of the presence of special illumination of the mind by divine power in his own and other cases.

The Puritans, John Owen to Samuel Hopkins, dealt with this problem. They were utterly opposed to the notion that mere hearing of the Word is sufficient to produce regeneration and consequent faith, for the same reasons I have repeatedly brought forward in this study. They insisted the event was not one with any necessary accompanying feeling—such as the ‘praying through’ technique. ‘We have no way to determine what is the cause of the ideas and sensations of our hearts, whether we are influenced by the Spirit of God or by a wicked spirit, but by considering their nature and tendency, whether they are such as the scripture tells us are the fruits of the Spirit’ (Samuel Hopkins, 1721–1803, student under Jonathan Edwards and Connecticut pastor, in a sermon on John 1:13).¹

Recall remarks in the first chapter on how salvation is conveyed to sinners and the place of the gospel itself, or the Word of God. ‘So belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ’ (Rom. 10:17 asv). ‘Truly, truly, I say to you, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life ... an hour is coming, and is now here, when the dead [in sin] will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live’ (John 5:24, 25). ‘[H]ear’ is used in a common New Testament sense of the ‘hearing with faith’ in these passages (Gal. 3:2; see also Acts 18:8)—i.e. ‘to hearken’. In such a case saving faith is based upon God’s testimony, not man’s, God’s testimony concerning His Son (1 John 5:7, 9, 13). This suggests that God takes the message of the Bible and if not by means of ‘truth’ or ‘the Word’, then supernaturally working with the Word by His Holy Spirit (John 16:7–11; Rev. 22:17) produces faith in human hearts (cf. Ps. 19:1–6 with 19:7–14 regarding the necessity of more than natural revelation to convert the soul).

The Agency of the Holy Spirit in Producing Faith

The inquiring student will find helpful counsel from John Calvin.² The heading to his major section on this matter reads: ‘Scripture must be confirmed by the witness of the Spirit. Thus may its authority be established as certain, and it is a wicked falsehood that its credibility depends on the judgment of the church’. This was Calvin’s way of repudiating the claims of the papal church that the New Testament was created by church authority and that only the papal hierarchy has knowledge and authority to interpret the Bible. The same may be said of the opinion that the Bible’s authority must wait for empirical, rational or historical proofs.³ Hence, as Paul has said, ‘faith’ must ‘not rest in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God’ (1 Cor. 2:5). This doctrine is congruent with the many affirmations of Scripture that ‘the new heart’ or ‘new spirit’ in the saved is the creation of God (Ps. 51:10; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26; John 1:13; 3:1–8). Saving faith, then, is man’s response to hearing the Word of God under the influence (life-giving power) of the Holy Spirit. God does not do men’s believing for them, nor does He infuse any supposed grace of faith into them, for faith is always completely a human faith. Yet in the sense indicated in this paragraph it is thoroughly correct to say that saving faith, without means or by whatever means, is a divine gift.

Ephesians 2:8 reads, ‘For by grace you have been saved through faith. And this is not of your own doing; it is the gift of God’. In the portion, and this is ‘not of your own doing’, ‘this’ translates touto which is neuter gender. Commentators have differed as to the antecedent noun whether faith (pisteōs), the nearest and hence most likely (in absence of contrary fact), or grace (chariti) or salvation by grace which has been previously discussed and is present in the word saved (sesōsmenoi). Among the ancients, Chrysostom appears to assume faith (pisteōs) even though a feminine noun and not in gender agreement with touto (that) is the antecedent, therefore ‘the gift of God’. He says:

‘And that not of ourselves’. Neither is faith, he means, ‘of ourselves’. Because had He not come, had He not called us, how had we been able to believe? for ‘how’, saith he, ‘shall they believe, unless they hear?’ So that the work of faith itself is not our own. ‘It is the gift’, said he, ‘of God’.⁴

Chrysostom’s first language was Greek—of which he was a master and surely understood the rules for agreement of pronouns and antecedents. Abraham Kuyper cites seven classical passages (five from Plato and one each from Xenophon and Demosthenes) where the same phenomenon occurs. He insists, therefore, it is faith itself which, in this passage, is the gift of God. The ‘ancient rendering’, he says, ‘cannot be anything else but correct’.⁵

This does not make the Bible anti-intellectual, nor does Scripture advise us to deny the evidence of sense experience and of history. Jesus appealed to empirical proofs when He directed Thomas to touch the wounds in His body (John 20:27–29). John assures his readers that he is reporting what he had ‘heard’ in company of the apostles, what he had ‘seen’ with his ‘eye’, what he had ‘looked upon’ and his ‘hands’ had ‘touched’ (1 John 1:1), and Peter makes a big point of asserting that he and the other apostles were ‘eyewitnesses’ of the events of redemption (2 Peter 1:16–18). There is historical research and confirmation within the New Testament record itself (Luke 1:1–4; cf. John 14:26). Securing eyewitness testimony is an important aspect of all historical study. Such ‘proofs’ are employed by Scripture to convince the minds of men. John 20:30, 31 thus distinctly affirms. Paul has much to say about the importance of the ‘understanding’ in the exercise of religious faith, though he never suggests that faith accepts no mysteries. Faith, understanding God’s directives, accepts many things with the faculty of understanding which are not fully understood (cf. 1 Cor. 13:2; 14:13–16).

Existential doctrine, defining faith as a leap into the dark, a decision without data on which to base decision, could not be farther from biblical religion. One wonders how Karl Barth could ever have made his early pronouncements in this regard in a Commentary on Romans, of all books! Perhaps his later doctrine regarding the witness of the Holy Spirit is to be regarded as his more settled opinion.

It is important to keep in mind that although one must distinguish between the Word as instrumental cause of faith and the Spirit as agent, the two cannot be separated in the origin of saving faith in the heart of sinners. Attention to what has been called the psychology of conversion will help.

The Psychology of Conversion

The biblical writers employed what we now call psychological terms to explain why some read or hear the gospel without ever truly coming to saving faith while others have the ‘hearing of faith’ and are spiritually renewed. We have already thought about this in the chapter on effectual calling. Let us now think of the problem in relation to the Testimonium Spiritus Sancti, the witness of the Holy Spirit—a biblical and theological phrase once widely discussed—in 1959 revived and ably presented by Bernard Ramm.⁶ The speech and literature of most languages, including the Bible, use the eye and ear as metaphors for the mind (‘I see what you mean’, ‘I hear what you are saying’). Though sight and hearing are physical functions, eyes and ears (as all five organs of sense) are the organs of perception of the external world, on a deeper level, for which the only right word seems to be ‘spiritual’, people may not truly attain understanding of what they are seeing and hearing, and perceive in a superficial way.

The capacity of everyone is to some degree limited by one’s ‘framework of plausibility’. The same has been called the paradigm of reality. These frameworks or paradigms within which human beings unconsciously assume anything real must be positioned are created by the atmosphere of influence from our earliest hours of existence onward and we find it difficult to escape from them. I once, for example, had great difficulty convincing a woman who was at the same boarding house with my wife and me at Grenoble, France, that I was the Professor in whose apologetics class she had sat a few weeks before at Wheaton College. She could not focus on the evidence of my physical likeness in jeans and sweater in a scruffy dining room across the table. I was not wearing a suit and standing behind a desk. Similarly, a devout gentleman whose world is Islam is not going to find the world of the triune God of Christianity anything he even wishes to contemplate, much less embrace. It does not fit his framework of plausibility.

Jesus, quoting Isaiah 6:9, 10 said, ‘Hearing you will hear and shall not understand, and seeing you will see and not perceive; for the hearts of this people have grown dull. Their ears are hard of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, Lest they should see with their eyes and hear with their ears, lest they should understand with their hearts and turn, so that I should heal them’ (Matt. 13:14, 15 nkjv; see Mark 8:18).

On the other hand Jesus also said the ‘pure in heart’ shall ‘see God’; those ‘born from above’ shall ‘see the kingdom of God’ (John 3:3); ‘the ‘hour is coming, and is now here, when the [spiritually] dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live’ (John 5:25).

The impairment of our spiritual powers of perception is, of course, part of the curse of death caused by the Fall. All the doctrine of sin and its results are apropos this deadness toward spiritual things. The sad fact is that ‘the natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God’. It is not necessary to restate the entire dreary litany of the sad effects of original sin.

In a supernatural way, not verifiable absolutely by the ordinary methods of empirical science, so-called, God’s Spirit employs the Word in a special way to restore spiritual capacity. It should not be called a revelation in any strict sense, though when it happens, newly converted folk often feel that it is and say so. More properly, it is illumination, first of the mind or understanding after the image both of the originally created First Adam and of the Last Adam. What was once a stumbling-block (1 Cor. 1:23) and foolishness (1 Cor. 1:18) ‘now appears to the man whose perception has been restored as “the power of God” (1 Cor. 1:18); “the wisdom of God” (1 Cor. 1:24) “a secret and hidden wisdom of God” (1 Cor. 2:7) and as “the mind of Christ (1 Cor. 2:16)” ’.⁷

The matter should not be complicated by supposing two witnesses of the Spirit—one to the Word (though in another connection the Spirit witnesses to the Word) and one to the mind, recreating ‘the spirit of understanding’ and ‘the eyes of your mind being enlightened’. The action is one. The Word is always the same. God is always talking there and always says the same thing.

God’s voice ceases to be ‘background noise’ when the Word is accompanied by the action of the Spirit. When the Spirit enters into the heart with the Word to assure the truth of the gospel, its relevancy and the urgency of the message thus engenders the response of faith. This movement of the Spirit may be called ‘special’ or ‘effectual calling’ from one perspective. As regards the heart’s perceiving the truth of the Word preached or read it is properly denominated the witness of the Holy Spirit.

Faith, Knowledge and Reason

The preceding discussion of the origin of saving faith will suffice here for the philosophers’ disjunction of faith and reason. There is a much more relevant intramural discussion among Christian thinkers, leaders and writers as to the relation of faith and knowledge. Calvin clearly taught that assured knowledge of Christ is the first part of saving faith. Many later Calvinists have disagreed, saying in effect such knowledge is prior to and a cause of faith though not a part of it.

The medieval scholastics, refining earlier misunderstandings of faith, distinguished fides informis, unformed faith (simple right beliefs, credence, orthodoxy) from a more admirable faith formed by love, fides caritate formata, i.e. right belief working through the supernaturally added grace of love. Faith of both kinds was held to be meritorious. What is more pertinent to the question of the relation of faith and knowledge was a certain distinction between the two, still maintained as follows: if the layman, who knows nothing of the doctrinal content of the gospel and the Bible, merely trusts the ordained minister of the church (priest) in matters of religion, he is, according to the doctrine of the medieval church, a Christian and worthy to receive all church rites. This is called implicit faith (fides implicita). Hence a pagan Mexican Indian who trusts the priest of the Roman Church and obeys him in matters of sacraments may be saved, even though he knows nothing of the doctrines of true religion. The priest must have explicit knowledge of the details of doctrine, fides explicita.

Today, when efforts toward rapprochement with Romanism are taking place, particularly on local community level, we do well to know what we are doing. Calvin, who had recently escaped the cloying scholasticism of the late medieval church, saw the necessity of an intellectual content in saving faith. Calvin gives an extended treatment of so-called implicit faith.⁸ Against the notion that for faith to save, it is enough simply to trust the priest, or other favorite ‘evangelist’, he asserts that faith involves knowledge. The notion of implicit faith obscures a sound understanding of how to be saved, ‘Bedecking the grossest ignorance with this term, they ruinously delude poor, miserable folk’.⁹ He goes on to say that, properly understood, there is such a thing as implicit faith—in two respects. First as to true believers, ‘We certainly admit that so long as we dwell as strangers in the world there is such a thing as implicit faith; not only because many things are as yet hidden from us, but because surrounded by many clouds of error we do not comprehend everything.’ That is, we believe what we know God has revealed to us and trust Him for more in the future.¹⁰ Second, those who come to saving faith do not always do so in a flash. ‘We may also call that faith implicit which is strictly nothing but the preparation of faith.’¹¹ In Christ’s day on earth many ‘believed’ who, caught up into wonderment by the miracles, ‘did not advance further’. Yet others like the ‘official’ of John 4:46–53 went on from preparatory faith to full, abiding, saving faith.¹²

The Reformers all rejected these specious, unbiblical notions and connected saving faith with the preaching of the Word in order to the hearer’s understanding of saving truth as a precondition of faith. There is a necessary preparation for faith. Paul called it ‘the word of faith, which we preach’ (Rom. 10:8 kjv) and went on to explain that people must know something of their own need and the provision which God has made in Christ. (See Romans 10:9–17; 1 Corinthians 15:1 ff.) It is not quite correct to say that faith has a ‘content of knowledge’, for faith is an act not a creedal statement, though what some mean to say by such remarks is correct. Though no one comes to faith in possession of a complete ‘soteriology’, true faith, though faltering and weak, acts on what the ‘believer’ knows. Faith is not knowledge but an act based on at least a little knowledge of its object, to which we now give attention.

The Object of Saving Faith

Saving faith is not faith in faith, or faith in formulae as such. The true object of saving faith is ultimately God Himself in the Mediator, Jesus Christ. John 5:24 (‘whoever ... believes him who sent me’) so indicates as does also Romans 4:5 and other texts. These must all be understood in the light of the fact that Christ is God ‘manifested in the flesh’ (1 Tim. 3:16; cf. John 14:9; 1:1–13, 14). So Christ, Himself, is the focus of saving faith—but not the ‘Christ of faith’ created by liberal-modernist theology or the ‘Christ of the early Church’s witness’ of Bultmannism, rather the Christ promised to the patriarchs (Gen. 3:16; 12:1–2; 49:10; 2 Sam. 7), predicted by the prophets (Isa. 7:14; 9:1–12; 52:13–53:12; Micah 5:2; Pss. 16, 72, 110, etc.), indeed, by all the Hebrew Scriptures (Luke 24:27, 44–46; Acts 3:24); born at Bethlehem in the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4), interpreted as Savior in the Epistles, etc.—the Christ of the Bible. This is the heart of the saving gospel whether preached to Gentiles (Acts 17:18; Col. 1:27) or Jews (1 Cor. 1:23).

This faith, for Old Testament believers, it must be admitted, was as explicit as God and Scripture directed, but partially implicit as far as faith in Jesus (of Nazareth) Christ was concerned. (See Gal. 3:8 which says Gen. 12:1 ff. is ‘the gospel’.) They believed God; they believed God’s promise according to His Word; the promise was Messiah, Seed of the woman, Son of David, Son of God.

It is not incorrect to unite the Scriptures with their Author as sharing in this dignity of being the object of saving faith, for although some earnest but misguided Christians have sought to find a saving message of divine grace in nature or the constitution of man as ‘inner light’ or as conscience, the effort has been unsuccessful. The God of faith and the Christ of faith are the God and Christ of the Bible. Neither church nor tradition and certainly not the light of nature or the moral constitution of man offer a sure hope of eternal life. The classical handbooks of systematic theology usually contain several pages on the question of possible faith among the heathen (Socrates?) without missionaries.¹³ In view of the doctrine of Romans 10:13, 14, 17, Hodge is surely correct when he asserts that calling upon Christ ‘implies faith; faith implies knowledge: knowledge implies objective teaching. “Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God” ... There is no faith, therefore, where the gospel is not heard; and where there is no faith, there is no salvation’.¹⁴ (The last chapter of this section considers at length the currently pressing controversy whether Christ can be found savingly in non-Christian religions.)

Confession of Faith in Christ

From the opening words of the ‘Apostle’s Creed’, ‘I believe’ (Latin credo) comes from the word ‘creed’. Hence a ‘creed’ in the best sense is a personal confession of faith.¹⁵ It is to be regretted that since faith has been frequently over-intellectualized (right statement of doctrine) and, since many modern people know that formal creeds are sometimes associated with sacerdotal religion (salvation by forms and ceremonies), many are prejudiced against formal confessions and creeds. Yet we do well to remind ourselves that ‘extemporaneous’ or ‘spontaneous’ testimony (witness, confession) is likewise capable of being a public ‘act’, spoken only because it is expected. Much that goes for spontaneous witness is about as unrehearsed as a coached recitation of Macbeth’s soliloquy in an elocution contest.

The earlier confessions of faith in the New Testament are mainly very simple: ‘You are the Christ, the Son of the living God’ (Matt. 16:16); ‘Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom’ (Luke 23:42 kjv); ‘I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God’ (Acts 8:37 kjv, omitted in some ancient MSS and therefore marginal in esv). Then they become somewhat longer, though simple still (Rom. 10:9). Certain New Testament statements thought to be derived from ancient hymns or ‘creeds’ seem like public group confessions (Phil. 2:5 ff.; 1 Tim. 3:16) though it is far from certain they really ever were recited in churches before becoming a part of Scripture. The nearest thing to a list formulated as essential beliefs is 1 Corinthians 15:1 ff.

The baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19, 20), however, may tell us more than all these supposed ‘creeds’. In the New Testament, initial confession is with the ‘mouth’ (Rom. 10:10) and it is by presenting one’s self for and in baptism (Acts 16:15, 30–34). The early converts presented themselves at the water and were baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, thereby making public announcement of faith in Christ. We are told that oral confession often preceded. Modern taste (necessity?) has asked for ‘walking up front’, ‘raising of the hand’, ‘going to the inquiry room’, ‘praying through at the altar’ or ‘giving a testimony’—and other things. Initial confession in the New Testament—the restoration thereof greatly to be desired—was spontaneously oral (Peter and the repentant thief) or oral in response to question followed by baptism. Confession was of Christ as Savior and Lord, no distinction being made between the one (Lord) and the other (Savior) (all the examples clearly involve Christ’s Lordship), and one was not considered a disciple until baptism had occurred.¹⁶ The churches rather quickly adopted policies of extended instruction before baptism and of expecting some evidence of a changed life (fruits of repentance and faith) before baptism.

After several decades new believers, yet unbaptized, were required to sit or stand separately from members. Special portions of the liturgy were designed for them and they even were excluded from certain parts of the service until after baptism. ‘The liturgy of the catechumens’ (those being catechized) was a regular feature of the developing system. Later, when baptism of the infant offspring of Christian parents became general practice, the catechizing took place (usually in early adolescence) after ‘christening’. That was followed by ‘confirmation’ vows (in place of earlier adult baptismal vows), ‘first communion’ and full church membership. Note that oral confession of Christian faith at ‘confirmation’ is required in this still widespread tradition before admission to the full privileges of church membership.

No separation of baptism from admission to local church membership, nor any church membership apart from the church’s ordinance of baptism, apparently was made until modern post-Reformation times and the rise of religious pluralism in American and European communities.

When Christianity comes to a formerly wholly pagan culture, presenting oneself for public baptism is still the event which to the general (pagan) public, even family and friends, unites the new Christian with the fellowship of believers in Christ and disunites him in many ways (especially heathen initiation and puberty rites, superstitions, spiritism, etc.) from the surrounding culture. Hindu and Muslim families care little, we are told, how much their members attend meetings and lectures of Christians. But baptism is another matter. There the tensions begin, often leading to rupture and ultimately to other conversions—as Jesus promised (Matt. 10:34–42).¹⁷

How Much and How Strong Must Saving Faith Be?

Is faith ever mixed with doubt? On a superficial level the Bible seems to be at odds with itself on the question whether true faith is ever mixed with ‘honest doubt’—or at least lack of full confidence. On the one hand is James’ blunt statement about a fatal kind of doubt. In one’s prayers, he seems to say, doubt is the very opposite of faith. ‘[L]et him ask in faith, with no doubting, for the one who doubts is like a wave of the sea that is driven and tossed by the wind’ (James 1:6). Such a doubter is ‘double-minded ... unstable in all his ways’ and ‘must not suppose that he will receive anything from the Lord’ (vv. 7, 8). On the other hand we find the Lord generously rewarding the most timid sort of faith, e.g. the simple touch of His garment, and everyone knows that doubting Thomas had a thoroughly sceptical mix in his faith. Several ‘heroes’ of faith in Hebrews 11 are equally famous for the failures (doubts) mixed in with faith. One thinks of Abram’s slippery slide to Egypt and Gerar—both on account of faith sadly mixed with doubt in the form of lack of confidence.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892) succeeded Wordsworth as Poet Laureate in the Victorian Age. It was a time when all the forces of a ripening ‘Enlightenment’ were converging to weaken or to destroy faith in a unique, saving revelation. Tennyson (with Bryant) became for me, first as a boy and ever since, the greatest single extra-biblical support of true saving faith against doubt as I too have wrestled with native scepticism and ‘the heartache, and the natural shocks/ That flesh is heir to’ while ‘yet believing’ (1 Peter 1:8 kjv). I have recited ‘Crossing the Bar’ at the grave of many to the amazing comfort of many, and lines from ‘In Memoriam’ in funeral services of many. It is precisely the recognition of the timid presence of something like doubt—perhaps it is only awe and trembling in presence of mystery (Otto’s tremendum). At any rate I vibrate ‘in sync’ with these lines from Tennyson’s ‘In Memoriam’ (to Arthur Hallan, his recently deceased dear friend):

Strong Son of God, Immortal love,

Whom we, that have not seen thy face

By faith, and faith alone embrace,

Believing where we cannot prove.

and from Tennyson's 'Crossing the Bar':

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place

The flood may bear me far,

I hope to see my Pilot face to face

When I have crossed the bar.

and finally from section 96 of 'In Memoriam':

You tell me, doubt is Devil-born.

I know not. One [a deceased friend] indeed I knew

In many a subtle question versed,

Who touched a jarring lyre at first,

But ever strove to make it true;

Perplexed in faith, but pure in deeds,

At last he beat his music out,

There lives more faith in honest doubt,

Believe me than in half the creeds.

Grant some rhetorical excesses and poetic, allusive obscurity. Acknowledge that as a poet he dared express in the great poem what we orthodox rightfully repress, a hope that everyone will be saved —'And faintly trust the larger hope'. Yet the faith of Thomas before the Sunday after Easter and of Mark between Acts 15 and 2 Timothy 4:11 was more like that of Tennyson's friend, Arthur Hallam, than the confidence of the author of the following:

'I ... am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day' (2 Tim. 1:12 kjv) and 'I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.... I have kept the faith' (2 Tim. 4:6, 7 kjv).

It seems to me that we should observe the following feature: of faith in relation to doubt.

a) We first come trembling to Christ. As Charlotte Elliott said for most of us, 'Just as I am, though tossed about With many a conflict, many a doubt, fightings within and fears without, O Lamb of God I come'. Let us think of the despairing jailer of Acts 16, of the dying thief on the cross, even of Saul of Tarsus himself at the beginning of his journey of faith (Acts 9). Even as eighty-year-old Moses, when he caught sight of divine reality atop Mt Sinai thought 'so terrifying was the sight that Moses said, "I tremble with fear"' (Heb. 12:21).

b) Faith though small and weak, only slightly informed of the truth at first, grows, as noted above. Sometimes it even grows ‘abundantly’ (2 Thess. 1:3).

c) Steady confidence or trust is an aspect of mature faith only. The many exhortations of Scripture to increase believers’ confidence demonstrates that desirable as full trust is, we sinners do mix it with doubt and need to be encouraged to ‘lift your drooping hands and strengthen your weak knees’ (Heb. 12:12). ‘[W]e beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more’ in all virtues (1 Thess. 4:10 kjv). This encouragement came from a busy evangelist who was writing back to a very newly formed assembly of believers (Acts 17).

d) Increase of faith is a matter of prayer by and for Christians. Luke reports the Twelve faced with the formidable task of forgiving chronic offenders, says ‘The apostles said to the Lord, “Increase our faith” ’ (Luke 17:5), and a newly convinced disciple, ‘I believe; help my unbelief!’ (Mark 9:24).

e) The Lord put greater emphasis on the authenticity of one’s faith than the size of it. He did not say, ‘If you have faith as a mountain you can move a mustard seed’, but the other way around.

f) As B. B. Warfield points out, ‘Jesus deals with notable tenderness with those of “little faith”, and His apostles imitated Him.’¹⁸ Indeed Jesus used ‘little faith’ (with big doubts) as occasion to teach big faith with smaller doubt (Matt. 6:20, 30; 14:31; 16:8; 17:20; Luke 12:28; 17:5; Mark 9:24).

To quote Warfield again:

The effects of faith not being the immediate product of faith itself but of that energy of God which was exhibited in raising Jesus from the dead and on which dependence is now placed for raising us up with Him into newness of life [Eph. 3:19, 20] would seem to depend directly on the fact of faith, leaving questions of its strength, quality, and the like more or less, to one side.¹⁹

On Confessing Jesus As Both Lord and Christ

‘Lordship salvation’ is an expression that first began to be heard in the last years of the twentieth century. It is a pejorative term used mainly by folk caught in the down-draught of expiring hyper-dispensationalism and others still holding on to the two-stage doctrine of sanctification in the waning holiness movement that swept Britain and America a century ago. They think they discern a doctrine of salvation by works encrypted in preaching that one must believe and confess Jesus Christ as Lord as well as Savior. The folk who tag the rest of us with ‘lordship salvation’ think of themselves as preserving the pure doctrine of salvation ‘by grace alone’ in denying that valid confession of Christ includes acknowledging Him as Lord of life as well as Savior of the soul.

The early church did not think so. In receiving Christian baptism they acknowledged, ‘Jesus Christ is Lord’—and that was precisely why they were persecuted. Because Caesar (who couldn’t have cared less about what they believed with respect to a ‘spiritual’ Savior) insisted that the Roman Emperor is lord.

The late A. W. Tozer met the problem and this is some of what he had to say about it.

We have all heard the tearful plea made to persons already saved to accept Christ as Lord and thus enter into the victorious life.

Almost all deeper life teaching is based upon this fallacy, but because it contains a germ of truth its soundness is not questioned. Anyway, it is extremely simple and quite popular, and in addition to these selling points it is also ready-made for both speaker and hearer and requires no thinking by either. So sermons embodying this heresy, a bit of verbal overkill, are freely preached, books are written and songs composed, all saying the same thing; and all saying the wrong thing, except, as I have said, for a feeble germ of truth lying inert at the bottom.

Now it seems odd that none of these teachers ever noticed that the only true object of saving faith is none other than Christ Himself; not the 'saviourhood' of Christ nor the 'lordship' of Christ, but Christ Himself. God does not offer salvation to the one who will believe on one of the offices of Christ, nor is an office of Christ ever presented as an object of faith. Neither are we exhorted to believe on the atonement, nor on the cross, nor on the priesthood of the Saviour. All of these are embodied in the person of Christ, but they are never separated nor is one ever isolated from the rest. Much less are we permitted to accept one of Christ's offices and reject another. The notion that we are so permitted is a modern day heresy, I repeat, and like every heresy it has had evil consequences among Christians. No heresy is ever entertained with impunity. We pay in practical failure for our theoretical errors.

It is altogether doubtful whether any man can be saved who comes to Christ for His help but with no intention to obey Him. Christ's saviourhood is forever united to His lordship. Look at the Scriptures: 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved ... for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved' (Rom. 10:9–13). There the Lord is the object of faith for salvation. And when the Philippian jailer asked the way to be saved, Paul replied, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved' (Acts 16:31). He did not tell him to believe on the Saviour with the thought that he could later take up the matter of His lordship and settle it at his own convenience. To Paul there could be no division of offices. Christ must be Lord or He will not be Saviour.

There is no intention here to teach that the earnest believer may not go on to explore ever-increasing meanings in Christ, nor do we hold that our first saving contact with Christ brings perfect knowledge of all He is to us. The contrary is true. Ages upon ages will hardly be long enough to allow us to experience all the riches of His grace. As we discover new meanings in His titles and make them ours we will grow in the knowledge of our Lord and in personal appreciation of the multifold offices He fills and the many forms of love He wears exalted on His throne. That is the truth which has been twisted out of shape and reduced to impotence by the doctrine that we can believe on His saviourhood while rejecting His lordship.²⁰

Several years earlier, James Orr, the famed author of The Christian View of God and the World, editor of the International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, teacher of generations of seminary students in his numerous writings, tells how sound teachers of late Reformation times answered this error.

They pointed out that acceptance of Christ in faith is acceptance of the whole Christ—of Christ in all His offices, and for all the ends of His work—for sanctification as well as for justification—and that holiness, being the end of pardon, for anyone to think of accepting Christ for forgiveness, while refusing to own Him as Lord, is only thereby to show that he has not yet attained a glimpse of what true faith means.²¹

An author who flourished as chaplain to Stonewall Jackson and influenced for good theology in the American South was Robert Dabney. In his Lectures in Systematic Theology he addressed this same tempest in a teapot, saying:

The selfishness and guilty conscience of man prompt him powerfully to look to the Saviour exclusively as a remedy for guilt, even when awakened by the Spirit. The first and most urgent want of the soul, convicted of its guilt and danger, is impunity [from punishment]. Hence the undue prevalence, even in preaching, of that view of Christ which holds Him up as an expiation only ... [receiving] Him in His priestly office!... The man who is savingly wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, is made to feel that his bondage to corruption is an evil as inexorable and dreadful as the penal curse of the law. He needs and desires Christ in his prophetic and kingly offices, as much as his priestly. His faith receives Him as He is offered in the gospel [emphasis added]; that is, as a ‘Saviour of His people from their sins’.²²

Distinction between receiving Jesus as Lord from Jesus as Saviour is a false distinction but a real red herring—apologies to President Harry Truman.

Some Implications of the Doctrine of Faith

If faith is man’s response to hearing the Word of God under the influence of the Holy Spirit, if the Spirit must prepare the heart of a sinner, then several conclusions about what is important follow.

a) Proclamation of the Word of truth is of ultimate importance for the church. If people are to be saved, repent, be justified by faith and sanctified, then, by whatever means available, they must be given the good news.

The importance of proclaiming the good news accounts for the central place of public reading of Scripture and of preaching over all other aspects of public worship, once the Reformation and kindred movements, before and after, approximately restored the primitive pattern. Donald Bloesch devotes 37 of the 265 pages of Essentials of Evangelical Theology, Volume One, to a chapter on ‘The Primacy of Scripture’.²³ Thirty-three of the 300 pages of his second (and last) volume constitute a chapter on ‘The Cruciality of Preaching’ by prophets and preachers who are conceived as, in an important sense, ‘the mouthpieces and instruments of the Word of God’.²⁴ As to proper public worship, Bloesch writes:

Reformed worship is centered about preaching and hearing of the Word of God. We are here using the word Reformed in its widest sense to include the whole of Protestantism, the hallmark of which is the appeal to the authority of the Bible over the church tradition and mystical experience. This kind of spirituality was most clearly identifiable in the Reformation and in early Calvinism and Puritanism.²⁵

There is more to say, of course. The emotional high point of worship may be a ritual act or a song. In Calvin's thought the culmination of the public service of worship ought to be the prayer. Recent writers call attention to the fact that in contemporary evangelical churches the whole atmosphere of the biblical 'solemn meeting' and 'sacrifice of praise' has been lost in mood music, light entertainment and catchy sermonizing rather than expounding the Word and attention to 'the public reading of Scripture ... exhortation ... teaching ["doctrine" kjv]' (1 Tim. 4:13), and corporate praise and prayer. Part of this may be simply the effect of the frivolous, entertainment-seeking of the television age, part the free church fear of liturgy (which has to be learned to be enjoyed and appreciated), and part, very regrettably, to the emphasis on the talents and personality of the preacher rather than the worship of God.

Yet the fact remains, as Paul enjoined the 'interim pastor' at Ephesus: 'Until I come [back], devote yourself to the public reading of Scripture, to preaching and to teaching [or "doctrine"]' (1 Tim. 4:13 niv).

b) Prayer for the Holy Spirit's power to accompany the Word is equally important. There are many scriptural injunctions in this regard.

We live in a time when the surrounding culture leads us to suppose that no problems are solved by truth as such. Objective, eternal truths, authoritatively announced, are as out of style today as knee-breeches and bustles—especially among the products of the modern university. Somehow we must not let our minds be conformed to the world (Rom. 12:1 ff.) in this regard. But our current evangelical 'in' style of talk, shows that we are never the less conformed. Apostles did not 'share their faith' or 'make rapport'; they vigorously proclaimed a message and did so with authority. They were not mere authority figures but authorities. As preachers adhere closely to apostolic doctrine they share apostolic authority.

Again, the meetings of the churches for prayer are generally out of style also. This is a day of going and doing, of activity. The mid-week prayer meeting has largely been lost in the contest for a slot in the weekly schedule when people are free to attend. Everything else seems more important.

The old time mid-weekly prayer routines are not sacred, nor are the time-worn methods of proclaiming the Word, but proclamation and prayer are at the heart of the Savior's programme for His church. They dare not be laid aside. If we have scheduled them out we must again schedule them in. The forms may change, but the essentials must not be neglected and lost. Whole church prayer (Acts 4) has been scheduled out. If ever we prevail in this sick world we must schedule whole church prayer back in.

In the village culture of the ancient churches, people walked to church for two evening meetings between Sundays, for prayer, reading of Scripture (many could not read and few owned a Bible) and mutual encouragement. These days of meeting were called 'Station Days'—Tuesday and Thursday.

Two important observations remain: 1) that Christian faith—the faith that saves—can and does grow, gaining strength as the reliability of its object and the authenticity of the faith itself are verified in life. After a little time a vital faith is stronger than at first. This implies gaining more knowledge of divine things and experience in biblical living. Of one group of young believers, left behind after only brief apostolic ministry by their evangelist, it is written, ‘your faith is growing abundantly’ (2 Thess. 1:3) and James notes how trials strengthen faith (James 1:2 ff.; cf. 1 Peter 1:7; and 2 Peter 3:18). Compare also the trembling faith of Saul of Tarsus described in the ninth chapter of Acts with the magnificent certainty of trust and commitment of the same man a generation later as set forth by his own hand in 2 Timothy (especially 1:12 and 4:6–8; cf. Ps. 34:8). 2) Faith, the first virtue, is itself the fountain from which arise all other Christian virtues. This is the teaching of 2 Peter 1:5–7, which may be paraphrased:

... applying all diligence, in your faith supply moral excellence, and in your moral excellence, knowledge; and in your knowledge, self-control, and in your self-control, perseverance, and in your perseverance, godliness; and in your godliness, brotherly kindness, and in your brotherly kindness, Christian love.

¹ My source is Edward Hindson, Introduction to Puritan Theology, A Reader (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1976), p. 183. His source is Volume 3 of The Works of Samuel Hopkins an 1852 publication. See Hindson, p. 4.

² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion i, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), chap. 7 and scattered throughout all four books.

³ ibid., i. 7.4, pp. 78–81.

⁴ ‘The Commentary and Homilies of John Chrysostom’, in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers ii, ed. P. Schaff and H. Wace, 1890 (Peabody: Hendrickson Publ., repr 1994), p. 67.

⁵ Abraham Kuyper, The Work of the Holy Spirit, trans. H. De Vries (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1941), pp. 407–414.

⁶ Bernard Ramm, The Witness of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1959).

⁷ ibid., p. 37.

⁸ Calvin, Institutes iii, chap. 2, through sections 2–5.

⁹ ibid., 3.2.

¹⁰ ibid., 3.4.

¹¹ ibid., 3.5.

¹² ibid., 3.5.

¹³ See A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology ii, (Valley Forge: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 842–844 and Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology ii, originally published 1871–1873 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1970), pp. 646–675. Many popular and scholarly articles issuing continually.

¹⁴ Hodge, Systematic Theology i, p. 648.

¹⁵ The ancient so-called Apostles' Creed was intended as a personal statement of one's personal belief, a pre-baptismal confession. As recited in group worship it has value for worship only as 'What I believe' not merely 'what this denomination stands for', the shift from 'I' to 'we' is regrettable.

¹⁶ Robert D. Culver, article 'What is the Church's Commission?', in Bibliotheca Sacra, July–September, 1968.

¹⁷ Robert D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1985, new ed. by author. 1999), chap. 6.

¹⁸ B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), pp. 426, 427.

¹⁹ ibid., p. 426.

²⁰ From 'No Saviourhood Without Lordship' an excerpted passage from The Root of Righteousness by A. W. Tozer in 'The Fellowship of Concerned Mennonites', vol. xvii, no. 1 (Harrisburg, VA. Jan./Feb. 2002), p. 8.

²¹ James Orr, The Progress of Dogma, first published in 1901 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1952), p. 272.

²² Robert L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1878, repr. 1992), pp. 664, 665.

²³ Donald Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology, i (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978, 1979), pp. 51–87.

²⁴ ibid., ii, p. 72.

²⁵ ibid., p. 87.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (721). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Doctrine of Justification by Faith

Background to this Critical Evangelical Truth

The fact that God forgives believing sinners, reckons them righteous and treats them as righteous, is a central feature of the doctrine of salvation from righteous Abel (see Heb. 11:4) through Abraham (Rom. 4:3) and on through Jesus' sayings and parables (Luke 18:4) to the Epistles of Paul and on to the last chapter of Revelation (Rev. 21:19).

Justification as a formal doctrine is first expounded in Paul's Epistles. This doctrine was the most critical feature of the Protestant revolt against the medieval church of the sixteenth century and remains today the indigestible surd which the Roman Church cannot swallow and the evangelical church can never yield.

'Justification by faith' is plain enough in the Bible but the teaching was early obscured by moralism and sacramentalism. Nevertheless, the Spirit of Truth did not fail to illumine minds to this truth through the Middle Ages (Bernard of Clairvaux, for example) though full clarification and emphasis awaited the reforms of the sixteenth century.

Some touching lines from Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) who wrote in a very dark period, show the 'dark ages' were not wholly dark. He is addressing God in 'A Meditation on Redemption':

I was on slippery footing because I was weak and prone to sin. I was on the downward road to the chaos of hell because in our first parents I had descended from justice [righteousness] to injustice (and injustice leads down to Hell) ... the unbearable burden of God's judgment was pushing me down.... Being thus destitute of all help, I was illumined by You and shown my condition. You taught all these things to others on my behalf, and later You taught these same things to me even before I inquired.... You removed the sin in which I had been conceived and born. You also removed the condemnation of my soul.... You gave me the name Christian, which derives from Your own name; through Your name I confess, and you acknowledge, that I am among the redeemed. You stood me upright ... You made me confident of my soul's salvation, for which You gave Your life.... You who cause me to ask [for reception 'into the inner chamber of Your love'], cause me also to receive.¹

As A. H. Strong says after quoting different passages by the medieval archbishop, these expressions 'give us reason to believe that the New Testament doctrine of justification by faith was implicitly, if not explicitly, held by many pious souls through the ages of papal darkness'.²

It is important to know how the doctrine came first to be clearly understood and stated by those early Protestants who devoted so very much thought and prayer as well as literary energy to justification by faith. Hundreds of Reformed, evangelical believers died for confessing this faith in the Reformation era in many lands of Europe. We, their heirs, owe them at least to become acquainted with how they defined this doctrine that defined them in their own consciences and in the eyes of their enemies.

Discussions after Luther's first bold quickly led to a Lutheran consensus and were given permanent form in The Formula of Concord of 1576. Excerpts from this lengthy creedal document assert:

By unanimous consent ... it is taught in our churches ... that sinners are justified before God ... alone by faith in Christ, so that Christ alone is our righteousness.³

We teach ... the whole Christ ... in his sole, most absolute obedience which he rendered to the Father even unto death, as God and man ... thereby merited for us the remission of all our sins and eternal life.⁴

For he bestows and imputes to us the righteousness of the obedience of Christ; for the sake of that righteousness we are received by God into favour and accounted righteous.⁵

[W]e ... recognize Christ ... and confide in him: ... for his obedience's sake we have by grace the remission of sins, are accounted righteous ... and attain eternal salvation.⁶

The theology of Lutheranism came into minor but regrettable disagreement with Reformed theology after the initial impulses of the Reformation passed. There is little difference to be found in Calvin. Differences developed in discussion of atonement, whether particular (as in Reformed theology or universal as in Lutheran) and the distinction between active obedience (Jesus' sinless life of doing the Father's will) and passive obedience of Christ (passion and death), both involved in imputation. Yet essential agreement that justification is by grace through faith on the ground of Jesus' work of redemption remained. The Westminster Confession is still standard for all orthodox Presbyterians. The Formula of Concord is still standard for orthodox Lutherans.

The Heidelberg Catechism (1563) has been standard for instruction of the children in Reformed churches for over 400 years now. A 1963 translation of Question 60 reads, 'How are you righteous before God?' Answer: 'Only by true faith in Jesus Christ. In spite of the fact that my conscience accuses me that I have grievously sinned against all the commandments of God, and have not kept any one of them, and that I am still ever prone to all that is evil, nevertheless, God, without any merit of my own, out of pure grace, grants me the benefits of the perfect expiation [better, satisfaction] of Christ, imputing to me his righteousness and holiness as if I had never committed a single sin or had ever been sinful, having fulfilled myself all the obedience which Christ has carried out for me, if only I accept such favour with a trusting heart.' Question 61 reads, 'Why do you say that you are righteous by faith alone?' Answer: 'Not because I please God by virtue of the worthiness of my faith, but because the satisfaction, righteousness and holiness of Christ alone are my righteousness before God, and because I can accept it and make it mine in no other way than by faith alone.'⁷ This unsurpassed catechism for children states the matter of justification in language any one who wants to know can understand.

The Westminster Confession, standard for generations of Puritans, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Baptists in Great Britain, Ireland and America is more formal, but it has the advantage of precision and brevity. Chapter XI, art. i, 'Of Justification' reads:

Those whom God effectually calleth, he also freely justifieth: not by infusing righteousness into them, but by pardoning their sins, and by accounting and accepting their persons as righteous; not for anything wrought in them, or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone; not by imputing faith itself, the act of believing, or any other evangelical obedience to them, as their righteousness; but by imputing the obedience and satisfaction of Christ unto them, they receiving and resting on him and his righteousness by faith; which faith they have not of themselves, it is the gift of God.⁸

Notable both for breadth and accuracy is the summary by James Orr, who along with Philip Schaff, did more than any other theologian to make Americans aware of the sound part of European theology.

The chief points in the doctrine of justification at the Reformation [were] (1) that justification is of God's free grace and not of works; (2) that it is through faith alone; (3) that it includes the forgiveness of sins and the pronouncing of the sinner righteous before God; (4) that it is to be distinguished from the internal change we designate regeneration and sanctification, and does not proceed on the ground of this change; (5) that it is nevertheless not a mere amnesty, but has its ground in the perfect righteousness of Christ, and the atonement made by Him for sin; and (6) that it is instantaneous and complete, an act of God never to be repeated,—these cardinal points on which all the Reformers were at one, were then fixed, I believe, beyond the power of future to recall.⁹

This fine statement co-ordinates with James Orr's thesis, which is hardly contestable, that doctrines of Christianity, always present latently in the Scriptures, have been given full and correct form at distinct junctures of Christian history—beginning first with Christology, then Theology (Trinity), Anthropology, and after that, in Reformation times, Soteriology including Justification.

Justification by Faith Through the Scriptures

The 'seed plot' of this doctrine, for which the name is justification, is Genesis 15:6 (kjv), where it is said of Abraham: 'And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness.' This text becomes the classical citation for the great expositions of justification in the New Testament (Rom. 4:3, 9, 22; Gal. 3:6; James 2:23). Three great themes of salvation, constituting the chief elements of the doctrine of justification, are here: belief (faith), imputation and righteousness. In an Appendix to this chapter, suggesting a translation of Genesis 15:6 different from the standard translations, the seed of Paul's doctrine of imputed righteousness is seen really to be in this verse. God did not, as the verse seems to say, accept faith in lieu of righteousness, but imputed righteousness to Abraham on the basis of his faith.

To trace the development of the doctrine through Scripture is too large a task for the present project. Suffice it to say that the Old Testament prophets knew about it and connected it with Messiah (Isa. 43:23–26; 45:21–25; 53:11). Without using the word, Jesus announced justification (John 5:24) and the Gospels teach it (John 3:18; Luke 18:9–14). It is the special theme of Romans and Galatians.

Historically speaking, the doctrine of justification—properly distinguished from sanctification and connected with faith—became important in the growth of Christian understanding of doctrine at the time of the Reformation. The Reformers emphasized regeneration and union with Christ too, for a fair reading of their writings shows how incapable the beginning of faith and of a life of faith they knew sinners to be apart from union with Christ and a new birth. The eighteenth-century revivals did by no means first clarify this teaching as it is often claimed. Indeed, there are not wanting informed persons who would affirm that the early Wesleyans, for all their emphasis on the need for new birth, were not fully aware of man's need of special awakening grace before faith can exist in the sinner's heart. Of course the book of Romans was read throughout the centuries by many. Yet one of the sad facts of Christian history is that the pure evangelical teaching of the New Testament and of the apostles was compromised in sub-apostolic and patristic ages by retreat into moralism, legalism and sacramentalism. Even the golden-tongued Chrysostom, and Augustine, mighty of pen for the doctrine of grace, were tainted by these errors.

The meaning of 'justification' or 'justify' in salvation will be treated at length below. The bare word is a forensic term, that is, related to law and courts where it means essentially to declare not guilty, as opposed to guilty. It is implicit that treatment as free from guilt (free from civil restraint—jail—and release from punishment) is a part of the idea also.

The Hebrew tsadheq (in hiphil) and Greek dikaioō in human civil matters mean the same (see Exod. 23:7; Deut. 25:1; Job 27:4; Ps. 143:2; Isa. 5:23; 2 Sam. 15:4; Prov. 17:15) as also in connection with God's acts in religious matters (1 Kgs. 8:32; Isa. 53:11).

In each of these texts the hiphil form of the Hebrew word is used and in the Septuagint (Greek) is rendered by dikaioō. The King James Version consistently reads some form of 'justify'. That the meaning of the word justify is to declare righteous, rather than make righteous is unmistakable in Deuteronomy 25:1. It reads in the kjv, 'If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment [into court rsv], that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify ["acquit" and "acquitting" rsv and esv] the righteous, and condemn the wicked.' This puts justification out of the realm of moral or spiritual improvement and into the realm of legal determination of the moral standing of the subject before the law and declaration of the same. In the Roman Church justification—reduced from the scholastic verbiage attached to dogmatic statements about it—is the same as sanctification in the sense of moral perfection or improvement. Protestants believe in moral improvement too. Sanctification is the cart that follows the horse (justification), not the other way around.

The Greek dikaioō does not appear in strictly civil connection in the New Testament, but in secular literature it was commonly (though not extensively) used in the above civil sense.¹⁰ The Greek Old Testament renders tsadheq by dikaioō and is quite uniformly 'a forensic term ... constantly used in the sense of "to pronounce righteous", "to justify, to vindicate" '.¹¹ In the New Testament this is uniform.

Justification, when used technically, relates to legal status; it is to receive a favourable verdict. Sometimes the sense of declare righteous appears in non-legal situations, but the extended sense is the same (as when men justify God or vindicate Him; Luke 7:29, where 'make righteous' simply will not do; see also Rom. 3:4; Ps. 51:4). Justification therefore is related in civil situation to civil laws and in religious matters to divine laws.

The Special Vocabulary of Justification

It would not be a diversion at this point to explore all the evidence of Scripture and of ancient languages and culture to show how justification and by it every aspect of biblical beliefs are constituted in an important way with righteousness before the law; also that justification is never to be made righteous but to be declared so. There was little of the democratic feeling in most ancient societies that laws for men proceed from men. Rather laws, including civil as well as moral and religious proceed from the gods (or God) to men, the creatures, in ancient thought. This was quite as prevalent among Israel's neighbours and the Greco-Roman world of New Testament times as in Israel.

The first element of the English word justification is Latin jus, which means law. Similarly, the first element in the Greek word dikaioō means legal punishment. Our leading authority, with abundant proofs furnished, states that in the New Testament 'dikē' is found only three times, and always in the sense of 'penal justice' or 'punishment'.¹² The Textus Receptus has dike also at Acts 25:15. 'Popular [heathen] belief is reflected in Acts 28:4.... Though Paul has escaped the sea, he is a marked man now overtaken by the goddess Dikē, personified [divine justice]. In the other instances the word conveys the inherited Jewish [and biblical] view of eternal judgment, as in 2 Thess. 1:9.'¹³

Five New Testament and Septuagint (Gr. OT) words have the element dikē (pronounced 'dee-kay') as an initial syllable. All relate to righteousness before the law and all are related to the doctrine of justification. This merits attention to the essential connection with dike as divine justice as law—throughout a forensic (legal) idea proper to courts of law. These words are dikaios (righteous); dikaiosunē (righteousness); dikaioō (justify, declare righteous); dikaiōma (1. ordinance or 2. righteous act or 3. sentence of justification); dikaiōsis (justification in sense of acquittal); and dikaiokisia (quality of righteous judgment). This last word does not appear in the New Testament and in the Old Testament only at Hosea 6:5 as rendering of mishpat in a rare variation of the LXX text. Let us look at each of the five New Testament words in relation to justification in salvation.¹⁴

1. Dikaioō uniformly means the forensic act of declaring righteous before the law. The only place in the kjv of the Bible where this word or its Hebrew equivalent might possibly mean to make righteous or turn to righteousness is Daniel 12:3. Yet even here, 'turn many [emphasis added] to righteousness' probably should be (as the hiphil of tsadheq certainly allows) 'cause many to be justified'. James A. Montgomery comments here on 'the Hiphil of tsadheq' that the customary sense is legal and means 'declaring innocent' and suggests comparison with Isaiah 53:11,¹⁵ where the usual rendering (as kjv) is 'shall ... justify many'. James 2:21, 23, 24 are not exceptions. As we shall have occasion to note, James was correcting a false view of faith not a false view of righteousness, viz. 'Can that kind of faith which produces no righteous works truly be directed toward Jesus as Savior and Lord?'

2. Dikaios, the quality of being righteous—before God and God's law—is the constant Old Testament and New Testament understanding. The LXX uses the word somewhat differently from the Greek world's use. 'The fundamental belief in God links it firmly to the judgment of God.'¹⁶ It gets 'a new application to the sphere of salvation in the NT'.¹⁷ In common usage, of course, the word was used to describe one who conformed to whatever standard of morals the speaker held.

3. Dikaiosunē (translated righteousness) is moral uprightness, absence of guilt. In context of salvation it is the gift of God by imputation, as in many texts in Paul's Epistles. He contrasts the defective, false dikaïosunē (righteousness) which comes by keeping rules (Rom. 10:3 kjv) 'going about to establish their own righteousness' with 'the righteousness of God', 'the righteousness which is of God by faith' (Phil. 3:9 kjv). This righteousness was called an 'alien righteousness' by the old Protestant theologians because it is Christ's righteousness obtained through our Mediator's life of active obedience to God's law and His passive obedience of willingly accepting the passion and death. This righteousness is proper to Him for He secured it, but alien to us in that it is His righteousness imputed to us when we believe (Rom. 4:1–8).

4. Dikaiōma the accomplished fact of being justified in contrast to being condemned, no longer subject to penalty as in Romans 5:16–18 where it refers first to our 'justification' (v. 16) and to Christ's 'act of righteousness' (v. 18). Sometimes it can refer to a righteous sentence as in Romans 1:32, or to acquitted righteous deeds as in Revelation 19:8.

5. Dikaiōsis is used only twice in the New Testament and seems to refer to the procurement process in our justification (Rom. 4:25, the resurrection of Christ and Rom 5:18, His whole life of righteousness).

The Soteriological Doctrine

The soteriological doctrine now to follow will be developed in relation to seven rubrics, each furnished with a basic text of Scripture: 1) Author (Rom. 8:33); 2) Agent (Gal. 2:17); 3) Method (Rom. 3:24); 4) Basis (Rom. 5:9); 5) Means or Instrument (Rom. 3:28); 6) Fruit (Rom. 5:1–11); 7) Evidence (James. 2:24).

1. The author of justification is God. At Galatians 3:8 Paul, interpreting the Old Testament, affirms, '... the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles ["heathen" kjv]' and adds that God in saying, 'In you shall all the nations be blessed' 'preached the gospel beforehand to Abraham' (Gal. 3:9; cf. v. 8; and Rom. 3:25; 8:33). God is now justifying believing 'heathen'.

God is 'the Judge of all the earth' (Gen. 18:25) and will 'do right'—Hebrew mishpat, judgment. Ultimately the verdict on a man is God's business to declare. There is hence an eschatological aspect to justification. God will not reverse a verdict, thus Jesus' strong statement about every true believer in 'him who sent me'—that he 'has eternal life. He does not come into judgment, but has passed from death to life' (John 5:24). As 'Judge of all the earth' the Creator's justification of believers has first, the aspect of verdict or sentence (not guilty, righteous) and secondly executive public action whereby the person vindicated receives treatment due (see Isa. 45:24, 25; 50:7–9). All the biblical materials which are appropriately discussed under the doctrine of divine judgment are properly introduced here. Calvary, where was shed the precious blood and where He bore the stroke in the place of those to whom the stroke was due was the scene of the first eschatological, 'general' judgment. 'The Lord has laid on him the punishment of us all'.

2. The agent of justification is Jesus Christ. The phrase 'justified by ... Christ' is employed by Paul (Gal. 2:16, 17). The words of Jesus explain why the Second Person of the Godhead must be the actual justifier, viz. 'The Father ... gave him authority to execute judgement, because he is a son of man' (John 5:26, 27 nasv margin and asv, see also 19–26). The kjv, rsv and esv have 'the Son of Man' but the asv cited (a son, not the son) is correct. The Semitic idiom means a member of the human race—not in appearance only, but in very nature. True, the Son of God as man shall in wrath yet 'judge among the heathen', thereby littering the twilight of the present age 'with the dead bodies' (Ps. 110:6 kjv; cf. Rev. 19:11–18); but for now, as judge of believing 'heathen' (Gal. 3:8, 9) our Lord publishes the executive decree in heaven's courts, 'Treat this man as righteous'. An examination of Hebrews 2:9–18 will help explain just why he undertook the Father's plan and became a man; to justify believing sinners was an important part of it. Even during the days of His earthly ministry we find Him proclaiming release to captives, forgiving sins and declaring men justified before God (Luke 4:18; Matt. 9:2, 5, 6; Luke 18:14), meanwhile affirming that he 'came' that sinners might be called to repentance and be forgiven. When contrite sinners of every class and of any time of life and of every age of Christian history come to repentance and faith their confession is always amenable to the memorable words of Charlotte Elliott's hymn: 'Just as I am, without one plea,/ But that thy blood was shed for me,/ And that thou bidd'st me come to thee,/ O Lamb of God, I come! I come!... Just as I am, thou wilt receive,/ Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;/ Because thy promise I believe,/ O Lamb of God, I come!'

3. The method of justification is by free grace: 'Being justified freely by his grace' (Rom. 3:24 kjv—esv has 'justified by his grace as a gift'). All aspects of salvation are by God's grace, yet in a unique, striking way, justification, for God to declare the ungodly righteous, manifests divine grace. Paul graphically portrayed this, viz. 'Now to the one who works, his wages are not counted as a gift but as his due. And to the one who does not work but trusts him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness' (Rom. 4:4, 5); also '... for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (Rom. 3:23, 24).

As previously noted (Introduction) grace is so contrary to fallen man's way of thinking about reality, so capable of perversion or misunderstanding, that it has always been under attack by those who supposed themselves to be the defenders of public morality and true religion. Paul was 'slanderosly' accused of teaching 'why not do evil that good may come?' (Rom. 3:8; cf. 6:1). The Galatian legalists sought to improve on his doctrine by adding the rite of circumcision. We have commented already on the slippage from the teaching of salvation by grace alone in the early centuries. The Roman Church rejects complete justification by grace alone without meritorious works to the present day.

Yet the essential idea of justification by grace alone is simple. Grace is unmerited favour. It is granted 'freely' (Greek dōrean), i.e. as a gift—without charge—rendered 'without a cause' (John 15:25), 'without paying for it' or 'for nought' (kjv) (2 Thess. 3:8). Isaiah spoke of this 'righteousness' of the Lord as procured 'without money and without price' (Isa. 55:1; see connection with the last verse of chapter 54). The Bible never says that God has paid no price, but it forbids human beings even to try to pay for justification or to try to earn or merit part of it. This is a unique feature of biblical religion, for no other is a religion of pure grace.¹⁸

4. The basis of justification is the satisfaction rendered to divine law when Christ died in the sinner's place on the cross. There God made Him to be sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him (2 Cor. 5:21). '[W]e have now been justified by his blood' (Rom 5:9).

Readers will know that this aspect of the work: of Christ is fully treated in an earlier locus of theology.

A problem arises: some inquire how God can do something in the area of ethics, that is, of righteousness, which He condemns in others—‘Woe to those who call evil good ... who put darkness for light ... who put bitter for sweet’ (Isa. 5:20). Yet God ‘justifies the ungodly’ (Rom. 4:5). The problem may be reduced to three elements: one of anthropology, one of the law of God, a third of theology proper. a) All men are sinners, guilty of breaking divine law. The possibility therefore of justification by law-keeping would be possible only among a class of people that has not a single member on earth. b) The moral law of God is non-relaxable and invariable: ‘whoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become accountable for all of it’ (James. 2:10); ‘For God shows no partiality. For all who have sinned without the law will also perish without the law, and all who have sinned under the law will be judged by the law’ (Rom. 2:11, 12). c) God is perfectly and incorruptibly just and holy. His name is holy. Holiness is his ‘fundamental attribute’ (Strong). If He is loving or merciful it will be with holy love and holy mercy. He will not break His holy law, which is the reflection or extension of His own holy will and nature. Look steadily at these facts and justification seems impossible. Modern writers, from Socinus (1539–1604) to C. H. Dodd and W. E. Chantry, older contemporaries, have sought to remove justification from its legal-forensic, biblical setting to place it wholly in the realm of divine love, or mercy, or sovereignty, but the Bible does not allow it, hence the doctrine defended herein, especially the Pauline exposition, has been maintained steadily through the Reformation era and to the present only by the very committed evangelicals.

The liberal-Modernist, with (I suppose) genuine exasperation, asks, ‘Why don’t you rigid ideologues admit that God simply finds it easy to forgive people out of pure love and mercy without reparations or punishments?’

We assert that never in the Bible is man’s need or his character, or legal obedience, or human ceremonies (circumcision or baptism) or God’s love or His sovereignty or mercy brought forward as the true bases of divine forgiveness. It is wholly on the ground of that satisfaction rendered to divine moral law by Jesus Christ when He died in our place for our sins. This is set forth in some detail at Romans 3:20–26. Here is Paul’s theodicy—if we may use the word—for the righteousness of God in forgiving sin from Eve and Adam onward.

I quote the nkjv, because it preserves propitiation, the correct rendering of hilasterion in v. 25:

But now the righteousness of God apart from the law is revealed, being witnessed by the Law and the Prophets, even the righteousness of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, to all and on all who believe ... through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth as a propitiation by His blood, through faith, to demonstrate His righteousness, because in His forbearance God had passed over the sins that were previously committed, to demonstrate at the present time His righteousness, that He might be just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus (Romans 3:21–26 with the indicated ellipsis [emphasis added]).

Paul seems to be asserting that up to now (v. 21) the righteousness of God in forgiving sin (justifying sinners) could be in question. The prophets preached justification by faith but didn’t explain the ground of remitting deserved punishments. The threats of divine judgment seem to have failed. God did not seem to carry through with His own rules. David didn't die for his adultery. The judgment of the Canaanites and the exile of the two kingdoms were long delayed. Since the propitiation by Christ's blood took place we can now understand how God 'had passed over' the sins of former ages. 'At the present time', Paul is saying, we understand how God can 'be himself righteous' in former ages and now also be the 'justifier' of him that has faith in Jesus.

Long before Jesus died God was justifying the saints of old—Abel, Abraham, Moses, etc.—yet without palpable basis in law and righteousness. Reason as well as revelation acquiesces in acknowledging 'The blood of bulls and goats can never take away sin'. When, however, Jesus died, God vindicated Himself, for He then became publicly 'just [Himself] and the justifier of the one who has faith'. He did it 'freely'—without a cause in us but at great expense to Himself for '... it was the will of the Lord to crush him' (Isa. 53:10); 'But ... he was crushed for our iniquities; upon him was the chastisement that brought us peace' (Isa. 53:5); 'shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities' (Isa. 53:11 kjv).

5. The means, or human instrument, of justification is faith. This is the burden of whole books of Scripture (Romans and Galatians) and numerous smaller sections.

As to the nature and meaning of saving faith, the reader is referred to the chapters on the doctrine of faith. It is significant in the present connection to show how decisively God makes faith the single requirement from man. It is the only 'work of God' acceptable (John 6:29), the supreme duty of man (Heb. 11:6), the root out of which grow all other virtues, with love the beautiful flower (2 Peter 1:5–8). Righteousness is repeatedly said to be received by faith (usually as opposed to any other human means; Rom. 3:21, 22; 4:5, 11, 13, 21, 22; 9:30; 10:6; Gal. 5:5; Phil. 3:9; Heb. 11:7); justification, the imputation of righteousness, likewise (Acts 13:39; Rom. 3:25, 26, 28, 30; 4:5; 5:1; Gal. 3:14, 24); as also the contrite sinner is just (or righteous) by faith (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38; 11:4). There is not even a biblical hint of the specious notion that faith is a work whereby righteousness is earned or a virtue accepted by God instead of righteousness. Faith is not the ground of justification any more than of election (as some affirm).

Faith as the way by which the sinner receives the Savior and salvation is illustrated by many metaphors and similes as well as examples and illustrations. To believe in Christ for salvation is like eating food (John 6:35, 36) or drinking water (John 4:13, 14) or like looking toward the serpent in the wilderness as believing Israelites did (John 3:14, 15). Sometimes it is to step out on a promise as Abraham did (Heb. 11:9–18) or to act decisively in response to divine warnings as Noah did (Heb. 11:7). It is to confess one's self to be a hopeless sinner and throw one's self on the mercy of the God who covers sin, carries off transgression and imputes no guilt to the contrite (Ps. 32; cf. Rom. 4:5–8). Faith is the hand of the heart, which receives righteousness by receiving Christ. We may ponder the faith by which God justifies sinners, analyze it, and even write theology courses and books about it, but when it happens it will always be a warm, simple, personal event and, like true love, prolonged forever. It is reverent as a child's gaze at the sky, sincere as a mother's kiss, genuine as a true lover's declaration.

6. The fruit of faith, rather, of justification by faith, is everything God has for us in salvation. This is the climax of Paul's great treatment of justification in Romans:

Therefore, having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom also we have obtained our introduction by faith into this grace in which we stand; and we exult in hope of the glory of God. And not only this, but we also exult in our tribulations, knowing that tribulation brings about perseverance; and perseverance, proven character . . . because the love of God has been poured out within our hearts through the Holy Spirit who was given to us (Rom. 5:1–5 nasb).

Paul develops one of the items, ‘love of God’, on through verse 11, after which a new aspect of his doctrine is introduced.

Paul’s clear doctrine is that when God declares a sinner righteous and proceeds to treat him so, there is included in justification immediate conferral of every blessing in Christ. ‘Peace with God’—cessation of all hostility with fatherly benevolence is immediately ours, for ‘we have’ it. We have immediate ‘introduction’ or ‘access’ (kjv and esv) to God and by grace we have approved standing with Him. Confident ‘hope’ replaces enervating fear. Henceforth even life’s seeming hard blows (tribulations) are seen to be God’s loving hand developing endurance, character and stronger hope, for we see the overruling ‘love of God’, not wrathful punishment in what Henley in his Invictus might call the ‘bludgeonings of chance’ or Shakespeare’s Hamlet ‘the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune’.

Especial attention should be directed to ‘the Holy Spirit who was given to us’ (v. 5). It is the clear teaching of the whole New Testament that the gift of the Holy Spirit belongs to all believers, that they have the gift of the Spirit from the first moment of faith and that they have this gift in full measure (John 3:34)—hence there is no command and rightly no precedent for ‘waiting’ for the Spirit to baptize believers. View the evidence. John prophesied that Jesus would baptize men ‘in the Holy Spirit and fire’ (Matt. 3:11 nasb margin). The fire will come in due season at the Second Advent (cf. Mal. 3:2–5; 4:1–5; 2 Peter 3:10). Meanwhile let us attend to the promise of Jesus’ baptizing ‘in the Holy Spirit’ adumbrated by John’s baptizing ‘in water’.

Well along in Jesus’ ministry He had not yet ‘given’ the Spirit and would not do so until ‘glorified’ (John 7:39). On the last night with His disciples the ‘baptizing’ was still future and had to remain so until redemptive history had moved on through Jesus’ ascension to the Father (John 14:16–18, 26; 15:26, 27; 16:7–13). One utterance of Jesus is specific on this point, viz. ‘Nevertheless, I tell you the truth: it is to your advantage that I go away, for if I do not go away, the Helper will not come to you. But if I go, I will send him to you’ (John 16:7). After He ascended, the apostles, by Jesus’ instruction (Acts 1:4, 5), waited at Jerusalem to ‘be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days from now’.

That coming of the Holy Spirit was to be as epochal, dispensational, as once-for-all as any other of the acts of redemption. A few days later He did come; the second chapter of Acts describes it as it happened (Acts 2:1–13) and in retrospect afterward (v. 33). Paul, decades later, would write of no similar waiting, not of a so-called second blessing, but of how ‘in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free; and were all made to drink of one Spirit’ (1 Cor. 12:13 asv margin) and in Romans 5:5, quoted above, that we Christians all have as fruit of justification—part and parcel with it—the Holy Spirit and love of God shed abroad in our hearts as faith’s best flower (cf. 2 Peter 1:5–7).

7. The evidence of justification is good works. This is the sense of James 2:14–26. Let us begin a brief examination of this passage, seat of controversy with some who reject salvation by grace through faith alone, with verse 18. ‘But someone will say, “You have faith and I have works.” Show me your faith apart from your works, and I will show you my faith by my works.’ If a proof text is desired, James 2:18 supports the proposition that good works are evidence of the faith that saves (cf. v. 14).

But there is a problem: James concludes, ‘You see that a person is justified by works and not by faith alone ... For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, so also faith apart from works is dead’ (vv. 24, 26). The theology of the Roman church argues from these verses that the merit of good works done in the state of grace are a cause of salvation.¹⁹

James is not, however, in his famous statement, thinking either of faith or of justifying faith in precisely the same sense Paul uses the two words. As to faith, for Paul, to have faith includes not only intellectual assent to certain truths but also trust and commitment as discussed earlier in this chapter. Only the first element, intellectual assent, is involved in James’ statements about some folks’ faith. His entire treatment of the subject is to show ‘that [kind of] faith’ cannot save him (v. 14 asv). Even the demons have that kind of faith ‘and shudder’ (v. 19).

As to how Paul on the one hand and James on the other employ the word justification, a recent article by C. Ryan Jenkins says:

Paul’s concern was the sinner’s basis for justification with God (i.e. the basis for his legal standing with God), while James’ concern was to refute antinomianism by showing that one’s true conversion will be ‘justified’ objectively by works. Paul was writing of a forensic declaration of righteousness that a sinner achieves only through faith, and James was writing of a universal demonstration of righteousness that is accomplished by works. James sought to show that a person who possesses faith in Christ will be justified (i.e. vindicated as a true Christian by his or her works ...).²⁰

James has the same doctrine of justification before God and God’s law as Paul’s. He even, as Paul, quotes Genesis 15:6 in that connection (James. 2:23). Of course faith which is unaccompanied by regeneration and fruits of righteousness here and now is ‘dead’—i.e. not genuine. Genuine faith will vindicate the believer before his neighbor and bring glory to God (Matt. 5:16; 1 Peter 2:12).

Further comments: 1) James is not correcting or contending with Paul, because James wrote (in conservative scholarly opinion) before Paul did and likely before the conference over which James presided (Acts 15). 2) James is reproving both legalism and antinomianism among Jewish people who had joined the church and were producing no signs of true conversion. Any one interested enough to examine the book knows this to be true. 3) The language of the whole passage hinges on the ‘if a man say’ (v. 14). The kjv and asv preserve the conditional mode, which Americans, to our loss of precise communication, do not use much any more. James is speaking hypothetically. 4) The kind of faith James belittles is the kind which shows respect of persons, preferring the wealthy over the poor (James 2:1–13), ignores and reproaches needs of the destitute (2:14, 15), does not control the tongue (chapter 3), manifests a worldly spirit (chapter 4), and has all its treasure on earth rather than heaven (5:1–6). 5) There is a doctrinal unity of Scripture—called the analogy of faith. The Bible teaches plainly throughout that justification is by faith alone, without works as earlier parts of this chapter demonstrate. James does not do otherwise.

Questions and Observations

1. Why is there such variety of expressions—justification by God, by Christ, by grace, by blood, by faith, by works? Robert Haldane answers:

The divine wisdom is admirable in the manner in which the Scriptures are written. It is not without design that inspiration varies the phraseology respecting justification. Each variety is calculated to meet a different abuse of the doctrine. The human heart is so prone to self-righteousness, that the very doctrine of faith has been made to assume a legal sense. Faith is represented as a work, and the office assigned to it is not merely that of the medium of communicating righteousness, but is made to stand itself for a certain value, either real or supposed. Had inspiration never varied the expressions, and always used the phrase justified by faith, though there would have been no real ground to conclude that faith is in itself the ground of justification, yet evidence to the contrary would not have been exhibited in the manner in which it is held forth by varying the diction.²¹

Haldane goes on to show how each of the several expressions serves a useful and necessary purpose.

2. How is justification related to regeneration, union with Christ, etc.? A. A. Hodge and some others have thought justification is ‘an eternal act’, that faith only puts the believer subjectively in possession of a blessing already his. Louis Berkhof has provided a useful discussion, in four tight pages, under the topic ‘The Time of Justification’.²² He is in agreement with the following sensible verdict of James Orr.

But the true view would seem to be that regeneration, in the full sense, can as little be said to precede justification, as justification to precede it; for it is the same supreme act which unites us to Christ for our justification in which regeneration is spiritually completed. What does precede faith, and beget it, is the exhibition of God’s gracious disposition and His promise of salvation in Christ [emphasis added]. We err, it seems to me, in endeavoring to separate the factors in a process all the elements of which are reciprocally conditioning. As well might we ask whether, in the apprehension of truth, the act of intellect precedes the possession of the truth, or vice versa. For clearly, unless in some sense the truth were already within the mind’s ken, it could not be grasped by it [the truth]. The psychological process in which God reveals His Son to the soul is too subtle and swift-glancing for our categories of before and after.²³

A Note on Translation of Genesis 15:6

The last clause of Genesis 15:6 reads, ‘and he [God] counted it to him [Abraham] as righteousness’ (esv); ‘and he [God] counted it to him [Abraham] for righteousness’ (kjv); ‘and he reckoned it to him for righteousness’ (asv); ‘He reckoned it to him as righteousness’ (nasb); ‘he credited it to him as righteousness’ (niv); ‘the Lord counted that faith to him as righteousness’ (neb). These renderings are ambiguous at best and perhaps (unless doctored in transit through the reader’s mind) even grievously in error.

There are three complete quotations of this clause in the Greek New Testament, two by Paul and one by James. All agree essentially in wording (Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6; James 2:23). There are also four partial quotations of it in Romans 4:4, 5, 6, 9. Paul quotes the verse (Gen. 15:6) to teach that saving faith means actually to give up one's effort to earn or deserve grace. It is trusting in God's mercy alone. God imputes righteousness to those who have such faith. Each of the three complete quotations cites the text of the ancient Greek Version (the Septuagint) of this clause, exactly. A fair rendering of the Septuagint (elogisthē autō eis dikaiosunēn) is 'it was counted to him for [or unto] righteousness'.²⁴ There lies the problem. For, the Hebrew would literally read, 'he imputed it [lit. her] to him [masculine pronoun], righteousness [femine noun]'. The Hebrew text is short and simple, only five words, as follows: wehe'emin bayhwh wayahsheveha lo tsedhaqah. Is it possible that here is a case where the pronoun it (her) (really a suffix on 'imputed', viz. 'imputed it') is in apposition to the noun righteousness? They agree essentially in gender and number and, I propose, are then both in direct objective relation to the verb. Thus: 'he imputed it [that is], righteousness, to him'. In such a case faith is not a 'substitute for' or 'as good as' or 'in lieu of' as several of the Versions, even the Septuagint suggest. The Septuagint and these Versions all seem to treat Abraham's believing as the antecedent of the pronoun 'it' (pronominal suffix) rather than 'righteousness'.

As is well known to students of Hebrew, there are precedents for the latter. Gesenius-Kautzsch-Cowley Hebrew Grammar says of feminine suffixes like this one, they are 'referring back to a whole statement' and cites verses at Genesis 15:6 as well as Exodus 10:11 and Job 38:18 (122. q). Evidence of such usage is enlarged and explained in a longer paragraph (135. p).

But this is not all. There are other sections of Gesenius-Kautzsch-Cowley where syntactic-grammatical constructions in the Hebrew Bible that are similar to or the same as the one in Genesis 15:6b are discussed. Some of these the same G.K.C. Grammar explains as permutation or an appositive, accusative suffixes (135. 1, p. 425). Among these are Exodus 2:6, 'she saw him, the child' [emphasis added]; Leviticus 13:57, 'thou shalt burn it, that which has in it the plague' [emphasis added]; 1 Kings, 19:21, 'he boiled them, the flesh' [emphasis added]. Among other examples are: 1 Kings 21:13; 2 Kings 16:15; Jeremiah 9:14; 31:2; Ezekiel 3:2; Ecclesiastes 2:21. Careful search might produce many more examples in the Hebrew Bible and in cognate literature.

Because it is a very familiar passage Exodus 2:6 is impressive as a parallel with 'he imputed it, righteousness to him' (Gen. 15:6b). The parallel is exact, viz. 'When she [Pharaoh's daughter] saw him, the child', etc. The nasb margin handles the clause in this manner: 'when she saw it, the child'.

And there is more evidence of the appositive pronoun suffix, also called a proleptic suffix. Let me cite a scholar whose fame and authority as a master of the languages of biblical antiquity command respect. Psalm 64:8 (v. 7 in English) would literally read, 'they shall cause it to stumble, their tongue'.²⁵ Franz Delitzsch calls it a proleptic suffix and cites Exodus 2:6 which we have considered above, along with Job 33:20 ('so that his life abhoreth bread') where he writes the suff(ix) '... is taken in anticipation of the following object' (wezihamattu hayyatho lehem).²⁶ He comments on a similar use of a pronoun suffix in Job 29:3, 'the suffix may, according to the syntax, be taken as an anticipatory statement of the object'.²⁷

To draw a conclusion: these several parallels (and there are several more) do not prove that the feminine, singular pronoun suffix (it or her) to the verb ‘he imputed’ is an apposition or anticipation of the feminine word ‘righteousness’. But they show that such is reasonable and syntactically possible. In such a case the employment of Genesis 15:6 by Paul to prove imputation of Christ’s righteousness is rendered more understandable and certainly not far-fetched. Perhaps Paul was thinking of the Hebrew text even as he quoted the Greek translation to his Gentile readers. If so he was thinking ‘He [God] imputed her [or it], that is, righteousness, to him’. It does make grammatical-syntactic sense and it clarifies Paul’s use of Genesis 15:6 as proof text for justification by faith.²⁸

¹ Anselm ‘A Meditation on Human Redemption’, in Anselm of Canterbury I: Monologion, Proslogion, Debate With Janiello, trans. by J. Hopkins and H. Richardson (Toronto and NY: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1974–1976), pp. 143, 145.

² A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge: Judson Press, 1907), p. 849.

³ The Formula of Concord of 1576, Art. iii, Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii, pp. 93–180.

⁴ ibid., art. iii, i.

⁵ ibid., art. iii, ii.

⁶ ibid., art. iii, iv.

⁷ The Heidelberg Catechism, 400th Anniversary Edition—1563–1963, trans. by Allen O. Miller and M. Eugene Osterhaven (Philadelphia and Boston: United Church Press, 1963), pp. 61–63.

⁸ Westminster Shorter Catechism in Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. together with The Larger Catechism and The Shorter Catechism (Richmond: John Knox Press, 1861, 1944), chap. xii, art. i, ‘Of Justification’.

⁹ James Orr, The Progress of Dogma, first published in 1901 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1952), pp. 268, 269.

¹⁰ Theological Dictionary of the New Testament ii, ed. G. Kittel and G. Fredrich (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1964), pp. 211–214.

¹¹ TDNT ii, p. 212.

¹² TDNT ii, p. 181.

¹³ TDNT ii, ibid.

¹⁴ See Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 350–354 for a very helpful treatment of these words, but without the input of TDNT which is to be consulted. I am in debt to both for this effort to point up the distinctive sense of each word in relation to justification by faith.

¹⁵ James A. Montgomery, Daniel, International Critical Commentary (New York: Charles Scribners Sons, 1927), p. 472.

¹⁶ Schrenk, TDNT ii, p. 185.

¹⁷ TDNT ii, p. 187.

¹⁸ Unconvincing claims to the contrary have appeared in journals of social science and of anthropology. Unfortunately I have mislaid the references.

¹⁹ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma, trans. L. P. Lynch, 4th ed. (Rockford, IL: TAN Books and Publ. 1960), p. 354.

²⁰ C. Ryan Jenkins, 'Faith and Works in Paul and James' in Bibliotheca Sacra, no. 633 (Jan.–Mar., 2002), p. 64.

²¹ Robert Haldane, Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (New York: Robert Carter 1847, reprints up to 1970), p. 196.

²² A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1957), pp. 517–520.

²³ Orr, Progress of Dogma, p. 274.

²⁴ L. C. L. Brenton in Septuagint With Apocrypha: Greek and English, trans. L. C. L. Brenton (London: Samuel Bagster & Sons, 1851; Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan reprint, n.d.).

²⁵ Franz Delitzsch, Commentary on Job, i (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1871), pp. 222, 223.

²⁶ Delitzsch, Commentary on Job, vol 2, p. 226.

²⁷ ibid., p. 118.

²⁸ I read a paper with a much more complete treatment of the problem entitled, 'The Righteousness of the First Hebrew: Reconsidering Imputation in Genesis 15:6' at the annual meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, 16 November 2000. It is available from the author.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (733). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Doctrine of Adoption

Where Does Adoption Belong in Ordo Salutis?

There is wide difference among good theologians as to where this doctrine should be placed among the aspects of individual (personal) salvation. These teachers are not in disagreement as to anything essential in the doctrine of salvation, rather as to how narrowly adoption should be conceived and how related to other aspects of salvation, such as regeneration and justification. Lutheran theologians¹ I have consulted expound on believers' access to the Father and other benefits of sonship to God but do not mention adoption per se as having anything to do with it. It is 'beneath their radar'. Dr Robert Reymond, a contemporary Presbyterian, quite to the contrary, begins not with specific attention to the very few references to huiiothesia (adoption) but with the noun son (huios), child (teknon) and little child (paidion). Then he says, 'all three [indicate] the filial relationship the Christian sustains to the Father by virtue of God's adoptive act (huiiothesia) (Rom. 8:15, 23; Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:15 ...)'² He correctly asserts adoption is a forensic act and brings passages in Ephesians which speak of God as the believers' Father into the range of adoption and says, 'I suggest that just as Romans is Paul's treatise on justification so Ephesians is in a special sense Paul's treatise on the Fatherhood of God and the doctrine of adoption.'³

Others arrange themselves in-between. I know of others widely separated in time and denominational connections who have held adoption is an aspect of justification and give good account of their opinion. Francis Turretin's sixteenth topic is justification. The fourth Question: 'Does justification consist only in the remission of sins? Or does it embrace also adoption and the right to life? The former we deny and affirm the latter'. He devotes four pages to proof and nails it all down in Question VI later.⁴ A. H. Strong (Baptist, died about 1920), though he was in no wise dependent on Turretin (Reformed), agreed and set forth a very appealing discussion to which we will shortly advert.⁵

John Murray (Presbyterian, 1898–1975) held that though not separable from justification and redemption, adoption is distinct from them.⁶ Murray was a partial defector from covenant theology, yet like many others, not merely Calvinist but consistently 'covenantal' in persuasion, tends to cite texts which speak of the believer as a child (teknon) of God as well as a son (huios) as both referring to the believer's status as adopted son. (So in Murray's article 'Adoption' in Baker's Dictionary of Theology.) He contends the terms are interchangeable in Paul's thought, citing Romans 8:14–17, but does not, in my judgment, sustain the point.

Of recent reference literature, the essay that speaks most clearly of a theology of adoption, is by Addison Leitch.⁷ It is interesting to me that in the bibliography he placed first A. H. Strong's treatment. I have found both Strong and Leitch to be convincing and valuable theologically. The following is indebted to both.

Roman Catholic authors, for whom divine grace is an undeserved infusion of power to earn whatever salvation we get, tend to define adoption or sonship as ‘brought about by the indwelling in our soul by the “Spirit of God” ’.⁸

The Background of Paul’s Doctrine of Adoption Not Jewish but Roman

Paul was a Roman citizen who found in the Roman legal custom of huiiothesia, conferral of adult sonship on male offspring (or sometimes other males) at a certain age, an idea and term to describe how he who is already by regeneration a teknon (child) of God has conferred upon him the legal privileges of adult membership in the household of God. There was no comparable Jewish custom, and modern customs, where adoption is of the offspring of others, provide no parallel. Hence Scripture is our only real source of understanding what Paul meant, for he doubtless employed only a few features of the Roman observance. He makes nothing, for example, of the Roman ceremony whereby adoption (huiiothesia) was conferred.

Many point out as does P. H. Davids that there is no adoption law in the Old Testament and notes that possible examples ‘which do occur are from outside Israelite culture (Eliezer, Gen. 15:1–4; Moses, Exod. 2:10; Genubath, 1 Kings 11:20; Esther, Esther 2:7, 15) and that problems of the infertile wife were not solved by adopting other people’s children, etc.’⁹ William E. Brown refers to the ‘adoption metaphor’ in several texts of the Old Testament.¹⁰ It seems to me, however, as for the Old Testament, it is more correct to say with E. Heinlein on ‘Adoption—In the Old Testament’ the examples even of Moses and Esther are not of adoption at all, for ‘the context merely implies that Moses and Esther were protégés of their respected benefactors’.¹¹ It should also be pointed out that Old Testament passages which speak of God as Father and Israel as God’s son have nothing to do with a relationship with individual persons, but of the collective Israel, the covenant nation. The declaration to David and Messiah, ‘You are my Son’ (Ps. 2:7) is unique and certainly offers no precedent for Paul’s use of the adoption idea to explain the special relation of believers to God as Father.

Main Features of Paul’s Doctrine of Adoption

Old Testament believers, while justified by God (Rom. 3:24, 25; 4:1–22; Gal. 3:1–22), were not granted huiiothesia (adoption) which believers, ‘not under law but under grace’, now have. This is explained by Paul in a long section—Galatians 3:23–4:7. They had the benefit of a national adoption (Rom. 9:4) which brought them a certain privilege and intimacy with God which no other nation had. This seems to be what Paul had in mind in speaking of his ‘kinsmen according to the flesh: who are Israelites; whose is the adoption [huiiothesia], and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises ... of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh’ (Rom. 9:3–5 asv). Until redemption took place after Jesus came in ‘the fullness of time’ (Gal. 4:4) they were kept under the Mosaic law as their ‘tutor’ (Gr. paidagogos).

Adoption is: 1) God’s sovereign bestowal (Eph. 1:5 nasb ‘sons’)—something not required by justice but wholly gracious; 2) received by faith of the regenerate sinner (Gal. 3:26 nasb); 3) based on the redeeming work of God’s ‘Son’ (Gal. 4:4–6); and 4) for the purpose of glory to God (Eph. 1:5 nasb).

Adoption confers on the believer 1) new freedom from fear (Rom. 8:15) and hence 2) through the Holy Spirit great boldness to come to God who is both our ‘natural’ Father by regeneration (John 1:12, 13) and our ‘legal’ Father by adoption (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15). Divine adoption also includes promise of 3) future conferral of the divine family name (Rev. 21:7; cf. 3:12) and to become 4) joint heirs with Jesus Christ (Gal. 4:7; cf. Rom. 8:17–19).

Our sonship with God (adoption, huiiothesia) will be gloriously manifest at the Second Advent of our Savior, at which time our adoption will be consummated by resurrection of our mortal bodies, for adoption in spirit only would be a defective sonship. In that day we shall be ‘like him’ (Rom. 8:23; 1 John 3:1, 2). The whole creation is said to be awaiting this time, groaning to be delivered likewise from its bondage to corruption (Rom. 8:19–22).

In Galatians the doctrine is set forth as an antidote to all forms of enslaving legalism; in Ephesians and Romans as part of a hope-engendering expectation and as a means of present Christian victory.

Addendum on Adoption As an Aspect of Justification

I am here presenting some of the rich harvest of the practical import of adoption when viewed, if not as an aspect of justification, then as related to it. A. H. Strong points out:

Justification is more than remission or acquittal. These would leave the sinner simply in the position of a discharged criminal—law requires a positive righteousness also.

Besides deliverance from punishment, justification implies God’s treatment of the sinner as if he were, and had been, personally righteous. The justified person receives not only remission of penalty, but the rewards promised to obedience.¹²

Scriptural evidence for this teaching seems to be decisive. It follows from the active obedience of Christ wherein he earned the rewards of righteousness as in His passive obedience He won the remission of our sin and sins. Some of the passages relevant are John 3:16; Romans 5:1 ff; and 2 Corinthians 5:21. In the Parable of the Prodigal Son there is a parallel. After receiving the prodigal as forgiven of his sin ‘against heaven and before you [father]’, the father directed, ‘Bring quickly the best robe, and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet. And bring the fattened calf and kill it, and let us eat and celebrate. For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found’ (Luke 15:22–24). ‘[T]his grace’, Paul says elsewhere, is a position ‘in which we stand’ as a permanent state (Rom. 5:2).

‘This restoration to favour’, Strong goes on to say, ‘viewed in its aspect as the renewal of a broken friendship, is denominated reconciliation; viewed in its aspect as a renewal of the soul’s true relation to God as a father, it is denominated adoption’.¹³

It is in a passage on fruits or ‘inclusion’ of justification that Paul asserts ‘we have now received reconciliation’ (Rom. 5:11).

It was the same Abraham who was justified by faith who then became ‘the friend of God’. This title was given to Abraham because of his close intimacy with God and his faithfulness (2 Chr. 20:7; James 2:23; Isa. 41:8). The friend of the king was a high court official, the king’s confidant and advisor (Gen. 26:26; 1 Kgs. 4:5). Abraham was not only forgiven but rewarded with unique access to God’s friendship and fellowship—one to whom God even confided future plans for Abraham’s wicked neighbours (Gen. 18:16–33). The Lord did not depart Abraham’s camp until ‘he had finished speaking to Abraham’.

In human courts there can be acquittal but no restoration to the normal rewards of rights and privileges of lawful behaviour. In justification there is both acquittal and restoration. A convict may serve his term in ‘the pen’ to pay for his crime but when he leaves he does so with the burden of disgrace and loss of social acceptance. He finds it difficult to find employment, a place to live, and he is likely to be without friends, perhaps even without accepting family. As a result he may go back to a life of crime and return to the penitentiary. In the court of Calvary God not only secured remission for sins of the past, but secured a life of friendship with God and of consort with other forgiven sinners here and now. ‘Blessed is the one whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man against whom the Lord counts no iniquity ... Many are the sorrows of the wicked, but steadfast love surrounds the one who trusts in the Lord’ (Ps. 32:1, 2, 10).

¹ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950–1957) and John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1934).

² Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson Publ., 1998), p. 759.

³ ibid., p. 760.

⁴ Francis Turretin (1623–1687), Institutes of Elenctic Theology i, trans. G. M. Giger and ed. J. T. Dennison, Jr (Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1994), pp. 656–660, 666–669.

⁵ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), pp. 856–859.

⁶ John Murray, Redemption: Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1955), pp. 132–133.

⁷ Addison Leitch, ‘Adoption’, in The Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, ed. M. C. Tenney (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1975), pp. 61–63.

⁸ E. Heinlein, ‘Adoption in the New Testament’, in The Catholic Encyclopedia: An International Work of References on Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church, i (New York: Catholic Encyclopedia Press, 1907–1922), p. 147.

⁹ P. H. Davids, ‘Adoption’, in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1984), p. 13.

¹⁰ Wm. E. Brown, ‘Adoption’ in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. W. Elwell (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996), p. 11.

¹¹ E. Heinlein, ‘Adoption—In the Old Testament’, in The Catholic Encyclopedia vol. i, p. 147.

¹² Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 856.

13 ibid., p. 857.

15

The Doctrine of Sanctification: Linguistic Factors and Past Positional Aspects

It will be necessary to clear the ground by taking careful note of the use of the Hebrew and Greek words used in connection with ‘sanctification’ (and kindred terms such as sacred, sanctify, holy, holiness, hallow, hallowed, dedicate, devoted, etc.). After that the distinction between past (or positional) sanctification, which falls into the category of God’s declarative acts, and present and future sanctification which are divine works in believers, must be given further attention. A sound theology, we repeat, must maintain a distinction between God’s works, His acts and human acts in salvation—there can be no works of sinners effective to produce salvation.

The Words Employed for Sanctification in Old and New Testaments

It will not be necessary to press any difference between the Hebrew and the Greek words, for it is acknowledged that the Greek New Testament follows the usage furnished by the Septuagint (Greek) translation of the Old Testament Hebrew words.

A group of Hebrew words (verb, noun, adjective) that are from a root composed of the consonants Q, D and SH are mainly involved. That the idea involved is not immediately apparent will be obvious by examining a few cases where this basic root form, qadhash, is employed. Examples from the kjv are: God ‘sanctified’ the seventh day (causative form of the verb, qadhash, Gen. 2:3); the burning bush at Horeb was on ‘holy ground’ (adjectival form of qadhash, Exod. 3:5); a ‘whore’ (noun feminine form of qadhash, Deut. 23:17); a male ‘prostitute’ (masculine noun form of qadhash, 1 Kgs. 14:24 esv); God is ‘holy’ (qadhosh, Isa. 6:3) as are also His people (Lev. 11:44, 45) as well as first-born of man and beast (Exod. 13:2); the central house of worship is a ‘Sanctuary’ or ‘holy place’ (Miqdash, a noun formed from the same root, Exod. 15:17 and dozens of other texts), an angel (‘holy one’, Dan. 4:13 Aramaic) and the ‘saints’ (7:18); the law, the city of Jerusalem, etc., are holy. New Testament use parallels this amazing but only partial listing.¹

The Meaning of QDSH in its Varieties of Forms and Uses

Some authorities speak of two main uses—secular and religious—others of three—cultic, religious and ethical. The latter proves to be more exact and more helpful in analysis for purposes of biblical doctrine. The treatment in The Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, usually very helpful, is rendered defective by a developmental theory tied to Wellhausian source analysis. Brown, Driver and Briggs Lexicon does a better job. If we had all the evidence from ancient extra-biblical usage, a strictly secular use whereby anything set apart for any special purpose would be holy (qadhosh) might conceivably appear. But the Bible and our present non-biblical sources do not seem to furnish such.

The following categories of use rather clearly emerge in Scripture.

(1) A Pagan Cultic Use

Modern research into Near-Eastern antiquity as well as the Bible itself pretty well shows that the Hebrew language of the descendants of Abraham after they left Haran and came to Canaan was Canaanite. Hebrew has preserved ‘the language of Canaan’ (Isaiah 19:18). It is more surprising to know—as research has demonstrated—that the vocabulary of ‘religion’ and worship and even theology—though not the doctrines—of Canaan is somewhat the same as we find in the Pentateuch. We should not be surprised, though we are. In no case is this more difficult to accept than the words for holy and holiness. QDSH, with various vowels, prefixes, infixes and suffixes designated the gods and goddesses, temples and temple services of Canaan’s pagan religious cult. It meant simply—dedicated. It had no specific moral connotation. Even today there are houses and people ‘dedicated’ to horrible immoral religious practices.

So we read in Deuteronomy 23:17 kjv (Heb., v.18), ‘There shall be no whore [Heb. qadheshah, female prostitute, holy woman] of the daughters of Israel, nor a sodomite [Heb. qadhesh, male prostitute, holy man] of the sons of Israel.’ This understanding of the words is confirmed by the fact that another common word for a female prostitute is zonah, a female who commits fornication,² is used in Genesis 38:15 to designate the same woman who is three times called a qadheshah—‘Harlot’ in verses 21 and 22 kjv. (The esv reflects this by using ‘cult prostitute’ in both the Deuteronomy and Genesis references.) No moral sense either of good or evil is in the words, even though deeply imbedded in a corrupt religious culture.

So just as such words for ritual, temple, sacrifice—even god—share the same root-meaning in whatever system of religion they are used, so with words for holy, holiness and related ideas. In Canaan they apparently had no moral or (as we think of it) spiritual connotation.

Quite to the contrary, in the speech and literature of Moses and all of the ‘holy scriptures’ (2 Tim. 3:15 kjv), these words have almost infinite ethical (and other) value, for which I seem to find no term to describe except sanctity and sanctify—English words derived from another pagan (Latin) language of a pagan people.

As an adolescent first reading through the Bible I came across these references to ‘harlot’ and ‘sodomite’ in Deuteronomy. Puzzled and, of course, interested, I found out what the second (sodomite) meant in a dictionary. I had heard about the first from some boys at school. Not long afterward I read The History by the ancient Greek, Herodotus, where he says maidens in Babylon served a term as temple prostitutes before they were allowed to marry. Many years later I have, as a pastor, experienced great difficulty in convincing older Christians that in any circumstances such customs could prevail anywhere and that I must be in error in saying women and men who did such things could be called holy women and holy men. This is because, it is safe to say, quite correctly, in Christian context, holy, sanctified, consecrated, etc., bear the force of moral purity. In old-fashioned homes this is driven home to children at every opportunity by good parents.

I, therefore, in addressing some of the tender spirits, now cite from acknowledged authority how important a place temple prostitution held in ancient heathen (it is the only right word) societies, even esteemed to be meritorious in that it supported the maintenance of the religious institution.

Among the ancient nations of the East, with the exception of the Jews, prostitution appears to have been connected with religious worship, and to have been not merely tolerated but encouraged. From the Mosaic ordinances and the narrative of the Old Testament it is clear that the separation of the Jews as the chosen people, and the maintenance of their faith, were always felt by Moses and by the later prophets to be chiefly endangered by the vicious attractions of the religious rites practiced around them [emphasis added]. The code of sexual morality laid down in the book of Leviticus is prefaced by the injunction not to do after the doings of the land of Egypt, nor after the doings of the land of Canaan, where all the abominations forbidden to the Jews were practiced; and whenever the Israelites lapsed from their faith and ‘went awhoring after strange gods’, the transgression was always associated with licentious conduct. In Egypt, Phoenicia, Assyria, Chaldea, Canaan and Persia, the worship of Isis, Moloch, Baal, Astarte, Mylitta and other deities consisted of the most extravagant sensual orgies, and the temples were merely centers of vice. In Babylon some degree of prostitution appears to have been even compulsory and imposed upon all women in honour of the goddess Mylitta [as noted above in Herodotus]. In India the ancient connection between religion and prostitution still survives. [It was the same, says the author, in Greece, but there was no temple prostitution in Rome which had its Vestal Virgins.]³

(2) In Biblical Religious Use

In the revealed religion of the Old Testament, things such as animals for sacrifice, houses and fields (Lev. 27:14, 16), the tabernacle or temple and its furniture (Lev. 8:10, 11), even the gold of the temple (Matt. 23:17, 19) are holy. The central idea is set apart for God. The same is true of persons set apart to God such as the first-born (Exod. 13:2) and the priests (Exod. 28:41).

A comparison of Exodus 13:2 above with Exodus 30:30 will show that to be sanctified (or holy) to God is to be specially His as a possession and whose service He may command. In the first passage that which is ‘Consecrate[d] to me’, says the Lord to Moses, ‘is mine’. In the second, of Aaron and his sons, ‘consecrate them, that they may serve me’.

(3) Holy in an Ethical-moral Sense

This applies only to persons not to things, and arises from the biblical cultic-ritual uses. Here is how: since God’s character is pure from sin, people belonging to Him must likewise be pure from sin. They must be of a character with their Lord. Certain of Baal’s servants, priests and priestesses could be sodomites and whores (to employ the straightforward King James diction) but not the Lord’s. Their character and activities were of a piece with the gods they served. Robert Dabney remarks somewhere that the heathen could behave badly without fear of their gods because ‘their gods were criminals’. This is not to deny that late Greco-Roman philosophy (not to be distinguished from science as understood at the time) became ashamed of their mythical deities, even though the philosophers’ personal lives were hardly better than their ancestors’ and the gods they worshiped.

An examination of Ezekiel 37:23 with verse 28 will illuminate this matter. Verse 23 predicts a time when Israel ‘shall not defile themselves anymore with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions, but I will deliver them from all their dwelling places [or ‘all the backslidings’ esv margin] in which they have sinned, and will cleanse them. Then they shall be My people, and I will be their God’ (nkjv). In such time God’s ‘dwelling place [tabernacle kjv] shall be with them’ (v. 27). The prophecy then connects all this ethical improvement with holiness: ‘then the nations will know that I am the Lord who sanctifies [QDSH] Israel’. The idea of separation or set apartness is paramount, but it is with respect to moral and religious matters.

Peter is exhorting his readers to abandon their ‘former lusts’ (1 Peter 1:14 kjv) inasmuch as ‘He who called you is holy [in moral sense], you also be holy in all your conduct, since it is written [Lev. 11:44, 45; 19:2; 20:7], “You shall therefore be holy, for I am holy”’. Then he adds that they had not been ‘redeemed with corruptible [emphasis added] things, like silver and gold’ and that ‘the precious blood’ was of ‘a lamb without blemish and without spot’ (1 Peter 1:15–19 nkjv). This places the highest emphasis possible upon holiness as a term indicating moral purity and holds it up not only as a fundamental attribute of God but as His highest demand upon His people.

Throughout the New Testament the ethical aspect of the idea of holiness or sanctification is usually intended when this word group appears. This is nowhere more clearly displayed than in the writings of Paul. In an important passage Paul says:

For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you should abstain from sexual immorality; that each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honour, not in passion of lust, like the Gentiles who do not know God; that no one should take advantage of and defraud his brother in this matter, because the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also forewarned you and testified. For God did not call us to uncleanness, but in holiness (1 Thess. 4:3–7 nkjv).

(4) Christian Doctrinal Use

Christian doctrinal use employs both the religious ‘set apart to God’ idea and the ethical ‘pure, conformed to the righteous character of God’ idea. The sense of separateness is paramount. In some texts the idea to make holy, i.e. to sanctify, does not contain the sense of purify (see passages wherein God sanctifies Himself [Ezek. 38:23], or His name [Ezek. 36:23], or His Son [John 10:36], etc.). In these passages the sense of apartness is always primary, while the ethical is secondary.

Past or Positional Sanctification of Believers

Even in elevated common English, one of the nuances of sanctify, or to make holy, is to declare set apart for someone or something or some purpose. We are familiar with this in ceremonies conducted to dedicate lands or buildings. An example is Lincoln’s Gettysburg Address: ‘In a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground.’ Rich men sometimes create gardens, parks or fine public buildings by decrees of dedication in a last will and testament. There is a section of the book of Hebrews that lifts up this sense of consecration (men dedicate; God consecrates) and makes an important doctrine of it. The same is true of the larger number of passages, mainly Pauline, wherein regenerate sinners are called ‘sanctified’ and ‘saints’—the former employing the verb hagiadzō, the latter the noun hagios.

Examples of such New Testament references to past, positional sanctification of believers, a much-neglected aspect of sanctification, must now be read. Because it preserves the distinction between singular and plural number important to the sense of the passage in second person pronoun the American Standard Version of 1901 will be cited.

... that they may receive remission of sins and an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith (Acts 26:18).

Paul ... unto the church of God which is at Corinth, even them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place, their Lord and ours (1 Cor. 1:1, 2).

Paul and Timothy ... to all the saints in Christ Jesus that are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons (Phil. 1:1).

But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who was made unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification, and redemption (1 Cor. 1:30).

Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, and such are ye (1 Cor. 3:16, 17).

Or know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?... And such were some of you: but ye were washed, but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Spirit of our God (1 Cor. 6:9, 11).

Or know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit which is in you, which ye have of God? and ye are not your own; for ye were bought with a price: glorify God therefore in your body (1 Cor. 6:19, 20).

By which will [God's will, v. 7] we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. And every priest indeed standeth day by day ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, the which can never take away sins: but he, when he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever-sat down.... For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified (Heb. 10:10–12, 14).

Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people through his own blood, suffered without the gate (Heb. 13:12).

These pieces of information from the Word of God enable us to make at least eight affirmations about positional sanctification.

1. There is, indeed, a past declarative act of God whereby all Christian believers have been rendered holy. The statements that they 'are [or have been] sanctified' (perfect, passive participle) in Acts 26:18 and 1 Corinthians 1:1 above say this. The event is placed in the past by the perfect tense. 'By this the church of God is distinctly characterized as Christian ... composed of persons who are sanctified; i.e. separated from the mass of sinful humanity, the world, and devoted to the exclusive service of the true God.'⁴ Hebrews 10:10, stating 'we have been sanctified' tells the same story and 'you were sanctified' (1 Cor. 6:11) is in the historical aorist tense. Indeed part of our sanctification is a fact of history.

2. Past sanctification has been conferred by Christ (1 Cor. 1:30 ‘Christ Jesus ... made ... sanctification’; Heb. 10:10 ‘sanctified through the offering of ... Jesus Christ’; Heb. 13:12 ‘Jesus ... in order to sanctify the people’). Past sanctification is pre-eminently the work of the Son, though Father and Spirit are not excluded (see John 17:6 and last phrase of 1 Cor. 6:11).

Robert L. Reymond in his A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith and before him, John Murray in Systematic Theology, Volume II, propose the category of ‘Definitive Sanctification’. It is based on the several New Testament affirmations that believers have been united with Christ in His death, burial and resurrection (Rom. 6:2, 6, 18; 7:4–6; 1 Peter 2:24; 4:1, 2). To these I would add Galatians 2:20 (rsv): ‘I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I who live, and the life ... I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.’ Dr Reymond summarizes:

[E]very Christian, the moment he becomes a Christian, by virtue of his union with Christ, is instantly constituted a ‘saint’ and enters into a new relationship with respect to the former reign of sin in his life and with God himself, in which relationship he ceases to be slave to sin and becomes a servant of Christ and of God. And the Christian is to take this breach with sin, constituted by his union with Christ, as seriously as God does and stop ‘presenting the members of his body as instruments of unrighteousness’ and start ‘presenting himself to God as one alive from the dead, and his members as instruments [or servants] of righteousness to God’ (Rom. 6:13, 19). He has Paul’s own assurance that ‘sin will not lord it over him’ (Rom. 6:14).⁵

John Murray’s treatment is similar. He like Reymond cautions that the sainthood of every believer is not sinlessness.⁶

These writers, it seems to me, are making somewhat the same point I have made in the last previous paragraph much more at length, except that they relate it to union with Christ rather than a declarative act of God. Perhaps, like the declarative act of justification, it is correct to say the declaration is made on the ground of our union with Christ in His death, burial and resurrection.

3. Past sanctification is by faith. In Acts 26:12–23 Paul recites the story of his Damascus Road conversion, that is, how he came to believe. In Paul’s narrative, Jesus, Himself, promised an ‘inheritance among those who are sanctified [emphasis added] by faith in me’ along with the ‘forgiveness [emphasis added] of sins’ (Acts 26:18 nkjv). Hence past sanctification is no more a matter of meriting salvation than is justification. Immediately upon coming to belief one has the privilege to sing, ‘Now I belong to Jesus ... not for the years of time alone, but for eternity’.

4. Past sanctification constitutes the believer a ‘called saint’ (1 Cor. 1:2) or as nasb puts it, ‘sanctified in Christ Jesus, saints by calling’. The passage (1 Cor. 1:2) cited employs a form of the Greek verb for ‘sanctify’ while the word saints is the noun for holy persons or things. Here we have connections with the doctrines of calling and the doctrine of the church, for called saints are part of a ‘mustered’ group (A. Deissmann), an ek-klēsia, a called-out group. Thus sainthood is the status of every Christian believer by virtue of having been so called or designated, by his Lord. A local church is a collection of ‘saints’ in a given place, directed and served by their own ‘overseers [“bishops” kjv] and deacons’ (Phil. 1:1).

5. Past sanctification is the present possession of all believing sinners. Every one of the texts cited above either directly affirms or indirectly implies it. The ‘sanctified’ and ‘saints’ of Corinth and Philippi are the entire local assembly of genuine believers. The insincere are addressed on the basis of their profession—what would be theirs if they were genuine. Sanctification creates no class of elite Christians.

6. Past sanctification, being a declarative act of God, has been perfectly done, complete, finished for each believer. There is no process about it. All God’s ‘acts’ as such are so. They cannot be less. It took place ‘once for all’ (Heb. 10:10). This sanctification can be no more partial or process than election or justification.

7. Past sanctification does not rest in any degree whatsoever upon what men do or ought to do. It has consequences in their lives, but rests upon no act of man except saving faith. There is a clear parallel, if not typology, in the action of Moses in sprinkling the blood of the Sinai covenant upon the people (Exod. 24:8), thus bringing them into bonds of that covenant, and the action of God in ‘sprinkling with his [Jesus’] blood’ (1 Peter 1:2). Moses, for God, did the sprinkling; the people did not do it. (See remarks under 8, below.)

8. In past sanctification we believers are set apart for God, being directed thereby to obedience to God, holiness of life. (See 1 Peter 2:9; Exod. 19:6; Lev. 19:2; 20:7.) Hebrews 13:12 says Jesus shed His blood to sanctify the people and Hebrews 10:29 speaks similarly. Peter (1 Peter 1:2) is thinking of Moses at Sinai (Exod. 24:8) and writes of ‘sanctification of the Spirit, for obedience to Jesus Christ and for sprinkling with his blood’.

The Old Testament type on which the expression is founded is no other than the making of the covenant related in Exodus 24:8 ... This is clear from Heb. 9:19 ... and 12:24 ... Accordingly, by [sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ] is to be understood the ratification of the covenant relation grounded on the death of Christ.⁷

Peter is perhaps thinking of continued obedience on the basis of that relation. This means that though positional sanctification is, indeed, wholly by God, it calls for response in personal holiness or obedience. See Leviticus 19:2; 20:7; 1 Peter 2:9 as well as 1:1, 2. There is a certain double meaning of hupakoē (obedience). It can mean faith per se or the obedience that springs from it. Either gives good sense at 1 Peter 1:2. The identification of obeying with believing is exemplified in the case of Abraham as cited at Hebrews 11:8, 9.

This eighth proposition provides a definition and summary of the doctrine of past or positional sanctification. The following chapter will lead on into discussion of present and future aspects of sanctification.

Holiness of the Church

Paul’s argument with certain carnally inclined believers at Corinth is based on an extension of the doctrine. Just as God took up His residence in the tabernacle (Exod. 40) and the temple (2 Chr. 7) consecrated to Him, so the Spirit of God has taken up His residence in the believer’s body individually (1 Cor. 6:19). It is therefore utterly incongruous for a man to use God’s own temple for intercourse with a harlot. Similarly (yet distinctly) the church as a local group has been taken over by God to be used as His temple. Those in the Old Testament era who perpetrated injury or pollution of the sanctuary, even inadvertently (Paul is thinking of Lev. 10 and the deaths of Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons), were destroyed immediately. It is therefore dangerous to harm Christ's church, His collective body on earth, by any kind of disruptive action (1 Cor. 3:16, 17). (Also this is a severe threat to all enemies of the church of Christ, her detractors and persecutors.)

The Idea of the Holy is the title of a important book by Rudolph Otto (1869–1937), a very insightful German theologian. The subtitle captures his theme: 'An Inquiry into the non-rational factor in the idea of the divine and its relation to the rational'.⁸ Otto was orthodox except for being limited by some acceptance of the 'higher criticism of his day'. He, for example, met the test of 1 John 4:2 and affirmed the bodily resurrection of Jesus. He was not opposed to Christian employment of rational powers in the exercise of faith any more than Paul in the first chapters of 1 Corinthians, but as the translator of Otto's book, quoting Pascal, says in his preface to the book, he thinks 'If one subjects everything [emphasis added] to reason our religion will lose its mystery and its supernatural character. If one offends the principles of reason [as rationalists perceive them] our religion will be absurd and ridiculous ... There are two equally dangerous extremes, to shut out reason [on the one hand] and to let nothing else in [on the other].'

Otto's term for the holiness of God is the Mysterium Tremendum. The idea of the holy is, to interpret Otto, the presence of wonder in the presence of overwhelming mystery. Once when my younger son Keith was about five years old I took him for a little fishing trip, just for him, to a place on Sandusky Peninsula—about ten miles from the parsonage where we lived at Fremont, Ohio. For about an hour before sunset we fished from a rowboat on the lazy river. Then as the sun was sinking, the air still, the surrounding marsh beginning to grow dim to the eye, we rowed slowly and then let the boat drift. All was silent except for the mournful sound of a waterfowl. As I watched my precious, slender, little boy, he too stopped making sounds, though he had been remarkably expressive when he had caught a fish an hour earlier. As we drifted his little legs began to shake as he braced himself on the sternboard. Then trembling, he looked up to me and said in words his father cannot forget, 'Papa, I think I would say something, but it would make too much noise!' That was wonder mixed with many emotions, including both admiration and fear before a mysterious presence, which might be either friendly or threatening or both. That experience of my little boy (now several times a grandfather) of both admiration and wonder before a mystery he perceived to be both admirable and desirable in the extreme, but perhaps also threatening, illustrates perfectly Otto's thesis that there is an aspect of deity which transcends and eludes comprehension in simply rational or ethical language about Him.

Otto invented a language to describe the elements in this kind of holiness. Though the rational and ethical are important to holiness, Otto desired to emphasize that there is more beyond them. Holiness minus the moral and rational he defines as the numen or numinous and he coined the expression Mysterium Tremendum to capture the essence of the numinous. This he reduces further to three aspects: 1) awfulness, that in God which inspires fear—as in the children of Israel before Mt Sinai. Not only did the mountain quake but so did the people. They feared not merely God's wrath but simply His tremendous special presence there. 2) The tremendum is also majesty—as when the Lord spoke to Job and displayed His presence to Job, and to Isaiah in the temple. We see ourselves as contingent and God as absolute. 3) The tremendum is also energy, a 'living fire' in Scripture language.

Otto also sums up the Mysterium Tremendum as the ‘Wholly Other’. God is a Being of a different kind (and here he calls on Bible doctrine) yet of a similar kind. He sees Christ the Mediator as the bridge to us.

Though one cannot approach God’s tremendum, we are fascinated with Him anyway. This element in his analysis of the numinous in God, therefore, Otto denominates fascinans, that which creates in us the feeling of dread. Like Isaiah we do cry ‘I am undone’.

But God has not left us there (as Islam has done with God). We, like Moses, first glimpse the burning bush, then ‘turn aside to see’; then spend the rest of our lives pressing forward and retreating and forward again.

In his book, Otto relates his thesis to biblical doctrine and religious practice. He finds it reflected in Mosaic laws regarding clean and unclean, for example. At a high point Otto affirms:

[T]he God of the New Testament is not less holy than the God of the Old Testament, but more holy. The interval between the creature and Him is not diminished but made absolute; the unworthiness of the profane in contrast to Him is not extenuated but enhanced. That God none the less admits access to Himself and intimacy with Himself is not a mere matter of course; it is a grace beyond our power to apprehend, a prodigious paradox. To take this paradox out of Christianity is to make it shallow and superficial beyond recognition.⁹

Respect for Holiness

A question to which there may be no answer: ‘Be ye holy, for I am holy’. Does this aspect of holiness, saintliness, to make it human, attach to believers whose lights, Peter says, are to shine in the world? Some of it attached to Moses when he descended from the mount (Exod. 34:30). The violation of it killed Nadab and Abihu. As old age advances saints closer and closer to entrance of the holy city not yet descended from God out of heaven, does some of it rest on their heads as it did on Moses? Is that what the statute means which says: ‘You shall stand up before the grey head and honour the face of an old man, and you shall fear your God: I am the Lord’ (Lev. 19:32)? I observe, in the Torah, civil judges are called elohim, gods, or God, to which the admonition of Scripture relates, ‘Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the emperor’ (1 Peter 2:17).

There is a frequent verb in the Hebrew Bible, ḥaram, which appears only in the causative stems (hiphil and hophal), with one odd exception (Lev. 21:18 where it may be a homonym) uniformly meaning ‘to destroy utterly’. The corresponding noun, ḥerem, appears six times only, five in Leviticus and Numbers and once in Ezekiel, meaning ‘devoted’ or ‘dedicated’ but the remaining thirty-two times is rendered cursed, accursed or curse from Deuteronomy 7:26 to Malachi 4:6 (Heb. 3:4). This is an example of what grammarians call polar meanings. Barakh in Hebrew is such a verb usually translated ‘to bless’ but sometimes the very opposite, as in Job’s wife’s infamous outburst: ‘Curse God and die’. In the case of barakh, it appears the ones who used it in their own language (Canaanites and neighbours) meant to call upon God in a formal way. The same word would serve the purpose whether pronouncing or denouncing, whether ‘bane or blessing, pain or pleasure’.

Something of the same sort seems to be the case with herem, the cognate noun in the Hebrew Scriptures. Leviticus 27 speaks of the custom whereby a man ‘shall sanctify unto the Lord some part of a field of his possession’ (Lev. 27:16 kjv). The usual word QDSH inflected here yaqdish (hi. m.s. impf.) to declare set apart, i.e. to sanctify, is used. In the Year of Jubilee the field should be still ‘holy’ (qodesh) to the Lord as a field devoted (herem) (Lev. 27:21). In this case the thing ‘devoted’ is not devoted to destruction but to preservation as a property from which the Lord receives the income. Thus the idea emerges of herem, devoted either to divine use or to utter destruction.

It is not our Western way of thinking about important matters, but the people, then as now, indigenous to the Near East agree with the Hebrew mode, and we had better learn to appreciate how they think. Arabic is closely related to Hebrew and this word haram, herem is commonly used in Arabic. In Arabic it means to prohibit from ordinary use. ‘Harem’ the special quarters for Muslim wives (not to be trespassed) is a form of the word as haram the Arab-Muslim name for the Jewish temple area in Jerusalem where there are several ‘holy’ Muslim shrines and a mosque.

This aspect of holiness is one we need to relearn. Let us think of the holy by its name ‘the sacred’ and recall that in any stable home, nation, state or society, the truth is sacred—‘you shall not bear false witness’ or the courts cannot operate. The marriage-bed is sacred too, for ‘Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled, but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge’ (Heb. 13:4 kjv). We should not let the prissy conventions of contemporary translators wash these glaring, sharp-edged declarations out of our Bibles, even if we do not like to read them out loud. ‘Our God is a consuming fire’. ‘Let all the earth keep silence before him!’ says the Bible. Therefore approach Him in prayer—even at youth ‘events’ ‘with reverence and godly fear’ and dress up to meet Him when you go to church!

Rightful authority, whether human or divine, has a certain holiness about it, because it is divinely given. Jude felt constrained to warn of ‘filthy’ people who ‘speak evil of dignities’ citing Michael the archangel who, reserving some respect even for the devil, simply said, ‘The Lord rebuke thee’ (Jude 8–10 kjv). There is a chattering class, endemic today, who seem to speak evil of any one as often as they can—at least so it seems, the so-called ‘media’ of public communications of what pretends to be news.

¹ Two qualifications: 1. scholars derive the verb qadhash from the corresponding noun, hence a denominative verb; 2. the negative idea in harem, ‘devoted’, is not strictly relevant.

² Francis Brown, S. R. Driver, Charles A. Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (Boston, New York and Chicago: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1906), sub zonah, p. 275.

³ This quotation on Prostitution in the 11th ed. of Encyclopeida Britannica Vol. 22, p. 458, is about one-third of a column of a thirteen-column article, fine print, by Arthur Shadwell, M.A., M.D., L.L.D., a British public health expert. I should add that at the time this edition of Britannica was published the writers were usually at least nominal Christians and the chattering elite were not yet systemically opposed to orthodoxy in faith and predisposed to find everything good in pagan societies, ancient and modern. A more recent book by Jack Finegan, Myth and Mystery: An Introduction to the Pagan Religions of the Biblical World (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1989), has a single sentence which only obliquely refers to the licentiousness of Canaanite religion and nothing at all about the others, except to say the gods and goddesses behaved the same way their worshippers did.

⁴ loc. cit. C. F. Kling on 1 and 2 Corinthians in John Peter Lange, A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures: Critical, Doctrinal and Homiletical, trans. P. Schaff (New York: Charles Scribner & Co., 1870).

⁵ Robert L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson Publ., 1998), pp. 758, 759.

⁶ John Murray, Collected Writings: Selected Lectures in Systematic Theology vol. ii (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), p. 281.

⁷ J. E. Huther, Meyer's Commentary on the New Testament, The First Epistle of Peter, p. 206.

⁸ Rudolph Otto, The Idea of the Holy, trans. J. W. Harvey (New York: Oxford University Press, 1958), 252 pages.

⁹ ibid., pp. 56, 57.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (747). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

16

The Doctrine of Sanctification: Present and Future Aspects

Before the Reformation

Present, or progressive sanctification, is what most evangelical theologians mean by the doctrine of sanctification. There is a good reason for this, even though seeming neglect of the past 'definitive' or positional sanctification of believers is to be regretted. As a distinct doctrine, 'sanctification' lacked careful definition until the Reformers recovered faith from medieval neglect and misunderstanding. Medieval thinking about faith seldom escaped conceiving of faith as a good work or a virtue employed in the use of sacraments and performance of good works. Bellarmine, apologist for the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent, never could understand why 'by faith alone' 'should exclude works but not faith since faith was after all a good work as well'.¹

The Reformation Era

As G. C. H. Berkouwer points out, though Luther's ardent heart and vigorous prose sometimes betrayed his sound insights and convictions by incautious language, he was unwavering in uncompromising insistence that justification must be distinguished (not separated) from sanctification. Justification is at the beginning. Good works, which accompany salvation, follow. These good works are not meritorious either, for though the Christian does them and they please God, good works do not produce the favor of God. Rather they are the fruit of growth in divine grace, by grace, in holiness of character.

For most of a century after 1517 there was debate (seldom dialogue) between the parties of Protestant Reformation, first with the lingering medieval mindset of the Roman theological hierarchy, then with the counter-Reformation as climaxed in the Council of Trent (1545–1563) and the Apologies (defence and explanations) for the canons and decrees of the Council which followed. The Roman Church at Trent formally excluded the teaching of Romans 3 and 4 and 11 that good works have nothing to do with justification before God as also did Robert Bellarmine (d. 1621), chief apologist for the Tridentine definition and anathemas.

Positional sanctification, or what Murray and Reymond call ‘definitive’ sanctification, or perhaps finished sanctification, is not to be found in Calvin, Turretin, Gill, Charles Hodge, A. A. Hodge or Strong. Perhaps they thought of the Scriptures relating to the believer’s holy standing as only another way of looking at justification. Interestingly, some Lutheran dogmaticians view sanctification as having a wider sense, whereby:

[S]anctification embraces all acts of divine grace by which the Holy Spirit turns a person from sin to holiness [which] ... in its wider sense includes every work of God by which he separates a sinner from the lost and condemned world ... bestowal of faith, justification, sanctification in its narrow sense, or the inward change in man by which he becomes holy, his preservation in faith to the end, and his final glorification on the day of judgment.²

Luther, himself, viewed the matter in this fashion.³ Mueller goes on to define sanctification in ‘its narrower, or strict, sense’ as ‘the inward spiritual transformation of the believer, which follows upon, and is inseparably joined with, justification’. This ‘narrow sense’ is present sanctification.

If we think of sanctification as growth in moral likeness to God, improvement of character, fulfilling the ethical norms of Scripture in heart and life it must be acknowledged that the people of the early Reformation were deeply concerned with it, even though they did not produce volumes of theology with sections on ‘present sanctification’. Berkouwer shows how, for example, the Heidelberg Catechism (first published in 1563 for the instruction of children) made these moral interests very prominent. He notes:

The Heidelberg Catechism declares at the very outset, that our comfort in life and death is that we are saved through the blood of Jesus Christ and that by the Holy Spirit he assures us of eternal life and makes us heartily willing and ready, henceforth to live unto him ...⁴

Berkouwer goes on to say:

In numerous Lord’s Days [the Catechism sections are divided by this device] the new life comes to the surface: in being governed by Word and Spirit, in sharing, the anointing of Christ and in the fulfilment of his three-fold office, in being free from the evil lusts of the flesh through the sacrifice and death of Christ, in being raised to a new life through the resurrection of Christ, in receiving the Spirit as an earnest, in the communion of the saints and our duties to our fellow members, and in the life-long battle against our sinful nature.⁵

The author documents each statement to the Heidelberg Catechism. This wonderful primer of doctrine by Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus, published nearly four and a half centuries ago, was the primary instrument for instruction of children among Reformed Europe and is still a standard for New World denominations emerging from those roots.

Rome's partisans of the time accused the evangelicals of teaching antinomianism and moral licence in denying saving merit to good works.

John Calvin produced a theology of progressive sanctification and demonstrated it in his own life. Book III of the final edition of The Institutes of the Christian Religion, issued not long before the author's death in 1564, has five chapters (vi–x) specifically related to the moral-spiritual development of the regenerate person's soul, respectively entitled: vi. 'The Life of the Christian Man: and First, by What Arguments Scripture urges us to it', vii. 'The Sum of the Christian Life: The Denial of Ourselves', viii. 'Bearing the Cross, a Part of Self-denial', ix. 'Meditation on the Future Life', x. 'How We Must Use the Present Life and its Helps'.⁶

It is not, therefore, correct to say, as one sometimes hears it said, that the sixteenth-century Protestants discovered justification by faith but had no interest in sanctification, which had to wait for the eighteenth-century Awakening to discover it. Quite to the contrary, the same spiritual forces which again made publicly prominent salvation by the unmerited favour of God, based upon the blood of Christ and received by faith, assigned as much importance to development of holiness in Christian life as to justification. The Roman Church had made the attainment of high morality the business of the 'religious'—monks, nuns and non-secular clergy—while the parish priest and common run of baptized folk limped along morally (and immorally) at a lower level, compensated for by confession, penance, purgatory and masses for the dead. The highest goal was thought to be the 'beatific vision' of God attained by a schema of ascetic practices and several systems of mystical ascent. The Reformation decisively swept all of that away and put in its place essentially the doctrine and practice of progressive sanctification held by most evangelical bodies of Christians today. Where sincerely, believingly and knowledgably followed, it has produced a type of piety quite different from that of the Roman Catholic communities. This is most manifest at funerals. Times are changing somewhat, for some Roman parishes have borrowed a good bit of the Protestant outlook on Christian assurance. But the very most sincere Roman Catholic Christian, if convinced of official teaching, is condemned as a heretic if he thinks or says he knows he is saved—for who can know how much saving merit he has accumulated? During my first pastorate, Mrs Culver and I attended the funeral of the elderly neighbour blacksmith, father of many children. After the mass, the priest's homily offered little comfort—for Jake had not attended church very often. The oldest son fainted and had to be assisted from the chapel. The family (all adults) wept through the sermon. My maternal grandfather died a non-observant Roman Catholic. His devout sister (mother of a nun) and another sister (a nun, sister superior) must have used all the papal devices—masses, prayers for application of the merit of many saints, etc., for rescue of Grandpa from wherever his soul went.

Let us, therefore, in pursuit of an honestly biblical-evangelical doctrine of sanctification, follow on with more than a mere nod of respect for that which the Reformers of the sixteenth century has transmitted to us from their fresh examination of apostolic Scriptures. I pray the previous remarks will nudge, if not propel, us toward humble acceptance of desperate need, as forgiven sinners, for the purifying of our hearts, enlightenment of our understanding and cleansing of our way. Let us, like John Bunyan's 'Pilgrim', progress toward the 'heavenly city' with a desire for it deeper than grudging acceptance that 'the living know that they shall die'.

Whatever kind of tribulation presses on us, we must ever look to this end: to accustom ourselves to contempt for the present life and to be aroused thereby to meditate upon the future life. For since God knows best how much we are inclined by nature to a brutish love of this world, he uses the fittest means to draw us back and to shake off the sluggishness, lest we cling too tenaciously to that love. There is not one of us, indeed, who does not wish to seem throughout life to aspire and strive after heavenly immortality. For it is a shame for us to be no better than brute beasts, whose condition would be no whit inferior to our own if there were not left to us hope of eternity after death. But if you examine the plans, the efforts, the deeds of anyone, there you will find nothing else but earth. Now our blockishness arises from the fact that our minds, stunned by the empty dazzlement of riches, power, and honours, become so deadened that they can see no farther. The heart also, occupied with avarice, ambition, and lust, is so weighed down that it cannot rise up higher. In time, the whole soul, enmeshed in the allurements of the flesh, seeks its happiness on earth. To counter this evil the Lord instructs his followers in the vanity of this present life by continued proof of its miseries.⁷

With this paragraph Calvin began a chapter of his great work which treats what today theologians call the doctrine of sanctification. It does not find most of us readers where we are presently in our thinking, but where we shall 'sure as death and taxes' sometime be, barring sudden end of life.

It is the glory of Luther and the other Reformers of the sixteenth century that they proclaimed justification as the beginning of Christian life, sanctification the process of moral improvement as justified sinners, and glorification as its consummation. Berkouwer says:

It was about this 'mystery of Christ' (Col. 4:3) the Reformers spoke when they discussed Sola-fide [by faith alone] and sanctification. They spoke to an age in which there was great eclipse of the Gospel, a time of great unrest. They spoke sharply and—it is no wonder—sometimes faultily. But they did give the essence of the Gospel back to the people. This is clear from their own words but also from the words of the opposition. The Council of Trent minced no words in its repudiation of Sola-fide. For this Sola-fide and this ground of sanctity could not be tolerated by those who loved the Roman doctrine of grace and penance, and this is the conflict [which remains to the present hour].⁸

The Importance of Moral Improvement

The importance of continuing, present, moral improvement may be derived from New Testament prayers, affirmations, exhortations, etc. Let us take special note of several.

[A]nd may the Lord make you increase and abound in love ... so that he may establish your hearts blameless in holiness before our God ... (1 Thess. 3:12, 13).

For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you abstain from sexual immorality; that each one of you know how to control his own body in holiness and honour, not in the passion of lust like the Gentiles who do not know God (1 Thess. 4:3–5).

For God had not called us for impurity, but in holiness (1 Thess. 4:7).

Now may the God of peace himself sanctify you completely (1 Thess. 5:23).

Strive for peace with everyone, and for the holiness without which no one will see the Lord (Heb. 12:14) [See also 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1].

The last of these texts makes personal holiness, a holiness to be pursued, something ‘without which no one will see the Lord’. Can we, then, doubt its importance?

Sanctification is of the Whole Person

The subject of sanctification is the entire man. We live in a time of exaggerated emphasis on the importance of a person’s body and mind and needs related to the physical and psychic. Theologians have tended to follow along—to the extent that it is no longer fashionable to speak of saving souls and some like to insist that a person is an animated body rather than, as formerly, an embodied soul (or spirit). So caution must be urged lest we simply conform our thinking to current fads and thinking of the contemporary world.

Without proposing a technical anthropology—analysis of man’s parts—a Christian person does have a spirit which goes to be with God when one dies and one has a psychic side, the seat of emotions and a body of flesh. Now, sanctification is concerned that God ‘sanctify you completely ... whole spirit and soul and body ... blameless’ (1 Thess. 5:23). The order is significant:

As apostasy began in the pneuma [spirit], and affected the other parts of human nature, sanctification begins in the pneuma and passes throughout the soul and body. A man can control his physical appetites, in proportion as he has a vivid spiritual perception of God and divine things. The intuition of the pneuma restrains the appetites of the psyche [soul] and soma [body]. If spiritual perception be dim, the bodily appetite is strong.⁹

Regeneration, without making the human spirit perfect, does impart spiritual life, a new nature out from which, by God’s grace, betterment of the thought-life, feelings and use of the body will grow.’ Sanctification is that continuous operation of the Holy Spirit, by which the holy disposition imparted in regeneration is maintained and strengthened.’¹⁰

The corrupt center of every human being born into this present evil world is in desperate need of inner renewal. The ‘natural person’ (1 Cor. 2:14) behaves badly but his bad behaviour is only surface exposure of the unseen root of his problem. Paul well puts ‘a base mind’ before ‘improper conduct’ (Rom. 1:28 rsv). Sophisticated, sinful leaders of the ‘cool’ crowd ‘oppose the truth’ because they are ‘men of corrupt mind’ (2 Tim. 3:8 rsv). For those who impute corruption to others ‘nothing is pure’ because ‘their very minds and consciences are corrupted’ (Titus 1:15 rsv). They read their own motives into the minds of their betters. They ‘live ... in the futility of their minds’ (Eph. 4:17 rsv), says the unsparing apostolic psychological ‘analyst’, Dr Paul. He asserted that all of us were ‘Gentiles’ (i.e. heathen) at heart before renewal in regeneration. He traces ‘the ignorance that is in them’ to ‘hardness of heart’.

But renewal of the heart has taken place (Eph. 4:23, 24). Though once ‘unrighteous ... immoral ... idolaters ... drunkards ... revilers ... swindlers’, Paul assures the Corinthians believers, ‘you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God’ (1 Cor. 6:9–11).

Though this inward ‘enlightenment’ was ‘the light of Christ’, the detergent a ‘washing of regeneration’, a ‘renewal of the Holy Spirit’ and the ‘seed incorruptible’ the new believer is not sinless, for ‘If we say we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us’ (1 John 1:10).

The renewed heart—the ‘new nature’—becomes the signal center for improvement of every part of the regenerate sinner. See Romans 12:1, 2. Full ‘redemption of the body’, however, must await the resurrection; the motions of sin still are there in all of us.

The agent in effecting sanctification is the Holy Spirit, who takes residence in the believer when he is born, again. He ‘will be in you’ (John 14:17). Jesus warned, ‘apart from me you can do nothing’ (John 15:5; cf. v. 3) and it is He who through the Holy Spirit of Christ dwells within us. See also 2 Timothy 1:14; Colossians 1:27–29. This is the fact behind Paul’s assertion that ‘love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control’ are ‘the fruit of the Spirit’ (Gal. 5:22, 23; cf. 24–26) and of the promise that ‘... he which hath begun a good work in you [regeneration] will perform it [sanctification] until the day of Jesus Christ [glorification]’ (Phil. 1:6 kjv).

Good theologians of every persuasion are careful to point out that though the sinner is not active in regeneration, for we are wholly ‘born of God’, yet we are commanded to co-operate with God’s Spirit in sanctification. Believers are to ‘Strive for peace ... and ... holiness’ (Heb. 12:14); they must not be conformed to this world but be renewed (Rom. 12:2). They are urged to ‘walk by the Spirit’ (Gal. 5:25), ‘to live self-controlled, upright, and godly lives’ (Titus 2:12). Historically, no group has been more sensitive than Lutherans to the error of any human ‘cooperation’—synergism—with God in justification. Yet for four centuries their Formula of Concord has proclaimed.

As soon as the Holy Ghost ... has begun in us this His work of regeneration and renewal [sanctification], it is certain that through the power of the Holy Ghost we can and should co-operate ... from the new powers and gifts which the Holy Ghost has begun in us in conversion [2 Cor. 6:1 is cited].¹¹

W. G. T. Shedd (who served both Congregational and Presbyterian schools) remarks: ‘The believer co-operates with God the Spirit in the use of the means of sanctification’.¹² (He cites 1 Cor. 16:13; Eph. 4:22, 23; 6:18, 19; Phil. 2:12, 13; Eph. 2:9 should be added.)

The Pattern of the holiness to which Christians aspire is the holiness of God Himself. Both Old and New Testaments emphasize that our holiness has respect to God’s holiness. ‘I am the Lord your God; sanctify yourselves and be ye holy, for I am holy ... I am the Lord that brought you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God; ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy’ (Lev. 11:44, 45). They were ‘positionally’ holy as a people collectively and had at Sinai entered into covenant to accept the arrangement. The elaborate ceremonies and special statutes regulating many aspects of life that had no specific reference to morals constantly called attention to this holiness—how they trimmed their beards and handled corpses, for example.

Their holiness related also to moral purity as the decalogue and the rules that enlarged it show. The New Testament relates the same sort of holiness to believers of our dispensation and provides the same ‘pattern’: ‘as he who called you is holy, you also be holy in all your conduct, since it is written, “You shall be holy, for I am holy” ’ (1 Peter 1:15, 16).

In the New Testament the moral implications of our being children of a holy Father are relative to several practical duties. The chief one is to be ‘perfect’ as God is ‘perfect’ (Matt. 5:48). The perfection of God consists in the fact that He is utterly conformed to His own nature as God. We, created in the image of the Creator, but fallen and now redeemed and partially restored, should as far as possible bring our level of thought and deed up to the level of purpose God had for each of us when He created us. This is the correct understanding of a misused aphorism: ‘to thine own self be true’. Romans chapter 7 and 8 report the apostle Paul’s struggles with that standard (pattern) of sanctification.

A specific characteristic of the divine holiness is to bestow mercy upon one’s enemies. ‘The disciples are being exhorted to bestow loving kindness upon their enemies and the reason is that God himself is kind to the unthankful and to the evil.’¹³

Murray points out that we must take into consideration the distinction between man and God and the distance we are from Him. There is a ‘total discrepancy between God as God and man as man, between God as Creator and man as creature, between God as sovereign and man as dependent’.¹⁴

Our proper concern with the law of God as the criterion of right and wrong, or with the revealed will of God [Holy Scripture] as the norm of what is well-pleasing to God, or even conformity to the image of Christ must not prevent us from appreciating what underlies all of these, and gives them validity and sanction ... man is made in the image of God and nothing less than the image of God can define the restoration which redemption contemplates.¹⁵

Means or Causes of Present Sanctification

Many things are mentioned by Scripture as the means or causes of sanctification. In light of what 2 Timothy 3:16 says of the sanctifying quality of Scripture and Romans 8:28 of how ‘all things’ are employed by God for the good of ‘those who are called’ the means of sanctification are illimitable. Though not strictly parallel or commensurate there are five means or causes of sanctification which may justly be mentioned together.

a) Like all of salvation, our sanctification is ‘by grace ... through faith’ (Eph. 2:8, 9). Further, the gift of the Holy Spirit, rendering the person positionally holy and producing fruit in good works, is to lead to ‘cleansing’ of ‘hearts by faith’ (Acts 15:9).

But sanctification is a duty as well as a product of grace. Regeneration is a grace, but is never enjoined upon men as a duty, even though Jesus told Nicodemus one will never enter the kingdom of God without new birth. We progress in sanctification, growing in character as we ‘take up the shield of faith ... with all perseverance’ (Eph. 6:16, 18). We ‘work out’ our own salvation (Phil. 2:12), ‘cleanse’ our ‘hands’ (James 4:8), following ‘peace ... and ... holiness’ (Heb. 12:14) as we all are commanded to do. But it is all done in faith knowing that God is working in us (Phil. 2:13). ‘Though the weakest faith perfectly justifies, the degree of sanctification is measured by the degree of the Christian’s faith, and the persistence with which he apprehends Christ in the various relations which the Scriptures declare him to sustain us.’¹⁶ (Strong rightly cites Matt. 9:29; Luke 17:5; Rom. 12:2; 13:14; Eph. 4:24; 1 Tim. 4:7.) Anything not performed in faith is less than fruitless for sanctification, ‘For whatever does not proceed from faith is sin’ (Rom. 14:23).

b) There are, secondly, the appointed ordinances, offices and services of the church. Sanctification cannot be carried out in isolation from other believers or from the community of faith. ‘Saints’ are served by deacons and ruled (as to church order) by bishops or elders (Phil. 1:1).

We ask you, brothers, to respect those who labour among you and are over you in the Lord and admonish you, and to esteem them very highly in love because of their work. Be at peace among yourselves. And we urge you, brothers, admonish the idle [or ‘disorderly’ or ‘undisciplined’ esv margin], etc. (1 Thess. 5:12–14).

Obey your leaders ... for they are keeping watch over your souls (Heb. 13:17).

The stated meetings of the church must not be neglected (Heb. 10:22–25) nor the ordinances of baptism and the Lord’s Supper, both being means of grace to promote our sanctification (Rom. 6; 1 Cor. 11).

If believers are to grow by the ‘sincere milk of the word’ (1 Peter 2:2 kjv) they must frequent the place where the word is publicly read, preached and expounded. After all, through much of Christian history, many if not most believers were illiterate. Even for the literate, it is written, ‘There are some things in them [Paul’s letters, see 2 Peter 3:15] that are hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction’ (2 Peter 3:16). This is why we are warned not to neglect ‘to meet together, as is the habit of some, but encouraging one another, and all the more as you see the Day drawing near’ when ‘The Lord will judge his people’ (Heb. 10:25, 30). The Lord Jesus, Himself, when He ascended ‘gave’ to the church ‘apostles and prophets’ who launched the church, ‘evangelists’ (missionaries?) who spread it as well as ‘pastors and teachers’ who each week offer their services ‘for the building up of the body of Christ’. There is no proper growth in grace and knowledge of the truth in private isolation. A good book by a famed author, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, sets forth in detail the ambience of ‘progressive sanctification’.¹⁷ All these matters are to be discussed later in connection with ecclesiology, the doctrine of the church including its ordinances, offices and services to believers.

c) There is, thirdly, the Holy Scriptures. Believers are made clean ‘through the Word’ which Jesus has spoken (John 15:3 kjv); sanctified through God’s ‘truth’ in His ‘word’ (John 17:17 kjv). Jesus washes by the ‘washing of water with the word’ (Eph. 5:26; cf. John 13:4–10). Scripture compares the Word to a mirror, which, looked into, reveals sin (James 1:23, 24); it is compared also to a probe which discovers improper foreign matter (Heb. 4:12, 13). These actions direct the genuinely regenerate to confession both of inborn sins and acts of sin (1 John 1:7–9; cf. Isa. 53:6; 1 John 2:1–5; see also Luke 22:60–62). Hence the pastoral minister of the Word is a great benefit to the believing flock (1 Peter 5:1 ff.), for through this ministry men are transformed into the image of Christ (2 Cor. 3:18). See also Revelation 1:3 for the blessed power of the proclaimed (or publicly read) Word in a church setting. This is a part of b), with its ordinances and services of the church.

There is a poignant, acted parable of our Lord Himself washing His regenerate disciples, i.e. cleansing from the defilement accrued from day to day. The thirteenth chapter of John narrates how ‘during’ the Last ‘Supper’ Jesus arose from reclining at the table, ‘girt himself about’ with a ‘towel’, took a ‘basin’ and a pitcher of water and began to wash the disciples’ feet—one disciple after another. When He came to Peter, that vigorous ex-fisherman (or as in some districts, a ‘waterman’), declined to be washed, exclaiming, ‘You (i.e. the master not the servant, whose normal task it is to pour water on the feet of newly arrived guests), shall never wash my feet.’ After that the Lord promised a future enlightenment when Peter and the rest would understand the little ritual of cleansing, cryptically stating: ‘What I am doing you do not understand now, but afterward you will understand’—i.e. when the Spirit had come as the new revelator. Then Jesus, speaking obliquely, added the point of the parable, ‘If I do not wash you, you have no share with me’. Whereupon Peter, the incurable enthusiast, asked that not only his feet ‘but also my hands and my head’. In response, Jesus explained, ‘The one who has bathed does not need to [be washed], except for his feet, but is completely clean’ (with regeneration and justification and all that pertains). The washing of sanctification, the continuing need of every Christian, is effected by many means, especially the same Word which was the seed of regeneration.

At various moments in the church’s long history some groups of believers have taken the words of Jesus literally, ‘if I then, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example, that you also should do just as I have done to you’. In several smaller Christian denominations a rite of feet washing—men of men, women of women—is conducted along with the Lord’s Supper, at stated intervals but not weekly. Though these folk frequently interpret the acted parable as one in humility, the Lord’s pronouncement about it makes it a symbolic act of daily cleansing—the Reformed doctrine of progressive sanctification. Professor Alva J. McClain always concluded on this matter with this adroit charge to his class of students for the ministry: ‘Brethren pour out plenty of the water of the Word into the basin and do not move too quickly to exhortation. Let the Lord himself do the washing.’

Since essentially finishing my writing of this chapter, I took another look at an old standard Baptist textbook of systematic theology—probably out of print for more than a century—by James Pedigru Boyce. He is still remembered at the school where he taught generations of pastors in training. He is summarizing on the absolute centrality of the divine truth of Scripture as ‘the primary means which the Spirit uses for our sanctification’. I abbreviate a section wherein Boyce shows that essentially all the instruments for producing our sanctification are in and through the Scriptures.

There are twelve sorts of relevant Scripture passages showing Scripture itself to be the instrument of sanctification; I abbreviate: such passages as 1) connect spiritual life with truth (John 6:63; 8:32); 2) teaching truth promotes obedience (Ps. 119:50, 93); 3) ascribe quickening power to the Word of God; 4) usefulness in preventing sin (Ps. 119:104); 5) cleansing from sin (Ps. 119:9; 1 Peter 1:22); 6) produces hatred of sin (Ps. 119:104); 7) power to lead to salvation (2 Tim. 3:15–17); 8) ‘all things that pertain to life and godliness’ through ‘the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord’ (2 Peter 1:2, 3); 9) growth in grace due to greater knowledge (Heb. 5:12–14); 10) weakness is traced to an infant level of knowledge (1 Cor. 3:1–3); 11) the Word of God as ‘sword of the Spirit’ (Eph. 6:17); 12) all the gifts for ministry of divine knowledge are ‘For the perfecting of the saints’ (Eph. 4:11–16 kjv).

There are other means of sanctification, but the Word is primary. The other means are all secondary and contributory to ‘the Word’ or ‘divine truth’. 1) Divine providence must be apprehended by divine instruction in the Word. 2) Prayer is effective ‘only through the believer’s apprehension of divine truth’. 3) Association of believers ‘must be connected with the recognition of divine truth’ if sanctification of those who meet together. 4) The ministry of pastors and teachers is of course effective for sanctification only as the divine truth of the Lord is conveyed and apprehended. 5) The ordinances of baptism and the Lord’s Supper do not convey grace as Rome teaches nor even serve as signs or seals (this is a Baptist speaking) but as visibly conveying symbolized truth to the recipients.¹⁸

d) Prayer is a fourth means of sanctification. This was Jesus’ promise (John 14:13, 14). It is, however, greatly to be regretted that this democratized, individualistic age has practically voided the scriptural emphasis that the prayers by which we grow in grace are pre-eminently prayers of the church, with our Christian brethren, rather than prayers of the closet. Note the emphasis of Acts 2:42 and almost every recorded prayer in the book of Acts. Even the martyr saints in heaven pray in concert (Rev. 6:9–11)! Hence we have here another of the church’s services and ordinances.

e) There is finally the providential divine chastening in the life experience of believers. Tribulation works patience; patience, experience; and experience, hope (Rom. 5:3, 4). Our sufferings enable us to be consoled by Christ’s sufferings and to comfort others (2 Cor. 1:4–6). Every experience, pleasant or unpleasant, is God’s Fatherly attention to our Christian discipline (Rom. 5:1–11; Heb. 12:1–17) so that we may triumphantly assure ourselves that ‘for those who love God all things work together for good, for those who are called according to his purpose’, leading to becoming morally ‘conformed to the image of his [God’s] Son’ (Rom. 8:28, 29). Struggle cannot be absent from the life of any growing Christian. ‘Sure I must fight, if I would reign; Increase my courage, Lord, I’ll bear the toil, endure the pain, supported by thy Word’ (hymn by Isaac Watts).

Stages of Sanctification

It has been assumed and stated already, but bears repeating, that this present sanctification is a gradual process not an instantaneously accomplished divine act such as election or justification.

... the whole body of sin is destroyed (Rom. 6:6, 14), and the several lusts thereof are more and more weakened and mortified (Rom. 8:13; Gal. 5:24; Col. 3:5), and they more and more are quickened and strengthened, in all saving graces, to the practice of true holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.¹⁹

The life of Jacob, wherein a believing sinner (Heb. 11:21) was changed from a supplanter to a prince with God, is a grand illustration. ‘And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from one degree of glory to another. For this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit’ (2 Cor. 3:18). Yes, ‘... Though our out nature is wasting away, our inner nature is being renewed day by day’ (2 Cor. 4:16; cf. Isa. 40:28–31).

The moral improvement of sanctification is not to be completed in the present life, but after the end of life. There is no promise that the sin nature will ever be eradicated in the present life. He who affirms otherwise deceives himself (John 1:8, 10). That the blessed apostle Paul himself was aware of this in himself is plain: ‘Not that I have already obtained this [likeness to Christ (Phil. 3:10)] or am already perfect; but I press on to make it my own, because Christ Jesus has made me his own’ (Phil. 3:12). It seems certain his acknowledgment of sin as a ‘law’ (principle) working in his members (Rom. 7, especially vv. 18, 23) was of his then present condition. We do not have a great deal of information about it, but it seems certain that when at death a Christian departs ‘to be with Christ’ ‘in paradise’ (Luke 23:43; cf. Phil. 1:23) his sin nature is truly eradicated, for heaven is the scene of ‘the righteous made perfect’ (Heb. 12:23). Furthermore, there can be no sin in His presence there.

Future Sanctification

We have earlier stated that sanctification is of the entire person: body, soul and spirit as Paul says (1 Thess. 5:23)—it appears that complete sanctification will take place in two stages. The first stage occurs at death when a Christian departs to be with Christ, in paradise ‘that is far better’ (Phil. 1:23; cf. Luke 23:43). His sin nature is eradicated, for heaven is the scene of (as just noted) ‘the righteous made perfect’ (Heb. 12:23). Furthermore we may safely assume that there can be no sin in the presence of God in the glory.

When we are made complete men again at the resurrection, then also will be completed the sanctification of the body. This is part of what Paul means when he says the Lord Jesus Christ shall ‘fashion anew the body of our humiliation’ (Phil. 3:21 asv). Yes, our bodies, while precious to us, are ‘our humiliation’. If one has ever contemplated a corpse, especially of anyone very dear, the state of death seems not only unfortunate, but as we say, shameful. Dead bodies would normally soon be put out of sight even if they did not decay! Paul elsewhere, after referring to the fact that all creation including mankind, here below, is in bondage to corruption, speaks of the ‘revealing’ of the sons of God as connected with the ‘redemption of our bodies’ and of a deliverance from bondage to corruption (Rom. 8:19–23). This strongly suggests the resurrection and complete sanctification of the body. Passages such as 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 and 1 Corinthians 15:51–57 promise resurrection and transformation of our bodies at our Lord’s return. John informs us that the sight of Christ, Himself, shall be a transforming experience, making us completely ‘like him ... as he is’ in respect of our souls and bodies (1 John 3:1, 2).

We are further assured that the very faithfulness of God is our guarantee of the fulfillment of these blessed promises: ‘He ... is faithful; he will surely do it’ (1 Thess. 5:24; cf. v. 23).

This hope is one of the greatest of all encouragements to Christian perfection here and now, for Peter writes, ‘Therefore, beloved, since you are waiting for these, be diligent to be found by him without spot or blemish, and at peace’ (2 Peter 3:14; cf. 11–13) and John states that ‘everyone who thus hopes in him [i.e. hope in Christ of the future transformation] purifies himself as he [Christ] is pure’ (1 John 3:3).

The Second Advent of Christ As Moving Believers to Purity of Life

This aspect of the Christian hope has been twisted out of shape so many times in Christian history and in the twentieth century so sensationalized by zealous practitioners of pulpit and press art that at the present time some shy away from preaching on the topic or the texts which clearly say the Christian should have steady awareness of this future, consummating event. A sampling of the numerous passages follows, beginning with the most graphic:

But the day of the Lord will come like a thief, and then the heavens will pass away with a roar, and the heavenly bodies will be burned up and dissolved, and the earth and the works that are done on it will be exposed. Since all these things are thus to be dissolved, what sort of people ought you to be in lives of holiness and godliness, waiting for and hastening the coming of the day of God ... (2 Peter 3:10–12).

The author having drawn out the lesson in preparation for the consummation of the age—whether the readers live to experience it or not—goes on to paint a picture and to state a promise.

But according to his promise [Isaiah 65, 66; the Olivet discourses of Matt. 24, 25; Mark 13; Luke 21] we are waiting for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells (2 Peter 3:13).

Therefore, beloved, since you are waiting for these, be diligent to be found by him without spot or blemish, and at peace [among yourselves] (2 Peter 3:14).

On the last day of the Lord's public ministry (and in the preceding weeks) Jesus spoke often and at length about His coming again and how His disciples should be preparing for it by active attention to their moral-spiritual condition and to fruitful living. I cite only one of His last-day-of-ministry admonitions to this effect. He had spoken at length of the course of the age intervening before His return (Luke 21:5–19 with parallels in Matt. 24:1–14 and Mark 13:3–13) and of how He would come. 'And then they will see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory' (Luke 21:27). This, Jesus said, should encourage the disciples, for 'when these things begin to take place, straighten up and raise your heads, because your redemption is drawing near' (Luke 21:28). The redemption to which Jesus directed their hope is the completion of sanctification by transformation of living bodies of believers or resurrection and transformation of 'the bodies of the saints' as described in 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 and 1 Corinthians 15:51–58.

There is both warning and hope in this future promise: 'But watch yourselves lest your hearts be weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness and cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly like a trap' (Luke 21:34; cf. Matt. 24:38 ff.; Mark 13:32 ff.). Jesus knew how easily the human heart lapses into spiritual lethargy in times of ease and plenty. He also knew how prone we are to despair in times of persecution, illness and disappointment. So His coming also offers hope. His future coming, which though no one knows when it will take place, is precisely important for holiness on that account. This is spelled out in many of the Lord's parables and sayings.

A few weeks before His final entrance to Jerusalem when as He said, 'the Son of man shall be lifted up' and 'glorified' by crucifixion—bringing his earthly career to an end—He devoted many sessions with disciples to 'exhortation to vigilance'.²⁰ They were intended both to deliver believers from anxiety and to spur them to morally correct, fruitful living. The entire twelfth chapter of Luke might be quoted to this effect, but the most focused is verses 35–48, from which the following lines are selected. He compares His return to events after a marriage celebration.

Stay dressed for action and keep your lamps burning, and be like men who are waiting for their master to come home from the wedding feast, so that they may open the door to him at once when he comes and knocks. Blessed are those servants whom the master finds awake when he comes. Truly, I say to you, he will dress himself for service and have them recline at table, and he will come and serve them. If he comes in the second watch, or in the third, and finds them awake, blessed are those servants! But know this, that if the master of the house had known at what hour the thief was coming, he would not have left his house to be broken into. You also must be ready, for the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect (Luke 12:35–40).

Under the heading, ‘The Saints Will Reign With Christ’, J. O. Buswell pursues this subject at some length, discussing several more of the pertinent tests I have referred to above.^{21}

Glorification

That eternity will be a time of activity and further personal spiritual growth seems scriptural, though there is scant direct teaching on the subject. One elder writer contends that even after deliverance from every taint of sin ‘probably there is no such thing as bringing the divine life to such completion that no further progress is possible to it... If an end of the progress of the divine life ... is possible, it lies far beyond the reach of human thought’.^{22} Perhaps! Yet a special occasion at which the sons of God shall be ‘revealed’ (Rom. 8:19; ‘manifestation’ kjv) is fixed at the Second Advent, the transformation and translation of living believers and the resurrection and translation of those who ‘are asleep’, as noted under future sanctification above.

This doctrine of ‘glorification’ is not highly developed in Scripture. We do have further statements in the context of sanctification, such as Colossians 3:4, ‘When Christ who is your life appears, then you also will appear with him in glory’. This text apparently is our strongest support for a distinct ‘doctrine of glorification’. Up to now the believer is a frequent object of secret or overt scorn. It does ‘not yet appear’ what he ‘will be’. True, he is spiritually already risen with Christ, but his ‘life is hidden with Christ in God’ (Col. 3:3). The world does not know about this and in times like the present era such notions are thought to be anti-social—too heavenly minded to be any earthly good. Hence, misunderstanding, enmity, even scorn, is sometimes the believer’s lot in life. But the hidden life with God is real. It shall be vindicated. Christ, Himself, shall come—the now rejected and ignored Savior. When He comes it will be in power and great glory and all the holy angels with Him, ‘When Christ who is [now incognito] your life appears, then you also will appear with him in glory’ (Col. 3:4). There is encouraging agreement among the believing commentators on Colossians that this verse should be interpreted and applied as has just been done.

A book (The Doctrine of Glorification by Dr Bernard Ramm) seeks to enlarge the doctrine, even somewhat realigning all of soteriology in relation to glorification. I judge the book to be suggestive and helpful but not definitive. My judgment is that glorification may be regarded as an extension or enlargement of future sanctification. We shall not only be entirely freed from sin, but also in glorified bodies manifestly vindicated before the whole creation.

¹ G. C. H. Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification, trans. J. Vriend (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1952), p. 38.

- ² John Theodore Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1934), p. 384.
- ³ Large Catechism iii, 40, 41, cited by Mueller.
- ⁴ Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification, p. 39.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 30.
- ⁶ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, i, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), pp. 684–719.
- ⁷ Calvin, Institutes iii. 9.1.
- ⁸ Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification, p. 44.
- ⁹ W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1969), p. 554.
- ¹⁰ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge: Judson Press, 1907), p. 869.
- ¹¹ Mueller, Christian Dogmatics, pp. 386, 387.
- ¹² Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii, p. 555.
- ¹³ John Murray, Collected Writings: Selected Lectures in Systematic Theology ii (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1977), p. 305.
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 306.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 306.
- ¹⁶ Strong, Systematic Theology, p. 873.
- ¹⁷ Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Life Together, trans. J. W. Doberstein, (London: SCM Press, 1954).
- ¹⁸ I am citing James Pedigru Boyce, Joseph-Emerson-Brown Professor of Systematic Theology in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary Abstract of Theology (Philadelphia, PA: American Baptist Publ. Society, 1887, repr. Phillipsburg, NJ. Nashville: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ.), selections from pages 417–421.
- ¹⁹ Westminster Shorter Catechism in Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. together with The Larger Catechism and The Shorter Catechism (Richmond: John Knox Press, 1861, 1944), chap. XV. i.
- ²⁰ Harold Lindsell's expression in Harper Study Bible, Revised Standard Version (New York: Harper and Row, 1964), p. 1557.

²¹ J. O. Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1962, 1971), pp. 353–361.

²² Wm. Newton Clarke, An Outline of Christian Theology 8th ed. (New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons, 1900), p. 417.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (755). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

17

The Doctrine of Perseverance

Assurance is a biblical word important to the doctrine of salvation. It refers to the inward conviction which genuine believers have that their salvation is certain. It refers primarily to the subjective state of the believer rather than to any objective matter that may be the basis of the 'conviction'. There is a Greek verb, plēroforeō, which has the sense of to convince fully (Arndt and Gingrich Lexicon) and is so used at Romans 4:21, '[Abraham was] fully convinced ['persuaded' kjv] that God was able to do what he had promised'. The cognate noun, plēroforia, means 'full assurance, certainty' (Arndt and Gingrich) and has this clear meaning the four (only) times it is used in the New Testament (1 Cor. 2:2; 1 Thess. 1:5; Heb. 6:11; 10:22). When the gospel came to the Thessalonians, Luke relates, 'some of them [Jews] were persuaded and joined Paul and Silas, as did a great many of the devout Greeks and not a few of the leading women' (Acts 17:4). A few months later, Paul the evangelist on that mission reminded the same folk, 'our gospel came to you ... with full conviction [plēroforia]' (1 Thess. 1:5). The teaching is that the gospel promise, when it was believed by these folk, carried this inward certainty with it.

The Christian doctrine that those who are truly saved may know that they are saved is designated as assurance (Col. 2:2; Heb. 6:11; 10:22).

The certainty of the objective truth of the gospel in 1 Thessalonians 1:5 ('with full conviction'; 'in much assurance' kjv) in the minds of the hearers rested objectively on the manner in which it was delivered by Paul and his party: 'not only in word but also in power, and in the Holy Spirit.... You know what kind of men we proved to be among you for your sake'. The Thessalonians were fully persuaded of the truth of the message, of its power and of the presence of the Holy Spirit with both message and messengers by something in the manner of life of the messengers of the gospel. We shall examine the doctrine of Christian assurance further in the next following chapter.

Perseverance is a related but different doctrine: that those who truly believe are saved with an everlasting salvation which can never be lost, though the term itself has reference to the permanence of saving faith. Though employed by Him in reference to a specific time of trial for believers, Jesus' statement applies: 'But the one who endures to the end will be saved' (Matt. 24:13). In this respect perseverance is sanctification viewed from the perspective of the believer himself while preservation designates the work of God in sanctification, keeping the believers in a state of belief. Security is another name given this group of ideas—sometimes referring to inward subjective assurance, sometimes to the objective certainty on which it rests, or to both.

Christians are admonished to strive for this inward assurance of salvation as a means to final perseverance: ‘Therefore, brethren, be the more zealous to confirm your call and election, for if you do this you will never fall’ (2 Peter 1:10 rsv). They are also frequently warned against falling away. These numerous warnings of Scripture are frequently cited by opponents of the doctrine of perseverance as arguments against it while proponents regard them as indispensable means to the goal of perseverance (Rom. 14:15; 1 Cor. 8:11; 2 Peter 2:20–22; Heb. 10:26–31 are examples).

The Roman Catholic position has been that no one on earth can know for certain that he is saved. Doctrines of mass, purgatory, contrition, satisfaction—among others—presuppose that full assurance of salvation is impossible. Their concept of merit does not allow otherwise. No one can know for certain he has accumulated enough merit. The early Reformers on all sides asserted that the believer can know that he is (at this moment) saved. Belief in perseverance and assurance among evangelical Protestants is a constant source of amazement to earnest, serious-minded Roman Catholics. ‘No one can know with a certainty of faith, which cannot be subject to error, that he has obtained the grace of God.’¹ Luther, Melancthon, Calvin and the English Reformers believed in assurance, as did John Wesley and his followers.² See also selections from creedal statements from A. A. Hodge.³ Even today the question: ‘Are you saved?’ or ‘Have you been born again?’ calls for a Yes or No answer.

The Protestant agreement about present assurance does not carry over to perseverance, that is, to the doctrine that those once genuinely believing, regenerated and justified will infallibly persevere until the end.

The Lutheran confessions reject certain statements of perseverance, though the statements rejected are hardly phrased the way any Reformed/Calvinist would put them. Defined as in the Lutheran Formula of Concord or Apology of the Augsburg Confession, Calvinists also would reject the doctrine. The Augsburg Confession, art. XII, however, specifically rejects the doctrine that the gift of the Holy Spirit, with justification, cannot be lost. Hence, though Lutheran dogma affirms election, it is of only those believers who persevere. Some truly saved believers are said to be temporary believers and do not, it is affirmed, persevere.⁴ Yet election is said to be the cause of faith. This puzzles most non-Lutherans who learn of it; perhaps it puzzles Lutherans also.

Part of Article XVI of the final form of the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England speaks to the matter of perseverance:

After we have received the Holy Ghost we may depart from grace given and fall into sin, and by the grace of God we may arise again and amend our lives, and therefore they are to be condemned which say they can no more sin as long as they live here.

E. C. S. Gibson reports: ‘At the Hampton Court Conference of 1604 a suggestion was made that after the statement that we “may depart from grace given”, there should be added the qualifying words, “yet neither totally nor finally”’, and comments, ‘no notice was taken ... and the sober statement remained unqualified’.⁵ The later influence of Arminianism on Anglican theology did not detract from belief in present assurance, but it did prevent endorsement of the doctrine of perseverance.

In English-speaking lands, especially recently, controversy over this doctrine has been mainly between Wesleyans (the immediate successors to Arminius in the low countries, the Remonstrants, soon abandoned the evangelical beliefs of Arminius), on the one hand, and Calvinists on the other.

The controversy is fairly quiet today. Most American Protestantism (Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Episcopalian, even Methodism) is descended from Calvinist origins. Hence, in America, except for the late-coming Lutherans, the debate must be treated as intramural. Most American Protestants were loyal to the Calvinistic Westminster Confession for many generations and the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Episcopalians (Anglicans) has a strong Calvinistic emphasis in all the articles. It is interesting in this connection that Charles G. Finney—strong advocate of ‘free will’ and other Wesleyan-Arminian tenets—strongly advocated the perseverance doctrine, devoting about one-eighth of his work, Systematic Theology, to it. Theological reasons for the disagreement really root in the question of whether ‘natural man’ has a free will or an enslaved will. If free, then there is no compelling need for election and calling; but, if natural man’s will, like all the rest of him, is sinful and therefore ‘vitiating’, or impaired, then no one comes to Christ in faith except God take the initiative to choose and bring him. We have already given reasons why we must affirm that man’s will is enslaved and thereby support for belief in God’s choosing (election) and bringing (calling) a people out from among the world of sinners.

Sustained assurance must ultimately rest on one’s being convinced of God’s preservation together with our perseverance. Evidence for one is evidence for the other.

Definition of Perseverance

Three Cautions

1) As with most biblical teachings there is a human side and a divine; God preserves us so that we may persevere. Our success depends on His; we ‘work out your [our] own salvation’ but only ‘with fear and trembling’ knowing that God ‘works in you [us], both to will and to work for his good pleasure’ (Phil. 2:12, 13) and the same balance is found in many texts bearing on perseverance/preservation (Jude 21; cf. 24; 2 Tim. 2:19; 1 John 3:9).

2) The true doctrine (not the caricature often rejected by opponents of the supposed doctrine) means that the believer is kept in faith and obedience, partial and temporary lapses notwithstanding. It means that final apostasy does not take place, that sins committed in moments of neglect of the means of grace will be repented of rather than continued in. Those who live scandalous lives have no basis for assurance and are not to be received as Christians by the churches (Heb. 10:26 ff.; Phil. 3:18–20; Eph. 5:5, 6).

3) God secures the final salvation of all who are truly converted, as with all aspects of gracious salvation. This He does by continuous operation of His sanctifying power here and now in order that finally I shall enter into heaven, still singing ‘Nothing in my hand I bring/simply to thy cross I cling’.

These three cautionary statements (1, 2, 3 above) will be found to accord with the two articles on perseverance and assurance in the Westminster Confession, a document very careful, biblical and cautious in diction and tone on this subject (see chapters XIX and XX, chapter XVIII ‘Of Good Works’ is also helpful).

At this point I address the large number of Protestant readers whose denominational connection is Baptist or ‘Baptistic’. Many groups knowingly or unknowingly originated in that wing of Puritan Calvinism which did not call itself Presbyterian or Reformed and did not receive state endorsement as the Presbyterian Church in Scotland or Congregationalist in New England. The Baptist Churches of America were formed at first out of the New England Puritan Congregational establishment and were suppressed by the latter for a long time. (My own eight times great grandparents Culver and offspring helped in founding the very first Baptist Church in Connecticut near New London. They are buried in the Wightman Baptist Cemetery nearby.) Their doctrinal differences from their Puritan brethren and ancestors, however, related almost exclusively to the nature, polity and structure of the local church and its relation to civil authority. Hence, they early identified themselves doctrinally with their inherited Calvinism and were acceptive of the Westminster Standards. The Free Will Baptists were an early but still later development. So when New World Baptists distinguished themselves from British General Baptists (non-Calvinist), some took the name Particular Baptists, i.e. they affirmed particular, personal, individual election and effectual calling as well as particular redemption. In America ‘Regular Baptists’ in northern and western states generally followed the New Hampshire Confession of 1833 (see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii, pp. 742–748). It is a ‘clear and concise statement ... in harmony with’ older Reformation Confessions but ‘expressed in milder form’. In Article XI The New Hampshire Confession affirms ‘of the Perseverance of the Saints’:

We believe that such only are real believers as endure unto the end; that their persevering attachment to Christ is the grand mark which distinguishes them from superficial professors; that a special Providence watches over their welfare; and they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.⁶

An early Confession of Faith of Baptist Churches (Southern), Art. 16 reads: ‘Those whom God hath accepted in the Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved.’⁷

James Pedigru Boyce taught the same doctrine of total depravity and unconditional election as in the Westminster and Continental Reformed Confessions. His Abstract of Theology has twelve pages on ‘Final Perseverance of the Saints’, which he defines at length as follows. I cite his definition here as the historic, common view among educated, New World Baptists and as enlightening to the readers of this book, most of whom are apt to associate such doctrines with Presbyterians, Reformed and Puritan Congregationalists. Here are the words of this eminent Baptist authority:

The doctrine of the final perseverance of the saints teaches that those who are effectually called of God to exercise of genuine faith in Christ will certainly persevere unto final salvation. This is not taught of a class of mankind in general, as something that will usually be true of the persons composing that class, but of each individual in it,—so that not one will finally apostalize or be lost; but each will assuredly persevere and be saved.

This fact is explicitly taught in the word of God, which sets it forth as due to the purpose and power of God and the grace which he bestows, and not to any excellence or power in the believer. Indeed, such is stated to be the weakness of man that, if left to himself, he would assuredly fall, against the danger of which he is constantly warned; a danger to which even the best instructed and most sanctified are liable, and which is evidenced by the sins which are committed, which are often of a most heinous character, sometimes extending to actual denial of the faith, and backsliding from God; showing that but for God's mercy and grace, final apostasy would occur. But, from the danger thus due to himself he is rescued by the power and grace of God, who, by his watchful preservation, keeps guard over his unworthy children, preventing their total estrangement from him, and bringing them finally unto the salvation he has designed for them. In so doing, however, he does not act independently of their co-operation, but leads them unto salvation through their own perseverance in faith and holiness.⁸

Many of the young men in my classes preparing for ministry in 'Baptistic' churches and several doctoral students in interdenominational seminaries were utterly unaware of their church's organic descent from Puritan Calvinism. Most of them had been taught to affirm 'eternal security' but had never been informed of its logical-biblical connection with divine grace in personal election and calling to overcome the total inability of man to repent and believe apart from restored ability through awakening grace. The particularity of Christ's work on the cross is, of course, a logical sequitor, though as pointed out in the doctrine of the work of Christ, there is also a doctrine of world-reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:19).

Direct Scriptural Evidence

Taught categorically in many passages, none is more direct and unambiguous than one of the discourses of Jesus:

My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they will never perish, and no one [Greek here and below means 'none, nothing'—certainly not 'any man' as in kjv] will snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all, and no one is able to snatch them out of the Father's hand. I and the Father are one (John 10:27–30).

Jesus speaks firstly, in relation to what God has done or is doing: election—'my sheep ... I give'; calling—'hear my voice' (cf. John 6:37, 44); divine foreknowledge—'I know them'; sanctification—'they follow me' (see John 17:6); regeneration—'I give them eternal life'. He also introduces the force of who and what God is: veracity—'they will never perish' (the Greek is striking, ou mē apolōntai eis ton aiōna, they shall not never perish into eternity). Our Saviour speaks similarly in His discourse on the bread of life: 'And this is the will of him who sent me, that I should lose nothing of all that he has given me, but raise it up on the last day' (John 6:39).

In a class by itself is Romans 8:30–39. In an earlier chapter attention has been called to the fact that a certain limited group of persons, none added or subtracted, is the subject throughout. The persons ultimately 'glorified' are exactly the same persons as those 'justified' and 'called' and 'predestined'. Paul's high-flown language is simply a rather rhapsodic way of stating the doctrine of preservation (security). The author asks four rhetorical questions, each designed to demonstrate that saved men are securely saved forever. There is question number one: 'Who can be against us?' Since

God is for us, No one! Number two: ‘Who bring any charge against God’s elect?’ Since the divine Judge has justified every one of them on the basis of the blood of His Son, again the answer is, No one! Number three: ‘Who is to condemn?’ If God has justified the elect, No one! Number four: ‘Who shall separate us?’ to which after a ‘bill of particulars’, viz. of all conditions (death, life), all authorities (angels, rulers, powers), all time (present time, time to come), all space (height, depth), all conditions (tribulation, distress, killed, etc.), and finally like a lawyer in a summation—‘anything else in all creation’, the answer is again, Nothing! No one!

It is difficult to imagine more direct and definitive statements than these three great texts. The same teaching is found throughout the New Testament (see Rom. 11:29; cf. 1 John 5:9; 1 Cor. 1:8, 9; 13:7, 13; Eph. 4:30; cf. 1:13; Phil. 1:6; 2 Thess. 3:3; 2 Tim. 1:9, 12; 1 Peter 1:5; Jude 1). The present writer has felt for many years that his duty is clear: to affirm the above stated doctrine on the basis of these clear texts, whatever objections might be raised. He was convinced long before he knew about systems in theology.

Support by Other Doctrines

Actually to show how perseverance is consonant with and required by other doctrines will seem to some to be a weakening of the case. Such it would be if the doctrine were based on these other doctrines. Such, however, is not the case. It is helpful to see that perseverance fits comfortably, consistently, supportingly in the other aspects of Scripture teaching. A few suggestions will be made to demonstrate this connection.

1. Perseverance is supported by the doctrine of the divine attributes. This is rendered specific by the following: ‘The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous man runs into it and is safe’ (Prov. 18:10; cf. Ps. 33:21). God’s name stands for Himself, what He is when manifest in His attributes. Hence we find the security of the justified guaranteed by God’s providence (Rom. 8:28), His faithfulness (1 Thess. 5:24), His immutability (Heb. 6:17–20; cf. Mal. 3:6), His power (1 Peter 1:5; Matt. 19:25, 26), His love (Rom. 8:39; John 17:23) and His holiness (John 17:11).

2. Perseverance is supported by the various aspects of the doctrine of Christ: His deity (John 10:28–30), life, etc. (see 1 John 5:11, 12; Heb. 1:10–12; 2 Tim. 1:12; John 13:1; Eph. 3:18, 19; Rom. 8:39; Rom. 4:25; Eph. 1:19, 20; Heb. 7:25; Col. 3:4), as also by the doctrine of the Holy Spirit who indwells us and has sealed us.

3. There is hardly an aspect of soteriology from election to glorification that is not employed in some passage of the New Testament to give believers assurance and thereby support for the doctrine of perseverance. The following may be profitably examined: John 6:37; Rom. 8:28; Rom. 6:5, 8; cf. 1 Cor. 6:17; Rom. 8:33; 1 John 3:9; Heb. 12:5–11, especially good; Heb. 10:10, 13; Rom. 8:29, 30; see also John 5:22, 24.

Objections to the Doctrine

Many objections are very sincerely offered. Of course no doctrine firmly and fairly taught by Scriptures ought, for any reason whatsoever, to be abandoned. Yet objections raised sincerely by believers ought to raise the question whether or not the Scriptures truly say what we think they do.

Hence attention is here directed to some of the more impressive objections. Some objections arise from failure to hear exactly what the doctrine is. These questions can only be returned without answer or if the objector is inclined to listen, by clarifying the teaching.

The rational objections are mainly three: (1) that perseverance (security) is inconsistent with free will—that a man who by free will comes to Christ can surely in just the same way leave Him. Answer: this is based in part on a misunderstanding of freedom. The Bible teaches that while men who come to Christ come freely, in the sense that their wills are un-coerced, yet their wills must be set free by God's Spirit before they can choose to come. '[E]veryone who commits sin is a slave to sin' (John 8:34) hence 'No one can come to me unless the Father ... draws him' (John 6:44). Therefore, the problem with freedom and perseverance is exactly the same as with election and calling on the one hand and supposed plenary ability of the will on the other. The quarrel is really with the doctrines of sin and of grace.

Baptists of recent generations seem to have forgotten much of their Puritan-Calvinist heritage, but not the doctrine of perseverance (or 'eternal security'). They forget there is a 'Free Will Baptist' denomination which long ago arose in protest, not specifically against the perseverance doctrine but against 'the Bondage of the Will' which Luther clearly saw to be the point in man's fallen condition from which he needs deliverance before he can exercise 'free will'. Scripture teaches that no person of Adam's race would 'will' to be holy, or have a will to be rescued unless God touches his heart first. Far and away the most ambitious effort of a Baptist scholar of recent times to overthrow the doctrine of perseverance is Robert Shank's Life In the Son: A Study In The Doctrine of Perseverance. I judge it to be a failed effort, though impressive, simply because Shank does not accept what Scripture teaches about the effect of the Fall on the whole body, soul and spirit of man. Man's will is un-coerced by God, but certainly neither free nor unpredictable: 'There is none that seeketh after God.' Shank lets this cat out of the bag near the end of his book, asserting:

All theologians to the contrary notwithstanding, the Scriptures declare that, with respect both to the saved and the lost, God takes fully into account the faculty of spiritual initiative [emphasis added] and decision with which he endowed man in creation. He has respect for his own creation.⁹

Shank seems to have forgotten about the Fall of man and its effects on the whole being including a depraved will.

Samuel Fisk, a conservative Baptist and former professor at Western Baptist Bible College in a 1973 book¹⁰ sought to prove that though God is sovereign, He limited His sovereignty to the extent that within limits even fallen mankind have free will. His book seeks a 'balanced approach' affirming, he says, both divine sovereignty and human freedom. He quotes some theologians whom I know taught the bondage of the will of human beings to sin (as Jesus plainly said) as teaching 'free will'. He comes close to achieving his goals but fails, as does Shank, to come to terms with the effects of the fall, including the moral disposition of the whole of each sinner. It is the will precisely that must be changed first and no one is able quite to take the initiative apart from awakening grace. Mr Fisk does not list 1 Corinthians 2:14 or Romans 7 or Jeremiah 17:9 or any of the texts affirming total depravity in his Scripture index.

(2) That perseverance encourages men to presume on God's grace, to turn it 'into lasciviousness'. Answer: this objection is really against the doctrine of sola gratia (by grace alone) rather than specifically against perseverance. Romanists have made this charge against wholly gracious salvation since the sixteenth century, even stating it at great length in the Tridentine decrees.¹¹ Paul resisted the same charge and called it slander, however sincerely offered (Rom. 3:8; 6:1, 2). This doctrine is, in the New Testament, always firmly locked into solid denial of this line of thinking either by friends of the doctrine or foes, viz. 'But God's firm foundation stands, bearing this seal: "The Lord knows those who are his", and, "Let everyone who names the name of the Lord [cf. Acts 4:12] depart from iniquity"' (2 Tim. 2:19).

(3) That it tends toward slacking of effort in good works and growth in Christian grace. This objection is supposedly grounded in human psychology. To the contrary, however, 'It is notoriously untrue that confidence of success inspires timidity or indolence' according to A. H. Strong.¹² The tortoise and hare fable does not come out of the Bible, and in any case is inapplicable. Such a perversion would in no case reflect the regenerate heart's aspirations. The 'punch line', the best illustration I ever heard of the true relation of security to Christian effort, was shouted by a telephone line crew foreman to a timid new hired hand trying to work on a crossbar forty feet above ground but who refused to trust his spurs and leather safety belt: 'Hey up there! Lean back in your belt and trust it so you can work with both hands'.¹³

There are many classes of biblical texts that are thought to be obstacles to acceptance of the doctrine of perseverance. These have been bruited about for generations, sometimes profitably, sometimes not. There are dozens of these texts. If the Bible teaches perseverance clearly in John 10 and Romans 8, then these other texts, correctly understood, will not contradict it. Most can be legitimately interpreted in a manner consistent with perseverance (note: not explained away!) on one of the following grounds: (1) lip profession is being put in opposition to heart faith. For example, 2 Peter 2:1 does not affirm that teachers who surreptitiously introduce false teaching lose their salvation thereby. They are rather 'false prophets' at heart to start with. They were insincere professors of true religion all the time. There are many texts of this type. (2) Some treat the subject of loss of reward for service rather than loss of salvation. First Corinthians 9:27, 'lest ... I myself should be disqualified' ('a castaway' kjv; Greek adokimos, disapproved) simply cannot be made to teach that Paul, the author of Romans 8, was fearful of losing his salvation. It should rather be connected with his words about rewards and loss of rewards for Christians earlier in the same Epistle (1 Cor. 3:12–15).

Warnings and exhortations are issued which are thought to imply the contingency that some truly regenerate can and do fall away. There are six or seven such in the book of Hebrews. Personally, I think several of these to be addressed to Jewish readers who are being warned of the peril to their souls in any return to Judaism and hence fall into the category already suggested of warning against false profession. Galatians is in large part a similar sort of argument. A. H. Strong makes five points about the 'commands to persevere and warnings against apostasy'.

(a) They show that some, who are [only] apparently regenerate, will fall away [Matt. 18:7; 1 Cor. 11:19; 1 John 2:19]. (b) They show that the truly regenerate, and those who are only apparently so, are not clearly distinguishable in this life [Mal. 3:18; Matt. 13:25,

47; Rom. 9:6, 7; Rev. 3:1]. (c) They show the fearful consequences of rejecting Christ, to those who have enjoyed special divine influences but who are only apparently regenerate [Heb. 10:26–29]. (d) They show that the perseverance of the truly regenerate may be secured by these very commands and warnings [1 Cor. 10:12]. (e) They do not show that it is certain or possible, that any truly regenerate person will fall away. [He cites Spurgeon: ‘The believer, like a man on shipboard, may fall again and again on the deck, but he will never fall overboard’.]¹⁴

Many theologians would add another point, possibly the most important, that the warnings, exhortations and promises are, under God, the very appointed means, whereby God preserves the believing saint and whereby he perseveres.

Those who have embraced this doctrine in a knowledgeable way have found it helpful to piety and genuinely an aid to that rest spoken of in Scripture as birthright of the children of God (Heb. 3:12–4:11). The writer well remembers the permanent effect for Christian joy and steady faith in the life of his father when at about thirty-eight years of age he came to be convinced of perseverance through a series of sermons by the local pastor. This is not to say piety cannot and does not flourish among evangelical believers who see the matter differently. Like every truth, it is capable of perversion even by its friends with invariably unhappy results. This is not because there is something wrong with the doctrine but because there is much wrong with human beings.

Arndt and Gingrich Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, translation and adaptation from the 5th edition by W. F. Arndt & F. W. Gingrich.

¹ ‘Canons and Decrees of Council of Trent’ in H. J. D. Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma, trans. R. J. Deferrari (St. Louis: B. Herder Co., 1957), session 6, chap. 9, para. 802.

² John McClintock and James Strong, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature i, first published, 1895 (repr. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1968–1970), p. 485.

³ A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1860, 1957), pp. 479, 481.

⁴ John T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1955), p. 585 ff.

- ⁵ E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England Explained with an Introduction, 8th ed. (London: Methuen & Co., 1912), pp. 455, 458.
- ⁶ As cited by Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom vol. iii, 6th ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1966), p. 146, and by McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia vol. i, p. 656.
- ⁷ McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia vol. i, p. 657.
- ⁸ James Pedigru Boyce, Abstract of Systematic Theology (Philadelphia, PA: American Baptist Publication Society, 1887, repr. Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ. n.d.), pp. 525, 526.
- ⁹ Robert Shank, Life in the Son: A Study of the Doctrine of Perseverance, 2nd ed. (Springfield, MO: Westcott Publ., 1968), p. 339.
- ¹⁰ Samuel Fisk, Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom (Neptune, NJ: Loizeaux Brothers Publ., 1973).
- ¹¹ Denzinger, ‘Canons of the Council of Trent 1545–1563’, in The Sources of Catholic Dogma, Chapters ii–vi, para. 804–843, pp. 253–261.
- ¹² A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1907), p. 884.
- ¹³ As related of himself as the aspirant rookie by Prof. Alva J. McClain to successions of classes in his systematic theology course ‘Salvation and the Christian of Life.’
- ¹⁴ Strong, Systematic Theology, pp. 884–885.
- Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (765). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

18

The Doctrine of Assurance

Assurance may be defined as a valid, subjective, inward certainty in the heart of the believer that one is now at this moment truly ‘saved’, that his ‘sins are forgiven’, his ‘name written in heaven’, that he now has ‘eternal life’.

Whether or not this state of matters can ever be changed by loss of salvation is not here under consideration. That is the subject of the preceding chapter. Rather, the biblical support for such inward certainty and how it relates to Christian life is now our interest.

This assurance is the specific subject of three New Testament texts, which authenticate the existence of such an immense benefit for joy and happiness in any circumstances.

The first is Colossians 2:2 where Paul says he desires that the readers, whom he has not yet met ‘may be encouraged, being knit together in love, and attaining to all the riches of the full assurance of understanding [emphasis added], to the knowledge of the mystery of God, both of the Father and of Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge’ (Col. 2:2, 3 nkjv). It seems clear that understanding God, Father and Son, and the treasure of truth about Him is our only source of assurance. The Holy Scriptures, of course, are the objective source of this understanding by which we come to ‘full assurance’.

The second and third texts are in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In the earlier the author has warned the readers against apostasy (Heb. 6:1–8) followed by expressing confidence they were truly ‘saved’ (v. 9) and that a just God was aware of their exemplary, fruitful lives. So as Paul ‘desired’ for the Colossians’ ‘assurance of understanding’, this author says ‘we desire that each one of you show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope [emphasis added] until the end’ imitating ‘those who through faith and patience inherit the promises’ (Heb. 6:11, 12 nkjv). Hope in the sense of confident expectancy is a necessary companion of any joy in living a life of joy. In context here, such full assurance of hope is an accompaniment of energetic ‘faith and patience’ (makrothumia, endurance, steadfastness). The text seems to say that believers who are indolent, lacking ‘things which accompany salvation’, will not enjoy the benefit of ‘full assurance of hope’, but that they who are in heart tending to the business of working at their Christian profession may enjoy that immense benefit.

Later in the Epistle it is said believers have ‘confidence to enter the holy places by the blood of Jesus by the new and living way ... and since we have a great priest’ are encouraged to ‘draw near’ that holy place with a true heart in ‘full assurance of faith [emphasis added]’ (Heb. 10:19–22). ‘Confidence’ (‘boldness’ kjv; Greek parrēsia) is ‘fearlessness, especially in the presence of persons of high rank’.¹ This boldness (parrēsia) is something for one to ‘hold fast’ (Heb. 3:6). The passages in Hebrews suggest that this confidence or boldness to come to God, as sons to a Father, is diminished or even lost, if not held fast. Both the assurance and the boldness are to be maintained by the usual ‘means of grace’ (see Heb. 10:23–39). ‘Therefore do not throw away your confidence [parrēsia], which has a great reward’ (v. 35).

Other considerations show that full assurance of understanding, hope and faith; inward, subjective certainty of forgiveness, peace with God and present possession of eternal life is normal for true Christians, even though not invariable.

1) Paul spoke confidently of such remarkable assurance among the new believers at Thessalonica, not long after their conversion and formation into a congregation. He took note of their ceaseless work of faith, labour of love and the enduring perseverance of their hope ‘in the sight of God’ the Father (1 Thess. 1:3 kjv). So strong was the evidence that an apostle, no less, claimed to ‘know’ their ‘election of God’. Such language coming from a local booster for ‘our side’—for example, the local pastor—would not be definitive. But this pronouncement of an apostle of Christ on the steadfast conduct (v. 7) even under persecution (v. 6; cf. Act 17:1–15) of these new Christians should lend great support to the doctrine that even less than mature believers may have subjective certainty of salvation. Paul knew they were ‘elect’ (kjv; ‘chosen’ esv)—or so he said—and presumably so did they.

2) John the Apostle early came to be known as ho theologos, ‘the theologian’, or ‘the divine’, in the sense of expert in doctrine. It was this theologian who near the end of his first Epistle declared his purpose (one of several purposes): ‘I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God that you may know that you have eternal life’ (1 John 5:13). Immediately he adds: ‘And this is the confidence (parrēsia) that we have’, etc., again, as Hebrews and Paul, connecting inward assurance of salvation with boldness—plēroforia with parrēsia. This certainty of heart regarding one’s salvation is a repeated message in 1 John, connected with joy (1 John 1:4), not sinning (1 John 2:1 ff.), passing from death to life and love of brethren (3:14), the gift of the Spirit (3:24; 4:13), boldness on Judgment Day (4:17), keeping Christ’s commandments (several), and victory over the world (5:4). Altogether, the picture drawn by the book is of a confident faith, boldness toward God as Father, all associated with a certain sonship (the huiiothesia or adoption of Romans 8 and Galatians 4). It is not a careless, flippant approach to God or life but a joyful one. There is a balance between awareness that ‘our God is a consuming fire’ and ‘the name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous man runs into it and is safe’.

The doctrine of full assurance (plēroforia) accompanied by boldness (parrēsia) of access to and complete acceptance by God is simply a way of characterizing ‘the adoption’ of which we read in Romans 8:15, 16 and Galatians 4:5, 6. As discussed earlier in connection with adoption (chapter 14), we have a natural relation to God by regeneration whereby we are tekna (offspring, children, those born of God). In adoption we also have the legal standing of sons (huiiothesia) whereby the privileges of heirship with Christ are ours. We are not mere slaves or servants in the household. ‘For you did not receive the spirit [not the Holy Spirit, but inward state of mind Godward] of slavery to fall back into fear, but you have received the spirit of sonship’ (Rom. 8:15 rsv) ‘whereby we cry, Abba, Father’ (Rom. 8:15 kjv). This places us somewhat in the position of Abraham, but a bit more familiar with God, for though he was ‘the friend [confidant] of God’ we may, so to speak, take the privilege of children with Abba, ‘Papa’. This is not one whit disrespectful, but simply, with assurance, going about our lives prayerfully resting in the love of God from which there will never be any separation (Rom. 8:37–39) and no reversal of the verdict of exonerated of any sin and imputation of righteousness. Such a son as this may fail in duties, but if so, as Father to sons, God will chasten him. Quoting Proverbs 3:11, 12, it is written:

‘My son, do not regard lightly the discipline of the Lord, nor be weary when reprov'd by him. For the Lord disciplines the one he loves, and chastises every son whom he receives.’

It is for discipline that you have to endure. God is treating you as sons [emphasis added]. For what son is there whom his father does not discipline? If you are left without discipline, in which all have participated, then you are illegitimate children (‘bastards’ kjv) and not sons (Heb. 12:5–8).

As though to prevent our presuming on the Father-son relationship, the author reminds us that the respect our earthly fathers expected is also required by God (Heb. 12:9).

Galatians 4:4–6 is in the midst of an enlightening discourse on the difference between the subjection of Old Testament people as slaves, both nationally and individually, to the ‘elementary principles [or “elements” kjv] of the world’ (Gal. 4:3). These ‘elementary principles’ seem to be identical with the detailed regulations on life and worship (Gal. 4:10) the Old Testament people lived under. They had no freedom to dress as taste preferred, eat what they liked, or even to plan their own schedule of work and holiday. They were not ‘free from the Law’. But, it is written, ‘when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son, born of woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, that we might receive adoption as sons’ (Gal. 4:4, 5).

As in Romans 8:15, this ‘adoption’ (huiiothesia, placing as a son) provides a unique assurance (plēroforia) that all is right between the forgiven sinner and God. One has boldness (parrēsia) or confidence in the Father’s eagerness for them to enjoy His confidence. ‘And because ye are sons, God sent forth into our hearts the Spirit of his Son, crying, Abba Father’ (Gal. 4:6 Alford’s trans.). Paul goes on, as in the texts cited above, to base on this an exhortation never to turn back to a legalistic understanding of how helpless sinners are saved.

These passages are not obscure in meaning. They say a person who has sincerely repented of his sins and placed his trust in Christ for eternal life has evidence of his regeneration in his own repentance and faith and has every right to the privileges of adoption, in full confidence that he need not be afraid of God. For God has declared him to be a beloved son with privileges of access. He may rightly say to his soul: Soul be at rest. Your sins have been forgiven; the blood of Christ is sufficient. Your name is written in the Lamb’s Book of Life; eternal life is now yours and will not be taken away from you. Your Saviour has said, ‘My sheep hear my voice ... and they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who hath given them unto me, is greater than all; and no one is able to snatch them out of the Father’s hand’ (John 10:27–29 asv).

As I shall explain more fully later, John Wesley, founder of the Methodist movement and leader of the Great Awakening in Britain of the eighteenth century, had a strong doctrine of assurance. Indeed he and followers among the numerous branches of evangelical Christianity who have been influenced by Wesleyan thinking, have made present assurance of salvation the goal of great exercises of prayer and devotion. In Wesleyan holiness movements the attainment of this assurance is by ‘praying through’. For that purpose the ‘altar rail’ and kneeling shelf was placed at the front of many a Methodist (or other Wesleyan) house of worship. This was also an emphasis of the ‘camp meetings’. The idea is to supplicate God for the experience of feeling saved, saved with certainty, accompanied by joy and often expressed by shouts of praise. This was (at least until recently) merged with a second spiritual experience—entire sanctification. At a holiness meeting I and several family members attended (in a tent) a good while ago a brother and sister sang a duet, the chorus: ‘The holiness people stand/ for two definite works of Grace./ Entire sanctification is God’s will’. The same system of theology rejects the possibility of full assurance that one will ‘stay saved’. The doctrine of perseverance as certain for the genuinely regenerated and justified is rejected.

Richard Watson, the acknowledged faithful interpreter of Wesley, forerunner of the theologies of John Miley² and Henry Orton Wiley,³ after advocating present assurance as desirable and possible, makes this caution and disclaimer:

This doctrine has been generally termed the doctrine of assurance, and perhaps the expressions of Paul—‘the full assurance of faith’, and ‘the full assurance of hope’, may warrant the word. But there is a current and generally understood sense of this term among persons of the Calvinists persuasion, implying, that the assurance of our present acceptance and sonship, is an assurance of our final perseverance, and of our indefeasible title to heaven: the phrase, a comfortable persuasion, or conviction of our justification and adoption, arising out of the Spirit’s inward and direct testimony, is to be preferred; for this has been held as an indubitable doctrine of Holy Writ by Christians, who by no means receive the doctrine of assurance in the sense held by followers of Calvin.⁴

Assurance Supported by Two Witnesses

The normal state of assured peace of heart for a Christian is described in Paul’s ‘Joy Letter’ to the Philippians. ‘Rejoice in the Lord always ... Be anxious for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made know to God; and the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, will guard your hearts and minds [thoughts] through Christ Jesus. The things which you learned and received and heard and saw in me, these do, and the God of peace will be with you’ (Phil. 4:4, 6, 7, 9 nkjv).

As I write these verses they stimulate the preacher and pastor in me to write at least two sermons of exposition. They not only characterize assurance as the peace of God keeping the heart and mind (v. 7) but the God of peace within each one who meets the conditions. Do you wish to have this normal state of absence of anxiety? Does not the text say ‘Rejoice in the Lord always.... Be anxious for nothing’. Some of the Puritan churches had an ‘anxious seat’. How does one get off this seat where so many of us sit? There is a practical answer and a theological answer.

The verses just cited (Phil. 4:8, 9) provide the practical answer:

Address prayers and supplications with thanksgiving to God: let your requests be made known to Him. Do so formally. Do not try to be nonchalant, however unafraid. There is also a ‘with reverence and awe’ (Heb. 12:28) aspect of devotion. Each of these terms signals habits of devotion. People who think about their anxieties rather than to love the Lord their God with all soul, spirit, body and mind will not have the peace of God in heart. Get acquainted through the Bible with what a saintly man like Paul taught. Recall what you ‘received’ when you believed, then go on to see how the man lived who here says ‘the things you heard and saw in me, these things do’. These will all be supplied by the appointed means—Bible reading, attendance at classes, sermons, reading the right literature. They will never come from hours seated before a television. If one fills the mind with nothing but what the world is pushing toward one the mind will never be aware of ‘the God of peace’ within.

Christian assurance is supported by two witnesses by whom assurance is made possible.

The first witness is the Holy Spirit, who speaks directly to the heart of the believer. The Revised Standard Version rendering of Romans 8:15b and 16 speaks plainly to this effect: ‘When we cry, “Abba! Father!” it is the Spirit himself bearing witness with our spirit that we are the children [tekna, offspring] of God’. Most translations make a break between the verses and the Greek syntax seems to support that; but as Henry Alford, who led the way to joining the verses, asserts: ‘This verse [v. 16], being without any conjunction coupling it to what went before, is best understood to refer to the same as the preceding, and the assertion to concern the same fact as the last verb, “we cry”, grounding that fact on an act of the indwelling spirit Himself.’⁵ This way of joining the verses together in one sentence is supported by the way Paul treats the doctrine of adoption in the Galatian Epistle: ‘And because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, “Abba! Father!”’ (Gal. 4:6).

It appears to be the teaching of Paul here that there is an immediate communication of the Holy Spirit to the believer’s own spirit inspiring ‘filial’ (meaning, proper for a son, as the older theologians say) confidence. In context, the whole triune God is present in this assuring of our hearts. The Spirit is ‘the Spirit of his Son’ (Gal. 4:6). He, Himself, delivers the assuring message, when the Spirit cries in and with our hearts ‘Abba! Father!’ This immediacy of the voice of the Spirit in assuring the heart merges exactly with the immediacy of the work (voice) of the Spirit in effectual calling and regeneration. Jesus spoke of the new birth as a mystery. ‘So then is every one that is born of the Spirit’. Though Jesus says we are born of ‘water and the Spirit’—the water a metaphor for the Word (see also 1 Peter 1:23), it is by no means clear that the Word is the instrument by means of which the Spirit effects regeneration; rather the Word, as someone says, is a catalyst. Most seed (of the Word) falls on hard or rocky or thorny ground and produces no fruit (Matt. 13). The good ground in the parable was made ‘good’ first by the special (not general as Arminians think) work of the Spirit in the individuals’ hearts who hear the Word, understand it and bear fruit (Matt. 13:23). Further, Paul speaks in the second chapter of 1 Corinthians of the human spirit as the point of connection in man where the impartation of divine wisdom occurs (1 Cor. 2:10–16).

There was immense interest in the subject of assurance and all the texts referred to here (and elsewhere in Scripture) in the times of the Puritans of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Assurance was an important goal of about everything ‘religious’ the devout Puritan did.⁶

The most extensive extant Bible exposition from Christian antiquity is the homilies of John Chrysostom. He was both praised and persecuted on account of his faithfulness as expounder of plain biblical truth. His skill in making biblical truth clear to his hearers caused him much trouble because both his friends and his enemies knew exactly what he meant to say. His simple comments on Romans 8:16 and Galatians 4:6 in relation to assurance derived from the witness of the Spirit are an example of his skill and bear repeating here. Commenting on Romans 8:16 and the passage in Galatians 4:6 he has put the sense in plain words, thus:

God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts crying Abba Father [Gal. 4:6], And what is that, ‘Spirit beareth witness with spirit?’ The Comforter, he means, with that Gift [of adoption], which is given to us. For it is not of the Gift alone that is the voice [saying Abba Father] but of the Comforter also who gave the Gift, He Himself having taught us through the Gift so to speak. But when the ‘Spirit beareth witness; what farther place for doubtfulness? For if it were a man, or an angel, or an archangel, or any other such power that promised this, then there might be reason in some doubting. But when it is the Highest Essence that bestoweth this Gift, and ‘beareth witness’ by the very words he bade us use in prayer, who would doubt any more of our dignity [as able to say Abba Father]. For not even when the Emperor elects anyone and proclaims in all men’s hearing the honour done him, does anyone venture to gainsay?⁷

There is a second witness. ‘The Spirit himself bears witness with [sunmarturei, emphasis added] our spirit that we are children [born ones] of God’ (Rom. 8:16). Observe the witness is not to our spirit but with. Not every Greek scholar agrees there is the second witness, the human witness of the redeemed soul, but the Greek sun prefix (meaning with) to marturei, in the opinion of many, requires that the human spirit witnesses to itself saying ‘Soul take thine ease’—not because like the rich fool ‘you have much goods laid up for many years’ but because your name is certainly ‘written in heaven’ (Luke 10:20).

We have already in exploration of Philippians 2:1–7 and 11–13 taken note of the devotional practice necessary to be aware and certain ‘the God of Peace’ is in our heart. When fully aware, then ‘the peace of God will keep your hearts and mind through Christ Jesus’. It seems correct to infer that one’s own heart confirms the Spirit’s witness by inference. In this respect, assurance is an induction.

The Puritans thought so. James I. Packer has written that ‘Romans 8:16 ... speaks of two witnesses giving evidence together, the Holy Spirit corroborating the testimony of our spirit.’ He goes on to say:

The Puritans identified ‘our spirit’ with the Christian’s conscience, which, with the Spirit’s aid, is able to discern in his heart the marks which Scripture specifies as tokens of the new birth and to conclude from them that he is a child of God. The Spirit ‘writes first of all graces in us, and then teaches our consciences to read his handwriting’. Without the Spirit’s aid, man can never recognize the Spirit’s handiwork in himself; ‘if he do not give in his testimony with them, your graces will have no witness at all’. Sometimes the Spirit’s help here is given in full measure; sometimes, however, to chasten us for sin, or to try our faith for a time, this help is partly or wholly withdrawn; and because the Spirit is not always active to enable us to know ourselves to the same degree, the witness of our spirit inevitably fluctuates: ‘A man shall find the same signs sometimes witness to him, and sometimes not, as the Spirit irradiates them.’ We must recognize that God is sovereign here, to give more or less assurance in this way as he pleases.⁸

Modern secular historians have spread abroad a wholly gratuitous theory—repeated as fact—that the Puritans conducted a desperate effort to obtain assurance of election—not through the witness of the Spirit or inward confidence based on peace of conscience, but in effort toward material success—or financial gain. It is a variation of the thesis of Max Weber, floated first in a lengthy two-part essay (1905–1906) in Archiv für Socialwissenschaft published in English as The Rise of Protestantism and the Spirit of Capitalism. I have dealt with it in a lengthy note in my book Civil Government: A Biblical View.⁹ The view came in for fatal refutation by H. M. Robertson, Albert Hyma and others. Ernst Troeltsch in his The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, two large volumes in English, 1931, original German, 1911, gave an excellent account of them, Calvinists all, including European and American Puritans, but though he refers very briefly to Weber in his massive work—over a thousand pages thoroughly documented—he apparently found no support for this theory of Puritan assurance-of-election-by-material-success. Many years have passed since I read the volumes and one can forget, but the index does not turn up the slightest evidence of Weber's really slanderous notion. Winthrop Hudson, eminent Baptist theologian and historian, said of capitalist economic opportunists, who in the seventeenth century 'went awhoring' after unearned riches, that they 'represented the infiltration of a spirit which the convinced Puritan did not hesitate to label pagan and antichristian ... The victory of the spirit of capitalism in a very real sense meant the defeat of Puritanism.'¹⁰

Many Puritan theologians have left us their views on interpretation of Romans 8:16 and Galatians 4:6 about the witness of the Spirit and the witness of our own spirits. They were variations of a single view. All of them regarded it as a fruit of faith, though not necessarily of the essence of faith, for they, like the distraught father of the afflicted son and like us today, often 'said with tears, Lord I believe; help thou mine unbelief' (Mark 9:24 kjv). There are levels of strength in assurance as well as of faith. Jesus put a high value on 'faith as of a grain of mustard seed'. Some, as Calvinists today, thought the sealing of the Spirit was something like circumcision or baptism which in some Reformed thinking are 'seals' and 'signs' of our acceptance with God.

John Owen, the paramount early English Puritan theologian, regarded the gift of the Holy Spirit at the moment of faith as Himself the seal of our redemption. He reminds us that Paul does not say the Holy Spirit is the sealer, but is Himself the seal (Eph. 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor. 1:21). He wrote: 'God's sealing of believers ... is his gracious communication of the Holy Ghost unto them ... to enable them unto all the duties of their holy calling, evidencing them to be accepted with him ... and asserting their preservation unto eternal salvation'¹¹ Sealing, no more than adoption, is not a post-conversion event. Assurance will develop as a consequence of our apprehension of the Spirit who 'shall be in you' from conversion onward. The sealing Paul refers to in Ephesians 1:13 was already past to all his readers.¹²

The Puritans' concern for assurance prevailed no less in the eighteenth century than in the seventeenth, especially among those of the Scottish Presbyterian Secession of 1733. Ebenezer and Ralph Erskine, two leaders of that movement, are memorialized in Erskine Theological Seminary in South Carolina, which trains ministers for the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. The writings of these men, which have been republished recently, manifest the continuing importance in devotion of assurance of salvation. A 2001 reprint by Christian Focus Publications of Beauties of Ebenezer Erskine has chapter titles such as 'How we are to know whether we be among the sealed servants of God' (three pages), 'Marks of our belonging to God's house or family' (ten pages). It would be fair to say that half the book is to offer assistance to troubled Christians in evoking the right means to finding and keeping assurance of their own personal salvation.¹³

I close discussion of assurance with a fact of Christian history pleasant to contemplate. John Wesley shared with the Puritans great concern for personal assurance of salvation in the context of a holy life. The Puritans were not 'puritanical'. Puritan and puritanical are terms, deliberately pejorative, hung on some of the greatest Christians who ever lived, by their contemporary enemies, the worldlings of established churches wherein had developed all the inevitable evils of formalism, sacerdotalism and conformity with the world. The New England 'transcendentalist' Emerson and backslidden Yankees such as Nathaniel Hawthorne, slandered them by making some backslidden New England Yankee church members to be typical of all the Puritan inhabitants of New England. Recent secular historians have come to see this as our upside-down view of religion in Britain and

America. I cite Edmund Morgan's biography of John Winthrop, first governor of Bay Colony. These are the opening paragraphs of the 'Author's Preface':

The Puritans of New England are not in good repute today. Authors and critics who aspire to any degree of sophistication take care to repudiate them. Liberals and conservatives alike find it advantageous to label the measures they oppose as Puritan. Whatever is wrong with the American mind is attributed to its Puritan ancestry, and anything that escapes these assaults is smothered under a homespun mantle of quaintness by the lovers of the antique. Seventeenth-century Massachusetts has thus become in retrospect a preposterous land of witches and witch-hunters, of tall-crowned hats whose main sole virtue lay in their furniture [as in the Travelling Antique Show].

It is not likely that this vision will ever be wholly dispelled. We have to caricature the Puritans in order to feel comfortable in their presence. They found some answers to some problems we would rather forget. Their very existence is therefore an affront to our moral complacency, and the easiest way to meet the challenge is to distort it into absurdity, turn the challengers into fanatics.¹⁴

The Jewish Heritage Foundation in 1962 sponsored the publication of The Puritan Heritage: America's Roots in the Bible, by two Jewish scholars, Joseph Gael, author of several books and government official, and Ben Siegel, a prolific author of the California State Department of Language Arts. Out of this popular but scholarly and thoroughly researched book, I cite one relevant paragraph:

Some modern commentators (among them, Allen Tate and Robert Penn Warren) view Emerson as the prime source of the secularism that dominated post-Civil War New England. Randall Stewart has declared Emerson to be 'the arch-heretic of American literature, and Emersonianism the greatest heresy. By no dint of sophistry can he be brought within the Christian fold ... and [Emersonianism] has done more than any other doctrine to undermine Christian belief in America'. For many moderns, then, Emerson symbolizes the nineteenth century's shift from a God-centered to a man-centered America.¹⁵

The book points out that not only Thoreau and Hawthorne but the darling of the university professors' courses in American Literature, Walt Whitman, were really political-religious activists determined to destroy the Puritan Heritage and to replace it with secularism, the religion of man the measure of all things.

A tiny minority in the world of the universities of America have been producing a literature of correction, which I have tried to keep abreast of, beginning with William Haller and Perry Miller. Among more recent scholars, two have helped me most to relate the Puritans to the theology of Wesley and the Wesleyans. One was published jointly by the Institute of Early American History and Culture of Williamsburg, VA and the College of William and Mary and the Colonial Williamsburg Foundation, by Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe,¹⁶ and second, a published Ph. D. Thesis (Princeton University) by Robert C. Monk.¹⁷

The relevance of this research is apparent in the opening paragraph of the preface in the first book:

Historians have long treated New England Puritanism as an intellectual and social movement. At heart, however, Puritanism was a devotional movement, rooted in religious experience. This book deals with the form, content, and spiritual impact of the worship and private devotional activity of seventeenth-century New Englanders.¹⁸

The same could be said of the Wesleyan-Methodist phenomenon as taught and practised—a devotional movement, rooted in religious experience. Robert Monk says early on, in the ‘Introduction’ to John Wesley, His Puritan Heritage:

The resemblance between Wesley and the Puritan ethics has been commonly recognized, especially the similarity of their teachings concerning the outward manifestations of the Christian life.... In the eyes of many of his contemporaries he revived the spirit and practice of Puritanism.¹⁹

He elaborates the similarity, even dependency of Wesley on Puritan antecedents. Though Anglican John Wesley rejected attempted identification with nonconformist (i.e. Puritan) practices, the similarity was obvious. After citing several recent studies relating Wesley’s ideas to Moravians, Anglicans, Eastern Fathers and Luther, Monk says:

The majority of these studies ... take note, to a greater or lesser degree, to the similarity between Wesley and the Puritan tradition ... [those] concerned with showing Wesley’s affinity with Calvin or Luther ... do not give sufficient attention to the fact that ... Wesley depends on the English form of the tradition, Puritanism.²⁰

This should not be surprising, says Monk, for though Charles Wesley’s father was an Anglican priest, two of John Wesley’s great-grandfathers were Puritans and a grandfather of Wesley’s mother was a Puritan.²¹ Some were of note in their time. Independency (usually Puritan) and Puritan views among his Anglican ancestors was common.²²

Personal assurance of one’s own salvation among zealous, devout Christians is—if not always, at the critical moment of death—a paramount concern. It undergirds the quiet ‘peace of God, which will guard your hearts and your minds’ (Phil. 4:7) of the devout in the daily life of the believer. At this point every devout Wesleyan and every devout Puritan (Calvinist) meet. Monk found that Wesley and the Puritans display a striking similarity in their concern for the practical application of the Christian gospel to the daily life of the believer. This becomes the burden of the whole book, which he outlines in a paragraph.²³ The decisive evidence was ‘Wesley’s use, recommendation, and abridgement of Puritan literature’.²⁴ Wesley was the publisher of a whole library of literature for disciplined reading by the members of his societies. A major number of the titles were by Puritans.²⁵

Finally, it is to be observed that, as Monk points out in pages 78–95, precisely in the doctrine of ‘The Witness of the Spirit’, Wesleyanism and Puritanism, as I have approvingly described it, were essentially at one. As a final word on the matter I quote Monk’s first paragraph in the section, ‘Assurance—the Witness of the Spirit’.

The experiential religious life has at its center an awareness of being accepted by God through the grace offered in the gospel—a knowledge that what the gospel says and promises is actually true for me. Such a personal awareness not only is a rational deduction from these promises but also, of far greater significance, springs from contact with God in which he makes known to the believer the reality of this acceptance.²⁶

This consciousness of being accepted is part of the doctrine of assurance, prominent and nearly identical in the theology both of Wesley and the Puritans. Dr Robert C. Monk's assertions in this paragraph are fully documented by references both to such Puritan leaders as Baxter and Thomas Goodwin and to the Journals and other works of John Wesley.

¹ William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, a translation and adaptation of Walter Bauer's German Work, 4th ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), sub parrēsia, p. 636.

² John Miley, Systematic Theology (New York: Hunt and Eaton, 1892).

³ Henry O. Wiley, Christian Theology (Kansas City: Nazarene Publishing House, 1940).

⁴ Richard Watson, Theological Institutes ii, 29th ed. (New York: Nelson & Phillips, 1850), pp. 270, 271. Mr. Watson (1781–1833) produced the standard, though not official, interpretation of Wesley's theology of Methodism. It is a major work, praised by Charles Hodge and I observe that Thomas Oden favourably cites Theological Institutes by Watson in his Systematic Theology iii: The Living God i, The Word of Life ii, Life in the Spirit iii (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), the latest thorough and scholarly evangelical systematic theology by a Methodist.

⁵ Henry Alford, The New Testament for English Readers, repr. (Chicago: Moody Press n.d.), p. 908.

⁶ It would take us far afield here to introduce that mighty literature but we shall have somewhat of an introduction to it shortly.

⁷ John Chrysostom, Homilies on the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistle to the Romans in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, First Series vol. xi, ed. by P. Schaff (American Editor, 1886, repr., Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publ., 1994), p. 442.

⁸ James I. Packer, A Quest for Holiness: The Puritan Vision of the Christian Life (Wheaton: Crossway Books, 1990), pp. 183, 184.

⁹ Robert D. Culver, Civil Government: A Biblical View (Edmonton, Canada: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology and Public Policy, 2000), pp. 111, 112.

¹⁰ Winthrop Hudson in 'Puritanism and the Spirit of Capitalism', Church History 18 (March, 1949):15.

¹¹ John Owen, Works iv, p. 401, as cited by Packer in Quest for Holiness, p. 188.

¹² See Packer, Quest for Holiness, chap. 11, 'The Witness of the Spirit in Puritan Thought', pp. 179–189.

¹³ Ebenezer Erskine, The Beauties of Ebenezer Erskine, selected by Samuel McMillan, intro. Joel R. Beeke (Ross-Shire, Scotland: Christian Heritage/Christian Focus, 2001), pp. 616, plus liii.

¹⁴ Edmund Morgan, The Puritan Dilemma (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1958), p. xi. Among Edmund Morgan's books is The Puritan Family (New York: Harper & Rowe, 1966).

¹⁵ Joseph Gaer and Ben Siegel, The Puritan Heritage: America's Roots in the Bible (New York: Mentor Books, 1964), p. 195.

¹⁶ Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe, The Practice of Piety: Puritan Devotional Disciplines in Seventeenth-Century New England (Chapel Hill, NC: The University of NC Press, 1982, 1988).

¹⁷ Robert C. Monk, John Wesley, His Puritan Heritage (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1966).

¹⁸ Hambrick-Stowe, Practice of Piety, p. vii.

¹⁹ Monk, John Wesley, p. 15.

²⁰ ibid.

²¹ ibid., p. 17.

²² ibid., pp. 24, 25.

²³ ibid., pp. 25, 26.

²⁴ ibid., p. 26.

²⁵ ibid., pp. 31–66.

²⁶ ibid., p. 78.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (772). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

19

Salvation Through Christ Alone

In expressing what one believes to be the truth of God on the topic of this and the next following chapter the caution of Augustine on a different but difficult question should be observed: ‘[I]t would seem that we might bear with considerable patience our ignorance of secrets that lie in the earth and heavens.’¹

Likewise Calvin frequently warned against the kind of curiosity which demands that God in Scripture furnish an answer, saying in one place we may be ‘titillated by an immoderate desire to know more than is lawful ... trifling and harmful questions repeatedly flow forth’.²

It is hardly contestable that the apostles, eleven of whom suffered death at the hands of adherents of other ‘religions’ believed in the depths of their hearts, as one of them famously declared, ‘there is salvation in no one else’. Early on and frequently since it has seemed to a few Christians there might be exceptions to the rule or perhaps even more than one way to be saved. Yet it would be false both to Scripture and Christian history to say any community of orthodox Christians ever denied the exclusive claims of Christ or that there is only one ‘way of salvation’. This one way is not Christendom, i.e. ‘Christianity’ as a social phenomenon, even though the Roman Church in earlier times claimed the ‘one holy, catholic and apostolic church’ is the organization that submits to the papal hierarchy and that outside this unum sanctum there is no salvation. In recent times, as we shall briefly observe below, some liberal (really apostate) Christian writers have rejected the apostolic exclusivity and found salvation, they think, in several ‘high’ religions (Buddhism, Islam, etc.). Some otherwise orthodox, evangelical writers think there may be saving revelation and divine grace in the teachings of these ‘ethnic’ religions and implicit (if not explicit) faith in Christ among sincere followers of these systems of thought and practice. Recently some scholarly writers have invented names for these departures from the historic ‘exclusivism’. The ones who think all religions equally true and false are called pluralists and the ones who think Christ may be found in other than biblical faith, inclusivists.³

History

For about 300 years American Protestants were spared the strain of loving acceptance of neighbors of a different ‘religion’ without accepting also the neighbors’ religion as of equal validity with biblical, orthodox Christian faith. At first there were not even large numbers of Roman Catholic or Jewish people in the usual local mix. Now that has changed for any one alert to what is going on in the wider culture of Western civilization.

Almost the whole of Christendom has been infiltrated with immigrant peoples who bring their world-views, including their religions, with them. This has forced a consideration of the truth-claims of Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism (to say nothing of Roman Catholicism, Judaism and Eastern Orthodoxy) upon Protestant believers, not least those who call themselves evangelicals.

America has been called a ‘melting pot’, meaning that its character as a culture is a mix of all the cultures brought to these shores. This is not entirely true, however. In fact it is more false than true. Will Herberg, in a well-known book, Protestant, Catholic, Jew (1955), pointed out that the cultural character of the land has always been prevailingly both British and Protestant. He shows (what no informed scholar denies) that the culture was British, including language, institutions and religion. Those of the various European cultures became ‘Yankees’ too in a few generations, except for their religion. That part of their particular ancestral culture remained as the chief, single feature that still identified them with ancestral culture. Through the generations we have learned to live with this. Later immigrations of all these European people brought some form of Christianity to their new country.

The colonial culture, however, not only reflected a Christian world-view, but a Protestant world-view, and, as has been convincingly shown, the prevailing outlook was Calvinistic in tone from Nova Scotia to Georgia. So we had a fairly uniform British—slightly modified—culture, even though there were sectional and even neighbourhood islands of less assimilated culture.

To what extent will a constitutional government formed by and reflecting a biblical-Christian world-view accommodate clashing outlooks? Shall we now put the month of Ramadan in the civil calendar? Time will tell. The Western world already has developed a high level of pluralism, i.e. acceptance of the existence of other than ‘native’ cultures. If this be ‘multiculturalism’ it is now a fact of life. Strong movements within our culture seek to promote a variety of cultures, including manner of living (plural marriage, homosexual marriage, etc.) and moral standards each of equal value and rightness and call it ‘multiculturalism’. When church leaders plan religious meetings where readings from the Koran, the Vedas, the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, prayers and sermons by ‘clergy’ of Islam, Hinduism, Judaism, etc., occur, they are not promoting mere peaceful acceptance of the right of people to live together in the same civil community with respect for contrary religious beliefs, but religious syncretism—properly labelled ‘the perennial heresy’.

There is intense pressure from many quarters for Christians to accept all ‘religions’ as equally true. Most of the old standard works of theology have no chapters on the subject of this chapter, though they contain comments on the great commandment—‘Him only shalt thou serve’ and the unique claims of Christ. Beginning, however, with such volumes as Hendrik Kraemer’s *The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World*⁴ and especially W. A. Visser’t Hooft’s No Other Name,⁵ the uniqueness of Christ and of salvation through Him and no other has been vigorously promoted as the only defensible Christian view. They have asserted the same insistence on the absolute and exclusive claims that brought down on Christians the wrath of both rulers and denizens of the Roman Empire in the first centuries of our era.

The Roman Church at Vatican II gave careful—if not quite satisfactory—attention to this matter, after several of its theologians, eminently Karl Rahner’s Theological Investigations (vol vi, 1966), raised the subject. It was he who provided Romanist theology with the interesting term ‘anonymous Christians’ for presumed ‘saved’ folk among followers of other religions.

Rahner went beyond asserting that divine revelation is present in religions such as Islam and Buddhism to say that divine grace leading to eternal salvation is available also. The ‘saved’ among such religions he called ‘anonymous Christians’ and the striking term caught on.⁶ Volume vi of Rahner’s Theological Investigations is excerpted in A Rahner Reader edited by G. A. McCool⁷ who comments on Rahner’s view that ‘Through ... implicit faith, men who have never accepted or even encountered Christian revelation become, not just anonymous theists, but anonymous Christians.’⁸

Even some atheists, according to Rahner, may be saved as atheists.⁹ These atheists are persons of ‘inculpable inability to understand or accept the formulated doctrine of the Christian religion ... Pastorally we should deal with contemporary atheists on the assumption that they are anonymous Christians’.¹⁰

A majority of prelates at Vatican II in early 1960s endorsed the ‘ecumenical’ modernity prevalent at the time, going as far as possible toward accommodation of every human thought and group without relinquishing the distinctives of papal Christianity. They, however, refused to go as far as Rahner and the World Council of Churches (New Delhi 1961, at about the same time). Ecumenist Claude Nelson was the Protestant respondent to ‘The Declaration on the Relations of the Church to Non-Christian Religions’ in the first English edition of The Documents of Vatican II.¹¹ His response reflects no interest in the question of salvation through Judaism or Islam, etc., only in developing better inter-religious relations.

The Council had been instructed by Pope John XXIII, who summoned it, to seek what Christianity has in common with other religions. Pius XII had been severely criticized for perceived anti-Jewish policy, hence ‘Pope John’s deletion of a word [conversion] from the Good Friday prayer for Jews and Pope Paul’s extensive revision of the prayer (now ‘for the Jews’ instead of ‘For the conversion of the Jews’, etc.)’.¹² So while encouraging dialogue (not debate or conversion) in this particular document, the Council nevertheless almost but not quite rejected the suggestion of some Roman Catholic theologians that all religions have saving power for their members. Here is the critical paragraph.

The Catholic Church rejects nothing of what is true and holy in these religions [Hinduism, Buddhism, other religions]. She has a high regard for the manner of life and conduct, the precepts and doctrines which, although differing in many ways from her own teaching, nevertheless often reflect a ray of truth which enlightens all men. Yet she proclaims and is duty bound to proclaim without fail, Christ who is the way, the truth and the life (John 1[4]:6). In him, in whom God reconciled all things to himself (2 Cor. 5:18–19), men find the fullness of their religious life.¹³

On 21 November 1964, Vatican II adopted Lumen Gentium (light of the nations). The document is rife with slippery qualifications both before and after the following acknowledgment of saving power through Christ in any religion:

Finally, those who have not yet received the Gospel.... Those who, through no fault of their own, do not know the Gospel of Christ or his Church, but who nevertheless seek God with a sincere heart, and, moved by grace, try in their actions to do his will as they know it through the dictates of their conscience—those too may achieve eternal salvation. Nor shall divine providence deny the assistance necessary for salvation to those who, without any fault of theirs, have not yet arrived at an explicit knowledge of God, and who, not without grace, strive to lead a good life. Whatever good or truth is found amongst them is considered by the Church to be a preparation for the Gospel and given by him who enlightens all men that they may at length have life.¹⁴

The Council found support, they thought, in Thomas Aquinas who said: ‘Those who are unbaptized, though not actually in the Church, are in the Church potentially [Aristotle again]. And this potentiality is rooted in two things—first and principally in the power of Christ, which is sufficient for the salvation of the whole human race; secondly, in free-will.’¹⁵

Recently from within professed ‘evangelicalism’ challenges have come to the exclusive claim that salvation is through Christ alone; or if through Him alone, then it is proposed that belief in Christ may be implicit, not explicit, via sincere allegiance to some other lord, savior, sage or proposed way of salvation.

J. I. Packer responded to the new inclusivism of the Roman Church in a lecture at Dallas Theological Seminary about twenty years before it burst out in evangelical circles, including the Evangelical Theological Society. He said—and I quote the first two and the last three sentences of the lecture:

Suppose that when the Philippian jailor asked Paul what he must do to be saved, Paul had said, ‘Be diligent in your present religion, whatever it is’, would this have been an adequate answer? Luke, at any rate would hardly have thought so, for the speeches and sermons which he records in Acts link salvation exclusively with the name of Jesus and faith in his person and lordship (cf. 2:38; 4:12; 5:31; 10:43; 13:23, 38, 39; 16:31; 26:15–23; 28:23–28).... It thus appears that the case for other forms of faith beside Christianity is forlorn indeed. Without Christ we are without God and without hope. Non-Christian religions exhibit much that is noble and many insights that are true, but they do not exhibit saving grace. So far as the way of salvation is concerned, ‘believe on the Lord Jesus Christ’ really is the last word.¹⁶

Let us try to respond to the growing problem: first by separating out the two main questions involved, then providing a scriptural answer to each in so far as Scripture addresses it and, finally, suggesting how we as believers, scholars and churchmen ought to treat people—believers and others—caught up in the errors of syncretism. The questions are: 1) Does the Bible and historic, orthodox Christianity teach that salvation is exclusively through Christ and no other? 2) May Christ be encountered without being identified and proclaimed in other religions than biblical Christianity and thereby salvation made available for sincere adherents to these other religions? Our response should be no even-handed approach to balancing light and darkness, truth and error. A clear line, if possible, must be drawn. In process we shall not enlarge greatly on the proposals and arguments of advocates of contrary views. There is easy access to their literature elsewhere. The Bible and Christian history speak plainly. Let us for now let the matter rest there for purposes of a theology of salvation that is ‘biblical, historical and systematic’.

Does the Bible and Historic Christianity Teach that Salvation is Exclusively Through Christ and No Other?

Since writing this section of the chapter I have had the privilege of reading Daniel B. Clendenin’s excellent book on how ‘Christianity Encounters World Religions’ (the subtitle of his book Many Gods, Many Lords). He devotes the last two chapters (5 and 6) to the question I have just now stated. The fifth chapter, ‘Old Testament Faith and the World Religions’ pays more attention to the fact that there were many before the call of Abraham and afterward who did not share in the Abrahamic covenant of promise who though ‘aliens and pagans [who] were not beyond the pale of the saving presence and activity of God.... God elected his unique people, so it would be foolish to think we can approach him however we might choose. But notable exceptions were not too uncommon’.¹⁷ He has shown how God made Himself known to Abel, Enoch, Noah, Melchizedek, Jethro and others. Beyond this he modestly declines to generalize. The sixth and last chapter entitled ‘The New Testament Documents: Chronicles of Disbelief’ shows how in stark reality it was the exclusive claims of Christianity in a pluralistic Roman world that distinguished biblical religion then and must do the same in our world today. Thirteen pages of select bibliography close the book. There is a complete absence of intellectual arrogance and strict submission to the plain texts of Scripture in this book.

The answer I shall present to this question has been stated currently by others: ‘[E]xcept perhaps in very special circumstances, people are not saved apart from explicit faith in Jesus Christ, which presupposes that they have heard about His salvific work on their behalf’.¹⁸

Let those who regard the Bible highly take note of Paul’s very relevant remarks about those religious teachers who mixed fatal errors with acknowledged truth: ‘there are some who trouble you and want to distort the gospel of Christ. But even if we or an angel from heaven should preach to you a gospel contrary to the one we preached to you, let him be accursed’ (Gal. 1:7, 8; cf. v. 10). The author of that statement had no interest in promoting mutuality of understanding or comity of dividing the turf with any gospel but his own, which he claimed to have received from Christ by immediate communication (Gal. 1 and 2). He goes on to insist the proper test to be applied is not whether some truths are present but if there is error in the mix of proclaimed doctrine and if the message is conveyed first by a properly certified apostolic messenger (Gal. 1:11–2:9). Consider the source!

The Scriptural Evidences

Let us juxtapose two ‘inspired’ comprehensive statements: first, is the promise of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Gal. 3:8) at the very beginning of the specifically soteriological narrative. The call of Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3) ends with a promise that was also a prediction: ‘and in you shall the families of the earth shall be blessed’. Every informed student knows the prediction-promise was clarified to show that ‘in you’ (bekha, singular) was meant to refer to Abraham’s descendants through many generations and ultimately to Christ, Himself (Gal. 3:16 and Gen. 13:15; 17:8, et passim). The ‘seed’ line of blessing to ‘all the families of the earth’ did not even include all of Abraham’s offspring but only those through his wife Sarah’s only son Isaac (Heb. 11:17; Rom. 9:7) and Isaac’s younger son Jacob (Rom. 9:10–13).

The second passage is the pronouncement of Jesus at the Well of Sychar to a woman who professed to believe salvation available through a competing and partially contrary religion, ‘of Samaria’. To the point of this chapter and the diverting question of the woman Jesus declared: ‘You worship what you do not know; we [Jews] worship what we know, for salvation is from the Jews’ (John 4:22).

The prima facie meaning of these texts is that the only salvation available anywhere to anybody, certainly the only salvation of interest to Scripture and its faithful readers, is through the line of chosen people which terminated upon Jesus Himself, elsewhere in the New Testament designated ‘the Savior of the world’ (John 4:42) and ‘the Savior of all people’ (1 Tim. 4:10). A bit later in the conversation of Jesus with the Samaritan woman (we may imagine with great pathos) she wistfully spoke, saying, ‘I know that Messiah [the Christ] is coming’ (John 4:25), to which Jesus responded, ‘I who speak to you am he’ (John 4:26).

Everything falling between Genesis 12:3 (the call of Abraham) and John 4:26 falls in line saying not only, 'Salvation is from the Jews' but from a particular Jew. He is the only Savior of mankind.

Let us see this starkly as it really is in the narrative of the Old Testament, beginning with Abraham's chasse into Egypt and Philistia (Gen. 12). Not only is salvation through a particular family but till the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4) in a particular portion of earth's surface—a 'land of promise' as well as sons of promise and a particular promised Son. Let the reader think of how the Lord at the Exodus not only annihilated the armies of Pharaoh but also judged all the gods of Egypt (Exod. 12:12); think also of the absolute rejection of any saving power in the elaborate rituals and idolatries of Canaan and divine revulsion even from their names.

Think also of the disasters in what Visser't Hooft calls 'the first wave of syncretism' with the nature-fertility worship of the Mother Goddess of Babylon and Damascus (2 Kgs. 23:7–11; Jer. 7:18; 44:17; Ezek. 8:14). The prophets Jeremiah (2:20) and Ezekiel (16:15 ff.) were not concocting allegories when they compared the Israel of that time to a whore. Says Visser't Hooft:

It is inadequate to describe the prophetic protest against this syncretism as a moral protest. It is far more. It is the refusal in the name of the living God who calls men by their name and demands their personal response, to let men become playthings of the dark, arbitrary forces of nature, the denial of the idea that man's ultimate destiny is to adjust himself and let himself be integrated with the unending circular process of life and death represented by nature.¹⁹

Think also of the permanent annihilation by God of the northern kingdom of Israel (2 Kgs. 17:5–23) because they thought they could find some 'grace' and 'rays of revelation' (to borrow the language of Vatican II) in the idols, rituals and doctrines of the religions of their neighbours. Then turn attention to the Babylonian captivity, precipitated by Jewish flirtation with 'all the [religious] abominations of the nations' (2 Chr. 36:14, and context). See also Daniel's prayer of confession of the abomination of religious syncretism (Dan. 9:1–19) and Ezra's similar prayer (Ezra 9:1–15). See also how 'the Israelites separated themselves from all foreigners and stood and confessed their sins [chiefly of religious syncretism] and the iniquities of their fathers' (Neh. 9:1–38, especially v. 2).

Let us pass lightly over inter-testamental times during which the constant temptation was to accept religious elements first from the ambient culture (Samaritan and degenerate Judaism) of the restored community (Ezra, Nehemiah) then from Greek paganism (1 and 2 Maccabees). The heroes of faith celebrated in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews are not they who found 'elements of grace', 'sanctification' and 'rays of revelation' in ethnic religion but they who not only resisted that mixing of beliefs which the scientific study of religion calls syncretion but fought it to the death (Heb. 11:34–38). The Epistles of Paul, Peter, John and Jude bristle with resistance to the notion of saving truth or any presence of the authentic Savior in the mystery religions, pagan cults and philosophical currents of first-century antiquity. Resistance to such was the very occasion for the writing of much of this New Testament literature. In the book of Revelation, the believers and their leader at Pergamos are commended by the One who 'has the sharp two-edged sword' saying, 'I know where you dwell, where Satan's throne is. Yet you hold fast my name, and you did not deny my faith even in the days of Antipas my faithful witness, who was killed among you, where Satan dwells' (Rev. 2:12, 13). These Christians who had suffered deeply from pressures to find enough truth in a satanic cult somehow 'to get along' with it, are reprov'd for even allowing in their company some who held 'the doctrine of Baalam and Balak' which mixed idolatry with fornication (Rev. 3:14), also the presently unknown 'doctrine of Nicolaitans' (perhaps the same as Balaamism, as the Greek syntax suggests.²⁰ The comments on Revelation 3:14–16 by a godly Anglican bishop speak directly to the dangers that come from allowing any saving element in non-Christian religion. (How elitist this would sound in current debate!) He speaks distinctly:

The simplest meaning of the passage seems to be that the temptation to which the Israelites were exposed, is used to illustrate the temptations of the Pergamene Church ... in the same Antinomian [ism] [unrestrained by moral laws] ... a tendency ... very early seen (Rom. 6:4; Gal. 5:13; Jude 4) and is not extinct now ... a vague, unavowed, unrealised idea that the Atonement has made sin less fatal, that sin indulged and persisted in, may yet not work death.²¹

The moral perils inevitably attached to a syncretic Christianity in this passage called for the very most severe denunciation and punishments by the risen and glorified Lord Jesus Christ. It was to this particular church, Pergamos, that the glorified Jesus reveals Himself as 'him who has the sharp two-edged sword' and threatens to use it on them.

What Texts of Scripture Plainly Say Salvation Is Through Christ and No Other?

The faith of the Old Testament was Christian in a preparatory sense, as is well understood, but this became clear only in the New Testament. We bring attention, therefore, to New Testament Scripture statements which plainly, in context, declare that salvation is by faith in Christ alone and in no other. Many before us have cited these texts for the same reason we are employing them now. After attention to what these texts say we shall briefly note how some, who do not welcome what these clear passages say, respond to them. Because most discussion of these verses has been in terms of the Authorized (or King James) Version, I shall quote several in that translation. I shall cite three verses from the third chapter of John first.

John 3:16—'For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'

John 3:18—'He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.'

John 3:36—'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.'

John's Gospel characteristically speaks immediately and plainly both to mind and feeling. It is always hard to miss the thrust of John's meanings. Exegesis may therefore be bypassed to exposition and application (see John 20:30, 31; 21:25). No one knows whether the section from verse 13 onward to 21 wherein two of these three verses lie was spoken to Nicodemus or is elaboration by John. Nor is it plain whether John the Baptist or John the Apostle spoke the words of verse 36. It makes no difference to knowledge and faith because 'the scripture says'—to employ Paul's trenchant phrase—is the same as 'God says'.²² Let all Christians therefore heed the caveat that when Scripture speaks in these three verses, God is speaking and thereafter there really is no more to say. If there is no more to be said, why keep on protesting?

The way to ‘have everlasting life’ and ‘not perish’ is to ‘believeth in him [Christ]’ (John 3:16). Any one who does not so believe ‘is condemned already’ (John 3:36) and shall certainly ‘not stand in the judgment’ future (see Ps. 1:5). This is ‘because he has not believed in the name’ (John 3:18; see Acts 4:12).

Contrariwise the one who ‘believes him’ is not condemned now or ever (John 5:24). Later, Jesus, in conspicuous display of authority, declared, ‘Truly, truly, I say to you, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life. He does not come into judgement, but has passed from death to life’ (John 5:24). In this saying it is apparent that to hear the word of the gospel is prerequisite to believing on the One who is the Savior. It is this text (and similar texts) which still gives impulse, as it did in late apostolic times, to preach Christ where He has not yet been named (Rom. 15:20).

John 3:36 adds the stark and awful fact nobody wishes to face, for it is spoken by the One from whose presence in the Last Judgment, in this same Apostle’s vision, ‘earth and sky fled away, and no place was found for them’ (Rev. 20:11): ‘he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but [to the contrary] the wrath of God abideth on him’ (John 3:36). The absence of life is death. ‘Death and Hades [hell] were thrown into the lake of fire. This is the second death’ (Rev. 20:14).

No ‘artful dodger’ who once walked the earth and shall come to this judgment will find a place to hide in that great day of God Almighty (Rev. 16:14). No crafty theologian who seeks to explain away plain passages of Scripture by creative exegesis based on wistful surmises—suspended on strained explanations of obscure texts or inferential nonsequiturs—will furnish any help from the side of an attorney for the defence. As is rather well known, one of America’s first great theologians (Jonathan Edwards) was rather insistent on the theology of this paragraph and helped spark a great revival, the waves of whose influence are still felt today. Where today is the Lord God of Jonathan Edwards? I doubt if there are any Edwards-like, in the serried ranks of inclusivist theologians and the still bolder pluralists.

The theology of the third chapter of John strengthens the nerve of aggressive missionary evangelism. To dilute it in any way is to ‘cut the nerve’ in missions, to borrow the phrase of Herbert Kane, the late missiologist. John Sanders, perhaps the most articulate and persuasive contemporary ‘inclusivist’, attempts throughout his book²³ to refute this charge. It does get his attention! Near the close he proposes four reasons for missionary evangelism even on inclusivist—‘wider hope’—presuppositions. They are: 1) ‘that Jesus commanded us to go and preach the gospel to all people’, 2) ‘Motivation for missions also arises from the desire to share what we cannot hold inside ourselves’, 3) ‘God wants to bring the fullness of eternal life into the lives of all people now’ 4) to engage the forces of evil in the world—‘to save people from ... a life of rebellion against God.’²⁴ Such motives as these hardly explain the zeal of the apostles or any others in the age-long missionary enterprise.

Charles Hodge, in discussing ‘the external call’, entitled a section, ‘The Call to Salvation is only Through the Gospel’. He has quoted Romans 10:14 and concluded with these almost transfixing sentences:

Invocation implies faith; faith implies knowledge; knowledge implies objective teaching. ‘Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God’ (Rom. 10:17). There is no faith, therefore, where the gospel is not heard; and where there is no faith, there is no salvation.

This is indeed an awful doctrine. But are not the words of our Lord also awful, ‘Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat; because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it’? (Matt 7:13, 14). Is not the fact awful which stares every man in the face, that the great majority even of those who hear the gospel reject its offers of mercy? Facts are as mysterious as doctrines. If we must submit to the one, we may as well submit to the other. Our Lord has taught us, in view of facts or doctrines which try our faith, to remember the infinite wisdom and rectitude of God, and say, ‘Even so Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight’. The proper effect of the doctrine that the knowledge of the gospel is essential to the salvation of adults, instead of exciting opposition to God’s word or providence, is to prompt us to greatly increased exertion to send the gospel to those who are perishing for lack of knowledge.²⁵

The case against ‘inclusivism’ and ‘pluralism’ might be rested here, yet there are many other plain texts and several will be introduced.

John 14:6—‘I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me’ (kjv)

At some juncture in the last hours of Jesus with His apostles, Jesus phrased this answer to a question expressed by Thomas about the way to God. Geivett and Phillips point out that this ‘I am’ statement identifies Jesus equally with the way, the truth and the life. He claims not merely to know but to be these three. Say these authors, ‘Since he adds that “no one” (oudeis) comes to the Father except by this way, we infer that anyone who wants to come to the Father must find that way that uniquely leads to the Father, namely, Jesus himself.’²⁶ The definite article preceding each of the three (way, truth, life) seems to say there is only one way, one truth, one life, that other claimants are spurious and to be heartily rejected.

Later in that last evening Jesus offered special intercessory prayer for those already in His fold of salvation, those who had already received His ‘word’ (John 17:6, 8). A little later he said to the Father, ‘I do not ask for these only, but also for those who will believe in me through their word’ (John 17:20). ‘This implies a direct link between the future salvation of those who are not of his immediate Jewish fold (10:16) and the explicit proclamation of the apostolic word.’²⁷ In other words, availability of salvation depends, from the human perspective, on hearing the apostolically authentic gospel. Such a conclusion leads immediately to the next text we shall examine, Romans 10:9–17.

Romans 10:9–17

That which is implicit in the preceding text is explicit here—not only is Jesus Christ the only Savior, but in order to believe on Him savingly one must first ‘hear’ the message about Him. Again for its stark, literal realism and, at this point, textual faithfulness, I cite the familiar King James Version. The ellipses are of verses 10 and 15b–16.

That if thou [singular] shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved ... for the scripture saith, whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed [Isa 28:16; 49:23]. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! ... So then faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God.

Little comment seems necessary. I call on pluralists and inclusivists in their debate with exclusivists to note the outright claim of this portion of Scripture that hearing the gospel is an assumed necessary preliminary to believing on Christ, presumed throughout to be the only Savior. Paul has previously in the same Epistle doused every hope of eternal life and righteousness before God apart from the redemptive work of Christ and faith alone as the way of human appropriation of the same.

Also the same should note (1) that the apostolic author regulates his doctrine by relevant Scriptures then existing ('For the scripture saith', v. 11, and 'as it is written', v. 15, 'For Isaiah says', v. 16). Where are the direct, positive affirmations of Scripture in arguments of the near-inclusivism of Alister McGrath, 'A Particularist View: A Post-Enlightenment Approach'?²⁸ The same is to be asked of Clark H. Pinnock, whose arguments for 'An Inclusivist View' rest on inferences not derived from the truly relevant texts cited here.²⁹ (2) The exclusive claims for Christ and the necessity of hearing the gospel in this passage are an important support for the author's appeal for assistance in a project of missionary evangelism proposed later in the Epistle.³⁰ One can hardly imagine anyone holding withered exclusivist convictions regarding the necessity of knowing 'the name' of Christ ever writing the book of Romans. I shall say more about this shortly.

Acts 4:12 'And there is salvation in no one else; for there is no other name under heaven that has been given among men by which we must be saved' (nasb)

Peter, in the temple court, had just performed the first apostolic miracle (Acts 3:1–11) in 'the name [emphasis added] of Jesus Christ [Messiah] of Nazareth' (v. 6). He had addressed the crowd of Jews attracted by the healing, not only stating that 'his name' had made the miracle happen but that Jesus was the Messiah of Israel's hope and of scriptural prophecy. He had previously identified Jesus as the promised Messiah (Acts 2:36). Then having been arrested and haled before the Jewish court, the court inquired 'By what power or by what name [emphasis added] did you do this?' (Acts 4:7). This is the setting of Peter's response to the court's inquiry—a response for which 'the Holy Spirit' filled him. It was no mere human testimony, for God had borne witness by raising Jesus from the dead (Acts 3:13–18). (I am addressing readers for whom divine testimony is both possible and important.) He proceeded not only to declare, 'by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth ... whom God raised from the dead' did the miracle take place, but further: 'there is salvation in no one else' (v. 12). Let us focus on v. 12 and note how 'particularistic' it really is.

1. 'Jesus Christ of Nazareth', is the One who saves. Before a Jewish audience Peter, by the Holy Spirit, produced a summary interpretation of the Old Testament and of Jewish history. All the weight of hope and prophecy of ‘the coming one’ says Jesus is the Christ, the Son of Man, Suffering Servant, Son of God, Son of David, the Seed of Abraham through whom not only Israel but all the families of the earth would be blessed. There are not two of Him, nor a multitude of Immanuels, Avatars, etc. Only one. ‘Are you the one who is to come?’ (Matt. 11:3) was the Jewish question and ‘salvation is from the Jews’ (John 4:22) was a limitation defined by Jesus Himself.

2. ‘The name’. The Bible nowhere hints that salvation is available through ‘natural light’, or, hints or surmises of reflective minds. Rather salvation is made available through announcement of ‘the Name’. Peter and John (cf. Acts 3, 4) knew the names of the gods and saviors of the religions of their time—as did Paul at Mars Hill. Yet they insist that the biblical revelation that terminated on One named Jesus of Nazareth describes the only authentic Way, that the God who saves is the ‘God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob’ (Acts 3:13).

Space fails here to bring all the weight of the thinking of the people of the Bible and theology derived from it, to the importance of ‘the Name’ here and in many parts of Scripture. To curse the name was to be punished promptly by death (Lev. 24:11–23). On the other hand all the energy that flowed into the crippled man when he was healed is also connected to the One in whose name he was healed and the ‘God who raised him from the dead’. There is ‘no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved’. This seems in context to be a proclaimed name, a name not simply pronounced as in an incantation or magical formula, but with explanation, that is to say, the gospel. ‘Jesus Christ’ and ‘the name’ are interchanged sometimes (Acts 5:41; 9:34; 3 John 7). I cite Geivett and Phillips:

Philip identifies the gospel expressly with ‘the name of Jesus Christ’ (Acts 8:12, 35). Paul’s vocation is to carry Jesus’ name to Gentiles as well as to Jews (Acts 9:15; cf. 9:27). Indeed he indicates a definite preference for conducting his ministry among those who did not know the name of Christ, as though it is urgent that this name be known as a condition for salvation (Rom. 15:20).... The persecutors of the early church properly and routinely associated the message of salvation preached by the church with ‘the name of Jesus’ (Acts 4:17–30; 5:28–33, 40; 26:9).³¹

These authors conclude ‘that “name” refers to the focus of God’s universal redemptive plan in the person and work of Jesus Christ, who must be the object of explicit faith by those who want to be saved’.³² We shall return to this thought.

The first occurrence of ‘believe on the name’ in the New Testament follows one of the first miracles performed by Jesus, His first cleansing of the temple and His performance of miracles at the Passover during the feast, viz. ‘Many believed on his name’. This expression, ‘into the name’, has Jewish (not Hellenistic) origin.³³ Further, ‘To believe in His name’ (John 2:23), says Bietendorf, ‘is to believe in his Messianic mission, to believe in Him as the Christ, as the only begotten Son of God, 3:18.’ This belief, Bietendorf adds, arises in response to proofs of His power, manifesting ‘God’s power in His acts’.³⁴ This only samples the evidence of Scripture that saving faith comes in response to reliable information about who Christ is and what He came to do. As demonstrated in chapter 2, salvation is conveyed by a message.

There is no such information furnished by ‘natural light’, only by authentic revelation. It is important that, from the standpoint of Scripture, apokalupsis (revelation) is a specially divinely caused event, not an inference drawn from nature or a surmise of the thoughtful mind. Strictly speaking, ‘general revelation’ is an oxymoron. According to Romans 16:25, 26, Paul’s ‘gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ’ was a ‘mystery that was kept secret for long ages’ but now in Paul’s own time became a revealed mystery through the prophetic writings and only then ‘made known to all nations’.

It seems clear to this reader of the Bible that ‘the nations’ knew nothing implicit or explicit about ‘the name’ by faith in whom and in no other way, they might be saved. This is the way the common run of believers have usually understood the breathless expectancy of the pious remnant of true believers at the time of the Advent (Mary, Zacharias, Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna [Luke 1, 2]). Even our hymns say the same.

Romans 16:25, 26

From Paul’s point of view, reliable information about salvation through Christ was not transparent even to the people of the Old Testament. If partially opaque to the Hebrew contemporaries of Moses and the prophets, then the heathen world was more seriously deprived. The nativity hymn has it right that until after Christ came the world was ‘in sin and darkness lying’. The message of salvation was simply not generally available.

I refer to Paul’s closing words of the Epistle to the Romans. The Greek text is very difficult, yet the translators of the Revised Standard Version (1946) seem to have it right and I cite the verses with little further comment.

Now to him who is able to strengthen you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret for long ages but is now disclosed and through the prophetic writings is made known to all nations, according to the command of the eternal God, to bring about the obedience of faith (Rom. 16:25, 26 rsv).

The word ‘nations’ in this passage is the plural of ethnos often translated ‘gentiles’ or ‘heathen’. Depending on context (modern pluralist sensitivities notwithstanding) either of these translations may be appropriate. In the just-cited passage, heathen—the nations as alienated from God and ‘without God in the world’—would not be inappropriate. The saving gospel, according to this passage was a mystery, not fully disclosed anywhere until disclosed through Christ, His apostles and evangelists. The world’s peoples are to be brought to ‘obedience to the faith’ only through the apostolic channels.

The presupposition of the whole enterprise of Christian world evangelism has not been that there is a world full of the culturally deprived, or of the illiterate, or of the needy, as such, but of fallen humanity, estranged from their Creator and blind to their condition. They shall remain without hope, without Christ and without God in the world unless evangelized. The hymns of that enterprise composed since the explosion of Protestant evangelical missions at the end of the eighteenth century presuppose it. I cite a few lines:

‘What though spicy breezes/ Blow soft o’er Ceylon’s isle;/

Though every prospect pleases,/ And only man is vile?/

In vain with lavish kindness/ The gifts of God are strown;/

The heathen in his blindness/ Bows down to wood and stone.'

(Lowell Mason, 1792–1872, From Greenland's Icy Mountains).

‘Are the heathen lost?’—the perennial question seems to be answered, Yes, unless and until they hear and ‘obey’, to use Paul’s occasional term for ‘believe’ the gospel. The destiny Paul contemplated for those who do not come to the ‘obedience of faith’ is plain, but no less appalling on that account as the following text uniquely clarifies.

2 Thessalonians 1:5–10

In this passage, for which space does not allow minute exegesis, Paul is comforting the new believers he had hurriedly left behind in the city now known as Salonika. They had recently suffered severe persecution from both Jews and Gentiles in their native city. In such a case even the martyrs in heaven justly call for vindication saying, ‘O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before you will judge and avenge our blood’ (Rev. 6:10). Paul in a certain sense answers their question in his comfort of the Thessalonian Christians. He says God will grant them ‘rest’ and explains the time of this vindication. It will be:

[W]hen the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance on those who do not know God and on those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. [‘How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard?’] They will suffer the punishment of eternal destruction, away from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might, when he comes on that day to be glorified in his saints, and to be marvelled at among all who have believed (2 Thess. 1:5–10).

Let the reader take this theology of vindication as well as of salvation seriously. Let the newly minted theological modifiers of evangelical theology include this text in their supposed new ‘paradigm’. Their argument seems to be not with an outmoded conservative model of evangelicalism but with plain Scripture teaching.

This chapter began with warnings against speculation based in curiosity about matters on which God has not spoken in Scripture. I close it with insistence that we swallow whole what God has clearly revealed. If there are exceptions or qualifications to be made, let us wait for further revelation rather than try to tell God what He ought to have said so we could sleep better at night.

The next chapter will address the question raised earlier in this chapter: May Christ be encountered in a saving way, without being specifically identified, in other religions?

¹ Aurelius Augustine, The Enchiridion on Faith, Hope and Love, ed. H. Paolucci and analysis A. Von Harack (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1966), end of chap. 16.

² John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion ii, ed. J. T. McNeil, trans. and ed. by F. L. Battles (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960), chap. 5.10.

³ There is a considerable amount of overlapping in this and the next chapter with a chapter in eschatology about perversions and denials of the doctrine of eternal punishment of the lost.

⁴ Hendrik Kraemer, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (London: Harpers, 1938).

⁵ W. A. Visser’t Hooft, No Other Name (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1963).

- ⁶ Karl Rahner, Theological Investigations v. (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1966), pp. 115–134. Also Theological Investigations vi, pp. 390–395. The series was issued progressively beginning in 1961. Rahner did not complete the planned work.
- ⁷ G. A. McCool (ed.), A Rahner Reader (New York: Seabury Publ., 1975), pp. 211–220.
- ⁸ ibid., p. 211.
- ⁹ Rahner, Theological Investigations, vol. ix, pp. 146–156, excerpted by McCool, Rahner Reader.
- ¹⁰ McCool, Rahner Reader, p. 220.
- ¹¹ The Documents of Vatican ii, ed. W. M. Abbott (New York: Guild Press/America Press, 1966), pp. 669–671.
- ¹² Documents of Vatican ii, pp. 660–668.
- ¹³ Vatican Council ii, ed. by Austin Flannery, vol. i (Northport, NY: Costello Publ., 1996), p. 736.
- ¹⁴ ibid., pp. 367, 368.
- ¹⁵ Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica iii, trans. by Fathers of the English Dominican Province (Westminster, Maryland: Christian Classics, 1911, 1981), Question 8, Article 3, Reply 1.
- ¹⁶ J. I. Packer, ‘The Way of Salvation, Part IV: Are Non-Christian Faiths the Way of Salvation’, Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 130, no. 518, April–June, 1973, pp. 110–116.
- ¹⁷ Daniel B. Clendenin, Many Gods, Many Lords (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1995), p. 117.
- ¹⁸ R. Douglas Geivett and W. Gary Phillips, ‘A Particularist View: An Evidentialist Approach’, in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, ed. D. L. Okholm and T. R. Phillips (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1996), p. 214.
- ¹⁹ Visser’t Hooft, No Other Name, p. 13.
- ²⁰ Robert H. Mounce, New International Commentary on the New Testament—Book of Revelation (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1977), p. 98.
- ²¹ Bishop Boyd Carpenter in Ellicott’s Commentary on the Whole Bible viii, ed. C. J. Ellicott (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1954), pp. 543, 544.
- ²² See B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1958), pp. 299–348.
- ²³ John Sanders, No Other Name: An Investigation into the Destiny of the Unevangelized (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1970).

²⁴ ibid., pp. 284, 285.

²⁵ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1970), pp. 648, 649.

²⁶ Geivett and Phillips, in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, p. 236.

²⁷ ibid., p. 237.

²⁸ ibid., pp. 177–180.

²⁹ ibid., pp. 95–123.

³⁰ Robert D. Culver, A Greater Commission: A Theology for World Missions (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984 and reissued by WIPF & Stock, Eugene, OR, 2001), pp. 119–131.

³¹ Geivett and Phillips, in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, p. 232.

³² ibid., p. 232.

³³ Bietendorf in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament vol. v. ed. G. Kittel and G. Frederich, trans. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1964–1976), art. ‘onoma’, p. 275.

³⁴ ibid.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (780). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

20

Is Christ Present in Non-Christian Religions?

May Christ be encountered in a saving way, without being specifically identified, in other religions? To sharpen the point of the question, granting that salvation is through Christ alone and that the gospel of Christ must be heard to be believed, is it possible to hear this message in non-Christian religions? To assert that Christ may be encountered for salvation in other religions is currently sometimes called ‘inclusivism’.

This is not the same as ‘pluralism’, exemplified by such writers as John Hick (contemporary), Ernst Troeltsch (a century ago) and Friederich Schliermacher (two centuries ago) which says that there are many ways to salvation (however defined), each valid.

There are few if any who take the Bible seriously who agree. Leslie Newbigin spoke as an aggressive, articulate evangeliser from within the World Council of Churches. He well said on the last page of his book, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society:

As we confess Jesus as Lord in a pluralist society, and as the Church grows through the coming of people from many cultural and religious traditions to faith in Christ, we are enabled to learn more of the length and breadth and height of the love of God (Eph. 3:14–19) than we can in a monochrome society. But we must reject the ideology of pluralism. We must reject the invitation to live in society where everything is subjective and relative, a society which has abandoned the belief that truth can be known and has settled for ... ‘truth for you’ but not truth for me. For one thing, I doubt whether such a society can long sustain its integrity in the face of those who have a firm commitment to some vision of truth.¹

Newbigin was referring to the rising, strident assertions of Islam—the Revolution in Iran, etc.—which he foresaw as exploiting the self-inflicted multiculturalism of the West. We see that more plainly after 11 September 2001. Newbigin made the same point at greater length in ‘Religion for the Marketplace’, a chapter in Christian Uniqueness Reconsidered: The Myth of a Pluralistic Theology of Religions.²

Biblical Christians of every persuasion have known and contended all along that multiculturalism (pluralism) in matters of religion is impossible. The Scriptures treated earlier in the last previous chapter (the history of the whole Bible; John 3:16–18 and 36; John 14:6; Acts 4:12; Rom. 10:4–17) are well known and convincing. The current crop of pluralists have every one of them abandoned all the unique claims of Christ and of the Bible as both truthful and of binding authority as well or they would not be pluralists. Some honest critical scholars outside orthodoxy see this plainly as, for example, the well-known John B. Cobb. In an essay, ‘Beyond Pluralism’, he points out that though the teachings of Buddhism, Confucianism, even Communism and Christianity, overlap somewhat in limited areas, they are thoroughly incompatible in what may be of central importance to each. It is not clear, he says, that they even share a central essence of some kind which might rightly be called ‘religion’. He closes:

I see no a priori reason to assume that religion has an essence or that the great religion traditions are well understood as religious, that is, as traditions for which being religious is the central goal. I certainly see no empirical evidence in favour of this view. I see only a scholarly habit and the power of language to mislead. I call for a pluralism that allows each religious tradition to define its own nature and purposes and the role of religious elements within it.³

Theology of the newspaper pundits and commentators, as well as organizers of gatherings to get the support of ‘religion’, for some cause or other assume there to be some essence, some valid core which is the same in every religion. Cobb had this to say about people who cherish this delusion:

[A]mong those who assume that religion has an essence there is no consensus as to what the essence may be. Even individual scholars often change their mind. The variation is still greater when scholars represent diverse religious traditions. Yet among many of them the assumption that there is an essence continues unshaken in the midst of uncertainty

as to what the essence is.⁴

Back more precisely to our topic—Granting all the exclusive claims of Christ and the Bible, may not God reveal Christ ‘incognito’ in other religions? Perhaps somewhat as Jesus did when on earth to the blind man of John chapter 9—only after an interval of time saying, ‘It is he who is speaking to you’, i.e. Messiah, the Savior, ‘Behold your God’ (Isa. 40:9; John 9:37). By extrapolation from Matthew 25:40, 45 where Jesus is said to identify Himself with the poor, and the saved with those who show mercy on the poor as fit for heaven, this idea is sometimes promoted, as by Clark Pinnock.⁵ Almost as an aside Dr Pinnock puts the position of ‘inclusivism’ quite plainly:

Everyone must eventually pass through Jesus to reach the Father, but there is more than one path [other religions] for arriving at this place. Is this not the stuff of Christian testimony—how one came to know him? One can get to that place from many points on the compass. All the paths that lead to God end up at Jesus, but they do not all start with him.⁶

Dr Pinnock’s chapter runs parallel to his 1992 book.⁷ Both the book and the essay cited above represent ‘musings’ as noted by Alister McGrath⁸ and are characterized by ‘vagueness’.⁹ Pinnock sometimes tries to speak as one of the evangelical crowd and about as often from an assumed superior position somewhere in space where he makes belittling comments on the fundamentalists. This has been the case with Dr Clark Pinnock for as long as I have known him—and for several years his office door was about six feet from mine. He has also during that time changed from a Calvinist posture to an Arminian posture, and from a radical leftist activism to a more conservative social outlook.¹⁰ Hence his musings and wandering thoughts shall not be treated at length here. With some searching one can find that he argues for possible salvation (maybe) in other religions from 1) the presence of God in the whole world, 2) divine sovereignty, 3) the alleged saintliness of many non-Christians, 4) ‘God’s love’ said to be the essence of the Holy Trinity, and 5) inferences from many Scripture texts and stories that do not relate to the subject. His ‘essay’ soars with a polemic that is ‘frequently vague’, employing analogies also frequently vague.¹¹

A sarcastic remark about German philosophers might apply to the arguments of those who as believers in the plenary inspiration of the Bible find evidence in the Bible for ways to Christ in non-biblical religions:

We Germans suffer from no lack of systematic books. No nation in the world surpasses us in the faculty of deducing from a couple of definitions whatever conclusions we please, in most fair and logical order.¹²

Gerald R. McDermott is a quite different writer whose respect for fellow ‘evangelicals’ is plain and who sets out to find evidence of saving revelation in other religions. He defines his terms and states his evangelical theological presuppositions. Though I appreciate his frankness I do not share his admiration for Karl Barth’s method and theology and think he finds more support for his idea in Jonathan Edwards than is there. At the end he finds no evidence that there is saving divine revelation in these religions but argues:

that there is both biblical and theological grounding ... for their notion of learning about God from non-Christians ... I have found in the religions confirmation of familiar

Christian doctrine, confirmation that enables us to see those doctrines with new vigour or application.¹³

The author teaches at Roanoke College, Salem, VA.

Dr McDermott is not likely to be followed by many believers in search for what they already know in potentially dangerous sources. He himself does not recommend his excursion into these religions for immature Christians.

Salvation of the Unevangelized in Historical Protestant Theology

It is commonly said and written that the sixteenth-century Reformers had no interest in evangelizing any one, only in re-establishing a sound church with truly biblical doctrines. Granting that the first generations following 1517 had their hands full with these tasks and staying alive long enough to do them, it is not quite true that reaching the lost was not of interest to them. Their interest in 'the lost' was first in the lost near at hand who were perceived rightly to be trusting in 'ordinances' (see Epistles of Paul to Galatians and Colossians) and ceremonies, rather than in the unmerited favour of God who saves wholly by grace on the occasion of faith in Christ, a faith which comes only with exposure to truth. The Reformers were not unlike Paul and the other apostles who went first (and in Peter's case at least) almost always to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel'. Further, on the side of the Roman Church, Columbus thought of himself as a missionary to the 'Indians'¹⁴ and ere long the Puritans of the seventeenth century were motivated not only by desire to set up a commonwealth where they could raise their families Christianly, but perceived a part of their 'errand to the wilderness' to be to evangelize the natives of the New World.¹⁵

There has been frequent cautious acknowledgment from earliest times of the possibility that some who never hear the gospel from any human sources nevertheless do learn of Him and are saved. Most orthodox Lutherans have not accepted this but it has been steadily affirmed by leading Calvinist-Reformed, though with cautious reserve.

Luther asserted that man has the moral capability to produce a kind of righteousness that meets the demands of civil law. This righteousness preserves civil order and makes the world go around and Luther praised men for it. This kind of righteousness is to be found among 'heathen' and 'Turks' (i.e. Muslims). It was the virtue taught and, to some degree, found in Aristotle and Cicero. But this will not stand up in the court of heaven for God judges by higher standards (Rom. 2 and 4).¹⁶ To this day strict Lutheran theology castigates 'Calvinists' for their opening up other possibilities for salvation outside the regular course of hearing a 'preacher'.¹⁷

The Westminster Confession, reflecting opinion going back to Calvin himself, states:

Since there is no other way of salvation than that revealed in the gospel, and since in the divinely established and ordinary method of grace [emphasis added] faith cometh by hearing the word of God, Christ hath commissioned his church to go into all the world, etc.¹⁸

The language implies clearly that there may possibly be extra-ordinary methods whereby grace can operate.

At this point it would be fruitful, space allowing, to introduce all of W. G. T. Shedd's rundown of the subject over seven pages wherein the bulk of historical footnotes in fine print exceeds the main text's bulk. He begins with the following sentences:

It does not follow ... that because God is not obliged to offer pardon to the unevangelized heathen, either here or hereafter, therefore no unevangelized heathen are pardoned. The electing mercy of God reaches to the heathen. It is not the doctrine of the Church that the entire mass of the pagans, without exception, have gone down to endless impenitence and death. That some unevangelized men are saved, in the present life, by an extraordinary exercise of redeeming grace in Christ [emphasis added], has been the hope and belief of Christendom. It was the hope and belief of the elder Calvinists, as it is of the later.¹⁹

One of the earliest 'elder Calvinists', converted by reading writings of the first line of Reformers—and a very strict one who early opposed the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity—was Hieronymus Zanchius (1516–1590). After remarking that many nations had never heard the gospel he asserted: 'It is not indeed improbable that some individuals in their unenlightened countries may belong to the secret election of grace, and the habit [inward heart disposition involving repentance] of faith may be wrought [by the Spirit] in them.'²⁰ Shedd also cites the Second Swiss Confession which after the remark that the ordinary mode of salvation is by the instrumentality of the written Word, adds: 'agnosimus, interim, deum illuminare posse homines etiam sine externe ministerio, quo et quando velit: id quod ejus potentiae est.'²¹ (I translate, 'Meanwhile, we acknowledge it to be possible for God to illuminate men even without an outward ministry, at what place and whatever time he wills: this is that which is His power.')

A. A. Hodge carefully distinguishes this alleged power and disposition of God to reveal Himself specially as He wills from the Roman doctrine of implicit faith (lately expounded in Vatican II canons) by which a man is said to exercise faith in a truth of which he knows nothing. For example, if one believes the church's local priest he embraces all the priest and his church stand for.²² Shedd was a zealous preacher as well as a supporter of missionary evangelism. He did not allow anything to obscure the duty and privilege to evangelize, saying:

This extraordinary work of the Holy Spirit is mentioned by the Redeemer Shedd has referred to [Matt. 8:11; Luke 13:30; Matt. 8:5–10 and reference to the heathen saints Ruth, Tamar, Rahab; Isa. 66:2; Matt. 5:3; Matt. 21:31] to illustrate the sovereignty of God in the exercise of mercy, not to guide His church in their evangelistic labour. His command is, to 'preach the gospel to every creature'.... The law of missionary effort is, that 'faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God', Rom. 10:17.²³

Calvinists have Calvin himself to thank for this outlook. In comment on Romans 10:14, 'how shall they call on him of whom they have not heard' he wrote:

No other word has he mentioned here but that which is preached, because it is the ordinary mode [emphasis added] which the Lord has appointed for conveying his word. But were any on this account to contend God cannot transfer to men the knowledge of himself, except by the instrumentality of preaching, we deny that to teach this was the Apostle's intention; for he had only in view the ordinary dispensation of God [emphasis added], and did not intent to prescribe a law for the distribution of his grace ... But as

Paul does not treat here the lawful call of anyone, it would be superfluous to speak at large on the subject. It is enough for us to bear this only in mind, that the gospel does not fall like rain from the clouds, but is brought by the hand of man wherever it is sent from above.²⁴

Likewise, Sir Norman Anderson, in one of the most thoroughly informed and biblical volumes on this subject cites cases where God brought saving knowledge to those whom God's Spirit had brought a genuine effective call without previously being evangelized.²⁵

This old concession shares some texts and thought with recent 'inclusivists', some of whom outrightly reject orthodox understanding of Trinitarian inner relationships and divine attributes (as Clark Pinnock and John Sanders) but none of their heterodoxy and spirit. A competent theologian of Reformed pedigree and conviction courteously but firmly points this out very recently. I refer to the last chapter of Robert E. Reymond's Systematic Theology, 'Downgrade trends in Contemporary Evangelical Eschatology'.²⁶ I shall reserve my own further remarks on this pesky diversion for the department of last things, or eschatology.

The Project of Christian Apologetics Is to Defend the Exclusive Claims of Christ

The second-century Christian apologists (Aristides, Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, et al) made a poor beginning from our point of view. They made what they deemed to be necessary concessions in order to make their point that Christians deserved to be tolerated. Irenaeus (Against Heresies) was concerned mainly to refute stupid but attractive heresies, though he did not shrink from stating and defending the sole existence of the one God of Scripture and of His incarnate Son the only Savior.²⁷

Properly the task of Christian Apologetics has been precisely to defend the claim that Christ is indeed the one and only Savior of the world. His certification as such by His resurrection from the dead is paramount in the apostolic writings of the New Testament and in every sermon recorded in the book of Acts.

In a recent, excellent article approaching the question of this chapter and with essentially the same data, Klaas Runia points out that higher critics of the Gospels who deny the resurrection of the 'flesh' of Jesus have little to say to those who will listen. 'For a Reformed church and a Reformed Theologian this view is utterly unacceptable.'²⁸ For such theologians, 'The resurrection of Jesus on the third day after his death is not an "idea" that one can accept or reject.'²⁹ He goes on to show how the resurrection verifies 'the miracle of reconciliation' by His death on the cross and 'the miracle of the incarnation'.³⁰ The same points have been made by Christian missionaries in their daily work, by pastors in their pulpits and about every quotable orthodox author since Irenaeus in his 'Against Heresies' 1,800 years ago.

In view of these strictures against even the cautious 'wider hope' of some Reformed theologians, I share Klaas Runia's reluctance even fully to endorse the historic Reformed concessions toward special cases wherein God may have revealed Himself in a saving way to founders and followers of other religions. We know God apparently savingly revealed Himself without any presently human messenger at least once—to Abraham (Gen. 12:1 ff.; cf. Acts 7:1, 2).

Herman Bavinck is ambivalent: ‘Even Hendrik Kraemer, who regarded all other religions as ‘endeavors for self-redemption’, wrote in his last book that he did not mean to say that ‘the other religions are erroneous in their totality and in every respect’.³¹ Another missiologist, J. Verkuyl, is quoted as speculating that God may have been involved somewhat in the writing of the Vedas and even the Koran.³² Runia concludes—and I with him:

I am not so sure whether we have the right to be so expansive, but I do know that if it is possible that people of other faiths may be saved, they most certainly will not be saved by their own religiosity, by their own religious experiences and rites, but only because the Spirit of Christ was active in their lives and because by his work the secret of Christ became manifest in them too.³³

Members of the Evangelical Theological Society have been close observers of the development of the ‘inclusivist’ view among a small number of members who have published articles in the Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society and lengthy books reviewed in the Journal. Though one hesitates to generalize in such matters, it seems fair to observe that the same theologians who have been rather stridently promoting their ‘inclusivism’ have also promoted a reduction in our understanding of God’s essential (i.e. of His being) attributes of omniscience and omnipotence. In order not to extend these remarks to greater length I refrain here from providing the names, though some of them appear earlier in this chapter.

Addendum

Finally, since completing the manuscript I have read once more a sermon by B. B. Warfield entitled ‘False Religions and the True’—twenty-one pages in length. In it he calls to our attention that Paul at Athens addressed the most ‘religious’ city in the Greek world. There were gods and goddesses to be worshiped scattered in abundance throughout the city. The devotion of the people was far from assuring him that some might have been led to saving repentance and faith. To the contrary, their zeal for religion greatly offended him as an affront to the true God who is repelled rather than approached by their zeal. Though all people have an innate impulse to worship, it takes a course at a diameter (180 degrees) away from the one true God. Up to the coming of the ‘God approved’ Man, God let the nations go on in their ignorance, ‘but now’ commands them to repent of their sins and acknowledge the One true God and His Man through whom alone there is forgiveness. Further there is full ‘assurance’ (proof) of the utterly valid authority of the demand for repentance in that God raised the Man from the dead, the one who is the Savior.

Paul used the word ‘deisidaimonesterous’ (more fear of gods than other Greeks) to describe the Athenians’ religion. They believed that there is a universal something in every religion (god, goddess, etc.) which might lead to blessedness here and hereafter. Warfield closed with an appeal to the hearer who might have such a multiculturalist, inclusivist opinion:

How easy it is to mistake the currents of mere natural religious feelings, that flow up and down in the soul, for signs that it is well with us in the sight of God. Happy the man who is born with a deep sensitive religious nature! But shall that purely natural endowment save him?.... Not because you are sensitive and easily moved to devotion, not because your sense of divine things is profound or lofty; not because you are like the Athenians, by nature ‘divinity-fearing’; but because, when the word of the Lord is brought to you, and Jesus Christ is revealed in your soul, under the prevailing influence of the Holy Ghost, you embrace Him with a hearty faith—cast yourself upon his almighty grace for salvation, and turning from your sins, enter into a life of obedience to Him—can you judge yourself a Christian... How instructive that when Paul himself preached in ‘deisidaimonistic’ Athens, where religiosity ran riot, no church seems to have been founded. We have only the meagre result recorded that ‘there were some men that clave to him and believed, among whom also was Dionysius, the Areopagete and a woman named Damaris, and others along with them’. The natively religious are not, therefore, nearer to the kingdom of God.³⁴

Harold A. Netland, who currently teaches at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, directly addressed religious pluralism in his book, Dissonant Voices: Religious Pluralism and the Question of Truth. Growing up in the home of Christian missionaries in Japan, he early faced the problem of religious pluralism: all religions possess religious validity. He proposes that this proposition ought to be addressed in detail. Further, taking his doctoral programme under guidance of the notorious John Hick, he is equipped to know what the problems are and how modern scholarship addresses the problem. So he patiently traces out the beliefs and resultant practices of four major religious traditions: Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam and Shintoism with regard to three basic questions which religions address. These are: 1) What is the nature of the religious ultimate? 2) What is the nature of the human predicament? 3) What is the nature of salvation/enlightenment/liberation?³⁵

Though I cannot review his book here, Netland shows not with broad strokes of pen but in detail how these four religions, while in some broad aspect do have some similarity, in details of central beliefs and practice are at odds with one another. He is always reserved in statement. His first summary contains these statements:

The common assumption that all religions ultimately are teaching the same things in their own culturally conditional ways is primie facie untenable. Not only are they not all saying the same things, but the particular issues addressed in the various religions are not necessarily the same.³⁶

Then citing W. A. Christian’s book, Oppositions of Religious Doctrines: A Study in the Logic of Dialogue Among Religions, Netland adds:

Christian says that the recent popular views that beliefs of the major religions are all mutually consistent and that all religions say basically the same thing ‘seem very implausible and certainly much current talk in aid of these views is loose and sentimental’. Surely the burden of proof is with those who would maintain the contrary.³⁷

As participant in the enterprise of Christian missionary tactics, Netland does not shrink from acknowledging failures to extend the practitioners of other religions and the culture the respect due them as human and bearers of the divine image but he goes on to show that pluralism is in demonstrable ways inconsistent with facts.

The notion of pluralistic equivalency of all religions first became prevalent not in twentieth-century liberalism but in the Enlightenment or Age of Reason of the eighteenth century. It is ironic that the eighteenth century which at its end produced the modern Protestant Christian missionary movement also produced the notion that all religious doctrines are true for someone somewhere. ‘As nothing is more irreligious than to demand general uniformity in mankind, so nothing is more unchristian than to seek uniformity in religion.’³⁸

The story of the rise of unbelief as ‘Enlightenment’ has been told many times—perhaps best by Reinhold Niebuhr in chapters I–IV of the first volume of his book The Nature and Destiny of Man.³⁹

Harold O. J. Brown specifically brought the story up to date in ‘The Heresy of the Enlightenment’, chapter 19 of his book, Heresies. It remains to be said—what seems most of the time to be forgotten—that the apostasy that says all religions are equally (or almost so) true also asserts or implies all religions are equally false.

¹ Leslie Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (World Council of Churches Publication Geneva and Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publ., 1989), p. 244.

² Leslie Newbigin, ‘Religion for the Marketplace’, in Christian Uniqueness Reconsidered: The Myth of a Pluralistic Theology of Religions, ed. Gavin D’Costa (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1990), pp. 135–148.

³ John B. Cobb, Jr., ‘Beyond Pluralism’, in Christian Uniqueness Reconsidered, p. 84.

⁴ ibid., p. 84.

⁵ Clark Pinnock, ‘An Inclusive View’, in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, ed. D. L. Okholm and T. R. Phillips (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1996), p. 119.

⁶ ibid.

⁷ Clark Pinnock, A Wideness in God’s Mercy: The Finality of Jesus Christ in a World of Religions (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1992).

⁸ Alister McGrath in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, in Okholm and Phillips, op. cit., p. 132.

⁹ Alister McGrath in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, in Okholm and Phillips, op. cit., p. 133.

¹⁰ There are many teaching Bible and doctrine in theological schools today who bypassed a seminary education on the way to their doctorates and some were allowed to omit systematic study of theology. Perhaps Dr Pinnock is one of them. Perhaps this explains why he has had trouble making up his mind about a long list of theological, social and political questions. He has discovered, embraced and discarded several systems of thought on his intellectual and religious pilgrimage. He has related the details in somewhat entertaining fashion in several venues. See Clark H. Pinnock, ‘A Political Pilgrimage’, Eternity magazine, October, 1984, pp. 26–29 and an essay in Ronald B. Nash’s symposium on Liberation Theology (Milford: Mott Media, 1984), 260 pages.

¹¹ Phillips and Geivett, in Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World, pp. 133–139.

¹² W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publ., 1969), p. 703.

¹³ Gerald R. McDermott, Can Evangelicals Learn From World Religions: Jesus, Revelation and Religious Traditions (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000), pp. 207, 208.

¹⁴ I have been impressed by materials furnished by Peter Marshall and David Manuel in their book, The Light and the Glory (Old Tappan: Fleming Revell, 1977). Chapter one ‘Christ Bearers’ pp. 29–48 and page 17. They later document the horrible atrocities against the Indians of the New World but give full credit to the well-known zeal of Roman Catholic missionaries to evangelize the Indians and their relative success. Death Comes to the Archbishop, a novel by Willa Cather, illustrates the movement. What is not so well known is that their missions extended along the coast of the Gulf eastward into what is now our Deep South.

¹⁵ I am unable at the moment to document this except to refer to Perry Miller’s volume Errand Into the Wilderness (Cambridge: Harvard U. Press, 1956). A missionary motive was not primary in the Puritan Plantation in New England, but it was cited as a reason for the colonizing of the New World. Very early, consistent effort was made to evangelize neighboring Indians, with some success. There were Indian members of the colony churches and separate Indian churches and communities of Indians. One of these proved decisive in assisting the colonists to survive the massacres of whites in King Philip’s War. Marshall and Manuel in The Light and the Glory describe and document this assertion. Jonathan Edwards, for example, for an interval in his career served as resident missionary pastor of a small congregation of Indians and his daughter’s fiancé, David Brainerd, served valiantly in an effort to evangelize Indians of New Jersey, a frontier territory of the time.

¹⁶ See Paul Althaus, The Theology of Martin Luther, trans. R. C. Schultz (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1966), pp. 143, 144.

¹⁷ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics i (St. Louis: Concordia Publ., 1950–1957), pp. 125–127; Peiper, Christian Dogmatics iii, pp. 247, 248.

¹⁸ Westminster Shorter Catechism in Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. together with The Larger Catechism and The Shorter Catechism (Richmond: John Knox Press, 1861, 1944), chap. x ‘of the Gospel’, para. iv.

¹⁹ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii, p. 706.

²⁰ ibid., p. 708.

²¹ ibid., p. 707.

²² A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology (1860, repr. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1957), pp. 467, 468.

- ²³ Shedd, Dogmatic Theology ii, pp. 710, 711.
- ²⁴ Calvin, Commentaries on the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, trans. John Owen (Edinburgh, 1849), pp. 398, 399.
- ²⁵ Sir Norman Anderson, Christianity and World Religions (Leicester: InterVarsity, 1980), chap. 5.
- ²⁶ Robert E. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998), pp. 1067–1093.
- ²⁷ Irenaeus, Against Heresies ii, 28; iii. 1–5.
- ²⁸ Klaas Runia, ‘Why Christianity of All Religions?’ Evangelical Review of Theology, vol. 22, no. 3 (July 1998), p. 256.
- ²⁹ ibid., p. 256.
- ³⁰ ibid., pp. 257–260.
- ³¹ ibid., p. 262.
- ³² ibid., pp. 262, 263.
- ³³ Bruce Nichols, writing in the same issue of Evangelical Review of Theology, vol. 22, no. 3 (July 1988), ‘Is Jesus the Only Way to God?’, p. 242, cites what he thinks may have been such a case in the story of Bilquis Sheikta, a high-born Muslim and influential lady of Pakistan. For it remains true for all times and all people: ‘There is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which they must be saved.’ (Runia, in Evangelical Review of Theology, vol. 22, no. 3), p. 263.
- ³⁴ B. B. Warfield, ‘False Religions and the True’ in Biblical and Theological Studies (Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1952), p. 519.
- ³⁵ Harold A. Netland, Dissonant Voices: Religious Pluralism and the Question of Truth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991), p. 36.
- ³⁶ ibid., p. 111.
- ³⁷ ibid.
- ³⁸ Friederich Schleiermacher, On Religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers, as cited by Harold O. J. Brown in Heresies (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984, repr. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 2000), p. 395.
- ³⁹ Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation, vol. i (New York:

Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation vol. 1 (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1941, 1961).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (791). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

PART 6

ECCLESIOLOGY

Church Local and Universal

1

The Critical Importance of the Doctrine of the Church

The purpose of this opening chapter is to convince the reader of two propositions: (1) the church is of supreme importance to God; and (2) the doctrine of the church is of critical importance to a correct understanding of Christianity, to a healthy spiritual life of every believer and to the propagation of Christianity.

I. The Importance of the Church to God

Paul's Vigorous Assertions

1. The preeminence of the church in God's scheme of things could hardly be stated more vigorously than in several texts from the Epistle to the Ephesians. With moving rhetorical power Paul says in the closing verses of chapter 1 that God (the Father) has designated Christ as Lord of all creation 'and appointed him to be head over everything for the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills everything in every way' (Eph. 1:22, 23 niv).

Later he goes on to say that though God's justice and wisdom in providence may have been 'hidden for ages in God who created all things,' it is His purpose that 'through the church the manifold wisdom of God might now be made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places' (Eph. 3:9, 10 rsv).

Further on, he says, the church was from eternity so cherished by the Son that He 'loved the church and gave himself up for her' (Eph. 5:25 niv). As for the Holy Spirit's interest in the church, Paul explains that members of the church are 'sealed with the promised Holy Spirit' (Eph. 1:13), and that by virtue of Christ's reconciliation through that Spirit, we all have 'access ... to the Father' (2:18), and that the Spirit is the spiritual presence in us that brings forth 'fruit ... in all that is good and right and true' (5:9). In this way Paul's stately diction gives transcendent importance to the church.

As a supervisor of pastors Paul declared 'the church of the living God' to be nothing less than 'the household of God' and the 'pillar and buttress of truth' (1 Tim. 3:15). In such cases, if theologies are interested in 'truth,' they hardly dare ignore the importance of the church in God's system of theology.

2. At the present moment 'the assembly of the firstborn' has a prominent place in heaven where millions of her members dwell in 'the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem' with 'angels,' 'God, the judge of all,' and 'the spirits of the righteous made perfect [O.T. saints?]' (see Heb 12:22–

24). The church therefore, even in heaven, has a special place ‘near to the heart of God’ (to borrow a line from a hymn).

These texts become important to several aspects of the doctrine of the church. For they serve to emphasize the importance of the church, as such, to God and His plan of things. They also cause us to realize how important it is to understand what the church is, our place in it, as well as our responsibilities and privileges.

3. There are many other hints that the church is far more important among the facts of our faith and the teachings of biblical religion than unreflective readers of the Bible might suppose. Some of these facts are outstanding, suggesting why ‘church’ as doctrine receives a special focus in the scheme of divine truths. The following are only selections out of the many.

The church has a very large place in the kingdom of Christ (of God, of heaven) as it develops from the Gospels through the Epistles and the Apocalypse. In that connection Paul claims that revelation of the peculiar nature of the church was a climax of special revelation, first made known fully to him and then to other Apostles (Eph. 3:1–5), and that the building of a church was the reason why Jesus chose and trained Apostles (Eph. 2:19–22). The church was a matter of growing revelation in the New Testament, which Jesus with great emotion first announced to Peter at Caesarea Philippi and enforced with some of the strongest language in the Bible (Matt. 16:18–20). The church of God is said to be ‘our mother’ (Gal. 4:26), giving biblical ground to the ancient dictum that ‘outside the church there is no salvation.’ In the last book of the Bible the risen, glorified Christ is seen holding the ‘angels’ of representative churches in His hands (a place of special care) and Himself standing in the midst of the ‘candlesticks’ of representative churches, advising, correcting, judging, warning and cheering them on to victory (Rev. 1–3).

4. These are impressive features of the church, thrilling to contemplate. Cantatas and oratorios have been composed on these themes to charm Christian audiences and capture the devotion of musicians ‘at church.’ Much more sobering are two further pieces of the picture to engage time, talent and even life itself. First, the present age between Pentecost and Second Advent is preeminently, in God’s stewardship of the fullness of the ages of history, the period of world evangelism (Matt. 16:13–20; Eph. 1:10–13). It is to be a time of proclaiming redemption to every kindred, tongue, tribe and nation at great cost to Christians (that is, the church in the world) of every generation (Rev. 5:9–14, 21, 22). It is the time first indicated by Jesus’ strong language: ‘I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it’ (Matt. 16:18). Second, the church itself is the vehicle of evangelism, nurture and instruction by which the program of church-building is to take place. Local churches within the great church are the scene of this amazingly varied action whereby the church simply by being the church carries out God’s redemptive providence for the present age.

This theological importance of the church is given powerful artistic statement in Samuel Stone’s famous hymn lines:

The church’s one foundation

Is Jesus Christ her Lord;

She is His new creation

By water and the word:

From heaven He came and sought her

To be His holy bride;

With His own blood He bought her,

And for her life He died.

II. The Importance of the Doctrine of the Church

The doctrine of the church (ecclesiology) is also vigorously expressed and expounded in the New Testament. Definition of the nature of the church as found in the Bible must await later treatment. For the moment let us assume there is such a thing and that we all have a provisional, working understanding of what the church is.

1. The church has allegedly failed. The Saturday editions of the daily papers lament the failures of 'the church' with wearying regularity. 'The church' fails to be relevant to people's needs and lacks force in social action, they say in a thousand ways. Frequently some anti-religious critic from without the church or some spokesman within it will lay all the world's present problems with race, poverty, crime and moral decline at the door of the church. Some in the religious press have charged that the church has departed from biblical integrity as though there really was no authentic church in the world today.

Of course, if the church which is 'failing' is the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of the ancient creeds and of the sublime perorations of Paul's letter to the Ephesians (Eph. 1:18–23; 2:18–22), then the heavens have come unstuck!

Some of the harshest judgments against the twentieth-century church arose in precisely those quarters from which one might least expect severe criticism. But when the World Council of Churches was only five years on its way, Emil Brunner, in a sincere effort to give some expert advice to the new pilots of the Good Ship Oikoumenē (World Council of Churches, organized in 1948 [leaders adopted the ancient sail-ship as a symbol of the World Church]), wrote in 1953:

It is a ... fact that dogmatists and church leaders often pay but small attention to the results of New Testament research, and are only too ready to bridge the gulf between then and now by a handy formula such as that of development or by appealing to the distinction between the visible and the invisible church, and thus give a false solution to this grave and distressing problem. But while many theologians and church leaders are able to quieten their consciences by such formulae, others are so much the more painfully aware of the disparity between the Christian fellowship of the apostolic age and our own 'churches' and cannot escape the impression that there may perhaps be something wrong with what we now call the church.¹

From the Roman Catholic direction, Hans Küng, a very gifted writer and theologian, wrote several books in protest against what he conceived to be the nearly utter lack of integrity of his own church as the biblical church of Christ. If space allowed, one could easily introduce many even more severe indictments of the empirical, 'visible' church from Roman Catholic authors who, quite out of step with Roman Catholic history, of late have turned critical of their own organized communion.

2. Neglect and evasion of what seem to be the church's own organs of service, evangelism and instruction by some of its most active members calls for renewed thinking about this subject. The churches have normal channels for gathering and nurturing their youth, yet strong organizations of evangelical aegis not infrequently attract our youth away from 'church-sponsored' programs into other programs apparently authorized quite independently of what we understand to be churches. Missionary work, in homelands and foreign countries, revival and renewal movements, relief organizations, and publishing of Christian literature are fields where these organizations proliferate. We have even borrowed the Greek preposition para (meaning 'extra,' 'beside') to invent 'parachurch' as a name for them. Are these parachurch entities competitors with the church? Are they arms of the church which like the church sometimes suffer from misdirection? Are they symptoms of malfunction of organized churches, perhaps even instruments of renewal?

3. A long period of neglect by American Christians renders the doctrine of the church now acutely in need of attention. Dr J. Oliver Buswell wrote as long ago as 1963:

I must testify that in my opinion American fundamentalism for three quarters of a century, with its faithful emphasis on individual regeneration and purity of evangelical doctrine, has neglected the doctrine of the church. This has been true in two ways. The doctrine of the purity of the visible church has been neglected.... Secondly, we have neglected the doctrine of the unity and fellowship of believers.²

Alfred Kuen (1971) observed similarly:

The Christian of the first century would never have conceived of his Christian life other than in communion with his brothers and sisters in the church.... The Robinson Crusoe Christian does not exist. During the first centuries of Christianity the church became progressively so important that one finally thought 'Outside the church—no salvation.' The Catholic overvaluation of the church was followed by the Protestant overemphasis of individual salvation. The church has little place in Protestant theological research from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century.³

Agreed! Not only so, in ignorance of what the church of Christ is (for Christ is still her head, the Holy Ghost her life, the Word of God her food and saints her members), evangelical Christianity in general has not infrequently rejected, wounded and shunned her true mother, the church,⁴ in shameful ways. She is, however, still her mother. Those who remember the anti-churchism that frequently accompanied the revolts against apostasy (some real, some only alleged) in the denominations a few decades ago will know whereof we speak.

4. There is a far more important reason, in no wise growing out of the accidents of history, why the doctrine of the church has critical importance, if not centrality, in the structure of Christian theology. I mean to say that it is in the empirical body of believers (call it organism, organization or institution) that Christianity (and theology) becomes manifest in concrete visible forms. The view which a group of believing Christians holds of the nature of the church will mightily affect the way in which its forms develop, i.e. the manner in which Christians organize themselves, the way they evangelize, their co-operation (or lack of the same) with other groups of believers with similar beliefs (or of different beliefs) and the kind of rites they observe. One's ecclesiology, of course, does not exist apart from and unqualified by the rest of one's theological schema, Christology, for example—for some go so far as to say the church as 'body of Christ' is a continuation of the incarnation. Yet, in a way unique among doctrines, and by whatever path ecclesiology develops, the doctrine of the church is the doctrine which above all others forces Christianity out in the open in social and structural forms which the world can see and which other Christians can see.

Let us cite, willy-nilly, some striking examples. The Roman Catholic Church holds that the visible church through the pope, Christ's vicar, and by means of apostolic succession from Him through Peter, archbishops, bishops, local clergy, and similar, is the embodiment of Christ on earth. This has imparted a sanctity to the empirical organization which through the centuries has been both the tactical competitive strength of Romanism and the weakness which has sometimes made it seem to some Christians 'the mother of harlots.' If the organized church is Christ Himself, then certainly the church can do no wrong.

Further, ritual, ceremonies and calendar events (saint's days, Marian years and the like) within the organized body have a sanctity that no true Protestant would think of ascribing to services and calendar of observances in his own 'church.' Hence liturgy becomes all-important in public worship. Things are done to be seen; for this, appropriate setting is to be provided—hence the magnificence of traditional Roman Catholic Church architecture and the grandeur of the ritual, the awe in the pious heart when the priest elevates the 'host' while the waiting congregation bow in reverent worship of Christ's very body and blood in the visible sacrament.

Now all this may seem like a sorry joke at best or systematic blasphemy at worst to the sons and daughters of the Reformation—but there can be no doubt about this: Roman ideas about the nature of the church, its ministry and its ordinances have totally affected its visible forms: architecture, furniture, ritual and worship. Consider these words of Karl Adam:

If I should ask a dying Christian uttering his last prayer, 'Why do you believe in Christ?' it may well be that his eyes will come to rest upon the priest, who is the witness of Christ most near to him. And the priest will refer to his bishop, and the bishop to the successio apostolica, the long series of episcopal witnesses of faith leading back to Peter and John. At the end of the succession stands Peter, with the disciples. In their midst stands Jesus himself. Thus across space and time the successio apostolica has brought me into the midst of the community of disciples and face to face with the Lord. My situation, in my heart and towards Christ, is now the same as the Apostles. By means of the succession of bishops, I have reached the same plane as the Apostles. This is not a question of any subjective experience or personal whim, but the concrete, visible reality of Christ's witnesses, from Peter down to the priest standing at the Christian's death-bed. The objective reality of the whole church [emphasis added] embraces me. For the sick man offers his dying prayer as a member of Christ's body, not in lonely isolation. The entire strength—vast, objective, holy—of all the members of Christ all over the earth is praying with him, through him. The entire Ecclesia orans, embracing earth and heaven, here and beyond, comes to meet me in the dying man's prayer. His act of faith is no more difficult than St. Peter's at Caesarea Philippi. For through the all-embracing Catholic church he has attained the same historical and religious feeling for Christ as Peter had for his divine master. The distances of time and space do not exist for him. Like Peter, he stands before Christ and hears his question: 'But who do you say I am?' The reply is not denied him; no one can take it from him. Thus far the Christian's act of faith is something completely personal. But that he should be in position to make this act of faith, that he should be objectively and subjectively directed toward the mystery, this he has from the testimony of the church alone [emphasis added].⁵

This lengthy quotation, from one of the most effective spokesmen for Roman Catholicism of the twentieth century, placed the ecclesiology of the church of Rome in true (and admittedly grand) perspective.

At the opposite pole, Baptist ecclesiology regards a local church as 'that smaller company of regenerate persons who in any given community, unite themselves together in accordance with Christ's laws....'⁶ Note that in this definition of the esse of the church, regenerate church membership and obedience to Christ's laws are included. On this basis some Baptists have argued that the only true churches in the world are Baptist churches and others similarly constituted of regenerated persons obeying Christ's laws, specifically, adult believer's immersion and congregational polity. To call a Presbyterian local group a 'church,' then, is not a matter of accuracy but only of 'courtesy.'⁷ Further, since the ordinance of the Lord's Supper is held to belong to the local church, unimmersed people, who by definition of the church cannot be church members, are excluded, hence many Baptist churches practice 'close' communion. It is partly out of a background such as this that Southern Baptists have persisted in staying out of ecumenical and other inter-church organizations. They are not unfriendly, nor do most Baptists deny the catholicity of the church.⁸ Rather they feel an essential principle of ecclesiology is at stake.

5. The practical importance of ecclesiology also shows up in questions about interdenominational co-operation. The following example cites Lutheran convictions, but strict Baptist views might illustrate the same problem.

The late Dr Walter Maier—of the world-wide radio broadcast of the Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod known as 'The Lutheran Hour'—was invited to address an interdenominational Bible conference gathering. It was to be at the grounds of a famous Bible conference in a tabernacle dedicated to the memory of a famous popular evangelist. One could hardly imagine a more 'unchurchly' setting from Dr Maier's point of view—interdenominational, fundamentalist sponsorship, popular gospel music, a Baptist moderator, a Presbyterian organist and so on. Now, as Philip Schaff once wrote, the Missouri Synod Lutherans are the most Lutheran Lutherans in all the world. At the time of this incident Dr Maier was certainly their best-known spokesman, heard the world around through 'The Lutheran Hour' broadcast. As the story was told, Dr Maier expressed interest in speaking but was unable to address the conference on account of a Missouri Synod, Lutheran Church view of inter-church co-operation. According to this view there are orthodox church bodies and heterodox ones. Brotherly relations should be maintained only with orthodox bodies.

Orthodoxy is pure Scripture doctrine, which in view of the perspicuity of the Bible, can be known certainly. Recently Missouri Synod Lutheran leaders place more emphasis on the Reformers' distinction between fundamentals and non-fundamentals and find thereby inter-church co-operation easier to accept. At any rate, Dr Maier did address the conference after a Lutheran pastor was secured to preside at the meeting and present the speaker, i.e. when, in effect, the meeting became a Lutheran gathering with those in general doctrinal unity performing all essential functions of a church meeting except the listening.

The Missouri Synod view is set forth by Dr Francis Pieper, a leading doctrinal authority, as follows:

Congregations and church bodies must be divided into two classes according to their doctrine.

It is God's will and command that in His church His Word be preached and believed in purity and truth, without adulteration. In God's church nobody should utter his own, but only God's Word (1 Peter 4:11). Chaff and wheat do not belong together. All 'teaching otherwise' is strictly forbidden. 1 Timothy 1:3: 'As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine.' It is important to point out again and again that in all Scripture there is not a single text permitting a teacher to deviate from the Word of God or granting a child of God license to fraternize with a teacher who deviates from the Word of God....

The distinction between orthodox and heterodox bodies and congregations is based on this divine order. A congregation or church body which abides by God's order, in which therefore God's Word is taught in its purity and the Sacraments administered according to the divine institution, is properly called an orthodox church.... But a congregation or church body which, in spite of the divine order, tolerates false doctrine in its midst is properly called a heterodox church.... All children of God should be earnestly concerned to see how real and serious this difference between the church bodies is, because indifference as to the Christian doctrine is rampant today among professed Christians.⁹

Again, these Christians take their position on co-operation or non-co-operation on an ecclesiological principle. These facts demonstrate that lack of love and understanding are not really the causes of non-co-operation at all. It is in doctrine, especially in ecclesiology, that the obstacles to visible church unity arise.

Still another enlightening instance is the group of Christians known as Plymouth Brethren. They lay great emphasis on the spiritual nature of the church and insist consistently on the wholly non-sacerdotal character of church offices. It is fair to say it is basic to their ecclesiology that 'the church is an exclusively spiritual body, destitute of all formal organization, and bound together only by the mutual relation of each believer to his indwelling Lord.... Those believers who chance to gather at a particular place, or to live at a particular time constitute the church of that place or time.'¹⁰ This view, similar to that of orthodox Quakers, though not carried out with Quaker consistency, has produced among the Brethren a distinct, though elusive visible shape. As oppressing officials in Catholic Spain used to find to their embarrassment, and more recently communist police in many countries, it is hard to deal with a ‘church’ that has no edifice at all, employs no clergy, never even receives a public offering of money, and which may meet in one part of town on the first Sunday morning in August, in another on the second Sunday. This is really an ‘invisible church’!

These examples (and they could be greatly extended) are sufficient to demonstrate that we cannot be judged in error when we assert ecclesiology is of unique importance because doctrinal commitments here determine in a large measure the visible shape that Christianity will assume among those Christian believers with whom those views prevail.

6. Another facet of ecclesiology, related to the immediately foregoing, one not as widely recognized, is the effect ecclesiology wields on the practice of evangelism and Christian mission.

Kenneth Scott Latourette¹¹ points out that as early as the fourth quarter of the second century the case for apostolic succession of bishops and the theory of the church later espoused officially by the Roman Church was forcefully spelled out by one of Christendom’s most able spokesmen, Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons.¹² Even earlier the clergy-laity distinction developed and other features of the naive view that the organized hierarchy is the church per se began to develop.¹³ The bishop speaks for the church because he is the church¹⁴ and can therefore open and shut its doors of entrance. How did (and does) this affect missionary work and evangelization of pagans? Let the same author tell the story.

The precise course of the conversion of Armenia has been hopelessly beclouded by legend. The great missionary was one Gregory, to whom the designation Illuminator was added because of his successful labours. Gregory seems to have been of the Armenian aristocracy and to have become a Christian while in Caesarea in Cappadocia, a region in which Christianity early made marked progress. Returning to Armenia and seeking to propagate his new faith, Gregory encountered persecution. Then he won the king, Tradt, Tirdat or Tiridates by name. Why the king became a Christian we can only conjecture, but with the consent of his nobles he supported Gregory. The compliant population rapidly moved over to the new faith. Many of the shrines of the pre-Christian paganism were transferred, together with their endowments, to the service of Christianity, and numbers of pagan priests or their sons passed over into the body of Christian clergy. Some were made bishops. Gregory, obtaining episcopal consecration at Caesarea, became the head of the Armenian church and was followed in the post by his lineal descendants.¹⁵

Now granting that this is an extreme case, straining even the episcopal authority papal ecclesiology later associated with Roman Christianity, this is not out of keeping with the kind of approach employed many times later by the Roman Church—including missions to the Indians in the Americas. Richard Fletcher, an historian of the University of York in England, traces in detail how the Saxons and others of continental Europe were ‘evangelized’ by military force in the age of Charlemagne.¹⁶ Try to imagine how different the story of evangelism in Armenia would have been if Gregory had derived all his theology, except ecclesiology, at Our Lady of the Pines Seminary but had studied his ecclesiology at Southern Baptist Theological seminary—voluntary association, regenerate membership, spiritual unity, believer’s baptism and all the rest. To think about the difference is to close the argument.

7. The bearing of ecclesiology on practice is quite as readily apparent, upon reflection, in efforts toward union of denominations—in the ecumenist terminology of our time, ‘Christian unity’ or ‘Christian community.’ This has long been recognized by leaders within the ecumenical movement—to their consternation and despair. The painful awareness of the problem there stimulated the production of a veritable library of books and articles among the ecumenically minded theologians. This stimulated others in the same direction. In fact, this forced wedding of ecclesiology with ecumenics more than anything else has made it necessary that at least some theologians of every Christian denomination and persuasion devote ‘primetime’ to the topic of the church. What is the church? What is the nature of her ministry and her ordinances?

Throughout Christian history people of varying beliefs about many aspects of doctrine have managed somehow to ‘stay together.’ But what people think about the church shapes what people do as churches. So not only mutual understanding but agreement as well must be achieved in ecclesiology or else on some of the most important levels of church life Christians of varying views must continue to function separately. It simply will not do to agree to disagree and then move into the same house.

To take only one aspect of the problem, consider the church’s ministry and its relation to the essence of the church. The Roman Church finds the esse of the church in Christ via the apostolic succession and thereby necessarily through the pope, as we have already seen. The Anglican theologian usually finds it by way of apostolic succession, but through the episcopate (bishops).

The church has invisible unity in the Holy Spirit, as E. L. Mascall once wrote. The visible organ of this unity, said Mascall, is the Universal Episcopate whereby all bishops are apostles. This body of apostles = bishops is composed of living bishops on earth and those deceased in heaven, never losing a member by death!

This seems so strange to most Protestants that it is not always accepted, even by some Episcopalians. Yet let this representative, competent Anglican speak:

It would be ... surprising if there were no visible organ by which the church’s unity is expressed and maintained.... Such an organ is, I would suggest, to be found in the Apostolate, instituted by Christ in the Twelve and expanded through the centuries into the universal Episcopate. It is, I think, noteworthy that the patristic tradition lays primary stress upon the Episcopate as the link between the local and the universal church...¹⁷

I would maintain, then, that as a visible reality in the historic order, the church’s unity is established in our Lord’s institution of the Apostolate, which is continued in the universal Episcopate, the bishop is the link between the local and the universal church... The diocese, gathered around its bishop, is thus not merely a part of the church of God, but it is its full manifestation in a particular place. Like the cell in a living organism, it is a coherent organic entity, yet it lives only because it coheres in the whole body. Like the sacramental Body of Christ in the Eucharist, the mystical Body of Christ which is the church is not divided into portions of its extension in space and time; it is tota in toto, et tota in aliqua parte [all in all and all in the various parts].¹⁸

Contrast this with a Baptist view of the ministry wherein the ‘bishop’ is no different from an ‘elder’ and both are merely designations of simple ‘ministers’ chosen by the congregation. The Presbyterian minister, while distinguished from a lay elder, is not thought to be a sacerdotal person in whom any mystical bond of church unity exists.

Thus, so far from finding universal Christian unity in the ministry, the church’s spiritual unity promises to remain ‘invisible’ for a long time! Churches at the present time cannot even consistently recognize one another’s ministry!

Baptism (whether adult, infant, sprinkling, pouring, immersion, etc., and whether conveying regeneration, accompanying regeneration or merely symbolizing it), the Lord’s Supper with the theories of Christ’s presence, and other problems of church practice and policy are a hornet’s nest of painful insects aboard the Good Ship oikoumenē.

Thus the time has come when study of the church is thrust upon us. There are those in certain denominations which have inner differences (or indifferences) on these issues who will not wish to go along on this tour of investigation. A modus operandi has developed: ‘Let well-enough alone!’ These practical churchmen are not entirely wrong. As long as no plain command of Christ is being disobeyed we can live and let live—together. On the other hand if our quest should lead us to demonstrable truth, truth has a way of seizing pious hearts and welding them together in spite of past sentiments. This kind of unity will be far more deep and steady than any program based on mere compromise.

8. There has been no time in the history of the last 1,500 years, when the community of believers which we call the church has been more critically important to mankind. The breakdown of the natural communal life of people around the whole world has ripped mankind out of the commonality of existence among other men with whom and to whom they counted for something, and has brusquely dropped them in rude and rushing crowds where they count for nothing.

One phase of the breakdown has been the dissolution of the ties which bound men and women to the natural communities of family, village, or working group, to which they had belonged.... Civilization has witnessed a sort of atomizing process.... [A man] becomes a sort of replaceable unit in the social machine. His nearest neighbors may not even know his name. He is free to move from place to place, from job to job, from acquaintance to acquaintance, and—if he has attained a high degree of emancipation—from wife to wife. He is in every context a more and more anonymous and replaceable part, the perfect incarnation of the rationalist conception of man. Wherever civilization has spread in the past one hundred years it has carried this atomizing process with it. Its characteristic product in Calcutta, Shanghai, or Johannesburg is the modern city into which myriads of human beings, loosened from their old ties in village or tribe or caste, like grains of sand fretted by water from an ancient block of sandstone, are churned in the whirlpool of the city.¹⁹

This has been true on all social and economic levels. There are few Americans today who know much about a permanent and stable community wherein one grows up and lives out his earthly existence among aunts and uncles, grandparents, cousins, and school-day friends and then is buried in the family plot in the community cemetery. For most of us outside very old rural areas this is something we know about only because our parents or grandparents have told us about it or something we have read about in novels and history books. ‘Village’ life is just about gone in America. In fact, in the western states the very word ‘village’ is not used by natives except as a quaint, affected name for places somewhere else. In the East, as a kind of fossil word, it is used without affectation, though there are not very many true villages there either, just joints and clefts in the seaboard megalopolis.

In such a situation it is natural that people should long for some sort of real community, for one cannot be human without it. It is especially natural that Christians should reach out after that part of Christian doctrine which speaks of the true, God-given community, the church of Jesus Christ.

All of modern, civilized life—urban, suburban and rural—has conspired to take us out of any satisfying form of commonality of being and living. The modern type of church has thoughtlessly (albeit learnedly, lovingly, anxiously and professionally) joined in the process of disintegration of human society. This has been accomplished by rationalizing: over-departmentalizing its worship and nurture; over-professionalizing its leaders and clergy; and running people to exhaustion with too many meetings, too many supplements to the Sunday church bulletin, too many ‘opportunities’ and ‘counseling’ them to death. This is presently being noticed and criticized by discerning critics whom we shall have occasion to notice later in this section.

Modern life has relentlessly attacked true social community at every level except the economic. Here we seem to be tied together in a growing, world-wide conjugal complex that threatens to crush the very soul out of human existence. Later pages of this book will take further note of this unhappy development.

Though decades have passed since the slogan was coined by ecumenists, it is still true that ‘Now is the time for the church to be the church.’ But what is the church? That is one of the chief questions this section of this volume seeks to answer.

A comment by Nathan Hatch of Notre Dame University gives this chapter real moral relevance. He raised the question, ‘Do evangelical concepts of leadership and authority derive from the church or from the market place?’ He answers:

The evangelical movement is amazingly dynamic: entrepreneurial, decentralized, and given to splitting, forming, and reforming....

The tendency is for us to anoint as leaders those who build a mass following in the free religious market. The thorny problem is that these leaders are not necessarily wise churchmen. They are more likely to be those who assume prominent political roles or who build mass special-purpose ministries. To the extent that this is the case, we allow the market to set the terms of church leadership.

The long-term question for evangelicals is what kind of shepherds we will follow, whether we will follow leaders whose interest is the well-being of the church itself, men and women who are theologically savvy, historically informed, and committed to seeing the church prosper in all of its dimensions and for all of its people.²⁰

¹ Emil Brunner The Misunderstanding of the Church (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1953) pp. 5-6

- ² J. Oliver Buswell, A Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1971), Vol. ii, p. 226.
- ³ Alfred Kuen, I Will Build My church (Chicago: Moody Press, 1971), p. 10.
- ⁴ ‘But the Jerusalem above is free, and she is our mother’ (Gal 4:26).
- ⁵ Karl Adam, The Christ of Faith (New York: Mentor Omega Books, 1962), p. 28.
- ⁶ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1907), p. 890.
- ⁷ ibid., p. 891.
- ⁸ A minority of Baptists deny the existence of the Universal church, e.g. H. E. Dana, The Christian Ecclesia and B. H. Carroll, Ecclesia—The Church.
- ⁹ Francis Pieper, Christian Dogmatics (St Louis: Concordia, 1953), Vol. III, p. 422.
- ¹⁰ A. H. Strong, op. cit., p. 895.
- ¹¹ Kenneth Scott Latourette produced more than 300 articles and about thirty books. The best known are the seven volumes of A History of the Expansion of Christianity (1937–1945) and A History of Christianity, 1,515 pages in first edition (1953). He was a Baptist of moderately conservative theological persuasion.
- ¹² Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of Christianity (New York: Harper & Bros., 1953), p. 131.
- ¹³ ibid., pp. 131–133.
- ¹⁴ ibid., pp. 182–185.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 79.
- ¹⁶ Richard Fletcher, The Barbarian Conversion: From Paganism to Christianity (New York: Henry Holt & Co., 1998, chap. 7, ‘Campaigning Sceptres, the Frankish Drive to the East,’ pp. 193–227).
- ¹⁷ E. L. Mascall, Corpus Christi (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1953, 1957), p. 13.
- ¹⁸ ibid., pp. 19, 20.
- ¹⁹ Leslie Newbigin, The Household of God (New York: Friendship Press, 1964), pp. 3, 4.
- ²⁰ Nathan O. Hatch, Wheaton College Alumni Magazine (Summer, 1999), pp. 10, 11.

2

Defining Ecclesiology

I. Church Is a Doctrine

The historic creeds of the undivided ancient church, accepted by almost all Christians to the present hour, demonstrate that there is a common, consensual core of beliefs among all Christians, always and everywhere. One of the earliest references to doctrinal consensus (by Cyprian of Carthage, ad 250) says, ‘I believe in the forgiveness of sins, and eternal life through the holy church.’¹ The ‘Apostles’ Creed’ adds ‘catholic’ to the formula and the ‘Nicene Creed’ (325, 381) adds ‘one,’ viz.: ‘one holy, catholic and apostolic church.’² Church, therefore, is as much a bona fide doctrine of historic Christianity as the doctrine of the holy Trinity or the incarnation.

II. Marks of the Church

Not every group of believers is aware of this early and enduring consensus, but wherever Christians do become aware they will likely agree there is a church of which they are a part and that there is only one church, in some important sense: holy, as distinct from the world; catholic, as including true believers everywhere of every age from the apostles onward; and apostolic, in the sense of founded by apostles and as faithfully teaching and living out apostolic doctrines. Much more than this is of course affirmed and with varying emphasis and understandings.

These ‘notes’ or marks of the church are not empirically derived nor are they immediately observable in local churches. The marks themselves have to be defined rather carefully. We need to be reminded that though revelation gives us much information about the church, she is at least partly under the category of mystery in the Bible (Rom. 16:25; Eph. 1:9; 3:3–9; 5:32). Paul once connects the church with the revealed mystery of the incarnation (1 Tim. 3:14–16). In Revelation 1–3 the churches are seven lamps with Christ in their midst, whose ‘angels’ are in Christ’s right hand (Rev. 1:12, 13, 20).

The church and its marks, however, may be discerned by biblically informed and spiritually sensitive people in thousands of assemblies where believers around the world gather every week. Where there is no unity with Christ and other Christians there is only schism; where no holiness, only sham religion; where no catholic faith, apostasy; where not apostolic, then unscriptural. Lacking any discernable connection with the church of Scripture and history and propagating teachings contrary to apostolic Scripture it cannot be a church of Christ. If any of the marks is obscured or missing the assembly needs reformation (in the sixteenth-century sense of revival and restoration). This is precisely why the leaders of the Reformation at first labored to revive and restore the medieval church to its beginnings in the apostolic ekklēsia. Prevented from that, they set out sadly to find living space in Europe for evangelical churches. The results are well known.

In point of fact, as Emil Brunner correctly states:

There are three classical ‘definitions’ of the church, each of which contains an answer to the question about the basis of the church. The church is the Company of the Elect, the Body of Christ, the Communion of Saints (coetus electorum, corpus Christi, communio sanctorum).³

These of course are Christian ‘definitions,’ though not comprehensive, scientific or sociological definitions. Each implies the church is a peculiar (particular) people different from all others. They are ‘the company of the elect’ because only they (not the entire world) are chosen in Christ and Christ is God’s elect; they are ‘the communion of saints’ because God has declared them so and are a communion even though scattered abroad (as Peter says, 1 Peter 1:1, 2). ‘The body of Christ’ is a metaphor employed particularly by Paul with special reference to its being the functionary of Christ as Savior of mankind. Yet each ‘definition’ (or perhaps only characterization or designation) includes those who have been ‘graduated’ to heaven—and as ‘the company of the elect’ some yet unborn. These concepts have been incorporated into very precious hymns, as in Samuel Stone’s The Church’s One Foundation:

Yet she on earth hath union

With God the three in one

And mystic sweet communion

With those whose rest is won.

Calvin conferred importance on ‘the communion of saints.’ He points out, ‘This clause, though generally omitted by the ancients, ought not to be overlooked, for it very well expresses what the church is’ (emphasis added).⁴

III. Marks Do Not Define the Church As Such

It is a mistake, I think, to suppose that the church may be defined simply by discussing her unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity. What is this church which wherever present possesses those characteristics? The critical questions remain to be answered.

Having said this, is it true that ‘the adjectives “one holy, catholic, apostolic” are terms specific enough to describe the essential nature of the church’?⁵ Hardly. It is a bit like saying of the place where I live, that it is made of bricks, glass, wood and steel without specifying further that it is a house not a barn, a residential structure not a warehouse, and so on. The definition says nothing of how the church is distinct from a club or a mob, or what it is in which the four marks inhere. These four adjectives designate differentia but no major genus.

Perhaps it is better to say these ‘notes’ or ‘properties’ are means by which, whatever the nature of the one society of Christ may be, it may be recognized by these marks. The Roman Catholic Church does not understand the notes (marks, properties) as Protestant evangelicals do, but she has it right as to what they are and what they do: ‘conspicuous characteristics which distinguish it from all other bodies and prove it to be the one society of Jesus Christ.’⁶ They ‘indicate essential features.’⁷ Rome thinks that she alone possesses these features authentically, hence, only as a matter of courtesy, not of fact, calls other Christian groups churches. Such added ‘marks’ or ‘notes’ as invisibility and exercise of discipline came into use as marks by the Reformers of the sixteenth century. Therefore, useful as the notes are in discussing the church, we must have many more categories. This does not mean that a theologian may not arrange further sub loci of ecclesiology under the four notes and proceed with comprehensive treatment as does Thomas Oden.⁸ The Roman Church at the Council of Constance (1414–1418) specifically condemned John Wycliffe’s ‘error’ of saying that the church is an article of faith only if by church is meant the gathering of the elect.⁹

An illustrative example will help to clarify the point that the four notes of unity, holiness, apostolicity and catholicity do not define what the church is. Water is a clear, odorless liquid which freezes at 32 degrees Fahrenheit, vaporizes at 212 degrees Fahrenheit (at sea level) and in a vertical column 32 foot tall equals the weight of earth’s atmosphere. These are the properties of water. A property is ‘any trait or attribute proper to a thing ... any of the principal characteristics of a substance.’¹⁰ Note all of them in the case of water are directly observable to the senses without chemical analysis. Yet by chemical analysis we discover that each water molecule is composed of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen. The compound H₂O is not similar to either hydrogen or oxygen. We might even try to define water by how it may be used—to wash or cook with, to swim in, to navigate the whole earth, to sustain life by drinking it, and similar. An adequate definition of water turns out to be quite a difficult matter, yet any animal or man recognizes it quickly (in pure form) when he drinks it or dips a part of his body in it. Whether we define water by properties or chemical analysis or what it does or can do, defining its identity is no simple matter.

This study from this point onward is entirely in response to that question: What is the church—both what it is and what it ought to be, its esse and its bene esse? We shall consider first the words church and ekklesia—the New Testament Greek word which it invariably translates. Then after introducing several distinct but related ideas, the Kingdom of God and Israel (and metaphors and synonyms), then the two main aspects of the subject, the church universal and the church local, are to be introduced and explained. The treatment then moves on to nine topics related to the church universal: its foundation, establishment, relation to Israel and the kingdom of God, essential nature and the like, unity, gifts, mission, purposes, and destiny. After that the church local will be discussed: its nature, organization and government, offices, ordinances, and worship.¹¹

It was my original plan to treat modern church union (ecumenical) movements but that would have enlarged this volume beyond reasonable size. It was that movement among ‘foreign’ mission fields in the nineteenth century that sparked intense interest in the nature of the church and a growing awareness of the importance of defining and clarifying every aspect of the subject. Soon there were journals wholly dedicated to research and discussion of narrowly defined aspects of the church and countless books, monographs, pamphlets and sermons. A special vocabulary was created to discuss the subject—for which the comprehensive term is ecumenism. Whatever one thinks of it—for good or ill—the ecumenical movement cannot yet be counted out.

IV. The Church Both an Aspect of and a Doctrine of Christianity

The church of Christ is both an aspect of and a doctrine of Christianity. Christianity is sometimes thought to be the same entity as ‘the church.’ A different and better way of looking at the matter is to see Christianity as (1) the culmination of a history of redemption in the life and work of Jesus Christ who was born of a virgin, as the creed says, lived, died, was resurrected and ascended to heaven, and so forth. Christianity is also (2) a system of doctrines by which the Holy Scriptures and its expositors through the centuries interpret that redemptive history. The church is one of those doctrines. The church is also (3) the multitudes of people who have embraced the redemption in history and now live out their faith on earth and in heaven. And it is correct to say the church is (4) a society, the institutional expression of the redemption, the doctrines and of the people. It has a visible aspect which has had an ongoing history that people who are not even part of it, or who even reject it, can recognize at least in part. This study will ignore none of these four features of ‘the church’ but will focus on the second—the church as a doctrine of Christianity.

V. How to Approach Definition and Description of the Church

Depending on presuppositions and goals, one of three different approaches—with modifications and crossovers—may be followed. Every group claiming to be a Christian church (or the Christian church) acknowledges Jesus Christ as founder of the church and that the church of Jesus Christ has some unique, vital connection with Him. Any ‘church’ which is orthodox in any meaningful sense finds in the New Testament its authority for doctrine and practice, but some do not regard the New Testament as the only authority. Some regard their structure as identically continuous with the church of the apostles, some acknowledge themselves as discontinuous and claim only to restore the essential features of the apostolic church.

Let us cite first the Roman Catholic approach. Though I simplify somewhat, the Roman Church claims that its visible organizational structure as such is the church. The esse of the church inheres in the structure. Let J. L. McKenzie, an eminent post-Vatican II Roman theologian, state the matter:

In Roman Catholic belief, the hierarchical structure of the church is the bearer of the sacred power which Jesus Christ committed to that group of his disciples who are called apostles.... Just as no one but Jesus could confer this authority on the apostles, so no one but the apostles could transmit the authority to successors.¹²

McKenzie goes on to point out that this apostolic authority primarily includes the ‘sacred power of the priesthood’ or ‘the power of orders’ to administer the means of saving grace, the sacraments, and secondly, ‘the power to rule’ or ‘jurisdiction.’ As we observed in chapter 1 of this section these powers as thought to be discovered in Scripture, in tradition and traced through history to the present, are essentially the doctrine of the church.

At the opposite end of the scale are ‘Pilgrim church’ theories. They see the ‘visible’ or historic churches of Christendom as discontinuous with the apostolic church. They agree with McKenzie that the Roman aspect of the church began approximately with the conversion of Emperor Constantine but think of the ‘true church’ as a ‘Pilgrim church’ whose written history of faithfulness to apostolic, New Testament origins is largely lost from written documents. Roman (and Eastern Orthodox Christianity as well) are both formally apostate, though Christians were and are present in both.

A passage from a fine book by a convinced ‘Christian Brethren’ author tells in graphic, but not extreme, form how this approach to ecclesiology works.

One day I resolutely put aside all my books, I took my New Testament and there underlined all that concerned the church; then I picked out and classified on cards what I had found. What a joy it was to see roughly outlined and gradually taking shape a living picture of the primitive church ... the church according to the plan of God.¹³

Mr Kuen goes on to acknowledge enlightenment (influence?) from other churchmen and scholarly Christian sources, but insists on the validity and adequacy of what he found by inductive study of the Bible—the primitive apostolic church, still today the true church—though he does not attempt definition.¹⁴

The Roman Church acknowledges an invisible church of the ‘elect’ within the visible church of the hierarchy but both are aspects of the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of which the Roman is the true and only structure, complete with the pope, who is Christ’s vicar on earth. For the Pilgrim church theologian the hierarchy represents the apostate church.

In between these approaches fall the several efforts at definition and restoration of the authentic first-century church as set up by Christ and His Apostles, attempted by Protestant Reformers on the continent and Anglicans and Puritans in Britain.

All the Reformers at first seem to have seen enough of New Testament authenticity in the Roman Church to regard it as still a church and as reformable (i.e. capable of being restored). They brought the ‘Scripture only’ principle to bear on their ideas of the church. And, since a visible church, however rudimentarily structured, involved practice (assembling, preaching, presbyters, baptisms, the Lord’s Supper and much more), they were compelled to decide what was authentically apostolic and what was not. This quickly drew the attention of the Roman hierarchy who then drove the aspirant Reformers out of the medieval church. The Reformers were committed to historic orthodoxy and biblical authority; hence they were driven to weigh what they found in the Roman Church of the time against Scripture and, finding it wanting, they endeavored to construct something authentically apostolic.

As in the whole range of doctrine, the Reformers did not attempt to erase 1,500 years of church history and theology in constructing ecclesiology. They were not able quite to break free from the cloying influence of the state-church notion—or, better stated, the territorial church. They did not cut free from the wholeness of post-Constantinian Christendom wherein there was no room for the Christian ekklēsia as simply a voluntary association. For them baptism in infancy remained the door of entrance both to church and civil commonwealth.

Yet Zwingli and Luther at the beginning, followed shortly by Calvin, all sought to find in the Scriptures a doctrine of the church. Brunner observes,

The [Roman] Catholic doctrine of Baptism ... is unambiguously sacramental; salvation is imparted in an event which makes no personal claim on the man, which works automatically and mechanically, ex opere operato.... it remains a matter of indifference whether it is an infant who is baptized or a man capable of answering the word in faith.... Luther’s new knowledge of the personal character of faith as trust in the grace offered in

Jesus Christ was bound to crack this whole sacramental structure.¹⁵

For present purposes it will not be necessary to report in detail how Luther came to conclusions similar to modern ‘free church’ doctrine of the church but receded from them. Similarly Zwingli found that his own principles of sola scriptura, taken seriously by ‘the radicals,’ i.e. the Anabaptists of Zurich, led to a church of voluntary associates, and the leaders of Zurich were not prepared to break with the territorial (or Constantinian) principle and later joined others in formation of territorial churches throughout Switzerland. This system was already established in Switzerland when Calvin came to Geneva in 1536.

Yet all the Reformers agreed that the pattern of the visible assemblies of the Christian ekklēsia, like all doctrine and practice of Christianity, should be derived from Scripture only. Further, they agreed that historical patterns should be corrected by Scripture. They aimed to judge the ‘fathers’ by the Scriptures, not the other way around.

The rise of the modern ecumenical movement produced a torrent of literature on this subject. We shall attend to some of it later in two chapters on the nature of the local church and of the universal church.

VI. Ecclesiology Addresses the ‘Visible’ Church

The churches as they exist on earth have many flaws. Yet, the New Testament addresses these assemblies as churches—even ‘the churches of Galatia’ which Paul knew to have removed from grace to another gospel (Gal. 1:1–6) and the ‘seven churches’ of the province of Asia, one of which was about to be spewed out of the Lord’s mouth (Rev. 2, 3). The ekklēsia at Ephesus (where Timothy ministered, in Paul’s absence, with other elders and deacons) the Apostle declared to be ‘the house of God.’ This was not because God’s residence is there as it is in the Tabernacle and first temple, but because the ekklēsia assembled is where the Word is preached, where by the foolishness of a preached message God has chosen to save, and where Christian worship takes place, without which true Christian nurture cannot be normal. The visible, professing church is not only ‘the house of God’ but also ‘the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth’ (1 Tim. 3:15 kjv). For this reason believers must not forsake the practice or neglect ‘to meet together’ (Heb. 10:25), where they must also ‘See that you [they] do not refuse him who is speaking’ (Heb. 12:25).

We know very little about ‘the church triumphant’ of the present and future in heaven. Hebrews 12:22–24 says there is an ‘assembly of the firstborn’ in heaven, called ‘Mount Zion and ... the city of the living God’ where also are ‘innumerable angels in festal gathering ... God, the judge of all,’ other ‘spirits of the righteous made perfect’ and ‘Jesus, the mediator.’ The passage furnishes a field day for commentators. What is plain and relevant here is that the bulk of the New Testament is addressed to believers on earth, most of it in their capacity as members of local churches. Further the ‘churches’ and ‘church’ of Matthew 16 and 18, the Acts, and on through Revelation is the church on earth as it exists visibly. There is validity to distinctions between church visible and invisible, but the distinction does not mean the same to every theologian who employs it.

VII. Ecclesiology Is a Big Subject

This church, Galatians 3:20 notwithstanding, is the mother who on earth has mediated motherhood for us all for all our lives from first spiritual awakening to the end of life.

Paul, in a passage (Gal. 4:21–31) where he is speaking somewhat in the oriental mode of undefined but understood metaphor, says: ‘But the Jerusalem above is free, and she is our mother’ (Gal. 4:26). The Roman church thinks the idea of ‘mother church’ refers to the papal edifice. I recommend Calvin’s exposition:

The Jerusalem which is above, or heavenly, is not contained in heaven; nor are we to seek for it out of this world; for the church is spread out over the whole world, and is a ‘stranger and pilgrim on the earth’ (Heb. 11:13). Why then is it said to be from heaven? Because it originates in heavenly grace; for the sons of God are born ... by the power of the Holy Spirit. The heavenly Jerusalem, which derives from heaven, and dwells above by faith (Phil. 3:20; Col. 3:1–4) is the mother of believers. To the church, under God, we owe it that we are ‘born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible’ (1 Peter 1:23), and from her we obtain the milk and food by which we are afterward nourished. Such are the reasons why the church is called the mother of believers. And certainly he who refuses to be a son of the church in vain desires to have God as his Father; for it is only through the instrumentality of the church that we are ‘born of God’ (John 3:19), and brought up through the various stages of childhood and youth, till we arrive at manhood.¹⁶

Calvin has much to say of this in the first chapters of Book IV of the Institutes. It is not without significance that Calvin, who lived at a time when ‘the church’ was as corrupt and divided as it ever has been, devoted 510 pages (Westminster Ed.), roughly one-third of the pages of the Institutes, to ‘the Holy Catholic church’—‘The External Means or Aids By Which God Invites Us Into the Society of Christ and Holds Us Therein.’¹⁷

VIII. Many Sources Go Into an Adequate Ecclesiology

The Bible does not anywhere define the church. Captions such as we have already considered—‘company of the elect,’ ‘communion of saints,’ ‘body of Christ,’ and others such as ‘community of faith’ and ‘household of faith,’ ‘the new Israel,’ some biblical, some not—are only designations. The ekklēsia is introduced by name in the Gospels only in the phrase ‘I will build my church’ (Jesus to Peter, Matt. 16:18) and ‘tell it to the church ... listen ... to the church’ (Matt. 18:17). We may be sure the disciples did not yet understand these predictions, though later they did (John 16:12–14). The next time we hear of ekklēsia is at Acts 2:47 (kjv), where some time following the effusion of the Spirit it is said ‘the Lord added to the church daily.’ The church is, of course, the group of 120 plus about 3,000 (Acts 1:15; 2:41). It was something new, formed supernaturally into a unique entity on the Day of Pentecost. In Matthew 16 and 18 it was a future entity. After Pentecost it was an existing entity. Yet no verse of Scripture tells us specifically what it was and is.

The rest of the New Testament assumes an understanding of the ekklēsia by the readers, yet also by bits and pieces gives information on every aspect of its nature, services, mission, ministry, government and destiny. At all points therefore our studies must begin with Scripture and end with Scripture. Yet no one comes to research the Bible without previous knowledge of and experience in the church—unless one wishes to reject one’s previous Christian life along with one’s mother. So though I must judge what I already know of my mother-church from living in and with her it is not necessary for me to repudiate her. This means simply that my views of the church have been inescapably affected by my experience in the bosom of the church. Further, I am not the first to attempt the daunting task of extracting from the Bible what it has to say about Christ's church. Others have been doing so for centuries. We may not neglect to learn from them. This 'history of exegesis' is how Jaroslav Pelikan rightly identifies tradition. Also, the church for the past century and on to the present has attracted the serious attention of many Christian scholars. Though I am not able to give credit to each from whom I have learned, this book owes a debt to each of them, for ecclesiology has been a topic of special interest to me since an article I wrote on the subject was published many years ago and which article had much to do with my being invited to begin a career as a professor of theology.

Let us 'launch out into the deep.'

- ¹ Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom II (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1966), pp. 20, 55.
- ² ibid., p. 59.
- ³ Emil Brunner, The Christian Doctrine of the Church, Faith, and the Consummation, Dogmatics: Vol. III, trans. D. Cairnes and T. H. L. Parker (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, English Trans. 1962), pp. 22, 23.
- ⁴ John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, IV, trans. F. L. Battler (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960), p. 3.
- ⁵ R. L. Omanson, 'The church,' Evangelical Dictionary of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker), p. 233.
- ⁶ A. J. Schulte, 'church,' The Catholic Encyclopedia, III, p. 758.
- ⁷ The Catechism of 1994, p. 811.
- ⁸ Thomas Oden, 'Life in the Spirit,' Systematic Theology, III (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992, 1996).
- ⁹ The Church Teaches: Documents of the Church in English Translation, ed. by Gerald Van Ackeren (Rockford, IL: TAN Books, 1973), p. 77.
- ¹⁰ Webster's New World Dictionary, 3rd ed.
- ¹¹ In another book I have discussed the relations of the church to civil governments ('church and state'), to society and to civilization, to sects and denominations of Christians. See R. D. Culver, Civil Government, A Biblical View (Edmonton, Alberta, Canada: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology, and Public Policy, 2000).

¹² J. L. McKenzie, The Roman Catholic Church (Garden City, NY: Image Books, 1971), pp. 22, 23.

¹³ A. F. Kuen, I Will Build My Church (Chicago: Moody Press, 1971), p. 12. Mr Kuen, a professor at a State Teachers College in France, was trained in theology at a Plymouth Brethren school in Switzerland.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 11.

¹⁵ Emil Brunner, Dogmatics, III (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1952), p. 52, 55.

¹⁶ Calvin, Commentary on Galatians and Ephesians, trans. W. Pringle (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1854), pp. 140, 141.

Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 volumes

¹⁷ Calvin, Institutes (Westminster Ed. of 1960), pp. 1009–1524.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (808). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

3

The Words ‘Church’ and Ekklēsia

I. The English Word ‘Church’ and Its Meaning

There are probably few members of civilized society today who are unfamiliar with the word ‘church’ or its equivalent in their own language, for ‘church’ is a part of Western civilization, which has now extended its influence almost everywhere. In the language of eastern (Slavic) and northern (Germanic) Europe and of the British Isles the words of common speech for ‘church’ show their relationship to our English word, all being some variation of the K-R-K form with which we of Anglo-Saxon culture are familiar in ‘church’ or its Scottish variant ‘kirk.’ In the Romance languages, however, the word is almost invariably similar to the French ‘eglise,’ usually featuring an initial ‘e’ followed by a ‘c,’ ‘k,’ or ‘g,’ then an ‘i’ followed by some appropriate vowel and finally an ‘s.’ We have a form of it in several adjectives—[ecclesi]astic, [ecclesi]ology, etc. For some, the explanation of these facts may suggest the boredom of seventh grade language class, for others, the romance of an archaeological expedition. In either case, the very heart of the Christian doctrine of the church is involved in the unscrambling of this philological anagram.

Most Christians and their ministers devote small effort to questioning what their church is and even less to the meaning of the word in their own language—to say nothing of the ancient languages of the Bible. ‘Church’ is, after all, a matter of daily experience. ‘I go to church; I am a member of the church; my church is Methodist; our church is located at the corner of First Street at Broadway. Of course I know what church means! It is a big thing in my daily life.’ What will emerge, however, from a minimum of reflection on this hypothetical quotation is that though used four times, ‘church’ means something different in each of the four cases—a meeting, a society, a denomination, a building used for worship. This is just a start.

In this chapter the aim is to clarify the whole theological project by definition and limitation of the goals through clarifying terms. If the terms are not clarified with utmost care the following study will inevitably be conducted in an atmosphere of ambiguity—as indeed is the case in all too much theological discussion. It is this prevalent ‘low visibility’ which calls for the whole effort at a comprehensive statement of the Christian doctrine of the church. Attention will first be directed to the very devious history of the English word. Then, the use of that word in our English Bible must be considered briefly. After that I shall devote more extended attention to the New Testament Greek words underlying the translations and their connection, if any, with Old Testament usages. The impatient or casual may not relish this kind of intellectual excursion, but it is essential in the early stages of this study if any persuasive statement of the Christian doctrine of the church is to be spelled out.

It is an historical question almost wholly within the domain of philological experts. A fairly large number of monographs and research abstracts bearing on the subject has been produced in the last century and more, sparked by the pioneer work in language history by Jacob Grimm.¹ Some of the relevant material will be found summarized in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament.² Of far greater importance, comparatively up-to-date and not likely ever to be superseded, is the article ‘church,’ extending to eleven columns, about 11,000 words total, in The Oxford English Dictionary.³ My discussion at this point is especially indebted to these ‘authorities’—if such a word ever can be used today.

As for the word ‘church’ in Anglo-Saxon (=English) speech, it is as old, at least, as the written language, though varying somewhat in pronunciation and spelling. In fact, the realities for which the word has stood have had a strong formative influence at all stages of the history of the British Isles since shortly after the beginning of the Christian era. The heathen Angles and Saxons possessed the word before they settled in Great Britain because they had become acquainted with the buildings and cultural features of Greek Christian and Latin Christian communities through their travels and raids (see below). Also Christian missions and merchant settlements had provided some acquaintance. All branches of the German and Slavic linguistic groups thus took over the word ‘church.’ As early as the time of the Emperor Carcalla in the third century, the Goths, a Germanic tribe, came into conflict with the Roman Empire in the lower Danube Valley. In the next century, when after the time of Constantine Christians were erecting edifices for worship everywhere in the Empire, the Goths plundered Thrace and Moesia (in the Greek-speaking East), and elsewhere. Meanwhile the Goths were in contact with other German tribes and passed this word church along. So even before they were Christianized, these German tribes had become acquainted with buildings used for Christian worship, in the Greek language called kuriakon doma, the Lord’s House. Kuriakon is an adjective derived from kuriος, Lord, employed in the New Testament only twice, in the phrases ‘the Lord’s supper’ (1 Cor. 11:20) and the ‘Lord’s day’ (Rev. 1:10).

Although this representation of the case has been disputed it can be said that ‘there is now general agreement among scholars in referring it [church] to the Greek word kuriakon, properly an adjective, “of the Lord, dominicum [Latin], dominical” (from kurios, Lord), which occurs from the 3rd century at least, used substantively (supply doma [house], or the like) = “house of the Lord” as a name of the Christian house of worship.’⁴

Nor is this identification based on recent speculation or scholarly guesswork. The article goes on to report that: ‘Of this the earliest cited instances are in the Apostolical Constitutions (II, 59), before 300, the edict of Maximinus (303–13), cited by Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. ix, 10) before 324, the Councils of Ancyra 314 (Canon 15), Neo-Caesarea 314–23 (Canon 5), and Laodicea (Canon 28). Thenceforward it appears to have been in fairly common use in the East: e.g. Constantine named several churches built by him kuriaka [plural] (Eusebius De Laud, Const xvii).’⁵

As will be seen, the New Testament Greek word ekklēsia (assembly, congregation, etc., and translated church) though it never has the sense of building or edifice in the Bible did very early come to be used of buildings for Christian worship, along with basilikon, a common name for important public buildings before Christian times. These words passed into Latin from Greek as ecclesia and basilica.⁶ From the Latin then, which had borrowed ekklēsia from Greek Christian use, spelling it ecclesia, the word passed into the Romance and all Celtic languages. Thus, though English does not use the Greek noun ekklēsia in the sense of ‘building,’ the Celtic dialects of Great Britain in the pre-Anglo-Saxon epoch picked it up and have preserved it: in Old Irish as eclais, Gaelic as eglais, Welsh as eglwys, Cornish as eglos, etc. Thus, from the Roman conquerors of Britain, even before their being Christianized, the native Celts were taught to call a building used for Christian worship an ekklēsia, so to speak, while the Germanic, Angles and Saxons, and likely also the Jutes, Danes and Norwegians, who came later, still as pagans, had learned to call such a building by the word kurikon (abbreviated from kuriakon doma), i.e. ‘church.’

Thus it is that from the standpoint of the informed and perceptive English-speaking Christian who desires to introduce some semblance of verbal consistency in doctrinal discourse, the whole subject of ecclesiology has been made obscure by the very history of our language, whereby a word first properly applied to a building of stone and wood became the common word also for the body of believers who worship there. It is not only ironic but confusing to learn that historically speaking, the English word ‘church’ refers primarily to a building dedicated to Christian worship of God and only secondarily to the people who meet there regularly for such purpose. This has been, is, and shall remain a cause of confusion, embarrassment and not a little injury to the cause of truth. The confusion is as old as the English language and will doubtless persist as long as and wherever English is spoken. Use of the word ‘church’ for pagan temples has even been dignified by its appearance in Tyndale’s Bible Version of 1526–34 at Acts 19:37 (‘neither robbers of churches [i.e. pagan temples], nor yet despisers of your goddess’) and perpetuated until this very day in the Authorized Version.

The English word ‘church’ finds many uses in our culture. It is commonly used as (1) a synonym for a religious denomination or sect—hence the Lutheran church, the Presbyterian church and the like, even though the most rudimentary knowledge of the biblical doctrine of the church renders such use objectionable, to say the least. It is also commonly used for (2) a Christian congregation meeting in some particular place. This sometimes gets very much confused with the previously mentioned use and the one to be mentioned next. For example, an independent congregation in Williams Bay, Wisconsin long known as ‘The Gospel Tabernacle,’ from the wooden building in which it met, almost had a split over a change in name when a move to another building was contemplated.

Another use is (3) of a building where a Christian congregation meets. As seen in the above discussion of etymology, this is the oldest use of the word ‘church’ in the English language. A highly improper, but nevertheless prevalent, further use is (4) to apply the word to any building used for religious purposes, even to mosques, synagogues and pagan temples. A Life magazine article, for example, referred to the Buddhist temples of Bangkok as churches. Sometimes all the Christian congregations in a geographical area, or even in the whole world, are called ‘the church.’ ‘Church’ is also popularly employed for (5) the chief worship service of a Christian congregation, as opposed to auxiliary meetings (as in ‘I attended church last Sunday, but was absent from Sunday School’). Finally, by abstraction (6) Christianity in any or all times may be referred to as ‘the church,’ as in the term ‘church history.’

II. The Word Ekklēsia in the New Testament

As further study will show, there are many words and figures of speech for Christ’s church in the New Testament. Yet the common and special word is ekklēsia, derived from ek, out of, and kaleō, to call. Hence the basic significance of ‘called out’ is derived. How much emphasis should be placed on this etymological meaning is difficult to say. Etymology does support the emphasis Scripture places on the spiritual separateness of the body of believers from the world in which they live. It has suggestive connection with ‘elect’ (Greek eklektos), emphasizing that the church are the chosen, the saved. Decisive information about what the word ekklēsia meant to the authors who wrote the New Testament and the Greek-speaking readers will be found only by examining how they used the word, according to an axiom of linguistics that usage determines meaning.

Before looking at the New Testament usage we should observe that there were at least two pre-Christian associations, and a possible third, which had already been named ekklēsia, long before Jesus and Paul employed the word for a Christian community.

There was, firstly, the Old Testament assembly of Israel, for which the usual Hebrew word is qahal, rendered frequently in the LXX by ekklēsia. Ekklēsia appears about a hundred times in the Greek Old Testament. Almost every time it is a translation of the Hebrew word qahal or the verbal equivalent of it. It is easy to make too much of this fact, interesting though it is. There is no consistent use indicating that every time qahal (= ekklēsia) appears, the same entity is being described. A mob in the streets, the prophets as a group, the elders in session, the leaders of Judah or of Israel gathered together—any gathering of people may be called an ekklēsia in the Greek Old Testament rendering of qahal. This word definitely is not the name for the national or spiritual people of God in the Old Testament. There were as many ‘ekklēsia’ as there were gatherings. In each case the ekklēsia comes into existence on the occasion of gathering and dissolves with the dissolution of that gathering. See such illustrative examples as Deuteronomy 4:10; 9:10; Judges 21:8, and similar. True, sometimes there is reference to the ‘ekklēsia of Israel’ or ‘of the Lord.’ We do not know what Hebrew or Aramaic word Stephen actually used and which by Luke was rendered ekklēsia (church) at Acts 7:38. He is alluding to Deuteronomy 9:10 where it refers to a special assembly, not a continuing social organization rendered ‘day of assembly’ (kjv, asv, rsv, niv).⁷ There is very slim support, however, for the concept of a continuing organ or body known as the ekklēsia in the Greek Old Testament. The one text wherein this word appears in a New Testament quotation of the Old Testament (Heb. 2:12; cf. Ps. 22:23) offers no support at all for the supposition the word ekklēsia may be used theologically to weld the Old Testament people of God into some organic or conceptual union with the New Testament people of God. The question of the connection between Old Testament Israel and New Testament ekklēsia will have to be settled on other grounds. Many recent authors assume but do not demonstrate this connection.

I base these conclusions in part on personal examinations of all the occurrences of ekklēsia in the Septuagint, employing the Concordance to the Septuagint of Hatch and Redpath in searching them out. Those who may wish the judgment of a recognized authority in the area will find my interpretation of the data confirmed by K. L. Schmidt's article Ekklēsia.⁸ Schmidt writes, 'In the LXX ekklēsia is a wholly secular term; it means "assembling," whether in the sense of the act of assembling or of those "assembled".'⁹

Though without special religious content, this word was nevertheless available to Jesus and the Apostles and to the first Christians. Though ekklēsia is sometimes used in the LXX as equivalent to sunagogē (synagogue), by the time of Jesus that word had distinctly Jewish connections which made it unsuitable as a name for the church of Jesus Christ.

In the second place, there was the use of ekklēsia as a name for a secular gathering in the Greek city states. When the citizens of a Greek city gathered, an ekklēsia came into existence. When it was dismissed, except for a vague nominal sense, the ekklēsia dissolved until called into existence again. There is again only one New Testament example of this use—i.e. three occurrences in one passage, Acts 19:32, 39, 41. (In verses 32 and 41 ekklēsia is used of an informal spontaneous community gathering, in verse 39 of a formally convened legal assembly.) I have discussed this somewhat at length elsewhere.¹⁰

Some have suggested that the cultic societies prevalent in the Greco-Roman world of the first century may have been designated by the word, ekklēsia. It has been advocated that this indeed is the immediate precedent for the distinct Christian use of ekklēsia. Yet though advocated by a few of the learned for three-quarters of a century, the view has now no known advocates.¹¹ This is not to say that it may not have been used by one or another of the mystery cults as a name for their meetings, though less likely of the cult itself. Indeed, the idea, 'business meeting,' might be rendered (and was so rendered) ekklēsia by any social group of the ancient Greek-speaking world.

The most valuable gain from this excursion is to make one aware that if we are to discover what the word ekklēsia means for definition of the church we will have to search the New Testament itself. The first-century preachers and missionaries referred to a local body of Christian believers as an ekklēsia. The New Testament documents use the word quite prevalently in the same way. Just why, we likely can never know. But they used many other terms of designation as well. Some attention must be given to all of these in due time.

The word ekklēsia appears 115 times in the New Testament. After the Gospels, which do not use the word except for two occurrences in Matthew (16:18 and 18:17), the word appears in all books except 2 Timothy, Titus, 1 and 2 Peter, 1 and 2 John, and Jude. The idea is present in these books also though the word may be missing. Nevertheless, since the idea is represented by this word an overwhelming number of times our study may not omit ekklēsia. We shall, however, pass over the usual tedious tracing of the word book by book and come immediately to a summary of the findings.

Two types of use of ekklēsia are not significant for our study. As previously noted, our word is used in one passage of the assembly of the citizens of a Greek city (Acts 19:32, 39, 41) and twice of the meetings of the Israelites in Old Testament times as at Hebrews 2:12 (whether in a synagogue type of setting or of some national ‘synod’ is hard to say) where Psalm 22:22 is quoted and at Acts 7:38 where Stephen refers to assembled Israelites as ‘the ekklēsia in the wilderness.’ He clearly is thinking of the assembly at Mount Sinai not of the continuing nation of Israel.

A third use is interesting and relates to the church of Christ but is not related to the essential nature of the church in the New Testament. This is of an event, the local group of believers gathered for worship (or business as the case might be, cf. 1 Cor. 5:4). Occurrences are limited to 1 Corinthians 11:18; 14:19, 34. The New English Bible conveys this sense quite precisely: ‘I am told that when you meet as a congregation you fall into sharply divided groups,’ etc. (11:18); ‘In the congregation I would rather speak five intelligible words,’ etc. (14:19); ‘As in all congregations of God’s people, women should not address the meeting’ (14:34). In this last reference, though, ‘congregations’ is in Greek the plural of ekklēsia (a case of the fourth use; see below)—it is the recurrence of the word ekklēsia in ‘address the meeting [emphasis added]’ only that furnishes the example of the third use. In this sense an ekklēsia comes into existence at about 11:00 o’clock Sunday morning and goes out of existence about an hour later.

This usage is usual in the Septuagint. There, a meeting or assembly of select persons (or of all) of Israel was called an ekklēsia; the total people as such were never so called, as far as I can determine. For the total people ekklēsia is not the way the idea is represented. The whole nation is ‘all Israel’ or ‘all Judah,’ or some such combination of words. In the New Testament, as we shall see, an advance was made, for the New Testament people as such are called the ekklēsia.

A fourth use is of the permanent group, the believers in Christ associated into a unit of permanent fellowship in a given locality. They are an ekklēsia whether listening to a sermon together on Sunday or sleeping in their beds in their various homes on Saturday night. There are approximately ninety occurrences of this sort in the New Testament. In this sense the word is often plural, as in Romans 16:16, where reference is made to ‘churches of Christ’ and 1 Thessalonians 2:14, viz. ‘churches of God in Christ Jesus that are in Judea.’ More frequently the single ‘house church,’ characteristic of the apostolic epoch, is so designated. Examples are, ‘the church in their house’ (Rom. 16:5), and ‘Gaius, who is host to me and to the whole church’ (Rom. 16:23). The plural as well as the singular in reference to the single local churches appear together in 1 Corinthians 16:19; ‘The churches of Asia send you greetings. Aquila and Prisca, together with the church in their house, send you hearty greetings.’

Finally ekklēsia is used of what theologians have come to call the church universal. Opinions vary somewhat as to how many times this is the sense, but most scholars allow twenty-five or twenty-six. True, a minority of Baptists and a few others have sought to eliminate the very idea of the universal church from the New Testament, but their arguments have not prevailed. A work by Dale Moody, a prominent Southern Baptist professor,¹² appears to have laid this spook to rest in the Southern Baptist Convention. Outstanding and hardly questionable references are 1 Corinthians 10:32; Hebrews 12:23; and Ephesians 5:25.

It must be added that in some scriptural texts the author seems to merge both the local and universal concepts. This is quite natural, considering the relation between the universal and local church. An example of this apparent merging is at Acts 20:28. Addressed, as it is, to local elders —‘Pay careful attention to yourselves and to all the flock, of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers’—one would suppose the ‘flock’ to be the local assembly or ekklēsia. Yet he continues, ‘to care for the church of God, which he obtained with his own blood.’ Who can say that Paul’s sweep of thought did not include also the same whole body of Christ of which the same Apostle wrote in Ephesians 5:25–27? ‘Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her ... that he might present the church to himself’ and so on.

It is only with the church local and universal that this study is concerned.

Scholars have pondered which is primary theologically. Is the application of ekklēsia to the church local a constriction of the idea of universal ekklēsia, or is the idea of church universal an extension of the more simple notion of the local ekklēsia or assembly? Hold in mind the previous usage in the Greek world, where an ekklēsia was always local, and the post-biblical use among Jews (an item we have not yet herein presented) where it is a very close synonym for a local synagogue. Schmidt asserts: ‘Parallel discussion of ekklēsia and sunagogē makes it plain ... that the two words mean much the same and often correspond to the same Hebrew word.’¹³ It seems close to certain that the word ekklēsia is primarily the local assembly and that its use to designate the universal church is a secondary extension of the primary meaning.

A notable author, Adolph Deissmann wrote in this vein:

The first scattered congregations of Greek-speaking Christians up and down the Roman Empire spoke of themselves as a ‘(convened) assembly’; at first each congregation was so called, and afterwards the whole body of Christians everywhere was spoken of collectively as ‘the (convened) assembly.’ That is the most literal translation of the Greek word ekklēsia. This self-bestowed name rested on the certain conviction that God had separated from the world His ‘saints’ in Christ, and had ‘called’ or ‘convened’ them to an assembly, which was ‘God’s assembly,’ ‘God’s muster,’ because God was the convener.¹⁴

F. J. A. Hort, of the galaxy of conservative orthodox scholars who in many ways brought evangelical biblical scholarship up to and into the twentieth century, wrote what many regard as the seminal work for all subsequent study of the biblical ekklēsia. He pointed out that the history of the New Testament shows how a small incipient ekklēsia (church) of twelve Apostles became 120 and then a single ethnic congregation at Jerusalem. Only as they caught the notion that the new ekklēsiae (plu.) which formed in other parts of a Jewish holy land, and then finally after a struggle with the idea of more ekklēsiae outside the Jewish nation and territory, did they fully see that the many were one ekklēsia, the larger being fully present in each authentic ekklēsia or local church.¹⁵

With this groundwork of understanding we are prepared further to focus this study, of which the church universal and the church local are the two foci.

¹ Jacob Grimm, Geschichte der deutschen Sprache (Leipzig: 1848, 3rd ed., 2 vols., 1868).

² Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Vol. III, art. ‘Ekklēsia.’

Oxford English Dictionary The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary

³ Oxford English Dictionary, Vol. II (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1971, 1975).

⁴ ibid., p. 402. A lengthy discussion in a footnote on pages 531, 532, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Vol. III., art. ekklēsia goes over this same ground and leads to similar conclusions.

⁵ ibid., p. 403.

⁶ See art. ‘Basilica,’ p. 198, A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, William Smith, London, 1882 and art. ‘Ecclesia,’ Latin-English Lexicon, Freund, Andrews, New York, 1862 and ekklēsia TDNT, Vol. III.

⁷ See TDNT, III, 504.

⁸ TDNT, III, pp. 527–529.

⁹ ibid., p. 527.

¹⁰ R. D. Culver, Civil Government, A Biblical View (Edmonton, Alberta: Canadian Institute for Law, Theology, and Public Policy 2000), pp. 222–227.

¹¹ TDNT, III, Schmidt, p. 513.

¹² Dale Moody, Christ and the Church, An Exposition of Ephesians, etc. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963).

¹³ TDNT, Vol. III, ‘qahal,’ p. 528.

¹⁴ Adolph Deissmann, Light From the Ancient East, tr. L. R. M. Strachan (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1927) p. 112.

¹⁵ F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia: A Course of Lectures on the Early Conceptions of the Ecclesia (London: Macmillan & Co., 1898).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (814). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

Metaphors, Images and Ideas Related to the Church

Like the Trinity of the Godhead and like the incarnation, the church is a New Testament ‘mystery,’ as Paul says: ‘This mystery is profound, and I am saying that it refers to Christ and the church’ (Eph. 5:32; cf. 1 Tim. 3:16). Hence, though the New Testament speaks at great length and in minute detail about many aspects of the church (members, officers, ordinances and the like) no text of Scripture defines the church in formal categories. Some of the same transcendent element which belongs to the Godhead and to the incarnation belongs to the church as well.

Theologians have different ways of calling attention to this fact. Strong emphasizes the ‘transcendent element in the church’.¹ J. V. L. Casserley in an important work speaks of ‘the mystery’ of the church, explaining correctly that ‘like all singulars the church is incapable of definition. We can enter into and expound the heart of the mystery but we cannot define its limits.’²

This element of ‘transcendence’ is profoundly present in many New Testament references to the Christian ekklēsia, or church: ‘I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it’ (Matt 16:18); ‘he ... gave him as head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all’ (Eph. 1:22, 23); ‘so that through the church the manifold wisdom of God might now be made known’ (Eph. 3:10). These and other amazingly grand statements (e.g. Heb. 12:23) are almost in a class with what the Bible says about Christ or God Himself. The incorporation of both natural branches (believing Israelites) and wild branches (Gentiles) into the olive tree of God’s grace and favor (Rom. 11:17) is said by Paul to speak of the wisdom and knowledge of God, both unsearchable and past finding out (Rom. 11:37). The unity of the church with Christ, though illustrated by the union of husband and wife, is said to be ‘a great mystery’ (Eph. 5:32 kjv).

Yet God has said much about Himself in Scripture—enough that chapters in great books of theology rightly expound God’s person, His attributes and works. Metaphors and other verbal images for God are abundant, each contributing valid information. So it is with the church.

Metaphors and Images of the Church

A distinction must carefully be made between metaphors for the collective entity, the church and metaphors for individual disciples of Christ who compose the church. When, for example, Jesus said of His disciples, ‘You are the salt of the earth’ there is no reference at all to the collective entity, the ekklēsia (assembly) as such. When authors of New Testament books frequently address fellow disciples as believers or ambassadors for Christ or saints these terms have no specific significance in defining the church. When, however, Peter exhorts his readers throughout the ‘dispersion’ as ‘a holy nation’ (1 Peter 2:9) the metaphor clearly designates the collective ekklēsia or church.

In a very widely influential book,³ P. A. Minear found ninety-six ‘analogies.’ Yet all except less than a score are really metaphors for individual Christians rather than the church as such.

Further, in the New Testament the church has an undefined, but certain, relation to ‘the kingdom of God [of Christ, of heaven]’ and to the Old Testament people of God, Israel, Abraham’s seed. Church, kingdom, Israel and people of God are viewed by some as identical, only viewed from different perspectives. Some others insist Israel and church have no connection at all, being in sequence two distinct kinds of collectives with different connections with God’s kingdom. Discussion of these questions has been controlled, at least in larger part, by interests seemingly remote, such as the proper form of church government and whether infants should be baptized or not.

Among recent writers Robert Saucy treats the metaphors as defining indicia of the church.⁴ Another selects only ‘the people of God,’ ‘the body of Christ’ and ‘the temple of God’ for comment and handles the church in relation to Israel and to the kingdom as special problems.⁵ Thomas Oden writes of ‘the metaphorical logic of Ecclesiology,’ briefly expounding seven such metaphors while treating kingdom and Israel in other connections.⁶

There are two important purposes served by some brief but careful preliminary attention to these topics right at this point, before later specific, extended chapters on the nature of the church. In first place, the scholar must rid himself of the prevalent unconscious notion that without faith and revelation one already knows anything at all of that entity, the Christian ekklēsia, which is so grandly represented in the New Testament. In some respects it is as far from authentic perception by the unregenerate or shallow believer as the mystery of the holy Trinity—the perchōrēsis, the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the begetting of the Son. The resort of the Bible to figures, analogies, metaphors and images demonstrates as much. In the second place, employment of such Old Testament terms and ideas as Abraham’s seed, Israel, holy priesthood, chosen people, holy nation, Zion and Jerusalem for New Testament entities has obscured for many the actual distinctions. ‘We’re marching to Zion’ or ‘O Zion haste thy mission high fulfilling’ in beloved hymns or St Peter’s extended metaphors such as ‘a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation’ (1 Peter 2:9) do not mean that the church is truly an Israel, a Zion, thus in any literal sense a mere extension of an Old Testament entity. There is a theological disagreement here that should be recognized early, even if settlement must come later.

Metaphors of the Church

Peter liked to ‘stir up’ the ‘pure minds’ of his readers ‘by way of remembrance’ (2 Peter 3:1 kjv). He required them to think of themselves (likely Gentile readers) as ‘exiles of the dispersion’ to compare themselves with the Jews of the dispersion (1 Peter 1:1). He assumes they know written revelation, the Old Testament, the reading of which we know consumed a major portion of time in every Christian assembly of the period. No less than for Paul the Holy Scriptures are ‘profitable ... for training in righteousness’ (2 Tim. 3:16). His Epistles are laced with Old Testament allusions, figures, citations and doctrinal assumptions. In his first Epistle Peter begs his readers to think of themselves individually as ‘strangers and exiles’ (Heb. 11:13) similar to Abraham (cf. Heb 11:9). At 1 Peter 2:5–11, 17, Peter instructs them as a collective entity. For that entity he uses seven different figures drawn from the Old Testament—several of them more widely used in the Old Testament as figures of speech than as literal references. They are (1) ‘a spiritual house,’ (2) ‘a holy priesthood,’ (3) ‘a chosen race,’ (4) ‘a royal priesthood,’ (5) ‘a holy nation,’ (6) ‘a people for his own possession’ (v. 9) and (7) ‘the brotherhood’.

Though Paul is thinking of the individual believer's body as 'the temple of the Holy Spirit' in his admonition against fornication at 1 Corinthians 6:19, in an earlier chapter the church collectively is (8) 'God's temple' (1 Cor. 3:16, 17). To the Ephesians Paul expounded the unity of the ekklēsia under the figure of (9) 'one new man' (Eph. 2:15). In several texts the ekklēsia collectively is called (10) 'one flock' (John 10:16), 'little flock' (Luke 12:32), and similar.

Upon reflection one must admit that even the Greek word ekklēsia, (11) 'assembly,' is a metaphor drawn from Greek politeia (political life). The church is (12) 'his body,' i.e. 'the body of Christ.' So prevalent in the Epistles and so important in extended explanations is this designation that it seems almost to pass from metaphor to literal reality (see 1 Cor. 12:13 ff.). Yet it is truly another metaphor, however amazingly realistic it seems in many ways. It will be our chief resource in understanding The Essential Nature of the Church Universal (chapter 10).

The universal, God-sponsored, human practice of marriage furnishes the image of the collective ekklēsia as (13) 'the bride' of Christ. This is explicit in the last book of the New Testament (Rev. 21:2, 9; 22:17) and implicit in Paul's discourse on Christian marriage in Ephesians 5:22–33, and several other New Testament texts. This relation is in large part an eschatological figure pointing to special events at the Lord's Second Advent when the ekklēsia as 'espoused wife' shall be joined to her husband furnished with special nuptial garments of white and shall celebrate the union at 'the marriage supper of the Lamb.' These images will furnish a major source of such information as we have regarding The Destiny of the Church (chapter 14 of this study).

Finally, the church is (14) 'the fellowship' or koinōnia, a word which does perhaps pass from the status of metaphor of human association to real—if intangible, perhaps ineffable—sharing, which the ekklēsia collectively has in the very life of God (Acts 2:4; 2 Peter 1:4). Yet koinōnia too is first of all a Greek word for community (intimate sharing) on the level of the purely human. It is not an Old Testament word. Hatch and Redpath report it only once in the whole Old Testament, at Leviticus 6:2, where it means something like partnership in a matter of material things.⁷ In the Greek world, however, as Hauch points out, words of the group koinon were applied 'to the most varied relationships' including sacral speech and rituals where it was thought to be an 'inward reception of mysterious divine power in eating and drinking.'⁸ In biblical Judaism, however, although the idea of 'fellowship' with God in various contexts is not absent, the idea of permanent participation of a group of human beings in the life of God is largely a matter of predictions of the future—Immanuel, 'God with us,' for the future in a consummate sense (incarnation, church, the new Jerusalem). It remained for the Hellenist, Dr Luke, author of two of the largest books of the New Testament, to employ the very Greek term koinōnia for that vital intimacy of reborn people, with one another and with God, by the Holy Spirit, which is normal for a healthy body of local believers in Christ, the New Testament ekklēsia:

And they devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and fellowship [kai tē koinōnia], to the breaking of bread and the prayers (Acts 2:42).

The communion service both enhances and celebrates the koinōnia of believers in unity with Christ. In the eating of the Eucharistic bread the symbolism of the 'one loaf' (1 Cor. 10:16) eaten by all believers speaks of their koinōnia (communion, common participation) in the benefits of His death on their behalf. So also with the one 'cup' of which Jesus instructed, 'all of you drink of it.' In this way they exercise their own 'body life' as ekklēsia and symbolize their collective existence as drawn from and subsisting in Christ. The (15) 'one loaf' then becomes still one more clear New Testament metaphor for the church. This is vivid in the Greek text of 1 Corinthians 10:16, 17: 'The loaf which we break [and eat], is it not a fellowship (koinōnia) of the body [the broken body] of Christ? because there is one loaf, we who are many (hoi polloi) are one body, for we all partake (metechomen, have together) out of (ex) the one loaf.'

Questions and Problems

Church, Israel, Kingdom

There are three interrelated matters that will be examined at length later in this study. The reader should be aware of them at this stage of discussion, namely the relation of the church to Israel and to the kingdom of heaven (of God) and the time of the beginning of the church. If the church began at some point after the Ascension of Christ it is not specifically an extension of the people of God known as Israel, however many parallels may be drawn, or analogies, for our instruction (see 1 Cor. 10:11 ff.). Parallels drawn by New Testament passages between the Old Testament people and the New Testament people of God, the members of the church are then just that—parallels, analogies, types. Further, Jesus spoke often of the kingdom of God in such a way as clearly to indicate that it was a present reality as he was speaking; that in the future His disciples and their converts would be witnesses to the kingdom as members of it; that the coming of the kingdom of God in some sense is a wholly future eschatological event to 'come' at the Second Advent. So these three biblical ideas, the inauguration of the church, the relation of Israel to the church and of the kingdom to the church have to be addressed.

No one can doubt that in some way true believers in revealed biblical religion before the coming of Christ have an intimate spiritual relation to New Testament believers after Pentecost. That does not necessarily mean that the New Testament church of Gentiles and Jews should be called an Israel and consequent application of all Israel's promises and warnings directly to the Christian ekklēsia, dear to New England Puritan theology. Both Israel and church are, however, in many biblical texts, placed within the kingdom of Messiah. How shall we sort this out? There are consequences for many departments of church doctrine, practice and spiritual formation. We cannot here trace out the origins and history of the several answers biblical interpreters have supplied. At this point let us note only how the subject appears in the New Testament narrative and reserve extended discussion to chapter 6 below, The Foundation for the church.

The Gospels report Jesus as referring to the church, as such, only twice, each time as something in the future, viz.: 'I will build my church' (Matt. 16:18 kjv) and 'tell it unto the church' (Matt. 18:17 kjv). Then after Jesus' Ascension and period of waiting in Jerusalem for the promised baptism of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4, 5), as Jesus commanded, the promised baptism in the Holy Spirit did occur (Acts 2:1 ff.; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13 ff.). That this constituted them one body, the Christian ekklēsia is the understanding apparently not only of Paul (1 Cor. 12:13 ff.) but of the author of Acts 2:47 for there (at least in the Textus Receptus reflected in kjv) the first appearance of the word ekklēsia as a name for the whole body of believers occurs after Matthew 18:17, viz.: 'And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved' (kjv). The vast majority of readers on the basis of this simple narrative evidence have (perhaps naively) understood that the Christian ekklēsia was predicted by Christ for the future and came into existence on that great Day of Pentecost of Acts 2. That ‘Day’ appears in theological writing of about every shade of opinion as ‘the birthday of the church.’ This is hardly negated by the revised Greek text which omits ekklēsia from Acts 2:47. Nor does this mean that the people who formed the Christian ekklēsia of Jerusalem had no special status during the days of waiting—the 120 of Acts 1. They were certainly ‘the church in expectation.’

Though some enthusiastic advocates of Reformed theology assert the ekklēsia is ‘Spiritual Israel’ or the ‘New Israel,’ the Bible never in any text says so as does one enthusiastic partisan book title which announces, The Church is Israel Now. No less presumptuous, it seems to me, was the frequent assumption of the optimistic liberalism of early and mid-twentieth century that enlarging church membership or promoting ‘world peace’ was what Jesus was talking about in His parables of the kingdom. It is equally indefensible to assume that the coming of the kingdom of heaven is uniformly and precisely the fulfillment of Old Testament promises to Israel in a future millennium.

The Church Militant, Expectant, Triumphant

Tradition has spoken of ‘three phrases or aspects of the church’s being,’ thought to have a biblical basis—the church militant, the church expectant and the church triumphant. The biblical basis is thought to be 1 Corinthians 13: church militant under the category of faith (struggling, warring, but believing and faithful); under the category of hope (expectant)—living in ‘an atmosphere of serene hope ... all anxiety banished from their lives’; triumphant, under the category of ‘absolute love,’ i.e. God’s love, the ultimate victory in the coming kingdom of God. Though this suggestive explanation by Anglican J. V. Langmede Casserley⁹ is attractive other explanations of this ancient tradition have been proposed.

The Church Visible and the Church Invisible

This distinction and its importance in Protestant-evangelical theology is not generally understood and is commonly severely criticized as though the Swiss Reformers who articulated it believed an absurdity of two universal churches in the world. After the Reformation epoch, reading of Calvin’s ecclesiology declined until recently, hence the world forgot what he (the Reformer who best articulated the distinction) really meant. The New Testament from Matthew 18 onward fully supports what he had to say. In fact a lengthy section of Rufinus’ *Commentary on the Apostles’ Creed*¹⁰ powerfully makes this very distinction. Hold in mind that Calvin was trying to help truly believing, converted people of his time understand that in addition to the organized, widely corrupted, professing church, there was the ‘church of the living God, pillar and ground of truth.’ Calvin used the accepted definitions of the church of ‘St. Cyprian and St. Augustine’ and repeats ‘in accord with general tradition and with Luther, that the church is our mother and that apart from her there is no salvation.’¹¹ He clarifies the biblical distinction in the following:

Holy Scripture speaks of the church in two ways. Sometimes by the term ‘church’ it means that which is actually in God’s presence, into which no persons are received but those who are children of God by grace of adoption and true members of Christ by sanctification of the Holy Spirit.... Often however, the name ‘church’ designates the whole multitude of men spread over the earth who profess to worship one God and Christ.... In this church are mingled many hypocrites who have nothing of Christ but the name and outward appearance.... Such are tolerated for a time either because they cannot be convicted by a competent tribunal or because a vigorous discipline does not always flourish as it ought.

Just as we believe that the former church, invisible to us, is visible to the eyes of God alone [emphasis added], so we are commanded to revere and keep communion with the latter which is called ‘church’ in respect to men.¹²

Calvin quickly moves on to show how by certain marks the true church may be recognized.

This does not mean that in Calvin’s view we are to ‘keep communion’ with every organization which calls itself a church, for there are marks by which the partially hidden existence of God’s true church in a local assembly may be recognized. The true Christian ekklēsia may be recognized in the human assembly with its structure of leadership, members and the like. ‘Sometimes the church is able to survive only in a hidden state, that the church should not be utterly extinguished. God always preserves a hidden seed, for there must always be a church in the world.’¹³

So the distinction between visible church and invisible church is, properly understood, a very important, necessary, practical matter. The Roman Church of the sixteenth century, of course, vigorously rejected it, holding that the existing, visible hierarchical structure is the one church outside which there is no salvation. Peter was appointed to be the ‘visible foundation’ of the one church. The Roman Mass is ‘a visible sacrifice,’ the hierarchy and priests are a visible structure of administration. ‘The rejection of the hierarchy inevitably [among Albigenses, Waldenes, Hus, Reformers] led to the doctrine of the invisible church.’¹⁴ Vatican II and the New Catechism have made some concessions and modifications in the way the matter is stated.

The Communion of Saints

Though not employed much recently among British and American evangelicals this expression is biblical, finding expression in some early forms of the tenth article of the Apostles’ Creed.¹⁵ ‘I believe ... in the holy catholic church’ follows, ‘the communion of saints.’ In the Roman church the communion of saints is an aspect of doctrine of the Mass, viz.: ‘The faithful are fed by Christ’s holy body and blood to grow in communion of the Holy Spirit....’¹⁶ Among Protestants, ‘the communion of saints’ should be understood almost in the same sense as ‘the invisible church’ except that emphasis is placed upon universality, including saints departed to be with Christ and all the saved of every dispensation (epoch), perhaps even holy angels. A precious hymn sung frequently (and perhaps only half understood) conveys the idea of the invisible aspect of ‘the communion of saints’:

Yet she on earth hath union

With God the Three in One

And mystic sweet communion

With those whose rest is won.¹⁷

The Pilgrim Church or the Believers’ Church

The origin of this good name for the Christian ekklēsia and authority for using it is Hebrews 11:13 and 1 Peter 2:11. The former refers to saints of old as strangers and pilgrims on the earth, while Peter addresses his Christian readers as sojourners (temporary residents) and beseeches them as sojourners and pilgrims, to abstain from fleshly lusts. In context these passages are addressed to believers in their capacity of disciples (followers) of Christ. ‘The children of God, wherever they may be, are only guests in the world’ (Calvin on 1 Peter 2:11).

Yet the ‘left wing of the Reformation’ (Roland Bainton)—also called ‘the Believers’ church’ or ‘Radical Protestantism’ (G. F. Williams), including first Anabaptists and then many other persecuted believing groups, including New England Baptists and Quakers—have taken these verses to themselves as special for themselves (not without reason).

The Roman Church has long since, and still to the present, sought to attract to itself the title ‘Pilgrim church.’ The Catechism of 1994 anomalously applies to the Roman Church Augustine’s references to the patient suffering of the pre-Constantinian church to show that ‘The [Roman] church progresses on her pilgrimage amidst this world’s persecutions and God’s consolations ... and ... will not be perfected in glory without great trials, etc.’¹⁸

Though the Roman Church has furnished some martyrs since 1517 it is per se hardly the persecuted pilgrim church. Ask the thousands of martyrs (Albigensians, Cathari, Huguenots, victims of Bloody Mary in Britain and the Inquisition) about that. The Roman Church insisted that the hierarchical structure is of the essence of the church and could therefore hardly escape bearing the role of persecutor of the pilgrim church. Yet the Word of God was preserved in written form by people within the fold of the Roman Church, and throughout the Middle Ages there are not wanting many who possessed faith, hope and love toward Christ. The ‘invisible’ church was present in the ‘visible’—precisely the point Zwingli and Calvin wished to make. In recent times many believers in Christ of common persuasion continue to be ‘slain for the testimony of Jesus’ in Marxist, pagan and Islamic areas of the world.

It is beyond the scope of this book to trace out the history of efforts—sometimes under duress of persecution, sometimes with encouragement of the civil community—to form what Max Weber first called ‘The Believers’ church.’¹⁹ For trustworthy coverage of the subject see G. G. Westin,²⁰ Franklin Littell,²¹ Donald F. Durnbaugh.²²

Durnbaugh describes a group formed by Alexander Mack (1708), in the Palatine district of Germany as upholding the pilgrim church ideal. They called themselves simply Brethren; by their critics, Dunkers, i.e. ‘dippers’, because they practiced baptism of believers by trine immersion. They were severely persecuted by Lutheran and Reformed as well as by the Roman Catholic clergy and several governments. A Lutheran pastor in 1713 (E. G. Gruber) challenged the Dunkers’ first printed record of beliefs. To this Mack replied in words which truly are a statement of the pilgrim church ideal:

We maintain ... that at all times God has had His church which always observed the true baptism and ordinances. This, however, was always hidden from unbelievers and often consisted of but few members. Despite this the gates of hell could not prevail against the church of the Lord Jesus. It can also be proved from the histories that God has caused His ordinances to be revealed as a witness to the unbelievers at all times.²³

The last sentence in the quotation is the theme of many volumes of Mennonite, Brethren (Dunker) and Baptist literature. Above-mentioned books will lead the interested reader into this truly vast realm.

¹ A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology (1907), p. 890.

² J. V. L. Casserly, Christian Community (Longmans, 1960), p. 19.

³ Paul A. Minear, Images of the church in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960).

⁴ Robert Saucy, The Church in God's Program (Chicago: Moody Press, 'The Nature of the church,' 1972), pp. 19–56.

⁵ Millard J. Erickson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), pp. 294–297.

⁶ Thomas Oden, Life in the Spirit (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1992), pp. 294–297.

⁷ Edwin Hatch and Henry A. Redpath, A Concordance to the Septuagint and the Other Greek Versions of the Old Testament (Including the Apocryphal Books), 3 vols., (Graz, Austria: Akademische Druck, U. Verlagsanstalt, 1954), p. 775, col. 1.

⁸ Hauch, TDNT, III, p. 798 ff.

⁹ Casserley, op. cit., pp. 16, 17, 19.

¹⁰ NPNF, ii, Vol. 3, pp. 558, 559.

¹¹ Francois Wendel, Calvin (New York: Harper and Row, 1963), p. 294. See I Tim. 3:15; Gal. 4:26.

¹² Calvin, Institutes, Book IV. i. 2, (Westminster ed.), pp. 1021, 1022.

¹³ Calvin, Commentary on Ezekiel. Vol. II, trans. T. Myers (Edinburgh: 1850), 16:53.

¹⁴ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Rockford, IL: TAN Books, 1960, 1974), p. 301. See art. 'church,' VI. 'The Necessary Means of Salvation,' The Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. III, pp. 752–754.

¹⁵ Henry S. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. (Oxford U. Press, 1963), p. 24.

¹⁶ Catechism of 1994, #948.

¹⁷ The Church's One Foundation, S. J. Stone, 1864.

¹⁸ Catechism of 1994. #769.

¹⁹ Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, trans. T. Parsons (New York: Scribners, 1958), pp. 144, 145.

²⁰ G. Westin, The Free Church Through the Ages, trans. V. A. Olson (Nashville: Broadman Press, 1958).

²¹ Franklin Littell, The Free Church (Boston: Star King Press, 1957).

²² Donald F. Durnbaugh, The Believers' Church (New York: Macmillan, 1970).

²³ Quoted from Alexander Mack, Jr., in Durnbaugh, ibid., p. 124.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (820). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

5

The Twofold Aspect of the Church, Universal and Local

The Scriptures distinguish between the universal church and the local assembly, but the New Testament consistently refers to either by the word ekklēsia. They are obviously not the same entity nor entirely different and the history of attempts to define and relate the two is part of the history of orthodoxy, schism and heresy. The differences of opinion have been not only between large groups such as Roman Catholics and Protestants (though the disagreement there is well-nigh absolute) but between Protestant denominations and within them. The Protestant differences are, of course, less.

The distinction between the church universal and the church local was introduced in connection with the meaning of ekklēsia in the New Testament. It would be easy simply to move on to discuss the two in the manner of biblical exegesis, without reference to the profoundly different ways in which Christian groups and teachers have understood both, especially the church universal.

The Roman Catholic Church, as we will show shortly, does not admit that any outside the pale of their own hierarchically structured society, all in obedience to Peter's successor and Christ's vicar, the Roman pontiff, are within the one, true, holy, catholic and apostolic church. The papal church claims to be the one authentic church. By 'catholic' they mean inclusive of every member of the church. This hierarchical structure is 'the mystical body of Christ.' At any time there are three parts of this body. Ott says, "mystical body of Christ" means communion of all those made holy by the grace of Christ. This includes the faithful on earth; those in the place of purification [purgatory] who are not yet completely justified; and the perfectly justified in heaven ... the militant, the suffering and the Triumphant church.¹ The pope has jurisdiction over all those on earth, the church militant. Until recent times all who claimed to be Christians and outside the Roman fold were called by various deprecatory names, the mildest being schismatics and heretics, and were denounced as dangerous and worthy of elimination by death. (As evidence, refer to all those anathemas which conclude many of the decrees of the Council of Trent and what the Roman Church actually did in pre-Reformation times and the Reformation epoch. Pope John Paul II has publicly apologized for the blood letting.) In recent times this has changed. That is to say, though the exclusive claims have not been renounced, it is allowed that Protestants and some others may be ‘separated brethren.’ The new stance seems to be quite sincere and it started before Vatican II in the 1960s. There has been growing a better feeling, with manifold rapprochement in varying degrees from almost all parties. Yet still, as I shall show—decisively I think—however defined, the official theology (dogma) is that only the Roman Church is Catholic (universal). Rapprochement did not begin suddenly with Vatican II, even though to the general public it seemed to be so. The volume Man’s Disorder and God’s Design,² prepared in anticipation of the ‘ecumenical’ founding council of 1948, reports early efforts of Roman Catholic clergy to establish fraternal relations with ‘schismatics and heretics’ (= Protestants). See also Rouse and Neill’s History of the Ecumenical Movement.³

The New Testament use of ekklēsia is not limited to the universal church and local churches but these are the senses that relate to the present topic. As we saw in chapter 4, in the Greek world an ekklēsia was a local assembly of people—whether of a city or some other civic, geographical, social or religious unit. In the New Testament an ekklēsia is a company of people united by faith in Christ who meet together regularly to hear apostolic doctrine, to share mutual life (fellowship), for worship (the breaking of bread), prayer, mutual encouragement, praise and service (Acts 2:42–47).

This New Testament use will be elaborated in chapter 15 below. Sometimes the ekklēsia is the whole church, that is, all believers everywhere. No doubt the clearest statement of the catholic or universal church is Paul’s: ‘so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another’ (Rom. 12:5). Paul was no member of the local church at Rome, but he says ‘we’ referring to Christians at home and everywhere else.

Thus far there is much agreement among all orthodox parties. It is summed up in the Nicene Creed (ad 325, 381): ‘And [I believe] in One Holy Catholic and Apostolic church.’⁴ These four ‘notes’ or ‘marks’ of the church in the article of the Creed (‘I believe in the church’) refer, as Calvin observed, ‘not only to the visible church ... but also to all God’s elect, in whose number also are included the dead.’⁵

The Reformers rejected the notion that the true church is an ecclesiastical organization as such. They distinguished the visible, i.e. the earthly organized church, from the invisible, the company of elect, regenerate, believers. Yet they asserted that wherever the local assembly was an authentic ekklēsia of genuinely saved people, the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church, was present.

The Roman church, per contra, asserts the unity of Rome includes all the notes of the church... the church is a world-wide corporation, whose existence is to be forced upon the notice of all, willing or unwilling. Formal visibility is secured by those attributes which are usually termed the ‘notes’ of the church—her Unity, Sanctity, Catholicity, and Apostolicity... Without this formal visibility, the purpose for which the church was founded would be frustrated.⁶

Pope Boniface VIII (1294–1303) in his Bull, ‘Unam Sanctum,’ November 18, 1302 asserted the visible 'spiritual' power of church is supreme over 'earthly powers,' that the Roman Church is 'the one, holy, Catholic church, and ... apostolic ... outside which there is no salvation.'⁷ Recently, the late learned and articulate Roman Catholic theologian, Hans Urs von Balthasar asserted:

The Catholic church is not one church amongst others, she is the single source from which they have come, the point of convergence of all the churches that have split off from her. Only when joined [publicly and visibly] to the Catholic [i.e. Roman] church can they plunge into the ocean of eternity.⁸

At the time of the Reformation the Roman Church had claimed for a thousand years to be the one true catholic church. John McKenzie of the University of Notre Dame University asserts: 'The jurisdiction of the Roman Catholic Church is organized in such a way that there is no place on earth not subject to some Episcopal authority; there are some interesting and complex rules that govern ecclesiastical actions on shipboard, which have been adapted to aircraft.'⁹ The Church of Rome, it was assumed, both then and now, is the one and only church. Present-day Roman theologians acknowledge Rome did not immediately become the site of the 'vicar of Christ,' but it was Christ's purpose from the beginning and was predicted in the Old Testament.

Thomas Aquinas spoke for what innumerable pages in Denzinger (The Sources of Catholic Dogma) and even the Catechism of 1994 say. He first quotes an ancient sermon: 'If He had chosen the great city of Rome [instead of Bethlehem and Nazareth], the change in the world would be ascribed to the influence of her citizens. If He had been the son of the Emperor, His benefits would be attributed to the latter's power,' etc. Aquinas then, citing 1 Corinthians 1:27, goes on to say, 'And therefore, in order the more to show His power, He set up the head of His church [the succession of popes said to be Peter, then Clement, Linus, Anacletus and onward] in Rome itself, which was the head of the world, in sign of His complete victory, in order that from that city the faith might spread through all the world; according to Isaiah 26:5, 6; "The high city He shall lay low ... the feet of the poor, i.e. of Christ [emphasis added], shall tread it down; the steps of the needy, i.e. of the Apostles Peter and Paul."'¹⁰ By virtue of the perpetual authority of the papal successors, the authority of Peter as Christ's vicegerent on earth and of the bishops as successors of the other Apostles, this monarchical, ecclesiastical organization has jurisdiction in matters doctrinal, spiritual and moral over the whole earth. God has two 'swords'—the secular (civil rulers) and spiritual (the papal church), but the spiritual has precedence over the secular. Recent, post-Vatican II Roman authors acknowledge these teachings of the medieval Roman Church and yield little of such claims for today. It is important in the present ecumenical climate that we all know this.

J. L. McKenzie, Professor of Theology at the University of Notre Dame, observes: 'It was not until the Second Vatican Council that any official Roman document recognized the modern secular religiously pluralistic state as a legitimate form of society.'¹¹ McKenzie further acknowledges:

After the French Revolution [1789–1799], the established church in most of Europe became a charming anachronism rather than a reality, but as far as the Roman church is concerned, it has been preserved as an ideal from which existing practice is a deviation, and indeed as an ideal which a kindly Providence might be hoped to restore.¹²

McKenzie¹³ also acknowledges that the theological pronouncements of the Second Vatican Council have really not changed the Roman Church's heart on this subject, only the manner of speaking about it to the church's skittish members, lay and clerical, and to the rest of us.

That McKenzie speaks not only a scholarly opinion but the continuing official point of view is demonstrable by paragraph #870 of the Catechism of 1994 which is in turn a direct quotation of paragraph #8 of 'Lumen Gentium' (or 'Dogmatic Constitution of the church'), the first section of the Documents of the Second Vatican Council.

The sole church of Christ which in the Creed we profess to be one, holy, catholic and apostolic ... [elipsis in the Catechism] subsists in the [Roman] church, which is governed by the successors of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him. Nevertheless, many elements of sanctification and of truth are found outside its visible confines.¹⁴

The Council plainly in almost all parts of the Documents desired to extend a friendly, welcoming hand to all professing Christians, even calling them 'separated brethren.' Yet, the invitation is without any discernible variation or exception to 'come home to Mother church,' the historic Roman establishment. A flood of recent literature makes this plain. Evangelicals find much in post-Vatican II orthodoxy to agree with, even to admire. Yet, insistence on papacy and the hierarchical structure in obedience to the Roman pontiff is now (or at least should be) as much an obstacle to any Protestant agreement to joining of ecclesiastical forces as ever. Sacraments, Mariolatry, orders (the sacerdotal priestly hierarchy), the Mass (Eucharist), penance (confessional), adoration of images, relics, intercession of saints and other features of the Roman religion are lesser obstacles.

Several renowned liberal Roman Catholic scholars have renounced or explained away orthodox doctrines (of mankind, the fall, the Person of Christ, the Trinity) which orthodox Protestants do share with historic Roman Catholicism (examples are Küng, Schillebeeckx, Teilhard). But these scholarly writers are not in good standing with the hierarchy. Others—of whom perhaps the best example is Hans von Balthasar—in good standing and mainly orthodox, strongly affirm every feature of the Roman religion which orthodox Protestants do not and cannot approve. Von Balthasar, in a 1988 translation of his 1975 small German work (Katholisch),¹⁵ treats most of the items of Roman belief objectionable to Protestants in such a way as to make them acceptable to skeptical laymen of his own denomination and to evangelical Protestants. Yet he yields not an inch to eliminating the essential historic Roman dogmas and practices. 'One, Holy, Catholic Apostolic' still means the same as ever, even if now spoken with a genuinely friendly smile and an honestly friendly heart. Significant theological movement is not likely to come from the Roman Church, it appears. The deadlock seems likely not to go away.

Several decades have now passed since the Second Vatican Council. Many acts of 'reconciliation' have taken place both on matters of broad consequences as, for example, reception of several former Anglican/Episcopal priests into Roman priesthood, common declarations between two different Anglican bishops and popes Paul VI and John Paul II.¹⁶ Hence, we all want to know, do Rome's exclusive claims still hold? Even during the age of scholasticism, at the time of the early Renaissance, when some accepted Roman claims were being challenged, the scholastic authors attempted to support the papal supremacy over the 'church' and over kings and emperors as well. They assembled arguments from Scripture, patristic authors, and even the history and literature of ancient Greece and Rome. True, official Rome has renounced the extremes of the Inquisition. But did the Roman Church abandon any of her claims over the church and claim to be the sole one, holy, catholic and apostolic church? The answer must be, No. Some lesser prelates have acted as though it were so; some theologians have thought so; many laymen felt so.

The Vatican Congregation for Divine Worship set the matter straight in the Declaration, Mysterium Ecclesiae, June 24, 1973, less than ten years after the close of the Council. This official Declaration rebuked their avant garde theologians ‘who have obscured catholic doctrine’ and are ‘opposed to Catholic faith even in fundamental matters’.... These offenses, they say, are especially grievous in relation to ‘the ministerial priesthood,’ ‘truths concerning the mystery of the church.’¹⁷ The document acknowledges ‘separated brethren,’ and ‘ecclesial communities which are joined by an imperfect communion.’ They acknowledge ‘truly Christian endowments’ by these communities ‘derived from our common heritage.... But at the same time ... through the gift of God’s mercy they belong to that church which Christ founded and which is governed by the successors of Peter [popes] and the other Apostles [bishops], who are the depositories of the original Apostolic tradition, living and intact, which is the permanent heritage of doctrine and holiness of that same church.’¹⁸

The claim is here asserted, in undiminished dogmatic form, that the episcopal hierarchy under the pope and over the priests, and they over all lay people, is the church universal, visible, structured, papal, one, holy, catholic and apostolic—this and no other. Some distinctives such as the infallibility of the pope and the magisterium are given a ‘spin’ less offensive to Protestants in Mysterium Ecclesiae. Many other features of Romanism rejected by the Protestant Reformation are restated throughout the Vatican II and post-conciliar documents in a manner more acceptable to us. Many are trimmed of what Calvin and Luther called superstition (especially penance and purgatory, indulgences, prayers to the Virgin Mary and other saints) but Rome’s dogmatic structure remains intact right where it was at the close of the Council of Trent, at the heart of the Roman system.

The foregoing presentation is not a digression. The purpose has been twofold: first, to demonstrate that though most Christians of every persuasion affirm a universal church, there is need to discover as exactly as possible what this universal (catholic) church is; second, to make the reader fully aware of the magnitude of the difference between accepted Protestant understanding (for all their minor variations) and that of the Roman Church from which the sixteenth-century evangelicals were driven out. Interestingly, among many other things John Owen, the Puritan rector of Oxford during the interregnum and acknowledged peer of theologians of the time, said this in answer to the Roman charge of schism:

[S]ome of our divines ... say they did not voluntarily forsake the communion of the church that then was, but being necessitated by the command of God to reform themselves ... they were driven out by bell, book, and candle [instruments of the Roman liturgy, ecclesiastical rules and civil magistracy]; which is a strange way of being schismatic.¹⁹

He goes on to say: ‘[T]hey forsook not the communion of the church, but the corruptions of it, or the communion of it in its corruption, not in other things wherein it was lawful to continue communion with it.’²⁰ Some of the corruptions to which Owen alludes have been acknowledged by Roman authorities over the centuries since—many of the corruptions of practice, if not the clutter of false doctrines, accumulated over the millennium and more before 1517.

The pre-Reformers, among them (and in this order) John Wycliffe (1320–1384), Jon Hus (1369–1415) and William Tyndale (1494–1536) drew from Scripture a doctrine of the wholly spiritual nature of the universal or catholic church. This teaching first pronounced by Wycliffe and later Hus, was rightly discerned to be totally destructive of the Roman establishment which had grown up after the end of the persecution by the Roman Empire.

John Wycliffe was a leading scholar of Oxford (then two centuries old). Already before his time the glaring corruptions of Rome had created widespread anti-papal feelings in Britain. Wycliffe translated the whole Bible into the English language of the time (Chaucer's Canterbury Tales are contemporary). French terms of the Norman conquerors had now coalesced with Anglo-Saxon language-structure to form a new stage of English which has essentially survived to the present. Into that language Wycliffe translated the whole Bible. Yet before the age of printing it went only as far as the translator and his disciples could take it in manuscript. They preached the gospel far and wide—bringing the Fathers, Councils and the Popes to the bar of scriptural judgment and as far as the papal view of the church was concerned found it false and pernicious. As to the church, Wycliffe and his Lollard followers:

viewed the church not as the visible Catholic [Roman] church, or organized community of the hierarchy, but as Christ's Body and Bride, consisting of the whole number of the elect, having in the visible world, only its temporary manifestation and pilgrimage, its home, origin, and end being in the invisible world, in Eternity. Salvation ... is not dependent on connection with the official church or the mediation of the clergy.... The ground of the church, Wycliffe taught, was the divine election.²¹

Wycliffe's doctrine of the church universal, with later refinement, and some variation, became the heart of the Reformation doctrine and of all evangelicals since.

John Wycliffe lost his post as leading scholar at Oxford University for his efforts and escaped execution by papal forces only by retirement. Hus (national hero of Bohemia) was burnt at the stake (by the Council of Constance, supposed to be a reforming council) on account of his successful efforts, and Tyndale (whose first printed translation of the Bible in English was his worst offense) got himself executed by strangling by papal agents.

What followed in the teaching of Luther, Calvin and even Anabaptists was already worked out by these heroic people. The details belong to church history and the history of Christian thought.²²

The New Testament speaks of the church on earth in two importantly different ways. The word ekklēsia is not always employed. Passages which refer to believers collectively as the body of Christ, the bride of Christ, His flock, the saints and similar expressions refer to the 'one, holy, catholic [universal] church.' When Paul addressed 'all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi, with the overseers and deacons' (Phil. 1:1) or the believers (or ekklēsia) at so and so's house, and similar, we rightly assume a local, organized (in some sense) church is designated. The rest of this ecclesiology will be devoted to details of nature, mission, offices, functions, origin and destiny of the church in these two aspects: universal and local.²³

The idea of the church universal is never precisely defined. Yet it is everywhere assumed. The Lord ‘gave himself up for her’ (Eph. 5:25) not ‘them.’ ‘Christ is the head of the church’ (Eph. 5:23) not ‘the churches’ and ‘savior of the body’ not the ‘bodies’ (Eph. 5:23 kjv). The one body, Spirit, hope, Lord, faith, baptism; one God and Father of all (believers); and ‘the unity of the Spirit’ (Eph. 4:3–6), like innumerable other passages, are meaningless unless all true believers in Christ—living and dead—are organically connected by union with Him in one vital unity.

There have been evangelical groups who acknowledging the unity in Christ yet have denied the present existence of a universal church. It has never been an emphasis of Protestant congregationalists [=independents]. The advancing frontier of settlement in America produced a minor stream of such thought... In colonial days Baptists had experienced persecution at the hands of the Congregational state church [in Massachusetts and Connecticut]. As a result these Baptists had come to fear the concept of the universal church, for with it they associated state-churchism.²⁴

The tendency issued in a book by Dr J. B. Graves, a prominent Baptist,²⁵ which gave the name Landmarkism to the most exclusivist stream within American Baptist belief and practice. In a later book²⁶ this influential author, in harmony with the then prevalent postmillennialism, equated the church and the kingdom of Christ. The church, he said, is an organized visible organization, earthly and local. The local church is always a single congregation which one enters by professing regeneration. Baptism by immersion (only) is the door of entrance. The Lord’s Supper is restricted to members of one local church only—never extended even to Baptist visitors or guests. Though far from universal or even widely known among Baptists today, the stream of thought still flows.²⁷ This stream of thought continues in a small minority of Baptist teachers and writers and congregations. R. V. Clearwaters, of Central Conservative Baptist Seminary (Minneapolis), held that the only church on earth today is a local church. The universal church has no present existence, ideal or real. He said, ‘the universal church ... has never been assembled or had a meeting. It is a prospective church.’²⁸ Several Baptist congregations in the U. S. Southeast actively promote their own brand of Landmarkism.²⁹

This view is quite the opposite of the English evangelicals of the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries who were the ‘Fathers’ of the Protestant groups of the English-speaking world. Briefly, these Puritans both within the state church (Anglican) party and those who sought freedom from the state church as Independents (Congregationalists), Baptists, Quakers and Presbyterian (initial majority), and others, believed intensely that every truly regenerate believer is a member of the church catholic. They believed that the church catholic is not the mere sum total of the elect but the body of Christ, the bride in preparation for wifhood; that the church though invisible to people on earth (inasmuch as only ‘the Lord knoweth them that are his’) achieves visibility through the churches (we now call them denominations), even in the papal system from whose subservience they wished to be freed; and that every believer, if possible, should associate himself with a local church.³⁰

These principles were embodied in part by the archetypal Anglican authority Richard Hooker,³¹ even though he thought the episcopal system was best. They are embodied in full and in detail in the prime spokesman for English Puritan theology, John Owen, in his work, Of Schism and A Review of the True Nature of Schism.³² We in the modern world, at least for now, feel little threat from the Roman Church—at least not of the sort that came with the Inquisition, the Spanish Wars, the attempted Conquest of the Netherlands, and the attacks on Protestant Britain from 1588 (the Spanish Armada) to 1745 when Bonnie Prince Charlie, encouraged by France, led his armies down from Scotland to within a few days' march of London. I quote an interesting paragraph to this effect from Father Richard John Neuhaus, while he was still a Lutheran minister.

In America, the threat has been handled by the constitutional nonestablishment of religion and by the Roman Catholic church's theological legitimation of democratic pluralism, including religious pluralism. Vatican II says this about the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church we profess in the Creed: 'This church, constituted and organized in the world as a society subsists in the Catholic church, which is governed by the successor of Peter and by the bishops in union with that successor, although many elements of sanctification and of truth can be found outside of her visible structure.' Dulles observes: 'The substitution of the term "subsists" in ... for the term "is" ... in previous drafts [at the Vatican II Council] on the church is one of the most significant steps taken by Vatican II.'³³

This was not the opinion of the Curia which met previously to the Council and except for the perceived benefits to be gained by giving in slightly and the persuasive arguments of a few—notably J. C. Murray, an American priest—the defense of Trent by Bellarmine (died 1621) might still remain official as it did for over 400 years.

Nor do evangelical Protestants deny 'elements of sanctification and the truth' in the 'visible structure' of the papal church, then and now. We all know about Luther's confessor Johann von Staupitz and of course there was Mother Theresa!

A Biblical Theology of the Universal Church

With growing clarity from Wycliffe onward there was and is practical agreement that biblically the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church may be taken in two ways. In Owen's words again:

1. ... the mystical body [or sometimes invisible body] of Christ, his elect, redeemed; justified, and sanctified ones throughout the world; commonly called the church catholic militant.
2. ... the universality of men throughout the world called by the preaching of the word, visibly professing and yielding obedience to the gospel; called by some the church catholic visible.³⁴

The first we often call the 'true church,' or 'invisible church,' or even 'the mystical body of Christ.' The second is nowadays more often called the professing church, some of whom are merely nominal or even hypocrites. This apparently is the meaning intended at Acts 9:31: 'So the church throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria had peace' (rsv). Most recent translations have 'church' rather than 'churches,' as in the Textus Receptus and kjv. Some theologians prefer to call this the historical church.

Our present interest is obviously in the 'true' church, the body of Christ, 'the church of the firstborn whose names are written in heaven.' The church as such did not come into concrete existence until the advent of the Spirit as described in Acts 2 (as most agree, and as we shall try to demonstrate). Every true believer since that effusion of the Spirit anywhere and everywhere is a member of the church. This is plain in the manner Paul addressed the Corinthians: 'To the church of God that is in Corinth, to those sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints together with all those who in every place call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, both their Lord and ours' (1 Cor. 1:2).

Among to notice this decisive testimony to the fact of one universal (catholic) church was John Chrysostom (337–407), chief pastor at Antioch of Syria and later at Constantinople. He commented on this verse:

He [Paul] calls it ... the church 'of God,' it is united, and is one, not in Corinth only, but also in all the world: for the church's name (ekklēsia: properly assembly) is not a name of separation, but of unity and concord. 'In every place, both theirs and ours'—For although the letter be written to the Corinthians only, yet he makes mention of all the faithful that are in all the earth; showing that the church throughout the world must be one, however separate in divers places ... so those in different places, if they have not different lords but one only [the Lord Jesus Christ] ... the One Lord binds them together.³⁵

The mystical catholicity came out in a practical orthodoxy which produced everywhere among believers a recognizably similar response to Caesar's claims as well as distinctive morality. This aroused social resentment and government persecution of the ancient church.

Though members of a universal body of believers, the 'saints,' as Paul called them, are all members of local churches. There are no unregenerate in the 'mystical' or 'invisible' body, but there are varying numbers of merely nominal Christians in the local churches where these believers meet. Unbelievers also attend their assemblies (1 Cor. 14:23). Some of them become accepted baptized members, among them surreptitious 'enemies of the cross of Christ' (Phil. 3:18), 'false brothers' (Gal. 2:4), savage wolves (Acts 20:28, 29). They creep in (Jude 4) with bad motives. Some depart, to the improvement of the church (1 John 2:20), but some stay and will not be manifest till the Judgment Day (2 Tim. 3:9). Viewed in its world-wide aspect, this professing church is 'catholic' or universal.³⁶

There is no evidence that this church ever had an 'ecumenical' structure. There was a unity of doctrine in the early centuries. The Epistles witness to the importance attached to that orthodoxy by the Apostles. In early church literature the word 'catholic' was frequently used simply to mean orthodox. Having surveyed the evidence, Jaroslav Pelikan asserts:

What did characterize primitive Christianity was a unity of life, of fidelity to the Old Testament, of devotion, and of loyalty to its Lord, as he was witnessed to in the Old and New Testament. Heresy was deviation from that unity; and as that unity came to be transposed into the languages of creed and dogma from that of testimony and proclamation, heresy was seen as an aberration from 'the pattern of sound words which you have heard.'³⁷

One of the very most excellent pieces of literature coming from the ancient church is the Apology of Tertullian (ad 145–240?), a North African lawyer turned preacher, theologian and apologist. It is addressed to 'Rulers of the Roman Empire.' Throughout he treats the Christian 'race' as a uniform element in the Roman world. He claims 'to exhibit the peculiarities of the Christian society' (xxxix., opening sentence). Christians, he says, acknowledge all mankind as 'brethren ... by the law of common mother nature,’ but there is a special oneness of ‘mind and soul’ among all Christians. Such a ‘community’ is one of mutual care for one another, sharing earthly goods and about all else except their wives—in which they differ, he says, markedly from the rest of Roman society. ‘We are,’ he sums up, ‘in our congregations just what we are when separated from each other ... as a community what we are as individuals.’³⁸

This community is the professing church of the time throughout the world—with all its warts and defects—a catholic ekklēsia.

This church is the subject of the next several chapters.

¹ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Rockford, IL: TAN Books, 1960, 1974), pp. 270, 271.

² Man’s Disorder and God’s Design, Vol. (Part) I (New York: Harper & Bros., n.d.), pp. 169–176.

³ Ruth Rouse and S. C. Neill, History of the Ecumenical Movement (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1954), pp. 593–596 passim.

⁴ Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom ii (Grand Rapids: Baker Books n.d., rep. 1966), p. 59.

⁵ Calvin, Institutes, Book iv, 1.1.

⁶ W. H. W. Fanning, ‘Church,’ The Catholic Encyclopedia, III, p. 753.

⁷ Heinrich Denzinger, The Sources of Catholic Dogma (St Louis: B. Herder, 1957), paras. 468, 469.

⁸ Hans Urs von Balthasar, In the Fulness of The Faith: On the Centrality of the Distinctively Catholic, trans. G. Harrison (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1988), p. 123.

⁹ John McKenzie, The Roman Catholic Church (New York: Image Books, 1971), p. 65.

¹⁰ St Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, trans. English Dominican Fathers, Christian Classics (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1981), Pt. III, Q. 35, art. 8.

¹¹ McKenzie, op. cit., p. 151.

¹² ibid., p. 151.

¹³ ibid., pp. 151–153.

¹⁴ Catechism of the Catholic Church, authorized English trans. of Latin text of 1994 (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, n.d.), p. 230.

¹⁵ Von Balthasar, op. cit.

¹⁶ The Vatican Collection of Vatican ii and Postconciliar Documents (new rev. ed., 1982, 1998 Vol. II), pp. 183–189.

¹⁷ ibid., p. 428.

¹⁸ ibid., p. 429.

¹⁹ John Owen, ‘Of Schism,’ Works, 16 vols. (London: Banner of Truth Trust, repr. 1965, 1970), p. 169.

²⁰ ibid., p. 169.

²¹ E. H. Broadbent, The Pilgrim church, 2nd ed. (London & Edinburgh: Pickering and Ingles, 1935), p. 120.

²² There is a significant literature relating to the Paulicians, Cathari, Albigensians, Waldensians and others who saw these truths and acted on them in the era between the establishment of hierarchical Roman Christianity and the Reformation.

²³ At several points in the following chapters three questions initially surface, the second depending on how the first is answered. (1) What is the relation of the church of the New Testament Apostles and prophets to the saints of the Old Testament? (2) When did the church come into existence? Another follows, presenting the ‘newness’ of the New Testament church and Pentecost, its birthday. (3) Are the Old Testament people ever incorporated into a single ‘people of God’? These questions will be addressed in chapters 8 and 9 below, ‘The Relation of the church to Israel and the Kingdom of God.’

²⁴ R. G. Torbet, ‘Larkmarkism,’ Baptist Concepts of the Church, ed. W. S. Hudson (Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1959), p. 172.

²⁵ J. B. Graves, An Old Landmark Reset, (1854). Publisher not indicated.

²⁶ J. B. Graves, Old Landmarkism: What is It? (1880). Publisher not indicated.

²⁷ R. G. Torbet, Baptist Concepts of the church, pp. 170–195.

²⁸ R. V. Clearwaters, The Local church of the New Testament (Minneapolis., MN: Central Conservative Baptist Press, 1954), p. 8.

²⁹ The same and similar statements are made by W. C. Hawkins and W. A. Ramsay (The House of God, Simpson, SC: Hallmark Baptist church, n.d., p. 48). And in a companion book by the same authors (The Nature of the Church On Earth, n.d.). These books are recent expressions of Baptist Landmarkism. Another equally conservative and similarly ‘restorationist,’ a representative of the Plymouth Brethren, says the opposite: ‘The Local church [is] an expression of the church as a whole,’

A. P. Gibbs, Scriptural Principles of Gathering (Kansas City: Walterick, n.d.), pp. 3, 19.

³⁰ Peter Toon, Puritans and Calvinism (Svengel, PA: Reiner Publications, 1973), especially chap. iii, 'The Cromwellian church.'

³¹ Richard Hooker, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (eight 'books' published between 1594 and 1662).

³² John Owen, The Works of John Owen, Vol. xiii (rep. Banner of Truth Trust, 1976), pp. 90–275.

³³ Richard John Neuhaus, Freedom for Ministry (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984), p. 43.

³⁴ Owen, op. cit., p. 124.

³⁵ John Chrysostom, Homily I.1, 2 (NPNF, 1st Series, XII.3). p. 3.

³⁶ John Gill, Complete Body of Divinity II, new ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1978), pp. 559–568.

³⁷ Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, Vol. I (Chicago: U of Chicago Press, 1971) p. 70.

³⁸ Tertullian, Apology, xxxix (ANF iii) pp. 46, 47.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (826). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

6

Foundation for the Church

Inasmuch as in the counsels of God the church was always a very special focus (Eph. 1:3–13; 3:21), the church has a pre-existence, not in the sense of Aristotle's potentiality or Plato's eternal forms, but in God's eternal purpose. This is somewhat as when we say the electric light bulb was only an idea in Edison's mind until October 21, 1879, when he succeeded in making an incandescent lamp (an electric lightbulb) which then transformed civilization in a manner almost inconceivable. By 'foundation for the church' we mean those preparations, specifically for the church, which came to being in the sphere of human history before the appearance of Jesus Christ.

There is difference of opinion about when the church actually (as opposed to in idea only) began. The chief differences appeared in post-Reformation times with two developments. The first, which appeared among certain Calvinists, is that the history of salvation should be interpreted within a scheme of certain divine and divine-human covenants, hence ‘Covenant Theology.’ The second appeared in Britain and America after about 1830. This scheme relates to all human history (not just of salvation) to seven or eight distinct epochs. Of these the church of the present age is not the ultimate but penultimate or ante-penultimate ‘dispensation.’ We shall be taking note of these systems of evangelical thought as we precede. The disagreement over the time of origin of the church is in part only a war of words—a logomachy—as some contemporary participants seem now to acknowledge.

Practically speaking, though no one doubts the Lord has had ‘a people’ from Adam, Abel, and onward to Elizabeth, Zacharias, Joseph and Mary, there is also agreement that the church as such, as the body of Christ, the bride of Christ, specially ‘all baptized into one body’ in the Holy Spirit, began the Day of Pentecost as described in the second chapter of Acts. All agree the church was not present in this sense at any previous moment of time. Though some speak of the people of God in Old Testament times as ‘church,’ yet even they begin church history with the book of Acts, not Genesis 4 or 12 or Exodus 25.

Foundation for that church was forming throughout Old Testament times (as the biblical record shows) however dimly perceived at the time, just as the foundations of the United States were forming in North America no later than the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, Massachusetts in 1620–169 years before the Union of thirteen ‘states’ under a written constitution took place in 1789.

Let us take brief note of (1) certain intimations of less or greater specificity; (2) types of the church; and (3) preparations.

1. Intimations of the Church in the Old Testament

One searches the Old Testament in vain for plain-out predictions of the formation of a body or bride of Christ with the special lineaments we shall be examining. Yet, as we can all see now from our perspective, there are intimations that their fulfillment takes place in the church.

First in importance is doubtless the promise to Abraham at the time of his initial call: ‘I will bless those who bless you ... and in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed’ (Gen. 12:3). At this point the Genesis account turns abruptly from general human history to Hebrew history. Abraham and his physical descendants are the cynosure from here to the end of the Bible. The promise rather quickly was enlarged to include a numerous progeny and their perpetual title to the Land of Canaan (Gen. 13:14–17). The language is definite to this effect. The promise did not take the formal quality of a covenant until later in the striking ceremony of Genesis 15. The promise (which came first) and the covenant were confirmed no less than twelve times over 215 years of the family’s residence in Canaan to the several patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.¹ Usually the promise of the Land of Canaan is prominent but we observe the promise of blessing to all the human families on the earth was initially present and was repeated later—notably to Jacob as he fled to Padan Aram from his brother, Esau, after Isaac pronounced ‘May he [God Almighty] give [you] the blessing of Abraham’ (Gen. 28:1–4). At Bethel God repeated, ‘in you and your offspring shall all the families of the earth be blessed’ (Gen. 28:14).

Reverent interpretation has always connected this with the protevangelion of Genesis 3:15 and crushing of the serpent’s head (Gen. 3:18) and the lineal physical descent of Christ the Savior (Gen.

1:21) from Abraham (Matt. 1:1–25). Evangelical commentators nowadays do not draw specific connection between the protevangelion (Gen. 3:15) and specific events in Messiah’s career, but rather that this is the ‘first good news’—‘the announcement of a prolonged struggle, perpetual antagonism, wounds on both sides, and eventual victory for the seed of the woman. God’s promise that the head of the serpent was to be crushed pointed forward to the coming of Messiah and guaranteed victory.’²

Second in importance are the several notices in several parts of the Old Testament that God’s saving grace was intended all along to be extended to Gentiles, that ‘all the peoples of the earth may know your [Jehovah’s] name and fear [worship] you, as do your people Israel, and that they may know,’ and so on.³ The language of one of Israel’s ritual Psalms prays that God’s ‘way’ and ‘saving power’ be known ‘among all nations’ (Ps. 67:1–4). Isaiah 56:6–8 (rsv) states that ‘foreigners’ will ‘join themselves to the Lord’ and in language cited directly by Jesus (Mark 11:17) says ‘My [God’s] house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations.’ It is predicted of the Servant of the Lord (whose atoning death is explained in Isa. 53) that He will establish his ‘justice’ in foreign places outside Israel (42:4) and He who will be a ‘covenant of the people [Israel]’ will also be ‘a light to the nations.’

These and other Old Testament intimations are set within the cultural-religious ambience of the Mosaic revelation, limited perhaps to the perspectives of the time. Jews of the time scarcely understood the real force of these predictions—a world-wide offer and acceptance of salvation. There is no hint here of a body of saints baptized in one Holy Spirit into one Body, yet they reveal the love of God for all mankind and provision of a Savior and implied proclaimed offer of salvation to every family kindred, tribe and nation.

Third in importance, Paul hinged his effort to persuade the church at Rome to help him shift his efforts to evangelize Gentiles from the eastern regions of the Roman Empire to the west (Spain) on a direct appeal to authority to the Old Testament. He draws from passages in all three major divisions of the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament): the Torah (five books of Moses), the Prophets and the Writings. Jesus, he says, ministered only to Jews because of God’s special promises of a Jewish Messiah (Rom. 15:8), but this was in order that (since rejection by Jews led to His atoning death) ‘the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy’ (i.e. participate in gracious salvation, Rom. 15:9 nkjv). Then he goes on to cite a chain of four verses to prove the point (Ps. 18:49; Deut. 32:43; Ps. 117:1; and Isa. 11:10, all cited immediately below from nasb):

As it is written,

‘THEREFORE I WILL GIVE PRAISE TO THEE AMONG THE GENTILES AND I WILL SING TO THY NAME.’

Again he says, REJOICE O GENTILES WITH HIS PEOPLE.

And again,

‘PRAISE THE LORD ALL YOU GENTILES, AND LET ALL THE PEOPLES PRAISE HIM.’

Again Isaiah says,

‘THERE SHALL COME THE ROOT OF JESSE,
AND HE WHO ARISES TO RULE OVER THE GENTILES,
IN HIM SHALL THE GENTILES HOPE.’

Before another audience Paul appealed to Isaiah 49:6: ‘I have made you a light for the Gentiles, that you may bring salvation to the ends of the earth’ (Acts 13:47).

After these citations of Old Testament authority for a gospel mission to the remote, Gentile west, Paul appealed for three benefits from the Roman Christians to help him on his mission to the West. He desired their friendship—he called it ‘company’ (v. 32)—their material support, ‘helped on my way,’ and their ‘prayers’ (v. 30).⁴

Though Paul found proof of the church’s missionary commission to evangelize Gentiles as well as Jews in the Old Testament he found nothing there about the special nature of the church. As we shall see, this came as a special revelation to Paul and other apostles. It is obscurely present in the Old Testament. Even the apostles themselves did not see things that way at first.⁵ The Lord had to stand Peter on his head—as reported in the vision of the sheet let down from heaven, his visit to Cornelius at Caesarea, and his subsequent convincing report to the reluctant Jerusalem church, before even the apostles saw a Jew-Gentile, ‘both one,’ church (Acts 10:1–11:18; Eph. 2). Only then did they acknowledge, ‘God has also granted to the Gentiles repentance to life’ (Acts 11:18 nkjv).

2. Types of the Church in the Old Testament

This is not the proper venue for a debate about types in biblical interpretation. Long ago as a professor of Old Testament I came to see what Stanley Gundry rightly says is ‘that one point of agreement’ among evangelical, orthodox interpreters: ‘that the essence of a type is that it is in some sense predictive, every bit as predictive as a verbal utterance of predictive prophecy.’⁶ The ark of Noah—favorite of preachers from John Chrysostom to Billy Graham—hardly qualifies as a type in this restricted sense. We can be certain of at least one. The evidence for divine intention as a type (= prediction by symbol) is clear in this case: the ‘tabernacle’ (or ‘tent’ Exod. 40:19 passim), ‘the house of God’ (Judg. 18:31 passim) and (much less frequently) ‘the temple (hekal) of the Lord’ [Jehovah], (1 Sam. 1:9 passim). This structure was God’s official ‘residence’; it was there that Moses came when the Lord wished to talk with him (Lev. 1:1 passim), where the entire worship system had its seat and center. God’s presence ‘filled’ it, as numerous passages say (Exod. 40:34–38). Many features of the structure and the priestly service were types of New Testament realities (antitypes), but it was the house (beth) itself (ohel or tent, then hekal or temple) which is a type of the New Testament church. This is marked with remarkable doctrinal and practical significance in 1 Corinthians 3:16, 17. I quote the passage in the kjv because the necessary distinction between plural ye (nom.) and you (accus.) and singular thou (nom.) and thee (accus.) is preserved in translation from the Greek text.

Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

If any man defile [or corrupt] the temple of God, him shall God destroy [corrupt];

for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Paul did not mean to say each person is God's temple. The Jerusalem temple played no significant role in the life of Gentile Christian churches; so he could freely make a figurative contrast: God's sanctuary was no longer a material building but was rather the collection of people among whom God's Spirit dwells.⁷

The sense is as follows: the believers, not only at the Corinth congregation but everywhere, are a temple (Gr. Naos), the room where the idol god in a Greek temple was set up, corresponding to the 'most holy place' in the Old Testament 'house of God,' where the ark of testimony and the shekinah (glory presence of God) were located. Just as Jehovah dwelt in the 'most holy place' of old so now the Holy Spirit of God indwells His whole church, rendering it a 'holy temple in the Lord.' In Ephesians 2, after showing Jews and Gentiles since Calvary (vv. 13–18), form only 'one body' he shifts the figure to citizenship; then to a household (v. 19); and finally to a whole 'building fitly framed together [which] groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: In whom ye [plural again] also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit' (vv. 21 and 22 kjv).

Back to 1 Corinthians 3:17 (kjv)—'If any man defile [harm or destroy] the temple of God, him shall God destroy [harm or defile].' God destroys, as in the case where He took the lives of Nadab and Abihu when they ignored the inviolability of divine regulations for temple service (Lev. 10), and when similarly 'God smote' Uzzah for violating the sanctity of the ark (2 Sam. 6:6, 7), though that poor man had every good intention to 'save' the ark from falling. So those who violate the sanctity of Christ's church by gossip, sectarian division, slander and the like, rebuked in the previous section of Paul's Epistle, will be judged in just proportion to the harm they have done to the church, the 'habitation of God through the Spirit.' This is a kind of divine lex talionis. Bengel calls it talione justissima, i.e. of a most just punishment similar and equal to the injury.⁸

The general trend of these comments will be both supported and amplified by most standard commentaries: older (Lange, Hodge, Meyer, Wordsworth, Alford) or more recent (Sauer, Bruce, Lindsell); even the somewhat liberal Orr and Walther in The Anchor Bible Commentary on the Corinthian Epistles.

The reliance of Paul on the house of God of old as type of the church is too obvious to be doubted by those who believe in any sort of typology of New Testament entities in the Old Testament. What convinced Christian can doubt that the type was of divine intention—a predictive prophecy in symbolic form? Like all types (and many verbal predictions), however, the connection between type and antitype could not be perceived clearly by people contemporary with the type. That could not happen until fulfillment, and even then often only by further revelation.

In this indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the church lies its dignity and its responsibility. Through this great fact they become the dwelling-place of God in history, one point of contact between eternity and time, the anticipation of the great and true perfection, ‘Behold the tabernacle of God is with men’ (Rev. 21:3).⁹

3. Preparation for the Church in the Old Testament

All of the plan of redemption, of course, from eternity past, has reference to the church as preparing for its creation, hence truly ‘foundation.’ The entire history of the Messianic nation—call, selection, growth, training, discipline and judgment, from Abraham to Joseph and Mary—which produced Jesus Christ, Lord of the church, is foundational. We press on to the actual establishment of the church.

In the next several chapters I seek to show that even though Jesus plainly said that He was ‘not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel,’ God’s design was the founding of the church. God’s plan and purpose involved rejection of Jesus by Israel. One thinks of Joseph’s rejection by his brothers. They could have received him with his father’s (Jacob’s) message of goodwill up north in Dothan (Gen. 37:12–27), but they did not. Instead they delivered him over to death, then changed their minds and sold him into slavery in Egypt. Later when their murderous intent was exposed to the world, Joseph, their intended victim, wise in the ways of providence, told them, ‘it was not you who sent me here, but God ... to preserve life’ (Gen. 45:5, 8), and later, ‘you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good ... that many people should be kept alive’ (Gen. 50:20). So Jesus’ death at the hands of wicked men to whom He offered Himself as king was ‘according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God’ (Acts 2:23). And, though I do not quite agree completely with my wise old professor in working out the details, I cannot improve on his judgment that this fact does not in the least detract from its moral and historical reality.... There remains the philosophical problem, of course, but this is nothing new; it being only an aspect of the wider problem of Divine Sovereignty and Moral Responsibility. And for this there is no completely rational solution which does not end by affirming one and denying the other. But the Word of God teaches the reality of both. And if perhaps we shall never wish to give up the search for an answer to the problem, a Christian attitude of intellectual humility will help in some degree to alleviate our uneasiness as we continue the quest.¹⁰

We may be sure that whatever in the eternal counsels of the Father Christ came to do, He ‘prosperously effected’ (2 Chron. 7:11 kjv, cf. Ps. 45:4). At the end of life He could report to the Father, ‘I ... [have] accomplished the work that you gave me to do’ (John 17:4).

Just how great that was must be appreciated if one is to grasp firmly the dimensions of His preparatory work in founding the church. In the Christology section of this Systematic Theology (see above, Part 4: Christology: The Person and Work of Christ), chapter 2, ‘Preparation for the Coming of Christ,’ I set forth in some detail how Old Testament history and prophecy prepared for the coming of Christ as Savior of mankind and Lord of the church.¹¹ The whole Old Testament is involved, some Messianic by way of preparing the historical setting as found in Israel when Messiah arrived; some by calling for the ethical ideal (Pss. 1 and 5) of a holy and just Man, never attained except when Jesus came; others by heralding the distant parousia, i.e. personal presence of God (the incarnation) (Micah 1:3; Pss. 50:3; 94:1 and 96:13); others speaking of a King whose universal realm shall extend to the ends of the earth (Pss. 45 and 72 are examples). Still others provide particular types of Christ's person, experience and redemptive work in the life experience of prominent Old Testament personages. Among these some passages, like Psalm 22, describe experiences of the typical person in an exaggerated (hyperbolic) way, while others are direct predictions in typical objects (as the Tabernacle-temple) or the Passover sacrifice. Finally in the highest and most direct level are direct, verbal predictions such as the place of Jesus' birth (Micah 5:2) or of His rejection and sufferings for the sake of His church (Isa. 53; cf. Eph. 5:25; Acts 20:28).

We have spoken of types of Christ as such, and of prophecies of the salvation of Gentiles in the Old Testament a bit earlier. In the above we are thinking in a more general way of how the Old Testament predicts the manner in which provision in Christ for the redemption, calling and creation of the body of Christ is unfolded in Old Testament prophecy. A feature of this aspect of the subject is how our Lord fulfilled the law. This important subject is a matter of ongoing difference of opinion among sober, believing scholars. If pursued in detail here it would distract from pursuit of a comprehensive doctrine of the church. Let us therefore move on to the narrative of actual establishment of the Church.

¹ Gen. 12:1–3; 13:14–17; 15:1–21; 17:1–21; 18:1–15; 22:11–18; 27:27–29; 28:10–17; 31:3; 32:24–29; 46:1–4; 48:15–49:27.

² Kyle M. Yates, Sr., 'Genesis,' The Wycliffe Bible Commentary (Chicago: Moody Press, 1962), p. 8.

³ 2 Chron. 6:32–33 from Solomon's prayer of dedication for the temple at Jerusalem.

⁴ Verse 24, see C. R. Barrett, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (New York: Harpers, 1957), p. 229; C. E. B. Cranfield, Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, Vol. 32:2 ICC (Edinburgh: T and T Clark, 1979), p. 769; and R. D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1976, 1996), pp. 129, 130.

⁵ H. R. Boer, Pentecost and Missions (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1961), pp. 15–27. And Culver, op. cit. pp. vii–xv.

⁶ Stanley Gundry, 'Typology as a Means of Interpretation,' Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society XII, 4), p. 237.

⁷ W. F. Orr and J. A. Walther, I Corinthians: The Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1976), p. 174.

⁸ J. A. Bengel, Gnomon Novi Testament ii (Tubingen, 1850), p. 110.

⁹ Erich Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 38.

¹⁰ A. J. McClain, The Greatness of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1959), p. 320.

¹¹ Also in 'The Old Testament as Messianic Prophecy,' Bulletin of Evangelical Theological Society,

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (834). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

7

The Establishment of the Church

In several previous chapters we have seen that God has always had the creation of the body of Christ, the church of the first-born, the temple of the living God, in His plans. Further, though the church per se is never named or described in the Old Testament, the Gospels do show Jesus fully aware of His mission to found and to build a church. Paul cited and interpreted several Old Testament passages as predicting the extension of the gospel to the world of Gentiles. We have also seen how the New Testament writers point to types of the church in the Old Testament. So none can deny that the church has always been at the ‘omega point’ (to borrow a phrase from Pierre Teilhard de Chardin) of God’s plan for the fullness of consummation of all things. This is the particular emphasis of Ephesians 1–3. The church, then, was no improvisation or backup position in case the first plan failed. Calvary was not a failure of plans but the very sine qua non of their success.

In a general way most students of the Word agree to this. Yet that we hold strictly to it is necessary if we are properly to interpret the New Testament narrative relating to the creation (establishment, inauguration) of the church.

For the present let us defer consideration of the relation of the church to Old Testament Israel and the kingdom of God and some related issues to the next chapters. For clarity’s sake we must think of the church as an entity brought into existence—fresh and new—after the close of the epoch of ‘the old covenant’ (2 Cor. 3:14; Heb. 8:6–13). Jesus said: ‘The Law and the Prophets were until John [the Baptist]; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached’ (Luke 16:16). For now let us accept a common-sense opinion stated well by W. E. Garrison (who certainly had no dispensationalist inclinations) whom I shall quote somewhat at length. He notes that some people presuppose:

- (a) a ‘people of God’ at however early a stage in history may be called the church, and
- (b) that at any later stage it can still be called an Israel. This is a loose use of language. There is no justification for making ‘church’ and ‘Israel’ synonyms for ‘people of God’ under all circumstances. The linguistic link is provided for by the use of the ekklēsia both in the Greek Version of the Old Testament and in the New Testament. The link is weak, however, because the word is used with different meanings. In the Greek Old Testament ekklēsia (like the Hebrew qahal which it generally translates) means only an assembly or meeting which ceases to exist when the meeting breaks up [C. F. Keil says in his famous Commentary that ‘the congregation (Heb. qahal, Gr. ekklēsia) of Israel’ was never the entire population anyway, but only the elders who represented them]; in the New Testament it means a continuing entity.... The phrase ‘new Israel’ has no New Testament support, nor was it used by any of the early fathers in reference to the church. It came into use only after the church had lost its free voluntary character and had taken on some of the characteristics of the Hebrew ‘people of God’ ... when the church had made its alliance with the government ... and virtually co-extensive with the community ... and had committed its religious and administrative functions to a priesthood.... The rootage of Christianity in Hebrew history is deep, and undoubtedly a continuing process of God runs through both. But the church was a new thing. It is the body of Christ and the fellowship of those who are committed to him. No religion before Christianity ever had a church.¹

We shall return to this important matter in the next chapter. It is true that Jesus limited His personal (as opposed to redemptive) ministry to national Israelites who inhabited ancient Palestine, and sent the Twelve only ‘to the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Matt. 10:6). Yet this was subordinate to His redemptive ministry for all mankind and ultimately for ‘the church.’ Several oft-cited, golden texts make the point: ‘the Son of Man came not to be served [as Israel’s royal Messiah] but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many’ (Matt. 20:28; cf. Mark 10:45). When Paul addressed the elders of the church at Ephesus he spoke of them as overseers of God’s ‘flock’ appointed by the Holy Spirit ‘to care for the church of God, which he obtained with his own blood’ (Acts 20:28). So we know for whom the Son of Man gave ‘his life as a ransom’—‘the church of God.’ More of this later, but these impressive texts should lead us to expect the creation of ‘the church of the living God’ to be on God’s program for the Son from the beginning of His life and career. The following paragraphs are intended to show, in the language of the New Testament records, how this ‘plan for the church’ was carried out. We observe the following.

I. The Appearance and Certification of Jesus As Both the Promised Christ and Lord of the Church

This is the meaning of the Gospels’ narrative of the coming and career of Jesus of Nazareth in Peter’s speech to the assembled Gentiles in Caesarea Maritima, at the house of the Roman centurion, Cornelius (Acts 10:34–43). The speech opens with Peter’s new understanding that Jesus was sent by God to be ‘Lord of all’ in ‘every nation’ even though ‘the word’ was first sent to Israel and was preached ‘throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee after the baptism that John proclaimed.’ Peter alludes to some difference in Jesus’ message, the ‘word that he sent to Israel,’ from ‘the baptism that John proclaimed’ (vv. 34–37).

Peter reports what Jesus did and what happened to Him, not what He said, ‘God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power. He went about doing good and healing all who were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him’ (v. 38). Peter is saying this means Jesus established Himself not merely as an outstanding rabbi, but as Savior and Lord of all (v. 36) and the one ‘appointed by God to be judge of [all] the living and the dead’ (v. 42) (not to deny His prophetic office as Teacher). Jesus’ dominion is universal, Peter said, being Lord of all—which includes the ordering of times, seasons and epochs. He goes on to mention Jesus’ death ‘by hanging him on a tree’ and how ‘God raised him on the third day’ (v. 40). Peter makes no mention of the redemption wrought by Christ’s death and resurrection—a point Peter emphasized later in teaching the believers ‘of the dispersion’ throughout the world chosen by ‘God the Father, in the sanctification of the Spirit’ (1 Peter 1:1, 2) ‘ransomed ... with the precious blood of Christ’ (1 Peter 1:18, 19).

But at Caesarea—where Peter is describing a change of epochs in God’s ordering of salvation history from preparatory stages to realization in a new thing of world-wide, supranational proportions—he does not call this new thing a church, though no doubt the meaning of what Jesus solemnly announced to him (‘I will build my church’) at Philippi several years before (Matt. 16:18, 19) now began to stimulate Peter’s sometimes sluggish rate of perception.

Then Peter moves on to tell Cornelius and company how the Holy Spirit empowered Jesus for His mission and certified the same to certain apostolic ‘witnesses’ (v. 39) that Jesus was the authentic Messiah. He cites the anointing ‘with the Holy Spirit’ (at His baptism) and ‘with power’ (dunamis, a word both for authority and for a miracle, of which Jesus performed many). He refers to Jesus’ miracles of ‘healing’ and casting out of demons (‘all ... oppressed by the devil’ [v. 38]). Then he speaks of Jesus’ resurrection after crucifixion. Only those ‘chosen by God as witnesses, who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead’ saw Him after God ‘made’ the risen Savior ‘to appear.’

This is the authentic primitive kerygma the liberal New Testament scholars have sought for a century.

This amazing discourse has more Old Testament connections than is immediately obvious. The tests of authenticity of a messenger of God (nabhi, prophet), set forth in Deuteronomy 18:9–22 and chapter 13, were all met by Jesus as reported in the Gospels. This is pointedly noticed in Peter’s speech to Cornelius’ household. The authenticating marks are evident: an Israelite who spoke in Jehovah’s name, who performed authenticated miracles, and made authenticated predictions of the near future, and conformed to the Mosaic revelation, are all present in Jesus’ story. Peter concluded his discourse, as Calvin said, with three things, [1] that it is the proper office of Christ to reconcile men to God when their sins are done away; [2] that we have remission of sins by faith; [3] that this doctrine is not new or of late invented, but that it had all the prophets of God since the beginning of the world to bear witness of it.²

‘To him all the prophets bear witness’ does not mean that a particular text in each Old Testament book of prophecy, or every oracle or sermon in the historical books and Pentateuch, predicts the coming of the Savior and the remission of sins for ‘everyone who believes in him.’ There is a much deeper connection here with God’s promise to Abraham and Abraham’s example of justification by faith and by faith alone (Gen. 15:6; cf. Rom. 4:1–6). Every true prophet directly or indirectly called the people of Israel to faith in the promise of God to Abraham. They were the ones to whom the oracles of God were committed (Rom. 3:1, 2), and from whom as ‘according to the flesh [i.e. His human nature], is the Christ’ (Rom. 9:5). For quite some time before Peter was specially sent to Caesarea, Cornelius had been ‘a devout man who feared God with all his household’ (Acts 10:2). That is to say, he was already a believer in the Word of God and the God of the Word—a sincere Gentile in possession of hearty faith in the revelation most of the contemporary Jews only professed to understand and believe. He was not unlike the little circle of Jews (Mary, Joseph, Zachariah, Elizabeth, Simeon, Anna) who ‘waited for the consolation of Israel’ about forty years earlier. He was already one of Abraham’s spiritual children in the sense of Galatians 3:6–9—‘those of faith ... are the sons of Abraham.’

Cornelius and his household, all justified by faith, were an earnest of the great church universal of every kindred and tribe and nation. He trusted ‘the gospel [preached] beforehand to Abraham’ (Gal.

3:8). All the prophets had called the people of Israel back to the righteousness imputed to those who have genuine faith, manifest in what theologians like to call ‘evangelical obedience.’

Peter’s witness to the appearance and certification of Jesus as Christ and Lord was used to open the door of the church to these Caesarean Gentiles. Immediately the same Spirit who baptized the waiting Jewish believers at Jerusalem into the ‘one body’ (cf. Acts 2:1–4 with 1 Cor. 12:12, 13) now united this household of Gentile believers into that one church, for ‘while Peter was still saying these words [ta hrēmata] the Holy Spirit fell on all those heard the word [ton logon].’ They all listened to the words and understood the message of the words.

I have cited the Cornelius incident (Acts 10) before citing the Pentecostal ‘birthday of the church’ because Peter’s message at Caesarea interprets the Gospels’ narratives in relation to the appearance and certification of Jesus of Nazareth (Acts 10:30) as Lord of the church, not merely as the ‘king of Israel,’ as Nathanael, the sixth Jew to adhere to Jesus, seems to have thought (John 1:49). Yet on the earlier occasion, Peter had made some of the same points. For example, he said ‘Jesus of Nazareth’ was ‘a man attested to you by God with mighty works and wonders and signs which God did through him in your midst’ (Acts 2:22 rsv)—Jesus appeared as One sent of God and as fully accredited by the proper means.

Hebrews 2:1–4, likely written near the end of the apostolic age, points out that the message of salvation spoken by the Lord Jesus was confirmed to the second generation of believers (that is those evangelized by the Apostles) by signs (sēmeious) and wonders (terasín) and diverse miracles (dunamesín) performed by the apostolic preachers (Rom. 15:17–19). These are the same special terms employed in the Gospels to identify Jesus’ supernatural works of healing, feeding the 5,000, walking on water and the like. They confirmed the message of Jesus and His Messiahship even though very few of the generation who heard Jesus believed Him (John 12:37–41). The signs wrought later by the Apostles, after the special work of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost and subsequently in and through the Apostles, proved more persuasive. So the great Apostle to the Gentiles explained in his letter to the church at Rome, concerning ‘what Christ has accomplished through me to bring the Gentiles to obedience—by word and deed, by the power of signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God—so that from Jerusalem and all the way around to Illyricum I have fulfilled the ministry of the gospel of Christ’ (Rom. 15:18–20). Paul’s campaign of evangelism was appropriate and successful only because an epochal change had been inaugurated, the epoch of the Spirit. The same Spirit who after Pentecost united all believers into one church was now also for the first time in history convicting people everywhere of sin, righteousness and judgment (John 16:8–10) through the Word.

II. The Choice of the Founders of the Church, Their Instruction and Qualifications

I have reference, of course, to those companions of our Lord who ‘accompanied us during all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us ... from the beginning’ of His ministry,³ known as Apostles.⁴

Jesus was apparently the first religious leader—or for that matter, any kind of leader—to call His chief agents apostles. One might expect some precedent in the Old Testament, but there is none. Apostolos, derived from the usual Greek verb (apostellō) to send someone away, is almost identical in meaning to the Hebrew word shaluah, one sent, used dozens of times. But apostolos translates shaluah only once (1 Kings 14:6). This occurrence might just possibly be the one linguistic source of our word Apostle as the New Testament uses it. Jesus, who likely spoke to His disciples in Aramaic, would have said shaliah, the Aramaic form of the word.

Let us look at the single occurrence of Apostolos in the Greek Old Testament, the Septuagint.⁵

King Jeroboam's son Abijah was sick, so the king 'sent' (shalah) his wife, disguised as someone else, to inquire of the aged prophet Ahijah if the boy would recover. Ahijah, though blind by reason of age, penetrated the disguise, and informed the poor woman, that he too had been officially 'sent' (by God) with a message and command, saying 'I am sent to thee with heavy tidings' (1 Kgs. 14:6 kjv). '[S]ent' is Hebrew sha-lu-ah, a qal passive participle of the ordinary word 'to send.'⁶

III. Founders of the Christian Ekklēsia

This probable connection of shaliah with apostolos makes it appropriate that Jesus should choose the Twelve and name them 'apostles' (Luke 6:13) immediately prior to sending them out on their very first preaching mission, a mission to Israel only (Matt. 10:5, 6; cf. v. 2). Yet it is hardly possible that in choosing them and authorizing them as ministers plenipotentiary (as we shall see), Jesus had anything less than their future as founders of the church in mind. Ephesians expounds the doctrine of the church in a special way. The teaching in Ephesians 2 is that the eternal purpose of God toward the consummation of history in a church composed of Jews and Gentiles, the veritable 'household of God' (Eph. 2:19), is 'built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets' (Eph. 2:20). This seems decisive to the effect that this is precisely why Christ established the 'office,' chose twelve men to fill the office and trained them to fulfill their office.

The initiative in becoming a disciple came partly from the people who became disciples—and there were multitudes of them. Other Jewish rabbis had disciples (mathētēs, learner, follower) too. The initiative for becoming one of Jesus' Apostles, however, came entirely from the Master Himself: 'he called his disciples and chose from them twelve, whom he named apostles' (Luke 6:13; cf. Matt. 10:1 ff.; Mark 3:14 ff.); 'You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed (ethēka) you' (John 15:16). Though, as fair-minded commentators agree, 'Jesus is undoubtedly addressing himself to all Christians ... as John 15:27 makes clear, Jesus' words here are directed to those who have been with him from the beginning. That apostles, "ones sent" are particularly in mind in the "I chose you" of verse 16 is suggested by what follows.'⁷ C. K. Barrett suggests that the Greek verb may reflect 'Heb. samak, to lay [hands] on, ordain, the verb-used in later Judaism of the ordination of a scholar or rabbi. Samak/epitithenai are used respectively in the Hebrew MT and LXX of Numbers 6:10 for the ordination of Levites and in Numbers 27:18 for Moses' commission of Joshua.'⁸

Mark says that Jesus' initial purpose in constituting twelve of His disciples as Apostles was threefold (Mark 3:14-15). The first was 'that they might be with him.' This was surely with a view to instructing them fully as missionary founders and instructors of the church by oral (preaching) and written (New Testament Scripture) means in the period after His Ascension: viz. 'teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you ... to the close of the age' (Matt. 28:20 rsv).

The second purpose, that 'he might send them out to preach,' was completed in part when they returned from their first mission to announce to Jews then living in northern Palestine the presence of the promised Messianic King and His kingdom (Matt. 10:5–7; cf. Luke 8:1–10). They did so as ministers plenipotentiary (Matt. 10:40).

The third purpose—to have miraculous powers—was similar to the Lord’s purpose in using such powers, viz. to provide credentials as divinely certified heralds of the arrived king and kingdom. Similar powers were temporarily granted to seventy messengers whom Jesus later sent out (Luke 10:1–17).

These purposes, including the miraculous powers, were permanently attached to the Apostles, and only to them. The Twelve certainly failed later in many ways. They even briefly ‘forsook him and fled’ as did all the disciples.

Yet the discourses of Jesus with the Twelve, especially the Upper Room Discourse of John 13–18, do clearly imply that their Lord was addressing the Twelve as accredited plenipotentiaries for an age about to begin at Pentecost [Acts 2], however sad their temporary lapse[s] may have been. Further, the several promises and charges given by Jesus to the apostles during their years with him compel us to believe that from the moment of their first commission Jesus constituted them the first chronologically in the church to be founded. Likewise, as the ‘founders’ of the church they were its first teachers (Matt. 16:18–19 cf. John 20:19–23; Eph. 2:20; see also Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:28–30).⁹

At this point it is important to point out that Jesus designated the Apostle Peter to a unique place among the Twelve in the founding of the church. I shall seek to show that the Lord used him in a special way to constitute the church a new and unique entity.

It is too much to assume that every reader will be familiar with the circumstances which led up to Jesus’ near ecstatic announcement to Peter in the region about Caesarea Philippi—territory mostly populated by heathen, high on the southwestern slopes of Mt Hermon. Let me therefore summarize thirteen pages (137–149 of *The Earthly Career of Jesus, the Christ*¹⁰). Jesus had definitely turned away from addressing the Jewish inhabitants of Palestine months before. The tetrarch Herod Antipas, having just lynched John the Baptist, was now perceiving Jesus as a threat (Mark 6:14–29; Matt. 14:1–12; Luke 9:7–9). The Pharisees and their scribes, angry with Him and offended from the first (John 2:13–21), now sought to kill Him. The population both of Judea and Galilee had shown themselves quite uncomprehending of the repentance required by His kingdom. Besides, he needed extended time alone with the Twelve to do what could be done before ‘He the Spirit of Truth’ should come and history would enlarge their understanding. Time was required to deposit in their minds the truths the Spirit would later bring to remembrance (John 14:26) and explain (John 16:12–14).

Jesus created the opportunity to instruct the Twelve and to impart as much information about the future as was possible by retreating from Jewish territory to an unclean land, northwest Canaan (Phoenicea) as far as Sidon (Matt. 7:24–8:10; Matt. 15:31–38). After an unsuccessful, brief foray back into Galilee (Mark 8:10–25; Matt. 15:39 ff.) the party of thirteen headed for pagan lands again, ‘the borders of Caesarea Philippi.’ All this must have been done in part to show by the very road they traveled (among Gentiles) that a new epoch in salvation history and of God’s dealing with the human race was about to dawn. Just before the retreat to Phoenicia, Mark, hinting at a break with the Mosaic epoch, parenthetically notes: ‘Thus he [Jesus] declared all foods [kosher or not] clean’ (Mark 7:19). So the stage was set for Jesus’ pivotal announcement about a future church, a church in which Peter would carry out a very special mission (Matt. 16:13–19).

Many ingenious explanations of the passage containing these announcements have been proposed. Albright and Mann comment: ‘There is no passage in the Gospels more discussed than this.’¹¹ It would require a long chapter to name and describe the various opinions. Many of the differences derive from views brought to the passage about (1) the time of the origin of the church (was it entirely future?); (2) the nature of the church (i.e. what constitutes for believers, Jewish or Gentile, a church?); and (3) the ‘rock’ on which Jesus said ‘I will build my church’ (is it Peter himself, Peter’s confession [‘thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God’], ‘Peter confessing’ or perhaps not Peter at all but Christ Himself?).

In addition, if, as I am convinced, Peter is the rock (whether petra or petros), what are the ‘keys of the kingdom of heaven’ and what is bound or loosed in heaven and earth? Further, when and how did Peter use these keys and did he pass this mighty power on to any one else—to the papal succession, as the Roman Church claims? To elders as rulers of a local church?¹²

Salient points of Jesus’ announcement in the order they appear are as follows. Peter had already prophetically been renamed Kephas by Jesus when He first summoned him to discipleship (John 1:42; Mark 3:16). Jesus now discloses why He had called Simon a kephas (Gr. Petros) from the beginning.

1. Simon Barjona, now named Rock, was sovereignly chosen by the Father in heaven to receive the revelation of Jesus the Messiah. The conviction did not develop out of unusual insight.

2. Peter (also Simon and Kephas or Rock) is the name Christ gave this man. The word petros (as in our petrify and petroglyph, which mean, respectively, to turn to rock and rock-writing) has no article, hence ‘Thou art Rock.’ He was not ‘Rock’ before Jesus met him but simply Simon, a name passed down from one of Jacob’s twelve sons (Simeon). Peter was not ‘naturally’ a rock-like man, any more than Moses had all the qualities of leadership before the Lord met him at the burning bush. There were, however, ‘born in’ qualities which could be ‘petrified’ (see the case of Jeremiah, Jer. 1:5; Gal. 1:15).

3. As Rock, Peter will be tautē tē petra, literally, ‘this, the stone,’ on which Christ will build His ekklēsia (church). Twice in Matthew 7:24 this word petra is used for the foundation rock on which one would build a permanent house, likewise, twice in Luke 6:48. Our equivalent in English would be ‘bedrock.’ Peter is presented in the Gospels and Galatians as possessing less than the steady character of rock. No other apostle seems to have so much unsteadiness reported—one of the ‘weak things’ chosen to ‘confound the wise.’ Nevertheless, throughout the period of the birth and first steps of the new community, the Christian Ekklēsia, Peter is the prime character of the story, as we shall see. To a lesser degree the same is true in the Gospels’ reports of the apostolic nucleus (e.g. Matt. 10:2; 14:28–31; and our text). ‘The interest in Peter’s failures and vacillations does not detract from this pre-eminence; rather it emphasizes it.’

4. Peter as Rock also received from Christ ‘the keys of the kingdom of heaven.’ He was thereby designated Christ's vizier, steward or chamberlain in admitting people to the new community of Messiah. It was an office like Joseph's (Gen. 41:40–44; 45:8). To get to Pharaoh one had to get by Joseph first. I think Isaiah 22:15–25 is probably the specific Old Testament background. A certain Shebna who was 'over the house' of David (vv. 15, 22) and had the 'office' and 'station' (v. 19), also had a special 'robe,' 'girdle' and 'the key of the house of David' (v. 22) was borne on his shoulder. (See 2 Kings 15:5.) In Christ's time this steward of the house had a key sometimes heavy enough to be borne on the shoulder—the heavy doors of palaces swung in stone sockets (see Isa. 9:6, 7; Isa. 22:22). As appears later on, Peter functioned in this office no less than three times, each time opening the door of the church to a new class of people, progressively admitting believers in God through Christ into the church, here called both church and the kingdom of heaven. We shall shortly attend to this matter.

Peter would never have any special authority to admit people to salvation. Every preacher of the gospel has that. Rather, Peter's authority is that of an oikonomos, manager of a household or steward (Luke 12:42; 16:1, 3, 8; Rom. 16:23) responsible to the master (owner). 'The authority in question is that of a house-steward, who is empowered to determine who are and who are not to be admitted to the household over which his master has commissioned him to preside.'¹³

I add: the power of Peter described here relates to the whole church universal, which power Peter exercised as described in Acts 2; 8; and 10. Similar language in Matthew 18 relates to the power a local assembly of believers has to include and to exclude from that local ekklēsia. The Matthew 18 account does not say anything of extending Peter's powers. It relates to a different situation entirely, on a different plane.

5. In exercising his office Peter would be 'loosing' and 'binding' publicly and visibly on earth what God had already loosed and bound beyond human vision, in heaven. The sense is that the events are associated with Peter's use of the keys at Jerusalem in forming the first ekklēsia of 3,000 Jews (Acts 2), the second of a group of newly converted half-Jews at Samaria (Acts 8), the third of a large household of Roman Gentiles at Caesarea (Acts 10). Peter later assigned this significance to 'the keys of the kingdom' given exclusively to him (Acts 15:7). Space forbids marshaling all the evidence for this interpretation of Matthew 16:19 and 'the keys.'¹⁴ Roman Catholic theology and exegesis, of course, insists that Peter, the Rock, was the church's representative of Christ on earth, and after him, in lineal descent, each bishop (pope) of Rome has full jurisdiction over all the church on earth. This jurisdiction is also over all princes and governors. Though the latter is not emphasized today, Rome has not plainly withdrawn the claim. This may be documented in the Documents of Vatican II and subsequent official pronouncements. (These sources do not usually attempt to prove from Scripture that Peter's 'jurisdiction' was passed on to succeeding popes.) The power of the keys 'designates authority to govern ... the church.'¹⁵

Christ appointed the Apostle Peter to be the first of all the Apostles and to be the Visible Head of the whole church by appointing him immediately and personally to the primacy of jurisdiction.¹⁶

According to Christ's ordinance, Peter is to have successors in his Primacy over the whole church and for all time.¹⁷

These quotations from a current standard textbook for instruction of priests supports the perpetual jurisdiction of the pope primarily on Matthew 16:17–19, the passage presently under discussion. Insofar as the post-Vatican II Roman Church finds ‘marks of authenticity’ (‘sanctification’) among Protestants, Eastern Orthodox and others it claims right of government by the pope over them too.

Rome relates what is clearly the power of the local assembly to govern itself set forth by Jesus (Matt. 18:18) to ‘all the Apostles,’ i.e. Roman bishops.¹⁸

Rome had difficulty at the time of the Reformation in finding support for the succession of Peter’s power in the successive popes and likewise for apostolic succession in the bishops of the hierarchy. The Roman Church has simply assumed the authority of Apostles promised by Jesus (John 14–16) resides in the church’s hierarchy and rests their practice upon dogmatic pronouncements. Karl Adam, who combined great learning with marvelous felicity of expression, frankly admitted that the exegetical basis of papal succession from Peter is not present in Matthew. He acknowledged the ‘Roman primacy’ was ‘subject to some development.’¹⁹ It seems to this reader of Karl Adam’s famous book that he resorts to Roman Catholic feeling alone, not to historical or biblical proofs.

Note On Binding and Loosing

Most Versions of the binding and loosing by Peter in Matthew 16:19 are essentially alike—indicative mood, future tense. In the Greek, however, dēsēs (bind) and lusēs (loose) are both subjunctive active—‘you may bind’ and ‘you may loose,’ not necessarily future, but certainly conditional. The clauses about heaven are not simple future passive (‘shall be bound ... shall be loosed’) but future, perfect passive—estai dedemenon, ‘will have been bound’; estai lelumenon, ‘will have been loosed.’ This tense and mood are very rare in ancient Greek. Authorities usually cite only three occurrences in the New Testament and two in the Old Testament LXX. Why the scholars who gave us our Versions and our commentaries take no notice of these facts, I do not know. There is no precise correspondence between Greek tenses and English tenses. Yet about as precise as possible a rendering is the one found in the The Anchor Bible:²⁰ ‘Whatever you bind on earth will have been bound in heaven, and whatsoever you release on earth will have been so released in heaven.’ This is how the Latin Vulgate translates it also—Latin and Greek having quite similar tense systems. Is this important? Yes. ‘It is certainly unsafe ... to proceed upon any other supposition than that the New Testament writer used the tense which would convey just the idea he wished to express.’²¹ The idea here seems plain. Heaven did not promise to certify and enforce whatever Peter and successors might decree true or demand of the church; rather that Peter as steward of God’s new household (the Christian ekklēsia) would act at God’s pleasure not his own, and admit or exclude precisely those whom heaven had already admitted or excluded. We see him admitting in Acts 2; 8; and 10. We see him refusing Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5) and Simon Magus (Acts 8).

The New Testament, outside of the ministry of Paul, does not tell much of the particular deeds of the Apostles beyond Jerusalem in founding churches. I have published a book showing that Jesus supplied them with specific principles and methods for their mission.²² We owe a debt to Eusebius of Caesarea, Palestine, who gathered up a narrative of their work shortly after the Council of Nicea (ad 324) in his Ecclesiastical History, available in several English editions. All we know of Christian antiquity demonstrates the early church universally regarded the Apostles as authoritative messengers of Christ who, together with certain New Testament prophets, founded the first churches, furnished them with the canon of New Testament Scripture and established the ekklēsia firmly in all the world (see Mark 16:19, 20; Col. 1:6; 1 Peter 1:1). The church of Jesus Christ is at its very heart not only one, holy and catholic, but veritably apostolic. There has been no personal power on earth equal to theirs since except as present in the Holy Scriptures which they left behind. Similar language about binding and loosing occurs at Matthew 18:18. Roman Catholic apologetics and dogmatics claim this text for the bishops of the church as successors to the apostolic Twelve, without textual support, because it relates wholly to a local ekklēsia ‘gathered together’ in prayer and exercising discipline over its members.

IV. The Instruction and ‘Inspiration’ of the Apostolic Founders

The twelve men chosen by Jesus were already initiated and practicing Palestinian Jews. They already had received the best the synagogue had to offer. They were no strangers to any part of the Old Testament revelation, as the way Jesus addressed them constantly demonstrates.

Men worthy to be first members of the church, to serve as special agents in the great harvest of souls, must be prepared of God. The Twelve had individually long awaited ‘the consolation of Israel’; several had heard John the Baptist and, as he insisted, had ‘prepared the way of the Lord’ in their own hearts by repentance. When the Baptist cried: ‘Behold, the Lamb of God!’ ... they followed Jesus’ (John 1:36, 37). Later when Jesus said, ‘Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men’ (Matt. 4:19) the record says they left all and did just that. When called to be Apostles some had already been following the Baptist for quite a while and all had been Jesus’ disciples from six months to more than a year.²³ Full instruction had to await the redeeming death of Christ, His resurrection, post-resurrection ministry in the ‘forty days’ and the special advent of the Holy Spirit. Yet Jesus had filled their several years in His company with instruction and conditioning for the coming epoch, some of it very specific, pertaining to their specifically apostolic work of missionary evangelism (Matt. 10 and 13). What they received was all intended directly or indirectly for the believers in the about-to-be formed church.

Portions of His discourses would have no relevance until after Christianity began to be widespread, late in the Apostles’ lives and even after their death (e.g. Matt. 10:18). Among His last admonishments to them was to teach disciples among ‘all nations ... all that I have commanded you’ (Matt. 28:19, 20). Jesus’ parables and proverbs, warnings and promises became the commonplaces of early instruction of believers. The Christian preachers of the first centuries whose teachings, sermons and sayings have come down to us were occupied heavily with what Jesus had spoken—not all of it in the canonical Gospels. As a safeguard of ‘the doctrine’ Paul ‘exhorted’ Timothy to point people to Jesus’ words, saying: ‘Teach and urge these things. If anyone teaches a different doctrine and does not agree with the sound words of our Lord Jesus Christ and the teaching that accords with godliness, he ... understands nothing’ (1 Tim. 6:2–4).

Some features of the church and kingdom were revealed to the Apostles—and to certain prophets—only after redemption was finished and after the effusion of the Holy Spirit.

It is an educational axiom that people understand answers well only after they have asked related questions, i.e. education cannot run ahead of personal development. Therefore it should be no surprise that on that last night with the Twelve (and only the Twelve), He said to Peter that he was not yet ready to understand the significance of that striking foot-washing incident in Chapter 13 of John. Later in the evening He said to them all (now only Eleven), ‘I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now’ (John 16:12).²⁴

During the forty days of Jesus’ post-resurrection ministry Jesus spoke, evidently at length, to them of ‘things pertaining to the kingdom of God’ (Acts 1:3 kjv). The Apostles even then were not ready for all the incipient church would need to know. Jesus had explained in His ‘Upper Room Discourse’ (John 14–16) in some detail to those who ‘have been with me from the beginning’ (John 15:27) that after ‘the Spirit of truth’ should come He would cause them to remember what Jesus had been saying to them over the months of their association. He, the Spirit, would explain what Jesus had meant. He would also show them ‘things to come’ and the revelation would be a complete revelation (John 16:13). In a future chapter we shall see how the specific nature of the church became a matter of special treatment vouchsafed to ‘holy apostles and [N.T.] prophets’ (Eph. 3:1–5). Though Paul is the apostle who reports the matter most fully and, as an ‘out of season’ (1 Cor. 15:8) Apostle, received some special treatment, it was by no means an exclusively Pauline revelation. This also will come in for fuller treatment. Likewise we must put on hold several features of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit which relate to the inauguration of the church. At a critical moment well along in His ministry Jesus spoke the words which are the key to distinguishing old covenant believers from the church, new covenant believers:

‘On the last day of the feast, the great day, Jesus stood up and cried out, “If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, ‘Out of his heart will flow rivers of living water.’ ” [to which John adds:] Now this he said about the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were to receive, for as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified’ (John 7:37–39).

The new relation of believers to God is to be constituted by a new ‘giving’ of the Holy Spirit. Jesus’ last word on that subject came in His last hours with the Apostles: ‘You know him, for he dwells with you [par’ humin] and will be [estai] in you [en humin]’ (John 14:17).

These passages seem clearly to say that even exemplary believers before Pentecost—think of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews—did not have that indwelling presence of the Spirit which was first experienced by the disciples of Christ on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2).

Ascertaining the time and manner of the actual inauguration of the church requires ascertaining the nature of the church. This is deeply involved with ascertaining the relation of the church to Israel and the kingdom of God (or of heaven). To these matters we now turn our attention.

¹ Winfred Ernest Garrison, A Protestant Manifesto (New York, Nashville: Abington-Cokesbury, 1952), pp. 94, 95.

² Calvin, Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, Vol. i (Edinburgh: 1844), p. 448.

³ Acts 1:21, 22; John 15:27.

⁴ Matt. 10:1–3; Luke 6:13–16; John 15:27; Acts 1:21, 22.

⁵ Hatch and Redpath, Concordance to the Septuagint, sub. Apostolos, i, p. 145.

⁶ The ancient Aramaic translation of the Bible (Syriac Peshitta) uses shaliaḥ to translate apostolos throughout the New Testament. This word (also in Aramaic, the spoken language of Jesus and His circles) slightly modified from shaluaḥ to shaliaḥ is the common word in rabbinical Hebrew for an official messenger authorized to act for the sender. Amazingly, 1 Kings 14:6 is the one occasion in the entire Septuagint (ancient Gr. trans. of the Old Testament) that the word apostolos (apostle) is used. Though this incident and the rabbinical shalliaḥ provide possible background for this use of the word, they are no precedents for the Apostolate of twelve select men for Jesus: it was entirely without precedent, as far as scholars can determine.

⁷ R. E. Brown, The Gospel of John, Anchor Bible II (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1970), pp. 683, 684.

⁸ C. K. Barrett, The Gospel according to St. John (London: SPCK, 1962), p. 339. As cited by Brown, ibid., p. 684.

- ⁹ R. D. Culver, 'Apostles and Apostolate in the New Testament,' Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 121 (April–June, 1977), p. 135.
- ¹⁰ Christian Focus Publ., 2002.
- ¹¹ W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Matthew: The Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: 1981), p. 197.
- ¹² For a brief statement of why Peter's confession that Jesus is 'the Messiah' requires a community of Messiah, i.e. no church, no Messiah, see Albright and Mann, ibid., p. 197.
- ¹³ H. A. W. Meyer, The Gospel of Matthew (New York: Funk & Wadnall's, 1884), p. 299.
- ¹⁴ Among the many authors who support this view in whole or part I cite among exegetes W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Matthew, The Anchor Bible, pp. 195–198; Lange's Commentary on Matthew, p. 298; Alford, New Testament for English Readers in loc.; Strack-Billerbeck, Kummentar Zum Neuen Testamentum, I, pp. 736–7, who show how fully the passage reflects the Housverwalter (German), oikonomos (Greek), steward (English) in Jewish and Old Testament customary usage. Among biblical theologians: G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament (1974, 1991), pp. 340–348. For a full survey of other views see A. Kuen, I Will Build My church (Chicago: Moody Press, 1971), pp. 109–117.
- ¹⁵ Catechism of 1994, English ed., para. 553.
- ¹⁶ Ludwig Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Rochford, IL: TAN. 1960, rep. 1974), p. 282.
- ¹⁷ ibid., p. 282.
- ¹⁸ ibid., p. 280.
- ¹⁹ Karl Adam, The Spirit of Catholicism (New York: Doubleday Image Books, 1954 and onward), pp. 96–101.
- ²⁰ Matthew, op. cit., p. 193.
- ²¹ Harvey Dana and Julius Mantey, Manual Grammar of the Greek New Testament (New York: Macmillan, 1927, 1955), p. 177.
- ²² A Greater Commission: A Theology of Missions (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984).
- ²³ Robert D. Culver, The Earthly Career of Jesus, the Christ (Ross-Shire, Scotland: Mentor/Christian Focus, 2002), pp. 67–69, 105–108.
- ²⁴ Lloyd Perry & Robert D. Culver, How to Search the Scriptures (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1967, 1979), p. 66.

8

The Church in Relation to Israel

In this chapter several related controversial subjects must be introduced. They have to do mainly with the degree of continuity between the epoch before Calvary and after it. All Protestant evangelicals agree there has never been but one way of salvation from Abel onward and that there are important differences between some formal duties of believers in the several epochs—as before Abraham, and from Abraham to Moses, and from there on to Christ’s death and resurrection. All agree that Calvary, Easter and Pentecost brought changes in duties and observances. The controversies relate to the precise continuities, discontinuities and new elements introduced by the last of these transitions—the Mosaic to the Christian.

For many centuries the name in theology for these epochs has been dispensation, which translates the Greek word oikonomia (1 Cor. 9:17; Eph. 1:10; 3:2; Col. 1:25), also stewardship (Luke 16:2, 3, 4). The word economy (as in capitalist, socialist, mercantile or mixed economy) is the anglicized Greek word, with somewhat the same meaning as ‘dispensation.’ So we should not shrink from the word, dispensation, even if one is not a ‘dispensationalist.’ Presbyterians, after all, do not refuse to speak of ‘baptism’ simply because Baptists have disagreements with them on the mode of baptism, nor do Baptists refuse to speak of presbyters.

Some questions arising from these circumstances follow. Is the church a continuation of Israel? If so, to what extent do the Old Testament promises and predictions regarding the national Israel apply to the transnational church of Christ? Further, to what extent do the religious observances of the ‘seed of Abraham’ (previous to Moses), and circumcision in particular, have parallel in the church (in baptism)? To what extent, if any, should the Mosaic rules for civil life (say on incest or punishment of adultery or murder) be applied in civil settings today? These and many more are all tough strands in one Gordian knot. I shall neither cut the Gordian knot as Alexander did, nor attempt to loose all the strands, nor report all I have written and said elsewhere about the issues, except as it relates to the subject at hand.

Many will be learning what these and related questions mean after some of the proposed answers have been provided—not the best way to learn, but there is no help for it, for we dare not pass this by. Most Protestant theologians, beginning with Luther and ‘Reformed’ even before Calvin, have discussed these issues, sometimes with anguish. These questions have been and continue to be formative in several strands of theology within, not necessarily between, denominations or the several branches of evangelical Christianity. They embarrass many efforts toward united evangelical action.

Only orthodox, believing Christians have any serious interest in these questions and problems. They should therefore be debated amicably.

Why, one often hears, can't we all just lay aside these theological quarrels and simply begin working together in promotion of the kingdom of God? This, of course, is pure naiveté, for there is no more divisive question, especially among theologians, than the precise meaning of the kingdom of God. We need not wait for full agreement on exactly what Jesus meant by 'the kingdom of heaven' to start co-operating as Christians. Yet a consistent and feasible doctrine of the church must recognize the problem and adopt some procedure, however tentative, in applying Old Testament teaching regarding Israel and the kingdom to the church.

If the church of the New Testament is a continuation of Israel of the Old Testament under new forms and ordinances (sacraments), certain definite results in biblical interpretation and church practice follow. On the other hand, if the church is a different kind of entity, a spiritual rather than natural body, and had a definite beginning in a different epoch of God's stewardship of the eons ('fulness of times,' Eph. 1:10 kjv), then somewhat different results will follow.

In view of the amount of literature treating these questions it will be necessary to narrow the field of inquiry to manageable size without doing injustice to the subject matter.

1. The investigation should not be restricted to any portion of the Bible; it must include it all. The objection of several premillennialists that too much discussion of the subject ignores the whole Old Testament—as if when John the Baptist first mentioned the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 3:2) it was a new idea—is as obviously valid as the sunshine, for even the immediate context directs the reader (and John's listeners) back to Isaiah's prophecies of the coming reign of Messiah (cf. Matt. 3:3 with Isa. 40:3–5). Any scholar who has before his mind the specific details of passages like Zechariah 12–14 will not likely find it easy to dismiss a national future for Israel in times of Messiah's Second Advent. Similarly, the investigation cannot end with the Synoptic Gospels, or with John, for the theme is carried directly from the last chapters of Luke (23:38) to the first chapter of Acts (Acts 1:3–6) by the common author of both books, and on through the New Testament. The kingdom (reign) of God in general, especially in the history of Israel leading to her Messiah (Anointed King), is the reigning idea of Old Testament law, history, poetry and prophecy. The Old Testament says, 'the King is coming,' the New Testament says, 'the King has come and will come again.'

2. A reverent believing approach will insist on consistency in our doctrine of church-Israel-kingdom. This is simply to say, for example, that we shall not indulge in the liberalist penchant for pitting Peter against Paul or Gospels against Epistles.

Aspects of kingdom theology in Scripture there certainly are, but not differing doctrines.

3. To achieve the consistency we seek we must work from the canonical texts of the Gospels as they are. Source criticism, form criticism, redaction criticism and several varieties of approach among recent devotees of 'Gospels research' and 'the search for the historical Jesus' have seemed to say that readers must know in advance about Q, M, L, and other supposed source documents and scholarly opinion about the 'creative community' and the like. Even W. G. Kümmel, a leading New Testament critic of rather moderate opinions, has said in print,

In the oldest tradition of Jesus' message, to be ascertained by critical methods, we meet with the Jesus whose historical message alone confirms the correctness of the apostolic message. To set forth this the oldest message is therefore not only a historical task, but one that is theologically indispensable and no historical mistake.¹

He apparently thinks that we must all become committed adherents to and masters of form criticism—his specialty—before being qualified theologians. No sort of criticism has yet shown the apostolic witness as it appears in the Gospels to be less than authentic report of 'the things said and done' by Jesus. Competent evangelical criticism, to say nothing of the internecine warfare of the liberal critics themselves, has removed any necessity for acting on Kuemmel's advice.

4. Neither shall we expect interpretive help from the dialectical approach of neo-orthodoxy. While granting a legitimate place for paradox as a pedagogical device and for mystery in revelation of truths too manifold for human reason quite to explain, it is not permitted of us to find the Bible-teaching self-contradictory. We cannot have the church, Israel and kingdom be the same part of the time and different part of the time in precisely the same respect—any more than God can be one and three in precisely the same respect.

The Hermeneutics of Israel-church Identity

The Old Testament, Isaiah through Malachi, predicts at great length and in considerable detail a coming kingdom of God on earth in which a restored nation of Israel, in her land, under Messiah, will be delivered spectacularly from all her enemies and will enjoy many visible benefits—spiritual, political, social and material. These blessings are all dependent on Messiah's coming and directly or indirectly involve Israel's repentance previous to national restoration. There really is surprisingly little disagreement as to what the prophecies of national Israel say and mean in context. Exegetes of every opinion regarding the connection of these prophecies to the New Testament church go amicably on their way discussing the grammar and syntax and share space in co-operative commentaries. Yet, having decided what the prophecies mean, then a large number say the subjects to whom they apply are not the physical descendants of Abraham ('seed of Abraham according to the flesh') but all 'the children of Abraham by faith.'

Accurate and charitable assessment ought to acknowledge that all parties to the debate espouse what used to be called the 'literal sense' of these prophecies. 'The issue among evangelical interpreters is not over the validity of grammatical or literal exegesis.'² All informed, believing parties in our time agree that sound interpretation of the Bible takes into consideration (1) the symbolical aspects of most words, indeed of all language; (2) the genre of literature (narrative, poetry, apocalyptic, wisdom and the like); and (3) rhetorical methods and devices; as well as (4) authorial intent.

Several important orthodox, believing groups who accept the above old Protestant approach do not expect literal fulfillment of what the prophecies concerned literally say of the future of Israel and the Messiah in an earthly kingdom of God on earth. At the risk of some oversimplification I will here state the chief theories as nearly as I can formulate them from the writings of their advocates.

1. One school of thought supposes the prophecies of Israel's glorious future as a national entity in times of Messiah never were intended by God to be understood literally, even though the prophets who spoke and wrote them may have thought so. The prophecies were intended to capture the interest and approval of ancient Israelites by means which people of the time could understand. The prophecies were designed to rebuke sins and inspire moral life, holy purpose, sublime thoughts. Christians today should employ the same prophecies in the same way. One would have to research the literature accompanying the International Sunday School lessons of the period before World War II to document this outlook. The temper of the times in and out of church was optimistic. Millions of Christians were convinced ‘The Great War’ of 1914–18 would be the last one. About halfway between World War I and World War II school teachers told our eighth grade class that there would never be another war. The great prophecies of Israel’s future in times of the Messiah were to be fulfilled simply by successes of Christian evangelism. Sunday School lessons were selected from ‘rosy tinted’ passages like Isaiah 2:1–4; 11:1 ff.; and similar passages in other Old Testament prophetic books. This was typical of a whole genre of nineteenth and early twentieth-century devotional commentary on the Bible.

2. A second view is more rooted in serious exegetical and doctrinal study. The prophets’ rebukes of Israel and predictions of judgment for her sins were intended to be understood literally, but the predictions of Israel’s glorious future and world dominion in times of the Messiah relate immediately to the church of the present Christian epoch and are to be interpreted symbolically. This was how the Spirit of God intended the prophecies to be understood. A prestigious, conservative Commentary by the Bishops and Other Clergy of the Anglican Church at the turn of the nineteenth century to the twentieth on Isaiah 2:2 declares the ‘mountain of the Lord’s house’ is ‘the mountain which God will establish for His household, church; the antitypical Zion ... The prophecy began to be fulfilled in John 12:20–32 (“I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me” ...).’³ This outlook was most prevalent in the 150 years after 1790, the great modern missionary epoch, promoted widely in sermons, literature and many hymns still sung today, ‘O, Zion Haste thy Mission High Fulfilling,’ for example.

It is significant, however, that many serious commentaries paid little attention to this wholesale symbolizing, paying minute attention rather to the literal sense of the text, impossible of applicability to the present-day church in any sure way whatsoever.

Furthermore, these same symbolizing interpreters uniformly applied many texts literally to Israel and the Messiah, e.g. Micah 5:2 as literal prediction of the place of Jesus’ birth, but Micah 4:1–5 to the success of the church in world-wide missionary work.

Lange’s Commentary (a very valuable late nineteenth-century set of many volumes) on Zechariah says of the very detailed picture of Jewish Jerusalem and land of promise in chapters 12–14: ‘[T]he Prophet here passes from the old to the new form of the church, he refers to the kingdom of God on earth after appearance of Messiah, and describes its trials and triumphs.’⁴ Similarly Thomas Laetsch on Zechariah 12:2, ‘I will make Jerusalem a heavy stone,’ etc.: ‘Judah ... Jerusalem ... both being types of the New Testament church.’⁵ Nevertheless, many of these same authors insist certain passages in these prophecies must be interpreted literally—Zechariah 9:9 of the Messiah’s triumphal entry riding a donkey colt; 11:12, 13 of Jesus’ betrayal for thirty pieces of silver and purchase by the money of a potter’s field; 12:10 of the piercing of the nails in Jesus’ hands and the spear in His side; and 13:7 of the smiting of Christ ('the shepherd') and scattering of the disciples. The New Testament writers, as we know, interpreted these verses literally. But the rest of these chapters, they say, is figurative of the church of the New Testament. This class of interpreters thinks they find support in precedents set by Jesus Himself and the New Testament writers (Apostles). A. J. McClain rightly called this 'eclectic' (selective) interpretation: literal when it suits one's system, figurative when it does not.

In this outlook on prediction of the kingdom of God, Israel and the church are nearly precise equivalents. There is to be no physical, earthly kingdom of Christ on earth for the kingdom of God is a spiritual affair only. The disciples' question (Acts 1:6–7) about restoration of 'the kingdom to Israel' was wholly mistaken—not about the time ('at this time' ... 'not for you to know times')—but was mistaken as to fact. There never is to be such a kingdom.

E. P. Clowney bases his discussion on the principle that not only the Old Testament predictions regarding Israel relate to the church but also the institutions (temple, priests, Levites, sacrifice and similar) and whole national structure relate directly to the church in greater way than to ancient Israel. He holds that the restoration of Israel takes place in the Christian dispensation, that is, 'the very fulness of the blessing transcends the form of the covenant which is restored.... The outward symbols of the old covenant are so intensified with the fulness of the glory of the new covenant that they are transfigured and transformed.' He cites passage after passage of Old Testament predictions of Israel's restoration 'in the latter days' in development of his doctrine of the church.⁶

3. Another approach, similar in results but very different in theory, avers that the promises of a future earthly kingdom for Israel under the Messiah were intended indeed to be fulfilled literally. Yet, it is asserted, since the promises were conditional upon Israel's obedience, when Israel proved obdurately unfaithful, even rejected and crucified Him 'that should come,' the Messiah, the promises were all transferred to the church and are therefore to be 'spiritualized,' i.e. interpreted metaphorically. This differs from #2 only in saying the promises were transferred from disobedient Israel to the church and transformed from literal to symbolical. Says C. D. Provair, a more recent postmillennial writer:

A verse which demonstrates the transition quite clearly is Matthew 21:34, which reads, 'Therefore I tell you that the kingdom of God, will be taken away from you [Jews] and given to a people [church of present epoch] who will produce its fruit.'⁷

4. An important Methodist scholar, F. C. Eiselen of Garret Biblical Institute, proposed that the promises to a failed and defunct Israel were all transferred to a better Servant of the Lord, Jesus the Christ, and should be adjusted accordingly. Though different in rationale, this is similar in result to views #2 and #3. Eiselen asserted:

[W]ith the cutting off of Israel the promises, based upon the assumption that the nation would prove faithful, became of no effect. Hence all elements of Messianic prediction connected with the nation Israel, such as the final exaltation of the nation, the permanence and unique place of Zion should be eliminated from all Christian expectation concerning the nature and character of the true kingdom of God.⁸

He further argues:

[I]t is a legitimate inference from the conditional character of all prophecy, that if at some future time, through its own fault, the nation should prove incapable of carrying to completion its mission, some other ‘Servant’ must take its place, if God still desires to carry out his original purposes. The later history of Israel shows that through disobedience it cut itself off, as a nation, from God and from its place in his plan of redemption. As a result its place became vacated, and another ‘servant’ had to be found. This other ‘servant,’ Christians believe was Jesus the Christ.⁹

These comments follow Eiselen’s exposition of Micah 4:1–6 (parallel to Isa. 2:1–4). Regarding ‘fulfillment’ of this and similar prophecies he says it will probably ‘never be fulfilled’ literally, but ‘in spirit and in essence ... when the Spirit of God or the Spirit of Jesus comes to be the dynamic of individual and national life and conduct everywhere.’¹⁰

This view, common among some Presbyterians and Reformed writers, is well stated by R. O. Zorn.¹¹

These views all agree in rejecting any literal application of Old Testament prophecies of a future repentant and restored nation of Israel under their Messiah in an earthly reign of Christ over all people. The explanations vary slightly but results are about the same.

Paul’s argument in Romans 9–11, which climaxes at 11:25, 26, says: ‘a partial hardening has come upon Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles has come in. And in this way all Israel will be saved.’

It can hardly be that Israel in this definition means the church, as some would have it, for such involves an unlikely redundancy, viz. ‘all the saved shall be saved.’ Hence, many who reject a literal application of Old Testament prophecies of national Israel’s repentance and restoration see here a prophecy that sometime in the future there will be a mass conversion of Jews to Christianity. They will simply become a part of the church as the original disciples did and as multitudes of Jews through the ages have done. Marvin Olasky points out: ‘Many Jews, particularly in Spain and Portugal during late medieval times, publicly converted.... Some particularly in Germany during early modern times, sought baptism for economic or civic gain. But hundreds of thousands over the centuries experienced true, God-given conversion.’¹²

Let us further observe that non-literal applications of the prophecies are rarely based on the form or grammatical sense of the Old Testament passages but upon putative ‘interpretations’ of the Old Testament in the New Testament. Here is where the debate lately seems to center. The many parallels between the people of the old covenant and of the new covenant which all Christians acknowledge are lifted up to ‘prove’ the identity of Israel and church. Writings presently emanating from Ligonier Ministries (R. C. Sproul) and several centers of Reconstruction Theology frequently follow this line. Perhaps the most sophisticated proposals and New Testament exegesis of this view is by E. P. Clowney, The Doctrine of the Church.¹³ Perhaps the most systematic and cogent in brief form is ‘The church in the Different Dispensations’ by L. Berkhof.¹⁴ Charles Hodge gives fuller treatment of infant baptism, in which he argues, ‘The church under the Christian dispensation is identical with that of the old.’¹⁵ A widely distributed essay by the renowned Dr Francis Schaeffer is influential among evangelical Presbyterian folk at present.¹⁶

It should be added that the article ‘Israel’ by G. Van Groningen in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology and ‘Israel and Prophecy’ by P. C. Craigie in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology are both friendly to a non-literal interpretation of Old Testament prophecies of a future for national Israel.

Response to Non-literal Interpretations of Prophecies of Israel

1. The New Testament never says the church is a new Israel, even though many parallels are drawn. How else could ‘all scripture be profitable’ to us for ‘instruction in righteousness’? These parallels in no wise imply identity. I totally agree with what R. L. Saucy wrote about this:

The NT never confuses Israel and the church ... the term Israel retains its reference to that people which came physically from the loins of Abraham [and Gentiles who like Ruth, the Ethiopia eunuch, and the like became proselytes]. After the beginning of the church Israel is still addressed as a national entity ... demonstrating the fact the church had not taken this term for itself ([Acts 3:2,] 3:12; 4:10; 5:21, 31, 35; 21:28). Paul’s prayer for ‘Israel’ (Rom. 10:1 cf. 11:1) and his references to Israel throughout ... Romans 9–11 concern his ‘kinsmen according to the flesh’ (9:3). If Israel were a reference to the church, the reference to Israel’s ‘blindness in part ... until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in’ (11:25) would be meaningless.¹⁷

I have before me a list of thirty-one Old Testament passages which are quoted in the New Testament in such a way as to imply parallels between Israel of old and Christian believers and are said by some to teach that the church has inherited the name and position of Old Testament Israel. I have another list of fifty-four texts which speak of Israel, its covenant with God and the various designation (children of Abraham, kingdom of God, chosen and the like), of Jerusalem, Zion and similar which these same authors say the New Testament applies directly to the church. These texts were drawn mainly from the books listed in the note, especially from the first listed.¹⁸

These passages are not decisive singly or collectively. They are beside the point. It is specious to claim the New Testament authors are in any sense saying all the prophecies and covenants with Israel are transferred to the church. I refer to two of my books.¹⁹

2. It is readily granted here that all Christians are saved in the same way Abraham was, by grace through faith, and in that sense are spiritual children of Abraham. Yet Paul, who presses this point throughout Romans and Galatians, never says the church is an ‘Israel.’ ‘The seed of Abraham’ is an expression used in two (or more) distinct ways in the Bible. Paul’s poignant use of it is an example of reference to Abraham’s seed by natural descent: ‘has God rejected his people? By no means [mē genoito, may it never happen now or ever]! For I myself am an Israelite, a descendant of Abraham, a member of the tribe of Benjamin [emphasis added]’ (Rom. 11:1). Paul is proud to have been ‘circumcised on the eighth day,’ to be ‘of the people of Israel ... a Hebrew of Hebrews’ (Phil. 3:5). He plainly accepts the then present integrity of the Jewish nation as ‘his [God’s] people’ still. He echoes multitudes of Old Testament passages where ‘offspring of Abraham’ is equated with ‘children of Jacob’ (Ps. 105:6)—‘Israel ... Jacob, whom I have chosen’ (Isa. 41:8), to ‘your people Israel’

God gave ‘this land ... for ever.’ They are ‘the descendants of Abraham your [God’s] friend’—a special friendship never to cease (2 Chron. 20:7).

3. Several texts are cited in the literature to prove Israel is now the church, the church a ‘new Israel,’ part and parcel of only one people of God. The chief texts cited are Galatians 6:16; Romans 2:20 ff.; Romans 9:25, 26 with Hosea 1:10; 2:23. It is not difficult to show these texts make no such assertions. I shall treat each briefly.

Galatians 6:16

‘And as for all who walk by this rule, peace and mercy be upon them, and upon the Israel of God.’

Galatians was addressed to a church whose members were preponderantly Gentile. The burden of the Epistle is to correct the error that a Gentile must in effect become a proselyte Jew, by circumcision, as part of becoming a Christian. The discussion closes with a pronouncement in the preceding verse, saying, neither circumcision nor lack of it avails anything (Gal. 6:15).

Paul pronounced a blessing on the whole group, saying ‘as for all who walk by this rule, peace and mercy be upon them’ (v. 16); but there were some Jews in the Galatian church too. Hence, he adds ‘and upon the Israel of God.’

This understanding fully meets the grammatical requirements of the passage if the translation is closely literal and adds no interpretive flourishes; kjv, nkjv, nab, Luther’s Bible and other strictly literal Versions conform to the same rendering.

In such a case ‘the Israel of God’ is not an alternate name for all the Gentile Christians in Galatia ‘who walk by this rule.’ They are Christian Jews, ‘Israelites according to the flesh’ who have received their Messiah and are now within the Christian ekklēsia.

Several recent Versions read the translators’ theory of Israel-church identity into the verse. The New International Version does so by changing the word order. In nkjv, and esv quoted above, ‘and upon the Israel of God’ (as in the Greek) is an afterthought, the author getting every Christian under the blanket of his blessing of ‘peace and mercy’. But niv changes the order, ‘and’ to ‘even,’ resulting in ‘Peace and mercy to all who follow this rule, even to the Israel of God.’ The rev, 1992, successor to neb meddles with syntax and instead of translating the Greek makes a statement of the translator’s theology of church-Israel identity, as follows: ‘All who take this principle for their guide, peace and mercy be upon them, the Israel of God.’

Calvin gave Protestant currency to the opinion that ‘the Israel of God’ is a ‘name’ for ‘children of Abraham by faith,’ ‘all believers whether Jews or Gentiles’ (Commentary, 186.7), even though the Latin Version of Galatians 6:16 follows the Greek order as also kjv.²⁰

I have given space to this discussion in order to make the reader aware of a possible bearing of the expression ‘and upon the Israel of God’ to the question of Israel-church identity. Most treatments of the passage seem to reflect views the interpreter brings with him. Yet by no means whatever can the text be made to say the church has now replaced Israel, the natural seed of Abraham, and that the church has inherited Israel's promises.

Dr Saucy at greater length has brought to bear the evidences for understanding the expression as Paul's designation for natural-born Jews ('Israel according to the flesh') who are also children of Abraham by faith, circumcised in heart as well as in flesh,²¹ as in Romans 2:28: 'he is not a Jew who is one outwardly, nor is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh' (nkjv).

The sense of Romans 2:28 is plainly, as the rest of the chapter from verse 17 onward, about Jews 'according to the flesh.' Educated in Jewish Scripture and lore, Paul has been talking to male, circumcised Jews in particular. Any one not circumcised physically who yet obeys the law (Torah of Moses) will condemn any Jew who has the written code and circumcision if he is a lawbreaker (v. 27). The sense of verse 28 applies the thought only to Jewish, natural descendants of Abraham and is hence irrelevant to the question of alleged transfer of the name and divine promises of God from Israel to church. In the same article cited earlier, Gutbrod closes his treatment of Ioudaios (Jew) in Paul's writings thus: 'This does not mean that the name Ioudaios is taken from Jews and transferred to some concept of a Jew apart from national membership of the Jewish people.'²²

Romans 9:6

'For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel' (kjv).

Romans 9:6 likewise relates only to people who are already natural-born Israelites, Paul's 'kinsmen according to the flesh ... Israelites ... according to the flesh' (vv. 3–5). Among these people (called Jews in chap. 2, Israel in chaps. 9–11), (1) some are only 'of Israel' in the sense that they are physical offspring of Abraham like Esau mentioned as the one God 'hated' (six and seven verses farther along); and (2) some of these Jews are truly 'Israel' (v. 6), true 'children' (tekna) in the spiritual sense. In verse 8 'Israelites,' some natural offspring of Abraham, are called 'children [emphasis added] of the flesh.' They may or may not be spiritual 'children [emphasis added] of God,' of whom 'our father Isaac' (v. 10) is an example and 'Jacob' whom God 'loved' (v. 13) is another example. These spiritual children are 'children of the promise' and 'counted for the seed' of promise, as Jacob, a physical Israelite was, and Esau, his twin Israelite, was not.

In these verses, as in all of Romans 9:1–13, the only people under discussion in particular or in principle are Jews. Any one, Jew or Gentile, may be a spiritual child of Abraham (Gal. 2:6–9) in direct spiritual line with all Old Testament believers from Abel on through all the faith heroes of Hebrews 11. But only a Jew of the natural line of Abraham can be an 'Israelite indeed' (John 1:47) in the sense Paul specifies in Romans 9:1–13 unless he was by natural descent 'of Israel' (v. 6). This passage is irrelevant to the question of Israel-church identity.

Romans 11:16–24

1. It is affirmed by some that Paul's 'parable' of the olive tree teaches that the Gentiles have been adopted into Israel, the Israel which is to inherit all the Old Testament promises. The 'good olive tree' (v. 24 kjv) is said to be Israel. Believing Gentiles (v. 13), 'branches' of 'the olive tree which is wild by nature' (24), as Christians (church) have been grafted into Israel, the good olive tree. Hence now church is Israel and Israel is church. But is the good olive tree Israel in the 'parable'? The text does not say so. It says 'his people' (v. 1). 'Israel' (vv. 7, 11) are 'natural branches' (v. 21) (not trunk) of a 'holy root' (v. 16) and 'olive tree' (vv. 17, 18). What is the holy root and olive tree? Neither Israel nor the church, but the place of God's special favor. It has to do with the promise 'in thee shall all the nations ... be blessed' in God's initial revelation to Abraham.

A bit later (vv. 25 and 26) Paul concludes that the blindness of Israel is temporary (cf. 8, 10). They will be grafted back into the good olive tree (v. 24) 'when the fullness of the Gentiles has come in' (v. 25). At that time 'all Israel will be saved' (v. 26). In this case Israel cannot be (as some would have it) the church of saved Jews and Gentiles for that is a redundancy, like saying all the saved will be saved.

There is no name of evangelical commitment more respected in Old Testament theology than that of G. F. Oehler, who has been read to the present by generations of seminary students. He clearly states at the close of a section of his Old Testament Theology that 'especially on the ground of Romans 11:25 ff "the predictions of the prophets which speak of the glories of Israel in the latter days [are not] abrogated" nor are they spiritually fulfilled to the Christian church.'²³

This profound climax to Paul's great essay on the place of Israel in the plan of God does not therefore conclude by saying the church has been grafted into Israel, hence a 'New Israel,' or that Israel and church are now convertible terms.

Some theologians in several denominations, including Roman Catholics but especially in Reformed-Presbyterian circles, have come to define much of their whole theology in terms of 'covenant.' In a common form of this teaching redemption began in a covenant between God the Father and the Son; mankind's probation and fall in Eden took place in a 'covenant of works' between God and Adam. Salvation took place in a 'covenant of grace' (patterned on Abraham's case). The covenant with Abraham was furnished with a 'sacrament' or 'sign-seal,' the circumcision of every male participant ('Abraham's seed') in the covenant of grace. The later covenant with 'Abraham's seed' (Moses and 'the Law,' David and his 'house') did not change the covenant of grace (or of salvation) with Abraham. It is held that the ritual and sacrificial requirements of the Mosaic law came to an end with Christ. Christ Himself assumed all the Davidic features of the covenant and presently occupies a Davidic throne in heaven. The Abrahamic covenant is said to prevail still with a change in sacrament-sign-seal only. Whereas circumcision of infant sons or male proselytes was the outward sign in Old Testament times in ancient Israel, baptism of infants (or adult converts to Christ) is the sign of the 'covenant of grace' since Christ came.

In Galatians 3 Paul does indeed say (v. 6) that the Galatian Gentiles received imputed righteousness by faith, the same way Abraham did, and are in some sense 'sons of Abraham.' But, per contra Hebrews 11 says that Abel, Enoch and Noah 'obtained' such righteousness by faith (vv. 4–7) and then that Abraham 'by faith' sojourned (vv. 8 ff.). Hence it might be said Abraham was a child of Abel, Enoch and Noah. They three, saved by faith, certainly were not 'children of Abraham.' We today are as much children of Abel, Enoch and Noah as of Abraham. Furthermore, Abraham was certainly no Israelite spiritually or physically, for Israel (=Jacob) was Abraham's grandson. Abel, Enoch and Noah received no sacramental 'sign' such as circumcision in order to be part of a society of God's children. No mention of any special 'covenant' of works, grace or anything else, appears in this story in Genesis or any subsequent passage of Scripture. Nor is any group of believers said to be a ‘church.’

Which leads to the conclusion that outside the elect nation of Old Testament Israel the idea of ‘covenant’ is of limited application as a vehicle of theology—whether of the doctrine of salvation or of the church. As for children of believers—whether christened or not, the offspring of Baptists, who baptize believers only, are no less ‘covenant children’ than the offspring of Lutheran or Presbyterian parents, who cause their infant children to be baptized by any one of several modes. Even Calvin, who spoke occasionally of God’s promises of salvation by grace through faith on the ground of redemption by Christ, never constructed a system of theology based on covenants, even though such a theology did develop among the third and fourth generations of his followers—based apparently on suggestions of some of Calvin’s Reformed contemporaries. There has always been a healthy section of Calvinists (Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptist and others) who either ignored or rejected the distinctive features of what has come to be called ‘covenant theology.’ Some practice infant baptism, some do not.

2. While the ‘covenant’ support for infant baptism is widespread, even among Reformed and Presbyterians it is far from uniform. James Orr (1844–1913), renowned Scottish Presbyterian pastor, scholar, editor of encyclopaedias, author of books of theology and apologetics still read and highly regarded, outrightly rejected covenant theology, saying that it sought to ‘read back practically the whole of the New Testament into the Old,’ created ‘an artificial scheme’ not based on Scripture and gave theology an increasingly ‘stiff and artificial shape.’²⁴

Infant baptism is more commonly defended simply on the ground of 1) ancient practice; 2) household baptisms reported in the New Testament; 3) mention of children in Acts 2:39; 4) the blessing of children by Christ (Mark 10:13 ff.); and 5) Jesus’ speaking of ‘these little ones which believe in me’ (i.e. infant baptism can then be believer’s baptism). Whether or not these grounds are valid is not my point here. I intend merely to point out that one need not accept an Israel-church identity and supporting covenant theology to be a loyal Methodist or Presbyterian and as such to accept and to practice infant baptism. In other words, there should be no creedal loyalty involved in one’s decision on this issue. In my opinion they who insist otherwise do so against the facts and err greatly.

3. Related to the above is the fact that Christians of every evangelical denomination, some of them influential theologians, have been premillennarians—accepting a future thousand years of Christ’s reign on earth, with His people, both Israel and the church. During this reign they expect the promises distinct to national Israel to be fulfilled. Among these whose names come to mind quickly are Lutherans, Joseph Seiss (preceptor of generations of prophecy students in his Lectures on the Apocalypse) and G. N. H. Peters, author of 2,000 pages of the three-volume The Theocratic Kingdom (a Kregel reprint of 1952). John Gill (1697–1771) was the greatest English Hebraist of his time, a premillennarian Baptist, yet also advocate of covenant theology. The justly famous Charles Spurgeon was Baptist, premillennial and convinced Reformed-covenant in theology. Gordon Clark, Francis Schaeffer, Barton Payne and J. O. Buswell, all Presbyterians, were covenant-premillennial in theology. The relevance is that there is no necessary opposition between premillennialism with its hope of a future distinct place of Israel and any particular denominational connection or baptismal practice or theory of covenants or dispensations.

4. During the first three centuries of the church, with the apparent sole exception of Origen, the believers and their teachers uniformly understood the Old Testament prophecies about Israel in their literal sense and expected them to be fulfilled in a future millennium. They were chiliasts, or as we now say millennialists or premillennialists. The thousand years of the reign of saints (Rev. 20; cf. Dan. 7), following the Second Advent of the Son of Man (Dan. 7; Rev. 19), spoke plainly to them of the time of fulfillment of the multitude of predictions (such as Zech. 12–14) speaking of Messiah's (or the Lord's) coming to rescue Judah, Jerusalem, the house of David and the like from attack by assembled armies of the world and prophecies of a world wherein swords would be beaten into plowshares and even nature would take on new benevolence (Isa. 35).

The apostolic age knew nothing of a spread of the church which would bring in the conditions described in the prophecies of Israel's future and the world's perfection. The writings of Paul and of John propagate rather hope of a speedy return of Christ to judgment and establishment of a new order. There is no evidence that they regarded the devil as presently bound and Christ reigning over the earth. They knew the Lord Jesus Christ was reigning in heaven at God's right hand, but it seems never to have occurred to any of them before Augustine that such was a fulfillment of Revelation 20 or the Old Testament prophecies of Messiah's kingdom over Israel extending over all the earth.²⁵

This uniform opinion of the first three centuries should give pause to the simple equation of Israel and church which volatilizes the Old Testament and New Testament promises of a future restoration of Israel, as such, and transfers fulfillment of the prophecies to the church, as such.

¹ W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment (Naperville, IL: Alec Allenson, 1957), p. 105.

² Bernard Ramm, Protestant Biblical Interpretation: A Textbook of Hermeneutics, 3rd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970, 1990), p. 243.

³ Commentary on the Whole Bible including the Apocrypha by the Bishops and Other Clergy of the Anglican Church, Vol. v (London: 1898), p. 38.

⁴ Lange's Commentary, The Minor Prophets, 1874, p. 89.

⁵ Thomas Laetsch, The Minor Prophets (St Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1956), on Zech. 12:2, p. 479.

⁶ E. P. Clowney, The Doctrine of the Church (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Pub. Co., 1969), pp. 24–31.

⁷ C. D. Provair, The Church is Israel Now (Valecito, CA: Ross House Books, 1987), p. 1.

⁸ F. C. Eiselen, The Minor Prophets (New York: 1907), p. 399.

⁹ ibid., p. 399.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 398.

¹¹ R. O. Zorn, Church and Kingdom (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ. Co., 1962), pp. 44–46.

¹² World magazine (March 27, 1999), p. 38.

¹³ Clowney, op. cit.

¹⁴ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1941, 1979), pp. 570–572.

¹⁵ Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology iii (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, reprint 1970), pp. 546–557.

¹⁶ Francis Schaeffer, Baptism (Wilmington, Delaware: TriMark Publishing, 1976).

¹⁷ R. L. Saucy, The Church in God's Program (Chicago: Moody Press, 1972), pp. 71, 72.

¹⁸ Charles D. Provair, The Church is Israel Now (Valecito, CA: Ross House Books, 1987); Raymond O. Zorn, Church and Kindgom (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ. Co., 1962); Herman Ridderbos, The Coming of the Kingdom, trans. H. de Jongate (Phila.: P & R Publ., 1962); M. J. Wyngaarden, The Future of the Kingdom in Prophecy and Fulfillment (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1955); O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church (Phila: P & R Publ., 1945, 1964).

¹⁹ R. D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, rev. ed. (Chicago: Moody Press, 1977) and The Histories and Prophecies of Daniel (Winona Lake, IN: BMH Books, 1980, 1988).

²⁰ Calvin, Commentary on Galatians and Ephesians, trans. N. Pringle (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Soc., 1854), pp. 186, 187.

²¹ Saucy, op. cit., pp. 71–73.

²² TDNT, III, p. 382.

²³ G. F. Oehler, Old Testament Theology, trans. G. E. Day (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1883), p. 494.

²⁴ James Orr, The Progress of Dogma (Grand Rapids: Eerdman Publ. rep., 1952), pp. 303–304.

²⁵ See G. N. H. Peter's The Theocratic Kingdom of Our Lord Jesus, the Christ, Vol. i, props 69–78, (Grand Rapids: Kregel Publ., 1957), pp. 433–555.

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (848). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

The Church in Relation to the Kingdom of God

Announcements of the new presence of ‘the kingdom of God’ (or ‘of Heaven’) by John the Baptist appear on the earliest pages of the Gospels. John’s preparatory work was followed soon by Jesus’ presence on the national scene of Israel, repeating and enlarging John’s announcement. But what came out three or four years later after Jesus’ Ascension was not a visible kingdom in Palestine but the beginning of a world-wide church. The apparent paradox of these hard facts does not seem to have concerned the church’s teachers for about two and a half centuries. The early church teachers were almost all chiliasts, i.e. they believed in a future millennium (Rev. 20) when the kingdom of God would be established on earth. These promises both to Israel (repentant and restored) and the resurrected saints of all ages would be fulfilled. They all would have expected to ‘[come] to life’ (Rev. 20:4) and ‘reign on the earth’ (Rev. 5:10) ‘with Christ for a thousand years’ (Rev. 20:4).

That, however, was not the end of the matter. In the fourth century Augustine conceived of the church as the present kingdom of God on earth. Though he did not envision the organized church of his time it was not long before the developing papal church took over the idea and has not really parted with it to the present day, though lately with some scholarly dissent among the learned class. The Roman Catholic Church claims still to be the visible kingdom of God on earth.

Jesus Himself never defined the kingdom of God nor does any New Testament passage do so. Jesus seems to have spoken of it on the reasonable assumption that His hearers, schooled by the Palestinian synagogues, already knew, or thought they knew, what the kingdom of God would be, as described in the Torah, Nebhiim and Kethuvim. This remains true even though Jesus was constantly correcting their pre-understandings and misunderstandings as He explained its authentic character, its present and future aspects and conditions for participating in it. That they misunderstood is evident when they tried by force to make Him king (John 6:15).

Study of the kingdom of God in the New Testament in recent times has profited from several sources. Even the most liberal critic today knows that the kingdom of heaven of the New Testament is not simply the prevalence of the ethics of Jesus in the world or mere love of God and mankind in the heart within. Just before and after 1900 several scholars captured scholarly attention by publishing research proving (they thought) that for the Jesus of the Gospels, the kingdom of God was only an eschatological idea that had been ‘realized’ or ‘inaugurated.’ Full report and documentation of this research is impossible here.¹

Meanwhile, among evangelical, orthodox scholars ‘kingdom’ theology has developed along several courses. Views diverge on certain important points. Candor compels us to admit that much discussion of this topic among evangelical scholars has been what Paul called logomachia, wars of words. He warned against it as ‘to no profit’ (1 Tim. 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:14 kjv).

One group of writers, pretty much in continuity with the chiliasm of the ancient church, finds much Old Testament prophecy of the Messiah and His kingdom fulfilled in Christ Himself, His ministry and redemptive work, and in the church which He founded, but look for a future repentance and restoration of Israel who, with the church of resurrected saints, will reign with Christ during a further millennial kingdom. This outlook has come to be called historic premillennialism.

Another group, only partially in continuity with ancient chiliasm, teaches that the kingdom of God was offered by Jesus to the Jews. Since they rejected it, crucifying their rightful King, the offer was withdrawn and the kingdom postponed until the Second Advent. Hence, A. J. McClain refers most if not all references to the kingdom of God in the New Testament to the millennium. This is 'consistent eschatology' of a sort. At the Second Advent God will give Israel repentance and will restore the nation and advance them to the conditions predicted in Old Testament prophecies of Israel in times of the Messiah. Views of the relation of Israel to church in the millennium are not uniform. Most advocates of this view develop a scheme of the history of God's dealing with mankind around seven or eight epochs called dispensations, hence the view is often called 'dispensational premillennialism.' Most New Testament passages referring to the kingdom of heaven are said to refer to the millennial age. A. J. McClain even insists the 'keys of the kingdom' in Matthew 16:19 will be used only in 'the future when this kingdom shall have been established on earth'.² The 'gospel of the kingdom' and the 'gospel of the grace of God' are different messages.³

Another contemporary group of orthodox evangelicals agree that though 'all Israel shall be saved,' i.e. shall repent in large numbers and become members of the church, the promises of the Old Testament regarding Israel's restoration to the holy land and hegemony under the Messiah will never happen, except in a 'spiritual' manner in Christ Himself and in the church. Most advocates of this view accept the name amillennialism. There are significant differences among proponents of each of these views. There is some variety in each and some overlapping, and I have not described postmillennialism. My book Daniel and the Latter Days deals at length with millennial views.⁴

It is interesting to find the same standard hymns, expressing each and all of these hopes, sung in churches of all these persuasions. 'Jesus Shall Reign,' for example, a versified Psalm 72, represents the church itself as fulfilling prophecy of God's kingdom and is in about every hymn book.

Out of these discussions arise several questions. One I have treated already in chapter 8, 'The Church in Relation to Israel.' I contended there that while the New Testament inevitably finds many parallels between God's Old Testament people, Israel, and His New Testament people, the church, they are never identical in Scripture. The wholly Israelite Apostles and pre-Pentecost group of Jerusalem disciples were the incipient church, yet the church is not an Israel and Israel is not a church.

I myself began to withdraw from the second of the views noted above almost as soon as I received the full form of it in the seminary lectures of one of moderate dispensationalism's most competent and convincing advocates. Through preparing lectures on ecclesiology, first in Trinity Theological Seminary and then Wheaton College Graduate School, a good while ago and on to the present, I came to understand that the scriptural evidence leads to considerable modification of that view. Some would say rejection of it. Briefly: from the beginning of the New Testament in Matthew to the end in Revelation, the church is presented as fulfilling certain aspects of Old Testament kingdom prophecy, without being its sole fulfillment; other aspects of the kingdom, especially its distinctly Israelitish, visible, Zion-centered features, await the coming age for their fulfillment.

This view requires no special hermeneutical rule to ‘spiritualize’ selected portions of Old Testament (amillennialism) or to multiply entities and distinctions to excess (multiple resurrections, gospels, groups). It does not confine fulfillment to a single moment. The prophecies were comprehensive in their reference and the fulfillments manifold—including aspects of the present age. So Paul argued for Gentile evangelism in Romans 15:8–12 on the ground of ‘the promises made to the fathers’ (v. 8 nkjv). Nor do we attempt to divorce the rather clear ‘kingdom of heaven’ connections of the church’s missionary task and message as exemplified in Paul and the apostolic literature from Acts through Revelation.

I. A Change in Message?

Let us first address a crucial question: Is there New Testament evidence of an essential change in Jesus’ message and that of the Apostles after it became evident that the Jewish nation was rejecting Him? Specifically, was there a shift from kingdom message to church message? Is the ‘gospel of the kingdom’ something different from the gospel of the grace of God? We may rightly assume such a sharp juncture would not be subtly introduced but clearly marked in a ‘perspicuous’ Bible. Without citing every reference to the kingdom, sufficient texts at proper junctures supply a clear answer.

1. The ‘forerunner,’ John the Baptist, presented Jesus as a King, the ‘Coming One’ (ho erchomenos), fulfilling the prophecies of the coming of Messiah’s kingdom. John called for Israel’s repentance in order to participate in the kingdom about to appear, just as the prophecies required. The texts speak plainly.⁵ This plain fact seems to be the place where a search must start.

2. Jesus began His ministry by introducing a message like John’s. Matthew’s account, ‘when he [Jesus] heard that John had been arrested, he withdrew ... and lived in Capernaum,’ in fulfillment of the Immanuel prophecy of the coming Prince who would reign from David’s throne in a kingdom which would never end (Matt. 4:12–17; cf. Isa. 9:6–7). ‘From that time,’ Matthew says, ‘Jesus began to preach, saying, “Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand” ’ (Matt. 4:17). He then began to gather His disciples (later Apostles).

3. After several months Jesus sent out the twelve Apostles to preach the kingdom gospel to the ‘lost sheep of the house of Israel,’ charging them, ‘proclaim as you go, saying, “The kingdom of heaven is at hand” ’ (Matt. 10:1–7). As is well recognized, Matthew highlights Jesus’ descent from David (Matt. 1) and birth at King David’s city, Bethlehem (2:1–12), said to be in fulfillment of the Immanuel prophecy (1:22, 23; Isa. 9:6, 7) of a Davidic Christ to reign as King forever, as a Prince of Peace.

Jesus’ commission to the Twelve on their first mission sounds an eschatological note (Matt. 10:23; cf. 24:29, 30) connecting this kingdom with the future coming of the Son of Man (Matt. 26:63–65; cf. Dan. 7:14 and context). Yet, His words of commission show that Jesus clearly foresaw the rejection of His message and Himself (Matt. 10:14–16). He also foresaw the spread of His gospel and His church when His Apostles would appear not only before Jews and synagogues (v. 17) but Gentile governors and kings (Matt. 10:18–22). His gospelizing vision was by no means limited to the possibility of an immediately-to-be founded, visible Jewish kingdom. He clearly foresaw rejection of the gospel which He, John and the Apostles preached (Matt. 10:16–22). It was to be expected that the Jews would be the first to hear, being the natural ‘children of the kingdom’ (Matt. 8:12 kjv) even though not spiritually worthy. Long after the Ascension and Pentecost the policy of ‘to the Jews first’ (or perhaps especially) continued (Acts 13:5, 14, and onward; cf. Rom. 1:16): ‘It was necessary that the word of God be spoken first to you [Jews]’ (Acts 13:46).

4. During His post-resurrection ministry to the disciples—‘forty days ... speaking about the kingdom of God’ (Acts 1:3)—the kingdom of God was still His main thrust. It would seem that with the inauguration of the church immediately to take place (Acts 2), and the long age of the church to ensue, He would not be giving information about a millennial kingdom at least 1,900 years in the future—or any alternate kingdom of God. After all, the church would be formed by the effusion of the Holy Spirit in a matter of a few days and Jesus had fixed their attention on the Spirit’s coming⁶ to complete the inauguration of the church.

Expositors who are convinced that the Messianic kingdom of God is in no wise established in the church say that Jesus was discussing the universal kingdom ‘as including the Mediatorial [Messianic] Kingdom and the Church’⁷ or perhaps ‘the Ekklēsia ... then regarded as the saved Jewish “remnant” of Old Testament prophecy.’ Maybe so, but it is doubtful. It is hard to define precisely what aspect of God’s kingdom Jesus had in mind. The fact the Apostles, like a swarm of bees in their hive, clung to Jerusalem and exercised a ‘Jews only’ ministry for long after those forty days and Pentecost, suggests that whatever He said about their coming mission of world-evangelism (Acts 1:8) they did not yet relate what He said to evangelizing Gentiles or to the formation of a Spirit-baptized body composed of Gentiles and Jews (Eph. 2). However that may be, the subject of discourse apparently continued to be that which John, Jesus and the Twelve had proclaimed—however incompletely—‘the kingdom of God.’ We know that He drew the substance of His remarks from the Old Testament ‘Law ... Prophets and ... Psalms’ (Luke 24:44) suggesting that the future Jewish aspect of that kingdom was not absent, and accounting for the fact that on the very last of the forty days the Apostles still believed in a future restored Jewish kingdom (Acts 1:6). Whatever Jesus may have said during the forty days about the kingdom of God did not revise that opinion. The time had not arrived to explain what Peter learned at Caesarea (Acts 10) in the house of Cornelius and which Paul (and other Apostles and prophets) later learned ‘by revelation’ (Eph. 3:1–6; Rom. 16:25, 26).

5. Persecution drove many disciples (but no Apostles) away from the Jerusalem congregation in a short time, among them a vocal and zealous ‘deacon’ named Philip (Acts 6:5; 8:3–5) who ‘went down to the city of Samaria [whose residents were quasi-Jews] and proclaimed to them the Christ.’ Philip’s preached gospel, accompanied with certifying ‘miracles’ (Acts 8:6 kjv), was so convincing that ‘they believed Philip’ and ‘were baptized, both men and women’—as Christians, not as Jewish proselytes. This was in response to the fact that ‘he preached good news about the kingdom of God’ (v. 12). This is all the record says of Philip’s kerygma. Plainly, in this first case of Christian evangelism beyond ‘Jerusalem and all Judea’ the gospel message was ‘the kingdom of God.’ It should appear, I think, clear to the candid reader of Acts that the author intended his readers to understand that the Christian gospel is a gospel of the kingdom of God. The assertion that this message was about God’s universal kingdom or an eschatological Jewish kingdom far in the future⁸ seems far from likely. Some will think it grotesque.

6. Near the very close of Paul's three great missionary journeys that intrepid evangelist made a comprehensive statement regarding his preached message (Acts 20:17–35) from his 'first day' in 'Asia' and presumably anywhere else. He consistently proclaimed 'at all seasons' (v. 18 kjv) as he preached publicly and privately in homes (v. 20) both to 'Jews' and 'Greeks [Gentiles]' (v. 21). As to content, he characterized his message as either 'the gospel of the grace of God' (v. 24) or 'proclaiming the kingdom' (v. 25)—comprehensively characterized as 'the whole counsel of God' (v. 27), a 'ministry ... received from the Lord Jesus' (v. 24). Those determined to remove the kingdom of God connection of the Christian ekklēsia (to some of whose elders the lengthy statement was addressed, v. 17) may wish to separate out the kingdom elements from this comprehensive summary of Paul's gospel. I have literature in my library which would say that the repentance message was just for Jews, the faith message for Gentiles: seeing the kingdom as message for Israel's future, the grace message for Gentiles—salvation by 'the gospel of the grace of God.' A. J. McClain again does not treat this plain text. This passage appears on only one of the 556 pages of his book where verse 25 is simply listed as one of seven references in Acts to the universal kingdom of God. Those who insist that the kingdom of God of Old Testament prophecy (Messianic or mediatorial kingdom) has no fulfillment in the church are embarrassed by all the references to that kingdom in the book of Acts, apparently as referring to the church and its gospel.

At a stage of my life when I was considering the possibility that the church has some important connection with the prophesied kingdom of the Son of Man on earth this text was decisive in forming my view expressed in this chapter. I have found it to be decisive also for most students in my classes in ecclesiology in several seminaries over the years.

It is claimed that Peter made a 're-offer of the kingdom' to the Jews in his address to them in Acts 3 and that, when the Apostles themselves still had no clear awareness of the body of Christ composed of Jews and Gentiles alike baptized into one Spirit (Eph. 2; 1 Cor. 12), the preachers were only gradually shifting to a church gospel. This in essence is Dr McClain's position.⁹ As I have shown above, this can scarcely apply to Paul's speech to the Ephesian elders. Furthermore, it was Luke who wrote Acts, Luke who was Paul's constant companion through many of his missionary journeys and present with Paul as he faced martyrdom at the very last (2 Tim. 4:11). He certainly was under no misapprehension of Paul's doctrine of the church—or of Peter's and John's. Luke apparently saw no inconsistency between the church as part of the kingdom of Old Testament promise and its essential character as a new body of Christ with a special new relation to the Godhead by virtue of a new relation to the Holy Spirit. Ephesians 2–3 and 1 Corinthians 12 had probably long been delivered to the churches when Luke wrote the last lines of the last chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

7. The last verse of Acts leaves Paul in prison at Rome, long after his work of evangelizing the eastern 'parts' of the Empire was over (Rom. 15:18–23). At this late date Paul is still majoring on the kingdom of God—perhaps during the same general period of time when he wrote about the church in the Ephesian and Colossian letters: 'He lived there two whole years at his own expense, and welcomed all who came to him, proclaiming the kingdom of God and teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ ...' (Acts 28:30, 31).

8. Onward throughout the New Testament Epistles and the Revelation, the kingdom of Christ (or of God or of heaven or 'his kingdom') is presented as the realm in which Christians live. How this relates to the persistent theme of a future kingdom of glory on earth is well put by George Ladd. As the gospel is preached throughout the world, he writes, 'two things always happen: some men are loosed while others are bound. Some believe and receive the message. They are delivered out of the power of darkness and transferred into the Kingdom of the Son of God's love (Col. 1:13); that is, they enter the kingdom of God because they receive its blessings. Furthermore, they are assured of an entrance into the future Kingdom of God when Christ comes in glory.'¹⁰

These facts lead to the conclusion that from the first of the New Testament epoch, beginning with Jesus' opening sermons in Galilee on until the end of the present age, the Christian message to the world is the gospel of the grace of God. The same is the gospel of the kingdom (Matt. 24:14). There was never any essential change of message, though the message came to be more perfectly revealed, better understood and more clearly articulated as time passed by. It is not to be distinguished in content from the gospel of 'repentance and forgiveness of sins' which 'should be proclaimed in his name to all nations' (Luke 24:47) authorized by the risen Christ on Easter Day.

II. A Change in Plan?

Does the inauguration of the church represent a change of plan on the part of Jesus? That is, was an external earthly kingdom of Old Testament prophecy offered by John, Jesus, the Twelve and the Seventy for Jews only, and upon rejection of the Messiah and that kingdom by the Jewish nation was the kingdom offer withdrawn and a different plan (the church) introduced?

This chapter began by taking note that the gospels begin with vigorous proclamations of the kingdom of God that had just drawn near and then 'in the midst.' The proclamations were accompanied by demands for Israel's repentance as necessary for entrance into that kingdom. Yet by the midpoint of Jesus' career He is speaking of building a church (Matt. 16:17-19). The book of Luke, which carries the reader deeply into the post-resurrection narrative, pointedly beckons on to the inauguration of the church (Luke 24:47-49). We know that the nation of Israel did decide to meet none of the requirements of the kingdom and rejected the King. It seems reasonable, therefore, to some careful and rational scholars, to assume the withdrawal of the kingdom plans and introduction of an alternate 'backup' mode. Though not a matter of difference between denominations, Yes and No answers to this question divide a large amount of academic theology.

To give an affirmative answer, 'Yes, there was a change of program,' is not to give up on God's eternal decrees, for any theologian with a little skill at his art can explain that all change in God is on the level of 'revelation' or 'procedure' not of essence. It will be better to consult Scripture to discover what, in fact, were the Savior's goals in this matter. In order to limit the study to manageable size let us restrict inquiry mainly to Matthew, where the issue arises most sharply.

1. Matthew connects his narrative at numerous stages with the Servant prophecies of Isaiah 42-53. This seems to start with an allusion to Isaiah 53:8, 'stricken for the transgression of my people,' at Matthew 1:21, 'He will save his people from their sins.' As I show in Part IV, Christology, chapter 13, 'The Passion and Death of Jesus,' Isaiah 52:13-53:12, concern throughout with our Lord's atoning death, is scarcely ever fully out of sight in Matthew's Gospel. Hence we can say that the rejection of our Lord by His people Israel and His redemptive death on Calvary for the sins of mankind was in God's plan for His Son from eternity. He is 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' (Rev. 13:8 kjv; cf. 1 Peter 1:18–20). The venerable Authorized Version of Isaiah 53:10 reads, 'Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him,' but this pleasure of God is the same plan of God which Paul mentions as the 'the good pleasure of his will ... which he hath purposed in himself ... the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will' (Eph. 1:5, 9, 11 kjv). Hence the death of Christ for the sins of our race was his eternal pleasure, plan, purpose, will.

Before the Jews officially rejected Him He spoke of how He, 'the bridegroom,' would be 'taken away from them' (Matt. 9:15). He knew already that 'the Son of Man [would] be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth' (Matt. 12:40, i.e. slain and buried).

2. Similarly, the rejection of Jesus' disciples and their gospel of the kingdom by their contemporaries, with subsequent persecution, was known to Jesus from the beginning of His ministry and predicted by Him (Matt. 10:16–23). In His inaugural sermon, Jesus held out the prospect of their being 'persecuted for righteousness' sake' (Matt. 5:10), of being reviled and slandered (5:11).

3. The purpose of His mission was not to bring civil tranquillity, domestic peace and cessation of all conflict. 'Think not,' He said, 'that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I came to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law: And a man's foes shall be they of his own household' (Matt. 10:34–37 kjv). Jesus positioned these warnings among a set of instructions that fit only the long ages of the church after the rejection and crucifixion of Christ, when evangelism would advance through frequent family disruption.¹¹ It becomes clear that Jesus came in the first place to bring to pass exactly what did come to pass, not to set up a Zion-centered, external world-government—something His last address (Matt. 24–25) clearly placed at a future time after 'this gospel of the kingdom will be proclaimed throughout the whole world as a testimony to all nations' (Matt. 24:14).

4. Early in His ministry, after a peculiarly impressive demonstration of faith by a Gentile (the Capernaum Roman army officer of Matt. 8:1–10), He hinted at what during the last week He forecast plainly—the temporary setting aside of the Jews, the natural 'children of the kingdom,' with Gentiles being brought into 'the kingdom of heaven.' The Parable of the Vineyard and the Husbandmen (Matt. 21:33–44) traces this transfer to Old Testament prediction (Matt. 21:42–44). This does not read like the circumstances of any change of plan.

5. In His very closing hours before being arrested in Gethsemane Jesus declared His death to be necessary—that is, His rejection by Israel and death by their instigation—to fulfill the Scriptures. The incident is familiar—'How then should the scriptures be fulfilled, that it must be so?'—and is not of moral necessity, but dei genesthai, necessity grounded in Old Testament Scriptures, expressing the purpose of God to send His Son to be the Savior of the world. On Easter Day He explained to two disciples on the road to Emmaus thus: 'Behooved it not the Christ [of whom 'the prophets have spoken] to suffer these things.... And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself' (Luke 24:25–27 asv).

Jesus clearly presented Himself as the Messiah of Israel, albeit never by direct claim. And He said that the kingdom of God was 'at hand,' i.e. had arrived. That the Messiah had no intention at that time to introduce the glorious reign of a final scion of the house of David is equally plain in the humble manner of His coming and the ‘image’ (as we now in journalistic idiom say) projected by the non-regal way He lived and behaved all His years in the presence of the Israel of Palestine. In the first of his several books on the kingdom of God, George Ladd perceptively wrote:

It is difficult to see how Jesus could have offered to Israel the earthly Davidic kingdom without the glorious Davidic king [Ladd’s emphasis] who was to reign in that kingdom. The very fact that he did not come as the glorious King, but as the humble Savior, should be adequate evidence by itself to prove that his offer of the kingdom was not the outward, earthly kingdom, but one which corresponded to the form in which the King himself came to men.¹²

With withering logic Philip Mauro demonstrated from the testimony of John the Baptist, Jesus Himself and other New Testament witnesses that ‘having come into the world to die for sinners’ He could not and did not go ‘about telling His hearers that He had come to restore again the Kingdom to Israel [at least not at that time, it should be added].’¹³

6. The final words of Matthew indicate clearly that all of Jesus’ teaching (‘commanded you’) from day one onward was designed for the present age of the kingdom of God, not a future age of visible kingdom glory on earth (Matt. 28:19, 20). In other words, all of Jesus’ teaching in the Gospels was intended for the instruction for a minority ekklēsia of humiliation, not a universal kingdom of glory such as the prophets predicted and Jesus confirmed for a more distant future.

We may conclude therefore, as already stated above: ‘From the beginning of the New Testament in Matthew to the end of Revelation, the church is presented as fulfilling certain aspects of Old Testament kingdom prophecy without being sole fulfillment. Other aspects of the kingdom, especially its distinctly Israelitish, visible, Zion-centered features await the coming age of their fulfillment.’

Advocates of the doctrine that Jesus began with proclamation of an earthly Jewish kingdom and upon rejection shifted to a different program altogether—the church—are not agreed as to when in His career and at what point in His teaching the shift came. Anything before the shift is detached from any direct application to the present age of the church. Philip Mauro insightfully inquired long ago:

We would simply raise at this point the question whether the difficulty our friends have in agreeing as to where the supposed ‘break’ occurred may not perhaps be due to the fact that there was no break at all? If so, then all the conflicting groups would be correct in so far as they deny the existence of any ‘break’ where the other parties say it occurred.¹⁴

The above proposition and arguments arose out of my own early theological pilgrimage away from rather strict ‘postponed kingdom’ doctrines made almost universal among fundamentalists in my childhood and youth. I was not influenced directly by other dissenting theologians of the time but my own reflections as I studied for lectures as a professor of Old Testament with a strong interest in New Testament and theology as well as for the pastor’s pulpit. We were not very specialized in those days. But at the same time others were devoting some of their energy to the same problems and were coming to similar conclusions. They came from many layers and sections of what was still self-designated as orthodox fundamentalist opinion. L. E. Maxwell, principal of Prairie Bible Institute,¹⁵ and Robert McQuilkin, president, Columbia Bible College, are representative of those who saw a weakening in the moral force of Christianity if large portions of the Gospels and Acts, the commandments and all promises and predictions of the Old Testament and New Testament through Acts, relate primarily to national Israel and a future earthly kingdom of God. Others were George Ladd¹⁶ (of fundamentalist Baptist origins and graduate of Gordon Divinity School followed by graduate university studies) and C. R. Ludwigson¹⁷ (raised a Lutheran, later independent) who taught this subject at Wheaton College and later as president of Trinity Seminary.¹⁸ I wrote Daniel and the Latter Days before 1952, though in its first form the book was not published until 1954. There were others—enough that these authors found a receptive market for their arguments far and wide, and modified the accepted dispensational fundamentalism of the time and onward. In Britain and on the continent of Europe several authors developed ‘premillennialism’ (Sauer, Lang, Pache, and others) along lines much more like the historic premillennialism of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.¹⁹

A Positive Assessment of Transitions and Stages of Kingdom Revelation in the New Testament

With regard to the transitional stages and progress within the New Testament, upon which several dispensational distinctions have been built, it may be better to think of revelational stages. This is mainly what some dispensational writers appear to mean, in part, by the distinctions they make.

At this juncture it will be helpful to observe in what light T. D. Bernard’s Bampton Lectures put the evident differences of procedure and message in the various parts of the New Testament. He observed, firstly, that the teaching of our Lord in the Gospels does, indeed, contain the substance of all Christian doctrine but does ‘not bear the character of finality.’ Secondly, the teaching of Jesus in the Gospels follows a ‘visibly progressive course, but on reaching its highest point [the Last Supper Discourse] announces its own incompleteness’ and declares another epoch of revelation to come (John 16:12–14).²⁰ He says, ‘There was nothing then on the lips of the preachers of the Gospel [i.e. the Apostles and contemporaries] but what had begun to be spoken by its first preacher, and in following to their utmost the words of the Apostles we are still within the compass of the words of the Lord Jesus.’ A comparison of John 3:14, 15, on the topic of faith, redemption and personal salvation, with the book of Romans will strongly support this assertion. The latter develops ideas both explicit and latent in the former. A comparison of John 8:35, 36 on the subject of faith and freedom with Paul’s Epistle to the Romans will do the same. Bernard observes further that Jesus’ direct teaching during the time of His earthly ministry was not perspicuously and systematically presented. Firstly, as to form, Jesus commonly used the Hebraic parable and proverb—which, as is well known, was frequently employed to obscure the truth from the unworthy (Matt 13:10–17).²¹ The Epistles, on the other hand are, in sections, models of forensic and rhetorical method. Secondly, as to method, Jesus’ discourses were usually related to ‘chance’ and occasion—a visit from John’s disciples, the question of a rich young ruler, a snare set by Pharisees and Sadducees, a bit of bad news like the execution of John, the tragic collapse of a building, or a question from one of His own disciples. Later portions of the New Testament, though sometimes arising out of a pressing missionary emergency, often take the form of extended systematic treatises on doctrine and practice. Thirdly, as to substance, Jesus’ teachings ‘bear a double character ... firstly clearing, restoring, perfecting of truth already known; and it is, secondly, the revealing of a mysterious economy which has not yet been divulged.’²²

Historical development of the kingdom of God theme is plainer in Matthew, I judge, than in the other Gospels. I propose (and am far from alone in this²³) that the ‘problem’ may be worked out in that book by observing the following.

1. Both John and Jesus initially announced that the kingdom of Old Testament prophecy had arrived in the Messiah. It was now present among the people of Palestine. John’s announcement is recorded in Matthew 3:1–12. Jesus’ announcement (Matt. 4:17) was verbally the same as John’s. His message squarely rested on Old Testament prophecy of the kingdom.

The real and most profound explanation of the presence of the kingdom is to be sought in the person of Jesus himself. The secret of the presence of the kingdom lies in Jesus’ victory over Satan [Luke 11:18–20; Matt. 12:25–28], in his unlimited miraculous power [Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 11:2–5], his unrestricted authority to preach the gospel [Matt. 11:5; Luke 16:16; Luke 4:17–21], in his pronouncements of blessedness [Matt. 5:3 ff. and Luke 6:20 ff.] and bestowal of salvation [Luke 12:32; 22:29; Matt. 21:43 et al] upon his people. There can be no doubt that we are confronted here with the messianic, Christological character of the kingdom of heaven and the entire fulfillment which Jesus proclaims as a present reality is based on the fact that he himself is the Christ [proclaimed so at baptism, transfiguration, et al].²⁴

2. From the time of His baptism, in His early public ministry, Jesus went about all Galilee teaching in Jewish synagogues at Sabbath services and preaching the kingdom of God, furnishing the supernatural signs of the arrival of the kingdom (Matt. 4:23–24) which readers of the prophets had a right to expect and a duty to acknowledge (cf. Matt. 11:1–6). Jesus responded to those who denied the presence of the kingdom by saying: ‘If it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you.’

3. Both John and Jesus asserted that repentance for sin and faith (i.e. conversion, personal spiritual regeneration) were necessary for entrance into this kingdom then present (Matt. 3:6–8). John threatened severe judgment for trust in mere Jewishness instead of repentance (Matt. 3:9–12). The punishments threatened were eschatological—‘unquenchable fire’ (Matt. 3:12).

4. Citizens of the kingdom would be regenerate folk, living according to the divine will and laws (Matt. 5–7), seeking ‘first the kingdom of God and his righteousness’ (Matt. 6:33).

5. Some aspects of Christ’s kingdom were and remain incompletely revealed. Certain ‘mysteries of the kingdom of heaven’ were made known to the circle of loyal disciples (Matt. 13:11 kjv) but not repeated to us.

It is important to note that the New Testament concept of mystery (Greek, mustērion), which in secular literature usually refers to something essentially unknown, is first introduced in connection with preaching the gospel of the kingdom, the seed of the Word of God (Matt. 13:11).

Biblical mysteries are truths of a religious sort, known to God from eternity, but known to men simply and exclusively because God has revealed them. Paul used the word in that sense in Romans 16:25, 26 and Ephesians 3:3. Since a supernatural opening of the mind is necessary to understand some of these things, the New Testament mystery often takes on the added sense of truth explained only to initiates [see 1 Cor. 5:12, 13].²⁵

These ‘mysteries’ were made known in parables (Matt. 13 kjv; Mark 4; Luke 18) but were only partly understood then and now. They have to do with principles of evangelism over the long church age to come. All eight of the ‘seminar of parables’ relate to this missionary program. Matthew 10, which in chronological order followed the seminar of kingdom parables, told them and succeeding generations what procedures to follow in the age-long mission of world evangelism. These chapters are inexplicable without specific, planned intention on the part of Jesus as instruction for the church of Christian believers throughout the age in which we live.

6. In formal statements such as Matthew 5:3, 6, 10, 11; 10:15–25, Jesus foretold that His disciples in the future would mourn, hunger and thirst for righteousness’ sake, be as sheep in the midst of wolves, scourged in synagogues (as Paul was), and brought into judgment in front of Gentile magistrates for Jesus’ sake. Before the heavenly kingdom of peace could come to earth there would be a long time of ‘not peace, but a sword’ when the spiritual and moral good of the kingdom would be in stubborn conflict with intractable evil, as several of the parables plainly imply—especially of the wheat and tares.

7. At the ‘end of the age’ (Matt. 13:40 niv; there is much manuscript evidence for ‘this age’)—the present age—the ‘regeneration’ of the world will take place (Matt. 19:28, 29 kjv) with Christ and His saints in charge (Rev. 5:10; 20:1–6).

8. The special Jewishness of Jesus’ first proclamations and limitation of His life and ministry to the Land of Israel and its people is to be accounted for by the simple fact that the redemptive events of Gospel history had to transpire among Jews and at their city to provide salvation in a spiritual kingdom. This was the divine plan for the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. This explains, in part, why John and Jesus and the Apostles as well never went into any ‘way of the Gentiles.’

Beginning at Romans 15:8 and through verse 14 Paul gives his own version of this argument in explaining the urgency of the church’s assisting him in a mission to Gentiles in Spain in particular. This passage, perhaps the most complete systematic biblical argument for world evangelism, hinges on the Old Testament kingdom promises voiced in the whole TENAK, the Hebrew Bible of Torah (Law), Neviim (Prophets) and Kethuvim (Holy Writings). ‘Christ,’ he says, ‘became a servant to the circumcised [the nation of Israel only] to show God’s truthfulness, in order to confirm the promises given to the patriarchs [Abraham onward].’ Then he carries a statement of a more ultimate purpose, a world-wide offer of divine mercy to Gentiles as well, adding, ‘and in order that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy.’

He clinches the point by quoting first from the Kethuvim, ‘Therefore I will praise you among the Gentiles’ (Ps. 18:49); then from the Torah, ‘Rejoice, O Gentiles, with his people’ (Deut. 32:43); and lastly from the Nevi’im, ‘The root of Jesse will come [house of David], even he who arises to rule the Gentiles; in him will the Gentiles hope’ (Isa. 11:10).²⁶ These comments apply equally to Matthew 10:5–7; John 10:16; and Romans 9:4, 5. See also Isaiah 56:3–8 and many other Old Testament predictions elaborating the ‘promise to the patriarchs that in Abraham all the families of the earth shall be blessed’ (Gen. 12:3).

9. The term ‘kingdom of heaven’ as employed by Jesus displays an area of equivalence with eternal life, treasure in heaven, the kingdom of God and ‘the regeneration’ of the world which have several present and future aspects of the kingdom of Christ in this world.

A story in Matthew 19 displays the point. Jesus had just spoken of celibate living ‘for the sake of the kingdom of heaven’ (v. 12); whereupon there were brought to him ‘little children’ of whom He declared, ‘to such belongs the kingdom of heaven’ (v. 14). The first of these two references to the kingdom of heaven seems to indicate simply the sphere of God’s spiritual-moral interests on earth, the second the sphere of salvation—not an essentially different thought.

Then follows (Matt. 19:16–30) the incident of the rich young ruler (cf. Luke 18:18 ff.; Mark 10:17 ff.). The man asked how to have eternal life (v. 16). Jesus told him how but called the ‘life’ (v. 17) to be obtained ‘treasure in heaven’ (v. 21). Then, addressing ‘his disciples,’ Jesus spoke of this eternal life or treasure in heaven as entering into ‘the kingdom of heaven’ (v. 23); and as entering ‘the kingdom of God’ (v. 24); again as inheriting ‘eternal life’ (v. 29). He also spoke of the Apostles as ‘in the new world [regeneration, kjv, paliggenesia, Gr.] when the Son of Man will sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel’ (v. 28). This last scarcely has primary reference to the church—in which case one should wonder which tribe one belongs to!

There is quite sufficient basis in this text alone to understand that the kingdom of heaven has plain reference sometimes to the era of Messiah’s reign on earth in the future predicted by the prophets of the Old Testament and sometimes to a living hope of Israel in Jesus’ time. In view of this passage how can we think of the disciples’ question of Acts 1:6 as stupid? Yet, there is also plain and, I think, unmistakable reference, in the expression ‘kingdom of heaven’ or ‘kingdom of God,’ to the eternal life the believer has now—to heaven above where his ‘treasure’ is even now.

10. There is an understood overlapping of the future (supernatural and eschatological) with the present (natural and worldly) in the above language, making it appropriate to speak of the reign of Christ by the Spirit in the hearts, lives and mutual connections of believers in the church as the kingdom of God, and even of the professing church as the kingdom of Christ (or of God). Calvin made the discerning comment on John 17:2, ‘So then, the kingdom of Christ extends, no doubt, to all men; but it brings salvation to none but the elect, who with voluntary obedience follow the voice of the Shepherd; for the others are compelled by violence to obey him, till at length he utterly bruise them with his iron sceptre.’²⁷

The personal accredited presence of the Son of David, the Messiah of Old Testament prophecy, rendered the kingdom of heaven, in an eschatological sense, present on earth. He invaded Satan’s kingdom, casting out the demons who got in His way or who ruled the lives of victims He chose to deliver (Matt. 12:22 ff.), declaring to Satan’s Jewish friends, ‘if it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you’ (Matt. 12:28). Shortly afterward Jesus proclaimed ‘[a] greater than Jonah is here’ (Matt. 12:41) and ‘[a] greater than Solomon is here’ (Matt. 12:42). The works (miracles, signs, power) following His baptism that accompanied Him and His official representatives, the Apostles, and some others, were directly a sign to that generation that God’s kingdom of power was (and still is) present on earth (see Heb. 2:3, 4). These blessings (see Luke 4:16–19) were proclaimed early by Jesus (Luke 4:16–21) and cited later by Him (Matt. 11:1–6) as evidence that the King of Israel (John 1:49) was present in the Person of Jesus of Nazareth. To the same effect are the comments of K. L. Schmidt of Basel:

That the ekklēsia, too, is an eschatological entity is proved by the eschatological events [miracles as prophesied] of the self-witness of Jesus as Son of man and the institution of the Lord's Supper. But the basileia tou theou and the ekklēsia are not the same. They are not the same in the primitive community which certainly regarded itself as the ekklēsia but which continued the proclamation of the basileia. Nor are they the same in the preaching of Jesus, who promises [the kingdom of God] to his ekklēsia. ['Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Luke 12:32)] In this sense the post-Easter ekklēsia, too, regarded itself as eschatological. In this sense the individual [believer] is to be understood eschatologically as a justified sinner [who has passed from death to life].²⁸

Hence the age to come (see Matt. 19:28) has already broken into the present age with the Advent of Messiah; believers in the Messiah (Old Testament predictions included Gentiles also in His benevolent reign) have already entered Messiah's kingdom and already participate in some of the blessings of that properly future kingdom. They now 'have eternal life' (John 3:16); they already have 'passed from death to life' (John 5:24). Their 'life' now already 'hidden with Christ in God' (Col. 3:3) and shall 'appear with him in glory' when 'Christ ... appears' (Col. 3:4). They even now may be 'transformed' (Rom. 12:1, 2) if not yet translated, and have even 'tasted ... the powers of the age to come' (Heb. 6:5).

When Jesus said that the kingdom of heaven is like a seed sown in the field of the world or in the heart of hearers (Matt. 13:38; 19; Mark 4:15), that kingdom is obviously in the here-and-now of this present world. Similarly, when Jesus informed 'one of the scribes ... "You are not far from the kingdom of God"' (Mark 12:28, 34) the tense is not future but present. Contrariwise, Jesus spoke a parable 'because they [the Passover crowds] supposed that the kingdom of God was to appear immediately' (Luke 19:11) and in the parable spoke of going to 'a far country' to 'receive ... a kingdom' (Luke 19:12; see also Matt. 22:1-4; 25:14). This places the 'also-kingdom' in a future time.

Though these observations may appear novel and strange to some and like a brilliant discovery to others, they are neither strange nor new ideas. The present spiritual aspects and future spiritual, visible and glorious aspects of the kingdom of God have been obvious to Bible readers always, I judge. Let me cite first a personal anecdote and then a bit of rabbinic theology.

In the period of prevalence of 'postponed kingdom' theory among conservative evangelicals, at the tender age of about sixteen, I was asked to teach a class of boys my own age. It was a time before radio and television had robbed our homes of extensive Bible reading, so the boys knew something of Scripture. Our thirteen-week quarter was on Matthew. Lesson material from Union Gospel Press resolutely argued that the kingdom of Matthew's Gospel is the future visible, earthly reign of Christ. My best friend argued me down each Sunday, though I gamely followed Robert McQuilkin's 'notes on the lesson.' My friend, Norwood, had seen both the present and future plainly, without any special pleading, in the King James Version before his unbiased vision.

Solomon Schechter, late head of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, was once perhaps the most widely known to American Gentiles of interpreters of rabbinic theology. His Aspects of Rabbinic Theology is about as near to systematic theology as Judaism gets. It seeks to summarize and systematize major concepts of the Talmud and devotes three of the eighteen chapters to ‘The Kingdom of God—Invisible, Universal and National.’ I cite first the summary on the subject by Louis Finkelstein, another famous Jewish scholar, in the lengthy introduction. He held that in eastern Europe of the nineteenth century the society of the good early years of the Judaism in the Diaspora was restored, saying that in the rejuvenated world:

In the rejuvenated ancient world the spirit of man was far more real than his body; mastery of Torah and compliance ... far more urgent and important than success in any aspect of mortal life. The kingdom of God was at once distantly future and immediately present [emphasis added]. It was distant in the sense that the vast majority lived outside it [remember the scribe ‘not far from the kingdom’]. It was present in the sense that one spent almost all one’s life [i.e. that of a true Jew] within it. Every Jew ‘accepted’ each day ‘the yoke of the Kingdom of Heaven,’ and a moment later prayed that this Kingdom might through a miracle be realized on earth in the future.²⁹

This was the best sort of Jewish piety in Palestine when Jesus addressed its crowds of curious people. Space does not allow me to show that Jesus was in almost every respect a true Jewish rabbi, employing many rabbinical and popular Jewish forms of expression, trains of thought, patterns of speech and accepted Weltanschauung. For one example, most of what Christians call the ‘Lord’s Prayer’ (Matt. 6:9–13) evidently previously existed in the earliest forms of what became the Jewish Prayer Book. ‘“Our Father, who is in heaven” is one of the most frequent ways of addressing God in the Jewish Prayer Book and the subsequent liturgy.’³⁰ Almost every member of the prayer can be found in the oldest rabbinic literature, the prayer book and the liturgy. If, as seems likely, these ideas of the kingdom of God derive from the days of Hillel and Shammai and the earlier Diaspora schools, then we may rest assured that Jesus’ teachings of a present kingdom of God in and among godly people and their association, as well as a future visible-earthly kingdom of glory on earth, were not per se thought strange. In such case the fluidity of terminology we have discovered in Matthew 19—life, eternal life, heaven, treasure in heaven, kingdom of heaven (or of God)—would have seemed quite unremarkable—along with a reference on the same plane of thought to a future reconstitution (regeneration, paliggenesia) when the Messiah would reign with His saints over the reconstituted ‘twelve tribes of Israel’ (Matt. 19:28).

Schechter shows that the kingdom of hope of post-biblical Judaism always embraced future hope of fulfillments, spiritual and national, as well as universal spread of the same blessings to the whole world.³¹

The Ascended Christ’s Present Reign at the Father’s Right Hand

1. The Fact

The nature of this event prevents any ‘this-worldly’ eyewitness report. Yet the New Testament provides revelation both of the fact itself and the meaning of it.

With reference to the fact, Jesus predicted it (Matt. 26:64) during His trials before Caiaphas; Peter in the first Christian sermon announced that Jesus had been exalted to the right hand of God (Acts 2:23); Stephen in his dying moments saw Jesus at the ‘right hand of God’ (risen from His throne to receive to glory the first Christian martyr, Acts 7:56). Through the New Testament the event is related to Christian doctrine, comfort and admonition (see the paragraphs to follow).

2. The Predictions

As in the case of other aspects of Messiah's work the Ascension is regarded as predicted in prophecy, prophecy which shaped the very language by which the whole subject is treated in the New Testament. That prophecy is Psalm 110: 'The Lord says to my Lord: "Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool." ... Rule in the midst of your enemies!... The Lord is at your right hand; he will shatter kings on the day of his wrath.' This phraseology is clearly recognizable in New Testament references to the Ascension. Here at the fountain are the elements of Christ's Kingly reign—a beginning in which He is declared King and a reign which takes place at first 'in the midst of ... enemies' but which shall later triumph openly over all other sovereignties.

3. The Salvational Meaning

Viewed from the viewpoint of redemption, the session at the Father's right hand was a signal that redemption was a finished work. By one sacrifice—once and for all—He had finished His work (Heb. 10:11–13). Thus the seated Savior is a ground of assurance to the Christian of full forgiveness. It completes setting the conscience free (Heb. 1:3; 12:2)

4. The Inauguration of Christ's Reign

The appropriation by Christ of His Kingly power, won by death and resurrection, took place at His session at the right hand of the Father—and it is this which gives it great significance. It marks the beginning of the reign of Christ. This is the meaning assigned at 1 Peter 3:21, 22, 'Jesus Christ ... has gone into heaven and is at the right hand of God, with angels, authorities, and powers having been subjected to him.' This reign, as Psalm 110 says, is 'in the midst' of enemies and will progress until all of them are under His feet (vv. 1, 2, 5; cf. Ps. 8:4–6; Heb. 2:6–9).³²

5. The Consummation of Christ's Reign

That reign, presently invisible and acknowledged on earth only by Christians, will become visible at His second coming as King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 5:6–14; 11:15; 19:11–21). At that time will occur the resurrection of the righteous dead (Rev. 20:1–5), to be followed by Christ's millennial reign (Rev. 20:4–6). Then ensue the resurrection and judgment of 'The rest of the dead' and their final judgment (Rev. 20:7–15), including presumably also all wicked angels, demons and Satan. This will be succeeded—who knows how long?—by a merging of the reign of Christ with that of His Father, 'For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet' (1 Cor. 15:23–25; see also Phil. 2:9–11).

6. The Church's Present Share in Christ's Reign

The Church's present share in and relation to the reign of Christ from the Father's right hand is mentioned at Ephesians 1:20–23; 4:15; 5:23 and Col. 1:18–20. It has been observed that the Christian confession, 'Jesus Christ is Lord' is an acknowledgment of this reign and that this doctrine brings about inevitable collision whenever 'Caesar' seeks to replace Christ as the object of ultimate allegiance. God's Son will allow no competitors.³³

¹ Inquiring students may consult articles about Harnak, Dodd, A. Schweitzer and 'Eschatology,' 'Realized Eschatology,' 'Enaugurated Eschatology' and 'Kingdom of God' in recent encyclopaedias of theology or of the Bible to gain further background and bibliography. Also any of the works of G. Ladd, especially his article 'Kingdom of Christ, God, Heaven' in Evangelical Dictionary of Theology. The literature is quite overwhelming. See also R. D. Culver, The Life of Christ, index 'kingdom of Christ,' 'God' and 'Heaven,' p. 291, Excursus 13, pp. 246–247; A Greater Commission, Appendix A., pp. 155–159; 'Rhetorical Allegories Among the Parables of Jesus,' pp. 103–124; New Testament Essays, G. T. Meadors, Winona Lake, IN: BMH Books, 1991.

² Alva J. McClain, The Greatness of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1959), p. 329.

³ ibid., p. 332.

⁴ Daniel and the Latter Days (Chicago: Moody Press, 1954, 1977) reprinted by author as The Earthly Reign of Our Lord With His People, 1999.

⁵ See Matt. 3:1–3; 11:3 ff.; 3:13–17; John 1:19–35.

⁶ Acts 1:4, 5; cf. Matt. 2:11; John 14:16–18.

⁷ Alva J. McClain, The Greatness of the Kingdom, p. 425.

⁸ ibid., p. 425.

⁹ ibid., pp. 389–430.

¹⁰ George Ladd, The Gospel of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959), p. 116.

¹¹ See R. Culver, A Greater Commission, pp. 36–39.

¹² George Ladd, Crucial Questions About the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1952), p. 117.

¹³ Philip Maura, God's Present Kingdom (New York: Revell, 1919), pp. 192–208.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 19.

¹⁵ L. E. Maxwell, Crowded to Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950), with McQuilkin's foreword to Maxwell's book.

¹⁶ Ladd, Crucial Questions About the Kingdom of God.

¹⁷ C. R. Ludwigson, A Survey of Bible Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1951, 1975).

¹⁸ Later known as Trinity Evangelical Divinity School.

¹⁹ I would direct the reader who is forming an opinion on this difficult matter to consider the irenic writings of Erich Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1954), pp. 171–178, still available and applicable, or C. R. Ludwigson, A Survey of Bible Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1951, 1975), pp. 189–182, and then more technical books and articles. See George Ladd, ‘Kingdom of Christ,’ ‘God,’ ‘Heaven,’ in Elwell, Dictionary of Theology, and pp. 607–611 for a survey of the subject and basic bibliography. See A. J. McClain, The Greatness of the Kingdom, 1959, p. 556, presently available at BMH Books, P. O. Box 554, Winona Lake, IN 46590, for a superb presentation of the postponed kingdom (dispensational) view and very full theological bibliography.

²⁰ Cf. my remarks in Perry and Culver, How to Search the Scriptures, 1967, 1979, pp. 67–69.

²¹ Also see my article, ‘The Difficulty of Interpreting Old Testament Prophecy,’ Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1957.

²² All the ideas since the last previous note are from The Progress of Doctrine in the New Testament, Bampton Lectures of 1865 by Thomas Dehany Bernard (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, repr. n.d.), pp. 72–77.

²³ See Ludwigson, A Survey of Bible Prophecy, pp. 78–82.

²⁴ Herman Ridderbos, The Coming of the Kingdom (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed Publ. Co., 1962), pp. 81, 82. This quotation summarizes the first ninety-seven pages of this great book.

²⁵ R. D. Culver, A Greater Commission (Chicago: Moody Press, 1984), p. 75.

²⁶ See chapter 14 above, and my discussion of this passage in A Greater Commission, pp. 123–126.

²⁷ Calvin, Commentary on John vol ii (Edinburgh, 1847), pp. 165, 166.

²⁸ K. L. Schmidt, TDNT, III., p. 522.

²⁹ Solomon Schechter, Aspects of Rabbinic Theology: Major Concepts of the Talmud (New York: Schocken Books, 1961), p. viii.

³⁰ ibid., pp. 54, 55.

³¹ ibid., pp. 97–115.

³² There is no scriptural evidence for the claims of some that at Christ’s session He fulfilled all the promises of Old and New Testaments of the Messiah’s reign from the ‘throne of David.’ Passages cited (e.g. Acts 8:32–36) say nothing of the sort. David’s throne is on earth, not in heaven.

³³ I read The Gospel of the Kingdom by G. H. Lang after completing this chapter and was pleasantly surprised. Almost every proposal of mine was anticipated long ago by Mr Lang, who first wrote his small book about seventy-five years ago. G. H. Lang, The Gospel of the Kingdom (reissued Miami Springs, FL: Schoettle Publ. Co., 1988).

Culver, R. D. (2005). Systematic Theology: Biblical and Historical (857). Ross-shire, UK: Mentor.

10

The Essential Nature of the Church

Early in these pages it was pointed out that divine revelation in the New Testament supplies copious information about the church and numerous figures (vine and branches, body of Christ, household of God, and similar), yet it is never defined. Paul calls the church a ‘mystery’—something we know only because God reveals it and only as much as He reveals—several times (Rom. 16:25; Eph. 1:9; 3:3–9; 5:22). Jesus referred to His ekklēsia by name only twice and in the future tense (Matt. 16:18; 18:17). The society of believers is called ‘the church’ (ekklēsia) in Luke’s history only after she had existed as an ekklēsia for quite some time (Acts 5:11).¹ Yet in those early days the Christian ekklēsia was a concrete visible reality which the unconverted Saul of Tarsus could identify and persecute (Acts 8:1, 3; 1 Cor. 15:9). There was a church at Jerusalem before it had deacons or elders or a permanent place of worship, and the ekklēsia in Crete evidently existed for a brief period without pastors or other officers—perhaps with no formal organization at all (Titus 1:5–7 ff.). The church was there, but what was it? The problem is ours, certainly not theirs.

Why We Have the Problem

Though the church Fathers wrote much about the local churches and the whole ‘body of Christ,’ they do not anywhere define her. Why? Let an acknowledged modern Eastern Orthodox authority on doctrine and history explain:

The Fathers did not care so much for the doctrine of the church precisely because the glorious reality of the church was open to their spiritual vision. One does not define what is self-evident.²

Florovsky goes on to point out this omission prevailed until 1489 when the first systematic treatise on the church was composed by Cardinal de Turracremata.³

Reformation Attempts

The Roman Church of the sixteenth century, however, claimed to be the one true church, sole dispensary of the means of salvation. When Luther (and before him the fifteenth-century ‘pre-reformers’) broke with a ‘church’ he deemed to be a spiritual harlot, he found it necessary to explain to himself and his disciples just what a true church is. He struggled with the problem and formed tentative statements on how to recognize the church of any particular place but did not produce a formal definition, though he thought he ‘knew it when he saw it.’ We will get back briefly to Luther and Lutheran thought on the matter.

By Calvin’s time, a generation later, the nature of the church, its ministry and sacraments (ordinances) were matters of confessional controversy. Church teachers and doctrinal authorities have attempted from then to now to state what the church is, and with some success. There is more agreement than immediately apparent in the variety of wordings. It has well been said that the nature of the church ‘can be rather depicted and described than properly defined.’⁴

Missionary and Ecumenist Interest

Many forces in the world and the churches of Christendom conspired to make the period from the beginning of the modern missionary movement (1790+), culminating in the organization and the formation of the World Council of Churches (1948), and with diminishing force on to about 1970, a time of great effort to forge some visible unity of all churches in Christendom. This demanded a common understanding of what the church as such is—in a word, the essential nature of the church, the subject of this chapter. Early on, many evangelicals led the search and research, though ultimately liberal forces took control of the organized ecumenical movement. The works by Rouse and Neill referred to above, and the Amsterdam Assembly Series, Man’s Disorder and God’s Design (New York: Harper, 1948), record the effort to 1948. Numerous bibliographies guide the scholar to the literary remains of the largely failed organizational effort. Many of the best hours of my life were spent reading these materials. I will not attempt summary or report save to sketch what I believe to be the two important formulations in a few paragraphs. The first is the chapter by Florovsky noted earlier from 1948 and the second from T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries.

Wherever there is a genuine local assembly of regenerate believers, the universal church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven, is also present. In the main, therefore, the following remark of T. M. Lindsay applies: ‘And we are definitely taught by the very ways in which St. Paul uses the word “church” to see the church Universal in the individual Christian community.’ He cites 1 Corinthians 10:32; 11:22; 12:28; Acts 20:28 (as probably); and 1 Timothy 3:5, 15 (as perhaps).⁵

A World Council of Churches Definition

Florovsky eschews definition (as earlier observed here) as being impossible, but sets forth what he asserts can be apprehended (not his word) within the worshipping church.

Ekklēsia, claims this Eastern Orthodox author, lays emphasis on ‘the ultimate unity of the Chosen People ... a sacred whole’ existing from the beginning ‘as a corporate whole.’⁶

‘Christianity means a “common life” ... united not only among themselves, but ... one—in Christ.’ This makes real community possible ‘in Him.’ Florovsky cites Colossians 2:7, ‘rooted and built up in him.’ Believers are ‘born anew in Him,’ ‘baptized’ by the ‘one Spirit ... into one body’ (cites 1 Cor. 12:13). She is not a mere ‘human society,’ but rather a ‘Divine Society ... intrinsically not of this world’ or ‘this eon ... but of the age to come.’⁷

This orthodox scholar refines the One-In-Christ idea saying, as a ‘peculiar people ... the ekklēsia, is a sacramental community.’ He states the Latin communio sanctorum as neuter gender in the ancient formula, hence not communion of saints but of holy things, that is the ‘two “social sacraments” [baptism and Eucharist],’ and finds the right administration of the sacraments belongs to the essence of the church. Yet strangely this scholar of Eastern Orthodoxy, which regularly baptizes infants (by true immersion), adds, ‘Baptism is to be preceded by repentance and faith. A personal relation between an aspirant and his Lord must be first established by the hearing and the receiving of the Word, the message of salvation.’ Perhaps Florovsky is thinking of adult converts only. This seems to say the uniting essence of the church lies in the rites of baptism and the Lord’s Supper observed by all Christendom. Though he draws close parallels between the Israel of old and the ekklēsia he regards the church as a ‘new Christian existence’ (45). Florovsky asserts:

Strictly speaking the Messianic Community gathered by Jesus the Christ was not yet the church, before His Passion and Resurrection, before ‘the promise of the Father’ was sent upon it and it was endued with power from on high ... still sub umbraculo legis [under the umbrella of the law].... Pentecost was the mystical consecration, the baptism of the whole church (Acts 1:5).⁸

He goes on to say, ‘By the Spirit we are united with Christ and constituted into His Body.’ Body is more than a metaphor, rather a summary of faith and experience. The church as His body is said to be ‘the extension of the incarnate life of the Son,’ carefully avoiding saying it is an extension of the incarnation per se. He quotes the Fathers Chrysostom, Augustine and Hilary, a modern Lutheran (A. Nygren), and a Roman Catholic (K. Adam) in support.⁹ This seems to say the church began at Pentecost and that its essence was created by the events of that day.

The unity of the church of Christ in the Spirit, he says, is through the apostolic succession of the ‘ministers.’ ‘Pentecost is continued and made permanent in the Church by means of the Apostolic Succession.’¹⁰ It began as an apostolic community and continues. ‘Ministry [priesthood] is ... an indispensable, constitutional or structural feature ... They are acting not only in the “persona” of the church, as primarily in the person of Christ. The local priest in celebrating the eucharist with the people builds the unity of the local church. The bishops secure the same for the whole church in the world.’ In the episcopacy Pentecost becomes universal and continuous. This seems to say the essence of the church is preserved by apostolic succession of the church’s official ministry, i.e. clergy.

Florovsky makes the point that there is a ‘symphony’ of the holy Trinity reflected in the church. He cites John 17:21, 23. Yet the church he affirms, is more Christ-centered (Christological) than Spirit-centered (pneumatological). He closes by saying the church has ‘as it were, a double life, both in heaven and on earth.’ The heavenly life (eschatological) is ‘only an anticipation.’¹¹

This brief excursion into some of the best ‘ecumenical’ ecclesiology will be a novel experience for many readers. It reveals that the special significance of Pentecost was not invented by modern dispensationalists, nor the indispensability of ‘sacraments, rightly administered’ invented by the Lutheran and Reformed, even though Luther and Calvin gave this view currency in Reformation Christianity to the present.

It is reassuring to find that Florovsky, speaking knowledgeably of modern historical and theological research and, presumably, for Eastern Orthodoxy, found the essence of the church at Pentecost in the coming of the Holy Spirit to dwell not only with the waiting 120-plus (including the Twelve) but now to be in them forever. He rightly affirms that to that time the ‘little flock’ of ‘remnant Israel’ were sub umbraculo legis (under the umbrella of) the legal dispensation. He did not learn that from American dispensationalists either. According to Hebrews 7 and 8 that old umbrella was not perpetuated in a new Christian administration but was permanently disposed of—more later.

Florovsky’s sacramental theology is similar to the Roman Church’s inherited teaching. Even in the Roman system the significance of Pentecost to ‘the essential nature of the church’ is not lost.¹² Also see L. Ott.¹³

T. M. Lindsay (chap. 1, ‘The New Testament Conception of the Church’) does not define the New Testament church in terms of essence (what a thing is) but descriptively, as does the book of Acts and the Epistles. He deals with ‘characteristics.’ First, ‘The church of Christ ... is a fellowship with Jesus Christ; that is the divine element in it. It is a fellowship with the brethren; that is the human element in it’ (p. 6). He calls attention to the fact the church is a society: ‘union with Christ which is the deepest of all personal things, always involves something social.’ The ‘call’ to be saved seldom comes except in company of believers.’¹⁴

‘The second characteristic ... is that [the church] is a unity.’¹⁵ He means the world-wide church on earth at this point. Lindsay showed that ‘this unity of the church of Christ in the mind of St. Paul was something essentially spiritual.’¹⁶ He explains:

[I]n the unity of the Christian church, something which ties implicitly in the unformed faith of every believer, that in personal union with Christ there is union with the whole body of the redeemed, and that man is never alone either in sin or in salvation.... And because the Unity of the church of Christ is a primary verity of the Christian faith, it can never be adequately represented in any outward polity ... never an earthly throne, but must always be that heavenly place where Jesus sits at the Right hand of God.¹⁷

He goes on, quoting Ignatius: ‘Where Jesus Christ is, there is the whole church’ and adds:

The congregation at Corinth was, in the eyes of Paul ... not a Body of Christ, for there is but one Body of Christ; not part of the Body of Christ, for Christ is not divided; but the Body of Christ in its unity and filled with the fulness of His powers [see Lindsay’s exegesis of 1 Cor. 12:27, pp. 14, 15].... In every Christian society ... our Lord has placed ‘gifts’ or charismata, which enables the church to perform its divine functions; and all the spiritual actions of the tiniest community [a house church]—Prayer, Praise, Preaching, Baptism, the Holy Supper—are actions of the whole church of Christ.¹⁸

It was at this point where, without saying so, Lindsay struck the essential nature of the church—a body of redeemed people in union with the risen, exalted and ascended Christ, baptized by Him in the Holy Spirit into one body, as we shall see.

Lindsay found three further ‘outstanding elements in the New Testament conception of the church of Christ': (1) visible community; (2) authority from Christ for oversight and discipline of its members; and (3) 'Lastly, the church of Christ is a sacerdotal society—a ministering priesthood of all believers not a mediating priesthood.'¹⁹ His treatment is enlightening, but does not bring us precisely to the point of this chapter, 'the essential nature of the church.' Think of the church in its essential nature as having visibility, authority and a holy ministry, not being visibility, authority and holiness. These matters call for attention when we come to discuss the local church.

I shall spare the reader further modern views of the essence of the church—what it is by definition. Some include a form of baptism in the essence or a theory of ordination to the office of bishop or priest or alleged right administration of sacraments. Most of these distinctions in my judgment might best be applied to the bene esse, that is well-being, not the being essence of the church. Acts 2:42 tells us the newly constituted church 'devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and the prayers [emphasis added].' These four elements of her life—sound doctrine, vital sharing with one another, common worship and united prayer—were and are of the bene esse (well-being) of the church, but they are not the church; they are vital signs of the church.

The New Testament Conception of the Church

Let us come to focus on that which constituted Jesus' waiting disciples, the church of Jesus Christ.

Although it provides no definition or detailed description of the church, the New Testament does use various terms which, by direct implication and by rich and varied symbolism, provided materials for understanding the nature of the church universal and local. Most of the information available, of course, deals with the details of the function and of the conduct of churches as local organizations.²⁰

It must be added that the dependence of the church for its very existence upon the ministry of the Holy Spirit and on the career of the Son of God are important considerations.

The teaching of the New Testament regarding the nature of the (universal) church may be summarized in two propositions. The first now follows.

I. The church is a body of believers in Christ created by the Holy Spirit, who imparts His own eternal life to each believer-member and who is Himself, in a distinct and special way, the bond of vital unity between the members themselves and of all with Christ. This teaching is set forth in Paul's rather full presentation of the subject of the nature of the church in 1 Corinthians 12.

The chapter begins with discussion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit among the 'brethren' (v. 1 kjv). These brethren are 'the church [ekklēsia] of God that is in Corinth ... sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints together with all those who in every place call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. 1:2). They have been divinely enabled to say, 'Jesus is the Lord ... by the Holy Spirit' (v. 3; cf. 12:3 kjv). To each believer is given some manifestation of the presence of the Spirit in his life by some one or more gifts (vv. 4–11). Then Paul moves on to state that there is a unique and profound unity among these Spirit-enabled Christ-believers. 'For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. For in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free; and were all made to drink of one Spirit' (1 Cor. 12:12, 13 asv).

In verse 12, ending with 'so also is Christ,' the figure of the human body is introduced. It is one body with many parts (members). The unity in diversity and diversity in unity of the human body are the ideas of interest to Paul.

He points out that there was a then past act whereby all the believers ('we all') were united together into one body ('baptized into one body'). It was an historically past event. The word baptized (Greek ebaptisthēmen) is aorist passive (not perfect as the kjv suggests). Note also that according to the asv rendering believers are baptized in (Greek en) the 'one' Holy Spirit, not by Him. As we shall see, this points back to the Pentecostal event (I would not lay emphasis on the charismatic experience of the 120 but on the filling of the house by the Spirit). We are at liberty to affirm that all believers everywhere, when they become believers, enter into the same event. All Christians are joined to Christ's body in the same way. There is only one Spirit. Through vital union with Him believers are constituted one divinely universal, spiritual body just as the natural body of man is a natural vital union through the natural life within it.

The church properly speaking had its birthday on the day of Pentecost, for the church is composed of all of those who by one Spirit [better, in one Spirit] have been baptized into one body by Christ, [Matt. 3:11] (1 Cor. 12:13), and this baptizing work of the Spirit began on the day of Pentecost [Acts 2].²¹

Furthermore, all believers are made to participate in the life of Christ. Above in verse 12, the body itself (i.e. the church) is called 'Christ'—'so also is Christ.' This is because all the life in the church is Christ's own. He is the spiritual progenitor of them all (cf. Heb. 2:10, 13). Thus by the well-known water-of-life figure (John 3:5; 4:10, 13, 14; 1 Cor. 10:4) Paul says 'we ... all were made to drink of one Spirit.'

Now, there is no doubt that in 1 Corinthians 12 'the body' is 'the church.' This is the sense from the beginning of the chapter, though the word 'church' is not used there. At verses 27 and 28, however, the text is explicit: 'Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it. And God has appointed in the church first apostles, second prophets,' and so on. That Paul is thinking specifically of the church universal rather than the local church is indicated not only by the exchange of body and church here, but also by the character of the Pentecostal event referred to in verse 13, by the grandeur of the general conception of the passage, and also by his reference to 'apostles.' The Apostles were given to the whole church everywhere—even that part of it already in heaven (which, by this time had received at least one Apostle, James). There is no evidence that Corinth had any of these Apostles resident when Paul wrote the Epistle to the church there or indeed had ever had them, as the church local at Corinth is not the specific referent. The Cephas party (1 Cor. 3:22) was not built on Peter's residence there.

The 'body of Christ' metaphor for the church has been periodically pressed toward a 'high ecclesiology,' making the metaphor something close to an ontological statement. This happened in the Anglo-Catholic movement of the nineteenth century and again in the flood tide of the world church or ecumenical movements of the mid-twentieth century. Gustaf Aulen wrote (in 1948, at the time of the organization of the World Council of Churches): 'Therefore, when the church is called the Body of Christ, this expression is not to be understood merely as figurative. This word visualizes in a very concrete way that Christ and the church are a unity.’²² Karl Barth at that time resisted the notion.²³

Likewise many Roman ‘Catholics and Orthodox ... see 1 Corinthians 12:27 as more than mere metaphor and particularly as a simple statement of reality proving that the relationship of the church and Christ should be seen more in terms of identity.’²⁴

This idea is prominent in some recent writings of Roman theologians who insist Christ mediates salvation through the church and her sacraments—sacraments provided by a priestly hierarchy at whose head is Christ’s vicar, the pope.²⁵ Robert Saucy has thoroughly canvassed the subject in the above-named article.

II. *The formation of the church by the special work of the Holy Spirit was the culmination of a process of revelation and of history, all of which lie in the record and history of the New Testament.*²⁶

The story begins with Matthew 3:1–17, the preparatory ministry of John and the inauguration of Jesus as the Messiah of God. The baptizing forerunner commands repentance, demands fruits of righteousness, and promises a Messiah of both grace and judgment. The Messiah comes, and is baptized by John in an act of dedication to His coming ministry of redemption. Then, before the forty days of temptation and while still in the baptismal waters, the Spirit visibly descends from heaven upon Him and henceforth leads and empowers His entire ministry. The sevenfold enduement of the ‘rod out of the stem of Jesse,’ promised by Isaiah (11:2 and 42:1 ff. kjv), having taken place, He is ‘led up’ (Matt 4:1) henceforth in a special way by the Third Person of the Godhead. Of course the Spirit had always been with Him on earth (vid. Luke 1:35) but this outstanding event at Jesus’ baptism, emphasized in each of the four Gospels (Matt. 4:13–17; Mark 1:1–11; Luke 3:21, 22; John 1:29–34) as fulfillment of the prophecies, was something special.

John the Baptist made the first announcement of Jesus’ future special bestowment of the Spirit upon certain people—presumably those prepared for it—as follows: ‘I baptize you with water for repentance, but he who is coming after me is mightier than I, whose sandals I am not worthy to carry. He will baptize you with (Gr. en, in) the Holy Spirit and with fire’ (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:15–17).²⁷ Such is the promise. The Holy Spirit baptizes no one. Jesus baptizes. Jesus is the agent. The Spirit is the ‘element’ in which Jesus baptizes. The symbolism is derived from immersion in water.

Many months later the promise of the baptism of believing people in the Spirit was still unfulfilled, though Jesus did add His own promise of the same. ‘On the last day of the feast [Tabernacles, John 7:2], the great day, Jesus stood up and cried out, “If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, ‘Out of his heart will flow rivers of living water’ ” (John 7:37, 38). These are Jesus’ words. There follows a bit of inspired apostolic ‘Biblical theology’ interpreting Jesus’ words. ‘Now this he said about the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were to receive, for as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified’ (John 7:39). This is exceedingly plain. John’s promise of the baptism in the Holy Spirit, reaffirmed and amplified by Jesus, had to do with a unique and totally unprecedented conferral of the Holy Spirit on believers in Christ which could not take place until after Jesus’ redemptive ministry of death, burial, resurrection and Ascension had been accomplished. Jesus' 'hour' was yet future as He said only a few days earlier (John 7:6, 8). Up to the time of the Last Supper His hour had not come—as several notices in the Gospels relate. But beginning with the Last Supper His time had come (vid. John 13:31, 32). The Ascension climaxed His 'time' or 'hour.' Pentecost came a few days later (Acts 1:5; 2:1).

We have the example of the New Testament itself in applying many Old Testament references to the Spirit of God and His work to the Third Person of the Trinity.²⁸ The Spirit was the Author of faith then as now (2 Cor. 4:13; cf. Ps. 116:10). He gave the temple ritual to Moses (Heb. 9:8) and spoke through all the Old Testament prophets (Matt. 22:43; Mark 12:36; Acts 1:16; 20:25; Heb. 3:7; 10:15). Saints were aware of His presence with them (Ps. 51:11). One cannot conceive of the regeneration necessary to enter the kingdom of God (John 3:3, 5, 7) back then apart from enlightenment and empowering of the souls, then as now 'dead in trespasses and sins.' He was in the world and with mankind then as now, though 'not yet' doing His present special office work.

A. H. Strong illustrated the matter well. He points out that the Holy Spirit is 'eternal' (Heb. 9:14) and wrought in Old Testament times. Yet:

Before Christ, the Holy Spirit was not yet (John 7:39), just as before Edison electricity was not yet. There was just as much electricity in the world before Edison as there is now. Edison has only taught us its existence and how to use it. Still we can say that, before Edison, electricity as a means of lighting, warming [instant communication] ... had no existence. So until Pentecost, the Holy Spirit, as the revealer of Christ [and whose presence within each believer unifies and constitutes the ekklēsia of Christ] 'was not yet.'²⁹

F. Meyrick and H. B. Smith, from an Anglican perspective, find the same significance for Pentecost:

The Day of Pentecost is the birthday of the Christian Church. The Spirit, who was sent by the Son from the Father, and rested on each of the Disciples, combined them once more into a whole—combined them as they had never before been combined, by an internal and spiritual bond of cohesion. Before they had been individual followers of Jesus, now they became his mystical body, animated by his Spirit. The nucleus was formed.

Agglomeration and development would do the rest.³⁰

Now note the progress. Perhaps in the Upper Room, perhaps on the way to Gethsemane (John 18:1), Jesus gave the 'promise of the Father' (Acts 1:4; 2:33) in some detail—greatly advancing the information supplied by John the Baptist and his own striking utterance in John 7:37–39. The first and most significant paragraph is John 14:16–18: 'And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another [Gr. allon, another of the same kind] Helper, to be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth [of great significance since these Apostles were to be the special bearers of new revelation (John 16:12, 13)], whom the world cannot receive, because it neither sees him nor knows him. You know him, for he dwells with you [Gr. par' humin, beside, or alongside you] and will be in you [en humin, in, or inside you]. I will not leave you as orphans; I will come to you.' It is possible that 'will be' (estai) should be 'is,' present tense (esti). As Alford and Westcott agreed in their commentaries on John in either case the sense is future. It is pointed out by more recent writers, including Max Zerwick and Macy Grosvenor,³¹ that the sense is future in either case, if present tense, a 'futuristic present.' It is parallel with 'I will not leave you as orphans' immediately following. Recent Versions preserve the futuristic translations (niv, rsv, etc.).

This also is not obscure. As believers in the one true God through the Scriptures, such as Elizabeth (Luke 1:41), Zacharias (Luke 1:67), Simeon (Luke 2:26) and others, they 'knew' the Holy Spirit. He had been 'with' them. Now a deeper relationship was to be theirs. The Spirit of God was going to be 'in' them in some special sense no believer could know until some future time after Jesus had gone away, as the text plainly states and exegetes of every stripe remind us. This special coming of the Holy Spirit, inasmuch as in a mysterious way the triune Godhead cannot be divided, was to be a coming of Christ, for he said of it, 'I will come to you' (John 14:18). As just now stated, some of the problems of the local 'presence' of Persons of the Godhead either in heaven 'with the Father' or on earth 'with you' and of their identity, which inevitably arise at this juncture, belong to the mysteries of the Persons of the Trinity and of the two natures of Christ and are hence, though matters of revelation and of faith, not fully explicable. They are by definition biblical mysteries.

No argument from those who might wish to over-press the continuity between the old and new covenants or of the continuity of the people of God under each of the covenants may ignore or bypass these facts. The relation of the Holy Spirit to the Christian believers post-Pentecost is not in every respect the same as it was before that event.

Jesus spoke very much of the future descent of the Spirit during the last night with His disciples. Yet, since for our present purpose no particular doctrinal advance was made, we cite the references and pass on. They are all in John—14:25–28; 15:26, 26; 16:7–15. Then at an Easter evening appearance, to the startled Apostles and perhaps other disciples, Jesus made a dramatic pronouncement, viz.: 'he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Spirit' (John 20:22 asv). This Easter evening pronouncement has a cryptic flavor. The Greek text might be translated 'receive holy spirit' (no 'the'). This, like the twofold pronouncement of peace, was something special, just for those frightened ten believers in that room—Judas and Thomas being absent. Pentecost was yet nearly seven weeks in the future. For those momentous but tedious days of waiting they needed staying power that even the strongest of them had not yet demonstrated. 'To enable them, Jesus imparted "a Holy Spirit" (John 20:22, pneuma hagion) the power of new life from the risen Savior. This was necessary to create in them the proper conditions for the descent of the Holy Spirit in the special way He came at Pentecost. The Spirit conferred was the [risen] Christ's Spirit, the Holy Spirit as dwelling in Him... The conferral of the Spirit in John 20:22 might be conceded to have been preliminary to Pentecost in the same sense that the descent of the Spirit at Jesus' baptism was preliminary to the mighty work of the Spirit of God some years later.'³² The view of John 20:22 which I have summarized here³³ follows the lead of B. F. Westcott in his famous commentary on the Gospel of John.³⁴

We should not be surprised then to read how that shortly before His ascension and only a few days before the Feast of Pentecost, 'And while staying with them he [Jesus] ordered them [the disciples] not to depart from Jerusalem, but to wait for the promise of the Father, which, he said, "you heard from me; for John baptized with water [Gr. suggests 'administered water baptism'], but you will be baptized [in] with the Holy Spirit not many days from now' " (Acts 1:4, 5).

Jesus here comes full circle back to the prophecy of John the Baptist with which we started: ‘he will baptize you with the Holy Spirit’ (Mark 1:8).

The fulfillment, when it came, was, then, climactic—and let us now return to the proposition with which these recent paragraphs began: The formation of the church by the special work of the Holy Spirit was the culmination of a process of revelation and of history, all of which lie in the record and history of the New Testament. Pentecost was as decisive and epochal and essentially unrepeatable an event as the birth of Jesus, His resurrection or His Ascension. ‘When the day of Pentecost arrived [“fully come” kjv], they were all together in one place. And suddenly there came from heaven a sound like a mighty rushing wind, and it filled the entire house where they were sitting’ (Acts 2:1–2). The believers present were all ‘immersed’ in the Holy Spirit, so to speak. The filling of the house was accompanied by (not identical with) a special filling of each disciple. These momentous spiritual events were accompanied by outward signs—to convince the disciples of the reality of fulfilled promise. This was complete fulfillment of the Father’s promise (John 14–16) noted reflectively by Jesus (Acts 1:4, 5). The Spirit of God ‘came.’ He does not need to come again. Further, it was as truly unique and epochal as any event of redemptive history—the giving of the law at Sinai, the crossing of the Jordan or the ‘It is finished!’ of Calvary. Paul reflecting on it could then say, ‘In one Spirit were we all baptized into one body’—thus our first proposition above: The church is a body of believers in Christ created by the Holy Spirit, who imparts His own eternal life to each believer-member and who is Himself, in a distinct and special way, the bond of vital unity between the members themselves and of all with Christ.

This is as far as the specific topic ‘The Nature of the Church in the New Testament’ might need to take us except for two things: (1) a whole Pandora’s box of theological problems concerning the relationship of the church, its ministers, Apostles and members, its revelation, and its forerunner, John, to the Old Testament dispensation, its people of God, its procedures and its prophecies; and (2) the fact that teaching on the church is amplified throughout the later books of the New Testament.

The first matter, the relation of the church to Israel, has been treated in another chapter. Observe, however, that the conclusions attained above were reached wholly without resort to assumptions about either dispensations or covenants. Further, I think that although John the Baptist was the last of the Old Testament prophets, the program of Jesus from the time of His baptism and temptation onward to His Ascension was one of church foundation, and that He never at any time changed His approach or plan because of His rejection by Israel. His Apostles were chosen in the first place to be founders of the church. Those who like to discuss theology in connection with party labels will observe that this presentation is representative neither of dispensationalism nor of covenant theology. I have chosen quite deliberately not to move within those categories. My opinions about them have been expressed elsewhere in this book.

With regard to the fact that the nature of the church receives amplification throughout the Epistles and Revelation we note the following.

First Corinthians 12 is basic to this subject. A. J. McClain was the first to call to this writer’s attention that it presents at least six features of the body of Christ, the church. Note that in this chapter there is a mysterious identification of Christ with the whole body—that the head is not Christ, but rather believers who are ears, nose, mouth and the like compose the head. In certain other passages Christ Himself is represented as the head of the body. This is, of course, because ‘body’ is a metaphor not a literal entity, even though it does stand for a literal group of persons in real spiritual union. These six features are as follows.

1. Organic Unity (vv. 12, 13). The church may or may not be externally organized. In either case it is inwardly ordered by a life—the life of God’s Spirit. The unity of the universal ekklēsia is not a goal to be attained, it is a fact to be acknowledged. This unity is not concocted or artificial. It was created at Pentecost and shall never dissolve. It includes believers living and dead—the church triumphant as well as the church militant.

Yet she on earth hath union
with God the three in one
And Mystic sweet communion
with those whose rest is won.

Though there is great difference of opinion on the subject, I find no compelling reason to exclude Old Testament believers, now deceased and in heaven, from this union with Christ. Yet see Hebrews 12:23, ‘to the assembly of the firstborn ... and to the spirits of the righteous made perfect.’ The language distinguishes but does not necessarily separate. This unity may be obscured by schism, sinned against by sectarianism, denied by ignorance, but it cannot be diminished or destroyed.

2. Diversity (vv. 14–20). There are as many members as there are genuine believers. They differ among themselves in abilities and characteristics, but as each is true to the law of his own individual being (as redeemed by Christ) and lives out the life of the Spirit of God (Gal. 5:22–26; 2:20), he will serve Christ effectively and with joy in his own inimitable and unduplicable way.

3. Universality (v. 13). Wherever there is a Christian the great church of Christ is present by virtue of the vital union of all the parts. There are no Christians who have no share in the Spirit of God (Rom. 8:9; also 1 Cor. 12:7). This is without respect to the social, educational or economic situation of the believer.

4. Mutuality (vv. 21–27). Every member receives from and imparts to every other member of the body. In some degree, however ignored or unrecognized, the body is entirely affected by the spiritual health-situation of each member. None lives or dies, rejoices or grieves to himself. This is quite apart from certain similar statements which might be made about the common humanity of all mankind everywhere. This is not socialism, egalitarianism or humanitarianism. It is spiritual union in its practical mutual relationships.

5. Visibility. This is not to say that the universality of the church is visible to the world. It isn’t even clearly visible to the genuine members who, sadly, do frequently question and harass one another. But it is the church alone which, shining as a light in the world, makes Christ spiritually visible to men. His is the Spirit animating the body which is His church (v. 12). It is not true that Christ or His mother are seen or have been seen at Fatima or Lourdes or even at St Peter’s in Rome. Rather Christ is seen everywhere and anywhere that Christians live out their distinctly Christian union with Him. Read Philippians 2:14–16 and also 2 Corinthians 10:4, 5, especially if you are concerned about relating the visible church to the world’s visible problems.

Karl Barth put an interesting spin on the question of the visibility and invisibility of the church—this time one of his inevitable paradoxes seems useful.

Like Israel in the Old Testament, the Christian community is not just a people in world-occurrence but this people. It is just as essential [essential nature, that is] to it to be this people as to be a people. And it is just as essential to it to be not merely visible as one people among many but also invisible as to this people, i.e. to be a phenomenon which cannot be comprehended and therefore known by all in empirical and rational terms. As this people it might well be a magnitude which is totally unknown to all. Hence it is both visible and invisible in one essence.³⁵

6. Spirituality. The entire twelfth chapter of 1 Corinthians deals of course with our spirits and God’s Spirit, their relations and activities. With effects in the world of ‘men and things ... roots and grubs and fishin’ worms’ the church is not seen with the same sort of eye that counts ballots or calculates the effect of a true statement about sin on a national senatorial election.

Further, in relation to God, the church is His temple. In relation to Christ the church is a temple of which He is cornerstone; a virgin by whom Christ is Beloved; a bride for whom He is the Groom; a city of which He is Chief Citizen; a people of whom He is Lord; a flock of which He is Shepherd; a family household of which He is Firstborn; a new man of whom He is Creator; an elect race of whom He is Progenitor; a royal priesthood of which He is High Priest; an inheritance of which He is the Heir.³⁶ Paul Minear devoted 300 pages to discussion of these twelve and eighty-four other images of the church to be found in the New Testament.³⁷

In the ‘heavenly Jerusalem’ the church is ‘firstborn [emphasis added]’ in distinction from ‘innumerable angels in festal gathering ... God, the judge of all ... the spirits of the righteous made perfect, and ... Jesus, the mediator’ (Heb. 12:22–24).

Finally, in relation to the whole created universe she is preeminent as Paul reveals in the great paean of prayerful praise with which we presently close, Ephesians 1:17–23.

Supplementary

Note #1

I append a note on this important subject. Neo-orthodox theologians have had their own way of conceiving the essential nature of the church. Karl Barth makes some interesting remarks on the nature of the church, despite his theories of universal salvation by covenant. Christ, he says, ‘is the man in whose person God has ... elected and loved from all eternity the wider circle of humanity as a whole, but also with a view to this wider circle, the narrower circle of a special race, of His own community within humanity.’ This, he says, is the Christian ekklēsia. He makes the point that though the ‘Christian tradition’ has an ‘aetiological narrative’ to explain the origin of the Lord’s Supper there is none for the church as such, and explains: ‘The reason why the establishment of the community [ekklēsia] by Jesus Himself could not emerge as a definite and distinctive event in the Gospel

