“First, all three together are one supreme essence (even though each, perfectly, is the supreme essence). And the one supreme essence cannot exist without itself, outside itself, or greater or less than itself” (ACMW, 66–67).

One must, therefore, have faith in Father, in Son and in their Spirit, equally in each individual and in all three together. This is because each individual is the supreme essence, and all three together are one and the same supreme essence. The supreme essence is the only thing that everyone ought to believe. (ibid., 79)

Thomas Aquinas

If there were any inequality in the divine persons, they would not have the same essence; and thus the three persons would not be one God; which is impossible. We must therefore admit equality among the divine persons. (ST, Ia.42.2)

Since one is an undivided being, if anything is supremely one it must be supremely being, and supremely undivided. Now both of these belong to God. For He is supremely being, inasmuch as His being is not determined by any nature to which He is adjoined; since He is being itself, subsistent, absolutely undetermined. But He is supremely undivided inasmuch as He is divided neither actually, nor potentially, by any mode of division; since He is altogether simple, as was shown above [Q. 3, A. 7]. Hence, it is manifest that God is one in the supreme degree. (ibid., Ia.11.4)

God is the same as His essence or nature. To understand this, it must be noted that in things composed of matter and form.... Since God then is not composed of matter and form, He must be His own Godhead, His own Life, and whatever else is predicated of Him. (ibid., Ia.3.3)

In God, intellect, and the object understood, and the intelligible species, and His act of understanding are entirely one and the same. Hence, when God is said to be understanding, no kind of multiplicity is attached to His substance. (ibid., Ia.14.4)

It was shown above [Q. 4, A. 2] that God comprehends in Himself the whole perfection of being. If then many gods existed, they would necessarily differ from each other. Something therefore would belong to one, which did not belong to another. And if this were a privation, one of them would not be absolutely perfect; but if a perfection, one of them would be without it. So it is impossible for many gods to exist. (ibid., Ia.11.3)

The Reformation Fathers on God’s Unity

The Reformers were careful to stress the oneness of God, His triunity notwithstanding. They continued the strong creedal and confessional stand of the orthodox church down through the centuries.

Martin Luther

We have had to use the word Person just as the fathers also have used it, for we have no better term. It signifies nothing else than hypostasis, a Being or Substance which exists of itself, and is God. There are indeed three distinct Persons, but only one God or a single Godhead.

Christ shows forcefully that the Holy Spirit is ... a separate, distinct Person by Himself, one who is not the Father or the Son. For all these expressions obviously refer to a separate Person: the Comforter, who will come; again: “Whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak” (John 16:13). If He is to come or (as He said above) to be sent or to proceed; again, if He is to hear and speak, He must certainly be Someone. Now He is, of course, not the Father, because the Father neither comes nor is sent; nor is He the Son, who has already come and now returns to the Father, of whom the Holy Spirit is to preach and whom He is to glorify. (WLS, 1381–82, 1384)

John Calvin

“The essence of God being simple and undivided, and contained in himself entire, in full perfection, without partition or diminution, it is improper, nay, ridiculous, to call it his express image” (ICR, 1.13.2).

Moreover, this distinction is so far from interfering with the most perfect unity of God, that the Son may thereby be proved to be one God with the Father, inasmuch as he constitutes one Spirit with him, and that the Spirit is not different from the Father and the Son, inasmuch as he is the Spirit of the Father and the Son. In each hypostasis the whole nature is understood, the only difference being that each has his own peculiar subsistence.

When we profess to believe in one God, by the name God is understood the one simple essence, comprehending three persons or hypostases; and, accordingly, whenever the name of God is used indefinitely, the Son and Spirit, not less than the Father, is meant. But when the Son is joined with the Father, relation comes into view, and so we distinguish between the Persons. (ibid., 1.13.19–20)

It seems to me that nothing can be more admirable than the words [of Gregory Nazianzen]: “I cannot think of the unity without being irradiated by the Trinity: I cannot distinguish between the Trinity without being carried up to the unity.” Therefore, let us beware of imagining such a Trinity of persons as will distract our thoughts, instead of bringing them instantly back to the unity. The words Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, certainly indicate a real distinction, not allowing us to suppose that they are merely epithets by which God is variously designated from his works. Still they indicate distinction only, not division. (ibid., 1.13.17)

“Only one thing can be infinite, for once we allow that there are two infinite substances, the one is immediately limited by the other” (in Bromley, ed., ZB, 247).

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God’s Unity

The triunity of God was a continued preoccupation of the post-Reformers. Each one struggled to state the mystery in a way that was most apprehensible by their contemporaries.

Jacob Arminius

The Divine Persons are not modes of being or of existing, or modes of the Divine Essence: For they are things with the mode of being or existing. The Divine Persons are distinguished by a real distinction, not by the degree and mode of the thing. A Person is an individual subsistence itself, not a characteristic property, nor is it an individual principle; though it be not an individual, nor a person without a characteristic property or without an individual principle....

Is it not useful that the Trinity be considered—both as it exists in nature itself, according to the co-essential relation of the Divine Persons—and as it has been manifested in the economy of salvation, to be accomplished by God the Father, in Christ, through the Holy Spirit? And does not the former of these considerations appertain to religion universally, and to that which was prescribed to Adam, according to the law?—But the latter consideration properly belongs to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Yet not excluding that which I have mentioned as belonging to all religion universally, and therefore to that which is Christian. (WJA, II. 481–82)

R. L. Dabney

The doctrine of the Trinity, as held by the Catholic Church, cannot be better defined than in the words of our Confession. It embraces the following propositions: The true unity, indivisibility, and simplicity of God. The subsistence of a threefold personal distinction, marked by a part of the properties of separate personalities, (in some inscrutable manner, entirely compatible with true unity) as intelligence, active principles, volition, action. Identity of substance, so that the whole godhead is truly in each person, without confusion or division, and all the essence belongs alike to all the persons. The distinction of the three persons, each by its property, incommunicable from one person to another, and the existence consequently of eternal relations between them. Now, that it is inscrutable how these things can be, we freely admit. Did they involve a necessary but not self-contradiction, we should also admit that the understanding would be incapable of receiving them all together. But we do not hold that the persons are three in the same sense in which they are one. (LST, 177–78)

John Miley

Trinitarianism is not tritheism; nor are trinitarians less pronounced on the unity of God than unitarians. The sense of this unity is embodied in the term designative of the personal distinctions in the Godhead. It follows that the unity of God is the basal truth in the doctrine of the Trinity. But as this question is not in issue as between trinitarianism and unitarianism, and especially as we have previously considered it in its distinctive application to God, it requires no further treatment here. (ST, 223)

William G. T. Shedd

God, as personal, is self-conscious. Consequently he must make himself his own object of contemplation. Here the doctrine of the Trinity, the deep and dark mystery of Christianity, pours a flood of light upon the mystery of the Divine self-consciousness. The pillar of cloud becomes the pillar of fire. The three distinctions in the one essence personalize it. God is personal because he is three persons: Father, Son, and Spirit.

Here is society within the essence, and wholly independent of the created universe; and self-knowledge, self-communion, and blessedness resulting therefrom. But this is impossible to an essence destitute of these internal personal distinctions. Not the singular unit of the deist, but the plural unity of the trinitarian explains this. (DT, 183–85)

Stephen Charnock

All multitude begins in, and is reduced to unity. As above multiplicity there is absolute unity, so above mixed creatures there is an absolute simplicity. You cannot conceive number without conceiving the beginning of it in that which was not number, viz., a unit.

All that we consider in God is unchangeable; for his essence and his properties are the same, and, therefore, what is necessarily belonging to the essence of God, belongs also to every perfection of the nature of God; none of them can receive any addition or diminution. (EAG, 1.183, 1.318)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S UNITY

The theological objections to God's oneness fall into two basic categories. First, there are those who deny there is only one God (as opposed to many gods). Second, others claim there are many beings or parts in God. The latter is a challenge to God's simplicity, which was treated earlier (see chapter 2).

Objection One—Based on Plural References to God

Most of these objections are based on biblical references to God in the plural. The term “God” itself is plural in form; God sometimes speaks in the plural (“we” or “us”—cf. Gen. 1:26), and even the word for “one” in Hebrew (echad) can mean “many.”

Response to Objection One

First, it is true that the very word for God in the Old Testament (elohim) is plural in form; indeed, it can be translated “gods” (see Ps. 82:6). However, when used of God, it is plural grammatically, not ontologically. It is plural in literary form, but not in actual reality. The many verses (see above) that use this form for God but that declare He is absolutely one are proof that this form is not intended to indicate a plurality of gods.

Second, the use of “we” or “us” of God is another literary form known as a royal or regal plural. It is used of royalty and of God in Semitic cultures. Even in a rigid monotheism such as Islam, where there is only one person in the Godhead, there are still references in the Qur’an to God as “we” or “us” (see Sura 6:55, 76; 7:117, 138, etc.).

Third, the Hebrew word for one (echad) used of God can and does mean “many in one.” For example, in Genesis 2:24 it refers to male and female as one (echad) flesh. At best this is an implication of the Trinity, not an affirmation of polytheism, for the Bible clearly condemns polytheism. Nonetheless, while not allowing that there are many gods (polytheism) or many beings in the Godhead (tritheism), the Bible does allow for a plurality of persons within the unity of essence by such terms as echad. So while not opposing monotheism, the term echad does favor trinitarianism.

Fourth, and finally, the Bible seems to imply there are many gods by the very command not to worship them (Ex. 20:3): “You shall have no other gods before me.” However, the “other gods” can be taken as imaginary, namely, gods created by us but not the real God. Or, they can be understood as the demons behind these gods that are not to be worshiped (1 Cor. 10:20). Paul summed it up well:

We know that an idol is nothing at all in the world and that there is no God but one. For even if there are so-called gods, whether in heaven or on earth (as indeed there are many “gods” and many “lords”), yet for us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live. (1 Cor. 8:4–6)

Objection Two—Based on God’s Trinity

Of course, the main objection to God’s unity is the claim that there is a plurality within this unity—that there are three persons (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit) and yet only one God. This appears to be a flat contradiction, affirming that there is only one God and yet that there are three gods.

Response to Objection Two

The orthodox Christian response to this charge is that God is three and one in different senses. He is three persons, but He has only one essence (nature). Therefore, it is not a contradiction, since it does not affirm that there are three persons and yet only one person in God or that there are three natures and yet only one nature in Him. How there can be three persons and yet only one nature is a mystery, but not a contradiction, as will be shown below.

GOD’S TRIUNITY—THE *TRINITY

God is not only a unity, He is a triunity; that is, there is not only one God (monotheism), but there are three persons in that one God. This is the orthodox teaching of the Trinity.

THE MEANING OF THE WORD TRINITY

First of all, it is important to point out what is not meant by the Christian concept of a Trinity. It does not mean there are three gods (tritheism), and it does not mean God has three modes of one and the same being (modalism). Tritheism denies the absolute simplicity of God, and modalism denies the plurality of persons in God. The former claims there are three beings in the Godhead, and the latter affirms there are not three persons in God.

What, then, does the word Trinity mean? It means that God is a triunity: He is a plurality within unity. God has a plurality of persons and a unity of essence; God is three persons in one nature. There is only one “What” (essence) in God, but there are three “Whos” (persons) in that one What. God has three “I’s” in His one “It”—there are three Subjects in one Object.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE TRINITY

The doctrine of the Trinity is based on two basic biblical teachings:

- (1) There is one and only one God.
- (2) There are three distinct persons who are God: The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

There Is Only One God

The biblical, theological, and historical evidence for God’s absolute oneness has already been given (see above). It need not be repeated here.

Three Different Persons Are God: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit

In addition to declaring God to be one in nature or essence, the Scriptures affirm that there are three distinct persons who are God. All are called God, and all have the essential characteristics of a person.

Personhood is traditionally understood as one who has intellect, feelings, and will. All three of these characteristics are attributed to all three members of the Trinity in Scripture (see below). Essentially, personhood refers to an “I,” a “who,” or a subject. Each “I” in the Trinity possesses (by virtue of its one common nature) the power to think, feel, and choose. Personhood itself is its I-ness or who-ness.

The Father Is God

Numerous verses speak of God as being a Father. Here is a sampling.

Jesus said, “Do not work for food that spoils, but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give you. On him God the Father has placed his seal of approval” (John 6:27). Paul added, “To all in Rome who are loved by God and called to be saints: Grace and peace to you from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 1:7). And, “Paul, an apostle—sent not from men nor by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father, who raised him from the dead” (Gal. 1:1).

The Son Is God

That Christ is God is affirmed in many passages and in many ways, both directly and indirectly. Several are summarized here.

Jesus Claimed to Be Yahweh (Jehovah)

Yahweh (YHWH) or Jehovah is the special name given by God for Himself in the Old Testament. It is the name revealed to Moses in Exodus 3:14, when God said, “I AM WHO I AM.” While other titles for God may be used of men (adonai [LORD] in Genesis 18:12) or false gods (elohim [gods] in Deuteronomy 6:14), Yahweh is only used to refer to the one true God. No other person or thing was to be worshiped or served (Ex. 20:5), and His name and glory were not to be given to another. Isaiah wrote, “Thus saith Jehovah ... I am the first, and I am the last; and besides me there is no God” (Isa. 44:6 ASV), and, “I am Jehovah, that is my name; and my glory I will not give to another, neither my praise unto graven images” (42:8 ASV).

Jesus prayed, “And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began” (John 17:5—this is an obvious claim for Christ’s deity, for Jehovah of the Old Testament said, “My glory will I not give to another” [Isa. 42:8 NKJV]). Jesus also declared, “I am the First and the Last” (Rev. 1:17)—precisely the words used by Jehovah in Isaiah 44:6. He said, “I am the good shepherd,” (John 10:11), and the Old Testament said, “Jehovah is my shepherd” (Ps. 23:1 ASV). Further, Jesus claimed to be the judge of all men (John 5:27ff.; Matt. 25:31ff.), and Joel quotes Jehovah as saying, “There I will sit to judge all the nations on every side” (Joel 3:12). Likewise, Jesus spoke of Himself as the “bridegroom” (Matt. 25:1f.) while the Old Testament identifies Jehovah in this way (Isa. 62:5; Hosea 2:16). While the psalmist declares, “Jehovah is my light” (Ps. 27:1 ASV), Jesus said, “I am the light of the world” (John 8:12).

Perhaps the strongest claim Jesus made to be Jehovah is in John 8:58, where He says, “Before Abraham was born, I am!” This statement claims not only existence before Abraham, but equality with the “I AM” of Exodus 3:14. The Jews around Him clearly understood His meaning and picked up stones to kill Him for blaspheming (cf. John 10:31–33). The same claim is also made in Mark 14:62 and John 18:5–6.

Jesus Claimed to Be Equal With God

Jesus professed deity in other ways, one of which was by claiming for Himself the prerogatives of God. He said to a paralytic, “Son, your sins are forgiven” (Mark 2:5ff.). The scribes correctly responded, “Who can forgive sins but God alone?” So to prove that His claim was not an empty boast, He healed the man, offering direct proof that what He had said about forgiving sins was true also.

Another prerogative that Jesus claimed, due only to God, was the power to raise and judge the dead: “I tell you the truth, a time is coming and has now come when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God and those who hear will live ... and come out—those who have done good will rise to live, and those who have done evil will rise to be condemned” (John 5:25, 29). He removed all doubt about His meaning when He added, “For just as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, even so the Son gives life to whom he is pleased to give it” (John 5:21). The Old Testament clearly teaches that only God is the Giver of life (1 Sam. 2:6; Deut. 32:39) and the one to raise the dead (Ps. 2:7) and the only Judge (Joel 3:12; Deut. 32:36). Jesus boldly assumed for Himself powers that only God has.

Jesus also claimed that He should be honored as God: He said that all men should “honor the Son just as they honor the Father. He who does not honor the Son does not honor the Father, who sent him” (John 5:23). The Jews listening knew that no one should claim to be equal with God in this way, and again they wanted to kill Him (John 5:18).

Jesus Claimed to Be Messiah-God

Even the Qur’an recognizes that Jesus was the Messiah (Sura 5:17, 75). The Old Testament teaches that the coming Messiah would be God Himself, so when Jesus claimed to be that Messiah, He was also claiming to be God. For example, the prophet Isaiah (in 9:6) calls the Messiah “Mighty God.” The psalmist wrote of the Messiah, “Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever” (Ps. 45:6; cf. Heb. 1:8). Psalm 110:1 records a conversation between the Father and the Son: “The LORD says to my Lord [adonai]: ‘Sit at my right hand.’ ” Jesus applied this passage to Himself in Matthew 22:43–44.

In the great messianic prophecy of Daniel 7, the Son of Man is called the “Ancient of Days” (7:22), a term used twice in the same passage of God the Father (Dan 7:9, Dan 13). Jesus also said He was the Messiah at His trial before the high priest. When asked, “ ‘Are you the Christ [christos, Greek for “Messiah”], the Son of the Blessed One?’ ” Jesus said, “ ‘I am ... And you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven.’ The high priest tore his clothes. ‘Why do we need any more witnesses? ... You have heard the blasphemy’ ” (Mark 14:61–64). There was no doubt that in claiming to be Messiah (see also Luke 24:27; Matt. 26:56), Jesus also claimed to be God.

Jesus Claimed to Be God by Accepting Worship

The Old Testament forbids worshiping anyone other than God (Ex. 20:1–5; Deut. 5:6–9). The New Testament agrees, showing that men refused worship (Acts 14:13–15), as did angels (Rev. 22:8–9). But Jesus accepted worship on numerous occasions, revealing that He claimed to be God. A leper worshiped Him before he was healed (Matt. 8:2), and a ruler knelt before Him with a request (Matt. 9:18). After He stilled the storm, “Those who were in the boat worshiped him, saying, ‘Truly you are the Son of God’ ” (Matt. 14:33). A Canaanite woman (Matt. 15:25), the mother of James and John (Matt. 20:20), and the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:6) all bowed before Jesus without one word of rebuke. A blind man said, “ ‘Lord, I believe,’ and he worshiped Him” (John 9:38). Thomas saw the risen Christ and cried out, “My Lord and my God!” (John 20:28). This could only be elicited by a person who considered Himself to be God.

Jesus Claimed to Have Equal Authority With God

Jesus also put His words on a par with God's: "You have heard that it was said to the people long ago ... But I tell you" (Matt. 5:21–22) is repeated over and over again. "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations" (Matt. 28:18–19). God had given the Ten Commandments to Moses, but Jesus said, "A new commandment I give you: Love one another" (John 13:34). Jesus promised, "Until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law" (Matt. 5:18), while later Jesus said of His words, "Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away" (Matt. 24:35). Speaking of those who reject Him, Jesus confirmed, "That very word which I spoke will condemn him at the last day" (John 12:48). There is no question that Jesus expected His words to have equal authority with God's declarations in the Old Testament.

Jesus Claimed to Be God by Requesting Prayer in His Name

Jesus not only asked people to believe in Him and obey His commandments, but He also asked them to pray in His name: "And I will do whatever you ask in my name.... You may ask me for anything in my name, and I will do it" (John 14:13–14). "If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given you" (John 15:7). Jesus even insisted, "No one comes to the Father except through me" (John 14:6). In response to this, the disciples not only prayed in Jesus' name (1 Cor. 5:4) but also prayed to Christ (Acts 7:59). Jesus certainly intended that His name be invoked both before God and as God in prayer.

Jesus Claimed to Be God by His Use of Parables

In his Cambridge doctoral dissertation on this topic, Philip B. Payne notes that out of Jesus' fifty-two recorded narrative parables, twenty depict him in imagery which in the [Old Testament] typically refers to God. The frequency with which this occurs indicates that Jesus regularly depicted himself in images which were particularly appropriate for depicting God. (Payne, "JICDP" in TJ, 17)

These images include Sower, Director of the Harvest, Rock, Shepherd, Bridegroom, Father, Giver of Forgiveness, Vineyard Owner, Lord, and many more. Thus, "Jesus depicts himself in these parables as the shepherd ... and in so doing implicitly claims to be God" (ibid., 11).

In view of these many clear ways in which Jesus claimed to be God, an unbiased observer should recognize, whether he accepts it or not, that Jesus of Nazareth did indeed claim to be God in the Gospels. That is, He claimed to be identical to the Jehovah (Yahweh) of the Old Testament.

Jesus' Disciples Acknowledged His Claim to Be God

In addition to Jesus' claims about Himself, His immediate disciples also acknowledged His claim to deity. This they manifested in many ways, several of which will be briefly outlined now.

(1) The disciples attributed the titles of deity to Christ.

In agreement with their Master, Jesus' apostles called Him "the first and the last" (Rev. 1:17; 2:8; 22:13); "the true light" (John 1:9); their "rock" or "stone" (1 Cor. 10:4; 1 Peter 2:6–8; cf. Ps. 18:2; 95:1); the "bridegroom" (Eph. 5:22–33; Rev. 21:2); "the Chief Shepherd" (1 Peter 5:4); and “the great Shepherd” (Heb. 13:20). The Old Testament role of “Redeemer” (Hosea 13:14; Ps. 130:7) is given to Jesus in the New Testament (Tit. 2:13–14; Rev. 5:9 NKJV). He is seen as the forgiver of sins (Acts 5:31; Col. 3:13; cf. Jer. 31:34; Ps. 130:4) and “Savior of the world” (John 4:42; cf. Isa. 43:3). The apostles also said He is “Christ Jesus, who will judge the living and the dead” (2 Tim. 4:1). All of these titles are unique to Jehovah (Yahweh) in the Old Testament but are given to Jesus in the New Testament.

(2) The disciples considered Jesus the Messiah-God.

The New Testament opens with a passage concluding that Jesus is Immanuel (“God with us”), which refers to the messianic prediction of Isaiah 7:14. The very title “Christ” carries the same meaning as the Hebrew appellation “Messiah” (“Anointed One”). In Zechariah 12:10, Jehovah says, “They will look on me, the one they have pierced.” The New Testament writers apply this passage to Jesus twice (John 19:37; Rev. 1:7) as referring to His crucifixion. Paul interprets Isaiah’s message, “For I am God, and there is no other.... Before me every knee will bow; by me every tongue will swear” (Isa. 45:22–23) as applying to his Lord, “at the name of Jesus every knee should bow ... and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father” (Phil. 2:10–11). The implications of this are strong, because Paul says that all created beings will call Jesus both Messiah (Christ) and Jehovah (Lord).

(3) The disciples attributed the powers of God to Jesus.

There are some things only God can do, but these very things are attributed to Jesus by His disciples. He is said to be able to raise the dead (John 5:21; 11:38–44) and forgive sins (Acts 5:31; 13:38). Moreover, He is said to have been the primary agent in the creating of the universe (John 1:2–3; Col. 1:16) and in sustaining its existence (Col. 1:17). Surely only God can be said to be the Creator of all things, and the disciples claim this power for Jesus.

(4) The disciples associated Jesus’ name with God’s.

The apostles’ use of Jesus’ name as the agent and recipient of prayer has been noted (1 Cor. 5:4; Acts 7:59). Often in prayers or benedictions, Jesus’ name is used alongside God’s, as in “Grace and peace to you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ” (Gal. 1:3; Eph. 1:2). The name of Jesus appears with equal status to God’s in the so-called trinitarian formulas: For example, the command to go and baptize “in the name [singular] of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19). Again this association is made at the end of 2 Corinthians: “May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all” (13:14). If there is only one God, then these three persons must by nature be equated.

(5) The disciples called Jesus God.

Thomas saw His wounds and cried, “My Lord and my God!” (John 20:28). Paul wrote, “Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!” (Rom. 9:5). He calls Jesus the one in whom “all the fullness of Deity lives in bodily form” (Col. 2:9). In Titus, Jesus is “our great God and Savior” (2:13), and the writer to the Hebrews says of Him, “Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever” (Heb. 1:8). Paul says that before Christ existed in the “form of a servant,” which clearly refers to being really human, He existed in the “form of God” (Phil. 2:5–8 NKJV). The parallel phrases suggest that if Jesus was fully human, then He was also fully God. A similar term, “the image of the invisible God,” is used in Colossians 1:15 to mean the manifestation of God Himself. This description is strengthened in Hebrews, where it says, “The Son is the radiance of God’s glory and the exact representation of his being, sustaining all things by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3). The prologue to John’s gospel also minces no words, stating, “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word [Jesus] was God” (John 1:1, emphasis added).

(6) The disciples considered Jesus superior to angels.

The disciples did not simply believe that Christ was more than a man; they believed Him to be greater than any created being, including angels. Paul said Jesus is “far above all rule and authority, power and dominion, and every title that can be given, not only in the present age but also in the one to come” (Eph. 1:21). The demons submitted to his command (Matt. 8:32), and even angels that refused to be worshiped are seen worshiping Him (Rev. 22:8–9). The author of the letter to the Hebrews presents a complete argument for Christ’s superiority over angels, saying, “For to which of the angels did God ever say, ‘You are my Son; today I have become your Father’? ... And again, when God brings his firstborn into the world, he says, ‘Let all God’s angels worship him’ ” (Heb. 1:5–6). There could be no clearer teaching that Christ was not an angel but rather the God whom the angels worshiped.

In summary, there is manifold testimony from Jesus Himself and from those who knew Him best that Jesus claimed to be God and that His followers believed this to be the case. They claim of the carpenter of Nazareth these unique titles, powers, prerogatives, and activities that apply only to God. There is no reasonable doubt that this is what they believed and what Jesus thought of Himself according to the New Testament. C. S. Lewis insightfully observed, when confronted with the boldness of Christ’s claims, that we are faced with three distinct alternatives:

I am trying here to prevent anyone saying the really foolish things that people often say about Him: “I’m ready to accept Jesus as a great moral teacher, but I don’t accept His claim to be God.” That is the one thing we must not say. A man who was merely a man and said the sort of things Jesus said would not be a great moral teacher. He would either be a lunatic—on a level with the man who says he is a poached egg—or else he would be the Devil of Hell. (MC, 55–56)

The third option is that Jesus was telling the truth: He is Lord.

Having established earlier that the New Testament is historically reliable (see Volume 1, chapter 26), that the Bible is the Word of God (see Volume 1, chapter 14), that miracles are possible and confirm the claim of those performing them in the name of God (Volume 1, chapter 3), it follows that Jesus not only claimed to be but also supernaturally proved Himself to be God in human flesh.

The Holy Spirit Is God

The deity of the Holy Spirit is indicated by:

- (1) His possessing the names of God;
- (2) His having the attributes of God;
- (3) His performing the acts of God;
- (4) His association with God in benedictions and baptismal formulas.

The Holy Spirit Is Given the Names of Deity

The Holy Spirit is referred to as God or Lord. “Ananias, how is it that Satan has so filled your heart that you have lied to the Holy Spirit.... You have not lied to men but to God” (Acts

5:3–4). “Don’t you know that you yourselves are God’s temple and that God’s Spirit lives in you?” (1 Cor. 3:16). “Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God?” (1 Cor. 6:19). “There are different kinds of gifts, but the same Spirit. There are different kinds of service, but the same Lord. There are different kinds of working, but the same God works all of them in all men” (1 Cor. 12:4–6). “Now the Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom” (2 Cor. 3:17). “How much more, then, will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself unblemished to God ...” (Heb. 9:14).

The Holy Spirit Possesses the Attributes of Deity

Attributes of God such as life (Rom. 8:2); truth (John 16:13); love (Rom. 15:30); holiness (Eph. 4:30); eternality (Heb. 9:14); omnipresence (Ps. 139:7); and omniscience (1 Cor. 2:11) are ascribed to the Spirit.

The Holy Spirit Performs Acts of Deity

Certain acts are associated only with God; both God the Father and the Son are said to perform these acts, and so is the Holy Spirit. These include the act of creation (Gen. 1:2; Job 33:4; Ps. 104:30); the acts of redemption (Isa. 63:10–11; Eph. 4:30; 1 Cor. 12:13); the performance of miracles by His own power (Gal. 3:2–5; Heb. 2:4); and the bestowal of supernatural gifts (Acts 2:4; 1 Cor. 12:4–11).

The Holy Spirit Is Associated With God in Prayers and Benedictions

Numerous times in the Bible the Holy Spirit is associated with one or both other members of the Trinity: “I will tell of the kindnesses of the LORD [the Father].... In all their distress he too was distressed, and the angel of his presence [the Son] saved them. In his love and mercy he redeemed them; he lifted them up and carried them all the days of old. Yet they rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit” (Isa. 63:7–10). First Peter 1:2 speaks of “the foreknowledge of God the Father, through the sanctifying work of the Spirit, for obedience to Jesus Christ.” Jude 1:20 exhorts readers to “build yourselves up in your most holy faith and pray in the Holy Spirit.” The benediction of 2 Corinthians 13:14 contains all three members of the Godhead: “May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God [the Father], and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all.” And the baptismal formula of Matthew 28:19 contains the Holy Spirit along with the other members of the Trinity all under one “name” [essence]: “Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.”

All Three Members of the Trinity Are Persons

Each individual member of the Trinity is a person, since each is referred to as a person (I, Who). Each has all the basic elements or powers of personhood: mind, will, and feeling.

The Father Is a Person

In addition to being referred to as a person (“He”), the three elements of personhood all are attributed to God the Father. He has the power of intellect to know (Matt. 6:32): “Your heavenly Father knows that you need them”; the emotional faculty to feel (Gen. 6:6): “The LORD was grieved that he had made man on the earth, and his heart was filled with pain”; and the power of will to choose (Matt. 6:9–10): “Our Father in heaven ... your will be done on earth as it is in heaven.” In addition, personal traits, such as the ability to communicate (Matt. 11:25) and teach (John 7:16–17), are also attributed to the Father.

The Son Is a Person

In addition to being referred to as a person (“He”), the Son can communicate and teach (John 7:17) as only persons can do. Further, He too has intellect (John 2:25): “He did not need man’s testimony about man, for he knew what was in a man”; feeling (John 11:35): “Jesus wept”; and will (John 6:38): “For I have come down from heaven not to do my will but to do the will of him who sent me.” The personal pronoun “He” is used consistently of the Son.

The Holy Spirit Is a Person

All the elements of personhood are attributed to the Holy Spirit in Scripture. He has a mind (John 14:26): “But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you.” He has will (1 Cor. 12:11): “All these are the work of one and the same spirit, and he gives them to each one, just as he determines”; and He has feeling (Eph. 4:30): “And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption.”

Further, personal pronouns (“He” and “His”) are appropriately attributed to the Holy Spirit: “But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come” (John 16:13, emphasis added).

Finally, the activities of a person are ascribed to the Holy Spirit: He searches, knows, speaks, testifies, reveals, convinces, commands, strives, moves, helps, guides, creates, recreates, sanctifies, inspires, intercedes, orders the affairs of the church, and performs miracles (see Strong, ST, 325). There are numerous verses of Scripture to support these activities (see Gen. 6:3; Luke 12:12; John 3:8; 16:7–8; Acts 8:29; Rom. 8:26; 1 Cor. 2:11; Eph. 4:30; 2 Peter 1:21, etc.).

Other Biblical Evidence of the Trinity in God

Many times in Scripture one member of the Trinity is speaking to another. This indicates that they are not one and the same person.

The Father Speaking to the Son

Psalm 2:7 (cited in Heb. 1:5) declares, “I will proclaim the decree of the LORD: He said to me, ‘You are my Son; today I have become your Father.’ ” Also, “The LORD [Father] says to my Lord [Son]: ‘Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet’ ” (Ps. 110:1). Jesus used this very passage to show His deity (Matt. 22:41–46). Again, the Father says, “Your throne, O God [Son], will last for ever and ever; a scepter of justice will be the scepter of your kingdom. You love righteousness and hate wickedness; therefore God [the Father], your God, has set you above your companions” (Ps. 45:6–7). Likewise, the book of Hebrews applies this passage to Christ (Heb. 1:8–9). Indeed, three times in the New Testament the Father spoke from heaven approving of Christ, His Son (Matt. 3:17; 17:5; John 12:28).

The Son Speaking to the Father

“Then the angel of the LORD [the Son] said, ‘LORD Almighty [Father], how long will you withhold mercy from Jerusalem and from the towns of Judah?’ ” (Zech. 1:12). That the angel (messenger) of the LORD is God is clear from the fact that it is He who is called the LORD (Yahweh), a term reserved for God alone. He is also called the “I AM” in Exodus 3:14 (cf. vv. 13, 15), which clearly refers only to Deity (cf. John 8:58–59). There is also a reference in Proverbs 30:4 to both the Father and the Son: “Who has gone up to heaven and come down? Who has gathered up the wind in the hollow of his hands? Who has wrapped up the waters in his cloak? Who has established all the ends of the earth? What is his name, and the name of his son? Tell me if you know!”

“After Jesus said this, he looked toward heaven and prayed: ‘Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you’ ” (John 17:1). Again, Jesus [the Son] called out with a loud voice, “Father, into your hands I commit my spirit” (Luke 23:46).

All Three Persons Together at Once

Several times all three persons are present and operating at the same time. Once in Isaiah it says, “I will tell of the kindnesses of the LORD, the deeds for which he is to be praised, according to all the LORD [Father] has done for us ... and so he became their Savior. In all their distress he too was distressed, and the angel of his presence [Son] saved them. In his love and mercy he redeemed them.... Yet they rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit” (Isa. 63:7–10).

At the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:16–17), all three members of the Trinity were present together: “As soon as Jesus [Son] was baptized, he went up out of the water. At that moment heaven was opened, and he saw the Spirit of God [Spirit] descending like a dove and lighting on him. And a voice from heaven [Father] said, ‘This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased.’ ”

In the baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19) it places all three under one “name” (singular), saying: “Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.”

Likewise, in an apostolic benediction (e.g., 2 Cor. 13:14), all three names are present together. Paul prayed, “May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ [Son], and the love of God [Father], and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit [Spirit] be with you all.”

All of these passages and many more indicate that there are three different and distinct persons who exist simultaneously and eternally and who share one and the same essence or nature. This is in stark contrast to modalism (sabellianism), which claims there is only one person in God who appears at different times in the form of different persons.

The Trinity Is Implied in the Old Testament

While the Trinity is not formally and explicitly set forth in the Old Testament, all the elements of trinitarianism are found there. There is only one God (Ex. 20:3; Deut. 6:4; Isa. 45:18), yet there are three persons who are considered God. Sometimes two are speaking to each other (Ps. 45:6–8; 110:1; Zech. 1:12). Indeed, in one text all three are mentioned together (Isa. 63:7–10).

Even the Hebrew word of “one” (echad) God (Deut. 6:4) implies a plurality with unity, just as male and female are considered “one” (echad) flesh (Gen. 2:24). There is also a threefold praise to God by the angelic choir: “Holy, Holy, Holy is the LORD of hosts” (Isa. 6:3 NKJV).

The Trinity Is Taught in the New Testament

As the above discussion shows, the New Testament teaches clearly that there is only one God and that there are three distinct persons who are God: These two premises constitute the basic elements of trinitarianism. What brings the Trinity into focus in the New Testament is the presence of the second person of the Godhead (Jesus Christ) in bodily form, often conversing with His Father (cf. John 17). Indeed, as we have seen, at Christ’s baptism all three members of the Trinity are present at the same time: The Father speaks from heaven, and the Holy Spirit descends from heaven on the Son, who is in the water (Matt. 3:16–17).

Later, again, all three names are mandated as the baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19) and used in apostolic benedictions (for instance, 2 Cor. 13:14).

There Is a Functional Order in the Trinity

All members of the Trinity are equal in essence, but they do not have the same roles. It is a heresy (called subordinationism) to affirm that there is an ontological subordination of one member of the Trinity to another, since they are identical in essence (examine the “ontological argument for God’s existence” in Volume 1, chapter 2); nonetheless, it is clear that there is a functional subordination; that is, not only does each member have a different function or role, but some functions are also subordinate to others.

The Function of the Father

By His very title of “Father” and His label of “the first person of the Trinity,” it is manifest that His function is superior to that of the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Father, for example, is presented as the Source, Sender, and Planner of salvation.

The Function of the Son

The Son, on the other hand, is the Means, Sent One, and Achiever of salvation. The Father sent, and the Son came to save us; the Father planned it, but the Son accomplished it on the cross. This is why it is a heresy (called patripassianism) to claim that the Father suffered on the cross—only the Son suffered and died.

Further, the Son is eternally “begotten” or “generated” from the Father, but the Father is never said to be “begotten” or “generated” from anyone.

The Function of the Holy Spirit

According to orthodox theology, both East and West, the Holy Spirit is said to “proceed” from the Father, but the Father never proceeds from the Holy Spirit (see Appendix 7)—that is, the Father sends the Spirit, but the Spirit never sends the Father. In addition, however, according to orthodox Western theology, the Holy Spirit proceeds both from the Father and the Son (see John 15:26). This is an issue over which the Eastern Orthodox and Western Roman Catholic churches eventually split (around A.D. 1054), namely, over the filioque (“and the Son”) clause that was added to the “procession from the Father” statement in Western creeds at the Council of Toledo (in A.D. 589), following Augustine's view. Mediators have sought to find common ground in the fact that Jesus said, "When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, He will testify about me" (John 15:26, emphasis added). Many Eastern Orthodox theologians are willing to say that the Holy Spirit is sent by the Father indirectly through the Son, but they deny that the Son has authority to send the Holy Spirit on His own. Be that as it may, all agree that there is a functional subordination of the Holy Spirit to the Father.

In brief, the Father is the Planner, the Son is the Accomplisher, and the Holy Spirit is the Applier of salvation to believers. The Father is the Source, the Son is the Means, and the Holy Spirit is the Effector of salvation—it is He who convicts, convinces, and converts (see Appendix 7).

One final word about the nature and duration of this functional subordination in the Godhead. It is not just temporal and economical; it is essential and eternal. For example, the Son is an eternal Son (see Prov. 30:4; Heb. 1:3). He did not become God's Son; He always was related to God the Father as a Son and always will be. His submission to the Father was not just for time but will be for all eternity. Paul wrote:

Then the end will come, when he hands over the kingdom of God the Father after he has destroyed all dominion, authority and power ... When he has done this, then the Son himself will be made subject to him who put everything under him, so that God may be all in all, (1 Cor. 15:24, 28)

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR THE TRINITY

From a theological vantage point, two things are necessary to defend the doctrine of the Trinity: first, to demonstrate that God has one and only one essence (nature); second, to show that it is not contradictory to have three persons in one essence.

God Can Have Only One Essence

By "essence" or "nature" is meant what something is, and essence is a set of characteristics—properties necessary to the thing being described. For example, it is necessary to the essence of a triangle that it has the following characteristics:

- (1) It must have three sides.
- (2) It must have three corners or angles.
- (3) The sum of the three angles must be 180 degrees.

An essence is differentiated from other characteristics by the fact that its characteristics are essential to it, while the other characteristics (called accidents) are not. For instance, it is essential to the essence of a human being that he or she possess rationality, while his or her skin color (red, yellow, black, brown, or white) is accidental. That God can have only one essence has already been demonstrated under His simplicity (see chapter 2). So the essential characteristics or properties of God must refer to one and the same essence.

It Is Possible to Have More Than One Person in One Essence

In order to complete what is understood by the Trinity, it remains only to show that there is no contradiction in having three persons in one essence. This is demonstrated by pointing out that the law of noncontradiction mandates that for two propositions to be contradictory, they must both affirm and deny something of

- (1) the same thing;
- (2) at the same time; and
- (3) in the same sense (in the same relationship).

Clearly this is not the case in affirming,

- (1) God is one and only one in relation to His essence;
- (2) God is more than one (viz., three) in relation to His persons. These are two different senses or relations. Therefore, the Trinity is not contradictory.

Of course, this response depends on the words person and essence being defined in different ways. By person is meant who it is, and by nature is meant what it is. A person is a subject, while a nature is an object. Person is an I, and an essence is an it. So a person is a subjective center of intentionality and volitionality, and a nature is an objective center of essential properties.

No orthodox theologian denies that this is a mystery, but it is not a contradiction. While the Trinity may go beyond reason, it does not go against reason. It is beyond finite ability to comprehend how there can be three persons in one nature, but it is not beyond finite ability to apprehend the truthful (and noncontradictory) nature of both premises.

Illustrations of the Trinity

Many illustrations of the Trinity have been offered down through the centuries. Some are good and some are not. The bad ones usually imply some heresy such as modalism or tritheism.

Poor Illustrations of the Trinity

- Three States of Water

One often-used bad illustration is that the Trinity is like water, which has three states (solid, liquid, and gas). The problem with this is that no given drop of water is in all three states at the same time. Yet God is both three and one at the same time. So despite the good intentions, this illustration implies the heresy of modalism (that God has one essence but is not three distinct persons).

- Three Links in a Chain

Another poor example offered of the Trinity is a three-link chain. The problem here is that the links are three different things. So in spite of whatever good motivations there may be behind it, what is being illustrated is tritheism, not trinitarianism. God is only one thing (substance), not three different ones joined together in some way.

- Human Body, Soul, and Spirit

Yet another faulty illustration of the Trinity is that God is like man, who has body, soul, and spirit and yet is one. Even apart from the implied trichotomy (see part 2), one problem with this is that the human soul and body separate at death. The members of the Godhead are inseparable. Further, God has no body—He is pure Spirit (John 4:24).

- One Actor Playing Three Roles

Most of us have seen a play where one person plays two or more roles. However, this is actually an illustration of the Sabellian heresy, not of the orthodox Trinity. In the latter, there are three different persons who exist and perform at the same time, yet share only one divine essence.

Better Illustrations of the Trinity

No illustration of the Trinity is perfect, but some are more helpful than others. Those that are better involve things where three different elements exist in an undivided oneness at the same time.

- A Triangle

God is like a triangle, which is one figure yet has three different sides at the same time—there is a simultaneous threeness in the oneness. Of course, no analogy is perfect, since in every analogy there is a similarity and a difference. The difference here is that “corners” are not persons. Nonetheless, they do illustrate how there can be a “threeness” and a oneness at the same time.

- One to the Third Power

Another helpful illustration is that God is like one to the third power ( $1 \times 1 \times 1 = 1$ ). God is three ones in One; He is not  $1 + 1 + 1 = 3$ . That is the heresy of tritheism, which holds three different gods, not just one God.

- Love Is Trifold

“God is Love” (1 John 4:16), and love involves three elements: A lover, a beloved, and a spirit of love. These three are one. One advantage of this example is that it has a personal dimension, in that love is something only a person does.

- Mind, Ideas, and Words

Further, God is like the relation between my mind, my ideas, and my words. They are all distinct, yet they are united, for one’s words cannot be separated from his ideas, and his mind behind them.

- Allah and the Qur’an

For Muslims (who deny the Trinity), a good illustration is the relationship between the Qur’an (which they believe is the eternal Word of God) and God (Allah), who expressed that Word. They believe there is only one God and that His Word is distinct from Him. Yet they also hold that there is a unity between them, since there is a unity between God and His Word. So they are admitting a plurality and yet unity between God and His eternal Word. The Qur’an is not identical to Allah, and yet it is one with God, who supposedly expressed Himself in the words of the Qur’an (see Geisler and Saleeb, AI, chapter 12).

Heresies Regarding God and Christ

Orthodox trinitarianism and Christology must be carefully distinguished from several heresies. Most of these have been condemned by Councils of the Christian Church: tritheism, modalism (sabellianism), arianism, docetism, nestorianism, monophysitism (eutychianism), patripassianism, monotholism, apollinarianism, subordinationism, monarchianism, adoptionism, and binitarianism.

Tritheism

Tritheism is the belief that there are three gods or three separate beings in the Godhead. Few, if any, have held this view consciously, though unwittingly many have fallen into it verbally by their incautious language about the Godhead. By correctly stressing the three persons as distinct, it is easy to slip into the language of tritheism, which wrongly posits three separate beings.

Modalism

Modalism is also called sabellianism after its founder, Sabellius (fl. c. 217–c. 220). Modalism holds that God is only one person who appears in different modes or roles at different times in the divine economy, from which it gets the title “Economic Trinity,” as opposed to the ontological Trinity of orthodox theology.

Arianism

Following Arius (c.250–336), its founder, this heresy denies that Jesus is fully God, allowing Him a created status below God. Arianism was opposed by Athanasius and condemned as heretical at the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325).

Docetism

From the Greek word dokeo, “I seem,” docetism affirms the deity of Christ but denies His humanity, claiming it was only an apparent, but not real, humanity. Elements of this error had appeared already in New Testament times (1 John 4:1–3; 2 John 7; Col. 2:8–9); in some forms it held that Jesus escaped the ignominy of death by crucifixion when either Judas Iscariot or Simon of Cyrene exchanged places with Him on the cross. Muslims accept a form of this error (see Sura 4:187). Among those charged with this error were Cerinthus (fl. c. A.D. 100) and Serapion, the Bishop of Antioch (190–203).

Nestorianism

It is doubtful that Nestorius (d. c. A.D. 451) held the view bearing his name, though some of his followers are credited with it. This perspective posited not only two natures in Christ (which is orthodox) but also two persons (which is not). Allegedly, if there is both a human and a divine person in Christ, then it was only the human person who died on the cross; hence, His sacrifice for our sins would have no divine efficacy. The truth is, only if one and the same person, who was both God and man, died for our sins, can He truly be mediator between God and man (1 Tim. 2:5).

It is against nestorianism that the creeds speak when they insist on a hypostatic union of the two natures in one person. While “hypostasis” literally means “substance,” it also bore the meaning of “individual reality,” and from the fourth century on it came to mean “person” (see Cross, ODCC, 685).

Monophysitism

Monophysitism is also dubbed eutychianism after its alleged founder, Eutyches (c.375–454). Monophysitism confuses the two natures of Christ, so that the divine and human natures intermingle. Besides being a heresy, it is a contradiction, since it holds that there is an infinite finite and an uncreated created blending of the two natures of Christ.

Patripassianism

Patripassianism means literally the “Father suffered.” It arose in the early third century in the form of monarchianism (see below), holding that God the Father suffered on the cross as well as Christ. However, the divine nature possessed by Christ did not suffer or die: God is impassible (see chapter 5) and, hence, incapable of undergoing suffering. Only the Son became incarnated in a human nature; thus, only the Son, not the Father or the Spirit, suffered on the cross.

Monothelitism

From two Greek words meaning “one” and “to will,” this unorthodox seventh-century view held that Jesus has only one will, not both a human and a divine will. This is contrary to our Lord’s words in Gethsemane, where He said, “My Father, if it is possible, may this cup be taken from me. Yet not as I will, but as you will” (Matt. 26:39, emphasis added). Further, by insisting that Christ has only one will, monothelitism in effect confuses His two natures through which He (one person) operated. This doctrine was condemned as a heresy by the Lateran Council of 649 and the Council of Constantinople of 680.

Apollinarianism

Following their leader, Apollinarius (c. 310–c. 390), this sect diminished the humanity of Christ; that is, while affirming His full deity, they denied His full humanity by claiming that Jesus had no human spirit (only a body and a soul). They held that the divine Logos replaced the human spirit in Jesus. Apollinarianism was condemned by the Synods in Rome (374–380) and the Council of Constantinople (381).

Subordinationism

This heresy was held by Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165) and Origen (c. 185–c. 254) and condemned at the Council of Constantinople (381). It asserts that the Son is subordinate in nature to the Father. Subordinationism is not to be confused with the orthodox belief that the Son (Christ) is functionally subordinate to (i.e., subject to) the Father, though essentially equal with Him.

Monarchianism

This second and third century nontrinitarian heresy stressed the unity (monarchy) of God to the neglect of Christ’s deity. Supposedly, Jesus was only a power or influence from God. There were two main groups of monarchianists: modalists (see above) and adoptionists (see below). The modalists were represented by Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius. The main adoptionists were Theodotus and Artemon and, perhaps, Paul of Samosata (see Cross, ODCC, 929).

Adoptionism

Adoptionism was rooted in second-and third-century monarchianism but flourished in the eighth century. According to this view, Jesus was only a man but was adopted by God because of His divine powers. This is said to have occurred when God declared from heaven: “This is my Son” (Matt. 3:17).

Binitarianism

According to binitarianism, there are only two persons in the Godhead. While few, if any, early Fathers explicitly affirmed binitarianism, some inadvertently and implicitly fell into it by denying the deity of the Son. Some modern proponents of this view deny the personality of the Holy Spirit, thus leaving only two persons in the Godhead. Both the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ (sister group to the Mormons) and the old Worldwide Church of God under Herbert W. Armstrong embraced this view.

The main views regarding the relation between the nature and person (s) of the Godhead can be summarized as follows:

	PERSON(S)	NATURE(S)
Trinitarianism	Three	One
Tritheism	Three	Three
Polytheism	Many	Many
Modalism	One	One

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S TRIUNITY

Not all doctrine is revealed immediately and completely by God; most teachings are revealed progressively. This is true of the Trinity.

The Early Church Fathers on the Trinity

The earliest Fathers of the church spoke of the Trinity by doctrine and even by name. This begins with a disciple of one of Jesus' apostles.

Polycarp (c. 70–155)

Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, was taught by the apostle John. He wrote, "May the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ Himself, who is the Son of God, and our everlasting High Priest, build you up in faith and truth" (EPE, chapter 12).

Ignatius

"Our Physician is the only true God, the unbegotten and unapproachable, the Lord of all, the Father and Begetter of the only-begotten Son. We have also as a Physician the Lord our God, Jesus the Christ, the only-begotten Son and Word, before time began; but who afterward became also man, of Mary the virgin" (ibid., chapter 7).

Justin Martyr

Justin, an early Christian apologist right after the apostles, affirmed the Trinity: "The most true God is the Father of righteousness.... We worship and adore Him, the Son (who came forth from Him and taught us these things, along with the host of the other good angels who follow and are made like Him), and the prophetic Spirit" (in Bercot, DECB, 652).

Irenaeus

Irenaeus learned under Polycarp, the disciple of John, and later became bishop of Lyons. He asserted the doctrine of the Trinity in these words:

The church, though dispersed throughout the whole world, even to the ends of the earth, has received from the apostles and their disciples this faith in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are in them; and in one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation; and in the Holy Spirit. (AH in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, X, 1)

One God the Father is declared, who is above all, through all, and in all. The Father is indeed above all, and He is the Head of Christ. But the Word is through all things and is Himself the Head of the church. While the Spirit is in us all, and He is the living water, (in Bercot, DECB, 652)

Clement of Alexandria

Clement affirmed that "the universal Father is one. The universal Word is one. And the Holy Spirit is one" (ibid., 652).

Tertullian

Tertullian, an African apologist and theologian, was the first to use the term "Trinity," though the truth of the Trinity was taught in the New Testament and by church Fathers before him. He declared,

We define that there are two, the Father and the Son, and three with the Holy Spirit, and this number is made by the pattern of salvation ... [which] brings about unity in Trinity, interrelating the three, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. They are three, not in dignity, but in degree, not in substance but in form, not in power but in kind. They are of one substance and power, because there is one God from whom these degrees, forms and kinds devolve in the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. (PAH, 23)

He added, “I testify that the Father, the Son, and the Spirit are inseparable from each other.... My assertion is that the Father is one, the Son is one, and the Spirit is one—and that they are all distinct from each other” (in Bercot, DECB, 653).

Origen

Origen was an Alexandrian defender of Christianity. He too defended the Trinity, writing,

If anyone would say that the Word of God [Christ] or the Wisdom of God had a beginning, let him beware lest he direct his impiety rather against the unbegotten Father, since he denies that he was always Father.... There can be no more ancient title of almighty God than that of Father, and it is through the son that he is Father. (DP in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1.2)

Further, “the Holy Spirit would never have been reckoned in the unity of the trinity, i.e., along with the unchangeable Father and His Son, unless He had always been the Holy Spirit” (ibid., 1:111:4).

Origen spoke of the fact that the person of the Holy Spirit was of such authority and dignity, that saving baptism was not complete except by the authority of the most excellent Trinity of them all, i.e., by the naming of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and by joining them to the unbegotten God the Father, and to His only-begotten Son, the name also of the Holy Spirit, (ibid., 1.2)

Athenagoras

Though the poets, in their fictions, represent the gods as no better than men, our mode of thinking is not the same as theirs, concerning either God the Father or the Son. But the Son of God is the Logos of the Father, in idea and in operation; for after the pattern of Him and by Him were all things made, the Father and the Son being one. And, the Son being in the Father and the Father in the Son, in oneness and power of spirit, the understanding and reason. (WA, 10 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, II)

Who, then, would not be astonished to hear men called atheists who speak of God the Father, and of God the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, and who declare both their power in union and their distinction in order?

We acknowledge a God, and a Son (His Logos [“Word”]), and a Holy Spirit. These are united in essence—the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. Now, the Son is the Intelligence, Reason, and Wisdom of the Father. And the Spirit is an emanation, as light from fire, (in Bercot, DECB, 652)

That we are not atheists, therefore, seeing that we acknowledge one God, uncreated, eternal, invisible, impassible, incomprehensible, illimitable, who is apprehended by the understanding only and the reason, who is encompassed by light, and beauty, and spirit, and power ineffable, by whom the universe has been created through His Logos, and set in order, and is kept in being—I have sufficiently demonstrated. (I say “His Logos,” for we acknowledge also a Son of God. Nor let any one think it ridiculous that God should have a Son ... ). But the Son of God is the Logos of the Father, in idea and in operation; for after the pattern of Him and by Him were all things made, the Father and the Son being one. And, the Son being in the Father and the Father in the Son, in oneness and power of spirit, the understanding and reason of the Father is the Son of God.... I will state briefly that He is the first product of the Father, not as having been brought into existence (for from the beginning, God, who is the eternal mind, had the Logos in Himself, being from eternity instinct with Logos ... ). The Holy Spirit Himself also, which operates in the prophets, we assert to be an effluence of God, flowing from Him, and returning back again like a beam of the sun. Who, then, would not be astonished to hear men who speak of God the Father, and of God the Son, and of the Holy Spirit and who declare both their power in union and their distinction in order, called atheists? (op. cit.)

Hippolytus

Therefore, a man ... is compelled to acknowledge God the Father Almighty, and Christ Jesus the Son of God—who, being God, became man, to whom also the Father made all things subject (Himself excepted)—and the Holy Spirit; and that these are three [Persons]. However, if he desires to know how it is shown that there is still one God, let him know that His power is one. As far as regards the power, therefore, God is one. But as far as regards the Economy, there is a threefold manifestation, (in Bercot, DECB, 655)

Novatian of Rome

Novatian, a bishop in Rome, wrote a work titled De Trinitate De Reula Fidei, defending the deity of Christ and the Trinity. He declared,

The rule of truth demands that, first of all, we believe in God the Father and Almighty Lord... The same rule of truth teaches us to believe, after the Father, also in the Son of God, Christ Jesus, our Lord God, but the Son of God... Moreover, the order of reason and the authority of faith ... admonishes us, after this, to believe also in the Holy Ghost, (in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 21)

Gregory Thaumaturgus

Gregory was the pupil of Origen and bishop of Neo-Caesaria who played a prominent part in the Synod of Antioch (A.D. 269). He confessed,

There is one God, the Father of the living Word... There is one Lord, one of one (only of only), God of God, the true Son of the true Father, Invisible of Invisible, and Immortal of Immortal, and Everlasting of Everlasting. And there is one Holy Ghost ... a perfect Trinity, not divided nor differing in glory and eternity and sovereignty. (DF, 7 in ibid., 25)

The Early Creeds and Councils on the Trinity

As was shown above, the Fathers of the first two centuries after Christ followed the teachings of the New Testament in affirming the Trinity. In the next two centuries the universal church affirmed that the doctrine of the Trinity was normative for all believers.

The Apostles' Creed

The Trinity is implied in the Apostles' Creed, which, in its old Roman form, declares: "I believe in God the Father Almighty. And in Jesus Christ his only begotten Son our Lord... And in the Holy Ghost" (in Schaff, CC, 47–48). The Trinity was made explicit by later church councils when the proponents of Arianism denied what was taught from the time of the apostles.

The Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381)

This great ecumenical council declared as a norm for orthodoxy:

I believe in one God the Father Almighty: maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all Worlds, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father.... And [I believe] in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life, (ibid., 58–59)

The Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451)

By the time of this second great ecumenical council, deviant doctrines called for an even more explicit statement on the Trinity. It declared,

We, then, following the holy Fathers, all with one consent, teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in manhood; truly God and truly man, of a reasonable rational soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the Manhood ... one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, in-divisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person and one Subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and only begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ. (ibid., 62)

The Medieval Fathers on the Trinity

The Fathers of the Middle Ages produced some of the great treatises on the doctrine of the Trinity.

Augustine

Let it not be supposed that in this Trinity there is any separation in respect of time or place, but that these Three are equal and co-eternal, and absolutely of one nature: and that the creatures have been made, not some by the Father, and some by the Son, and some by the Holy Spirit, but that each and all that have been or are now being created subsist in the Trinity as their Creator; and that no one is saved by the Father without the Son and the Holy Spirit, or by the Son without the Father and the Holy Spirit, or by the Holy Spirit without the Father and the Son—but by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the only one, true, and truly immortal (that is, absolutely unchangeable) God. (L, 169.2)

The Spirit is other than the Father and the Son because He is neither the Father nor the Son. I say “other than,” not “different from,” because, equally with them, He is the simple, unchangeable, co-eternal God. This Trinity is one God. And, although it is a Trinity, it is nonetheless simple. For we do not say that the nature of this good is simple because the Father alone shares in it, or the Son alone, or the Holy Spirit alone. Nor do we say with the Sabellian heretics that it is but a nominal Trinity without subsistent Persons. Our reason for calling it simple is because it is what it has—with the exception of the real relations in which the Persons stand to each other.

It is, therefore, because we are men, created in the image of a Creator, whose eternity is true, His truth eternal, His love both eternal and true, a Creator who is the eternal, true, and lovable Trinity in whom there is neither confusion nor division, that, wherever we turn among the things which He created and conserved so wonderfully, we discover His footprints, whether lightly or plainly impressed. (CG, 11.10, 11.28)

Anselm

First, all three together are one supreme essence (even though each, perfectly, is the supreme essence). And the one supreme essence cannot exist without itself, outside itself, or greater or less than itself. And, secondly, the Father, as a complete whole, exists in the Son and in their mutual Spirit, the Son in Father and in Spirit, and Spirit in Father and in Son. This is because the supreme essence's consciousness is, as a complete whole, in its understanding and in its love, and its understanding in its consciousness and in its love, and its love in its consciousness and in its understanding. The supreme spirit understands and loves its whole consciousness. It is conscious of and loves its whole understanding. It is conscious of and understands its whole love. By consciousness we understand the Father, by understanding, the Son, and by love, their Spirit. Such, therefore, is the equality of the mutual embrace and the mutual indwelling of Father, Son and Spirit. It demonstrates that none of them is greater than, or can exist without, the others. (ACMW, 66–67)

Father, Son, and Spirit exist in each other, and with such equality that none is greater than the others. What a joy it is to behold this! Their equality is demonstrable first in terms of their shared essence, and secondly—and no less—in terms of each individually. (SABW, 66–67)

Thomas Aquinas

In like manner, as in God the persons are multiplied, and the essence is not multiplied, we speak of one essence of the three persons, and three persons of the one essence, provided these genitives be understood as designating the form. (ST, Ia.39.2)

If there were any inequality in the divine persons, they would not have the same essence; and thus the three persons would not be one God; which is impossible. We must therefore admit equality among the divine persons. (ibid., Ia.42.2)

There can be only three persons in God. For as it was shown above, the several persons are the several subsisting relations really distinct from each other. But a real distinction between the divine relations can come only from relative opposition. Therefore, only three persons exist in God: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (ibid., Ia.30.2)

The Reformers on the Trinity

The basic doctrine of the Trinity—one nature and three persons—has been the same since the controversy was settled in the early church. The Reformers affirmed the same.

Martin Luther

Christ shows forcefully that the Holy Spirit is an actual Being in the Godhead and a separate, distinct Person by Himself, one who is not the Father or the Son. For all these expressions obviously refer to a separate Person: the Comforter, who will come; again: “whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak” (John 16:13). If He is to come or (as He said above) to be sent or to proceed; again, if He is to hear and speak, He must certainly be Someone. Now He is, of course, not the Father, because the Father neither comes nor is sent; nor is He the Son, who has already come and now returns to the Father, of whom the Holy Spirit is to preach and whom He is to glorify.

“Whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak” (John 16:13). For here He speaks of a conversation that is carried on within the Godhead, apart from all creatures, and sets up a pulpit with both a Speaker and a Hearer, making the Father the Preacher but the Holy Spirit the Hearer. To be sure, this is a sublime matter, and it is above the ability of human reason to determine how it takes place. But because we are unable to comprehend it with human words or reason, we are to believe it... Accordingly, it [the Word] has a true divine nature from the Father; yet it does not depart from the Father (as a corporeal, natural word, spoken by a man, is a voice or breath which does not stay in him but comes from him and stays away from him) but stays forever in Him. These, then, are the two distinct Persons: the Speaker and the Word that is spoken, that is, the Father and the Son. And now the third follows: the Hearer of both the Speaker and the spoken Word; for where a Speaker and a Word are to be, a Hearer is required. But all this speaking, being spoken, and hearing takes place within the divine nature and stays within it. There no creature is or can be. But Speaker and Word and Hearer must be God Himself, all three equally eternal in the indivisible one Majesty. For in the divine Being there is no change or inequality and neither beginning nor end. Therefore, no one can say that the Hearer is Someone apart (ausser) from God or each Person is as entirely the whole Godhead (tota divinitas) as if there were no other. And yet it is true that no Person is the Godhead so exclusively that the others are not also the Godhead. This distinction of Persons is so great that only the Person of the Son assumed human nature.... Therefore, the entire science of metaphysics is in error and must be boldly crucified when we are in search of God. (WLS, 1384–85)

John Calvin

Because the Father, though distinguished by his own peculiar properties, has expressed himself wholly in the Son, he is said with perfect reason to have rendered his person (hypostasis) manifest in him. And this aptly accords with what is immediately added—viz., that he is “the brightness of his glory.” The fair inference from the Apostle’s words is, that there is a proper subsistence (hypostasis) of the Father, which shines refulgent in the Son. From this, again, it is easy to infer that there is a subsistence (hypostasis) of the Son, which distinguishes him from the Father. The same holds in the case of the Holy Spirit; for we will immediately prove both that he is God and that he has a separate subsistence from the Father. This, moreover, is not a distinction of essence, which it [would be] impious to multiply.

The whole Father is in the Son, and the whole Son in the Father, as the Son himself also declares (John 14:10), “I am in the Father, and the Father in me”; nor do ecclesiastical writers admit that the one is separated from the other by any difference of essence. “By those names which denote distinction,” says Augustine, “is meant the relation which they mutually bear to each other, not the very substance by which they are one” (ICR, 1.13.2, 19).

The Post-Reformers on the Trinity

John Miley

Trinitarianism is not tritheism; nor are trinitarians less pronounced on the unity of God than unitarians. The sense of this unity is embodied in the term designative of the personal distinctions in the Godhead. It follows that the unity of God is the basal truth in the doctrine of the Trinity. But as this question is not in issue as between trinitarianism and unitarianism, and especially as we have previously considered it in its distinctive application to God, it requires no further treatment here. (ST, 223)

“The doctrine of the Trinity asserts the personal distinctions of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and the essential unity of each” (ibid., 224).

What then is this doctrine? It is that God is one being in such a modified and extended sense of the language, as to include three persons in such a modified and restricted sense of the terms that he is qualified, in a corresponding restricted sense.... Does it assert that one God is three Gods, or that there are more Gods than one? It admits of no such construction, for it expressly affirms that there is but one God, and that the three persons, as persons, are not three beings or three Gods, (ibid., 230)

Jacob Arminius

“For the Son and the Divine Essence differ in relation” (WJA, II.481).

The Divine persons are not modes of being or of existing, or modes of the Divine Essence: For they are things with the mode of being or existing. The Divine Persons are distinguished by a real distinction, not by the degree and mode of the thing. A Person is an individual subsistence itself, not a characteristic property, nor is it an individual principle; though it be not an individual, nor a person without a characteristic property or without an individual principle (ibid., 481–82)

OBJECTIONS TO THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY

Many objections have been leveled against the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, both biblical and philosophical. The most important one will be treated here.

Objection One—Based on Alleged Counter-Claims to Christ’s Deity

Several passages are used by critics to show that neither Jesus nor His disciples actually claimed deity for Him. This they claim by offering many counter-texts to the above affirmations. A brief examination of these passages is in order here.

Response to Objection One

Matthew 19:16–30 NKJV

The rich young ruler called Jesus “Good Teacher,” and Jesus rebuked him, saying, “Why do you call Me good? No one is good but One, that is, God.” If Jesus was really God, then why did He appear to deny the same to the young ruler, even rebuking Him for implying so?

In response, it should be observed that Jesus did not deny He was God to the young ruler. He simply asked him to examine the implications of what he was saying. In effect, Jesus was saying to him, “Do you realize what you are saying when you call Me good? Do you realize that this is something you should attribute only to God? Are you saying I am God?”

The young man did not realize the implications of what he was saying; thus, Jesus was forcing him into a very uncomfortable dilemma. Either Jesus was good and was God, or else He was bad and was merely a man. A good God or a bad man, but not a good man: These are the real alternatives with regard to Christ, for no good man would claim to be God when he was not. The Christ who was a good moral teacher but not God is a figment of human imagination.

Matthew 24:36

The Bible teaches that Jesus is God (John 1:1) and that He knows all things (John 2:24; Col. 2:2–3). On the other hand, He “grew in wisdom” (Luke 2:52) and sometimes did not seem to know certain things (cf. John 11:34). Indeed, He denied knowing the time of His own second coming here and in Mark 13:32, saying, “No one knows about that day or hour, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father.”

In response, we must distinguish between what Jesus knew as God (everything) and what He knew as man (not everything). As God, Jesus was omniscient (all-knowing), but as man He was limited in His knowledge. The situation can be schematized as follows:

Jesus As God

Jesus As Man

Unlimited in knowledge

Limited in knowledge

No growth in knowledge

Growth in knowledge

Knew time of His coming

Did not know time of His coming

Therefore, properly understood, this passage is not a denial of the deity of Christ; rather, it is in harmony with the distinction between the two natures of Christ, one divine and one human.

John 1:1

This text is used by Arians to show that Jesus was only “a” god, not “the” God, because there is no definite article (“the”) in the Greek of this verse. This is a misunderstanding. In Greek, when the definite article is used, it often stresses the individual, and when it is not present, it refers to the nature of the one denoted. Thus, the verse can be rendered “And the Word was of the nature of God.” Further, as mentioned previously, “Father” is often used of God in the New Testament without the definite article, and even critics do not take this as a disclaimer of full deity for the Father.

The full deity of Christ is supported not only by general usage of the same construction but also by other references in John to Jesus being God (cf. John 8:58; 10:30; 20:28) and in the rest of the New Testament (cf. Col. 1:15–16; 2:9; Titus 2:13).

Furthermore, some New Testament texts use the definite article and speak of Christ as “the God.” So it does not matter whether John did or did not use the definite article here—the Bible clearly teaches that Jesus is God, not just a god (cf. Rom. 9:5; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8).

Indeed, the Father is sometimes referred to as God with the definite article, but no one takes this to be a denial of His deity (see, for example, 2 Cor. 1:3).

That Jesus is Jehovah (Yahweh) is clear from the fact that the New Testament attributes to Jesus properties and powers that in the Old Testament apply only to God (see above).

John 14:28

Another alleged counter-example is found here, where Jesus said, “The Father is greater than I.” How can the Father be greater if Jesus is equal to God?

In response, there is an important difference. As a man, the Father was greater than Jesus, and Jesus was a human being. But the Father was not greater than Christ as God, for Jesus was also God. Also, the Father is greater than the Son by office, but not by nature, since both are God (see John 1:1; 8:58; 10:30). Just as an earthly father is equally human with but holds a higher office than his son, even so the Father and the Son in the Trinity are equal in essence, but different in function. In like manner, we speak of the president of our country as being a greater man, not by virtue of his character, but by virtue of his position. Therefore, Jesus cannot ever be said to say that He considered Himself anything less than God by nature.

Colossians 1:15–17

In verse 15 Paul calls Christ the “firstborn.” This seems to imply that Christ was only a creature; that is, the first one born (created) in the universe. However, careful examination of this verse in its context reveals that Paul clearly declares Christ to be God in this very letter by saying He created all things (1:16) and has “the fullness of the Godhead” (2:9 NKJV). The reference to “firstborn” does not mean He is the firstborn in creation, but the “firstborn over all creation” (1:15), since “He is before all things” (1:17). “Firstborn” in this context does not mean the first one to be born, but the Heir of all, the Creator and Owner of all things. As Creator of “all things,” He could not have been a created thing.

Revelation 3:14

This is another verse used by those who deny the deity of Christ. Here John refers to Christ as the “Beginning of the creation of God” (NKJV). This too may sound to the casual observer like Christ is the first created being. However, “Beginning of the creation of God” must mean that Christ is the Beginner of God’s creation, not the beginning in God’s creation. This is clear from the fact that the same word beginning is used of God the Father in Revelation 21:6–7 (emphasis added): “He said to me: ‘It is done. I am the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End. To him who is thirsty I will give to drink without cost from the spring of the water of life. He who overcomes will inherit all this, and I will be his God and he will be my son.’ ” Hence, if “beginning” disproved that Christ is God, then it would also disprove that the Father is God, which is absurd.

Objection Two—Based on God’s Simplicity

Trinitarian theists affirm a multiplicity in God of three persons: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Thus, it would seem that God cannot be absolutely one, or else He could not also be three persons, for if the persons are truly different, then God cannot be absolutely the same, and if they are not really distinct (but only in our minds), then modalism (sabellianism) follows and not trinitarianism.

Response to Objection Two

The first thing to note about this objection is that it confuses person and essence: Simplicity refers only to God’s essence. Clearly, the orthodox view of the Trinity has a plurality of persons within the unity of one essence. The early creeds were very careful to distinguish the persons in the Godhead without dividing His essence (see Schaff, CC, Volume 1).

As Aquinas noted, in reference to the divine essence, each person is identical to the essence. But in respect to one another, each person is mutually distinct and not united with the others (OPG, 3:7:1). Therefore, the Trinity and simplicity are not contradictory.

Classical theists do not deny relationships in God, for the relationships really exist in Him. Even so, the distinctions in God are not according to essence, but according to what is relative, namely, to personhood. God is essentially one but relationally three. Therefore, relationality in God does not entail composition (Aquinas, ST, Ia.28:3).

Objection Three—Based on the Identity of Persons of the Trinity

It is objected that all things identical to the same thing are identical to one another. For example, if A is identical to B, and C is identical to B, then A must be identical to C. All the members of the Godhead are identical to the same thing (viz., God's essence). Therefore, it would seem to follow that all the members of the Trinity are identical to one another.

Response to Objection Three

First, no trinitarian would want to make this claim, for it denies the plurality of persons in God. It is, in fact, the proposition made by Sabellian heretics.

Second, Thomas Aquinas responded to this very objection in his Summa Theologica (1a.28, 4). Citing Aristotle, he noted that this objection is telling only where there is identity between object and meaning. But such is not the case in God, for while Fatherhood and Sonship in reality refer to the same thing (essence), yet their meaning implies opposing relationships.

Third, God can be one and have two or more relations, in the way there is one and the same road between two different cities. The relation between Father and Son is the same relationship, yet Father and Son are not the same (ibid.): They are different persons within the same God. Likewise, one and the same triangle has three corners—this neither destroys the unity of the nature of a triangle, nor does this unity do away with its three corners. The same is true of the Trinity.

Objection Four—Based on the Traditional Definition of Personhood

The traditional definition of personhood includes that which has mind, feelings, and will. However, on this definition, one could not distinguish the two natures of Christ, since each nature has a mind of its own. For example, the divine nature of Jesus knew everything, but the human mind of Christ was limited (Matt. 24:36). If “person” includes mind, then how can we distinguish two different minds (and wills) in Christ, one mind being infinite and the other finite?

Answer to Objection Four

The “traditional” definition of personhood only speaks about the power of a person by virtue of the nature in which he participates. The core of personhood is a “who” or an “I”—a subject. But there are no “naked persons”; each person has a nature, and in Christ's unique case, He has two natures. So “person” is defined by the powers it possesses—mind, emotion, and will. But the person himself is not these powers; he simply has them. What is more, there is a difference between having the powers of intellect and a nature that contains the content that particular intellect holds.

In brief, one and the same person, in the sense of an “I” or “who,” can have two different natures through which it operates. Further, even one and the same person in the sense of having the powers of intellect, emotion, and will can have two different natures through which it operates, since this differs from the content these natures can possess. For example, an infinite Mind has more content than a finite mind, even though the same “person” (understood as having the power of intellect) can have two different minds, one finite and the other infinite in content.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

The nature of God is the most fundamental factor in evangelical theology; on it rests all other theological doctrines, either explicitly or implicitly. According to sound biblical, theological, and historical reasoning, the God of the Bible is the God of trinitarian monotheism. He is tri-personal, infinite, indivisible, immutable, eternal, all-knowing, all-powerful, all-loving, and absolutely perfect and just. Deviation from any of these attributes results in an unorthodox view of God.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

GOD'S HOLINESS AND RIGHTEOUSNESS

As we have seen, God has both moral and nonmoral attributes and characteristics. All of the preceding ones (in chapters 2–12) are non-moral in character. (They are also called “metaphysical attributes,” since they describe God’s actual nonmoral nature.) The first group of these is also called “incommunicable,” since they cannot be communicated to creatures. God alone is Pure Actuality, simple, self-existent, necessary, immutable, eternal, impassible, infinite, immaterial, immense, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, and ineffable. The other attributes are communicable but still nonmoral: These include wisdom, light, majesty, beauty, life, and immortality.

God also has moral attributes and characteristics; these are communicable to creatures, since they do not necessitate infinitude. They include holiness, righteousness (justice), jealousy, perfection, truthfulness, goodness (love), mercy, and wrath (although, again, these last two may be activities, not attributes as such, which flow from God’s goodness and justice, respectively).

GOD'S HOLINESS

God’s attribute of holiness defies simple categorization, for it combines both metaphysical and moral dimensions. In the latter sense, it fits with the other moral attributes just listed and will be treated here.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S HOLINESS

The biblical Hebrew words for holy are godesh, meaning “apartness” or “sacredness,” and gadosh, translated “sacred” or “holy.” The Greek word hagios means “righteous,” “holy,” or “pious.”

Theologically, God's holiness means that He is totally and utterly set apart from all creation and evil. His holiness is associated with His jealousy (Josh. 24:19), His exaltation (Ps. 99:9; Isa. 5:16), His righteousness (Isa. 5:16; Luke 1:75), His almightiness (Rev. 4:8), His absolute uniqueness (Ex. 15:11), His moral purity (2 Cor. 7:1), and His being vexed by evil (Ps. 78:41). As such, His holiness should inspire a deep sense of awe (Isa. 29:23) and perpetual worship (1 Chron. 16:29; Rev. 4:8) in His creatures.

As mentioned above, God's holiness is both a metaphysical and a moral attribute: It refers to His absolute moral uniqueness as well as His total separateness from all creatures. In one sense, holiness is an overall attribute of God that distinguishes Him from everything else that exists (see Sproul, HC).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S HOLINESS

God is holy by His very nature. Exodus 15:11 declares, "Who among the gods is like you, O LORD? Who is like you—majestic in holiness, awesome in glory, working wonders?" In Leviticus 11:44, God affirms, "I am the LORD your God; consecrate yourselves and be holy, because I am holy. Do not make yourselves unclean by any creature that moves about on the ground." Leviticus 11:45 adds, "I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy." In Leviticus 19:2, He says, "Speak to the entire assembly of Israel and say to them: 'Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy.'"

And in Leviticus 20:7, He orders, "Consecrate yourselves and be holy, because I am the Lord your God." Once again God says (in Leviticus 21:8), "I the Lord am holy—I who make you holy."

In Joshua 24:19, He told the people, "You are not able to serve the LORD. He is a holy God; he is a jealous God. He will not forgive your rebellion and your sins." First Samuel 2:2 affirms that "there is no one holy like the LORD; there is no one besides you [God]; there is no Rock like our God." First Samuel 6:20 continues, "Who can stand in the presence of the LORD, this holy God?" First Chronicles 16:29 commands, "Ascribe to the LORD the glory due to his name. Bring an offering and come before him; worship the LORD in the splendor of his holiness." Psalm 78:41 asserts that "again and again they put God to the test; they vexed the Holy One of Israel." We are told in Psalm 99:5 to "exalt the Lord our God and worship at his footstool; he is holy." Psalm 99:9 affirms, "Exalt the LORD our God and worship at his holy mountain, for the Lord our God is holy."

The prophet (Isaiah 5:16) said, "The LORD Almighty will be exalted by his justice, and the holy God will show himself holy by his righteousness." Again Isaiah 29:23 says, "When they see among them their children, the work of my hands, they will keep my name holy; they will acknowledge the holiness of the Holy One of Jacob, and will stand in awe of the God of Israel." Numerous biblical passages speak of God as "the Holy One" (Ps. 71:22; Ps. 78:41; Isa. 5:19; 29:23; 43:3; cf. 48:17; 54:5; 55:5; 60:9; Jer. 51:5; Hosea 11:9, 12; Hab. 1:12; 3:3; Mark 1:24; Luke 1:35; 4:34; John 6:69).

In the New Testament, the apostle wrote in 2 Corinthians 7:1, "Since we have these promises, dear friends, let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God" (emphasis added). John informs us in Revelation 4:8 that "each of the four living creatures [around God's throne] had six wings and was covered with eyes all around, even under his wings. Day and night they never stop saying, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come" (emphasis added).

In addition to direct references to God as holy, the Godhead has a Holy Spirit (Acts 2:33; 4:31; 5:32; 7:55; 10:38; 15:8; 20:28; Rom. 14:17; 15:13, 16; 1 Cor. 6:19; 12:3; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:30; 1 Thess. 4:8; Heb. 2:4; 2 Peter 1:21). God has a holy name (Lev. 22:2; 1 Chron. 16:35; Ps. 106:47). God makes the ground holy where He stands (Ex. 3:5). He has holy ways (Ps. 77:13). He takes an unchangeable oath by His holiness (Ps. 89:35). God has a holy arm (Ps. 98:1; Isa. 52:10). God sits on a holy throne (Ps. 47:8). His throne is on a holy mountain (Ps. 48:1; Ezek. 28:14). God has holy angels (Deut. 33:2; Job 15:15; Acts 10:22). God ordained a holy day (Sabbath) for Israel (Gen. 2:3; Ex. 20:11; Neh. 13:22). He also established holy fasts (Joel 1:14). God has holy prophets (Acts 3:21). God has a holy place (heaven) where He dwells (2 Chron. 30:27; Ps. 46:4; 68:5; Matt. 3:17). He had a most holy place in His tabernacle (1 Chron. 6:49; 1 Kings 6:16; Ps. 79:1). In it God had holy things (furniture and utensils) (Ex. 25:23ff.; Lev. 5:15; 1 Chron. 23:13).

God chose a holy people (Israel) (Deut. 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19; 28:9; Col. 1:2; 1 Peter 2:9). He also picked special holy men (2 Kings 4:9). He elected a holy church (1 Cor. 1:2). He set aside a holy land (Zech. 2:12). God chose a holy city on earth (Jerusalem) (Neh. 11:1; Isa. 52:1). God's holy city sits on a holy mountain (Ps. 15:1; 48:1; Dan. 9:20). He also has a holy city in heaven (Rev. 21:2, 10). God ordained holy priests (in Leviticus). God even designated a holy dumpsite (Jer. 31:40), that is, a special place set apart to dispose of things. God demands a holy tithe of His people (Lev. 27:30). God had holy food (Lev. 21:22). He expects us to live a holy life (Rom. 12:1; 1 Thess. 4:7).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S HOLINESS

God's holiness follows from several other attributes. The metaphysical aspect of holiness follows from many of His metaphysical attributes, and the moral dimension follows from His absolute perfection.

Holiness Follows From Transcendence

God's transcendence over the world (see chapter 22) sets Him apart from everything in the world. What is so set apart is holy, since holiness means to be set apart from everything in the world. Therefore, the holiness of God follows from His transcendence.

Holiness Follows From Infinity

God is an infinite Being (see chapter 5), and there can be only one infinite Being, for if there were two infinite Beings, then there would be more than an infinite, which is impossible. Thus, the infinite Being is a class of one, and what is in a class of one is unique and set apart from all other beings—which is what is meant by being holy.

Holiness Follows From Absolute Perfection

Sacred Scripture asserts that God is absolutely perfect (see chapter 14). There cannot be two beings who are absolutely perfect, for to be two they must differ; otherwise they would be the same. To differ, one would have to possess some perfection that the other lacked. But the one who lacked some perfection would not be absolutely perfect; therefore, there can be only one Being who is absolutely perfect—holy, in the metaphysical sense.

Further, if perfection is thought of as moral perfection, then absolute perfection implies holiness as well. God is absolutely perfect, and what is absolutely perfect is set apart from all else. Therefore, God is holy: He is perfect in and of Himself; all else is perfect by participation in His perfection.

An Important Implication of the Moral Attributes of God

The moral dimension of God's holiness, unlike the metaphysical, can be emulated by creatures. This is the sense in which the Bible declares, we "may participate in the divine nature" (2 Peter 1:4). Thus, God declares, "I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy" (Lev. 11:45). And, "God did not call us to be impure, but to live a holy life" (1 Thess. 4:7). Thus, Paul urges, "Since we have these promises, dear friends, let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God" (2 Cor. 7:1). So we can be like God in His moral attributes, but we cannot emulate Him in His metaphysical attributes. This is why the Bible never says, "I am infinite; be you infinite." Or, "I am a necessary Being; therefore, be you a necessary Being."

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S HOLINESS

Holiness was recognized as a moral attribute of God by the earliest theologians of the church. This begins with the early Fathers.

The Early Church Fathers on God's Holiness

Ignatius

God the Word, the only-begotten Son, was of the seed of David according to the flesh, by the Virgin Mary; was baptized by John, that all righteousness might be fulfilled by Him; that He lived a life of holiness without sin, and was truly under Pontius Pilate and Herod the tetrarch, nailed [to the cross] for us in His flesh. From whom we also derive our being, from His divinely-blessed passion, that He might set up a standard for the ages, through His resurrection, to all His holy and faithful [followers], whether among Jews or Gentiles, in the one body of His Church. (TE, 20 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

Justin Martyr

Again, in another prophecy, the Spirit of prophecy, through the same David, intimated that Christ, after He had been crucified, should reign, and spoke as follows: "Sing to the Lord, all the earth, and day by day declare His salvation. For great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised, to be feared above all the gods. For all the gods of the nations are idols of devils; but God made the heavens. Glory and praise are before His face, strength and glorying are in the habitation of His holiness. Give Glory to the Lord, the Father everlasting. Receive grace, and enter His presence, and worship in His holy courts. Let all the earth fear before His face; let it be established, and not shaken. Let them rejoice among the nations." The Lord hath reigned from the tree.

And then, what is said by David, “In the splendors of Thy holiness have I begotten Thee from the womb, before the morning star. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek” (FA, 1.41 in ibid., 1).

Clement of Alexandria

This is the eternal adjustment of the vision, which is able to see the eternal light, since like loves like; and that which is holy, loves that from which holiness proceeds, which has appropriately been termed light.

Guide [us], Shepherd of rational sheep; guide unarmed children, O holy King, O footsteps of Christ, O heavenly way, perennial Word, immeasurable Age, Eternal Light, Fount of mercy, performer of virtue; noble [is the] life of those who honor God, O Christ Jesus, heavenly milk of the sweet breasts of the graces of the Bride, pressed out of Thy wisdom. (I, 1.6, 3.1 in ibid., 2)

Tertullian

Moreover, it would be a more unworthy course for God to spare the evil-doer than to punish him, especially in the most good and holy God, who is not otherwise fully good than as the enemy of evil, and that to such a degree as to display His love of good by the hatred of evil, and to fulfill His defense of the former by the extirpation of the latter. (FBAM, 2.1.27 in ibid., 3)

Commodianus (fl. between A.D. third and fifth centuries)

Avoid the worship of temples, the oracles of demons; turn yourselves to Christ, and ye shall be associates with God. Holy is God’s law, which teaches the dead to live. God alone has commanded us to offer to Him the hymn of praise. All of you shun absolutely the law of the devil. (IC, 35 in ibid., 4.1.26)

Origen

Isaiah spake of two seraphim alone, who with two wings cover the countenance of God, and with two His feet, and with two do fly, calling to each other alternately, and saying, “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of Sabbath; the whole earth is full of Thy glory.” That the seraphim alone have both their wings over the face of God, and over His feet, we venture to declare as meaning that neither the hosts of holy angels, nor the “holy seats,” nor the “dominions,” nor the “principalities,” nor the “powers,” can fully understand the beginning of all things, and the limits of the universe. (DP, 4.1.26 in ibid.)

The Medieval Fathers on God’s Holiness

The major theological minds of the Middle Ages spoke with reverence of God’s awesome holiness.

Augustine

Augustine spoke of “my holy God, that Thou givest when what Thou commandest to be done is done” (C, 13.10.31.45 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.1). “And in another psalm we read, ‘Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of His holiness,' increasing the joy of the whole earth" (CG, 11.1 in ibid., 1.2). Again, Augustine wrote about "the image of God answering to the holiness of the Lord, the brighter portion of the flock of Christ" (OCD, 4.21.27 in ibid., 1.2).

"When we praise God directly, we do it as we celebrate His Holiness, who is without sin: but when we accuse ourselves we give Him glory, by whom we have risen again" (SSLG, 17.4 in ibid., VI).

Strengthen me, that I may be able. Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt. He confesses to have received, and when he glorieth, he glorieth in the Lord. Another have I heard entreating that he might receive, "Take from me," saith he, "the greediness of the belly"; by which it appeareth, O my holy God, that Thou givest when what Thou commandest to be done is done. (C, 10.31.45 in ibid., 1.1)

Anselm

Holiness means to be set apart; this is true of God both morally and metaphysically. Anselm stressed the latter when he said,

Of all the things that can be said of something, could any be appropriate to the substance of so wonderful a nature as this? This is the question to ask as carefully as possible at this point. I would be surprised if we could find anything from among the nouns and verbs which we apply to things created from nothing that could worthily be said of the substance that created all... Hence, the mere fact that the supreme nature is greater than everything that it has created clearly does not specify its natural essence. (ACMW, 26)

Hence, "neither nothing, nor something, went before or will come after the supreme essence; and that nothing existed before or will exist after it—this will be totally true" (ibid., 33).

Thomas Aquinas

We are drawn to goodness as by an end. What our ends are ultimately decides whether our voluntary acts are right or wrong. Consider then how the love which loves the supreme good which is God, is so excellent that it is called holy—whether that means pure, as the Greeks say, for God's is sheer goodness quite unflecked, or firm, as the Latins say, for God's is immutable goodness. Fittingly, therefore, we speak of the Spirit which is God's love of himself as the Holy Spirit. (Aquinas, CT, 47 in Gilby, PTTA, 89)

The Reformation Theologians on God's Holiness

The great Reformers, with their focus on the doctrine of God's grace, could not help but place it in the context of His holiness.

Martin Luther

We should not be holy in order to earn or prevent something. For people who do this are hirelings, servants, and day laborers. They are not willing children and heirs who are holy for the sake of holiness, that is, for the sake of God alone; for God Himself is Righteousness, Truth, Goodness, Wisdom, and Holiness. And he who seeks no more than holiness itself, seeks and finds God Himself.

But he who seeks reward and flees punishment never finds God but makes reward his god. For that which moves a man to do something is his god. (WLS, 655–56)

“God must administer justice, for He has Himself been called a righteous Judge” (WL, 4.33).

John Calvin

“With what better foundation can it begin than by reminding us that we must be holy, because ‘God is holy?’ (Leviticus 19:2; 1 Peter 1:16.)” (ICR, 3.6.2).

Assuredly, the attributes which it is most necessary for us to know are these three: Loving-kindness, on which alone our entire safety depends; Judgment, which is daily exercised on the wicked, and awaits them in a severer form, even for eternal destruction; Righteousness, by which the faithful are preserved, and most benignly cherished. The prophet declares, that when you understand these, you are amply furnished with the means of glorying in God. Nor is there here any omission of his truth, or power, or holiness, or goodness. For how could this knowledge of his loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, exist, if it were not founded on his inviolable truth? (ibid., 1.10.2)

If they will not retain God in their knowledge (Rom. 1), or nourish their hungry soul with a sweet hope in God, God the righteous Judge will undoubtedly fill their hearts with the foreboding fear and anguish of eternal torment, so that not having the desire to enter now upon eternal life in quiet expectation, they begin to experience already that eternal perdition which in the world to come they will fulfill eternally. (Bromley, ZB, 63)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God’s Holiness

Jonathan Edwards

The reason why it is not dishonourable to be necessarily most holy is because holiness in itself is an excellent and honourable thing. For the same reason, it is no dishonour to be necessarily most wise, and, in every case, to act most wisely, or do the thing which is the wisest of all; for wisdom is also in itself excellent and honourable. (WJE, 1.71)

Being thus infinite in understanding and power, he must also be perfectly holy; for unholiness always argues some defect, some blindness. Where there is no darkness or delusion, there can be no unholiness. It is impossible that wickedness should consist with infinite light, (ibid., 2.108)

Thus, “God is essentially holy, and nothing is more impossible than that God should do amiss” (ibid., Seven Sermons, 2).

Stephen Gharnock

Never did Divine holiness appear more beautiful and lovely, than at the time our Saviour’s countenance was most marred in the midst of his dying groans. This himself acknowledges in that prophetic psalm [22:1–2], when God had turned his smiling face from him, and thrust his sharp knife into his heart, which forced that terrible cry from him, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” He adores this perfection of his holiness.... In this his purity did sparkle, and his irreversible justice manifested that all those that commit sin are worthy of death; this was the perfect index of his “righteousness” [Rom. 3:25], that is, of his holiness and truth; then it was that God that is holy was “sanctified in righteousness” [Isa. 5:16] (EAG, 2.135).

In fact, “God always acts according to the immutable nature of his holiness, and can no more change in his affections to evil, than he can [change] in his essence” (ibid., 1.345).

R. L. Dabney

Most frequently it seems to express the general idea of His moral purity, as in Lev. 11; Ps. 65; 1 Peter 1:15–16; sometimes it seems to express rather the idea of His majesty, not exclusive of His moral perfections, but inclusive also of His power, knowledge and wisdom, as in Ps. 22:3; Is. 6:3; Rev. 4:8. Holiness, therefore, is to be regarded, not as a distinct attribute, but as the resultant of all God’s moral attributes together. And as His justice, goodness, and truth are all predicated of Him as a Being of intellect and will, and would be wholly irrelevant to anything unintelligent and involuntary, so His holiness implies a reference to the same attributes. His moral attributes are the special crown; His intelligence and will are the brow that wears it. His holiness is the collective and consummate glory of His nature as an infinite, morally pure, active, and intelligent Spirit. (LST, 172–73)

William G. T. Shedd

The Holiness of God is the perfect rectitude of his will. The divine will is in absolute harmony with the divine nature. Isa. 6:3, “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts.” Isa. 57:15; Ex. 15:11; Ps. 89:35; 145:17; Amos 4:2 ; Rev. 4:8; 15:4. God’s word is holy, Rom. 1:2. His promise is holy, Ps. 105:42. His Sabbath is holy, Isa. 58:13. His people are holy, Isa. 62:12. His residence is holy, Isa. 57:15. His angels are holy, Rev. 14:10.

Holiness in God cannot be defined in the same terms in which holiness in man or angel is defined, namely, as conformity to the moral law. The moral law supposes a superior being whose love and service are obligatory upon the inferior.... Holiness in God must, consequently, be defined as conformity to his own perfect nature. (DT, 362)

OBJECTION TO GOD’S HOLINESS

Criticisms of the doctrine of God’s holiness have come from many quarters. It is much more popular to speak of a loving God than a holy God. Further, it is difficult for many to understand how an absolutely simple Being can be more than one thing. What is more, some attributes, like holiness and love, seem to be incompatible.

Objection One—Based on God’s Love

It is objected that God cannot be both loving and holy at the same time, for one attribute would lead God to save all, but the other to condemn all. These appear to be contradictory desires, and God cannot contradict Himself. Hence, it seems impossible for God to be holy if He is a God of love. But the Bible declares, “God is love” (1 John 4:16).

Response to Objection One

It is true that God cannot be or do contradictory things. However, there is no contradiction here for two reasons.

First, God's love can be expressed even toward those who reject it. For example, the waterfall that would fill two cups underneath it is flowing on both. But only the one that is right side up is going to be filled with water.

Second, the wrath of God falling on the condemned in hell and the love of God showering the saints in heaven are not being received by one and the same group. Hence, there is no contradiction, since the same persons are not receiving opposite expressions of God. God has different attributes, and each is expressed on different objects, depending on their condition.

Objection Two—Based on God's Simplicity

God is absolutely one, with no multiplicity or divisibility in His Being whatsoever. What is absolutely one cannot be many different things; thus, if God is love, then it would seem to follow that He cannot also be holy (or have any other attribute).

Response to Objection Two

God can be absolutely one and still have many attributes in the same way that the radii of a circle are one at the center and many at the circumference. Further, as we have seen, one and the same rock has many attributes at the same time: It is hard, round, and solid. Thus, one and the same God can have many attributes. The insistence that God cannot be one in essence and many in attributes is due to a failure to understand analogy (see Volume 1, chapter 9). Each attribute of God is being affirmed of Him in an analogous way, not in a univocal way; a contradiction emerges only if different attributes are affirmed of God in exactly the same way, for then God would be different things in the same way, which is impossible.

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS (JUSTICE)

God's righteousness (or justice) is a moral attribute; as such, it is intrinsic to God (and extrinsic to creatures). Being an infinite and unchanging Being, God is infinitely and immutably righteous.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

Literally, the word righteous (Gk: dikaios) means "to be just" or "right." Theologically, it refers to the intrinsic characteristic of God wherein He is absolutely just or right and is the ultimate standard of justice and rightness.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

The biblical basis for God's righteousness is found in the many ways the word is used regarding God.

- (1) Righteousness involves His true ordinances (Ps. 19:9): "The fear of the LORD is pure, enduring forever. The ordinances of the LORD are sure and altogether righteous."
- (2) Righteousness is the foundation of His throne (Ps. 89:14): "Righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne; love and faithfulness go before you."

- (3) Righteousness is the scepter of his kingdom (Heb. 1:8): “Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever, and righteousness will be the scepter of your kingdom.”
- (4) Righteousness does no injustice (Zeph. 3:5): “The Lord within her is righteous; he does no wrong. Morning by morning he dispenses his justice, and every new day he does not fail.”
- (5) Righteousness will endure forever (2 Cor. 9:9): “As it is written: ‘He has scattered abroad his gifts to the poor; his righteousness endures for ever.’ ”
- (6) Righteousness is the ultimate standard of judgment for the world (Acts 17:31): “For he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed.”
- (7) Righteousness renders to all according to their deeds (Rom. 2:6): “God will give to each person according to what he has done.”
- (8) Righteousness is the basis for the believer’s rewards (2 Tim. 4:8): “Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the LORD, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day—and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing.”
- (9) Righteousness is revealed in the law of God (Rom. 10:5): “Moses describes in this way the righteousness that is by the law.”

Being a moral attribute, righteousness can also be possessed by creatures: It is a communicable characteristic of God. Hence, it is something

- (1) we should be instructed in (2 Tim. 3:16–17);
- (2) we should seek (Matt. 6:33);
- (3) we should pursue (2 Tim. 2:22);
- (4) we should thirst after (Matt. 5:6);
- (5) we should suffer for (1 Peter 3:14; 2 Tim. 3:12);
- (6) we should submit to (Rom. 10:3);
- (7) we should be slaves of (Rom. 6:18);
- (8) we should practice (1 John 3:7).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S RIGHTEOUSNESS

Theologically, God’s righteousness is grounded in His morality and immutability: God is metaphysically absolute and morally perfect. The reasoning goes like this:

- (1) God is an immutable (unchanging) Being.
- (2) God is also a moral Being.
- (3) Hence, God must be unchangingly moral.
- (4) But being righteous is a characteristic of a moral Being.
- (5) Therefore, God must be unchangingly righteous; that is, He must be absolutely right in everything He is and does.

The same logic can be applied this way:

- (1) God is a moral Being.
- (2) God is a perfect Being.
- (3) Hence, God is a morally perfect Being. One characteristic of being moral is being righteous; therefore, God is a perfectly righteous Being.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

The Early Church Fathers on God's Righteousness

From earliest times the church Fathers spoke of God's righteousness. This practice continues to the present.

Ignatius

Again,

God the Word, the only-begotten Son, was of the seed of David according to the flesh, by the Virgin Mary; was baptized by John, that all righteousness might be fulfilled by Him; that He lived a life of holiness without sin, and was truly, under Pontius Pilate and Herod the tetrarch, nailed [to the cross] for us in His flesh. From whom we also derive our being, from His divinely blessed passion, that He might set up a standard for the ages, through His resurrection, to all His holy and faithful [followers], whether among Jews or Gentiles, in the one body of His Church. (ES, 1 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

Irenaeus

Wherefore also he shall be justly condemned, because, having been created a rational being, he lost the true rationality, and living irrationally, opposed the righteousness of God, giving himself over to every earthly spirit, and serving all lusts; as says the prophet, "Man, being in honor, did not understand: he was assimilated to senseless beasts, and made like to them" (AH, 4.4 in ibid., 1).

Inasmuch, then, as in both Testaments there is the same righteousness of God [displayed] when God takes vengeance, in the one case indeed typically, temporarily, and more moderately; but in the other, really, enduringly, and more rigidly: for the fire is eternal, and the wrath of God which shall be revealed from heaven from the face of our Lord, (ibid., 4.28.1)

Justin Martyr

But if we do not admit this, we shall be liable to fall into foolish opinions, as if it were not the same God who existed in the times of Enoch and all the rest, who neither were circumcised after the flesh, nor observed Sabbaths, nor any other rites, seeing that Moses enjoined such observances; or that God has not wished each race of mankind continually to perform the same righteous actions: to admit which, seems to be ridiculous and absurd. Therefore we must confess that He, who is ever the same, has commanded these and such like institutions on account of sinful men, and we must declare Him to be benevolent, foreknowing, needing nothing, righteous and good. (DJ, 23 in ibid.,

Theophilus

Wisdom, I speak of His offspring; if I call Him Strength, I speak of His sway; if I call Him Power, I am mentioning His activity; if Providence, I but mention His goodness; if I call Him Kingdom, I but mention His glory; if I call Him Lord, I mention His being judge; if I call Him Judge, I speak of Him as being just; if I call Him Father, I speak of all things as being from Him; if I call Him Fire, I but mention His anger. You will say, then, to me, "Is God angry?" Yes; He is angry with those who act wickedly, but He is good, and kind, and merciful, to those who love and fear Him; for

He is a chastener of the godly, and father of the righteous; but he is a judge and punisher of the impious. (TA, 1:3 in ibid., 2)

Shepherd of Hermas (c. early second century)

Give ear unto me, O Sons: I have brought you up in much simplicity, and guilelessness, and chastity, on account of the mercy of the Lord, who has dropped His righteousness down upon you, that ye may be made righteous and holy from all your iniquity and depravity; but you do not wish to rest from your iniquity. Now, therefore, listen to me, and be at peace one with another, and visit each other, and bear each other's burdens, and do not partake of God's creatures alone, but give abundantly of them to the needy. (PH, 3:9 in ibid.)

Clement of Alexandria

Truly, he who worships gods that are visible, and the promiscuous rabble of creatures begotten and born, and attaches himself to them, is a far more wretched object than the very demons. For God is by no manner or means unrighteous, as the demons are, but in the very highest degree righteous; and nothing more resembles God than one of us when he becomes righteous in the highest possible degree. (EH, 10 in ibid.)

Terullian

It was once the law; now it is "the righteousness of God which is by the faith of [Jesus] Christ." What means this distinction? Has your god been subserving the interests of the Creator's dispensation, by affording time to Him and to His law? Is the "Now" in the hands of Him to whom belonged the "Then"? Surely, then, the law was His, whose is now the righteousness of God. (FBAM, 2.5.11.13 in ibid., 3)

The Medieval Fathers on God's Righteousness

Following the patristic Fathers, medieval theologians had high regard for God's righteousness. They spoke of it often, stressing its importance among God's moral attributes.

Augustine

Thee do I long for, O righteousness and innocency, fair and comely to all virtuous eyes, and of a satisfaction that never palls! With thee is perfect rest, and life unchanging. He who enters into thee enters into the joy of his Lord, and shall have no fear, and shall do excellently in the most Excellent. I sank away from Thee, O my God, and I wandered too far from Thee, my stay, in my youth, and became to myself an unfruitful land. (C, 2.10.18 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.1)

Lord, have mercy on me and hear my desire. For I think that it is not of the earth, nor of gold and silver, and precious stones, nor gorgeous apparel, nor honors and powers, nor the pleasures of the flesh, nor necessities for the body and this life of our pilgrimage, all of which are added to those that seek Thy kingdom and Thy righteousness, (ibid., 11.3.4)

And who is this but Thee, our God, the sweetness and well spring of righteousness, who renderest "to every man according to his deeds," and a contrite heart! (ibid., 4.3.4).

The more we ardently love God, the more certainly and the more calmly do we see Him, and we behold in God the unchangeable form of righteousness according to which we judge that man ought to live (OTT, 8.9.13 in op. cit., 1.3).

Anselm

How do You spare the wicked if You are all just and supremely just? For how does the all just and supremely just One do something that is unjust? Or what kind of justice is it to give everlasting life to him who merits eternal death? How then, O good God, good to the good and to the wicked, how do You save the wicked if this is not just and You do not do anything which is not just? Or, since Your goodness is beyond comprehension, is this hidden in the inaccessible light in which You dwell? Truly in the deepest and most secret place of Your goodness is hidden the source whence the stream of Your mercy flows. For though You are all just and supremely just You are, however—precisely because You are all just and supremely just—also beneficent even to the wicked. You would, in fact, be less good if You were not beneficent to any wicked man. For he who is good to both good and wicked is better than he who is good only to the good. And he who is good to the wicked by both punishing and sparing them is better than he who is good to the wicked only by punishing them. You are merciful, then, because You are all-good and supremely good. (ACMW, 191)

Thomas Aquinas

It is impossible for God to will anything but what His wisdom approves. This is, as it were, His law of justice, in accordance with which His will is right and just. Hence, what He does according to His will He does justly: as we do justly what we do according to law. But whereas law comes to us from some higher power God is a law unto Himself. (ST, Ia.21.1)

God is sheer goodness, whereas other things are credited with the sort of goodness appropriate to their natures. Justice, for example, is defined with reference to one type of activity. God's being is identical with his acting; therefore for him to be good and to be just is one and the same. We do not touch this simplicity, our substance and our activity are distinct, and the goodness attributed to us because we exist is not identical with the goodness attributed to us because our dealings are fair.

Goodness is a general term, under which justice, and the other virtues, are special headings. God's is goodness at full strength, whereas not every type of goodness is discovered in other things, for the type varies from one to another. Though all are good in some way, not all possess the type of goodness called justice. Some are just, others have their different but appropriate kind of goodness. Yet all are good because they flow from the fount of goodness. God be praised through all things. (Exposition de Hebdomadibus, 5 in Gilby, TTA, 38–39)

The Reformation Theologians on God's Righteousness

The doctrine of God's justice came into bright focus during the Reformation, with its emphasis on justification by faith. As Paul put it in Romans 3, the question became how God could be just and still justify the unjust.

Martin Luther

“God standeth in His congregation and judgeth the gods; that is, He rebukes them. For He keeps the upper hand over them and the right to judge them” (WL, 4.295).

And,

if the Lord our God appoints anything for us, whether it is good or evil, brings weal or woe, is shame or honor, prosperity or adversity, I am to consider it not only good but actually sacred, and I am to say: This is a pure and precious blessing. I am not worthy to have it touch me. So says the prophet (Ps. 145:17): “The Lord is righteous in all His ways and holy in all His works.” If I give God praise for such matters and consider them good, holy, and excellent, I sanctify Him in my heart.

But those who consult books of law, complain that an injustice is being done them, and say God is asleep and will not help the just and restrain injustice—they dishonor Him and consider Him neither just nor holy. But whoever is a Christian should attribute justice to God and injustice to himself, should consider God holy and himself unholy, and should say that in all His deeds and works He is holy and just. This is what He requires.... If we sing Deo gratias and Te Deum laudamus and say, God be praised and blessed, when misfortune overtakes us, that is what Peter and Isaiah (8:12f.) call a true hallowing of the Lord. (WLS, 555–56)

John Calvin

The Scripture system of which we speak aims chiefly at two objects. The former is, that the love of righteousness, to which we are by no means naturally inclined, may be instilled and implanted into our minds. The latter is (see chapter 2) to prescribe a rule which will prevent us while in the pursuit of righteousness from going astray. It has numerous admirable methods of recommending righteousness. Many have been already pointed out in different parts of this work; but we shall here also briefly advert to some of them. With what better foundation can it begin than by reminding us that we must be holy, because “God is holy”? [Leviticus 19:1; 1 Peter 1:16] (ICR, 3.6.2).

Read this again:

Assuredly, the attributes which it is most necessary for us to know are these three: Loving kindness, on which alone our entire safety depends: Judgment, which is daily exercised on the wicked, and awaits them in a severer form, even for eternal destruction: Righteousness, by which the faithful are preserved, and most benignly cherished. The prophet declares, that when you understand these, you are amply furnished with the means of glorying in God. Nor is there here any omission of his truth, or power, or holiness, or goodness. For how could this knowledge of his loving kindness, judgment, and righteousness, exist, if it were not founded on his inviolable truth? (ibid., 1:10:2)

But though in every passage where the favour or anger of God is mentioned, the former comprehends eternity of life and the latter eternal destruction, the Law, at the same time, enumerates a long catalogue of present blessings and curses (Lev. 26:4; Deut. 28:1). The threatenings attest the spotless purity of God, which cannot bear iniquity, while the promises attest at once his infinite love of righteousness (which he cannot leave unrewarded), and his wondrous kindness. Being bound to do him homage with all that we have, he is perfectly entitled to demand everything which he requires of us as a debt; and as a debt, the payment is unworthy of reward. He therefore foregoes his right, when he holds forth reward for services which are not offered spontaneously, as if they were not due. (ibid., 1:8:4)

Jacob Arminius

The Justice of God, considered universally, is a virtue of God according to which He administers all things correctly and in a suitable manner, according to that which his Wisdom dictates as befitting Himself. In conjunction with Wisdom, it presides over all his acts, decrees and deeds: And according to it, God is said to be “just and right,” his way “equal,” and himself to be “just in all his ways.”

The particular Justice of God is that by which He consistently renders to every one his own: to God himself that which is His, and to the creature that which belongs to itself. We consider it both in the words of God and in his deeds. In this, the method of the decrees is not different; because whatever God does or says, he does or says it according to his own eternal decree. This Justice likewise contains a moderator partly of his love for the good of obedience, and partly of his love for the creature, and of his goodness. (WJA, 11:48)

The Post Reformation Teachers on God’s Righteousness

Jonathan Edwards

[About the resurrection], God willing the event was the most holy volition of God that ever was made known to men; and God’s act in ordering it was a divine act, which, above all others, manifests the moral excellency of the Divine Being. (WJE, 1.78)

Stephen Charnock

As we have seen,

Never did Divine holiness appear more beautiful and lovely than at the time our Saviour’s countenance was most marred in the midst of his dying groans. This himself acknowledges in that prophetic psalm [xxii. 1–2], when God had turned his smiling face from him, and thrust his sharp knife into his heart, which forced that terrible cry from him, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” He adores this perfection of his holiness.... In this his purity did sparkle, and his irreversible justice manifested that all those that commit sin are worthy of death; this was the perfect index of his “righteousness” [Rom. 3:25], that is, of his holiness and truth; then it was that God that is holy, was “sanctified in righteousness” [Isa. 5:16]. (EAG, 2.135)

John Miley

In every form and in the deepest sense God is righteous. Abraham apprehended this truth in his profound question, “Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” There was a special case in question; but there is no sense of a local or temporary limitation in the meaning of the words. There is a universal and eternal righteousness of the divine agency. “He is the Rock, his work is perfect; for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he.”

“Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth.” These texts express the same deep sense of an ever-present holiness in the divine moral government. “The law of the Lord is perfect”—perfect as the expression of this divine holiness; perfect therefore as the standard of right; perfect in its requirements; perfect in its sanctions. All this is summed into one sentence by St. Paul: “The law is holy and the commandment holy, and just, and good” [Rom. 7:12] (ST, 200).

William G. T. Shedd

It is here and thus that we can explain the blessedness of God in connection with his omniscience and omnipresence. We know that sin and the punishment of sin are ever before him.

The feeling of wrath against the wickedness of man and devils, is constantly in the Divine essence. Yet God is supremely and constantly blessed. He can be so, only because there is a just and proper harmony between the wrath and the object upon which it falls; only because he hates that which is hateful, and condemns what is damnable. Hence he is called “God over all [hell as well as heaven] blessed forever.” The Divine blessedness is not destroyed by the sin of his creatures, or by his own holy displeasure against it. And here, also, is seen the compatibility of some everlasting sin and misery with the Divine perfection. If the feeling of wrath against moral evil is right and rational, there is no impropriety in its exercise by the Supreme being, and its exercise by him is the substance of hell. If the feeling is proper for a single instant, it is so forever. (DT, 177–78)

J. I. Packer

[Anger] is, instead, a right and necessary reaction to objective moral evil. God is only angry where anger is called for. Even among humans, there is such a thing as righteous indignation, though it is, perhaps, rarely found. But all God’s indignation is righteous. Would a God who took as much pleasure in evil as he did in good be a good God? Would a God who did not react adversely to evil in his world be morally perfect? Surely not. But it is precisely this adverse reaction to evil, which is a necessary part of moral perfection, that the Bible has in view when it speaks of God’s wrath. (KG, 151)

God is the judge of all the earth, and he will do right, vindicating the innocent, if such there be, but punishing ... lawbreakers. God is not true to himself unless he punishes sin. And unless one knows and feels the truth of this fact, that wrongdoers have no natural hope of anything from God but retributive judgment, one can never share the biblical faith in divine grace, (ibid., 130–31)

God has resolved to be every person’s Judge, rewarding every person according to his works. Retribution is the inescapable moral law of creation; God will see that each person sooner or later receives what he deserves—if not here, then hereafter. This is one of the basic facts of life. And, being made in God’s image, we all know in our hearts that this is right. This is how it ought to be. (ibid., 143)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD’S RIGHTEOUSNESS

The primary objection to God’s righteousness is the doctrine of His grace. How can God justly save the unjust? The objection is penetrating, but the answer is profound.

Objection One—Based on Transferred Righteousness

According to Scripture, God punished the Righteous (Christ) for the unrighteous (sinners) and transferred His righteousness to our account (see Volume 3, chapter 9). This seems like an unrighteous (unjust) process: Why should the innocent be punished for the guilty, and why should the guilty receive the alien righteousness of Another?

Response to Objection One

This problem is answered in many passages of Scripture, the most succinct of which is Romans 3:21–26:

But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. There is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus.

In essence, the answer is this: God punished the Righteous (Christ) for the unrighteous, so that His righteousness (justice) could be satisfied (propitiated) and His mercy released to all who believe. So He can be both just and the Justifier of the unjust because His justice was satisfied, and so His grace can be freely exercised on all who receive His gift of salvation by faith (see Volume 3, chapter 9).

Humans Are Utterly Unrighteous

Measured by God's perfect righteousness, fallen human beings are wholly unrighteous. Our unrighteousness is universal (Rom. 3:10): As it is written, "There is no one righteous, not even one"; our righteousness is inadequate (Matt. 5:20): "For I tell you that unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven"; our unrighteousness is pervasive (Rom. 3:11–18); our righteousness is hopeless (Jer. 13:23): "Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard its spots? Neither can you do good who are accustomed to doing evil"; our righteousness is worthless (Isa. 64:6): "All of us have become like one who is unclean, and all our righteous acts are like filthy rags; we all shrivel up like a leaf, and like the wind our sins sweep us away"; our righteousness is helpless (cf. Titus 3:5–7).

Christ's Righteousness Is Perfect

In contrast to our utter unrighteousness, Christ's righteousness is completely perfect. He lived a perfect life (2 Cor. 5:21; Heb 4:15; 1 Peter 3:18; 1 John 3:3), and He fulfilled the demands of the law. Jesus said at His baptism: "Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (Matt. 3:15). Later He said He came to fulfill, not destroy, the righteous demands of the law: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17).

Christ's Righteousness Is Imputed to Believers

In addition to living a perfect life and fulfilling the righteous demands of the law, Christ's righteousness is transferred to believers:

For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit. (Rom. 8:3–4)

Paul added, “Since they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own, they did not submit to God’s righteousness. Christ is the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes” (Rom. 10:3–4).

Christ Satisfied God’s Righteous Demands on Our Behalf

Christ’s absolute righteousness alone satisfies (propitiates) the demands of an absolutely righteous God. The Greek term “propitiate” (hilasterion) is used only three times in the New Testament. John informs us that “He [Christ] is the atoning sacrifice [propitiation] for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world” (1 John 2:2). He adds, “This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice [propitiation] for our sins” (1 John 4:10). Thus, “God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement [propitiation], through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished” (Rom. 3:25).

Christ’s Righteousness Is Imputed Only to Believers

It is noteworthy from the preceding passage that the imputation of God’s righteousness to unrighteous human beings is not automatic; it is only “for everyone who believes.” As Paul said earlier, we are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus. Where, then, is boasting? It is excluded. On what principle? On that of observing the law? No, but on that of faith. (Rom. 3:24–27)

Jesus became a perfect substitute for our unrighteousness, for “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). As Peter put it, “Christ died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, to bring you to God” (1 Peter 3:18). So “by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast” (Eph. 2:8–9).

God imputed our unrighteousness to Christ that the gift of His righteousness might be imputed to us by faith.

For if, by the trespass of the one man [Adam], death reigned through that one man, how much more will those who receive God’s abundant provision of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life through the one man, Jesus Christ. Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. (Rom. 5:17–18)

to the man who does not work but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited [imputed] as righteousness. David says the same thing when he speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom God credits [imputes] righteousness apart from works. (Rom. 4:5–6)

Speaking of Abraham being justified by faith, Paul declared, “This is why ‘it was credited to him as righteousness’ ” (Rom. 4:22). So “The words ‘it was credited to him’ were written not for him alone, but also for us, to whom God will credit righteousness—for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead” (Rom. 4:23). Thus, believers are “found in him [Christ], not having a righteousness of [our] own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith” (Phil. 3:9).

How is this fair? It was voluntarily given and it must be voluntarily received. It is fair because God’s justice was satisfied so His mercy could be released.

Objection Two—Based on the Concept of Justice

As we have seen, justice is traditionally defined as “to each his due, or getting what one deserves.” If so, then the sinner deserves death (Rom. 6:23) and hell (Rev. 20:11–15). Those who believe are excused from this consequence; hence, it would seem that justice has not been satisfied.

Response to Objection Two

As pointed out in the previous response, justice has been satisfied—not by the sinner himself, but by his substitute, Christ. Therefore, while the just punishment due the sinner was not executed on him, it was taken up—fully—by the sinless Savior. This is what makes grace shine so brightly.

As Aquinas (1225–1274) put it,

God acts mercifully, not indeed by going against His justice, but by doing something more than justice; thus a man who pays another two hundred pieces of money, though owing him only one hundred, does nothing against justice, but acts liberally or mercifully. The case is the same with one who pardons an offense committed against him, for in remitting it he may be said to bestow a gift. Hence the Apostle calls remission a forgiving: “Forgive one another, as Christ has forgiven you” [Eph. 4:32]. Hence it is clear that mercy does not destroy justice, but in a sense is the fullness thereof. And thus it is said: “Mercy exalteth itself above judgment” [James 2:13] (ST, 1.21.3).

In addition, while it is unjust to charge another person for my crime, it is not unjust for them to voluntarily pay the fine. Christ was not charged by God with our crime—He paid it for us, but it was our crime and God charged us with it. Hence, rather than being immoral, a voluntary substitutionary atonement is the apex of morality. As Paul said,

Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5:7–8)

In short, God’s justice demands that all sin be punished, but not necessarily that all sinners be punished for their sin.

Further, since Christ was God (see chapter 12), in His case the one who demanded the penalty (God) was the One who paid it—the Judge atoned for the defendant. Like an earthly judge who takes off his robe, reaches into his wallet, and pays the fine for his child, the defendant, even so God did this for us—Christ’s death replaced our death sentence. Thus, by example, the complaint that it is unjust to pay the penalty for another’s sin vanishes (see Volume 3, chapter 10, for further discussion).

CONCLUSION

God's holiness designates His total and utter separation from all creation and evil. Holiness is both a metaphysical and a moral attribute: It refers to His absolute moral uniqueness as well as His total separateness from all creatures. As established above, in one sense holiness is an overall attribute of God that distinguishes Him from everything else that exists.

God's righteousness refers to His absolute justice or rightness. Righteousness is the intrinsic characteristic of God wherein He is the ultimate standard of just and right actions and because of which He must punish all unjust and evil acts.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

GOD'S JEALOUSY AND PERFECTION

Two more of God's moral attributes are jealousy and perfection. Admittedly, jealousy is a surprising attribute, yet it is one of only a few that the Bible declares is God's "name," a distinctive title of one of God's essential characteristics. In fact, this raises the unique problem (discussed below) as to why what is a sin for creatures is a moral attribute of God.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S JEALOUSY

The root meanings of the basic Old Testament word for "jealous" (kannaw) are "to be desirous of," "to be zealous about," "to be excited to anger over," and "to execute judgment because of."

The Bible speaks of man's jealousy ("zealous envy," "angry fury") in many places. It talks of being jealous of one's brother (Gen. 37:11); of having jealousy over a wife (Num. 5:14); of jealousy leading to rage (Prov. 6:34); of jealousy being as cruel as death (Song 8:6 NKJV); of jealousy and selfish ambition (James 3:16); and of Paul's jealous zeal for the church (2 Cor. 11:2—see below, under "An Objection to God's Jealousy").

As will be shown (in the texts cited below), jealousy is used of God in terms of His holy zeal and His angry wrath. God has holy zeal to protect His supremacy, and God has angry wrath on idolatry and other sins.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S JEALOUSY

God's jealousy can be understood by looking at its nature, its subject, and its object.

The Nature of God's Jealousy

God's jealousy carries the connotation of anger, fury, and wrath. Anger (Deut. 29:20): "The LORD will never be willing to forgive him; his wrath and zeal will burn against that man. All the curses written in this book will fall upon him, and the Lord will blot out his name from under heaven." Fury (Zech. 8:2): "This is what the Lord Almighty says: 'I am very jealous for Zion; I am burning with jealousy for her.'" Wrath (Isa. 42:13): "The LORD will march out like a mighty man, like a warrior he will stir up his zeal; with a shout he will raise the battle cry and will triumph over his enemies."

The Subject of God's Jealousy

God's jealousy is vented on images, idols, other gods, and other sins. Images (Ps. 78:58): "They angered him with their high places; they aroused his jealousy with their idols." Idols (1 Cor. 10:19–22): "Do I mean then that a sacrifice offered to an idol is anything, or that an idol is anything? No, but the sacrifices of pagans are offered to demons, not to God.... Are we trying to arouse the Lord's jealousy?" Other gods (Deut. 32:16): "They made him jealous with their foreign gods and angered him with their detestable idols." Other sins (1 Kings 14:22): "Judah did evil in the eyes of the Lord. By the sins they committed they stirred up his jealous anger more than their fathers had done."

The Object of God's Jealousy

The object of God's jealousy is first and foremost His own nature, then His name, His people (Israel), His land (the Holy Land), and His city (Jerusalem). His own nature (Ex. 34:14): "Do not worship any other god, for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God." His name (Ezek. 39:25): "Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will now bring Jacob back from captivity and will have compassion on all the people of Israel, and I will be zealous for my holy name." His people (Zech. 8:2): "This is what the LORD Almighty says: 'I am very jealous for Zion; I am burning with jealousy for her.'" His land (Joel 2:18): "Then the LORD will be jealous for his land and take pity on his people." His city (Zech. 1:14): "Proclaim this word: This is what the LORD Almighty says: 'I am very jealous for Jerusalem and Zion.'" "

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S JEALOUSY

A combination of other attributes forms the basis for God's jealousy. Foremost among these is God's holiness; God is particularly jealous about preserving His own uniqueness. Of course, all of God's attributes are unique and comprise the one infinite, absolutely perfect, and supreme God. The theological argument for God's jealousy can be formulated as follows:

- (1) God is unique and supreme (see His metaphysical attributes—chapters 2–12).
- (2) God is holy, loving, and morally perfect (see His moral attributes—chapters 13–17).
- (3) Hence, God is uniquely and supremely holy, loving, and morally perfect.
- (4) Whatever is supremely holy, loving, and perfect is to be preserved with the utmost zeal.
- (5) God's jealousy is His zeal to preserve His own holy supremacy.
- (6) Therefore, He is eminently justified in His jealousy. Indeed, it is essential to His very nature: His name is Jealous (Ex. 34:14).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S JEALOUSY

The Early Church Fathers on God's Jealousy

Although not one of the more noted attributes of God, His jealousy did not go unnoticed by the early church Fathers. There are considerable references to God's jealousy.

Justin Martyr

They sacrificed to demons whom they knew not; new gods that came newly up, whom their fathers knew not. Thou hast forsaken God that begat thee, and forgotten God that brought thee up. And the Lord saw, and was jealous, and was provoked to anger by reason of the rage of His sons and daughters.... They have moved Me to jealousy with that which is not God, they have provoked Me to anger with their idols; and I will move them to jealousy with that which is not a nation, I will provoke them to anger with a foolish people. For a fire is kindled from Mine anger, and it shall burn to Hades. (DJ, 119 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

Irenaeus

It is therefore one and the same God the Father who has prepared good things with Himself for those who desire His fellowship, and who remain in subjection to Him; and who has the eternal fire for the ringleader of the apostasy, the devil, and those who revolted with him, into which [fire] the Lord has declared those men shall be sent who have been set apart by themselves on His left hand. And this is what has been spoken by the prophet, "I am a jealous God, making peace, and creating evil things"; thus making peace and friendship with those who repent and turn to Him, and bringing [them to] unity, but preparing for the impenitent, those who shun the light, eternal fire and outer darkness, which are evils indeed to those persons who fall into them. (AH, 4.40.1 in ibid., I)

Tertullian

Even His severity then is good, because [it is] just: when the judge is good, that is just. Other qualities likewise are good, by means of which the good work of a good severity runs out its course, whether wrath, or jealousy, or sternness. For all these are as indispensable to severity as severity is to justice. The shamelessness of an age, which ought to have been reverent, had to be avenged. Accordingly, qualities which pertain to the judge, when they are actually free from blame, as the judge himself is, will never be able to be charged upon him as a fault. (FBAM, 2.216 in ibid., 3)

Cyprian

There is no ground, therefore, dearest brother, for thinking that we should give way to heretics so far as to contemplate the betrayal to them of that baptism, which is only granted to the one and only Church. It is a good soldier's duty to defend the camp of his general against rebels and enemies. It is the duty of an illustrious leader to keep the standards entrusted to him. It is written, "The Lord thy God is a jealous God" (EC, 72.10 in ibid., 5.787, 5).

The Medieval Fathers on God's Jealousy

Augustine

For Him doth “the friend of the bridegroom” sigh, having now the first-fruits of the Spirit laid up with Him, yet still groaning within himself, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of his body; to Him he sighs, for he is a member of the Bride; for Him is he jealous, for he is the friend of the Bridegroom; for Him is he jealous, not for himself; because in the voice of Thy “waterspouts,” not in his own voice, doth he call on that other deep, for whom being jealous he feareth, lest that, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in our Bridegroom, Thine only Son. (C, 13.13 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.1)

Ineffable is therefore that patience, as is His jealousy, as His wrath, and whatever there is like to these. For if we conceive of these as they be in us, in Him are there none. We, namely, cancel none of these without molestation: but be it far from us to surmise that the impassible nature of God is liable to any molestation. But like as He is jealous without any darkening of spirit, wroth without any perturbation, pitiful without any pain, repenteth Him without any wrongness in Him to be set right; so is He patient without aught of passion. (OP, 1 in ibid., 1:3)

Because “the Lord our God is a jealous God,” let us refuse, whenever we see anything of His with an alien, to allow him to consider it his own. For of a truth the jealous God Himself rebukes the woman who commits fornication against Him, as the type of an erring people, and says that she gave to her lovers what belonged to Him, and again received from them what was not theirs but His. In the hands of the adulterous woman and the adulterous lovers, God in His wrath, as a jealous God, recognizes His gifts; and do we say that baptism, consecrated in the words of the gospel, belongs to heretics? (BAD, 3.19.25 in ibid., 1:4)

The Reformation Leaders on God’s Jealousy

Martin Luther

“For Him Who once drowned the whole world in the Flood and sank Sodom with fire, it is a simple thing to slay or to defeat so many thousands of peasants. He is an almighty and terrible God” (WL, 4.226).

God says: “I the Lord thy God am jealous God.” Now, God is jealous in two manners of ways; first, God is angry as one that is jealous of them that fall from him, and become false and treacherous, that prefer the creature before the Creator; that build upon the favors of the great; that depend upon their friends, upon their own power—riches, art, wisdom, etc.; that forsake the righteousness of faith, and condemn it, and will be justified and saved by and through their own good works. God is also vehemently angry with those that boast and brag of their power and strength; as we see in Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who boasted of his great power, and thought utterly to destroy Jerusalem....

Secondly, God is jealous for them that love him and highly esteem his word; such God loves again, defends and keeps as the apple of his eye, and resists their adversaries, beating them back that they are not able to perform what they intended. Therefore, this word jealous comprehends both hatred and love, revenge and protection; for which cause it requires both fear and faith; fear, that we provoke not God to anger, or work his displeasure; faith, that in trouble we believe he will help, nourish, and defend us in this life, and will pardon and forgive us our sins, and for Christ’s sake preserve us to life everlasting. (TT, 135–36)

John Calvin

But though in every passage where the favour or anger of God is mentioned, the former comprehends eternity of life and the latter eternal destruction, the Law, at the same time, enumerates a long catalogue of present blessings and curses (Lev. 26:4; Deut. 28:1). The threatenings attest the spotless purity of God, which cannot bear iniquity, while the promises attest at once his infinite love of righteousness (which he cannot leave unrewarded), and his wondrous kindness. Being bound to do him homage with all that we have, he is perfectly entitled to demand everything which he requires of us as a debt; and as a debt, the payment is unworthy of reward. He therefore foregoes his right, when he holds forth reward for services which are not offered spontaneously, as if they were not due. (ICR, 1.8.4)

Jacob Arminius

Hatred is an affection of separation in God; whose primary object is injustice or unrighteousness; and the secondary, the misery of the creature: The former is from “the love of complacency”; the latter, from “the love of friendship.” But since God properly loves himself and the good of justice, and by the same impulse holds iniquity in detestation; and since he secondarily loves the creature and his blessedness, and in that impulse hates the misery of the creature, that is, He wills it to be taken away from the creature; hence it comes to pass, that He hates the creature who perseveres in unrighteousness, and He loves his misery. (WJA, 11.44)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God’s Jealousy

Jonathan Edwards

Those who come to Christ need not be afraid of God’s wrath for their sins; for God’s honor will not suffer by their escaping punishment and being made happy. The wounded soul is sensible that he has affronted the majesty of God, and looks upon God as a vindicator of his honor; as a jealous God that will not be mocked, an infinitely great God that will not bear to be affronted, that will not suffer his authority and majesty to be trampled on, that will not bear that his kindness should be abused. (WJE, 376)

For we see that when men come to be under convictions, and to be made sensible that God is not as they have heretofore imagined, but that he is such a jealous, sin-hating God, and whose wrath against sin is so dreadful, they are much more apt to have sensible exercises of enmity against him than before, (ibid., 1021)

William G. T. Shedd

There is a kind of wrath in the human soul that resembles the wrath of God, and constitutes its true analogue. It is the wrath of the human conscience, which is wholly different from that of the human heart. That kind of anger is commanded in the injunction “Be ye angry and sin not” (Eph. 4:26). Were this species of moral displacency more often considered, and the Divine anger illustrated by it, there would be less of the common and unthinking opposition to the doctrine of the Divine wrath. (DT, 176)

Stephen Charnock

God is a jealous God, very sensible of any disgrace, and will be as much incensed against an inward idolatry as an outward: that command which forbade corporeal images, would not indulge carnal imaginations; since the nature of God is as much wronged by unworthy images, erected in the fancy, as by statues carved out of stone or metals. (EAG, 1.198)

J. I. Packer

God's jealousy is not a compound of frustration, envy and spite, as human jealousy so often is, but appears instead as a [literally] praiseworthy zeal to preserve something supremely precious.

Zeal to protect a love relationship or to avenge it when broken [is a good sort of jealousy]. This jealousy also operates in the sphere of sex; there, however, it appears not as the blind reaction of wounded pride but as the fruit of marital affection. As Professor Taylor has written, married persons "who felt no jealousy at the intrusion of a lover or an adulterer into their home would surely be lacking in moral perception; for the exclusiveness of marriage is the essence of marriage" [The Epistle of James, 106]. This sort of jealousy is a positive virtue, for it shows a grasp of the true meaning of the husband-wife relationship, together with a proper zeal to keep it intact.... God's jealousy is of this kind; that is, as an aspect of his covenant love for his people. The Old Testament regards God's covenant as his marriage with Israel, carrying with it a demand for unqualified love and loyalty.

From these passages we see plainly what God meant by telling Moses that his name was "Jealous." He meant that he demands from those whom he has loved and redeemed utter and absolute loyalty, and he will vindicate his claim by stern action against them if they betray his love by unfaithfulness. (KG, 170–71)

AN OBJECTION TO GOD'S JEALOUSY

Objection One—Based on an Alleged Inconsistency

This objection points to an apparent inconsistency: Why is jealousy right for God but wrong for us? All other moral attributes of God we are asked to emulate: God is love, and we should be loving (1 John 4:19); God is holy, and we should be holy (Lev. 11:45). Why, then, if God is jealous, should we not also be jealous?

Response to Objection One

The answer to this objection is simple: There is no inconsistency; jealousy can be right sometimes and wrong at other times. Wrong jealousy for us is about being jealous for what does not belong to us. God cannot ever be jealous of what does not belong to Him, since He owns everything. Psalm 24:1 declares: "The earth is the Lord's, and everything in it, the world, and all who live in it." Deuteronomy 32:21 adds, "They made me jealous by what is no god and angered me with their worthless idols. I will make them envious by those who are not a people; I will make them angry by a nation that has no understanding."

Everything belongs to God, even the things He has entrusted to the care of others; hence, it is not right for us to be jealous about what is not ours. Jealousy, as such, is not evil; what is evil is being jealous about what is not ours. Therefore, there is no inconsistency in it being right for God to be jealous for our affection (which belongs to Him) and it being wrong for us.

Note, however, that not all jealousy is wrong for human beings—godly jealousy is right. For example, Paul's jealousy for the church was commendable. He wrote, "I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy. I promised you to one husband, to Christ, so that I might present you as a pure virgin to him" (2 Cor. 11:2). Likewise, there is nothing wrong with a husband having appropriate jealousy over his wife (or vice versa), since she belongs to him (cf. Num. 5:14) and he to her.

GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

Another attribute of God is that of absolute moral perfection. God is morally impeccable: He is not simply an infinite Being; He is an infinitely perfect Being.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

The English word perfect means “flawless” or “excellent.” There are several Hebrew words for “perfect”: tamim, meaning “complete,” “sound,” “blameless,” “perfect,” “without blemish”; shalem, meaning “complete,” “safe,” “blameless”; tam, which is rendered “complete,” “blameless,” “perfect”; omen, translated “perfect,” “faithful”; kalil, meaning “entire,” “whole,” “perfect”; and taman, which is expressed by words like “complete,” “finished,” and “blameless.”

The Greek words for “perfect” are teleios, which means “complete,” “perfect,” “mature”; teleioō, which bears the idea of “bringing to an end,” “completing,” “perfecting”; teleiotes, a kindred concept that can be rendered “completeness,” “perfection”; and katartizo, meaning “to complete,” “to perfect,” “to prepare.”

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

God is perfect in every way. “He is the Rock, his works are perfect, and all his ways are just. A faithful God who does no wrong, upright and just is he” (Deut. 32:4). “As for God, his way is perfect” (2 Sam. 22:31). “It is God who arms me with strength and makes my way perfect” (2 Sam. 22:33). “Do you know how the clouds hang poised, those wonders of him who is perfect in knowledge? (Job 37:16). “As for God, his way is perfect; the word of the LORD is flawless” (Ps. 18:30). “The law of the LORD is perfect, reviving the soul” (Ps. 19:7). “The LORD will fulfill [perfect] his purpose for me; your love, O LORD, endures forever—do not abandon the works of your hands” (Ps. 138:8). “O LORD, you are my God; I will exalt you and praise your name, for in perfect faithfulness you have done marvelous things, things planned long ago” (Isa. 25:1). “Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). “Then you will be able to test and approve ... God’s ... good, pleasing and perfect will” (Rom. 12:2). “When perfection comes, the imperfect disappears” (1 Cor. 13:10). “We proclaim him, admonishing and teaching everyone with all wisdom, so that we may present everyone perfect in Christ” (Col. 1:28). “Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows” (James 1:17). “The man who looks intently into the perfect law that gives freedom ... will be blessed in what he does” (James 1:25). “There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear” (1 John 4:18).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

That God is morally perfect can be derived from several theological premises.

Knowledge of the Imperfect Implies the Perfect

We know what is imperfect; however, we cannot know the not-perfect unless we know what is perfect—hence, there must be a Perfect (God). We cannot know a circle is imperfect unless we have an idea of a perfect one; likewise, moral imperfections cannot be detected unless we possess some idea of what moral perfection is.

God's Metaphysical Attributes Demand His Moral Perfection

It is granted that God is a moral Being. If He possesses moral characteristics, then He must possess them perfectly. The reasoning goes like this:

- (1) God's nature is morally perfect.
- (2) God is infinite, unchangeable, and necessary by nature.
- (3) Therefore, God is infinitely, unchangeably, and necessarily morally perfect.

God's Function As the Ultimate Moral Standard Demands His Moral Perfection

It is recognized that God is the ultimate standard for what is morally right: He is the ultimate Moral Lawgiver. The ultimate source of all moral perfection cannot be less than ultimately perfect; the ultimate measure of morality is by its very nature morally perfect. God can no less be perfect than a good yardstick can be less than three feet long.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

The Christian God has always been viewed as absolutely perfect, both morally and metaphysically. This is evident from the very beginning.

The Early Church Fathers on God's Moral Perfection

Justin Martyr

"God, the Father of the universe ... is perfect intelligence" (FLWR, I in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I). "Neither is there straitness with God, nor anything that is not absolutely perfect" (OFLWJ, 6 in ibid., I).

Clement of Alexandria

"Be perfect as the heavenly Father [is perfect]" (S, 12, 546).

Theophilus

For the sun is a type of God, and the moon of man. And as the sun far surpasses the moon in power and glory, so far does God surpass man. And as the sun remains ever full, never becoming less, so does God always abide perfect, being full of all power, and understanding, and wisdom, and immortality, and all good. But the moon wanes monthly, and in a manner dies, being a type of man; then it is born again, and is crescent, for a pattern of the future resurrection. (TA, 2.15 in op. cit., II)

Athenagoras

I pass over those who lacerate with knives and scourges of bones, and shall not attempt to describe all the kinds of demons; for it is not the part of a god to incite to things against nature.... But God, being perfectly good, is eternally doing good. (PC, 26 in ibid., II)

Tertullian

What new god is there, except a false one? Not even Saturn will be proved to be a god by all his ancient fame, because it was a novel pretense which some time or other produced even him, when it first gave him godship. On the contrary, living and perfect Deity has its origin neither in novelty nor in antiquity, but in its own true nature. Eternity has no time. It is itself all time. It acts; it cannot then suffer. It cannot be born, therefore it lacks age. (FBAM, 2.1.8 in ibid., III)

The Medieval Church Fathers on God's Moral Perfection

Augustine

“For certainly He would not be the perfect worker He is, unless His knowledge were so perfect as to receive no addition from His finished works” (CG, 11.21 in Schaff, NPNF, 1. II).

“Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect.” ... Moreover, the perfection of that mercy, wherewith most of all the soul that is in distress is cared for, cannot be stretched beyond the love of an enemy; and therefore the closing words are: “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect.” Yet in such a way that God is understood to be perfect as God, and the soul to be perfect as a soul. (SM, 1.21.69 in ibid., 1. VI)

Anselm

Anselm argued that since we know things that are more or less perfect, there must be a most Perfect by which we know this. Of all the things that exist, there is one nature that is supreme: It alone is self-sufficient in its eternal happiness, yet through its all-powerful goodness it creates and gives to all other things their very existence and their goodness.

Quite certain, indeed, and clear to all who are willing to see, is the following: take some things that are said to be (say) X, and relative to each other are said to be less, more, or equally X. It is through this X that they are said to be so, and this X is understood as the very same thing in the various cases and not something different in each case (whether X is considered to be in them equally or not equally).

Necessarily, therefore, everything beneficial or excellent is, if it is truly good, good through that same one thing, through which all good things necessarily are good, whatever that thing may be. And who would doubt that that through which all things are good is a great good?

In conclusion,

Because, then, it is that through which every good thing is good, it is good through itself. It therefore follows that all the other good things are good through something other than what they themselves are, while this thing alone is good through itself. But nothing that is good through something other than itself is equal to or greater than that good which is good through itself. The one thing, therefore, that is good through itself is the one thing that is supremely good. (ACMW, 11–13)

Thomas Aquinas

Aquinas also argued for a God of absolute perfection in his famous “Five Ways.” The fourth “way” states,

Among beings there are some more and some less good, true, noble, and the like. But more and less are predicated of different things according as they resemble in their different ways something which is the maximum [i.e., the Most Perfect]. (ST, Ia.2.3)

Later, Aquinas added,

Hence, the first active principle [God] must needs be most actual, and therefore most perfect. [For] matter as such is merely potential ... and thus most imperfect.... God is the first active principle, not material, but in the order of efficient cause, which must be most perfect. Hence, the first active principle [God] must needs be most actual, and therefore most perfect; for a thing is perfect in proportion to its state of actuality, because we call that perfect which lacks nothing of the mode of its perfection, (ibid., 1.4.1)

The Reformation Leaders on God's Moral Perfection

Martin Luther

God has given me prescriptions as to how I am to live and how I am to serve Him. Then I imagine that He also ought to live in that way. He lays down the Law here below but does not apply it to Himself above. It behooves no one except God to give laws and directions as to how we are to live and be pious; but I am not to lay down any law to God as to how He may rule the world or human beings. Therefore, think whatever you please, what God does is nonetheless right. (WLS, 745)

John Calvin

You shall therefore be perfect. This perfection does not mean equality, but relates solely to resemblance. However distant we are from the perfection of God, we are said to be perfect, as he is perfect, when we aim at the same object, which he presents to us in Himself. Should it be thought preferable, we may state it thus. There is no comparison here made between God and us: but the perfection of God means, first, that free and pure kindness, which is not induced by the expectation of gain—and, secondly, that remarkable goodness, which contends with the malice and ingratitude of men. (CC, 16.308)

It must be acknowledged, therefore, that in each of the works of God, and more especially in the whole of them taken together, the divine perfections are delineated as in a picture, and the whole human race thereby invited and allured to acquire the knowledge of God, and, in consequence of this knowledge, true and complete felicity. Moreover, while his perfections are thus most vividly displayed, the only means of ascertaining their practical operation and tendency is to descend into ourselves, and consider how it is that the Lord there manifests his wisdom, power, and energy—how he there displays his justice, goodness, and mercy. (ICR, 1.5.10)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God's Moral Perfection

Stephen Charnock

God is thus good, because his nature is infinitely perfect; he hath all things requisite to the completing of a most perfect and sovereign Being. All good meets in his essence, as all water meets in the ocean. Under this notion all the attributes of God, which are requisite to so illustrious a Being, are comprehended. (EAG, 2.217)

J. I. Packer

Goodness, in God as in human beings, means something admirable, attractive and praiseworthy. When the biblical writers call God good, they are thinking in general of all those moral qualities which prompt his people to call him perfect, and in particular of the generosity which moves them to call him merciful and gracious and to speak of his love.

Generosity means a disposition to give to others in a way which has no mercenary motive and is not limited by what the recipients deserve but consistently goes beyond it. Generosity expresses the simple wish that others should have what they need to make them happy. Generosity is, so to speak, the focal point of God's moral perfection; it is the quality which determines how all God's other excellencies are to be displayed. (KG, 161, 62)

The biblical judge is expected to love justice and fair play and to loathe all ill treatment of one person by another. An unjust judge, one who has no interest in seeing right triumph over wrong, is by biblical standards a monstrosity. The Bible leaves us in no doubt that God loves righteousness and hates iniquity, and that the ideal of a judge wholly identified with what is good and right is perfectly fulfilled in him. (ibid., 141)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S MORAL PERFECTION

Four main objections to God's moral perfection call for answers. The first is based on the problem of evil, and the second on an alleged fallacy. The third springs from a supposed incompatibility between the attributes of perfect love and perfect justice, and the fourth is founded on the idea that there is a need for a loving being to change.

Objection One—Based Upon Injustice in the World

Both theists and nontheists (except pantheists) agree that evil is real: There is real injustice in this world. But an all-perfect and all-powerful God would not allow any injustice; hence, there cannot be any such theistic God.

Response to Objection One

First, this argument, at best, does not disprove that God is morally perfect, for it has not addressed the possibility that God could be all-perfect but not all-powerful and, thus, not able to overcome all injustice. (This is what many finite godists believe.)

Second, if God is infinite in power, it is argued by neotheists that God did not know in advance what creatures would do with their freedom, and, hence, He did not foresee all this injustice. Since humans are free, God cannot eliminate all injustice without destroying all free will, yet this would be injustice, since He created them with free will.

Third, from a traditional theistic position, this objection does not follow for two reasons: For one thing, the in-just (not-just) implies the Just (i.e., God): One could not know there is an ultimate injustice in the world unless he had some ultimate standard of justice by which he could know it was ultimately unjust.

Fourth, for another, this objection overlooks an important fact: That there is present injustice does not mean there will be ultimate injustice. The biblical theist notes that the story is not over yet; a day of ultimate justice is coming (Rev. 20). If God is all-powerful, then He can overcome all injustice, and if He is all-just, He will overcome it. If He is all-perfect, God has the desire to overcome all evil, and if He is all-powerful, He can do it. One day He will.

Objection Two—Based Upon Alleged Incompatibility With Love

According to this objection, God cannot be both perfectly holy and perfectly loving, for a perfectly holy God must judge and condemn all sinners, while a perfectly loving God wants to save all sinners. Wrath flows from God's holiness, and blessing flows from His love. Aren't these incompatible? God cannot be both at the same time, or He would seem to violate the law of noncontradiction.

Response to Objection Two

God can be both completely just and perfectly loving at the same time, provided it is not on the same person at the same time. His wrath flowing from His holiness rests on all unrepentant sinners, and blessed acts flowing from His love on all repentant sinners. This is not contradictory, since it is manifest in the same persons at different times (before and after repentance). This does not mean there is a change in God, since He always consistently manifests wrath on unrepentant sinners, and He always consistently manifests love on the repentant. The only thing that changes is that the person (by repentance) moves from under one attribute to under another.

Further, God's attributes are tied together in one essence: God is holy love and loving holiness, each attribute complimenting the other. There is no contradiction in God's desiring the good of even those whom He must justly punish, for it is good to punish evil.

Objection Three—Based Upon the Supposed Impossibility of Having a Perfect Being

Many contemporary theologians reject God's absolute perfection because of what they call "the difficulties of a perfect being theology" (Pinnock, OG, 132). As the traditional reasoning is stated:

If God were to change, so the argument goes, then He would change either for the better or for the worse. But God cannot change for the better, since He is already perfect. And He cannot change for the worse, for this would mean that He would no longer be perfect. So God cannot change, (ibid., 131)

Some neotheists reject this argument, not because God is imperfect, but because they say that "it rests on the assumption that all change is either for the better or for the worse, an assumption that is simply false" (ibid., 132). As we have seen, they offer the "immutable watch" as a counterexample: It registers the same time day in and day out. By contrast, an "extremely accurate watch" always registers the correct time, even though it is constantly changing. When it changes, its change is not for the better or worse—it remains the same in its changes, namely, an extremely accurate watch.

Response to Objection Three

One way to respond to this objection is to point out that it contains a category mistake by comparing a changing thing with an unchanging Being. It only shows how one changing thing (the clock) is not better when it changes to another changing thing (time); it does not show that a changing God is better than an unchanging God.

Another way to pinpoint the error is to note that this argument begs the question in favor of a non-immutable view of God. The clock illustration does not tick if one assumes that God does not change, for in that case anything that represented Him as changing would be inaccurate.

Further, as we have seen, even the objection implies that God does not really change, for it asserts that whatever changes there are in God are "consistent with and/or required by a constant state of excellence” (ibid., 133, emphasis added). What is this “constant state of excellence” but the equivalent of an unchanging nature? Thus, in order to defend their view, neotheists fall back on the theistic view of an unchanging nature in God.

Finally, the objection presupposes that God must be perfect, for neo-theists speak of the possibility of an unchanging God suffering from “imperfection” (ibid., 132). How could one know God was imperfect unless he presupposed an absolute, unchanging standard of perfection (which they would have to say is God; otherwise, there would be something more ultimate than God, which is platonic dualism, not neotheism)?

Objection Four—Based Upon the Need for a Loving Being to Change

Objectors to God’s unchanging perfection argue that a truly loving God will change. They agree that God is perfect love: “The statement God is love is as close as the Bible comes to giving us a definition of the divine reality” (Pinnock, OG, 18). Again, “Love is the essence of the divine reality, the basic source from which all of God’s attributes arise” (ibid., 21).

Their argument for the necessity of change in a God of love goes like this:

- (1) God is essentially love.
- (2) Love, of necessity, involves the possibility of change.
- (3) Therefore, God’s love necessitates the possibility of change.

The crucial second premise is supported by showing that God’s love is a dynamic, interactive activity whereby God engages in a give-and-take activity with His creatures. Love suffers with the loved one (ibid., 46), and, hence, God cannot be impassible, as traditional theism affirms.

Response to Objection Four

At the start, one notices something strange about this objection to God’s unchangeableness—the very first premise begins with a God who cannot change. It affirms that God is “essentially” love. If God by His very essence is love and cannot be otherwise, then God cannot change in His nature. Indeed, neotheists admit the same when they affirm that “God’s essential nature and his ultimate purpose did not change” (Pinnock, OG, 28). The premise that “God cannot change in His essential nature as love” is not consistent with their conclusion from this premise that God must be able to change because He is love.

Also, once again, who said God has to love the way we love? To be sure, human love is changing, because human beings are changing beings. Theism affirms that God is an unchanging Being (see chapter 4) and, therefore, He must love in an unchanging way.

God can do whatever good we can do, but He does not do it in the way we do it. He does it in an infinitely better way than we do—an unchanging way. All theists insist that God is infinite, ontologically independent, uncreated, and transcendent. Even granted that God is infinite demands that He is and does things differently than finite beings do.

CONCLUSION

God possesses a holy jealousy and a morally perfect character. The former is what gives God zeal to protect and preserve His own holiness; the latter is the absolute moral perfection that pervades the character of God. These attributes are firmly grounded in Scripture, sound theological reasoning, and the history of the Christian church. All objections stated against these attributes fail; the attributes are internally consistent.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

GOD'S TRUTHFULNESS AND GOODNESS (LOVE)

God is not only absolutely truthful, but He is also all-good (omnibenevolent). It is impossible for Him to lie (Heb. 6:18), and He is love by His very nature (1 John 4:16).

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S TRUTHFULNESS

The Hebrew word for "truth" (emeth) means "firm," "stable," "faithful," "reliable," "correct." The Greek word for "truth" (aletheia) means "truthful," "dependable," "upright," "real." In brief, the term "truth," as used in Scripture, means that which, because it corresponds to reality (the facts, the original), is reliable, faithful, and stable. Used of words, truth is telling it like it is. True statements are those that correspond to reality and, hence, are dependable.

By contrast, falsehood is telling it like it is not (1 John 2:21) and, therefore, is not reliable. False expressions do not correspond to reality, and the devil is the father of all lies (John 8:44). Truth is absolute: God cannot lie (2 Cor. 1:18; Titus 1:2; Heb. 6:18), and His Word cannot pass away (Mark 13:31; cf. Ps. 117:2).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S TRUTHFULNESS

Many things are involved in God's truthfulness, but most fundamentally God is truth by His very nature. Creatures have truth, but God is truth, and He is truthful. Just a sampling of verses demonstrates the point.

"He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he" (Deut. 32:4 KJV). "God is not a man, that he should lie, nor a son of man, that he should change his mind. Does he speak and then not act? Does he promise and not fulfill?" (Num. 23:19). "He who is the Glory of Israel does not lie or change his mind; for he is not a man, that he should change his mind" (1 Sam. 15:29). "Into your hands I commit my spirit; redeem me, O LORD, the God of truth" (Ps. 31:5). "For the word of the LORD is right and true; he is faithful in all he does" (Ps. 33:4). "Jesus answered, 'I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me' " (John 14:6). "When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me" (John 15:26). "They tell how you turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God" (1 Thess. 1:9). "God did this so that, by two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we who have fled to take hold of the hope offered to us may be greatly encouraged" (Heb. 6:18). "This is how we recognize the Spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood" (1 John 4:6).

Because God is truthful, we can trust His promises (Ps. 89:35); we can be assured of our salvation (2 Tim. 2:13); we are protected (Ps. 91:4); we are saved (Eph. 1:13); we are sanctified (2 Thess. 2:13); we are liberated (John 8:32); we are established forever (Ps. 117:2); we should always speak the truth (Eph. 4:25); we should walk in His truth (Ps. 86:11); we should serve Him in truth (1 Sam. 12:24 NKJV); we should diligently study His truth (2 Tim. 2:15; John 17:17); we should worship Him in truth (John. 4:24); and we should pray to be led in truth (Ps. 25:4–5).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S TRUTHFULNESS

God’s absolute truthfulness follows from several of His other attributes. If God is truthful, then He must be absolutely truthful, for He can only be morally what His nature allows Him to be metaphysically.

God’s Truthfulness Follows From His Simplicity

If God is truthful, then He must be truthful in accordance with His nature. God is simple (indivisible) by nature; thus, God cannot be partly anything—whatever He is, that He must be totally and completely. Hence, God must be totally and completely truthful.

God’s Truthfulness Follows From His Immutability

If God is truthful, again, He must be truthful in accordance with His nature. God is immutable (unchangeable) by nature; hence, God must be unchangeably truthful. Indeed, the Bible declares that “if we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself (2 Tim. 2:13).

God’s Truthfulness Follows From His Infinity

God is also infinite (see chapter 5). Since He is truthful, it follows, then, that He must be infinitely truthful. Whoever is infinitely truthful is not partly truthful, but wholly and completely truthful.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS OF GOD’S TRUTHFULNESS

God’s absolute truthfulness is a hallmark of His moral nature. This has been recognized by Christian theologians down through the ages.

The Early Church Fathers on God’s Truthfulness

The patristic Fathers declared and defended the attribute of truthfulness in God. Polycarp, the disciple of John the apostle (who spoke of Jesus as the Truth—John 14:6), echoed his mentor’s reflections.

Polycarp

I give Thee thanks that Thou hast counted me worthy of this day and this hour, that I should have a part in the number of Thy martyrs, in the cup of thy Christ, to the resurrection of eternal life, both of soul and body, through the incorruption [imparted] by the Holy Ghost. Among whom may I be accepted this day before Thee as a fat and acceptable sacrifice, according as Thou, the ever-truthful God, hast foreordained, hast revealed beforehand to me, and now hast fulfilled. Wherefore also I praise Thee for all things, I bless Thee, I glorify Thee, along with the everlasting and heavenly Jesus Christ, Thy beloved Son, with whom, to Thee, and the Holy Ghost, be glory both now and to all coming ages. Amen. (EE, 14 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

Mathetes

As I said, this was no mere earthly invention which was delivered to them, nor is it a mere human system of opinion, which they judge it right to preserve so carefully, nor has a dispensation of mere human mysteries been committed to them, but truly God Himself, who is almighty, the Creator of all things, and invisible, has sent from heaven, and placed among men, [Him who is] the truth, and the holy and incomprehensible Word, and has firmly established Him in their hearts. (EMD, 7 in ibid., 1)

Ignatius

Since, also, there is but one unbegotten Being, God, even the Father; and one only-begotten Son, God, the Word and man; and one Comforter, the Spirit of truth; and also one preaching, and one faith, and one baptism; and one Church which the holy apostles established from one end of the earth to the other by the blood of Christ, and by their own sweat and toil; it behooves you also, therefore, as “a peculiar people, and a holy nation,” to perform all things with harmony in Christ. (EP, 5 in ibid., 1)

Justin Martyr

The word of His truth and wisdom is more ardent and more light-giving than the rays of the sun, and sinks down into the depths of heart and mind. Hence also the Scripture said, “His name shall rise up above the sun” (DJ, 12:2 in ibid.).

Irenaeus

They have fallen into error, too, respecting Zoe, by maintaining that she was produced in the sixth place, when it behooved her to take precedence of all [the rest], since God is life, and incorruption, and truth. And these and such like attributes have not been produced according to a gradual scale of descent, but they are names of those perfections which always exist in God, so far as it is possible and proper for men to hear and to speak of God. For with the name of God the following words will harmonize: intelligence, word, life, incorruption, truth, wisdom, goodness, and such like. (AH, 2:13:9 in ibid.)

The Shepherd of Hermas

Again he said to me, “Love the truth, and let nothing but truth proceed from your mouth, that the spirit which God has placed in your flesh may be found truthful before all men; and the Lord, who dwelleth in you, will be glorified, because the Lord is truthful in every word, and in Him is no falsehood.” They therefore who lie deny the Lord, and rob Him, not giving back to Him the deposit which they have received. For they received from Him a spirit free from falsehood. (C, 2:3 in ibid., 2)

Clement of Alexandria

Of the same sentiments is Plato, who somewhere alludes to God thus: "Around the King of all are all things, and He is the cause of all good things." Who, then, is the King of all? God, who is the measure of the truth of all existence. As, then, the things that are to be measured are contained in the measure, so also the knowledge of God measures and comprehends truth. And the truly holy Moses says: "There shall not be in thy bag a balance and a balance, great or small, but a true and just balance shall be to thee," deeming the balance and measure and number of the whole to be God. For the unjust and unrighteous idols are hid at home in the bag, and, so to speak, in the polluted soul. But the only just measure is the only true God, always just, continuing the selfsame; who measures all things, and weighs them by righteousness as in a balance, grasping and sustaining universal nature in equilibrium. (EH, 6 in ibid., 2)

The Medieval Fathers on God's Truthfulness

Augustine

I said, "Is Truth, therefore, nothing because it is neither diffused through space, finite, nor infinite?" And Thou criest to me from afar, "Yea, verily, 'I AM THAT I AM.'" And I heard this, as things are heard in the heart, nor was there room for doubt; and I should more readily doubt that I live than that Truth is not, which is "clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made" (C, 7.10).

It is, therefore, because we are men, created in the image of a Creator, whose eternity is true, His truth eternal, His love both eternal and true, a Creator who is the eternal, true, and lovable Trinity in whom there is neither confusion nor division, that, wherever we turn among the things which He created and conserved so wonderfully, we discover His footprints, whether lightly or plainly impressed.

The holy angels gain knowledge of God not by the spoken word but by the presence in their souls of that immutable Truth which is the only-begotten Word of God. They know this Word and the Father and their Holy Spirit, understanding that this Trinity is indivisible and that each of the Persons is substantial, although there are not three Gods but only one. (CG, 11.28, 11.29)

Anselm

You are this good, O God the Father; this is Your Word, that is to say, Your Son. For there cannot be any other than what You are, or any thing greater or lesser than You, in the Word by which You utter Yourself. For Your Word is as true as You are truthful and is therefore the very truth that You are and that is not other than You. (ACMW, 100)

Have you found, O my soul, what you were seeking? You were seeking God, and you found Him to be something which is the highest of all, than which a better cannot be thought, and to be life itself, light, wisdom, goodness, eternal blessedness and blessed eternity, and to exist everywhere and always. If you have not found your God, how is He this which you have found, and which you have understood with such certain truth and true certitude? But if you have found [Him], why is it that you do not experience what you have found? Why, O Lord God, does my soul not experience You if it has found You? Or has it not found that which it has found to be the light and the truth? But then, how did it understand this save by seeing the light and the truth? Could it understand anything at all about You save through "Your light and Your truth" [Ps. 43:3]? If, then, it saw the light and the truth, it saw You. If it did not see You then it did not see the light or the truth, (ibid., 98)

Thomas Aquinas

As said above, truth is found in the intellect according as it apprehends a thing as it is; and in things according as they have being conformable to an intellect. This is to the greatest degree found in God. For His being is not only conformed to His intellect, but it is the very act of His intellect; and His act of understanding is the measure and cause of every other being and of every other intellect, and He Himself is His own existence and act of understanding. Whence it follows not only that truth is in Him, but that He is truth itself, and the sovereign and first truth. (ST, Ia. 16, 5)

The Reformation Leaders on God's Truthfulness

Martin Luther

God seems as though he had dealt inconsiderately in commanding the world to be governed by the Word of Truth, especially since he has clothed and hooded it with a poor, weak, and condemned Word of the cross. For the world will not have truth, [but] lies. (TT, 45)

Truly, in this case, we must not only be well armed with God's Word and versed therein, but must have also certainty of the doctrine, or we shall not endure the combat. A man must be able to affirm, I know for certain, that what I teach is the only Word of the high Majesty of God in heaven, his final conclusion and everlasting, unchangeable truth, and whatsoever concurs and agrees not with this doctrine, is altogether false, and spun by the devil. I have before me God's Word, which cannot fail, nor can the gates of hell prevail against it; thereby will I remain, though the whole world be against me. (ibid., 22)

John Calvin

We must go, I say, to the Word, where the character of God, drawn from his works, is described accurately and to the life; these works being estimated, not by our depraved judgment, but by the standard of eternal truth. (ICR, 1.6.3)

Therefore, in reading profane authors, the admirable light of truth displayed in them should remind us, that the human mind, however much fallen and perverted from its original integrity, is still adorned and invested with admirable gifts from its Creator. If we reflect that the Spirit of God is the only fountain of truth, we will be careful, as we would avoid offering insult to him, not to reject or condemn truth wherever it appears. In despising the gifts, we insult the Giver, (ibid., 2.2.15)

In the first place, we must consider what an oath is. An oath, then, is calling God to witness that what we say is true. Execrations being manifestly insulting to God, are unworthy of being classed among oaths. That an oath, when duly taken, is a species of divine worship, appears from many passages of Scripture.... Swearing by the name of the Lord here means that they will make a profession of religion. In like manner, speaking of the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, it is said, "He who blesseth himself in the earth shall bless himself in the God of truth: and he that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth" [Isaiah 65:16] (ibid., 2.8.23).

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God's Truthfulness

The concept of God's unswerving truth did not change in the writings of those of the post-Reformation period. They too saw it as the Gibraltar of God's character.

Jacob Arminius

Justice in Words is also threefold: (1) Truth, by which He always enunciates or declares exactly as the thing which is opposed to falsehood. (2) Sincerity and Simplicity, by which He always declares as He inwardly conceives, according to the meaning and purpose of His mind; to which are opposed hypocrisy and duplicity of heart. And (3) Fidelity, by which He is constant in keeping promises and in communicating privileges; to which are opposed inconstancy and perfidy. (WJA, 351)

“He is as unchangeable in his essence as in his veracity and faithfulness: they are perfections belonging to his nature” (EAG, 1.187).

Charles Hodge

The true, therefore, is, (1) That which is real, as opposed to that which is fictitious or imaginary. Jehovah is the true God, because He is really God, while the gods of the heathen are vanity and nothing, mere imaginary beings, having neither existence nor attributes. (2) The true is that which completely comes up to its idea, or to what it purports to be. A true man is a man in whom the idea of manhood is fully realized. The true God is He in whom is found all that the Godhead imports. (3) The true is that in which the reality exactly corresponds to the manifestation. God is true, because He really is what He declares Himself to be; because He is what He commands us to believe Him to be; and because all His declarations correspond to what really is. (4) The true is that which can be depended upon, which does not fail, or change, or disappoint. In this sense also God is true as He is immutable and faithful. His promises cannot fail; His word never disappoints. His word abideth forever. When our Lord says, “Thy word is truth,” He says that all that God has revealed may be confided in as exactly corresponding to what really is, or is to be. His word can never fail, though heaven and earth pass away.

The truth of God, therefore, is the foundation of all religion. It is the ground of our assurance that what He has revealed of Himself and of His will, in His works and in the Scriptures, may be relied upon. He certainly is, and wills, and will do, whatever He has thus made known. It is no less the foundation of all knowledge. That our senses do not deceive us; that consciousness is trustworthy in what it teaches; that anything is what it appears to us to be; that our existence is not a delusive dream, has no other foundation than the truth of God. In this sense, all knowledge is founded on faith, i.e., the belief that God is true. (ST, 1.436–37)

William G. T. Shedd

Again, God cannot do anything inconsistent with the perfection of the Divine nature. Under this category, fall the instances mentioned in Heb. 6:18, “It is impossible for God to lie”; and 2 Tim. 2:13, “He cannot deny himself”; and James 1:13, “God cannot be tempted.” God cannot sin: (a) Because sin is imperfection, and it is contradictory to say that a necessarily perfect Being may be imperfect, (b) God cannot sin, because he cannot be tempted to sin, and sinning without temptation or motive to sin is impossible. God cannot be tempted, because temptation implies a desire for some good that is supposed to be greater than what is already possessed. But God cannot see anything more desirable than what he already has; and his understanding is infallible, so that he cannot mistake an apparent for a real good. (DT, 360)

John Miley

Veracity is the source of truthfulness in expression, whether in the use of words or in other modes. It is deeper than mere intellect; deep as the moral nature. With all true moral natures veracity is felt to be a profound obligation. Veracity is revered, while falsehood, deceit, hypocrisy are abhorred. In the truest, deepest sense of veracity there is profound moral feeling. The divine veracity is more than truthfulness of expression from absolute knowledge; it is truthfulness from holy feeling. As God solemnly enjoins truthfulness upon men, and severely reprehends its violation, in whatever forms of falsehood or deceit, so his words and ways ever fulfill the requirements of the most absolute veracity. (ST, 210)

J.I. Packer

“All your commands are true” [Ps. 119:151]. Why are they so described? First, because they have stability and permanence as setting forth what God wants to see in human lives in every age; second, because they tell us the unchanging truth about our own nature. For this is part of the purpose of God’s law; it gives a working definition of true humanity. It shows us what we were made to be, and teaches us how to be truly human, and warns us against moral self-destruction. (KG, 114)

He never becomes less truthful, or merciful, or just, or good than he used to be. The character of God is today, and always will be, exactly what it was in Bible times, (ibid., 78)

That is why his words to us are true, and cannot be other than true. They are the index of reality: they show us things as they really are, and as they will be for us in the future according to whether we heed God’s word to us or not. (ibid., 113)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD’S TRUTHFULNESS

The most important objections to God’s absolute truthfulness come from instances in the Bible where God is alleged to approve of actions that appear to be less than completely truthful.

Objection One—Based on Samuel’s Alleged Partial Truth

If God is totally truthful, then why did He tell Samuel to utter a partial truth? He instructed Samuel to give only part of the truth when He said to tell Saul that he had come to offer a sacrifice (1 Sam. 16:1–3). In fact, he had also come to anoint David to be king.

Response to Objection One

What God told Samuel to say was completely truthful, not partly truthful. He did come to offer a sacrifice. Saul never asked him, and he never answered the question, as to whether Samuel had any other purposes for his trip there. That God does not condone partial truths that directly imply a falsehood is clear from His condemnation of Abraham when he asked Sarah to say she was his “sister.” She was his half-sister, but answering the question this way led the king of Egypt to believe she was not his wife, which is what he wanted to know. So in implying she was not Abraham’s wife, Sarah lied.

Objection Two—Based on God’s Commanding Lying Spirits

In 1 Kings, God ordered lying spirits (demons) to lie to king Ahab (1 Kings 22:19–22). How can a God of absolute truth ever condone a lie? It is contrary to His very nature.

Response to Objection Two

God does not and cannot condone a lie as such, for lying is contrary to His nature, and He cannot condone what is contrary to His very nature (Heb. 6:18). But God did not command or condone this lie; He simply permitted it and used it to accomplish His sovereign will. He knew this spirit would lie, and He knew this would accomplish His sovereign purpose to a good, namely, to judge wicked King Ahab. As Joseph said to his brothers who had sold him into slavery, “You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives” (Gen. 50:20). So God uses evil to accomplish His purposes, but He does not promote evil; He simply permits it to produce a greater good.

Objection Three—Based on God’s Condoning the Midwives’ Lie

In Exodus 1:15–22, the pharaoh commanded the Hebrew midwives to kill all male babies. They not only refused, but they also lied about it to the king when he inquired (vv. 17, 19). Verse 20 says, “So God was kind to the midwives and the people increased and became even more numerous.” Thus, it appears that God condoned their lie.

Response to Objection Three

Scholars differ on how to interpret this passage. Some claim that God blessed the midwives for their refusal to kill the children but not for their lie. They claim God blessed them, like Rahab (Josh. 2), in spite of but not because of their lie.

Other scholars claim that God does not condone this or any other lie, even in a conflict situation; rather, we ought to do the lesser evil (of lying) and then confess our sin to God. However, it is difficult to make any sense out of a view that says we have a moral obligation to do what is not moral. Further, Jesus faced all kinds of evil situations, yet He never sinned. If sin is unavoidable in this kind of scenario, then Jesus sinned (while the Bible declares He did not). If He did not face extremely difficult situations, then He could not be our complete moral example, since we would then not have His example to follow.

It would seem better to argue that in unavoidable conflicts, we should suspend our obligation to keep the lower command in view of our overriding obligation to keep the higher one (see Geisler, CE, chapter 7). Thus, in the case of the midwives, mercy-showing was a greater duty than truth-telling. For example, if an angry neighbor asks you to return the gun you had borrowed so that he can kill his wife, your duty to save her life takes precedence over your obligation to return his property. In either way of viewing this situation, God never condones telling a lie as such: It is only when there is a higher duty to another attribute of God (like mercy) that one’s duty to tell the truth is suspended. And even in this case, the conflict is not in God (His attributes are all harmonious); it is in this finite fallen world.

Objection Four—Based on Progressive Revelation

According to the doctrine of progressive revelation, God does not reveal all His truth at once, but only part at a time, progressively, over a period of time (see Geisler, “RP” in BECA). For example, God did not reveal explicitly from the very beginning the doctrine of the Trinity: He first revealed that He was one (cf. Deut. 6:4) and then later that there are three persons in this one God (cf. Matt. 28:18–20). The same is true about God’s plan of salvation; it was unveiled only a piece at a time from the beginning (from Gen. 3:15 to John 3:16).

Response to Objection Four

Revealing only part of the truth is not necessarily a lie. At no time in this progressive revelation did God affirm what was false. All that He said was true, but He did not say all from the very beginning. He told the whole truth about part of what He wanted to reveal, but He never revealed the whole of what He wanted to say at once.

Objection Five—Based on Divine Accommodation

According to the doctrine of divine accommodation, God adapts Himself to human finitude in order to communicate with us effectively. For example, He uses metaphors and figures of speech that are not true literally so that we can understand Him better; as we have seen, portraying God with hands, eyes, and arms is an example. God does not actually have these bodily parts, since He is a pure Spirit (John 4:24), but God accommodates Himself to us in these terms. Yet if God is not really this way, then how can His accommodation avoid the charge of being less than fully truthful?

Response to Objection Five

There is a significant difference between God's adapting to our finitude and His accommodating to error; He does the former, but not the latter. For instance, there is a big difference between a parent (1) telling the "stork story" to a small child and (2) only telling part of the truth when the child first asks where babies come from and the mother says, "From my tummy." In a kind of progressive revelation, the mother may some years later explain how the baby gets inside her by saying, "Daddy placed a seed there," and so on. Each revelation is only part of the whole truth, but each is wholly true. This is in contrast to the stork story, which is wholly false in any literal sense of the term.

Further, anthropomorphisms and figures of speech are appropriate forms of divine communication because they convey a literal truth: While they are not true literally; they are literally true. For example, when Jesus said, "I am the Vine," He was not literally a vine. However, it is literally true that He is the source of our spiritual nourishment. Even "God is a rock," while not true literally, is literally true when it is realized that God is the rocklike, firm, solid basis for our lives (see Volume 1, chapter 9, for an explanation of analogy). In short, there is nothing false about divine adaptation to finitude in metaphors and figures of speech. What they convey is literally true, even though it is not intended that they be taken as true literally, but only figuratively.

GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE (ALL-LOVINGNESS)

One of the best-known moral attributes of God is His love. Some theologians stress God's love to the neglect of His holiness and justice; others diminish it by limiting it to only some people. The former tend toward universalism, while the latter use it as a basis for particularism, i.e., limited atonement (see Volume 3).

It is debated by orthodox theologians whether goodness and love are the same thing or whether they are different. And, if different, whether love is an attribute of God or an activity of God. Some hold that goodness is an attribute of God and that love is an act of His goodness. But 1 John 4:16 says God is love, seemingly applying the term to His essence.

DEFINITION OF GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE

If “love” is defined as “willing the good of its object,” then for all practical purposes “love” and “goodness” can be treated synonymously. Literally, the word omnibenevolent means “all-good.” Biblically, the basic Hebrew term for “love” (chesed) used of God means “goodness,” “affection,” “good-will,” “loving-kindness” or “tender loving-kindness.” The Greek word agape used of God’s love means “benevolence,” a self-less “sacrificial” love. Theologically, God’s omnibenevolence refers to His infinite or unlimited goodness.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE

The biblical basis for God’s omnibenevolence is widespread: “Yet the Lord set his affection on your forefathers and loved them, and he chose you, their descendants, above all the nations, as it is today” (Deut. 10:15). “For I, the LORD, love justice; I hate robbery and iniquity” (Isa. 61:8). “In all their distress he too was distressed, and the angel of his presence saved them. In his love and mercy he redeemed them” (Isa. 63:9). “The LORD appeared to us in the past, saying: ‘I have loved you with an everlasting love; I have drawn you with loving-kindness’ ” (Jer. 31:3). “The LORD said to me, ‘Go, show your love to your wife again, though she is loved by another and is an adulteress. Love her as the LORD loves the Israelites’ ” (Hosea 3:1). “I led them with cords of human kindness, with ties of love; I lifted the yoke from their neck and bent down to feed them” (Hosea 11:4). “The LORD your God is with you, he is mighty to save. He will take great delight in you, he will quiet you with his love, he will rejoice over you with singing” (Zeph. 3:17).

“But love your enemies, do good to them, and lend to them without expecting to get anything back” (Luke 6:35). “For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life” (John 3:16). “God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us” (Rom. 5:5). “But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8). “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? ... For I am convinced that neither death nor life ... nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:35–39). “Christ’s love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died” (2 Cor. 5:14). “But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ” (Eph. 2:4–5). [Paul prayed] “that you may know this love that surpasses knowledge—that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God” (Eph. 3:19). “Live a life of love, just as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us as a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God” (Eph. 5:2). “But when the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared, he saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy” (Titus 3:4). “How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!” (1 John 3:1). “This is how we know what love is: Jesus Christ laid down his life for us. And we ought to lay down our lives for our brothers” (1 John 3:16). “Dear friends, let us love one another, for love comes from God” (1 John 4:7). “Whoever does not love does not know God, because God is love” (1 John 4:8). “This is how God showed his love among us: He sent his one and only Son into the world that we might live through him” (1 John 4:9). “This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins” (1 John 4:10). “And so we know and rely on the love God has for us. God is love. Whoever lives in love lives in God, and God in him” (1 John 4:16).

Then, of course, there is the greatest description of love in the Bible—1 Corinthians 13:

If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am only a resounding gong or a clanging cymbal. If I have the gift of prophecy and can fathom all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have a faith that can move mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. If I give all I possess to the poor and surrender my body to the flames, but have not love, I gain nothing. Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres. Love never fails.... And now these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE

God's omnibenevolence is logically connected to several of His metaphysical attributes. Granted that love is a characteristic of God, as the above verses demonstrate, He must be all-loving.

God's Infinity Implies Omnibenevolence

God is infinite in His essence, and love is of the essence of God. Therefore, God is infinite love: His love can no more be limited than His nature, and His nature is unlimited.

God's Simplicity Implies Omnibenevolence

Again, love is of the essence of God (1 John 4:16), and God is simple in His essence; that is, He is indivisible, having no parts. Thus, God cannot be partly anything: Whatever a simple Being is, it is wholly and completely. Hence, God must be wholly and completely love.

God's Necessity Implies Omnibenevolence

God's necessity (see chapter 3) implies that He is all-loving, for a necessary Being is what it is necessarily. God is love; therefore, God necessarily is love—He cannot not love. God by His very nature must love.

Some Implications of God's Omnibenevolence.

A number of important implications follow from the omnibenevolence of God; two are worth noting here. One is related to His omnipotence, and the other to the extent of salvation.

Implications for the Doctrine of Irresistible Grace

All Calvinists believe in some form of irresistible grace: Strong Calvinists believe grace is irresistible on the unwilling, and moderate Calvinists believe it is irresistible on the willing (see Volume 3, chapter 3). But in view of God's omnibenevolence, it follows that grace cannot be irresistible on the unwilling, for a God of complete love cannot force anyone to act against his will. Forced love is intrinsically impossible: A loving God can work persuasively, but not coercively.

Implications for Universalism

Another implication of God's omnibenevolence is that it renders universalism untenable, for in spite of the fact that an omnipotent God can do whatever is possible, an omnibenevolent God will only do what is moral. And it is not morally right to force moral beings against their will. God wants all to be saved, but it is not possible morally to save people against their will (by irresistible grace on the unwilling). Hence, there is no guarantee that all people will be saved. God can only save the willing; His omnibenevolence will not allow Him to do everything His omnipotence could otherwise do (see Volume 3, chapter 13).

On the other hand, if strong Calvinism is correct, and God can force people by irresistible grace to be saved, then the only way they can avoid universalism is to deny that God is omnibenevolent. If God can save anyone He wants to save, even apart from free choice, and if God really loves all and wants all to be saved, then all will be saved (universalism). Thus, the only true way to avoid universalism is to insist that God is all-loving and, as such, cannot coerce free choices, because it is contradictory to do so, and God cannot do what is contradictory.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE

Church history gives abundant testimony to God's omnibenevolence. This is true of every period, beginning with the patristic Fathers.

The Early Church Fathers on God's Omnibenevolence

Mathetes

For God, the Lord and Fashioner of all things, who made all things, and assigned them their several positions, proved Himself not merely a friend of mankind, but also long-suffering [in His dealings with them]. Yea, He was always of such a character, and still is, and will ever be, kind and good, and free from [unjustified] wrath, and true, and the only one who is [absolutely] good; and He formed in His mind a great and unspeakable conception, which He communicated to His Son alone. (EMD, 8 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

Justin Martyr

Therefore we must confess that He, who is ever the same, has commanded these and such like institutions on account of sinful men, and we must declare Him to be benevolent, foreknowing, needing nothing, righteous and good. (DJ in ibid., 1.389)

Clement of Alexandria

"God himself is love" (ibid., 2.1218).

It is then now clear to us, from what has been said, that the beneficence of God is eternal, and that, from an unbeginning principle, equal natural righteousness reached all, according to the worth of each several race, never having had a beginning. For God did not make a beginning of being Lord and Good, being always what He is. Nor will He ever cease to do good, although He bring all things to an end. And each one of us is a partaker of His beneficence, as far as He wills. For the difference of the elect is made by the intervention of a choice worthy of the soul, and by exercise. (S, 5.14 in ibid., II)

Theophilus

You will say, then, to me, “Do you, who see God, explain to me the appearance of God?” Hear, O man. The appearance of God is ineffable and indescribable, and cannot be seen by eyes of flesh. For in glory He is incomprehensible, in greatness unfathomable, in height inconceivable, in power incomparable, in wisdom unrivaled, in goodness inimitable, in kindness unutterable.... For if I say He is Light, I name but His own work; if I call Him Word, I name but His sovereignty; if I call Him Mind, I speak but of His wisdom; if I say He is Spirit, I speak of His breath; if I call Him Wisdom, I speak of His offspring; if I call Him Strength, I speak of His sway; if I call Him Power, I am mentioning His activity; if Providence, I but mention His goodness; if I call Him Kingdom, I but mention His glory; if I call Him Lord, I mention His being judge; if I call Him Judge, I speak of Him as being just; if I call Him Father, I speak of all things as being from Him; if I call Him Fire, I but mention His anger. (TA, 1:4 in ibid., III)

Tertullian

“We first of all indeed know God Himself by the teaching of Nature, calling Him God of gods, taking for granted that He is good” (C, 1.4.6 in ibid., III). “And as God is good, He so loves infants as to have blessed the midwives in Egypt, when they protected the infants of the Hebrews which were in peril from Pharaoh’s command” (FBAM, 4.23 in ibid.).

Origen

“This just and good God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Himself gave the law and the prophets, and the Gospels, being also the God of the apostles and of the Old and New Testaments” (DP, preface 4.1 in ibid., 4).

Are we to suppose that that Providence which in the sacred Scriptures has ministered to the edification of all the Churches of Christ, had no thought for those bought with a price, for whom Christ died; whom, although His Son, God who is love spared not, but gave Him up for us all, that with Him He might freely give us all things? (DP, 414 in ibid.)

The Medieval Fathers on God’s Omnibenevolence

During the Middle Ages, Christian thinkers undergirded the love of God with a strong metaphysical structure. They grounded it in His necessity, unchangeability, and infinity.

Augustine

There is, accordingly, a good which alone is simple and, therefore, which alone is unchangeable—and this is God. This good has created all goods; but these are not simple and, therefore, they are mutable. They were created, I repeat, that is, they were made, not begotten. For, what is begotten of the simple good is likewise simple and is what the Begetter is. These two we call the Father and the Son and, together with their Spirit, are one God. (CG, 11.10)

Aught else except Thee there was not whence Thou mightest create these things, O God, One Trinity, and Triune Unity; and, therefore, out of nothing didst Thou create heaven and earth—a great thing and a small—because Thou art Almighty and Good, to make all things good, even the great heaven and the small earth. Thou wast, and there was nought else from which Thou didst create heaven and earth; two such things, one near unto Thee, the other near to nothing—one to which Thou shouldest be superior, the other to which nothing should be inferior. (C, 12.7)

Anselm

Again,

What then are You, Lord God, You than whom nothing greater can be thought? But what are You save that supreme being, existing through Yourself alone, who made everything else from nothing? For whatever is not this is less than that which can be thought of but this cannot be thought about You. What goodness, then, could be wanting to the supreme good, through which every good exists? Thus You are just, truthful, happy, and whatever it is better to be than not to be—for it is better to be just rather than unjust, and happy rather than unhappy.

That there is only one God and not several, we easily establish because either God is not the supreme good, or there are several supreme goods, or there is one sole God and not several. And no one denies that God is the supreme good, since anything less than something is in no way God, and anything not the supreme good is less than something, since it is less than the supreme good. The supreme good surely does not allow that there be duplication of itself, so that there be several supreme goods. For if there are several supreme goods, they are equal. But the supreme good is the good that surpasses other goods, so that it has neither an equal nor anything that surpasses it. Therefore, there is one and only one supreme good. Therefore, there is one and only one God and not several gods, just as there is one and only one supreme good, and as there is one and only one supreme substance or essence or nature (which the same argument as in the case of the supreme good proves cannot be in any way affirmed of several things). (ACMW, 89, 248)

Thomas Aquinas

“And when it is said, None is good but God alone, this is to be understood of essential goodness” (ST, Ia.6.2).

He is not directed to anything else as to an end, but is Himself the last end of all things. Hence it is manifest that God alone has every kind of perfection by His own essence; therefore He Himself alone is good essentially, (ibid., Ia.6.3)

God loves all existing things. For all existing things, insofar as they exist, are good; since the existence of a thing is itself a good; and likewise, whatever perfection it possesses. Now it has been shown above [Q. 19, A. 4] that God’s will is the cause of all things. It must needs be, therefore, that a thing has existence, or any kind of good, only inasmuch as it is willed by God. To every existing thing, then, God wills some good. Hence, since to love anything is nothing else than to will good to that thing, it is manifest that God loves everything that exists, (ibid., Ia.20.2)

For good is attributed to God inasmuch as all desired perfections flow from Him as from the first cause. They do not, however, flow from Him as from a univocal agent ... but as from an agent which does not agree with its effects either in species or genus.... Therefore, as good is in God as in the first, it must be in Him in a most excellent way; and therefore He is called the supreme good, (ibid., Ia.6.2)

The Reformation Leaders on God’s Omnibenevolence

With their powerful stress on God’s gracious provision of salvation, the Reformers placed a strong emphasis on God’s love. This is evident in their focus on God’s unconditional election and unmerited favor toward sinners.

Martin Luther

Wherefore He has bidden us, in the Lord’s Prayer, to pray for nothing more than our daily bread, so that we may live and act in fear and know that at no hour are we sure of either life or property, but may await and receive everything from His hands. That is what true faith does. Indeed we daily see in many of God's works that things must happen thus, whether it suits us or not. (WL, 4.20)

God indeed gives to some many good things and richly adorns them, as He did Lucifer in heaven. He scatters His gifts broadcast among the multitude; but He does not therefore regard them. His good things are merely gifts, that last but for a season; but His grace and regard are the inheritance, which lasts forever, (ibid., 3.159)

True, the malicious devil deceived and seduced Adam; but we ought to consider that, soon after the fall, Adam received the promise of the woman's seed that should crush the serpent's head, and should bless the people on earth. Therefore, we must acknowledge that the goodness and mercy of the Father, who sent his Son to be our Savior, is immeasurably great towards the wicked ungovernable world. Let, therefore, his good will be acceptable unto thee, oh, man, and speculate not with thy devilish queries, thy whys and thy wherefores, touching God's words and works. For God, who is creator of all creatures, and orders all things according to his unsearchable will and wisdom, is not pleased with such questionings. (TT, 33)

John Calvin

Therefore, in order that all ground of offense may be removed, and he may completely reconcile us to himself, he, by means of the expiation set forth in the death of Christ, abolishes all the evil that is in us, so that we, formerly impure and unclean, now appear in his sight just and holy. Accordingly, God the Father, by his love, prevents and anticipates our reconciliation in Christ. Nay, it is because he first loves us, that he afterwards reconciles us to himself. But because the iniquity, which deserves the indignation of God, remains in us until the death of Christ comes to our aid, and that iniquity is in his sight accursed and condemned, we are not admitted to full and sure communion with God, unless insofar as Christ unites us. (ICR, 2.16.3)

The other course, which has a closer relation to faith, remains to be considered—viz., that while we observe how God has destined all things for our good and salvation, we at the same time feel his power and grace, both in ourselves and in the great blessings which he has bestowed upon us, thence stirring up ourselves to confidence in him, to invocation, praise, and love, (ibid., 1.14.22)

The Post Reformation Theologians on God's Omnibenevolence

Jacob Arminius

The Goodness of the Essence of God is that according to which it is, essentially in itself, the Supreme and very Good; from a participation in which all other things have an existence and are good; and to which all other things are to be referred as to their supreme end: For this reason it is called communicable. (WJA, 1.442)

Love is an affection of union in God; whose objects are not only God himself and the good of justice, but also the creature, imitating or related to God either according to likeness, or only according to impress, and the felicity of the creature ... God loves himself with complacency in the perfection of his own nature, wherefore He likewise enjoys himself. He also loves himself with the love of complacency in his effects produced externally; both in acts and works which are specimens and evident, infallible indications of that perfection.

Grace is a certain adjunct of Goodness and Love, by which is signified that God is affected to communicate his own good and to love the creatures, not through merit or of debt, not by any cause impelling from without; nor that something may be added to God himself, but that it may be well with him on whom the good is bestowed and who is beloved, which may also receive the name "Liberality." According to this, God is said to be "rich in Goodness, Mercy," etc. (ibid., 456)

Stephen Charnock

Every creature is capable of a death in sin. “None is good but God,” and none is naturally free from change but God, which excludes every creature from the same prerogative; and certainly, if one angel sinned, all might have sinned, because there was the same root of mutability in one as well as another. It is as impossible for a creature to be a Creator, as for a creature to have naturally an incommunicable property of the Creator. All things, whether angels or men, are made of nothing, and therefore, capable of defection; because a creature being made of nothing, cannot be good, or essentially good, but by participation from another. (EAG, 2.230)

Pure and perfect goodness is only the royal prerogative of God; goodness is a choice perfection of the Divine nature. This is the true and genuine character of God; he is good, he is goodness, good in himself, good in his essence, good in the highest degree, (ibid., 2.214)

God is good himself, and to himself ... whereby he loves himself and his own excellency; but as it stands in relation to his creatures, it is that perfection of God whereby he delights in his works, and is beneficial to them. God is the highest goodness, because he doth not act from his own profit, but for his creatures' welfare, and the manifestation of his own goodness, (ibid., 2.219)

God gave him a law, taken from the depths of his holy nature, and suited to the original faculties of man. The rules which God hath fixed in the world, are not the resolves of bare will, but the result particularly from the goodness of his nature; they are nothing else but the transcripts of his infinite detestation of sin, as he is the unblemished governor of the world, (ibid., 2.128)

God only is originally good, good of himself. All created goodness is a rivulet from this fountain, but Divine goodness hath no spring; God depends upon no other for his goodness; he hath it in, and of, himself: man hath no goodness from himself, God hath no goodness from without himself: his goodness is no more derived from another than his being; if we were good by any external thing, that thing must be before him, or after him; if before him, he was not then himself from eternity; if after him, he was not good in himself from eternity, (ibid., 2.210–11)

R. L. Dabney

“The world is full of the goodness of the Lord.” I only aim to classify the evidences that God is benevolent. And [first], generally: since God is the original Cause of all things, all the happiness amidst His works is of His doing; and therefore proves His benevolence. [Second], more definitely: the natures of all orders of sentient beings, if not violated, are constructed, in the main, to secure their appropriate well-being. Instance the insect, the fish, the bird, the ox, the man. [Third], many things occur in the special providence of God which show Him benevolent; such as providing remedial medicines, etc., for pain, and special interpositions in danger. [Fourth], God might, compatibly with justice, have satisfied Himself with so adapting external nature to man's senses and mind as to make it minister to his being and intelligence, and thus secure the true end of his existence, without, in so doing, making it pleasant to his senses. Our food and drink might have nourished us, our senses of sight and hearing might have informed us, without making food sweet, light beautiful, and sounds melodious to us.... Such, in a word, is God's goodness, that He turns aside to strew incidental enjoyment. The more unessential these are to His main end, the stronger the argument. [Fifth], God has made all the beneficent emotions—love, sympathy, benevolence, forgiveness, delightful in their exercise; and all the malevolent ones, as resentment, envy, revenge, painful to their subjects; thus teaching us that He would have us propagate happiness and diminish pain. Last: Conscience, which is God's imperative, enjoins benevolence on us as one duty, whenever compatible with others. Benevolence is therefore God's will; and doubtless He who wills us to be so, is benevolent Himself. (LST, 52)

Francis Turretin

The goodness of God is that by which he is conceived not only absolutely and in himself as supremely good and perfect (as it were) and the only good (autoagathon, Mark 10:18) because he is such originally, perfectly and immutably; but also relatively and extrinsically as beneficent towards creatures (which is called benignity) because it is of the reason of good to be communicative of itself.

Although the goodness of God extends itself to all creatures, yet not equally, but exhibits the greatest diversity in the communication of good. Hence one is general (by which he follows all creatures, Ps. 36:6–7); another special (which has respect to men, Acts 14:17) and another most special (relating to the elect and referred to in Ps. 73:1: “God is good to Israel”). If you seek the causes of this diversity, various ones can be assigned besides his will: (1) It was in accordance with his supreme dominion to show the most free power in diffusing his gifts (which in this inequality is exhibited in the highest manner). (2) The wisdom of God demanded that a certain order should exist in things (which is beheld in the connection of superiors and inferiors). (3) It conduced to the beauty of the universe (which creatures differing in form, actions and qualities render perfect). (4) It afforded a better demonstration of the inexhaustible fountain of divine goodness, since one creature could not receive the full communication of good (thus it should be imparted to more). (IET, 1.241)

William G. T. Shedd

The Goodness of God is the Divine essence viewed as energizing benevolently, and kindly, towards the creature. It is an emanant, or transitive attribute issuing forth from the Divine nature, and aiming to promote the welfare and happiness of the universe. It is not that attribute by which God is good; but by which he does good. As good in himself, God is holy; as showing goodness to others, he is good or kind. (DT, 385)

In Luke 18:19, the reference is to benevolence, not to holiness: “None is good save one, that is God.” (ibid., 377)

[The] assertion that God is love [tells us] that, in other words, the love which he shows to humanity, and which Christians know and rejoice in, is a revelation of his own inner being. (KG, 119)

The measure of love is how much it gives, and the measure of the love of God is the gift of his only Son to become human, and to die for sins, and so to become the one mediator who can bring us to God. The New Testament writers constantly point to the cross of Christ as the crowning proof of the reality and boundlessness of God’s love, (ibid., 125)

God’s love is an exercise of his goodness towards sinners. As such, it has the nature of grace and mercy. It is an outgoing of God in kindness which not merely is undeserved, but is actually contrary to desert; for the objects of God’s love are rational creatures who have broken God’s law, whose nature is corrupt in God’s sight, and who merit only condemnation and final banishment from his presence, (ibid., 123)

OBJECTION TO GOD’S OMNIBENVOLENCE

Objection One—Based on the Idea That Necessary Love Is Contradictory

Love is a free act, flowing from one’s free choice. A person cannot be forced to love; forced love is contradictory. If this is so, then love cannot flow from the essence of God, since God’s essence is necessary. Hence, love cannot be of the essence of God: If it were, then God would be forced to love, which is contradictory. In other words, God loves because He wants to love, not because He has to love. Thus, love and necessity are incompatible.

Response to Objection One

Love and necessity are not contradictory, but love and compulsion are. It is of the nature of God to love, and since God's nature is necessary, it is necessary that God love. In addition, since love is a free act, it is necessary that God loves freely. Therefore, it is not contradictory for love to be both necessary and free: It simply means that God, by His very nature, must love. His will is in accord with His nature; consequently, His freely chosen love is in accordance with His necessary and unchanging nature. For instance, since God is essentially good, He cannot love evil. Likewise, He is not free to not be loving. God is free only within the bounds of His nature. Since God is just, He cannot love injustice or love in an unjust way. It is of God's essence that He love, but it is also of His essence that He loves freely. Nothing forces God to be loving; it comes naturally to Him.

Objection Two—Based on God's Unique Love for the Elect

Strong Calvinists, who rightly deny universal atonement, claim that God does not love all people in a saving way, insisting that Christ died only for the elect. If this is so, then God would not be omnibenevolent. Some of the passages they appeal to include the following (emphasis added): "For he chose us in him before the creation of the world" (Eph. 1:4); "For what I received I passed on to you as of first importance: that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. 15:3); "I lay down my life for [my] sheep" (John 10:15); "Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her" (Eph. 5:25); "In him we [believers] were also chosen" (Eph. 1:11). Christ's death is allegedly always for those who do or will (cf. John 20:29) believe in Him (cf. Gal. 1:3–4; Titus 2:14; 1 Peter 3:18).

Response to Objection Two

The fact that in some passages only believers are mentioned as the object of Christ's death does not prove the Atonement is limited, for several reasons (see Volume 3, chapter 12).

First, when the Bible uses terms like "we," "our," or "us" of the Atonement, it speaks only of those to whom it has been applied, not for all those for whom it was provided. In doing so it does not thereby limit the Atonement in its possible application to all humanity; it speaks only of some to whom it has been already applied.

Second, the fact that Jesus loves His bride and died for her (Eph. 5:25) does not mean that God does not love the whole world and desire all to be part of His bride, the church. Indeed, as the verses below will show, "God so loved the world that he gave His only son" (John 3:16).

Third, this reasoning overlooks the fact that there are many passages that do declare Jesus died for more than the elect (John 3:16; Rom. 5:6; 2 Cor. 5:19; Heb. 2:9; 1 John 2:2).

Fourth, nowhere in the New Testament does it say, "Christ died only for the elect," even though all of these words are part of the common vocabulary of the New Testament writers.

Fifth, and finally, numerous times the New Testament proclaims in so many words that "God so loved the world" (John. 3:16); that "one [Christ] died for all" (2 Cor. 5:14); Jesus came to "taste death for everyone" (Heb. 2:9); God "wants all men to be saved" (1 Tim. 2:4); Christ "gave himself as a ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:6); "He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2); "There were also false prophets ... even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them" (2 Peter 2:1); "He is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9).

Sixth, even though Paul says Christ died for the Corinthians (1 Cor. 1:13) it does not mean he died only for them.

Objection Three—Based on God’s Loving Jacob and Hating Esau

According to Romans 9, God loved Jacob and hated Esau (v. 13). He has mercy on some, but not on others (v. 5:15). He destines some to destruction and not others (v. 22). He hardens the hearts of some in unbelief, but not others (v. 5:18). From this it seems obvious that God is not omnibenevolent when it comes to salvation.

Response to Objection Three

In response, it should be pointed out that this is not a correct interpretation of these texts, for several reasons.

First, this passage is not speaking about electing individuals, but nations. “Esau” is the nation of Edom that came from him (cf. Mal. 1:2–3), and “Jacob” is the nation of Israel that came from him (cf. 9:13).

Second, the election of the nation was temporal, not eternal; that is, Israel was chosen as a national channel through which the eternal blessing of salvation through Christ would come to all people (cf. Gen. 12:1–3; Rom. 9:4–5). Not every individual in Israel was elected to be saved (9:6).

Third, “hate” means to love less; it does not mean not to love at all or not to will the good of the person. This is evident from Genesis 29:30: The phrase “loved Rachel more than Leah” is used as the equivalent of “Leah was hated” (cf. also Matt. 10:37).

Fourth, Pharaoh hardened his own heart against God (cf. Ex. 7:13–14; 8:15, 19, 32) before God hardened it (Ex. 9:12). The purpose of the plagues upon Egypt was to get Pharaoh to repent; since he refused, the result was that his heart was hardened. As we have seen before, the same sun that melts wax hardens clay. The problem is not with the sun, but with the receptivity of the agent it is acting upon.

Fifth, the “vessels of wrath” in Romans 9 (v. 22 NKJV) were not destined to destruction against their will. Indeed, they were such because they rejected God as He “endured with much longsuffering,” waiting for them to repent (cf. 2 Peter 3:9).

Sixth, and finally, to take this passage out of its context and use it to support limited love is to go against numerous clear affirmations of God’s universal saving love for all (see Volume 3).

Objection Four—Based on the Notion That Omnibenevolence Leads to Universalism

If God loves all people and desires all of them to be saved, then why are not all people saved? He is omnipotent, and an all powerful Being can do whatever He wants to do, can’t He? Further, God is sovereign and in control of all things (see chapter 23): His will cannot be thwarted, and He also accomplishes whatever He sets out to do (Isa. 55:11). But if He can accomplish whatever He desires, and if He desires to save all, then doesn’t it follow that all will be saved (universalism) ?

Response to Objection Four

God's ultimate will is always accomplished, but His immediate will is not. God wills some things conditionally and some unconditionally. Salvation is one of those things that is willed on the condition of our free will (John 1:12; Matt. 23:37). God does not desire that anyone perish, but that all should repent (2 Peter 3:9). But not all will repent; hence, not all will be saved. Jesus lamented, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing" (Matt. 23:37, emphasis added).

God is all-powerful, but He cannot do anything: He cannot do what is contradictory, and He cannot go against His own nature. For example, "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18), and "He cannot disown Himself" (2 Tim. 2:13). Once again, God cannot force someone to freely love Him. So while God is all-powerful, He must exercise His power in accordance with His love, and His love cannot force someone to love Him.

Objection Five—Based on God's Having Power That Is Not Used

It is objected by strong Calvinists that God does not have to exercise love toward everyone just because He is all-loving any more than God must exercise His power toward everyone just because He is omnipotent. That is, God can have more love than He uses, just as He has more power than He uses; thus, God does not have to love everyone simply because He is all-loving.

Response to Objection Five

First of all, love is a moral attribute of God; power is a nonmoral attribute. It is a category mistake to confuse them. Moral attributes bind God to act in a certain way because they are moral attributes, while nonmoral attributes do not.

Further, it is inconsistent to argue, as strong Calvinists do, that God must always act justly because He is all-just, but that He does not always have to act lovingly simply because He is all-loving. If this were the case, then God's justice would not obligate Him to condemn all sin—but it does. Therefore, His love binds Him to love all sinners as well. Love is just as essential to God as justice. God is a simple, necessary, and infinite Being; hence, whatever attribute He has, He must have completely, necessarily, and infinitely. Thus, God cannot be all-loving unless He shows love to all any more than He can be all-just unless He shows justice to all. In brief, if God is absolute truth, He must tell the truth to all. If God is all-just, He must be just to all. And if He is all-loving, He must be loving to all.

Objection Six—Based on What Sinners Deserve

By virtue of being a sinner, one gets what he deserves—justice. But grace is getting what one does not deserve. Hence, there is nothing in a sinner by which he deserves God's grace.

Response to Objection Six

We are saved by God's grace, but grace isn't deserved by any sinner. Rather, justice demands that sin be condemned. There is nothing in a sinner that prompts God to save him; instead, justice must condemn him. However, there is something in God that prompts Him to save sinners, namely, His love. Since God is all-loving by nature, He must try to save them. So God does not have to show love because we deserve it (we don't), but because His nature demands it. Love is not an arbitrary attribute of God; it is rooted in His necessary nature.

Objection Seven—Based on the Presence of Evil

This objection states that if God were all-powerful and all-loving, there would not be any evil. But there is evil; consequently, if God is all-powerful, then He cannot be all-loving. God is all-powerful (see chapter 7); therefore, God cannot be all-loving, for an all-powerful God can defeat evil and an all-loving God would defeat evil. Evil is not defeated; it seems to follow, then, that if God is all-powerful He cannot be all-loving (see Volume 3, chapter 6).

Response to Objection Seven

The above conclusion does not follow, though, because it wrongly assumes that since evil is not yet defeated it never will be defeated. To affirm that evil never will be defeated would assume omniscience, which only God has. Indeed, since it has already been shown that the Bible is God's Word (see Volume 1, part 2), we have the basis for asserting that evil will one day be vanquished (see Rev. 20–22).

Since God is both omniscient (see chapter 8) and omnipotent, we know that evil will be defeated, for an all-knowing God knows the end from the beginning, and an all-good God will assure that it is a good ending (where evil is defeated), and an all-powerful God can achieve what He knows will come to pass. Therefore, evil will be defeated someday, namely, when God by His predetermined foreknowledge has decided that it will be defeated.

CONCLUSION

God is not only completely truthful, but He is absolutely good. He has not only perfect integrity, but He has perfect charity (love). In short, He is all-true and all-loving. It is impossible for Him to lie (Heb. 6:18), and He is love by His very nature (1 John 4:16). As such, these attributes provide complete confidence in His pronouncements and promises. His work cannot be broken or perish (John 10:35; Matt. 5:17–18); likewise, we can trust that His love will never fail us (Rom. 8:35–39).

While God possesses truth and love in an absolute sense, He is able to communicate them to us in a limited degree. Hence, these moral attributes are called communicable characteristics of God.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

GOD'S MERCY AND WRATH

Another pair of God's moral characteristics is mercy and wrath. While some mistakenly believe these are incompatible, they, in fact, form a unity within the character of God.

There is, however, a legitimate question raised as to whether mercy and wrath are attributes of God or activities that flow from other attributes. Even if they are acts, not attributes, there are, nonetheless, deep-seated attributes (such as goodness and justice) from which these actions proceed.

GOD'S MERCY

Regardless of whether mercy is itself an attribute or an activity of God, it is deeply rooted in His unchangeable nature. As such, it reveals something extremely important about God's character.

THE DEFINITION OF MERCY IN GENERAL

There are several Hebrew words that are associated with God's mercy. Kapporeth (from kopher) means "ransom," "propitiatory," or "the mercy seat," where the blood of atonement was offered to God. Racham means "to love," "to have compassion," or "to show mercy." Chesed means "goodness," "kindness," "mercifulness," or "loving-kindness."

There are Greek words associated with mercy in the New Testament. Eleemon (from eleeo) means "to show mercy," "to pity," "to have compassion," or "to be merciful." Eleemon depicts a merciful, sympathetic attitude, used of humans (Matt. 5:7) as well as of Christ (Heb. 2:17). Eleos is employed of one human toward another (Matt. 9:13; 12:7; Luke 10:37) as well as of God toward human beings (Luke 1:50, 58; Gal. 6:16; Rom. 15:9; Titus 3:5; Rom. 9:23; 11:31; Jude 1:2). Oiktirmos carries the idea of "compassion" or "pity," whether of God (James 5:11) or of people (Luke 6:36).

The word mercy is used of human beings in saving a life (Gen. 19:19); in prospering a journey (Gen. 24:27); in delivering from prison (Gen. 39:21); in not destroying lives (Jude 1:20); in receiving the favor of the king (Ezra 7:28; 9:9); and in answer to prayer to receive the favor of another person (Neh. 1:11). Of course, as will be seen, God's mercy is all of this and more (cf. Job 37:13; Ps. 4:1).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S MERCY

Several characteristics are associated with God's mercy: It is unfailing, unchanging, everlasting, and manifest in great compassion.

God's Mercy Is Rooted in His Goodness and Love

"In your unfailing love you will lead the people you have redeemed" (Ex. 15:13). "[He is] maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished" (Ex. 34:7). "The LORD is slow to anger, abounding in love and forgiving sin and rebellion. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished.... In accordance with your great love, forgive the sin of these people, just as you have pardoned them from the time they left Egypt until now" (Num. 14:18–19). "Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good" (1 Chron. 16:34). "They raised their voices in praise to the LORD and sang: 'He is good'" (2 Chron. 5:13). "When all the Israelites saw the fire coming down and the glory of the LORD above the temple, they knelt on the pavement with their faces to the ground, and they worshiped and gave thanks to the Lord, saying, 'He is good' ” (2 Chron. 7:3). “With praise and thanksgiving they sang to the LORD: 'He is good; his love to Israel endures forever.' And all the people gave a great shout of praise to the LORD” (Ezra 3:11).

God's Mercy Is Great

“Your servant has found favor in your eyes, and you have shown great kindness to me in sparing my life” (Gen. 19:19). “In accordance with your great love, forgive the sin of these people, just as you have pardoned them from the time they left Egypt until now” (Num. 14:19). “Solomon answered, 'You have shown great kindness to your servant, my father David, because he was faithful to you and righteous and upright in heart. You have continued this great kindness to him and have given him a son to sit on his throne this very day' ” (1 Kings 3:6). “Remember me for this also, O my God, and show mercy to me according to your great love” (Neh. 13:22). “Solomon answered God, 'You have shown great kindness to David my father and have made me king in his place' ” (2 Chron. 1:8). “Then I commanded the Levites to purify themselves and go and guard the gates in order to keep the Sabbath day holy. Remember me for this also, O my God, and show mercy to me according to your great love” (Neh. 13:22).

God's Mercy Is Everlasting

God is faithful forever in His covenant and mercy. “Know therefore that the LORD your God is God; he is the faithful God, keeping his covenant of love to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commands” (Deut. 7:9). “But my love will never be taken away from him, as I took it away from Saul, whom I removed from before you” (2 Sam. 7:15). “He gives his king great victories; he shows unfailing kindness to his anointed, to David and his descendants forever” (2 Sam. 22:51). “Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good; his love endures forever” (1 Chron. 16:34). “With them were Heman and Jeduthun and the rest of those chosen and designated by name to give thanks to the LORD, 'for his love endures forever' ” (1 Chron. 16:41). “They raised their voices in praise to the Lord and sang, 'He is good; his love endures forever.' Then the temple of the LORD was filled with a cloud” (2 Chron. 5:13). “The priests took their positions, as did the Levites with the LORD'S musical instruments, which King David had made for praising the LORD and which were used when he gave thanks, saying, 'His love endures forever' ” (2 Chron. 7:6). “After consulting the people, Jehoshaphat appointed men to sing to the LORD and to praise him for the splendor of his holiness as they went out at the head of the army, saying, 'Give thanks to the Lord, for his love endures forever' ” (2 Chron. 20:21). “Who is a God like you, who pardons sin and forgives the transgression of the remnant of his inheritance? You do not stay angry forever but delight to show mercy” (Micah 7:18).

God's Mercy Is Faithful

“In your unfailing love you will lead the people you have redeemed. In your strength you will guide them to your holy dwelling” (Ex. 15:13). “Know therefore that the LORD your God is God; he is the faithful God, keeping his covenant of love to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commands” (Deut. 7:9). “Praise be to the Lord, the God of my master Abraham, who has not abandoned his kindness and faithfulness to my master” (Gen. 24:27). “May kindness and faithfulness be with you” (2 Sam. 15:20). “If you pay attention to these laws and are careful to follow them, then the LORD your God will keep his covenant of love with you, as he swore to your forefathers” (Deut. 7:12). “O LORD, God of Israel, there is no God like you in heaven above or on earth below—you who keep your covenant of love with your servants who continue wholeheartedly in your way” (1 Kings 8:23). “I will be his father, and he will be my son. I will never take my love away from him, as I took it away from your predecessor” (1 Chron. 17:13). “Then I said, ‘O LORD, God of heaven, the great and awesome God, who keeps his covenant of love with those who love him and obey his commands’ ” (Neh. 1:5). “Now therefore, O our God, the great, mighty and awesome God, who keeps his covenant of love, do not let all this hardship seem trifling in your eyes” (Neh. 9:32).

God’s Mercy Is Essential

God’s mercy is essential, because it is eternal (2 Sam. 22:51), unailing (Ex. 15:13), unconditional (Deut. 7:9), flows from His unchanging goodness (Deut. 7:9; Num. 14:18–19), does not need to be provoked like wrath (Deut. 9:7–8) but comes naturally (Jer. 44:8), is associated with His faithfulness (Gen. 24:27; cf. 2 Tim. 2:13), is exercised on all who want it, not only some (John 6:37), and, like other moral attributes, is rooted in God’s unchanging nature (e.g., truth [cf. Heb. 6:18], justice, and perfection). These properties are from His nature, not from an arbitrary will; indeed, God said, “I have done nothing ... without cause” (Ezek. 14:23).

God’s Mercy Is Unfailing

“In your unfailing love you will lead the people you have redeemed. In your strength you will guide them to your holy dwelling” (Ex. 15:13).

God’s Mercy Is Longsuffering

“The LORD is slow to anger, abounding in love and forgiving sin and rebellion. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished; he punishes the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation” (Num. 14:18).

God’s Mercy Is Received by the Repentant

“In accordance with your great love, forgive the sin of these people, just as you have pardoned them from the time they left Egypt until now” (Num. 14:19). “None of those condemned things shall be found in your hands, so that the Lord will turn from his fierce anger; he will show you mercy, have compassion on you, and increase your numbers, as he promised on oath to your forefathers” (Deut. 13:17).

God’s Mercy Was Manifest on the Mercy Seat

God’s mercy was manifest on the “mercy seat” in the temple for the forgiveness of sins (cf. Ex. 25:1, 18–22; 26:34; 30:6; 31:7; 35:12; 37:6–9; 39:35; 40:20; Lev. 16:2, Lev. 16:13–15; Num. 7:89; 1 Chron. 28:11 NKJV). Mercy was released by Christ’s atoning death for all humankind (1 John 2:2).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S MERCY

Mercy flows from God's attribute of goodness (or love) as grounded in His infinity and immutability. Since God is unlimited and unchangeable, then, given that He is good, He must be infinitely and unchangeably good. Since mercy flows from God's goodness, and since God is infinite, it follows that God is infinitely and unchangeably merciful. It is of His very nature to show mercy; He cannot not be merciful. As God is a necessary Being, even so He must of necessity be merciful. Were He not merciful, He would not be essentially good or loving. God is not arbitrarily merciful (see Objection One on page below).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S MERCY

In the history of the church, the twin attributes of mercy and wrath have found a varying but continual place.

The Early Church Fathers on God's Mercy

Clement of Rome

"Let us be kind to one another after the pattern of the tender mercy and benignity of our Creator" (ECC, 14 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I).

Wherefore, let us yield obedience to His excellent and glorious will; and imploring His mercy and loving-kindness, while we forsake all fruitless labors, and strife, and envy, which leads to death, let us turn and have recourse to His compassions. (ECC, 9 in ibid.)

Justin Martyr

From the beginning we have not heard, nor have our eyes seen a God besides Thee: and Thy works, the mercy which Thou shalt show to those who repent. He shall meet those who do righteousness, and they shall remember Thy ways. (DJ, 25 in ibid.)

Irenaeus

It is indeed proper to God, and befitting His character, to show mercy and pity, and to bring salvation to His creatures, even though they be brought under danger of destruction. "For with Him," says the Scripture, "is propitiation" (AH, 5.36.10 in ibid.).

Clement of Alexandria

But God being by nature rich in pity, in consequence of His own goodness, cares for us, though [we are] neither portions of Himself nor by nature His children. And this is the greatest proof of the goodness of God: that such being our relation to Him, and being by nature wholly estranged, He nevertheless cares for us. For the affection in animals to their progeny is natural, and the friendship of kindred minds is the result of intimacy. But the mercy of God is rich toward us, who are in no respect related to Him; I say either in our essence or nature, or in the peculiar energy of our essence, but only in our being the work of His will. (S, 2.16 in ibid., II)

Tertullian

Thus far, then, justice is the very fullness of the Deity Himself, manifesting God as both a perfect father and a perfect master: a father in His mercy, a master in His discipline; a father in the mildness of His power, a master in its severity; a father who must be loved with dutiful affection, a master who must needs be feared; be loved, because He prefers mercy to sacrifice; be feared, because He dislikes sin; be loved, because He prefers the sinner's repentance to his death; be feared, because He dislikes the sinners who do not repent. Accordingly, the divine law enjoins duties in respect of both these attributes: Thou shalt love God, and, Thou shalt fear God. It proposed one for the obedient man, the other for the transgressor. (FBAM, 2.2.13 in ibid., 3)

The Medieval Fathers on God's Mercy

Focus on God's mercy did not await the Reformation. There were "pre-Reformers," like Augustine, who saw His mercy as absolutely indispensable for our salvation.

Augustine

Though, nevertheless, they who are not citizens of the eternal city, which is called the city of God in the sacred Scriptures, are more useful to the earthly city when they possess even that virtue than if they had not even that. But there could be nothing more fortunate for human affairs than that, by the mercy of God, they who are endowed with true piety of life, if they have the skill for ruling people, should also have the power. (CG, 5.19 in Schaff, NPNF, 111)

We, though in ourselves unworthy, are bold to expect, through the merit of Christ and the mercy of God the Father. Wherefore I pray that the grace of God by our Lord Jesus Christ may grant unto us this favor too, that we may yet see your face. (LSA, 30 in ibid., 1:1)

My whole hope is only in Thy exceeding great mercy. Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt. Thou imposest contingency upon us; "Nevertheless, when I perceived," saith one, "that I could not otherwise obtain her, except God gave her me ... that was a point of wisdom also: to know whose gift she was." For by contingency are we bound up and brought into one, whence we were scattered abroad into many. (C, 10:29 in ibid.)

Anselm

O God, how profound is Your goodness! It is apparent whence Your mercy comes, and yet it is not clearly seen. Whence the stream flows is obvious, and yet the source where it rises is not seen directly. For on the one hand it is from plenitude of goodness that You are gentle with those who sin against You; and on the other hand the reason why You are thus is hidden in the depths of Your goodness.

O mercy, from what abundant sweetness and sweet abundance do you flow forth for us! O boundless goodness of God, with what feeling should You be loved by sinners! For You save the just whom justice commends, but You free sinners whom justice condemns.

But how are You at once both merciful and impassible? For if You are impassible You do not have any compassion; and if You have no compassion Your heart is not sorrowful from compassion with the sorrowful, which is what being merciful is. But if You are not merciful, whence comes so much consolation for the sorrowful? How, then, are You merciful and not merciful, O Lord, unless it be that You are merciful in relation to us and not in relation to Yourself? In fact, You are [merciful] according to our way of looking at things and not according to Your way. For when You look upon us in our misery it is we who feel the effect of Your mercy, but You do not experience the feeling. Therefore, You are both merciful because You save the sorrowful and pardon sinners against You, and You are not merciful because You do not experience any feeling of compassion for misery. (ACMW, 91–92)

Thomas Aquinas

Mercy is especially to be attributed to God, as seen in its effect, but not as an affection of passion. In proof of which it must be considered that a person is said to be merciful, as being, so to speak, sorrowful at heart; being affected with sorrow at the misery of another as though it were his own. Hence it follows that he endeavors to dispel the misery of this other, as if it were his; and this is the effect of mercy. To sorrow, therefore, over the misery of others belongs not to God; but it does most properly belong to Him to dispel that misery, whatever be the defect we call by that name. Now defects are not removed, except by the perfection of some kind of goodness; and the primary source of goodness is God, as shown above. It must, however, be considered that to bestow perfections appertains not only to the divine goodness, but also to His justice, liberality, and mercy; yet under different aspects. The communicating of perfections, absolutely considered, appertains to goodness, as shown above.... Insofar as God does not bestow them for His own use, but only on account of His goodness, it belongs to liberality; insofar as perfections given to things by God expel defects, it belongs to mercy.

God acts mercifully, not indeed by going against His justice, but by doing something more than justice; thus a man who pays another two hundred pieces of money, though owing him only one hundred, does nothing against justice, but acts liberally or mercifully. The case is the same with one who pardons an offence committed against him, for in remitting it he may be said to bestow a gift. Hence the Apostle calls remission a forgiving: "Forgive one another, as Christ has forgiven you" (Eph. 4:32). Hence it is clear that mercy does not destroy justice, but in a sense is the fulness thereof. And thus it is said: "Mercy exalteth itself above judgment" (James 2:13). (ST, Ia.21:3, ad 2)

The Reformation Leaders on God's Mercy

God's unmerited mercy in saving poor, lost sinners is at the heart of the Reformation doctrine of grace. This is obvious from both Luther and Calvin.

Martin Luther

God's proper work is well-doing, while being angry is called "His strange work" (Is. 28:21); and, to be sure, we need to have Him do well more than punish.... When God does us good for one year or ten, no one recognizes the fact, no one thanks Him for it. Thus our nature can well endure a benefaction but is unwilling to endure punishment and grumbles from the moment it comes, although it deserves nothing but wrath. However, God overlooks this and shows us more kindness than wrath. (WLS, 544)

This is the first work of God—that He is merciful to all who are ready to do without their own opinion, right, wisdom, and all spiritual goods, and willing to be poor in spirit, (ibid., 3:176)

John Calvin

All the Apostles abound in exhortations, admonitions, and rebukes, for the purpose of training the man of God to every good work, and that without any mention of merit. Nay, rather their chief exhortations are founded on the fact that without any merit of ours, our salvation depends entirely on the mercy of God. Thus Paul, who during a whole Epistle had maintained that there was no hope of life for us save in the righteousness of Christ, when he comes to exhortation, beseeches us by the mercy which God has bestowed upon us. (ICR, 3:16:3)

To conclude, in one word; as often as we call God the Creator of heaven and earth, let us remember that the distribution of all the things which he created are in his hand and power, but that we are his sons, whom he has undertaken to nourish and bring up in allegiance to him, that we may expect the substance of all good from him alone, and have full hope that he will never suffer us to be in want of things necessary to salvation, so as to leave us dependent on some other source; that in everything we desire we may address our prayers to him, and in every benefit we receive acknowledge his hand and give him thanks; that thus allured by his great goodness and beneficence, we may study with our whole heart to love and serve him. (ibid., 1.14.22)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God's Mercy

Jonathan Edwards

God is pleased to show mercy to his enemies, according to his own sovereign pleasure. Though he is infinitely above all, and stands in no need of creatures; yet he is graciously pleased to take a merciful notice of poor worms of the dust. (WJE, 2:110, 2.114)

Francis Turretin

Mercy attends upon the grace of God. For as the latter exercises itself about man as a sinner (granting the pardon of his sin) so the former is exercised about man as miserable (relieving his misery). This is properly ascribed to God not as signifying grief arising from the misery of another (as it is in men), but as indicating a prompt and disposed will to succor the miserable without any anguish or perturbation of mind.

It does not spring from any external cause which usually excites this effect in men (as the tie of blood, of friendship, the company of misery, imbecility of age, sex, etc.). Rather it springs from his goodness alone (as he loves to communicate himself to the creature and as he does not refrain from succoring the miserable). (IET, 1.243)

William G. T. Shedd

Mercy is a second variety of the Divine Goodness. It is the benevolent compassion of God towards man as a sinner. This attribute, though logically implied in the idea of God as a being possessed of all conceivable perfections, is free and sovereign in its exercise. Consequently, it requires a special revelation in order to establish the fact that it will be exercised. (DT, 389)

Charles Hodge

Goodness, in the scriptural sense of the term, includes benevolence, love, mercy, and grace. By benevolence is meant the disposition to promote happiness; all sensitive creatures are its objects. Love includes complacency, desire, and delight, and has rational beings for its objects. Mercy is kindness exercised towards the miserable, and includes pity, compassion, forbearance, and gentleness, which the Scriptures so abundantly ascribe to God. (ST, 471)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S MERCY

Several difficulties are associated with God's mercy. Perhaps the most important one is whether mercy is rooted in God's nature or in His arbitrary will.

Objection One—Based on God's Free Will

According to this objection, mercy cannot be of God's essence, since it flows from God's will. God can be and is merciful only on the ones He chooses to be, but not on others. Exodus 33:19 declares, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." Romans 9:18 adds: "He hardens whom he wants to harden." This seems to say that mercy is a matter of God's arbitrary choice, not of necessity. If so, God cannot be essentially merciful.

Response to Objection One

First, even if mercy is an act, not an attribute of God; nonetheless, it is an act of His will that is in accordance with His unchangeable nature. It is not an arbitrary act of will. As shown above, it is an essential characteristic of God.

Second, nothing in Scripture contradicts this; even the illustrations used in Romans 9 do not prove the contrary, for God did not arbitrarily harden Pharaoh—He attempted to get Pharaoh to repent. Further, Pharaoh first hardened His own heart (Ex. 7:14; 8:15, 32). When God did later harden Pharaoh's heart, it was because Pharaoh would not respond to Him. (Again, the same sun that melts wax also hardens clay—the difference is not in the sun, but in the receptivity of the agents receiving its rays.) Likewise, even in Romans 9, God waited patiently for His creatures to respond to His loving overtures (Rom. 9:22). Thus, they became "vessels of wrath" by rejecting His mercy, not because He did not want them to be recipients of it.

Third, when the Scripture says, "Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated" (Rom. 9:13), it does not support the contention that God is arbitrary in His love for several reasons. First of all, He is not speaking of individuals, but of the nations of Jacob (Israel) and Edom (which came from Esau). For another thing, this was not said of Edom before it was born, but after it had lived and performed horrendously evil actions on God's chosen people. (It was cited from Malachi [1:2–3], not from Genesis.) Likewise, Romans is not speaking here of God's eternal choice of individuals for salvation, but of His temporal election of nations to fit His purposes. Also, "hate" is a Hebrew idiom for "love less" (cf. Gen. 29:30). It does not mean God did not love Esau and want him to repent (cf. Rom. 9:22; 2 Peter 3:9); it means He has less affection for those who hate His people and attempt to thwart His plan.

Fourth, and finally, the implications of considering mercy to be an arbitrary act of God are incredibly significant. If mercy is an arbitrary act of God, then voluntarism is correct (i.e., something is right simply because God wills it rather than that God wills it because it is right). If so, then limited atonement follows (i.e., God only loves some, not all, persons). This is a denial of God's omnibenevolence; the Bible is clear that God loves the whole world (cf. John 3:16; Rom. 5:18–19; 1 Tim. 2:4–6; 1 John 2:2). A more detailed discussion of this is found later (in Volume 3, chapter 12).

Objection Two—Based on Universalism

It is further objected that if mercy is essential, then universalism follows, for if Christ died for everyone, then everyone will be saved. The Bible rejects this teaching (see Matt. 25:41; 2 Thess. 1:7–9; Rev. 20:11–15).

Response to Objection Two

God's unlimited mercy only shows God desires to save all (not that He must or will save all). God cannot do what is impossible, and it is impossible to force a free choice (Matt. 23:37; cf. 2 Peter 3:9). God's saving mercy must be received freely; hence, only those who freely receive God's mercy will be saved.

Objection Three—Based on Deuteronomy 7:9

In this text God appears to be selective in those to whom He shows mercy. However, if He is all-merciful, then why does He not show mercy to all? Moses wrote, "Know therefore that the LORD your God is God; he is the faithful God, keeping his covenant of love to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commands" (emphasis added).

Response to Objection Three

God loves everyone (John 3:16), and He sent His Son to pay for the sins of all (1 John 2:2). Indeed, He wishes all to repent and receive His mercy (2 Peter 3:9). However, each person must receive His mercy; anyone who repents will be a recipient of it. God will not withhold His mercy from anyone who wants it, but neither will He cram His love down the throats of those who do not want it (Matt. 23:37).

Objection Four—Based on the Need to Pray for Mercy

The Bible records instances of people praying for mercy; for example, the sinner in Luke 18:13 prayed, "God have mercy on me, a sinner." If God is essentially merciful, then why should anyone have to beg for His mercy?

Response to Objection Four

Prayer is not a condition for God's giving mercy, but rather a condition for our receiving the mercy He desires to freely give us. Prayer changes us and puts us in a position where God's essential and unchanging mercy can flow upon us (e.g., prayer moves us out from under God's unchanging wrath to under His unchanging love). Prayer is not a means of overcoming God's reluctance, but a means by which God takes advantage of our willingness to receive His mercy.

Objection Five—Based on Matthew 20:15

In a parable Jesus told, God said, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I wish with my own things?" (NKJV). From this it would seem that His mercy need not be given to all.

Response to Objection Five

The passage deals with service, not salvation. The laborers all worked for the wages they had agreed upon, but salvation is free (Rom. 4:5; Eph. 2:8–9). Further, God does not have to give the same amount of His possessions and gifts to everyone, but His essentially all-loving nature does necessitate that He love all. This He does, as Isaiah put it: "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat! Come, buy wine and milk without money and without cost" (Isa. 55:1).

GOD'S WRATH

God is not only merciful to the repentant, but He is also wrathful upon the unrepentant. These actions are not incompatible, since they are exercised on different objects.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S WRATH

A number of Hebrew words are translated as “wrath.” Charown (Ex. 15:7) means “burning anger,” “fury.” Aph (Ex. 22:24) means “ire,” “wrath.” Ebrah (Num. 11:33) depicts outbursts of passion, anger, or rage. Chemah (Ps. 59:13) literally means “heat” and, figuratively, “anger.” Qetreph (2 Chron. 19:2) speaks of a rage.

The New Testament word for “wrath” is orge. It carries the meaning of “strong desire,” “violent passion,” and “ire” (see Eph. 2:3; Col. 3:6; 1 Thess. 5:9; Rev. 6:16). As applied to God, wrath means His anger at and hatred of sin, His righteous indignation at all evil, and His jealous execution of judgment on unrighteousness. However, wrath, while rooted in God’s essential nature as just, is not an attribute, but an act that flows from His unchanging righteousness.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S WRATH

Biblical descriptions of God’s wrath include “Your wrath” (Ex. 15:7); “My wrath” (Ex. 22:24); “wrath of the Lamb” (Rev. 6:16); “day of God’s wrath” (Job 20:28); “fierce” wrath (Ex. 32:12); “wrath of the LORD” (Num. 11:33); “wrath of the Almighty” (Job 21:20).

God’s wrath gets “hot” (Ex. 22:24 NKJV); can “kindle” (Job 19:11 NKJV); can “flare” (Ps. 2:12); “burns” (Ex. 32:10); is “living and burning” (Ps. 58:9 NKJV); “consumes” (Ex. 32:10 NKJV); is “great” (2 Kings 22:13); can reach the point of “no remedy” (2 Chron. 36:16); has “fury” (Job 20:23 NKJV); can “swallow them up” (Ps. 21:9); can “rebuke” us (Ps. 38:1); “pours” out on evil men (Ezek. 21:31); can be “completed” (Dan. 11:36); can be “kept forever” (Amos 1:11 NKJV); and can come on unbelievers to the “uttermost” (1 Thess. 2:16 NKJV). A “great day of” wrath is coming (Rev. 6:17); Babylon will drink of the “wine of the wrath of her fornication” (Rev. 14:8 NKJV); God will have “bowls” of wrath to pour out on the earth (Rev. 16:1); His wrath can loom over cities (2 Chron. 32:25 NKJV).

Further, God can be provoked to wrath over taking a census [to count human power rather than trust God’s] (1 Chron. 27:24); over rebellion (at Horeb and in the wilderness—Deut. 9:7–8, 22); because of complaints about His provision (Num. 11:18–20, 33–34); for helping the wicked (2 Chron. 19:2); for hating the Lord (2 Chron. 19:2); for a trespass against the Lord (2 Chron. 19:10); for great guilt (2 Chron. 28:13); for being stiff-necked (2 Chron. 30:8); for not keeping the word of the Lord (2 Chron. 34:21); for burning incense to other gods (2 Chron. 34:25); for mocking God’s messengers (2 Chron. 36:16); against those who forsake God (Ezra 8:22); for not doing God’s commands (Ezra 7:23); for having pagan wives (Ezra 10:14); for profaning the Sabbath (Neh. 13:18); and for not obeying the truth (Rom. 2:8).

Wrath is brought about by the law (Rom. 4:15), but we can be saved from it through Christ (Rom. 5:9; 1 Thess. 1:10). God being aroused to wrath (Num. 11:33; Job 32:5) is associated with His anger (Deut. 9:8; 29:23, 28); however, God can turn (or relent) from it (Ex. 32:12) if people humble themselves (2 Chron. 12:7, 12); pray (as David, Ps. 103); rejoice in the fall of our enemy (Prov. 24:17–18); and repent (Jonah 3). God cannot be turned away from wrath by riches (Prov. 11:4); silver, or gold (Zeph. 1:18). Wrath can be “stored up” by hypocrites (Job 36:13 NKJV); stored in “vessels” of the unrepentant (Rom. 9:22 NKJV); and can “take you away in one blow” (Job 36:18 NKJV).

God sometimes speaks in His wrath (Ps. 2:5); it can lie “heavy upon” us (Ps. 88:7); it can be “terrifying” (Ps. 90:7); it can be mediated (e.g., by Moses, Ps. 106:23). Wrath is the expectation of the wicked (Prov. 11:23); the earth will “tremble” at God’s wrath (Jer. 10:10). He has a “rod of His wrath” (Lam. 3:1). It “abides” on all unbelievers (John 3:36 NKJV) who are “objects of wrath” (Eph. 2:3). Believers have not been “appointed” to it (1 Thess. 5:9). God “swore” (took an oath) by it (Heb. 3:11 NKJV) against unbelief. At His second coming, Christ will tread the winepress of God’s wrath (Rev. 19:15).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S WRATH

God’s wrath is based in several of His attributes, including His holiness, righteousness, and jealousy.

Wrath Flows From God’s Holiness

Paul wrote, “The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness” (Rom. 1:18). God is so holy that He cannot look upon sin with approval (Hab. 1:13). Thus, He cannot overlook sin forever—it must eventually be punished.

Wrath Flows From God’s Righteousness

A kindred characteristic from which wrath flows is God’s righteousness or justice. Romans states: “Because of your stubbornness and your unrepentant heart, you are storing up wrath against yourself for the day of God’s wrath, when his righteous judgment will be revealed” (Rom. 2:5).

Wrath Flows From God’s Jealousy

One of God’s names is “Jealous” (see chapter 14); Moses wrote, “Do not worship any other god, for the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God” (Ex. 34:14). Ezekiel added, “Therefore this is what the Sovereign Lord says: I will now bring Jacob back from captivity and will have compassion on all the people of Israel, and I will be zealous for my holy name” (Ezek. 39:25). It is because of His jealous zeal to protect His own supremacy that God executes wrath on evil. Deuteronomy 29:20 declares, “The Lord will never be willing to forgive him; his wrath and zeal will burn against that man.”

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S WRATH

Until modern times, the universal consent of the great teachers of the church stressed both God’s justice and love, as well as the corresponding acts of mercy and wrath that flow from these attributes.

The Early Church Fathers on God’s Wrath

The patristic Fathers had no illusion of a lopsidedly loving God who would not punish sin. They spoke consistently of a balanced view that included mercy to the repentant as well as wrath to the wicked.

Origen

Indeed, we speak of the wrath of God. However, we do not maintain that it indicates any passion on His part. Rather, it is something that is assumed in order to discipline by stern means those sinners who have committed many and grievous sins. For that which is called God's wrath and His anger is actually a means of discipline, (in Bercot, DECB, 21)

Novatian

When we read of His anger and consider certain descriptions of His indignation ... we are not to understand them to be attributed to Him in the same sense in which they are to humans. For although all these things can corrupt man, they cannot at all corrupt the Divine power. All those angers or hatreds of God, or whatever there is of this kind, are displayed for our healing.... They arose out of wisdom, not from vice, (ibid.)

Lactantius

It is the fear of God alone that guards the mutual society of men. By this, life itself is sustained, protected, and governed. However, such fear is taken away if man is persuaded that God is without anger. For not only the common advantage, but also reason and truth itself, persuade us that He is moved and is indignant when unjust actions are done.

There is a just and also an unjust anger.... The unjust anger ... is to be restrained in man—lest he should rush into some very great evil through rage. This type of anger cannot exist in God, for He cannot be injured.... There is also just anger. This anger is necessary in man for the correction of wickedness. Plainly, then, it is also necessary in God, who sets an example for man. Just as we should restrain those who are subject to our power, so also God should restrain the offenses of everyone.

We should understand that since God is eternal, His anger also remains to eternity. On the other hand, since He is endowed with the greatest excellence, He controls His anger. He is not ruled by it; rather, He regulates it according to His will.... For if His anger were completely inextinguishable, there would be no place after a sin for satisfaction or reconciliation, (ibid., 21–22)

The Medieval Fathers on God's Wrath

There was no change of view on God's wrath during the Middle Ages. Like their theological forebears, the medieval Fathers also viewed God consistently and eternally displeased with sin.

Augustine

I would exhort to give heed, if they be wise, and to observe how, without any such arts, the position of a shepherd was exchanged for the dignity of the kingly office by David, of whom Scripture has faithfully recorded both the sinful and the meritorious actions, in order that we might know both how to avoid offending God, and how, when He has been offended, His wrath may be appeased. (LSA, 139 in Schaff, NPNF, 1:1)

Take, for example, that saying of the apostle: "But, after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil” (OCD, 3:11:17 in ibid., 1:2).

Therefore “God commendeth His love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, being now justified in His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him...” From the wrath certainly of God, which is nothing else but just retribution. For the wrath of God is not, as is that of man, a perturbation of the mind; but it is the wrath of Him to whom Holy Scripture says in another place, “But Thou, O Lord, mastering Thy power, judgest with calmness” (AA, 13:6 in ibid., 3).

Thomas Aquinas

Original sin is hinted at in “and we were by nature children of wrath.” This sin of the first parent was not only passed on to the Gentiles but to the Jews also: “Wherefore as by one man sin entered into this world, and by sin death; and so death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned” (Rom. 5:12)... Thus he says we were by nature, that is, from the earliest beginning of nature—not of nature as nature, since this is good and from God, but of nature as vitiated—children of an avenging wrath, aimed at punishment and hell, even as the rest, that is, the Gentiles. (CE, 89)

The Reformation Leaders on God’s Wrath

The backdrop of the Reformation emphasis on God’s grace in justification by faith is the wrath of God. Because God is just, He must punish sin; His grace through Christ’s payment of the penalty for our sin shines more brightly in view of this necessity.

Martin Luther

God is called a “Fire” because He utterly destroys the godless and leaves them nothing; nor is there anything that can resist His wrath. He is called “jealous” because His disposition is such that He will not spare. Who, then, should not fear Him of whom it is known that He will not spare and that He has the ability implacably and unceasingly to take vengeance?

Moses calls God “jealous,” one who will not drop the matter, who must stand by His Word. Both are here joined, the will and the power, strength and might, so that He both can and will punish. If people held this to be the truth, they would not despise His Commandments so shamefully. But no one believes Him to be like this until he experiences it.

The wrath of God is real, not fictitious, not a jest. If it were false, then mercy would be fictitious; for as the wrath, so the mercy which forgives.... Christ most assuredly took upon Himself the wrath of God and bore it for us. So He did not take it upon Himself merely as an example, but He is in very truth the purchase price expended for us.

God punishes in a twofold manner. In the first place, He does so in grace, as a benevolent Father; and the chastisement is temporal. In the second place, He punishes in wrath, as a strict Judge; and this punishment is eternal. (WLS, 1549, 53)

John Calvin

For were it not said in clear terms, that Divine wrath, and vengeance, and eternal death, lay upon us, we should be less sensible of our wretchedness without the mercy of God, and less disposed to value the blessing of deliverance. For example, let a person be told, Had God at the time you were a sinner hated you, and cast you off as you deserved, horrible destruction must have been your doom;

but spontaneously and of free indulgence he retained you in his favour, not suffering you to be estranged from him, and in this way rescued you from danger—the person will indeed be affected, and made sensible in some degree how much he owes to the mercy of God. (ICR, 2.16.2)

Post-Reformation Theologians

Until recent times, the theologians following the Reformers have discussed God's wrath. The attribute faded only with the rise of modern unitarianism and liberalism.

Jacob Arminius

Hatred is an affection of separation in God; whose primary object is injustice or unrighteousness; and the secondary, the misery of the creature.... But since God properly loves himself and the good of justice, and by the same impulse holds iniquity in detestation; and since he secondarily loves the creature and his blessedness, and in that impulse hates the misery of the creature, that is, He wills it to be taken away from the creature; hence it comes to pass that He hates the creature who perseveres in unrighteousness, and He loves his misery.

Hatred, however, is not collateral to Love, but necessarily flowing from it; since Love neither does nor can tend towards all those things which become objects to the understanding of God. It belongs to Him therefore in the first act, and must be placed in Him prior to any existence of a thing worthy of hatred; which existence being laid down, the act of hatred arises from it by a natural necessity, not by liberty of the will. (WJA, 1.456)

Jonathan Edwards

God has set bounds to every man's wickedness; he suffers men to live, and go on in sin, till they have filled up their measure, and then cuts them off. Consider, you know not what wrath God may be about to execute upon wicked men in this world. Wrath may, in some sense, be coming upon them, in the present life, to the uttermost, for ought we know. (WJE, 2.122, 2.124)

Stephen Charnock

The greatest different interests are reconciled, justice in punishing, and mercy in pardoning. For man had broken the law, and plunged himself into a gulf of misery: the sword of vengeance was unsheathed by justice, for the punishment of the criminal; the bowels of compassion were stirred by mercy, for the rescue of the miserable. Justice severely beholds the sin, and mercy compassionately reflects upon the misery. Two different claims are entered by those concerned attributes: justice votes for destruction, and mercy votes for salvation. Justice would draw the sword, and drench it in the blood of the offender; mercy would stop the sword, and turn it from the breast of the sinner. Justice would edge it, and mercy would blunt it. The arguments are strong on both sides. (EAG, 1.554)

Charles Hodge

God's wrath flows from His holiness. The truth of this doctrine may also be inferred from the holiness of God. If He is infinitely pure, his nature must be opposed to all sin; and as his acts are determined by his nature, his disapprobation of sin must manifest itself in his acts. But the disfavour of God, the manifestation of his disapprobation, is death, as his favour is life. It cannot be that this essential opposition between holiness and sin should be dependent for its manifestation on the mere ab [extra] consideration that evil would result from sin being allowed to go unpunished. It might as well be said that we should feel no aversion to pain, unless aware that it weakened our constitution. We do not approve of holiness simply because it tends to produce happiness; neither do we disapprove of sin simply because it tends to produce misery. It is inevitable, therefore, that the perfection of the infinitely holy God should manifest its opposition to sin, without waiting to judge the consequences of the expression of this divine repugnance. (ST, 422, emphasis added)

William G. T. Shedd

There is a kind of wrath in the human soul that resembles the wrath of God, and constitutes its true analogue. It is the wrath of the human conscience, which is wholly different from that of the human heart. This kind of anger is commanded in the injunction “Be ye angry and sin not” (Eph. 4:26). Were this species of moral displacency more often considered, and the Divine anger illustrated by it, there would be less of the common and unthinking opposition to the doctrine of the Divine wrath. (DT, 176)

J. I. Packer

The wrath of God in Romans denotes God’s resolute action in punishing sin. It is as much the expression of a personal, emotional attitude of the triune Jehovah as is his love to sinners; it is the active manifesting of his hatred of irreligion and moral evil.... God’s wrath is his reaction to our sin, and “law brings wrath” [Rom. 4:15] because the law stirs up sin latent within us and causes transgression—the behavior that evokes wrath—to abound [5:20; 7:7–13]. As a reaction to sin, God’s wrath is an expression of his justice. (KG, 154)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD’S WRATH

Objections against God’s wrath generally follow from alleged inconsistency with other attributes, such as love or mercy, or else from the eternal nature of His wrath on the unrepentant.

Objection One—Based on an Alleged Inconsistency With Mercy

How can one and the same God exercise both wrath and mercy toward His creatures? These appear to be incompatible characteristics, since one is the opposite of the other. Hence, it would seem that God cannot be both.

Response to Objection One

Wrath and mercy are not incompatible, since they are exercised toward different objects; wrath is on the unrepentant, and mercy is on the repentant. As established previously, God is consistently and unchangeably angry with sin and consistently and unchangeably delighted with righteousness.

Objection Two—Based on an Alleged Overkill of Eternal Wrath

Temporal wrath is one thing; eternal wrath is another. The Bible declares: “This will happen when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven in blazing fire with his powerful angels. He will punish those who do not know God and do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They will be punished with everlasting destruction and shut out from the presence of the Lord and from the majesty of his power” (2 Thess. 1:7–9). Eternal wrath for temporal sin seems to be a classic case of overkill.

Response to Objection Two

It is to be noted, first of all, that this is not so much an objection against God’s wrath as it is an objection against the doctrine of hell, which is discussed in detail later (see Volume 4, chapter 11). Further, any protest against God’s wrath is equally an objection against His holiness and justice, from which it flows. But, as has already been shown, there is a strong biblical, theological, and historical basis for all of these (see chapters 13–14).

As for the justice of exercising wrath, it should be remarked that not to punish sin would be unjust. And, since God is eternal, not to punish sin eternally would be an eternal injustice. The sin of the ultimately unrepentant is sin against the eternal God, and a sin against the Eternal is deserving of eternal punishment.

Objection Three—Based on an Alleged Inconsistency With Atonement

It is noted by some critics that Christ took the wrath of God for sinners, being made sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21)—He was the satisfaction for our sins (1 John 2:2). This being the case, it seems unnecessary for any person to suffer the consequences for his sins, since Christ has already done so (Rom. 5:15–19).

Response to Objection Three

This objection is based on a misunderstanding of what Christ did on the cross (see Volume 3, chapter 12). The salvation of everyone was not applied; it was simply purchased. All persons were made savable, but not all persons were automatically saved. The gift was made possible by the Savior, but it must be received by the sinner (Eph. 2:8–9; cf. John 1:12). In short, the salvation of all sinners from God’s eternal wrath is possible, but only those who accept Christ’s payment for their sins will actually be saved from it.

To put it another way, this objection presupposes universalism (that all will be saved), for which there is no sound biblical, theological, or historical basis (see Volume 3, chapter 13).

CONCLUSION

Mercy and wrath are a matched pair of God’s moral characteristics; the former is exercised on the repentant, and the latter on the unrepentant. While some believe these are incompatible; again, they form a unity in the character of God. They are consistent, since they are exercised on two different objects.

As to whether these are attributes of God or activities that flow from other attributes, it depends on how one defines them. In any case, if mercy and wrath are thought of as acts, then the unchangeable basis for them is in God’s goodness and justice, respectively.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

A RESPONSE TO GOD'S ATTRIBUTES

Although it is not within the purview of this work to provide a systematic discussion of practical theology, a few comments are appropriate here. God did not intend that His attributes be studied in absence of a response on the part of His creatures. Contemplating the Creator should change the creature; meditating on the Master should make a difference in the life of the servant.

GOD'S ATTRIBUTES AND OUR ACTIONS IN GENERAL

Numerous verses of Scripture contain the exhortation to respond in direct connection with the presentation of the attribute. Moses cited the Lord, saying, "I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy" (Lev. 11:45). Jesus said, "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). John wrote, "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he [God] is pure" (1 John 3:3).

Whole chapters of the Bible are dedicated to an attribute or attributes of God, followed by our expected response to it (them). Psalm 139 is a classic example, and it can be outlined as follows.

God's Revelation of Himself (vv. 1–16)

God's Omniscience (vv. 1–6)

O LORD, you have searched me and you know me. You know when I sit and when I rise; you perceive my thoughts from afar. You discern my going out and my lying down; you are familiar with all my ways. Before a word is on my tongue you know it completely, O LORD. You hem me in—behind and before; you have laid your hand upon me. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me, too lofty for me to attain.

God's Omnipresence (vv. 7–12)

Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence? If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there. If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast. If I say, "Surely the darkness will hide me and the light become night around me," even the darkness will not be dark to you; the night will shine like the day, for darkness is as light to you.

God's Omnipotence (vv. 13–16)

For you created my inmost being; you knit me together in my mother's womb. I praise you because I am fearfully and wonderfully made; your works are wonderful, I know that full well. My frame was not hidden from you when I was made in the secret place. When I was woven together in the depths of the earth, your eyes saw my unformed body. All the days ordained for me were written in your book before one of them came to be.

Our Response to God's Revelation of Himself (vv. 17–24)

The final two verses of David's reply are "Search me, O God, and know my heart; test me and know my anxious thoughts. See if there is any offensive way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting" (vv. 23–24). Clearly, the subject of the attributes of God was not purely academic with the psalmist (or any other biblical writer).

SPECIFIC ATTRIBUTES AND SPECIFIC ACTIONS

Not only should meditating on God's nature in general produce godliness in general, but contemplating specific attributes should bring specific actions.

Responding to God's Sovereignty

Since God is the sovereign Lord of the universe, we can live with the assurance that He is in control: "Have I not commanded you? Be strong and courageous. Do not be terrified; do not be discouraged, for the LORD your God will be with you wherever you go" (Josh. 1:9).

And we can be confident that He can bring good out of evil: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:20).

Likewise, we should be grateful that He desires to use us. As Paul said, "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who has given me strength, that he considered me faithful, appointing me to his service" (1 Tim. 1:12).

Finally, we should be thankful to be His instruments. Paul wrote, "We have this treasure in jars of clay to show that this all-surpassing power is from God and not from us" (2 Cor. 4:7).

Responding to God's Infinity

In the light of God's unlimited nature, several responses are appropriate. First, we should be humbled as Solomon was when he said, "Will God really dwell on earth? The heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27).

Further, we should have the awe of Isaiah when he wrote, "In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple.... And they [the seraphim] were calling to one another: 'Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory.' At the sound of their voices the doorposts and thresholds shook and the temple was filled with smoke. 'Woe to me!' I cried. 'I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the Lord Almighty' " (Isa. 6:1-5).

Finally, we should have the praise of Paul when he declared, "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!" (Rom. 11:33).

Responding to God's Immateriality

God is pure Spirit (John 4:24); as such, He demands a certain response. For one thing, we should avoid all idolatry. Exodus declares, "You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below" (Ex. 20:3-4). Paul told the Athenians that "the God who made the world and everything in it is the Lord of heaven and earth and does not live in temples built by hands. And he is not served by human hands, as if he needed anything, because he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else.... 'We are his offspring.' Therefore since we are God's offspring, we should not think that the divine being is like gold or silver or stone—an image made by man's design and skill" (Acts 17:24-29).

Implied in the above passages is another implication of God being pure Spirit, namely, that He should be worshiped in a spiritual way. Jesus said, God's "worshippers must worship in spirit and in truth" (John 4:24). This means that our worship should be from our spirits (which are immaterial like God) and in a spiritual manner. Paul warned of those who have "a form of godliness but [deny] its power" (2 Tim. 3:5). This does not intend to signify, of course, that we are forbidden to use ritual in worshiping God. Even the most simple service has some form, structure, or ritual to it. Rather it means that we should avoid outward ritual that has no inner reality. We should not confuse lace and grace.

Responding to God's Transcendence

A kindred characteristic of God is His transcendence above all His creation. This should give us a sense of awe: "O LORD, our LORD, how majestic is your name in all the earth! You have set your glory above the heavens" (Ps. 8:1).

Likewise, God's transcendence should prompt a sense of insignificance in us: "Great is the LORD, and most worthy of praise, in the city of our God, his holy mountain" (Ps. 48:1).

In addition, we should be led to a sense of sinfulness, as we have seen that Isaiah was: "I saw the LORD seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple.... And they [the seraphim] were calling to one another: 'Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory'.... 'Woe to me!' I cried. 'I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty' " (Isa. 6:1-5).

Further, a sense of submission is an appropriate response. As Paul put it, "Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:9-11).

Finally, a sense of reverence should emerge from contemplating God's exaltedness: "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" (Rev. 4:11).

Responding to God's Omnipresence and Immanence

God's intimate presence in all of creation should elicit several responses from us. First of all, we should have an awareness of God's nearness, since He is nearer to us than any other being or thing can possibly be. Again, as David said (in Ps. 139:7-10): "Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence? If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there. If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast."

Furthermore, we should have a sense of utter reliance, for our very moment-by-moment existence is dependent upon God. Paul wrote, "He is before all things, and in him all things hold together" (Col. 1:17). We depend on Him for our very reality, for "in him we live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:27-28).

Finally, we can hide nothing from God. Hebrews declares, "Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13).

Responding to God's Majesty

As King of Kings, God has regal majesty. Our response to this attribute is that God is highly praised for His greatness: "Great is the Lord, and most worthy of praise, in the city of our God, his holy mountain" (Ps. 48:1).

Further, God should be repeatedly blessed for His blessedness: "Praise the LORD, O my soul. O LORD my God, you are very great; you are clothed with splendor and majesty" (Ps. 104:1).

What is more, God should always be held in awe for His awesomeness: "O LORD, our LORD, how majestic is your name in all the earth! You have set your glory above the heavens" (Ps. 8:1).

Finally, the Lord should forever be given the highest honor for His honorableness: "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" (Rev. 4:11).

Responding to God's Beauty

God's majesty gives us a sense of the Supreme; His beauty gives a sense of the Sublime. While our response is similar, there are some dimensions of His beauty that call for special comment.

First of all, we should enjoy all beauty as a gift of God: "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). Everything that is beautiful somehow reflects His character.

Furthermore, we should anticipate the incredible and ultimate beauty of seeing God face-to-face. In this present life, God's ineffable loveliness is veiled. As Paul said, "Now we see but a poor reflection as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known" (1 Cor. 13:9–12). Even Moses, the great mediator between Israel and God, could not see the Lord face-to-face (Ex. 33:22–23), for "no one has ever seen God" (John 1:18), but in heaven "they will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads" (Rev. 22:4). This is called the Beatific (blessed) Vision (see Volume 4, chapter 10).

Responding to God's Omnipotence

In response to God's unlimited power, believers can have assurance in the present that God can solve our problems. As Abraham was asked by God, "Is anything too hard for the LORD?" (Gen. 18:14).

Also, we can be sure that God can (and will) keep His promises to us. He will keep conditional promises conditionally (1 John 1:9), and He will keep unconditional promises unconditionally, for He said, "Never will I leave you; never will I forsake you" (Heb. 13:5).

Further, God's omnipotence assures us that believers are eternally secure in their salvation (see Volume 3, chapter 11): "For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38–39).

Finally, we can be certain about the future, for God has the power to fulfill prophecy. He declared, "I make known the end from the beginning, from ancient times, what is still to come .... What I have said, that will I bring about; what I have planned, that will I do" (Isa. 46:10–11). God has the complete ability to accomplish His purposes; He announced to Isaiah, "So is my word that goes out from my mouth: It will not return to me empty, but will accomplish what I desire and achieve the purpose for which I sent it” (Isa. 55:11).

Responding to God’s Eternality

In response to God’s eternity, we should again have confidence that God’s purpose will stand: “I make known the end from the beginning, from ancient times, what is still to come. I say: My purpose will stand, and I will do all that I please” (Isa. 46:10). Also, we can have assurance God’s promises will be kept: “But you remain the same, and your years will never end. The children of your servants will live in your presence; their descendants will be established before you” (Ps. 102:27–28). Further, our hope in Christ is established: “We have this hope as an anchor for the soul, firm and secure. It enters the inner sanctuary behind the curtain, where Jesus, who went before us, has entered on our behalf. He has become a high priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek” (Heb. 6:19–20). Finally, we have the promise that Christ can help us now: “There have been many of those priests, since death prevented them from continuing in office; but because Jesus lives forever, he has a permanent priesthood. Therefore he is able to save completely those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them” (Heb. 7:23–25).

Responding to God’s Immutability

Since God is unchangeable, we can trust His Word: “God is not a man, that he should lie, nor a son of man, that he should change his mind. Does he speak and then not act? Does he promise and not fulfill?” (Num. 23:19).

Also, we can trust God’s promises completely: “In the beginning you laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of your hands. They will perish, but you remain; they will all wear out like a garment. Like clothing you will change them and they will be discarded. But you remain the same, and your years will never end” (Ps. 102:25–27).

Further, we can be sure of our salvation, because “if we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself” (2 Tim. 2:13). What is more, God’s immutability provides an anchor for our souls: “Because God wanted to make the unchanging nature of his purpose very clear to the heirs of what was promised, he confirmed it with an oath. God did this so that, by two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we who have fled to take hold of the hope offered to us may be greatly encouraged” (Heb. 6:17–18).

Finally, we have a stable foundation for service. Paul wrote, “Therefore, my dear brothers, stand firm. Let nothing move you. Always give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord, because you know that your labor in the Lord is not in vain” (1 Cor. 15:58).

Responding to God’s Impassibility

Since God has no needs or changing passions, we should respond in humility, knowing that we cannot add anything to Him: “He is not served by human hands, as if he needed anything, because he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else” (Acts 17:25). Rather, in thanksgiving, we should remember that He is the giver of “every good and perfect gift” (James 1:17). We can give back to Him only what He has given us. As David said, “But who am I, and who are my people, that we should be able to give as generously as this? Everything comes from you, and we have given you only what comes from your hand” (1 Chron. 29:14). So in confidence we know He never changes His feelings toward us. He remains eternally and unchangeably consistent in His love and compassion toward us (Jer. 31:3).

Responding to God's Omniscience

God is all-knowing, and as such we can be assured that He strongly supports our good actions: "For the eyes of the Lord range throughout the earth to strengthen those whose hearts are fully committed to him" (2 Chron. 16:9).

It encourages us to know that we have a limitless source of truth that leads us to obedience: "Your statutes are wonderful; therefore I obey them. The unfolding of your words gives light; it gives understanding to the simple" (Ps. 119:129–30).

We must also be aware that God knows even our secret sins: "Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13).

God's omniscience assures us that God will reward even unknown actions: "When you give to the needy, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, so that your giving may be in secret. Then your Father, who sees what is done in secret, will reward you.... But when you pray, go into your room, close the door and pray to your Father, who is unseen. Then your Father, who sees what is done in secret, will reward you" (Matt. 6:3–6).

Further, we should be humble with our ideas: "You asked, 'Who is this that obscures my counsel without knowledge?' Surely I spoke of things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know. You said, 'Listen now, and I will speak; I will question you, and you shall answer me.' My ears had heard of you but now my eyes have seen you. Therefore I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes" (Job 42:3–6).

Responding to God as Living

Since the God of the Bible is the "living God" who created every living thing (Gen. 1:27), we should be thankful to Him for the gift of life. Again, James reminds us that "every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17).

As the Source of life itself, God can provide all we need for life, both physically and spiritually (John 4:10; 6:51): "You open your hand and satisfy the desires of every living thing" (Ps. 145:16). Jesus said to the woman at the well, "If you knew the gift of God and who it is that asks you for a drink, you would have asked him and he would have given you living water" (John 4:10).

Because God created life from nonlife, He can also raise the dead. Hence, we can be assured of eventually overcoming death by His resurrection power, proclaiming: "Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?" (1 Cor. 15:55).

Responding to God's Immortality

Since only God has intrinsic immortality (1 Tim. 6:16), and our immortality is a gift from Him (Rom. 2:7), we should have great admiration for the Source of immortal life. As Job put it, "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised" (Job 1:21).

Further, we should recognize the contingency of life: “In Him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28); “in Him all things hold together” (Col. 1:17).

Finally, because of God’s immortality and His promise to us of the same, we can anticipate our glorious resurrection. As Paul said, Christ, “by the power that enables him to bring everything under his control, will transform our lowly bodies so that they will be like his glorious body” (Phil. 3:21). Thus, “we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies” (Rom. 8:23) when “the perishable must clothe itself with the imperishable, and the mortal with immortality” (1 Cor. 15:53).

Responding to God’s Omnibenevolence

Since God is all-loving, we should be reminded that “we love because he first loved us” (1 John 4:19). Likewise, “he who has been forgiven little loves little” (Luke 7:47). What is more, “Christ’s love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again” (2 Cor. 5:14–15). Finally, as we have seen, God’s unconditional love gives a deep sense of security, for “if we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself” (2 Tim. 2:13).

Responding to God as Light

As light, God is the Source of all spiritual illumination. John said of Jesus that He was “the true light that gives light to every man [who] was coming into the world” (John 1:9). Jesus said of Himself, “I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life” (John 8:12). Also, “You are my lamp, O LORD; the LORD turns my darkness into light” (2 Sam. 22:29).

God is not only light Himself, but He gives light. Thus, Isaiah urged, “Come, O house of Jacob, let us walk in the light of the Lord” (Isa. 2:5). The psalmist continued, “Open my eyes that I may see wonderful things in your law” (Ps. 119:18). Thus, “The LORD is my light and my salvation—whom shall I fear?” (Ps. 27:1).

Responding to God’s Unity

Because God is absolutely one, we should avoid all forms of polytheism, tritheism, and idolatry. Meditating on God’s unity brings oneness to believers. Paul urged, “Make every effort to keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace. There is one body and one Spirit—just as you were called to one hope when you were called—one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all” (Eph. 4:3–6). To illustrate, the closer the spokes of a wheel get to the center, the closer they all get to one another. Likewise, concentrating on the nature of God brings unity to Christians.

Responding to God’s Wisdom

God is all-wise; because of His omniscience, we should fear Him. To be wise we must respect wisdom, and God is Wisdom personified. Thus, “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge, but fools despise wisdom and discipline” (Prov. 1:7).

Therefore, when we lack wisdom we should request it of God. James wrote, “If any of you lacks wisdom, he should ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault, and it will be given to him” (James 1:5).

Further, we should look to Christ for true wisdom, for “in [Christ] are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (Col. 2:3). And, “It is because of him that you are in Christ Jesus, who has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our righteousness, holiness and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30).

In fact, we need wisdom to know God. Consequently, Paul said, “I keep asking that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the glorious Father, may give you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, so that you may know him better” (Eph. 1:17).

Responding to God’s Jealousy

As mentioned previously, jealousy seems to be a strange attribute of God, yet, once understood, it inspires an awesome response. God’s jealousy indicates His holy zeal to protect His own supremacy that flows out in His wrath on idolatry and other sins. In view of this attribute, three responses are most appropriate.

First of all, we should worship God as supreme. He insists in the first commandment: “You shall have no other gods before me” (Ex. 20:3). Yahweh adds in Isaiah: “I am the LORD, and there is no other.... And there is no God apart from me, a righteous God and a Savior; there is none but me.... Before me every knee will bow; by me every tongue will swear” (Isa. 45:18–23).

What is more, since God is jealous, we should rid ourselves of all idols. He declares, “You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below” (Ex. 20:4).

Finally, we should seek our ultimate good in the Ultimate Good (God). Solomon tried everything “under the sun” for satisfaction, concluding that “all is vanity and vexation of spirit” (Eccl. 1–3 KJV). But while nothing under the sun can bring permanent and complete happiness, there is One above the sun, namely, the SON, who said, “I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full” (John 10:10). Indeed, David said to God, “You have made known to me the path of life; you will fill me with joy in your presence, with eternal pleasures at your right hand” (Ps. 16:11).

Responding to God’s Moral Perfection

God is not only infinite, He is infinitely perfect. Thus, He demands of us: “Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). Paul adds, “Finally, brothers, goodbye. Aim for perfection” (2 Cor. 13:11). If we aim at nothing, we will usually hit it. The sign under the sketch of a girl with an apple on her head and an arrow in her forehead reads, “To succeed, aim higher!”

Thus, while we cannot attain absolute perfection in this life, we should press toward it, as Paul said, “Not that I have already obtained all this, or have already been made perfect, but I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me” (Phil. 3:12).

Likewise, we should pray for perfection: “We are glad whenever we are weak but you are strong; and our prayer is for your perfection” (2 Cor. 13:9). When we aim at, seek, and pray for perfection, we can live in God’s perfect plan: “Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God’s will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will” (Rom. 12:2).

Of course, we know that we cannot attain absolute perfection in this life, so we look forward to it in heaven: “When perfection comes, the imperfect disappears” (1 Cor. 13:10). As John said, “We know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2).

Responding to God’s Truthfulness

Since God is absolutely truthful, we can trust His promises (Ps. 89:35); we can be assured of our salvation (2 Tim. 2:13); and we are protected by His truth (Ps. 91:4 NKJV). We are also saved by His truth (Eph. 1:13) and sanctified by it as well (2 Thess. 2:13). We are liberated by His truth (John 8:32) and are established forever by it (Ps. 117:2).

Further, we should always utter the truth (Eph. 4:25). We should speak the truth in love (Eph. 4:15); we should walk in His truth (Ps. 86:11); and we should serve Him in truth (1 Sam. 12:24 KJV). We should diligently study His truth (2 Tim. 2:15; John 17:17); we should worship Him in truth (John 4:24); and we should pray to be led in truth (Ps. 25:5).

Responding to God’s Righteousness

God is absolutely just or righteous. As we meditate upon what this means, the Bible guides us in our response. We should be instructed in justice (or righteousness) through God’s holy Word (2 Tim. 3:15–17). We should earnestly pursue it (2 Tim. 2:22) and thirst after it (Matt. 5:6). We should also be willing to suffer for it (1 Peter 3:14; 2 Tim. 3:12); submit to it (Rom. 10:3); be slaves of it (Rom. 6:18); and practice it (1 John 3:7). Jesus said, “Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things will be given to you as well” (Matt. 6:33).

Responding to God’s Holiness

As awesome as God’s holiness is (see Isaiah 6), we should try to emulate it. First, we should be holy as God is holy. As cited previously, He said, “I am the Lord who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy” (Lev. 11:45).

Further, we should be pure as God is pure: “God did not call us to be impure, but to live a holy life” (1 Thess. 4:7). Paul added, “Since we have these promises, dear friends, let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God” (2 Cor. 7:1).

In addition, we should stand in awe of God’s holiness. Isaiah wrote, “They will acknowledge the holiness of the Holy One of Jacob, and will stand in awe of the God of Israel” (Isa. 29:23).

Finally, we should pursue holiness. Hebrews instructs, “Make every effort to live in peace with all men and to be holy; without holiness no one will see the Lord (Heb. 12:14). Few books inspire us to do this better than A. W. Tozer’s The Knowledge of the Holy and The Pursuit of God. For a general response to who God is, J. I. Packer’s Knowing God is extremely helpful.

CONCLUSION

The response of godly men and women of old stands in stark contrast to the shallow response of the typical Christian today. They stood “in awe” of the God of Israel (Isa. 29:23). Ezekiel fell on his face as he beheld visions of God’s glory (Ezek. 1:28). Paul was blinded by the light of Jesus (Acts 9) and had to be given a thorn in his flesh to remain humble after his exalted vision (2 Cor. 12). After seeing Jesus' omnipotence at work, Peter "fell at Jesus' knees and said, 'Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man!'" (Luke 5:8). Isaiah cried, "Woe to me! ... I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5).

God is an awesome God, and He should be responded to in awe. He is the King of the universe, and He should be approached with obeisance to His royalty. He is the Sovereign before whom "every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (Phil. 2:10). He is the great Creator around whose throne all unfallen angels and redeemed people gather and sing: "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" (Rev. 4:11). And He is the loving Redeemer before whom John heard "every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth and on the sea, and all that is in them, singing: 'To him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb be praise and honor and glory and power, for ever and ever!'" (Rev. 5:13).

PART TWO

CREATION

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

ALTERNATIVE VIEWS ON CREATION

The theological setting for the Christian doctrine of creation is theistic. Theism can best be understood in contrast with the other two main views (pantheism and atheism—see Volume 1, chapter 2). Each holds a fundamentally different view of origins.

There are three primary alternatives on the nature of creation (see Geisler, KTC, chapter 4). Materialists (many of whom are atheists) believe in creation out of matter (ex materia), while pantheists claim creation comes out of God (ex Deo), and theists hold to creation by God out of nothing (ex nihilo).

MATERIALISM: CREATION OUT OF MATTER

The materialistic view of creation contends that matter (or physical energy) is eternal: Matter always has been, and always will be. As the physicist claims, “Energy can neither be created nor destroyed.” This is known as the first law of thermodynamics.

There are two basic subdivisions in the “creation out of matter” view: those that involve a God (e.g., platonism), and those that do not (e.g., atheism).

Platonism: God Created Out of Preexisting Matter

Many ancient Greeks believed in creation by God out of some previously existing, eternal “lump of clay.” That is, both God and the “stuff” of the material universe (cosmos) were always there. “Creation” is the eternal process by which God has been continually forming matter, giving shape to the contents of the universe.

Plato (c. 427–347 B.C.) held this view of creation out of matter (T, 27ff.). He called matter “the formless” (or “chaos”), while God was the Former (or Demiurgos). Using an eternal world of forms (ideas), God gave shape or structure to the formless mass of stuff called matter. In brief, the Former (God), by means of the forms (ideas that flowed from the Form), formed the formless (matter) into the formed (cosmos). Or, using the Greek words, the Demiurgos, by means of the eidos (ideas), which flowed from the agathos (Good), formed the chaos (formless) into a kosmos (material universe).

There are several elements of this platonic view of creation briefly explained here.

Matter Is Eternal

The basic stuff of the physical universe has always been here. There never was a time when all the elements of the cosmos did not exist. Everything has been forever.

“Creation” Means Formation, Not Origination

According to this view, “creation” does not mean bringing something into existence that previously did not exist; rather, it means formation of what has always existed. God allegedly does not originate matter; He simply organizes the matter that has always been there.

The “Creator” Is a Former, Not a Producer

In this platonic view, the word Creator does not mean “Originator of all that exists,” but simply the “Builder.” The building blocks were already there—God just put them together. Hence, God is only an architect of the material universe, not the Source of it.

God Is Not Sovereign Over All Things

A consequence of the platonic worldview is that God is not really in ultimate control of all things, for there is something eternal outside of Him: There is a given, something that even God must deal with. Matter is just there, and God cannot do anything about it. He can shape matter, but it places certain limitations on Him. Just as there are limits on what can be made out of paper (it is good for making kites, but not for space shuttles), so the very nature of matter is a handicap to the Creator’s ability. In short, both the existence and nature of matter supposedly place limits on God.

Atheism: Matter Is Eternal

A second worldview within materialism is generally called atheism, although many agnostics hold it as well. An atheist says there is no God; an agnostic claims not to know whether there is a God. However, neither believes it is necessary to posit God in order to explain the universe: Matter is simply there and always has been in one form or another. In fact, for the atheist, the universe is ultimately all that exists—even mind came from matter. Those atheists who believe that humans have souls usually insist that the soul is dependent on the body as a shadow is on a tree (see Volume 3, chapter 2).

If questioned as to where the universe came from, the strict materialist may ask in reply: Where did God come from? They claim it makes no more sense to inquire about who made the universe than it does to ask who made God.

That creation came out of matter (ex materia) has been held by many thinkers down through the centuries, from the ancient atomists (who reduced all things to atoms) to modern materialists like Karl Marx [1818–1883] (see MER, 298).

One contemporary spokesperson for this view was the famous astronomer Carl Sagan (1934–1996), who believed that “THE COSMOS IS ALL THAT IS OR EVER WAS OR EVER WILL BE” (C, 4). Humans are simply Stardust pondering stars. Rather than God creating people, people created God. As Karl Marx put it, mind did not create matter; matter created mind (op. cit., 231).

Granting the eternal existence of matter and motion, everything else can be explained by purely natural evolution. Matter plus time, chance, and natural laws (such as natural selection) can explain everything. Even the complexities of human life can be rationalized through the purely natural laws of the physical universe. As we have seen, given enough time, monkeys at a typewriter can supposedly produce the works of Shakespeare. No intelligent Creator is necessary.

Summary of Ex Materia Creation

There are several important aspects to this nontheistic view, briefly summarized under the following four points.

Matter Is Eternal

Again, matter has always been—or, at least, as one atheist put it, “If matter came to be, it came into existence from nothing and by nothing” (Kenny, FW, 147). The material universe is self sustaining and self generating. It is probably eternal, but if it came to be, then it came to be on its own without outside help. As Isaac Asimov speculated, there are equally good chances for either nothing to come from nothing or for something to come out of nothing. As luck would have it, something emerged (BE, 148). So either matter is eternal, or else it came from nothing, spontaneously, without a cause.

Traditional materialists (called atomists) believed that there were innumerable, indestructible, little hard pellets of reality, called atoms. With the splitting of the atom and the emergence of Einstein’s  $e=mc^2$  (energy=mass  $\times$  the speed of light squared), materialists now speak of the indestructibility of energy. They appeal to the first law of thermodynamics, claiming, as we have seen, that “energy can neither be created nor destroyed.” Energy does not pass out of existence; it simply takes on new forms. Even at death, all the elements of our being are reabsorbed by the environment and reused by other things. The process allegedly goes on forever.

No Creator Is Necessary

Another premise of strict materialism is atheism or nontheism; that is, either there is no God or, at least, there is no need for a God. Humanist Manifesto II put it, “As non theists, we begin with humans not God, nature not deity” (Kurtz, HM II, 16).

According to the nontheistic “creation out of matter” view, no cause is needed to bring matter into existence or to form matter already in existence. There is neither a Creator nor a Maker (Former) of the world. The world explains itself.

Humans Are Not Immortal

Another usual implication of this perspective is that there is no immortal, never dying “soul” or spiritual aspect to human beings. Humanist Manifesto I noted, “The traditional dualism of mind and body must be rejected.” For, its writers believe, “Modern science discredits such historic concepts as the ‘ghost in the machine’ and the ‘separable soul’ ” (ibid., 8, 16–17). The strict materialist does not believe in spirit or mind at all: There is no mind, only a brain. Thought is simply a chemical reaction in the brain. Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) defined matter as follows:

The world (I mean not the earth only, that denominates the lovers of it “worldly men,” but the universe, that is, the whole mass of all things that are) is corporeal, that is to say, body; and hath the dimensions of magnitude, namely, length, breadth, and depth: also every part of body is likewise body, and hath the like dimensions; and consequently every part of the universe is body, and that which is not body is no part of the universe: and because the universe is all, that which is no part of it is nothing, and consequently nowhere. (L, 269)

Less stringent materialists admit the existence of a soul but deny that it can exist independently of matter. For them, the soul is to the body what the image in the mirror is to the one looking at it. When the body dies, so does the soul; when matter disintegrates, the mind is also destroyed.

Humans Are Not Unique

Among those holding to creation out of matter, there are differences regarding the nature of human beings. Most accord a special status to humans as the highest point in the evolutionary process. However, virtually all agree that humans are not qualitatively different from animals. Humans differ only in degree, not in kind, from lower forms of life. Human beings are the highest and latest animal form on the evolutionary ladder, but they are not uniquely different. They simply have some more highly developed abilities than primates. Certainly, it is said, humans are not unique over the rest of the animal kingdom, even if they are the highest in it.

Pantheism: Creation Out of God

On the other end of the spectrum from materialism is pantheism. Materialists claim all is matter; pantheists believe all is mind or spirit. On the subject of creation, materialism believes in creation out of matter (ex materia), but pantheism believes in creation out of God (ex Deo). There are two basic categories into which pantheists fall: absolute and non absolute.

Absolute Pantheism

An absolute pantheist claims that only mind (or spirit) exists, not matter. What we call matter is only an illusion, like a dream or mirage: It appears to exist, but it really does not exist. There are two classical representatives of this view, Parmenides (born c. 515 B.C.) from the West (a Greek) and Shankara (c. eighth century) from the East (a Hindu).

Again (see Volume 1, chapter 2), Parmenides argued that all is one, because to assume that more than one thing exists is absurd (Pin Kirk, PP, 266–83). If there were two or more things, they would have to differ, but the only ways to differ are by something (being) or by nothing (nonbeing). However, it is impossible to differ by nothing, since to differ by nothing (or nonbeing) is just another way of saying there is no difference at all. And two things cannot differ by being because being (or existence) is the only thing they have in common—it is impossible to differ by the very respect in which they are the same. Hence, Parmenides concluded that it is impossible to have two or more things. There can be only one being: All is one, and one is all. Thus, whatever else appears to be does not really exist.

Put in the context of creation, this simply means that God exists and the world does not; there is a Creator, but not really any creation. Or, at least, the only sense in which there can be said to be a creation is that it comes out of God the way a dream comes from a mind. The universe is only the nothing of which God thinks. God is the totality of all reality, and the non real about which He thinks and which appears to us, like zero, does not exist. It is literally nothing.

The famous Hindu philosopher Shankara (in Prabhavananda, SHI, 55) described the relation of the world to God, illusion to reality, by the analogy of what appears to be a snake but on closer examination turns out actually to be a rope. When we look at the world, what is there is not reality (Brahman); rather, it is merely an illusion (maya).

Likewise, when a person looks at himself, what appears to be (body) is only an illusory manifestation of what really is (soul). And when one looks into his soul, he discovers that the depth of his soul (atman) is really the depth of the universe (Brahman): Atman (man) is Brahman (God). To think we are not God is part of the illusion or dream from which we must awaken. Sooner or later we must discover that all comes from God, and all is God. So goes the absolute pantheist's argument.

Non Absolute Pantheism

Other pantheists hold a more flexible and elastic view of reality. While they believe all is one with God, they do not deny there is some multiplicity flowing (ex Deo) from the unity of God. They believe all is in the one as all radii are in the center of a circle, or as all drops merge into one infinite pond. Representatives of this view include the neoplatonic Plotinus (A.D. 205–270), the modern philosopher Benedict Spinoza (1632–1677), and the contemporary Hindu thinker Radhakrishna.

According to this thinking, there are many things in the world, but they all spring from the essence of the One (God). The many are in the One, but the One is not in the many; that is, all creatures are part of the Creator. They come from Him the way a flower unfolds from a seed or sparks come from a fire. Again, creatures are simply many drops that splash up from the infinite pond, only to eventually drop back in and blend with the All. All things come from God, are part of God, and merge back into God. Technically speaking, for the pantheist, there is no Creation, but only an emanation of all things from God. The universe was not made out of nothing (ex nihilo), nor out of something preexisting (ex materia)—it was made out of God (ex Deo).

Summary of the Pantheistic View of Origin

Several significant elements are contained in this pantheistic view of origins. They can be briefly outlined by four points.

There Is No Absolute Distinction Between Creator and Creation

Ultimately, Creator and creation are one. They may differ in perspective, as two sides of a saucer. Or, they may differ relationally, as Source does to sequent, as Cause to effect. Creator and creation may be no more different than the reflection in a lake is to the swan swimming on it. One is simply a mirror image of the other that is the real thing. Even for those who believe the world is real, Creator and creation are simply two sides of the same coin: There is no real difference between them.

There Is an Eternal Relation Between Creator and Creation

Pantheists believe that God caused the world, but they insist that He has been causing it forever. Just as rays would shine forever from an eternal sun or radii always emerge from the center of an eternal circle, even so God has been creating forever: The universe is as old as God. Just as in an eternal world one stone could be resting on another forever, so the world could be dependent on God forever. According to pantheism, the Cause has been creating from eternity.

The World Is of the Same “Stuff” As God

Pantheists believe God and the world are of the same substance: Both are comprised of God stuff. The creation is part of the Creator; it is one in nature with God. God is water. God is trees. As New Ager Marilyn Ferguson put it, when one watches milk being poured into cereal, he sees God being poured into God! (AC). Ultimately, there is only one substance, one “stuff in the universe, and it is divine. We are all made of it—we are all God.

Human Beings Are God

If all of creation is the emanation of God, then so is humankind. A pop theologian of New Age pantheism, Shirley MacLaine, believes that “you can use I am God, or I am Christ, or I am that I am, as Christ did” (DL, 112). In her television special miniseries “Out on a Limb” (January 1987), she waded to the ocean and proclaimed, “I am God. I am God!” Lord Maitreya, believed by many to be the “Christ” of the New Age, declared through Benjamin Creme, his press agent, “My purpose is to show man that he need fear no more, that all of Light and Truth rests within his heart, that when this simple fact is known man will become God” (Creme, MMC, 204).

THEISM: CREATION OUT OF NOTHING

In contrast to both materialism and pantheism, there is the Judeo Christian view of creation: out of nothing. According to this position, God is above and beyond the world, not merely in it, and certainly not of it. The Creator is related to creation more like a painter is to a painting. The painter is not the painting; rather he created the painting and is manifest in it. Likewise, God is not the world; instead, He created the world and manifests Himself in it (Ps. 19:1).

This position is represented by orthodox Judaism, Islam, and Christianity. Its proponents include great Christian thinkers such as Augustine, Anselm, and Aquinas, as well as Reformers such as Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin. Likewise, one of the best known twentieth century representatives of this view was C. S. Lewis.

Augustine’s Contribution to Theism

Augustine (354–430), the medieval monk, struggled his way through the preceding positions. He was once caught in the clutches of skepticism, which held to creation out of matter without a God. Later he accepted a form of manichean dualism, which believed there was an eternal evil kingdom opposed to God. Prior to his conversion to Christianity, Augustine was influenced by Plotinus, who, as mentioned before, believed in creation out of God (ex Deo). But, eventually, Augustine accepted the biblical position of creation out of nothing. He concluded that creation comes from God but is not of God. “‘From Him’ does not mean the same as ‘of Him’.... For from Him are heaven and earth, because He made them; but not of Him because they are not of His substance” (ONG, 27). Only Christ, God’s Son, is of ‘Him. All of creation is from God. Peter Kreeft noted that for Christians, “The world is not God and not an illusion. In Eastern religions, the world is either God or an illusion, either part of God’s mind or body, or maya, a trick” (BHH, 92).

God Alone Is Eternal

For Augustine, “the eternal God” created the temporal world (CG, 11.4). God alone is eternal, for He did not create from eternity. Augustine rejected the view of those who were denying “a ‘temporal’ but admitting a ‘creational’ beginning, as though, in some hardly comprehensible way, the world was made, but made from all eternity” (ibid.).

If one asked what God did before He made the world, Augustine replied, “God was unoccupied, for the simple reason that there was no such thing as time before the universe was made” (ibid., 11.5), for “if they excogitate infinite periods of time before the world, in which they cannot see how God could have had nothing to do, they ought to conceive of infinite reaches of space beyond the visible universe” (ibid.). But this is absurd, because there is no space beyond the finite cosmos.

The World Had a Beginning

Augustine declared, “Sacred and infallible Scripture tells us that in the beginning God created heaven and earth in order.... Undoubtedly, then, the world was made not in time but together with time.” So there was no time before time, only eternity. God does not change, but the universe does. Time is a measurement of that change, for “the distinguishing mark between time and eternity is that the former does not exist without some movement and change, while in the latter there is no change at all.” Obviously, then, “there could have been no time had not a creature been made whose movement would effect some change.” But in God’s “eternity there is absolutely no change.” Hence, we cannot “say that He created the world after a space of time” (ibid., 11.6).

The World Was Created Out of Nothing (ex nihilo)

“In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). Augustine believed that “unless this meant that nothing had been made before, it would have been stated that whatever else God had made before was created at the beginning” (ibid.). And not only was nothing made before this, but what was made was created from nothing.

Creation cannot be out of God’s substance, because He is eternal in His essence, and creation is temporal. He has no beginning, whereas the world had a beginning. Further, “it [creation] is not out of Him, because it is not immutable, as He is.” Since the universe “was not made of anything else; it was undoubtedly made out of nothing—but by Himself (OSIO, 1.4).

Even Adam—body and soul—was created from nothing, for “though God formed man of the dust of the earth, yet the earth itself, and every earthly material, is absolutely created out of nothing.” Even “man’s soul, too, God created out of nothing, and joined to the body, when He made man” (CG, 14.11).

In brief, the world must have been made out of nothing because it had a beginning; it came to be. It did not always exist; God did. The world is finite, temporal, and changing, while God is none of these. Hence, the world cannot be made out of God’s substance or essence. It must, then, have come into existence out of nothing by God’s power. Augustine succinctly summarized the three basic questions about creation:

“Who made it? How? and Why?—the answers are: ‘God’; ‘by the Word’; and ‘because it is good’ ” (ibid., 11.23). So “what God created was made solely because of His goodness, not by reason of any necessity nor of any need to use the thing for Himself (ibid., 11.24). Because each person is created by God’s good will, he should acknowledge God’s goodness. “If he does not worship God, he is wretched, because [he is] deprived of God.” On the other hand, “if he worships God, he cannot wish to be worshipped in God’s stead” (ibid., 10.3).

Thomas Aquinas’s Contribution to a Theistic View of Creation

After Augustine, the greatest Christian thinker of the Middle Ages was the Dominican monk Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274). His systematic views of God and creation have become a standard for orthodox Christian thought since his time.

Only God Can Create

Aquinas contended that “not only is it not impossible that anything should be created by God, but it is necessary to say that all things were created by God” (ST, Ia. 45.2.), for “to create can be the proper action of God alone,” and “to produce being absolutely, not merely as this or that being, belongs to the nature of creation. Hence it is manifest that creation is the proper act of God alone.” God cannot use any secondary or instrumental cause when creating “because the secondary instrumental cause does not share in the action of the superior cause.” For example, a saw does not by itself produce the form of a bench. This is the proper effect only of the principal cause, the carpenter. “So it is impossible for any creature to create, either by its own power, or instrumentally” (ibid., la. 45.5).

Creation Is Not Eternal

Like Augustine before him, Aquinas believed that “nothing except God can be eternal.” However, Aquinas did not hold that there were any sound arguments proving that the universe had a beginning, even though he did accept it as the teaching of Scripture (ibid., la. 46.1). He affirmed clearly, “That the world did not always exist we hold by faith alone; it cannot be proved demonstratively” (ibid., la. 46.2).

However, if the world did have a beginning, this is a strong indication of its Creator. “For the world leads more evidently to the knowledge of the divine creating power if it was not always, than if it had always being.... Everything which was not always manifestly has a cause” (ibid, la. 46.1).

God brought the world into existence by a free act of His will: “The first agent is a voluntary agent.” Even though He had the eternal will to produce some effect, yet He did not produce an eternal effect (ibid., la. 46.1 ad 6), for “from an eternal action of God an eternal effect does not follow; there follows only such an effect as God has willed, an effect, namely, who has being after non-being” (ibid., la. 46.2 ad 10).

Aquinas did not believe there was time before the world began. Non-being came “before” being only in a logical sense, not a chronological one. The Creator is “before all time” only by a priority of nature, not of time. “Things are said to be created in the beginning of time, not as if the beginning of time were a measure of creation, but because together with time the heavens and earth were created” (ibid., la. 46.3 ad 1). Therefore, time begins with creation; it was not a creation in time but a creation of time.

Creation Is Out of Nothing

Aquinas argued that creation must be out of nothing. By definition, “Nothing is the same as non-being.” However, “when anything is said to be made from nothing, the preposition from does not signify a material cause, but only an order” (ibid., la. 45.2). Likewise, we speak of midday coming from morning, meaning after morning but not literally out of it.

To create from nothing is really a negative concept: “The sense is ... it is not made from anything; just as if we were to say, He speaks of nothing, because he does not speak of anything” (ibid., la. 45.2 ad 3). The ancient dictum that “nothing comes from nothing” is not to be understood absolutely: It means that something cannot be caused by nothing, but not that something cannot come after nothing. That is, something can be created from nothing but not by nothing.

Several Important Elements of the Theistic View of Creation

Many significant truths are contained within a theistic view of creation. Four of them will be briefly discussed here.

There Is an Absolute Difference Between Creator and Creation

Christian theism holds that there is a fundamental and real difference between the Creator and His creation. The following contrasts will focus these differences.

Creator	Creation
Uncreated	Created
Infinite	Finite
Eternal	Temporal
Necessary	Contingent
Changeless	Changing

God and the world are radically different. One is the Maker, and the other is made. God is the Cause, and the world is the effect. God is unlimited, and the world is limited. The Creator is self-existing, but creation is entirely dependent on Him for its existence.

Some already familiar illustrations may help to further clarify the real distinction between Creator and creation. In pantheism, God is to the world what a sea is to the drops of water in it, or what a fire is to the sparks that come from it. However, in theism, God is to the world what a painter is to a painting or a playwright is to his play. That is to say, while the artist is in some sense manifest in his art, he is also beyond it. The painter is not the painting: He is beyond, over, and above it. Likewise, God is the Creator of the world who causes it to exist and who is revealed in it. God is not the world.

Creation Had a Beginning

Another crucial element of the theistic view of creation from nothing is that the universe (everything except God) had a beginning. Jesus spoke of His glory with the Father “before the world was” (John 17:5 NKJV). Time is not eternal; the space-time universe was brought into existence. The world did not always exist. The world did not begin in time—the world was the beginning of time. Time did not exist before creation and then at some moment in time God created the world. Again, it was not a creation in time, but a creation of time.

This does not mean that there was a time when the universe was not, for there was no time before time began. The only thing “prior” to time was eternity; that is, God exists forever, while the universe began to exist. Hence, God is prior to the temporal world ontologically (in reality), but not chronologically (in time).

To say that creation had a beginning is to point out that it came into being out of nothing. First it did not exist, and then it did. It was not, and then it was. Of course, the Cause of its coming to be was God.

The “Nothing” Out of Which God Created Was Absolute Nothing

When the theist declares that God created “out of nothing,” he does not mean that “nothing” was some kind of invisible, immaterial something that God used to make the material universe.

Nothing means absolutely nothing, that is, God alone existed and utterly nothing else. God created the universe, and then, and then alone, was there something else that existed.

If “nothing” were really a hidden or secret something, then creation would really be out of something else (ex materia). But theists demonstrate that creation came out of nothing (ex nihilo). In short, creation out of nothing truly means that God did not use something else when He created the universe. He brought it into being by His own power.

Creation Out of Nothing Is Not Creation By Nothing

Theism believes that the universe came to be from nothing, but only by Someone (God); it does not hold that nothing produced something. Indeed, a theist could sing with Julie Andrews in The Sound of Music, “Nothing comes from nothing; nothing ever could.” In fact, at the heart of the theist belief in the causal power of God is a rejection of the premise that nothing can create something. Only something (or someone) can cause something. Nothing causes nothing.

So for theism, creation from nothing does not mean creation by nothing. It means, rather, that God created the universe without the aid of any preexisting matter or substance. He did it simply by His own infinite omnipotence. Someone who used absolutely nothing else caused the entire creation to come into being “by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3; cf. Gen. 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 14, 20, 24, 26).

THE SOURCE, CONTENT, METHOD, TIME, AND PURPOSE OF CREATION

In addition to being distinguished by ex nihilo creation, the Christian doctrine of creation is characterized by several other features. These include the source, content, method, time, and purpose of creation.

The Source of Creation

The source of creation is a theistic God: He alone can create something from nothing (Augustine, CG, 11.23). God is the “First Cause” (Augustine, LCG, 23); He is the “Beginning” beyond which there is no beginning. He is eternal and uncaused. He is indivisible and unchangeable (Augustine, CG, 11.10). He is infinitely wise and powerful. Further, God created voluntarily. As Aquinas observed, “It is not necessary that God should will anything except Himself (ST, Ia. 46.1).

Since the Christian God is a trinity of Father, Son, and Spirit (see chapter 12), all three persons are involved in Creation. According to Augustine, “To the Father is appropriated power which is especially shown in creation.... To the Son is appropriated wisdom through which an intellectual agent acts.... To the Holy Ghost is appropriated goodness, to which belong both governance ... and the giving of life” (ibid. 1:46:6). Creation is ascribed to all three members of the Godhead because in God His existence is “identical with his essence and common to all three persons, and is, therefore, an activity of the whole Trinity, not peculiar to one person” (ibid.).

Not only did God create, but only God can create. “To create is, properly speaking, to cause or produce the being of things” (Aquinas, ST, Ia. 45.6). Only God can cause something to come into being; humans cannot create. “An individual man cannot be the cause of human nature absolutely, because he would then be the cause of himself” (ibid., Ia. 45.5). In fact, “No created being can produce a being absolutely” (ibid.).

Since angels are created beings, it follows that they cannot create. This is so, since God alone is the primary cause and “no secondary cause can produce anything.... Hence it remains that nothing can create except God alone” (ibid., la. 65.3).

Secondary causes do not create; they only reduplicate (ibid., la. 45.6). A “secondary instrumental cause does not share in the action of the superior cause.... So it is impossible for any creature to create” (ibid, la. 45.5).

The Content of Creation

God created everything that exists: He created “the heaven and the earth” and “every living thing” (Gen. 1:1, 20–27 KJV). God created existence out of nonexistence; He made something out of nothing. For Augustine, the fact that God created all things “implies that before the creation of heaven and earth God had made nothing” (CG, 11.9). But if there was nothing before God created, then ultimately He created everything out of nothing: “There could not have existed any matter of anything whatever unless it came from God, the Author and Creator of all that has been formed or is to be formed” (Augustine, LCG, 35).

While all things are from God, they are not of God (Augustine, ONG, 27). Creation “is not out of Him, because it is not immutable, as He is.” However, as we have seen, since “it was not made of anything else, it was undoubtedly made out of nothing—but by Himself” (Augustine, OSIO, 1.4). Again, this does not mean that “nothing” is some sort of invisible stuff out of which God made the world. By “out of nothing” is meant “that it was not made from anything” (Aquinas, ST, la. 46.2).

As Aquinas noted, the preposition “from” does not imply it came from something, but simply after nothing (ibid., 1:45:1). Consequently, creation from nothing is really creation after nothing, for “nothing is the same as no being” (ibid, la. 45.1). But creation from nothing is not creation by nothing. Only what exists can cause, and only God can cause existence. God is Pure Existence (“I AM THAT I AM,” Ex. 3:14 KJV), and He alone produces everything else that exists.

The Method of Creation

God is the Source of creation, and His Word is the means. As mentioned previously, there is no instrumental cause of creation, for between nothing (nonbeing) and something (being) there is no medium; whatever comes from nothing must do so immediately and abruptly. So “God produces being in act out of nothing ... according to the greatness of His power” (Aquinas, ST, la. 61.1). Since God has infinite power, He can do anything that is possible. It is not impossible for an infinite Creator to produce a finite creature. Thus, God, who is Existence, brought all else into existence. Everything came from nothing, but by Someone. It takes power to produce something, and what has all power can produce anything. An infinite Being has unlimited power (see chapter 5), and unlimited power is not limited in its ability to create limited powers (see chapter 7). God can create simply by “his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3).

God created not only by His power but also by His will. God is not bound by any obligation when He creates. Hence, “It is to be held with complete conviction that God brings creatures into existence of his own free will, and not as bound by natural necessity” (Aquinas, OPG, 3.15).

The Time of Creation

God created “in the beginning.” God is eternal, but the world is not. The universe came to be, but God always was (actually, is). Again, according to Aquinas, “That the world did not always exist we hold by faith alone; it cannot be proved demonstratively” (ST, Ia. 46.2). Others, like Bonaventure (c. 1217–1274), held that it can be proven by reason that the universe had a beginning. All orthodox Christians, however, acknowledge that the universe had a point of beginning—that it is temporal, not eternal.

Both time and space were created with the universe. There was no time before the world began, only eternity. God is prior to the universe in order, but not in time. “Things are said to be created in the beginning of time, not as if the beginning of time were a measure of creation, but because together with time the heavens and earth were created.” Likewise, space was created with the world, for “we hold that there was no place or space before the world was” (ibid., Ia. 46.3). Further, as cited before, Augustine said that “it is silly to imagine infinite space since there is no such thing as space beyond the cosmos” (CG, 11.5). Neither was there any physical motion before there was a physical universe: “Motion always existed from the moment that movable things began to exist” (Aquinas, ST, Ia. 46.1). God did not have to move to create motion, nor did He need time to create time. Augustine asked, “Did the author of time need the help of time?” (LCG, 195).

What was God doing before He created? Augustine had two answers, one humorous and one serious. First, he jested that God was preparing hell for those who ask such questions! Second, he noted that there was no time before God created, for to speak of “doing” and “before” imply time. Therefore, the question is as meaningless as asking, What time is it for a timeless Being? There is no time before time began, only eternity. Thus, it is senseless to ask how the Eternal One occupied His time before He created time. For this same reason, it makes no sense to ask why God did not create the universe earlier; “earlier” implies that there were moments before moments began. This is as absurd as asking why God did not create the world there rather than here, since there was no here or there (space) before space was created. As Augustine points out, “If they excogitate infinite periods of time before the world ... they ought to conceive of infinite reaches of space beyond the visible universe” (CG, 11.5). However, since God created both time and space with the universe, there is neither time nor space beyond the universe. God created neither in time nor in space; rather, He created the universe with both.

If God did not create in time, then did He not create from eternity? And if He created from eternity, then is not the world eternal? All the orthodox Fathers rejected this conclusion, but for different reasons. Aquinas believed eternal creation was theoretically possible, though not actually so (ST, Ia. 46.2.). This, he reasoned, is because viewed “from above,” God is eternal, and an effect is simultaneous to its cause of existence. Bonaventure and others argued “from below” that an eternal universe is impossible because an infinite series of moments is unattainable. Both views agree that the universe is not eternal. The problem, then, is this: How can God be an eternal Cause when the universe He caused is not eternal?

In response, it should be noted that the universe no more has to be eternal because God is eternal than it has to be infinite, since He is infinite. Nor does it have to be necessary because God is a necessary Being. The only thing a necessary Being must will necessarily is the necessity of His own Being. There is no necessity placed upon God to will the existence of contingent beings. Likewise, there is no reason an eternal Being must will anything else to be eternal. While all material things flow from God’s eternal will, He wills that all these things exist temporarily.

Everything preexists in God in accordance with His will. But God willed eternally that created things would have a beginning. So, even though He willed them from eternity, nevertheless, they had a temporal beginning. For example, a doctor can decree at the outset that a patient take a medication later on at different intervals than at the beginning of the treatment. Likewise, God can will events from all eternity that will occur at later successive times.

The Purpose of Creation

If God created freely, then we can ask, Why did He create rather than not create? Again, Augustine’s answer was “because it is good” (CG, 11.23). Aquinas concurred, saying, “God brings things into existence in order that his goodness may be communicated and manifested” (ST, Ia. 47.1). Not that God must share His goodness, but simply because He wants to do so. Commenting on the fact that God declared His creation was “very good” (Gen. 1:31), Augustine concluded, “Surely, this can only mean that there was no other reason for creating the world except that good creatures might be made by a good God” (CG, 11.3).

God is infinitely good; as such He desires to share His goodness. Creatures should recognize the goodness God has showered upon them and thank Him for it. In recognizing God’s worth, they should attribute worth to Him. Thus worth-ship (worship) is the natural result of creation: Every rational creature should worship the Creator. The purpose for creating is so that the creature will worship God: “If he does not worship God, he is wretched” (Augustine, CG, 10.3). Augustine confessed elsewhere, “Thou hast formed us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find rest in Thee” (C, 1.1).

In brief, since a rational God created rational creatures, it is only rational that they should worship Him, for in acknowledging His good as the highest good, they find their highest good.

CONCLUSION

The Christian doctrine of creation is best understood in contrast with the other two main options. The following comparison will summarize and focus the differences.

Category	Theism	Materialism	Pantheism
Source of Creation	Creator beyond nature	No Creator	Creator within nature
Method of Creation	Out of nothing ( ex nihilo )	Out of something ( ex materia )	Out of God ( ex Deo )
Duration of Creation	Temporal	Eternal	Eternal
Relation of Creator and Creature	Creator and creation (really different)	No real Creator	No real creation
God’s Control	Unlimited	Limited or nonexistent	Limited

Properly speaking, materialism believes in natural generation, pantheism believes in eternal emanation, and only theism believes in supernatural creation. These are fundamentally different perspectives. All the other world-views (see Volume 1, chapter 2) hold positions on origin that fit into one or more of these three main categories.

Christianity holds that creation was out of nothing. God brought the universe into existence (Gen. 1:1; John 1:2–3), and He sustains it in existence (Col. 1:16–17; Heb. 1:3). Thus, He is in sovereign control of it. God is infinite, necessary, and eternal; the creation is finite, contingent, and temporal. Hence, there is a real and radical difference between the uncreated Creator and the created creation.

For theists, creation out of God is a contradiction in terms, for a creature would be a temporal eternal, a finite infinite, and a created uncreated being. Thus, creation out of nothing makes it nonsense for a human being to say, “I am God.” It is impossible to have a contingent being that is necessary, or a finite that is infinite.

Further, it is in the context of creation that the Christian concept of service to God and worship of Him are best understood. By our very nature as creatures we owe all that we are and have to the good hands of our Creator. Failure to acknowledge this is the ultimate ungratefulness. Indeed, the divine epithet over the pagan world reads: “Although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him” (Rom. 1:21). By contrast, the blessed ones around God’s throne sing praise to Him who by His will “created all things” (Rev. 4:11).

CHAPTER NINETEEN

THE ORIGIN OF MATERIAL CREATION

Creation is a major doctrine of Scripture: It is the first to be stated (Gen. 1:1) and one of the last to be stressed (Rev. 4:11; 10:6; 21:5; 22:13). There are hundreds of references to Creation and the Creator in the Bible, covering the vast majority of books from Genesis to Revelation (see appendix 2). The physical creation includes not only inanimate objects but also all living things.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR CREATION

The word create (bara) is used in connection with three great events in Genesis 1: the creation of matter (v. 1), living things (1:21), and human beings (1:27). These will be the focal point of our discussion.

THE CREATION OF MATTER (THE UNIVERSE)

“In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). With these majestic words, the Scriptures begin their description of the origin of all things, and creation is the foundation for everything else that follows. This grand statement of the initial divine act is uniquely monotheistic. That this is a reference to creation from nothing (ex nihilo) is confirmed by recent discoveries in ancient Ebla (Syria). The Ebla tablets declare,

Lord of heaven and earth:
the earth was not, you created it,
the light of day was not, you created it,
the morning was not, you created it,
the morning light you had not [yet] made exist.
(Pettinato, AE, 259 in Merrill, BS)

The Origin of Matter

“God is spirit” (John 4:24); as such, He is the “invisible” God (1 Tim. 1:17). Indeed, “no one has ever seen God” (John 1:18). God is both invisible and immaterial (1 Tim. 6:16), and as Spirit He has no “flesh and bones” (Luke 24:39): He is incorporeal and purely spiritual. However, the universe that God created is both visible and material (Heb. 11:3)—it can be seen and handled, being both physical and tangible. It has both space (whereness) and time (whenness); it possesses both “here” and “now.” Further, it has matter, which is extended throughout space and time. It has “parts” or particles with spaces between them.

The “stuff” or matter of the universe is described by modern science in terms of atoms of physical energy with component particles and charges. As experienced by humans, matter is sensible, tangible, and visible: It is the hard, objective data that comprises our environment. It is there; we must make our way around it or else knock our heads on it. Bodies are real, and the earth is tangible, as are the stars and planets. So affirms God's revelation.

All of this was created by God "in the beginning." And "through him all things were made" (John 1:3). God created "all things ... visible and invisible" (Col. 1:16). He created the "heavens and earth." His creation includes the "land," the "seas" (Gen. 1:10), and all plants and animals (vv. 6–26). It includes also the human body that was made "from the dust of the ground" (Gen. 2:7). There is a real material universe, and it was created by God.

Matter Was Created From Nothing

Indeed, God brought all of matter into existence out of absolutely nothing (see chapter 18). The Bible says God simply spoke (cf. Gen. 1:1, 3, 6, etc.), and things came into existence by His power and word (Heb. 1:2; cf. 2 Cor. 4:6). "By the word of the LORD were the heavens made.... For he spoke, and it came to be" (Ps. 33:6, 9). "He is before all things" and "all things were created through him" (Col. 1:16–17 NKJV). It was through Him that "all things were made," and "without him nothing was made that has been made" (John 1:3). The writer of Hebrews declared that "by faith we understand that the universe was formed at God's command, so that what is seen was not made out of what was visible" (Heb. 11:3). The universe was created out of nothing. John the apostle proclaimed of God, "You created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" (Rev. 4:11). In brief, the entire cosmos came into existence by God's will at His command. When He spoke, it appeared out of absolutely nothing.

Matter Was Created by God, Not Out of God

The material universe was created by God out of nothing (ex nihilo), but not out of God (ex Deo): The cosmos is not made out of God-stuff. This is why it is a grievous sin to worship and serve the "creature rather than the Creator" (Rom. 1:25 NKJV). It is for this reason that idolatry is condemned so strongly in the Scriptures; God commanded: "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below" (Ex. 20:4). If, on the other hand, the universe were God's "body" or part of His substance, there would be no reason we should not worship it. Yet the Bible makes it very clear that God is not to be identified with the physical universe. The universe comes from God, but it is not made of God. God is as different from the world as a potter is from clay (Rom. 9:20–21), or as the craftsman is from his handiwork (Ps. 19:1).

The material universe is not made out of God, but it is a reflection of God. It "declares" His glory, for "since the creation of the world God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made, so that men are without excuse" (Rom. 1:20). That is, God is present in creation both as its sustaining Cause (Heb. 1:3; Col. 1:16–17) and as it reflects His attributes (Rom. 1:20). Just as the energies of Shakespeare are revealed in his works, so the Creator is manifest in His handicraft. Just as the creative mind of Picasso is portrayed in his art, in like manner the Creator of the universe can be seen in His great masterpiece.

God, then, is the invisible Creator of the visible world, the immaterial Maker of all matter, and the incorporeal Producer of all corporeal (bodily) things (see chapter 6). But how can this be? How can God create matter when He is not material? In response to this question, several observations are relevant.

First, it is certainly no more a mystery for the theist to believe that Mind produced matter than it is for the atheist to believe that matter produced mind. In fact, it is easier to believe that infinite Mind made matter than that finite matter could produce a mind that can contemplate the infinite.

Second, it is no more difficult to understand how an immaterial Spirit (God) can be manifest in material things than it is to comprehend how our minds can reveal themselves in material things, such as literature, art, and technology. Just like the written page is a material manifestation of the immaterial thoughts of the author, even so the universe is a material creation of the immaterial Creator.

Third, and finally, in spite of its similarity to the Creator (Rom. 1:19–20), creation by its very nature must also be different from the Creator. God is infinite, and creation is finite. He is necessary, and creation is contingent. God is uncreated, but the world is created. It is not strange, then, that God is immaterial and the universe is material. After all, a painting is visible, but the artist’s mind that created it is not. Indeed, since God cannot create another absolute Spirit, and since everything He creates must have limitations and potency, such as matter has, it is understandable that He made matter.

The Nature of Matter

All creation—whether bodies or spirits (angels), whether visible or invisible—by nature partakes of certain characteristics. Since the material universe is part of creation, it also participates in these properties.

Material Creation Is Contingent

The created world, including matter, is contingent. That is to say, even though the world exists, it could nevertheless not exist; it is, but it might not be. Indeed, God is holding it in existence “by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3), for by Him “all things hold together” (Col. 1:17). Without God’s continual, sustaining causality, all of creation would cease to be—instantly (see chapter 21).

The contingency of all creation is another way to express the biblical truth that God is not only the originating cause of the universe, but He is also its conserving cause. He caused it to come to be, and He also causes it to continue to be. The following chart expresses this more completely (see also chapter 3):

GOD’S CAUSALITY

ORIGINATING CAUSALITY	CONSERVING CAUSALITY
Cause of beginning	Cause of sustaining
Cause of coming to be	Cause of continuing to be
Cause of becoming	Cause of being
Cause of coming together	Cause of holding together
Cause of origin	Cause of operation

Creation is contingent at all times—it is always dependent on its Creator. Once a creature, always a creature; the created can never become the Uncreated. Radical dependence on God for moment-by-moment existence is an essential characteristic of all created things, including the material universe as a whole.

Material Creation Is Finite (Limited)

Another essential property of creation is finitude. All created things are finite or limited, and only God is infinite or unlimited. It is impossible to have two infinite Beings, for infinite includes all, and there cannot be two Alls. As Paul declared, “In him [the infinite God] we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28). God is infinite, and all exists in Him. When He created finite beings there was not more Being; there were simply more who had it. For example, when a teacher instructs a class, there is not more knowledge; there are simply more who possess it.

There can only be one infinite Being (see chapter 5), and since there is only one infinite Being (God), then all other things—the whole of creation—must be finite. God alone is unlimited; everything else is limited. God is the unlimited Limiter of all limited things; He is the uncaused Cause of all that is caused.

The very fact that all created things are caused to exist reveals that they must be limited, for if they came to be, then they did not always exist; hence, their existence is not unlimited; it had a beginning. Furthermore, whatever is created undergoes change; only the uncreated God is unchanging. “I the LORD do not change” (Mal. 3:6). Of the heavens the Scriptures declare, “They will perish, but you [God] remain; they will all wear out like a garment. You will roll them up like a robe; like a garment they will be changed. But you remain the same, and your years will never end” (Heb. 1:11–12).

Whatever changes is limited, for if it changes, then it does not remain exactly what it was. Thus, it is limited by what it becomes; it cannot be precisely what it once was, for in that case it has not changed. So all changing things are limited.

Further, the fact that created things change reveals that they have a potentiality for that change: The fact of change proves the possibility of change, and the actuality of change shows the potentiality for change. Thus, all created things have potentiality. However, all created things also have actuality, since they actually exist. Therefore, all created things have both actuality and potentiality. As for potentiality, a creature has the potential to be what it is not. Thus, creatures are limited by their potentials: They cannot do more than their capacities allow them to do. Just as a gallon jug has only the capacity to hold a gallon of liquid, even so every finite being is limited by its created capacity. God, on the other hand, is Pure Actuality. God is the “I AM” (Ex. 3:14)—there is no “can be” in God’s essence, for He is what He is. There is nothing He can be that He has not always been and always will be.

Material Creation Is Spatial and Temporal

In addition to being contingent and limited, material creation is also restricted to space and time. Time is a measurement based on change; it measures according to “before” and “after” the change. Because He is an unchanging Being, God is not subject to such measurements. Since He is always the same, He cannot be the object of calculations based on what He once was. Because He has not changed, He still is what He always was. However, in a changing being, such as material things are, measurements can be made according to before and after the change. Time is such a measurement.

Time is a limited measurement; that is to say, it measures certain limited segments (Augustine, C, chapter 11). Since material beings are in time (i.e., are temporal), they are limited to a “now” as opposed to a “then.” This is why we are not now living the past: We lived the past then, but the present we are living now. We cannot live both a now and a then simultaneously in the same sense. We can live the past in memory, but not in actuality. Time is a measurement based on a real limitation that we have as material (bodily) beings. We live only now; every future moment becomes a “now” when we experience it.

Likewise, space is a limitation. Time is a limitation to a now, and space is a limitation to a here. Thus, as spatio-temporal beings, we are limited to the here and now. So are all material things—the limitations of space impose upon us the boundary conditions of “hereness” rather than “thereness.” We cannot be both here and there at the same time and in the same sense. We can be there mentally (by remembering or dreaming), but we can only be here bodily. Such is the spatial limitation on all material things.

God, however, can be here, there, and everywhere at the same time, for He has no body that limits Him to being only here as opposed to there. God has no “hereness” that limits Him to one place at a time—He is not in space. God is omnipresent; that is, present everywhere in all of creation at the same time (see chapter 7). Again, this is possible because He is an infinite spirit. Having no body to limit Him, nor finite capacity to fence Him in, God’s presence is barred from nowhere. As the psalmist proclaimed, “Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence? If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there” (Ps. 139:7–8).

Material Creation Is Good

After nearly every day of Creation we read, “And God saw that it was good” (Gen. 1:3, 10, 12, 18, 21). After the final day it says, “God saw all that he had made, and it was very good” (Gen. 1:31). Indeed, Paul declared, “Everything God created is good” (1 Tim. 4:4). Elsewhere he added, “I know and am convinced by the Lord Jesus that there is nothing unclean of itself; but to him who considers anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean” (Rom. 14:14 NKJV).

Like its Creator, all of creation was and still is good. This Judeo-Christian teaching that material, physical, bodily things are good is unique, standing in contrast to all other religions and philosophies. Gnostics (past and present) believe that matter is evil, while Plotinus (A.D. 205–270) held that it was nearly evil, the least good of all things. For him, matter had no good, but only the mere capacity for good (E, 1:8:7).

Plato (c. 427–347 B.C.) thought matter was a formless chaos, and identified the “good” with “form.” More radical Eastern belief (e.g., Shankara Hinduism) holds that matter is an illusion (maya), and Christian Science also believes matter, like evil, is an error of mortal mind (Eddy, SHKS, 480–584).

By contrast, both the Old and New Testaments teach that the material world is good. God’s own conclusion, upon viewing His handiwork, was that “it was very good” (Gen. 1:31). The apostle Paul affirms the same (1 Tim. 4:4; Rom. 14:14).

THE CREATION OF LIVING THINGS

God not only created matter (Gen. 1:1), but He also created “every living thing that moves” (Gen. 1:21 NKJV). Many of these kinds of life are named in Genesis 1:21–25:

So God created the great creatures of the sea and every living and moving thing with which the water teems, according to their kinds, and every winged bird according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. God blessed them and said, “Be fruitful and increase in number and fill the water in the seas, and let the birds increase on the earth.” And there was evening, and there was morning—the fifth day. And God said, “Let the land produce living creatures according to their kinds: livestock, creatures that move along the ground, and wild animals, each according to its kind.” And it was so. God made the wild animals according to their kinds, the livestock according to their kinds, and all the creatures that move along the ground according to their kinds. And God saw that it was good.

The Origin of Life

All of life exists because God wills it to exist, for “he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else” (Acts 17:25). God “created ... men and animals, and creatures that move along the ground, and birds of the air” (Gen. 6:7). Moses tells us that out of the ground “the LORD God had formed ... all the beasts of the field and all the birds of the air” (Gen. 2:19). And John added, “Without him nothing was made that has been made” (John 1:3). Literally, all living things originated from God’s hand.

The Nature of Life

The biblical description of life includes its mobility, its unity, its diversity, its fecundity, its stability, and its dominion. It has one source, many manifestations, and continually reproduces after its kind.

The Unity of All Life

There are many indications in Scripture of the unity of all living things.

First, all life has one Creator. His stamp is upon all things.

Second, all life is interdependent. Higher forms were commanded to eat lower forms (Gen. 1:29; 9:3).

Third, humans were commanded to care for the environment (1:28), to cultivate the flora and to care for the fauna (Gen. 2:15). As humans cared for living things, they would provide food and clothes for themselves (Gen. 3:21).

Fourth, and finally, the Bible often refers to “all living things” as a group or whole (Gen. 1:21; 6:19; Acts 17:24). There is, then, a unity and interdependence of all life. It comes from one God; it manifests one creative hand, and each individual form fits into one organic whole.

The Diversity of All Life

God loves variety—He created all kinds of things. In biblical language, God created “vegetation: seed-bearing plants and trees on the land that bear fruit with seed in it” (Gen. 1:11). Then He said, “Let the water teem with living creatures” (v. 20). God also “created the great creatures of the sea and every living and moving thing with which the water teems ... and every winged bird according to its kind” (v. 21). On top of this, He made all the “living creatures” of the land: “livestock, creatures that move along the ground, and wild animals” (v. 24). And finally, “God created man in his own image ... male and female he created them” (v. 27).

This great diversity of life filled the earth and literally “teemed” in the sea. The landscape crawled with animals, the waters swarmed with fish, and birds flew across the heavens. Life was created in great abundance and diversity.

The Fecundity of All Life

God commanded life to multiply, and this it does naturally, for “the land produced vegetation: seed-bearing plants and trees on the land that bear fruit with seed in it, according to their various kinds” (Gen. 1:11). This pleased God, for “God saw that it was good” (Gen. 1:12). Since human beings have free choice, God gave them strong desires to multiply and commanded them, saying, “Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth” (Gen. 1:28).

The Stability of All Life

God provided for the continuance of the life He created: Each was to produce “according to their various kinds” (Gen. 1:11). Thus “plants yielding seed and fruit trees” were made “bearing fruit in which is their seed.” The same was true of animals of the sea and land, each reproducing “according to their kinds” (vv. 21, 25). Finally, humankind was told to reproduce according to their kind (v. 28; cf. 5:3). Thus, God provided for the continuance of each kind He had made.

Life is basically the same from generation to generation, each reproducing its own: fish producing fish, birds hatching birds, cows calving calves, and humans giving birth to humans. This has been the pattern from the very beginning and continues to the present. Life in all of its many kinds is continuous and stable.

Humankind's Dominion Over All Life

Not only did God create all life, He crowned it with human life and made us king over all the earth. God told Adam and Eve to “subdue it. Rule over the fish of the sea and the birds of the air and over every living creature that moves on the ground” (Gen. 1:28). The psalmist added of humankind, “You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor” (Ps. 8:5). It is important to note that what was granted was dominion, not destruction. God owns the world (Ps. 124:8), and humans are to care for it for Him (Gen. 2).

THE CREATION OF HUMANKIND

Therefore, humankind is the pinnacle of God's earthly creation. Although humans were “made a little lower than the angels” (Heb. 2:9), nonetheless they are higher than the animals. They were made male and female in “his [God's] own image” (Gen. 1:27).

The Origin of Humankind

In the words of Scripture, “the LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being” (Gen. 2:7). Then God “took one of the man's ribs and closed up the place with flesh. Then the LORD God made a woman from the rib he had taken out of the man” (vv. 21–22). Our Lord referred to this event, declaring “that at the beginning the Creator ‘made them male and female’ ” (Matt. 19:4). Indeed, Jesus said that the creation of man and woman was the basis for lifelong marriage between husband and wife (vv. 5–6).

The creation of man and woman is mentioned as the grounds for other Christian teachings. Paul, for example, said, “I do not permit a woman to teach or to have authority over a man.... For Adam was formed first, then Eve” (1 Tim. 2:13). Elsewhere, he proclaimed that “the head of the woman is man,” for “man did not come from woman, but woman from man” (1 Cor. 11:3, 8).

Thus, the order of authority both in the home and church is based on the fact and order of creation as recorded in Genesis 1–2.

When speaking of original sin, the Scriptures refer to “Adam” (Rom. 5:12, 14) as an historical person, just as “Moses” was (v. 14). Paul also refers to the first man in 1 Corinthians 15 when comparing “Adam” to “Christ” (v. 22). Indeed, Luke places Adam as the first name in the literal, actual ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:38), and it adds that Adam is “of God.” So does the historical record in 1 Chronicles name Adam as the first human being (1 Chron. 1:1).

Everywhere Scripture assumes or declares that the origin of humankind is the creation of Adam and then Eve, as recorded in Genesis 1–2. God “created” them (Gen. 1:27), forming the man from “the dust of the ground” (Gen. 2:7) and shaping the woman from Adam’s rib (vv. 21–22). “God ... created him; male and female he created them” (Gen. 1:27).

The Nature of Humankind

The nature of human beings includes their dignity, their unity of soul and body, and their community as a group of individuals. All came from a common source, and all possess a common human nature. Paul declared, “From one man he [God] made every nation of men” (Acts 17:26).

Human Dignity

Humankind is a special creation of God. Again, of man, the psalmist said, “You [God] made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor” (Ps. 8:5). Humans are uniquely made in God’s “image” and likeness (Gen. 1:27), which is said of no other creatures. Only humans are in the image of God, and this image includes “male and female,” extending to Adam’s children, for “when God created man, he made him in the likeness of God” (Gen. 5:1). Even after the Fall, “Adam ... had a son in his own likeness, in his own image” (v. 3).

Human Sanctity

Human life is sacred because it is godlike; hence, there is a prohibition against intentionally taking another innocent human life: “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man” (Gen. 9:6). Murder is, as it were, killing God in effigy. Indeed, even cursing another human is forbidden, for “with the tongue we praise our Lord and Father, and with it we curse men, who have been made in God’s likeness” (James 3:9). Life is sacred and godlike, and thus it should be protected both after birth and before, from the moment of conception (Ps. 51:5; 139:13–16; Ex. 21:22–23).

Passages on the image of God are found throughout the Bible. They include the following: “So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them” (Gen. 1:27). “When God created man, he made him in the likeness of God” (Gen. 5:1). “You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor” (Ps. 8:5). “This only have I found: God made mankind upright” (Eccl. 7:29). “He is the image and glory of God” (1 Cor. 11:7). “Put on the new self, which is being renewed in knowledge in the image of its Creator” (Col. 3:10). “[We] have been made in God’s likeness” (James 3:9). This image of God includes both moral and intellectual characteristics. Several things implied in the concept of “image and likeness” can be enumerated here.

Image includes intellectual likeness to God. God is an intelligent Being; indeed, He is all-knowing (Ps. 139:1–6). Although humans are finite, nevertheless, they are like God in that they have intelligence (cf. Job 35:11). Paul speaks of being “renewed in knowledge in the image of its Creator” (Col. 3:10). Jude declares that humans are above “unreasoning animals” (Jude 10).

Image includes moral likeness to God. God is holy (Isa. 6:1–3); He is love (1 John 4:16); and He has many other moral attributes as well (see part 1). Since humans were created like God, it is expected that they would share these moral characteristics. Therefore, God commands us, “Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). The Lord said to Israel, “Be holy, because I am holy” (Lev. 11:45).

Implied in the intellectual and moral likeness to God are some other elements. Not only do humans resemble God, but they are to reproduce for Him (Gen. 1:28) and to represent Him as well. Humans are God’s regents on earth; thus, as mentioned, it is wrong to kill or curse them (Gen. 9:6; James 3:9), because in doing so one attacks God. Further, unlike angels (cf. Matt. 22:30), human beings can reproduce (Gen. 1:28). Also, human beings are to reign for God. He said to Adam and Eve, “Fill the earth” (ibid.).

Finally, God created human beings to be morally responsible to God, for “the LORD God commanded the man, ‘You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die’ ” (Gen. 2:16–17). All of these aspects are part of what it means to be in God’s image.

Image includes volitional likeness to God. Moral responsibility implies the ability to respond, if not on our own, at least by God’s grace. Essential to morality is volitionality; like God, humans have free choice (see Volume 3, chapter 3). Indeed, God gave Adam an option, saying, “You are free” (Gen. 2:16), and then held him accountable for this freedom. Likewise, all who have sinned since Adam are held accountable for their sins (Ezek. 18:18–20; Rom. 14:12).

Image includes the body. It is common for Christian theologians to limit the image of God to the soul. However, this is contrary to Scripture:

- (1) Mind and body are a unity (see Volume 3, chapter 2).
- (2) Matter is good and reflects God’s glory (Gen. 1:31; Ps. 19:1; 1 Tim. 4:4).
- (3) Both male and female (which entails bodies) are in God’s image (Gen. 1:27).
- (4) Killing a body is wrong because it is included in God’s image (Gen. 9:6).
- (5) Christ in incarnate bodily form is called the “image of God” (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15; Heb. 1:3; 1 John 1:1).
- (6) Resurrection of the body reveals that it is part of the whole person made in God’s image.

Contrary to the opinions of critics, this does not imply that God has a body (John 4:24), since it does not follow logically that because we are like God, God is like us in all respects. Angels are pure spirits (Heb. 1:14) and are like God, but God is not like them in totality. For example, they are finite and created, but God is neither.

Human Unity

Each individual human being is a unity of soul and body, having a spiritual dimension and a physical dimension. Each partakes of the immaterial as well as the material, the angelic as well as the animal. As such, humans are unique: each is a psychosomatic unity, a blend of mind and matter.

This unity of body and soul was evident from the very beginning, for “the LORD God formed man from the dust of the ground [body] and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life [spirit], and the man became a living being” (Gen. 2:7). At death, “The dust returns to the ground it came from, and the spirit returns to God who gave it” (Eccl. 12:7).

Soul and body are so closely united in human beings that their union is used as a figure of what is virtually indissoluble (Heb. 4:12). Paul speaks of “spirit, soul, and body” forming an individual “wholly” (1 Thess. 5:23); that is, these three aspects constitute one person.

However, within this basic unity there is a tri-dimensionality, because a human being is self-conscious, world-conscious, and God-conscious. He can look inward, outward, and upward. But he is, nonetheless, one person, with one individual human nature (Berkouwer, MIG, chapter 7).

Within the unity of human nature, there is also a basic duality. The unity of soul and body is not an identity of the two (see Volume 3); the union is not an indissoluble one. At death “we are ... away from the body and at home with the Lord” (2 Cor. 5:8). Paul says elsewhere that it is better “to depart [from the body] and be with Christ” (Phil. 1:23). Indeed, such is stated of the blessed ones whose bodies were “slain” but whose “souls” are conscious in heaven (Rev. 6:9). Jesus replied to one thief who died on the cross, “Today you will be with me in paradise” (Luke 23:43).

The separation of soul and body is only temporary: They await their reunion at the resurrection, when they will be brought back together permanently (1 Thess. 4:13–17). The intermediate state between death and resurrection is both temporal and incomplete. Paul describes this state as being “unclothed” (2 Cor. 5:1–4), one that awaits the return to its natural union of body and soul.

Human Community

“No man is an island.” From the very beginning God made a community of “male and female” and told them to multiply their kind into a larger community (Gen. 1:27–28). Indeed, before Eve was made, Adam discovered that “it is not good for the man to be alone” (Gen. 2:18). Adam sought a helper, but none was “found” among the animals (v. 20), so God made one from Adam’s side to be by his side. God made woman from his flesh so that the two should be “one flesh” (v. 24). God created woman from man to be his equal—not from his head to rule over him, or from his feet to be a slave to him, but from his side to be a companion for him.

The solidarity of all humanity is a fact not only of their original creation but also of their continued existence. Paul declared this when he said, “From one man he [God] made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth” (Acts 17:26). There are many ethnic groups, but there is only one race—the human race. Not only are all human beings one in Adam’s creation, but we were also one in Adam’s fall, for “just as sin entered the world through one man ... in this way death came to all men, because all sinned [in Adam]” (Rom. 5:12). That is to say, the whole human race was present in Adam when he sinned, so it fell with him. Thus, all humans inherit this original sin, so that without salvation we are “by nature objects of [God’s] wrath” (Eph. 2:3).

The unity of the human race is also evident in the means of its propagation. Multiplication comes only from a union of male and female (Gen. 1:28; 2:24), and from this union come children who are in the “likeness” of their parents (Gen. 5:3). The whole race is genetically connected; indeed, there are not many different kinds of humans—all humans are of the same kind. They are essentially the same and only accidentally different. We all have one ancestral father and mother (Adam and Eve) and, hence, we are all part of one large “family” (Eph. 3:15).

Finally, not only is it true that “none of us lives to himself” but also that “none of us dies to himself” (Rom. 14:7). Whether we live or die, “we belong to the Lord” (v. 8); no one is completely independent. Woman was created from man, and yet “man is born of woman” (1 Cor. 11:12). There are no self-made men; every man has a mother. The whole human race is interdependent: We are a community of beings with a common Creator, a common connection, and a common commission—to glorify and enjoy God.

THE EVIL OF RACISM

An important consequence of the foregoing discussion on the dignity, community, and solidarity of the human race is that it is a powerful argument against racism. The idea that there is a superior race, of whatever color, is contrary to the most fundamental teaching of Scripture. As established previously, there is only one race—the human race—and we are all part of it. There are many ethnic groups, but, again, only one race—the Adamic race, which includes all of us.

The Baseless Arguments for Racism

Several arguments advanced for racism have misused Scripture to support them. Of these the following call for comment.

The Mark on Cain

Some have suggested that the mark on Cain was that which designated him as a race into which others were not to marry (Gen. 4:15). However, there is no such reason given anywhere in Scripture for this. It was actually a mark of protection for him, for the text says “the Lord put a mark on Cain so that no one who found him would kill him” (Gen. 4:15). It had nothing to do with color or ethnic groups that had not even developed yet (cf. Gen. 11).

The Command Not to Intermarry With Other Nations

Several times in the Old Testament, God forbade intermarriage or condemned His people for intermarrying with those of other nations. For instance, foreign wives were part of Solomon’s demise (1 Kings 11:1–3), and Ezra demanded that the Israelites divorce those they had married from among the heathen (Ezra 10:10–11, 17–19). However, in each case the reason was moral, not racial. Ezra called the alien spouses “pagan” (vv. 17–18 NKJV), and when Solomon was condemned for his foreign brides, the reason was clearly stated: “You must not intermarry with them, because they will surely turn your hearts after their gods” (1 Kings 11:2). Finally, that God sanctioned marriage with people of varying ethnic groups is clear from his blessing upon Rahab and Ruth, both of whom were brought into the bloodline of the Messiah by intermarriage with Jews, and both of whom were women of faith (cf. Joshua 2:9–11; Ruth 1:16–17; Heb. 11:31).

God Desired Nations to Be Separate

It is argued that God desired nations to be distinct, for Acts 17:26 declares: “He determined the times set for them and the exact places where they should live.” If God has so determined their identity, then it is suggested that to pass those boundaries in intermarriage is wrong. However, this kind of argument is misdirected for several reasons.

First, the statement is descriptive, not prescriptive. It is not a prohibition against migration. He told them to fill the earth (1:28).

Second, the statement is general, not specific, being about nations, not individuals. If it were about individuals, then Ruth and Rahab would have been excluded too, yet they were included in the bloodline of the Messiah (cf. Matt. 1).

Third, the text itself speaks against racism, declaring that “from one man [God] made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth” (Acts 17:26). Again, there are not many races, there is only one—the human race.

The Curse on Canaan

Perhaps the most misused passage of all is Genesis 9, where God denounced Noah’s descendants through Canaan, the son of Ham, saying, “Cursed be Canaan! The lowest of slaves will he be to his brothers” (Gen. 9:25). However, this kind of interpretation overlooks several important facts, in addition to those listed below in favor of ethnic intermarriage.

First, there is nothing in this text about a curse on black or African people.

Second, the curse has nothing to do with the color of one’s skin.

Third, the descendants of Canaan were the Canaanites of the Promised Land who were cursed by God and destroyed by the Israelites in the book of Joshua. It has nothing to do with those who come from or live in Africa.

The Basis for Ethnic Intermarriage

There are several strong arguments from Scripture that God approves of ethnic intermarriage.

First, as noted above, all ethnic groups are from the same race—the human race.

Second, the New Testament specifically repeats that we are all “from one blood” (Acts 17:26 NKJV).

Third, there are biblically approved cases of ethnic intermarriage (such as Ruth’s and Rahab’s).

Fourth, when Moses married an Ethiopian woman and was criticized for doing so, God intervened and judged those who disapproved (Num. 12:1–15).

Fifth, and finally, the scriptural commands applicable to marriage are to marry “in the Lord” (1 Cor. 7:39 NKJV), someone with whom one is not “unequally yoked together” (meaning, not an unbeliever—2 Cor. 6:14 NKJV).

THE PURPOSE OF HUMANKIND

The purpose of creation is twofold: to honor the Creator and to enjoy His creation. This design is evident from the very beginning of creation and from the very nature of the creature. Paul exhorted the Corinthian believers to “honor God with your body” (1 Cor. 6:20). He said, “Whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God” (1 Cor. 10:31). He urged the Colossians, “Whatever you do, work at it with all your heart, as working for the Lord, not for men” (Col. 3:23).

In fact, all creatures, angelic and human, join in the eternal praise around God’s throne, singing, “You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things” (Rev. 4:11). “In his temple all cry, ‘Glory!’ ” (Ps. 29:9). Only “fools” (Ps. 14:1) exchange “the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles” (Rom. 1:22–23). They “worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator—who is forever praised” (v. 25).

To Glorify God, the Creator

The first purpose of the creature is to glorify his Creator. God said, “I created for my glory” (Isa. 43:7). This purpose follows from the nature of the Creator as well as the creature.

The Creator Did Not Have to Create Us

Creation did not come by compulsion; God was not forced to create us. The Scriptures say plainly, “By your [God’s] will they were created and have their being” (Rev. 4:11). God did not need to create—an infinite, perfect Being needs nothing. God was not lonely, for as a triunity of persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—God had absolutely perfect fellowship within Himself. He did not have to seek any companionship elsewhere. Why, then, did God create? Not because He had to, but because He wanted to. Indeed, all things are done “according to his good pleasure, which he purposed in Christ” (Eph. 1:9) who “works all things according to the counsel of His will” (v. 11 NKJV).

If God did not have to create us, then our existence is not necessary. Indeed, we might not have been, and we exist only because He wants us to be. Therefore, we owe our very existence to Him. Our very nature as freely created beings demands our allegiance to our Creator.

Our Life Is Dependent Upon God

Not only did we come to be because of God’s will, but we also continue to be by His will. He literally “sustain[s] all things by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3), because “in him all things hold together” (Col. 1:17). If God were to decide that we should no longer exist, we would go into oblivion that very moment.

God sustains all things in existence, including humankind (see chapter 21). “For in him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28). God has given ample evidence of His sustenance of all creation; as St. Paul said to the heathen at Lystra, “He [God] has not left himself without testimony: He has shown kindness by giving you rain from heaven and crops in their seasons; he provides you with plenty of food and fills your hearts with joy” (Acts 14:17). James acknowledged, “Every good and perfect gift is from above” (James 1:17). We came into the world naked, and we return naked (Job 1:21), and if God did not provide clothes for us, we would live naked as well (1 Tim. 6:7–8). However, God not only feeds the raven and clothes the lily, but He also provides for all our needs (Matt. 6:28–34).

Without the air and food He provides, we could not live. It behooves us, therefore, not to bite the Hand that is feeding us. Rather, as thankful creatures, we should confess with the psalmist, “I sing for joy at the works of your hands” (Ps. 92:4). As grateful creatures, we should glorify “the Creator—who is forever praised. Amen” (Rom. 1:25). This is the very reason for our existence.

To Enjoy God’s Creation

The second purpose of the creature is to enjoy creation. God is not a cosmic killjoy; He is not a heavenly Scrooge. God desires His creatures to be content. The psalmist said that the Lord “satisfies your desires with good things so that your youth is renewed” (Ps. 103:5). As just noted, Paul told unbelievers that God “provides you with plenty of food and fills your hearts with joy” (Acts 14:17). In fact, Paul speaks of “God, who richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment” (1 Tim. 6:17). “No good thing does he withhold from those whose walk is blameless” (Ps. 84:11). That is a promise for this life. And in the life to come? The psalmist said it best: “You will fill me with joy in your presence, with eternal pleasures at your right hand” (Ps. 16:11).

God desires that His creatures be happy as well as holy. He wants to provide them with satisfaction as well as sanctification. It is His very purpose for us that we enjoy every gift He graciously gives, for “a man can do nothing better than to eat and drink and find satisfaction in his work. This too, I see, is from the hand of God, for without him, who can eat or find enjoyment?” (Eccl. 2:24–25). In short, God desires that we be happy now and forever. He desires that (1) we exalt Him as Creator, and that (2) we enjoy His creation.

SUMMARY OF THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR CREATION

Creation is the first and one of the most basic teachings of Scripture. God created the material universe (Gen. 1:1), every living thing (1:20–25), and human beings in His image and likeness (1:27). The original creation was out of nothing (ex nihilo). Material creation by its nature is contingent, finite, limited in space and time, and good.

God created life in all its diversity and gave it an enduring unity and stability to reproduce after its kind. Human beings are a distinct creation: The human race possesses dignity, unity, and community. God also created spirits called angels (see chapter 20) whose purpose is to serve God and His children. (Some angels rebelled against God and became known as demons. The leader of this rebellion is called the devil or Satan.) The purpose of all rational creatures is to glorify God and enjoy His creation.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS OF MATERIAL CREATION

The doctrine of creation is firmly rooted in the theology of the historic Christian church. This is true from the very earliest times.

The Early Church Fathers on Creation

Justin Martyr

Homer, too, having discovered from the ancient and divine history which says, “Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return,” calls the lifeless body of Hector dumb clay.... And again, somewhere else, he introduces Menelaus, thus addressing those who were not accepting Hector’s challenge to single combat with becoming alacrity, “To earth and water may you all return,” resolving them in his violent rage into their original and pristine formation from earth. These things Homer and Plato, having learned in Egypt from the ancient histories, wrote in their own words. (JHAG, 286)

Irenaeus

It is proper, then, that I should begin with the first and most important head, that is, God the Creator, who made the heaven and the earth, and all things that are therein (whom these men blasphemously style the fruit of a defect), and to demonstrate that there is nothing either above Him or after Him; nor that, influenced by any one, but of His own free will, He created all things, since He is the only God, the only Lord, the only Creator, the only Father, alone containing all things, and Himself commanding all things into existence. (AH, 2.1.1 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1)

He added,

For it must be either that there is one Being who contains all things, and formed in His own territory all those things which have been created, according to His own will; or, again, that there are numerous unlimited creators and gods, who begin from each other, and end in each other on every side; and it will then be necessary to allow that all the rest are contained from without by someone who is greater. (AH, 2.1.5 in ibid., 1)

Further,

He [God] created and made all things by His Word, while He neither required angels to assist Him in the production of those things which are made, nor of any power greatly inferior to Himself.... But He Himself in Himself, after a fashion which we can neither describe nor conceive, predestinating all things, formed them as He pleased, bestowing harmony on all things, and assigning them their own place, and the beginning of their creation. (AH, 2.1.4 in ibid., 1)

Irenaeus continued,

He formed all things that were made by His Word that never wearies. [For] His own Word is both suitable and sufficient for the formation of all things, even as John, the disciple of the Lord, declares regarding Him: "All things were made by Him, and without Him was nothing made." Now, among the "all things" our world must be embraced. (AH, 2.1.4–5 in ibid., 1)

He went on,

Let them cease, therefore, to affirm that the world was made by any other; for as soon as God formed a conception in His mind, that was also done which He had thus mentally conceived. (AH, 2.3.2 in ibid.)

In conclusion,

It is not seemly, however, to say of Him who is God over all, since He is free and independent, that He was a slave to necessity, or that anything takes place with His permission, yet against His desire; otherwise they will make necessity greater and more kingly than God, since that which has the most power is superior to all [others]. (AH, 2.5.4 in ibid.)

Tertullian

Although Hermogenes finds it amongst his colorable pretenses (for it was not in his power to discover it in the Scriptures of God), it is enough for us, both that it is certain that all things were made by God, and that there is no certainty that they were made by Matter. And even if Matter had previously existed, we must believe that it had been really made by God, since we maintained (no less) when we held the rule of faith to be, that nothing except God was uncreated. Up to this point there is no room for controversy, until Matter is brought to the test of the Scriptures, and fails to make good its case. The conclusion of the whole is this: I find that there was nothing made, except out of nothing; because that which I find was made of the grass, and the fruit, and the cattle, and the form of man himself; so from the waters were produced the animals which swim and fly. The original fabrics out of which such creatures were produced I may call their materials, but then even these were created by God. (AH, 2.3.33 in ibid., III)

You have, no doubt, amongst your philosophers men who maintain that this world is without a beginning or a maker. It is, however, much more true, that nearly all the heresies allow it an origin and a maker, and ascribe its creation to our God. Firmly believe, therefore, that He produced it wholly out of nothing, and then you have found the knowledge of God, by believing that He possesses such mighty power. (RF, 2.6.11 in ibid.)

The Medieval Church Fathers on Creation

Continuing into the Middle Ages, all orthodox teachers continued to believe what the early Apostles' Creed declared, namely, that God is "Creator of heaven and earth." Indeed, many went into great detail as to what this meant and how it happened.

Augustine

Concerning creation, as we have seen, Augustine said three questions may be asked: "Who made it? How? and Why?"—the answers are: 'God'; 'by the word'; and 'because it is good' " (CG, 11.23). He elaborated as follows:

Who created? God is of course the "First Cause" (LCG, 23). He is the "Beginning" beyond which there is no beginning. He is eternal and uncaused. He is indivisible and unchangable (CG, 11.10). He is infinitely wise and powerful. Further, God created voluntarily. God created "the heavens and the earth" and "every living thing" (Gen. 1:1, 21). This "implies that before the creation of heaven and earth God had made nothing" (ibid., 11.9). Thus, "There could not have existed any matter of anything whatever unless it came from God, the Author and Creator of all that has been formed or is to be formed" (LCG, 35).

While all things are from God, they are not of God (ONG, 27). Creation "is not out of Him, because it is not immutable, as He is." But since "it was not made of anything else, it was undoubtedly made out of nothing—but by Himself" (OSIO, 1.4). So "it is silly to imagine infinite space since there is no such thing as space beyond the cosmos" (CG, 11.5).

How Did God Create? As to the time God created, Augustine asked, "Did the author of time need the help of time?" (LCG, 195). There is no time before time began, only eternity, for "if they excogitate infinite periods of time before the world ... they ought to conceive of infinite reaches of space beyond the visible universe" (CG, 11.5). There was no time before God created: He created time from eternity. Time had a beginning, but God's decree to create did not; it was eternal.

Commenting on the length of "days" in Genesis 1, Augustine wrote,

We see, indeed, that our ordinary days have no evening but by the setting, and no morning but by the rising, of the sun; but the first three days of all were passed without sun, since it is reported to have been made on the fourth day. And first of all, indeed, light was made by the word of God, and God, we read, separated it from the darkness, and called the light Day, and the darkness Night; but what kind of light that was, and by what periodic movement it made evening and morning, is beyond the reach of our senses, (ibid., 208)

Further,

When it is said that God rested on the seventh day from all His works, and hallowed it, we are not to conceive of this in a childish fashion, as if work were a toil to God, who "spake and it was done," spake by the spiritual and eternal, not audible and transitory word. But God's rest signifies the rest of those who rest in God, as the joy of a house means the joy of those in the house who rejoice, though not the house, but something else, causes the joy. (ibid., 209)

Why did God create? If God created freely, then we can ask why He created rather than not create. Once again, Augustine's answer was "because it is good" (ibid., 11.23). Commenting on the fact that God declared His creation was “very good” (Gen. 1:31), Augustine concluded, “Surely, this can only mean that there was no other reason for creating the world except that good creatures might be made by a good God” (CG, 11.3).

Anselm

Who created? In answer to this question, Anselm wrote,

WHAT art thou, then, Lord God, than whom nothing greater can be conceived? But what art thou, except that which, as the highest of all beings, alone exists through itself, and creates all other things from nothing? For, whatever is not this is less than a thing which can be conceived of. But this cannot be conceived of thee? (P, 5)

Hence, seeing that whatever is exists through the supreme Being, nor can aught else exist through this Being, except by its creation, or by its existence as material, it follows, necessarily, that nothing besides it exists, except by its creation. And, since nothing else is or has been, except that supreme Being and the beings created by it, it could create nothing at all through any other instrument or aid than itself. (M, 7)

From what did God create? Anselm replied,

All that it has created, it has doubtless created either from something, as from material, or from nothing.... Since, then, it is most patent that the essence of all beings, except the supreme Essence, was created by that supreme Essence, and derives existence from no material, doubtless nothing can be more clear than that this supreme Essence nevertheless produced from nothing, alone and through itself, the world of material things, so numerous a multitude, formed in such beauty, varied in such order, so fitly diversified, (ibid.)

We can understand, without inconsistency, the statement that the creative Being created all things from nothing, or that all were created through it from nothing; that is, those things which before were nothing, are now something. For, indeed, from the very word that we use, saying that it created them or that they were created, we understand that when this Being created them, it created something, and that when they were created, they were created only as something, (ibid., 8)

However,

It is clear that the beings that were created were nothing before their creation, to this extent, that they were not what they now are, nor was there anything whence they should be created, yet they were not nothing, so far as the Creator’s thought is concerned, through which, and according to which, they were created, (ibid., 9)

Just as an artisan first conceives in his mind what he afterwards actually executes in accordance with his mental concept, yet I see that this analogy is very incomplete. For the supreme Substance took absolutely nothing from any other source, whence it might either frame a model in itself, or make its creatures what they are. (ibid., 11)

Since it cannot but be that those things which have been created live through another, and that by which they have been created lives through itself, necessarily, just as nothing has been created except through the creative, present Being, so nothing lives except through its preserving presence, (ibid., 13)

Why did God create?

It is, therefore, most obvious that the rational creature was created for this purpose, that it might love the supreme Being above all other goods, as this Being is itself the supreme good; nay, that it might love nothing except it, unless because of it; since that Being is good through itself, and nothing else is good except through it. But the rational being cannot love this Being, unless it has devoted itself to remembering and conceiving of it. It is clear, then, that the rational creature ought to devote its whole ability and will to remembering, and conceiving of, and loving, the supreme good, for which end it recognizes that it has its very existence, (ibid., 68)

Thomas Aquinas

As established previously, Aquinas's view on Creation can be stated in terms of his answers to the basic questions.

Who created? God did, but He did it freely, for, again, "it is not necessary that God should will anything except Himself" (ST, la. 46.1).

To the Father is appropriated power which is especially shown in creation.... To the Son is appropriated wisdom through which an intellectual agent acts.... To the Holy Ghost is appropriated goodness, to which belong both governance ... and the giving of life, (ibid., la. 46.6)

Not only did God create, but only God can create, for "to create is, properly speaking, to cause or produce the being of things" (ibid., la. 45.6). God alone can cause something to come into being: "An individual man cannot be the cause of human nature absolutely, because he would then be the cause of himself" (ibid., la. 45.5). In fact, "no created being can produce a being absolutely" (ibid.). This is so, since God alone is the primary cause, and "no secondary cause can produce anything.... Hence it remains that nothing can create except God alone" (ibid., la. 65.3).

Secondary causes do not create; they only reduplicate (ibid., la. 45.6). A "secondary instrumental cause does not share in the action of the superior cause.... So it is impossible for any creature to create" (ibid, la. 45.5).

How did God create? By His Word. As stated, there is no instrumental cause of creation, because between nothing and something there is no medium. So "God produces being in act out of nothing ... according to the greatness of His power" (ibid., la. 61.1). Hence, "it is to be held with complete conviction that God brings creatures into existence of his own free will, and not as bound by natural necessity" (OPG, 3.15).

From what did God create? Aquinas replied,

I answer that it must be said that every being in any way existing is from God. For whatever is found in anything by participation, must be caused in it by that to which it belongs essentially, as iron becomes ignited by fire. Therefore all beings apart from God are not their own being, but are beings by participation. Therefore it must be that all things which are diversified by the diverse participation of being, so as to be more or less perfect, are caused by one First Being, Who possesses being most perfectly. (ST, la.44.1)

To resummarize, God created out of nothing, but "nothing" is not some sort of invisible stuff out of which God made the world. By "out of nothing" is meant "that it was not made from anything" (ibid., la.46.2). The preposition "from" does not imply it came from something but simply after nothing (ibid, la.45.1). Therefore, creation from nothing is really creation after nothing, for "nothing is the same as no being" (ibid.).

When did God create? As we have seen repeatedly, God created "in the beginning." God is eternal, but the world is not. The universe came to be, but God always was (really, is).

Again, Aquinas believed eternal creation was theoretically possible (ST, Ia.46.2), though not actually so. This, he reasoned, is because viewed “from above,” God is eternal, and an effect is simultaneous to its cause of existence. As mentioned before, Bonaventure and others argued “from below” that an eternal universe is impossible because an infinite series of moments is unattainable (Bonaventure, S, 1.1.1.2.1–6). Both views agree that the universe is not eternal.

It is not therefore necessary for God to will that the world should always exist; but the world exists forasmuch as God wills it to exist, since the being of the world depends on the will of God, as on its cause. It is not therefore necessary for the world to be always; and hence it cannot be proved by demonstration. (Aquinas, ST, Ia.46.1)

Further,

The words of Genesis, “In the beginning God created heaven and earth,” are expounded in a threefold sense in order to exclude three errors. For some said that the world always was, and that time had no beginning; and to exclude this the words “In the beginning” are expounded—viz., “of time.” And some said that there are two principles of creation, one of good things and the other of evil things, against which “in the beginning” is expounded—“in the Son.” For as the efficient principle is appropriated to the Father by reason of power, so the exemplar principle is appropriated to the Son by reason of wisdom, in order that, as it is said (Ps. 104:24), “In wisdom you made them all,” it may be understood that God made all things in the beginning—that is, in the Son; according to the word of the Apostle (Col. 1:16), “by him”—viz., the Son—“all things were created.” But others said that corporeal things were created by God through the medium of spiritual creation; and to exclude this it is expounded thus: “In the beginning”—i.e., before all things—“God created heaven and earth.” For [these] things are stated to be created together—viz., the empyrean heaven, corporeal matter, by which is meant the earth, time, and the angelic nature, (ibid., Ia.46.3)

Why did God create? “God brings things into existence in order that his goodness may be communicated and manifested” (ibid., 1.47.1). Not that God must share His goodness, but simply that He wants to do so. Thus, God created both to manifest His goodness and to share it with His creatures.

After what pattern did God create?

I answer that God is the first exemplar cause of all things. In proof whereof we must consider that if for the production of anything an exemplar is necessary, it is in order that the effect may receive a determinate form. For an artificer produces a determinate form in matter by reason of the exemplar before him, whether it is the exemplar beheld externally, or the exemplar interiorly conceived in the mind, (ibid., Ia.44.3)

The Reformation Leaders on Creation

Martin Luther

In the beginning, God made Adam out of a piece of clay, and Eve out of Adam’s rib: he blessed them, and said: “Be fruitful and increase”—words that will stand and remain powerful to the world’s end.... These and other things which he daily creates, the ungodly blind world see not, nor acknowledge for God’s wonders, but think all is done by chance and haphazard, whereas, the godly, wheresoever they cast their eyes, beholding heaven and earth, the air and water, see and acknowledge all for God’s wonders; and, full of astonishment and delight, laud the Creator, knowing that God is well pleased therewith. (TT, 64)

John Calvin

God was pleased that a history of the creation should exist—a history on which the faith of the Church might lean without seeking any other God than Him whom Moses sets forth as the Creator and Architect of the world.... This knowledge is of the highest use not only as an antidote to the monstrous fables which anciently prevailed both in Egypt and the other regions of the world, but also as a means of giving a clearer manifestation of the eternity of God as contrasted with the birth of creation, and thereby inspiring us with higher admiration. (ICR, 1.14.1)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on Creation

Jacob Arminius

“Creation is an external act of God, by which he produced all things out of nothing, for himself, by his Word and Spirit” (WJA, 11.54). “The primary efficient cause is God the Father, by his Word and Spirit. The impelling cause, which we have indicated in the definition by the particle ‘for,’ is the goodness of God” (ibid.).

Further, “time and place are not separate creatures, but are created with things themselves, or, rather, that they exist together at the creation of things” (ibid., 57). And,

Man is a creature of God; consisting of a body and a soul, rational, good, and created after the divine image “according to his body,” created from pre-existing matter, that is, earth mixed and besprinkled with aqueous and ethereal moisture, [as well as] “according to his soul,” created out of nothing, by the breathing of breath into his nostrils, (ibid., 62)

Jonathan Edwards

A main difference between the intelligent and moral parts, and the rest of the world, lies in this, that the former are capable of knowing their Creator, and the end for which he made them, and capable of article complying with his design in their creation, and promoting it while other creatures cannot promote the design of their creation, only passively and eventually. (WJE, 2.2.8)

Charles Hodge

Charles Hodge, onetime president of Princeton University, was a great defender of the orthodox faith, including the doctrine of Creation. In His book What Is Darwinism? he answers flatly, “Darwinism is atheism.” He explains that neither Darwin nor all his followers were atheists, but the theory of Darwinism is tantamount to atheism because in excluding design from nature it thereby excludes the need for a Designer.

The God of the Bible is an extramundane God, existing out of, and before the world, absolutely independent of it; its creator, preserver, and governor. So the doctrine of creation is a necessary consequence of Theism. If we deny that the world owes its existence to the will of God, then Atheism, Hylozoism, or Pantheism would seem to be the logical consequence. (ST, 1.561–62)

Apart from the pantheistic doctrine which makes the universe the existence form, or, as Goethe calls it ... (the living garment) of God, the most prevalent views on this subject are, First, those theories which exclude mind from the causative origin of the world; Secondly, those which admit of mind, but only as connected with matter; and Thirdly, the Scriptural doctrine which assumes the existence of an infinite extra-mundane mind to whose power and will the existence of all things out of God is to be referred, (ibid., 1.550)

Hodge on Creation Ex Nihilo

While it has ever been the doctrine of the Church that God created the universe out of nothing by the word of his power, which creation was instantaneous and immediate, i.e., without the intervention of any second causes; yet it has generally been admitted that this is to be understood only of the original call of matter into existence. Theologians have, therefore, distinguished between a first and second, or immediate and mediate creation. The one was instantaneous, the other gradual; the one precludes the idea of any preexisting substance, and of cooperation, the other admits and implies both.... It thus appears that forming out of preexisting material comes within the Scriptural idea of creating. We all recognize God as the author of our being, as our Creator, as well as our Preserver.... And the Bible constantly speaks of God as causing the grass to grow, and as being the real author or maker of all that the earth, air, or water produces. There is, therefore, according to the Scriptures, not only an immediate, instantaneous creation ex nihilo by the simple word of God, but a mediate, progressive creation; the power of God working in union with second causes, (ibid., 1.556–1.557)

Hodge on the “Days” of Genesis

The foundation of the world is an epoch. Then time began. What was before the foundation of the world is eternal. The world, therefore, is not eternal, and if not eternal it must have had a beginning, and if all things had a beginning, then there must have been a creation ex nihilo.... The [Genesis] account recognizes in creation two great eras of three days each, an Inorganic and an Organic. Each of these eras open with the appearance of light; the first, light cosmical; the second, light from the sun for the special uses of the earth.... Each era ends in “a day” of two great works—the two shown to be distinct by being severally pronounced “good.” On the third day, that closing the Inorganic Era, there was first the dividing of the land from the waters, and afterwards the creation of vegetation, or the institution of a kingdom of life—a work widely diverse from all that preceded it in the era. So on the sixth day, terminating the Organic Era, there was first the creation of mammals, and then a second far greater work, totally new in its grandest element, the creation of Man. (ibid., 1.572)

Hodge on No Conflict Between Genesis and the Facts of Science

As the Bible is of God, it is certain that there can be no conflict between the teachings of the Scriptures and the facts of science. It is not with Facts, but with theories, believers have to contend. Many such theories have, from time to time, been presented, apparently or really inconsistent with the Bible. But these theories have either proved to be false, or to harmonize with the Word of God, properly interpreted. The Church has been forced more than once to alter her interpretation of the Bible to accommodate the discoveries of science. But this has been done without doing any violence to the Scriptures or in any degree impairing their authority. [For] the Bible, and the Bible alone of all ancient books, was in full accord with these stupendous revelations of science. And so if it should be proved that the creation was a process continued through countless ages, and that the Bible alone of all the books of antiquity recognized that fact, then, as Professor Dana says, the idea of its being [only] of human origin would become “utterly incomprehensible” (ibid., 1.573–74).

Karl Barth

The divine creation in itself and as such did not and does not take place for its own sake. Creation is the freely willed and executed positing of a reality distinct from God. The question thus arises: What was and is the will of God in doing this? We may reply that He does not will to be alone in His glory; that He desires something else beside Him. (CD, 3.1.95)

He wills and posits the creature neither out of caprice nor necessity, but because He has loved it from eternity, because He wills to demonstrate His love for it, and because He wills, not to limit His glory by its existence and being, but to reveal and manifest it in His own coexistence with it. As the Creator He wills really to exist for His creature, (ibid.)

The creature does not exist casually. It does not merely exist, [it] exists meaningfully. In its existence it realizes a purpose and order. It has not come into being by chance but by necessity, therefore not as an accident but as a sign and witness of this necessity. This is already implied in the fact that it is a creature and therefore the work of the Creator, of God. (ibid., 3.1.229)

THE CURRENT DEBATE ON CREATION AND EVOLUTION

Since the time of Charles Darwin (1809–1882), a debate has raged within Christianity on whether or not total evolution is compatible with the historic biblical and theological teaching on origins. Two basic camps have emerged: theistic evolution and creationism. Within the second faction (creationists), there are two major groups: old-earth creationists and young-earth creationists. (The former are often called progressive creationists, and the latter, fiat creationists.) Currently, in America, the young-earth creationists are led by the Institute for Creation Research (ICR), based on the work of Henry Morris. Progressive (old-earth) creationism is championed by Hugh Ross and his “Reasons to Believe” organization; another proponent of this view is Robert Newman at Biblical Seminary in Hatfield, Pennsylvania.

Young-Earth Creationism

The primary difference between young-and old-earth creationists is the speculated amount of time between God’s creative acts (see appendix 4). Young-earthers (fiat creationists) insist that it was all accomplished in 144 hours—six successive twenty-four-hour days—while old-earth (progressive) creationists allow for millions (or even billions) of years. This is usually done by

- (1) placing the long periods of time before Genesis 1:1 (making it a recent and local Creation);
- (2) placing the long periods of time between Genesis 1:1 and 1:2 (called “gap” views);
- (3) making the “days” of Genesis 1 long periods of time;
- (4) allowing long periods of time between literal twenty-four-hour days in Genesis 1 (called “alternate day-age” views); or
- (5) making the “days” of Genesis to be days of revelation of God to the writer, not days of Creation (called “revelatory day” views).

There are several variations within these perspectives, making a total of more than a dozen different views held by evangelical theologians on the matter (see appendix 4).

Old-Earth Creationism

Old-earth (progressive) creationists are not to be confused with theistic evolutionists. Old-earth creationists do not accept macroevolution (see the third area of agreement below) as a method by which God produced the originally created kinds of Genesis 1. Old-earth creationism was strong among nineteenth-century creationists, though the view dates from at least the fourth century (in Augustine). Again, prominent contemporary defenders include Hugh Ross and Robert Newman (see bibliography).

Theistic Evolution

Broadly speaking, theistic evolution is the belief that God used evolution as His means of producing the various forms of physical life on this planet, including human life. All theistic evolutionists believe that God performed at least one supernatural act—the act of creating the physical universe from nothing. However, this may more properly be called deistic evolution, since there are no miracles involved after the first act of Creation (see Volume 1, chapters 2–3).

Most theistic evolutionists hold to at least two acts of Creation: (1) the creation of matter out of nothing, and (2) the creation of first life. After that, allegedly, every other living thing, including human beings, emerged by natural processes that God had ordained from the beginning. Some theistic evolutionists do insist that (3) God directly created the first soul in the long-evolved primate to make it truly human and in His image.

Roman Catholicism embraces theistic evolution, and Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955) is a notable example, although his concept of God is more pantheistic (see Volume 1, chapter 2). Among evangelical scientists, Howard Van Til (see PC and FD) is a champion of theistic evolution, as are many members of the American Scientific Association (see JASA). There is a movement among some contemporary scientists to combine theistic evolution with the anthropic principle, positing that the Creator fine-tuned the entire universe from the moment of the big bang so that everything, including all life forms, eventually emerged by natural processes from that point (see Barrow and Tipler, AP).

Areas of Agreement Between Young- and Old-Earth Creationists

Young- and old-earth creationists have much in common, at least among those who are evangelical. This includes several basic things.

Direct Supernatural Creation of All Forms of Life

Both young- and old-earth creationists believe that God supernaturally, directly, and immediately produced every kind of animal and human as separate and genetically distinct forms of life (Ross, FG). Both hold that every kind produced by God was directly created de nova (brand-new) and did not come about by God's using natural processes over a long period of time or tinkering with previous types of life in order to make higher forms (evolution).

Opposition to Naturalism

Both groups are also agreed in their opposition to naturalism, which they see as the philosophical presupposition of evolution. They correctly observe that without a naturalistic bias, evolution loses its credibility. Ruling out the possibility of supernatural intervention in the world begs the whole question in favor of evolution even before one begins.

Opposition to Macroevolution

Likewise, both are united in their opposition to macroevolution, either theistic or nontheistic; that is, they reject the theory of common ancestry. They both deny that all forms of life descended by completely natural processes without supernatural intervention from the outside.

They deny that all living things are like a tree connected to a common trunk and root; rather, they affirm the separate ancestry of all the basic forms of life, a picture more like a forest of different trees. Microevolution, where small changes occur within the basic kinds of created things, is acknowledged, but no macro (large scale) evolution occurs between different kinds. For example, both old and young earth creationists agree that all dogs are related to an original canine pair—part of the same tree. However, they deny that dogs, cats, cows, and other created kinds are related like branches from one original tree.

The Historicity of the Genesis Account

Further, both young and old earthers who are evangelical hold to the historicity of the Genesis account: They believe that Adam and Eve were literal people, the progenitors of the entire human race. While some may allow for poetic form and figure of speech in the narrative, all agree that it conveys historical and literal truth about origins. This is made clear by the New Testament references to Adam and Eve, their creation and fall, as literal (cf. Luke 3:38; Rom. 5:12; 1 Tim. 2:13–14).

Areas of Difference Between Young- and Old-Earth Creationists

Of course, there are some differences between the two basic evangelical views on Creation. The primary ones include the following.

The Age of the Earth

A crucial variance between the two views, naturally, is the age of the earth (see Newman and Eckelmann, GOOE). Young earthers insist that both the Bible and science support a universe that is only thousands of years of age, while old earthers allow for billions of years. Young earthers connect their view to a literal interpretation of Genesis (and Ex. 20:11), but old earthers claim the same basic hermeneutic, which they believe can include millions, if not billions, of years since Creation. They too cite scientific evidence in their favor (see appendix 4).

At a minimum, it would be wise if both sides could agree on the following:

- (1) The age of the earth is not a test for orthodoxy.
- (2) Neither view is proven with scientific finality, since there are unproven (if not unprovable) presuppositions associated with each.
- (3) The fact of Creation (vs. evolution) is more important than the time of Creation.
- (4) Their common enemy (naturalistic evolution) is a more significant focus than their intramural differences.

The Nature of the Flood

Most young-earth creationists are also flood geologists; that is, they believe that the apparent age of the earth represented in the sedimentary geological formations do not represent millions of years, but only one year of activity by a worldwide flood. A few comments are appropriate here:

- (1) Again, flood geology should not be used as a test of orthodoxy, as there are other ways to explain the data that are consistent with an evangelical interpretation of the Bible.
- (2) Flood geology should be explored as a scientific theory in its own right, as well as for its possible explanatory value of the biblical data.

- (3) One can be a young earther and still reject flood geology, as some do. Hence, the two are not inseparably tied.
- (4) Those who reject a universal flood (along with flood geology) do have a more difficult time explaining all the biblical data. If the flood was only local, then
  - (a) why were two of each kind of animal taken into the ark?
  - (b) why is the language of Genesis so specifically and intensely universal (cf. 7:19–23)?
  - (c) why are flood deposits universal?
  - (d) why are flood stories universal?
  - (e) why does Peter say the whole earth was under water? (2 Peter 3:5–7)
  - (f) why does the Bible say only eight people were saved (2 Peter 2:5) if there were others who escaped also?
  - (g) why were all the mountains covered? (Gen. 7:19)

The Intelligent Design Movement

A third group of creationists has emerged; its adherents attempt to avoid the internal debate between fiat and progressive creationists. The intelligent design movement was founded and championed by UC-Berkeley professor Phillip Johnson (see his DT And RB); other major leaders include Baylor professor William Dembski (see his MC) and Lehigh professor Michael Behe (see his DBB). By concentrating on the issue of intelligent design versus purely naturalistic evolution (and instead of focusing on issues such as the age of the earth and the extent of the flood), the intelligent-design movement hopes to accomplish the following:

- (1) Form a unifying “wedge” that can break the bulwark of naturalistic evolution around the academic community.
- (2) Strike at the Achilles heel of evolution by revealing its naturalistic philosophical commitment and thereby destroy its plausibility and privileged position in the academic community.
- (3) Provide a scientific alternative to naturalistic macroevolution that is free of the trappings of biblical and religious language.
- (4) Provide an umbrella under which young-and old-earth creationists can work against naturalistic evolution.

CONCLUSION

The doctrine of Creation is a cornerstone of the Christian faith. The essentials of this teaching have universal consent among orthodox theologians. They include the following:

- (1) There is a theistic God.
- (2) Creation of the universe was ex nihilo (out of nothing).
- (3) Every living thing was created by God.
- (4) Adam and Eve were a direct and special creation of God.
- (5) The Genesis account of creation is historical, not mythological.

While there is lively debate about the time of Creation, all evangelicals agree on the fact of Creation. There is also agreement on the source of Creation (a theistic God) and the purpose of Creation (to glorify God). The exact method of Creation is still a moot question; however, increasingly, the scientific evidence supports a supernatural Creation of the universe, the direct creation of first life (see Thaxton, MLO), and the special creation of every basic life form. Hence, macroevolution, whether theistic or naturalistic, is unfounded both biblically and scientifically.

CHAPTER TWENTY

THE CREATION OF SPIRITUAL CREATURES (ANGELS)

In addition to the physical world and humankind, God also created spiritual creatures called angels. The universe is material, while angels are immaterial; human beings have both matter (body) and spirit, while angels have only spirit. The hierarchy of beings ranges from God to angels to human beings to animals to inanimate matter. Angels are beneath God, and humans are a little lower than the angels (Heb. 2:7), while all creatures are below them (Ps. 8:4–5).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR ANGELOLOGY

The study of angels is a major but often neglected division of theology. Angels play an important role in God’s plan of redemption (Heb. 1:14; Matt. 18:10), and their origin, nature, function, and destiny are significant themes in Scripture.

The Origin of Angels

Although technically angels are only a certain kind of God’s spiritual creatures (namely, “messengers”), “angels” is the term commonly used of all spiritual creatures.

Angels are not eternal; they were created. The psalmist declared, “Praise him, all his angels, praise him, all his heavenly hosts. . . . For he commanded and they were created” (Ps. 148:2, 5). Paul added, “by him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities” (Col. 1:16). Nehemiah said, “You alone are the Lord. You made the heavens, even the highest heavens, and all their starry host” (Neh. 9:6). Genesis concludes that “the heavens and the earth, and all the host of them, were finished” (Gen. 2:1). Thus, angels were probably created when the Scriptures say, “God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). They were definitely created before the earth was, for they sang when its cornerstone was laid (Job 38:6–7).

The Names of Angels

God's spiritual creatures are given different titles in the Bible; some are even given proper names. Angels are called "living creatures" (Rev. 4:6); "angels" ("messengers"—Dan. 4:13); "angels of God" (John 1:51); "elect angels" (1 Tim. 5:21); "holy angels" (Rev. 14:10); "powerful angels" (2Thess.1:7); "chief princes" (Dan. 10:13); "ministers" (Ps. 104:4 NKJV); "sons of God" (Job 1:6; 2:1 NKJV); "Sons of the mighty" (Ps. 89:6 NKJV; cf. 29:1); "mighty ones" (Ps. 26:9; 103:20); "gods" (elohim—Ps. 8:5); "holy ones" (Dan. 8:13; Zech. 14:5; Job 15:15); "stars" (Job 38:7; Rev. 12:4); "host" (of heaven—Gen. 2:1 NKJV; Neh. 9:6; Luke 2:13); and "chariots" (Ps. 68:17; Zech. 6:1–5). Many scholars also believe that the "elders" in Revelation 4:4 are angelic beings.

Again, some angels are given names in the Bible. There is Michael, whose name means "Who is like God?" He is called "one of the chief princes" (Dan. 10:13), the "archangel" (Jude 9) who "protects your people [Israel]" (Dan. 12:1; 10:21), leader of the heavenly army (Rev. 12:7), and "possibly of cherub class" (Dan. 10:13; cf. Ezek. 10:1–13). He disputed with Satan (Jude 9) and will lead in the final victory over the devil after the thousand-year reign of Christ (Rev. 12:7).

Then there is Gabriel, whose name means "Devoted to God." He "stand[s] in the presence of God" (Luke 1:19). He makes special announcements for God, like the one to Zechariah (Luke 1:11–13). He appeared to Mary (Luke 1:26–33), and he is a revealer of God's kingdom purposes (Dan. 9:21–22; 8:16).

Finally, there is Lucifer (Isa. 14:12 NKJV), called "son of the morning," who fell and became the devil. He has many names in his fallen state; the most common are listed in Revelation 12:9: "The great dragon was hurled down—that ancient serpent called the devil, or Satan, who leads the whole world astray" (emphasis added, see Volume 3).

Presumably, all angels have names. God knows all the stars by number (Isa. 40:26), and these are merely inanimate objects. They too with angels, are called the "host" of heaven (Gen. 2:1; cf. Neh. 9:6; Ps. 103:21). So God likely has a name for each angel. Certainly He knows each one individually, since He is all knowing or omniscient (see chapter 8).

The Nature of Angels

Like God (see chapter 6), angels are immaterial, being pure spirits. Thus, they have an invisible nature, though some have taken on physical forms and appeared to human beings (cf. Gen. 18). Colossians 1:16 declares, "For by Him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him." Hebrews 1:14 calls them "ministering spirits," and in Luke 24:39 (NKJV) Jesus said, "A spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see I have." As such, many angels can be present in one place, as was the case of the demon possessed man who had a legion of spirits in his body. Luke 8:30 records: "Jesus asked him, 'What is your name?'"

"'Legion,' he replied, because many demons had gone into him." Further, it is only by a miracle that angels can be seen by mortals. In 2 Kings 6:17, "Elisha prayed, 'O LORD, open his eyes so he may see.' Then the LORD opened the servant's eyes, and he looked and saw the hills full of horses and chariots of fire all around Elisha."

Angels Are Genderless

Since they are without gender, angels do not engage in marriage. Matthew wrote, "At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like angels in heaven” (Matt. 22:30). Luke added, “Those who are considered worthy of taking part in that age and in the resurrection from the dead will neither marry nor be given in marriage, and they can no longer die; for they are like the angels. They are God’s children, since they are children of the resurrection” (Luke 20:35–36).

Angels Never Die

Since they have no body, angels are not subject to decay and death: They are immortal. As noted before, Luke wrote, “Those who are considered worthy of taking part in that age and in the resurrection from the dead will neither marry nor be given in marriage, and they can no longer die; for they are like the angels” (Luke 20:35–36). In Matthew 25:41, we read Jesus’ words, “Then he will say to those on his left, ‘Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels.’ ”

Angels Have Free Will

Paul spoke of Satan, who chose to rebel against God, saying, “[Do not place] a recent convert [in a position of spiritual leadership], or he may become conceited and fall under the same judgment as the devil” (1 Tim. 3:6). Jude added, “Angels who did not keep their positions of authority but abandoned their own home—these he has kept in darkness, bound with everlasting chains for judgment on the great Day” (Jude 6). Peter noted that “God did not spare angels when they sinned, but sent them to hell, putting them into gloomy dungeons to be held for judgment” (2 Peter 2:4).

Angels Have Great Intelligence

Second Samuel 14:20 observed: “My lord has wisdom like that of an angel of God—he knows everything that happens in the land.”

“The angel [at Jesus’ empty tomb] said to the women, ‘Do not be afraid, for I know that you are looking for Jesus, who was crucified,’ “thus revealing that they knew where He was (Matt. 28:5). Jesus implied that angels have great knowledge when He said, “No one knows about that day or hour, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father” (Mark 13:32). Other angels biblically displayed tremendous knowledge (cf. Luke 1:13; Rev. 10:5–6; 17:1).

Angels Have Great Power

The messengers sent to Sodom performed a miracle: “The [angels] reached out and pulled Lot back into the house and shut the door. Then they struck the men who were at the door of the house, young and old, with blindness so that they could not find the door” (Gen. 19:10–11). They are called “mighty ones” (Ps. 103:20) and “powerful angels” (2 Thess. 1:7). The ones at Jesus’ tomb were able to roll back the heavy stone (Matt. 28:2–3). At the end of the age, God “will send his angels with a loud trumpet call, and they will gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of the heavens to the other” (Matt. 24:31). Speaking of false teachers, Peter says, “Angels, although they are stronger and more powerful, do not bring slanderous accusations against such beings in the presence of the Lord” (2 Peter 2:11).

Angels Are Persons

Having the three essential characteristics of intellect, will, and emotion, angels are persons. Since the first two have just been discussed, it remains to show that they have feelings. This is evident in their worship, for “they were calling to one another: ‘Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory’ ” (Isa. 6:3; cf. Rev. 4:8–9). Further, they experience joy, for “there is rejoicing in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner who repents” (Luke 15:10).

Angels Are Beautiful

As reflections of God’s nature and glory, angels are lovely beings; Isaiah’s vision of them in the temple is certainly one of ineffable beauty. He said, “In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple. Above him were seraphs, each with six wings: With two wings they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they were flying” (Isa. 6:1–2). Likewise, Ezekiel’s vision of the “living beings” was one of incredible beauty. He said, “As I looked at the living creatures, I saw a wheel on the ground beside each creature with its four faces. This was the appearance and structure of the wheels: They sparkled like chrysolite, and all four looked alike” (Ezek. 1:15–16; cf. 22, 28).

When referring to the Prince of Tyre as a “cherub,” Ezekiel said, “You were in Eden, the garden of God; every precious stone adorned you: ruby, topaz and emerald, chrysolite, onyx and jasper, sapphire, turquoise and beryl. Your settings and mountings were made of gold; on the day you were created they were prepared. You were anointed as a guardian cherub, for so I ordained you. You were on the holy mount of God; you walked among the fiery stones” (Ezekiel 28:13–14).

Daniel had a similar aesthetic experience when an angel appeared to him (Dan. 10:5–6). Matthew said of the angel at Jesus’ tomb, “His appearance was like lightning, and his clothes were white as snow” (Matt. 28:3). Even fallen angels retain their beauty—“no wonder, for Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light” (2 Cor. 11:14)—which enhances their ability to deceive.

The Purpose of Angels

Like all of God’s rational creatures, angels were created for His glory. They sing (Job 38:7; Rev. 4:11); and they praise God (Ps. 148:2). Indeed, some angels continually sing “holy, holy, holy” in His presence (Isa. 6:3). Like other creatures, angels were “created by him [Christ] and for him” (Col. 1:16, emphasis added).

To Glorify God

Angels were created to glorify God: “You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being” (Rev. 4:11). “Praise him, all his angels, praise Him, all his heavenly hosts!” (Ps. 148:2).

To Serve God

“For by him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him” (Col. 1:16). “One day the angels came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan also came with them.... On another day the angels came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan also came with them to present himself before him” (Job 1:6; 2:1).

To Reflect God's Attributes

Angels also reflect God's glorious attributes. Again, Isaiah 6:3 records: "They were calling to one another: 'Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory'"; Ezekiel 1:5, 28 says, "In the fire was what looked like four living creatures. In appearance their form was that of a man.... This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD. When I saw it, I fell facedown, and I heard the voice of one speaking."

To Learn God's Wisdom and Grace

Ephesians 3:10 (NASB) declares that the mystery of Christ was revealed "in order that the manifold wisdom of God might now be made known through the church to the rulers and the authorities in the heavenly places." First Peter 1:12 adds: "It was revealed to them that they were not serving themselves but you, when they spoke of the things that have now been told you by those who have preached the gospel to you by the Holy Spirit sent from heaven. Even angels long to look into these things."

To Minister to God's Elect

The general purpose of God's spiritual messengers is recorded in Hebrews 1:14: "Are not all angels ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation?" This is where the concept of "guardian angels" comes in. Matthew 18:10 says, "See that you do not look down on one of these little ones. For I tell you that their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father in heaven."

Angels come regularly as "sons of God" to present themselves before the Lord (Job 1:6; 2:1 NKJV; cf. Ps. 91:11). They are constantly seen throughout the Bible running errands for God (Gen. 18:2ff.; Dan. 10:1ff.; Matt. 1:20–24; Luke 1:11ff.). They eventually escort believers into the presence of the Holy One (Luke 16:22). But, most fundamentally, angels are God's servants, and all their service is for His glory. Meanwhile, some angels are assigned to fight evil angels in a cosmic spiritual warfare (Dan. 10:13–21; 12:1; cf. Eph. 6:12).

The Number of Angels

Since they do not procreate, there has been a fixed number of angels from the beginning: "In the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like angels in heaven" (Matt. 22:30). The number of angels is vast, being described in various places as "hosts" (Ps. 46:7 NKJV); "a great company of the heavenly hosts" (Luke 2:13); "many angels, numbering thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand" (Rev. 5:11; cf. Heb. 12:22); and "myriads" (Deut. 33:2). In short, for us, they are innumerable.

The Position of Angels

As stated previously, in the hierarchy of beings, angels rank under God and above human beings: "Who has gone into heaven and is at God's right hand—with angels, authorities and powers in submission to him" (1 Peter 3:22). "What is man that you are mindful of him, the son of man that you care for him? You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor" (Ps. 8:4–5; cf. Heb. 2:7),

Archangel

There is a rank among both good and evil angels (demons). Among the good angels, at the top is the archangel (Michael): “At that time Michael, the great prince who protects your people, will arise. There will be a time of distress such as has not happened from the beginning of nations until then. But at that time your people—everyone whose name is found written in the book—will be delivered” (Dan. 12:1). “The Lord himself will come down from heaven, with a loud command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet call of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first” (1 Thess. 4:16). “The archangel Michael, when he was disputing with the devil about the body of Moses, did not dare to bring a slanderous accusation against him, but said, ‘The Lord rebuke you!’ ” (Jude 9). “There was war in heaven. Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon and his angels fought back” (Rev. 12:7). “Soon I will return to fight against the prince of Persia, and when I go, the prince of Greece will come” (Dan. 10:20).

Chief Princes

Under Michael there are “other chief princes.” Daniel wrote, “I will tell you what is written in the Book of Truth. (No one supports me against them except Michael, your prince)” (Dan. 10:21; cf. Dan. 10:13).

Cherubim

These glorious creatures are proclaimers and protectors of God’s glory. Genesis 3:24 says: “After [God] drove the man out, he placed on the east side of the Garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword ... to guard the way to the tree of life.” Psalm 80:1 records: “Hear us, O Shepherd of Israel, you who lead Joseph like a flock; you who sit enthroned between the cherubim, shine forth.”

“The Lord reigns, let the nations tremble; he sits enthroned between the cherubim, let the earth shake” (Ps. 99:1). Ezekiel wrote, “The glory of the God of Israel went up from above the cherubim, where it had been, and moved to the threshold of the temple. Then the Lord called to the man clothed in linen who had the writing kit at his side” (Ezek. 9:3). “I looked, and I saw the likeness of a throne of sapphire above the expanse that was over the heads of the cherubim” (Ezek. 10:1; cf. 1:28). The writer of Hebrews adds, “Above the ark were the cherubim of the Glory, overshadowing the atonement cover. But we cannot discuss these things in detail now” (Heb. 9:5).

Living Creatures

Among God’s spiritual entourage are spirit beings called “living creatures,” whose functions appear to be to worship God and direct His judgments. Revelation 4:7–8 says:

The first living creature was like a lion, the second was like an ox, the third had a face like a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle. Each of the four living creatures had six wings and was covered with eyes all around, even under his wings. Day and night they never stop saying: “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come” (cf. Rev. 6–7, 14, 19).

These “creatures” are similar to cherubim, but they have six wings, not four, and one face, rather than four, as in Ezekiel 1:6.

Seraphim (“Burning Ones”)

Seraphim are proclaimers of God's holiness. As cited before, Isaiah 6:2–3 declares: "Above him were seraphs, each with six wings: With two wings they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they were flying. And they were calling to one another: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory.' "

Angels

The most common designation of God's spiritual creatures is "angel," meaning "messenger." "Angel" is used some 273 times in the Bible; these beings are the ones sent on errands to earth. They include the "ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation" (Heb. 1:14).

Evil angels (demons) also have rank. Satan heads them up (Rev. 12:4), and under him are "princes" over various countries (Dan. 10:13), "rulers," "authorities," "powers," "dominions," and finally "spirits" or evil angels known as demons (see Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col. 1:16; 1 Peter 3:22; Jude 8–9).

The Abode of Angels

The general sphere of angels is in heaven: "Micaiah continued, 'Therefore hear the word of the LORD: I saw the LORD sitting on his throne with all the host of heaven standing around him on his right and on his left' " (1 Kings 22:19). "See that you do not look down on one of these little ones. For I tell you that their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father in heaven" (Matt. 18:10). "At the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven" (Matt. 22:30). "In the same way, I tell you there is rejoicing in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner who repents" (Luke 15:10). "But even if we or an angel from heaven should preach a gospel other than the one we preached to you, let him be eternally condemned!" (Gal. 1:8).

The sphere of activity of angels is focused in the second heaven, though some are active in the third heaven by the Throne of God (2 Cor. 12:2, 4). "I looked, and I saw a windstorm coming out of the north—an immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light. The center of the fire looked like glowing metal" (Ezek. 1:4). "Before the throne there was what looked like a sea of glass, clear as crystal. In the center, around the throne, were four living creatures, and they were covered with eyes, in front and in back" (Rev. 4:6). "Since we have a great high priest who has gone through the heavens [the first and second heavens], Jesus the Son of God, let us hold firmly to the faith we profess" (Heb. 4:14). "The morning stars sang together and all the angels shouted for joy" (Job 38:7).

Evil angels abide in the second heaven too. Daniel 10:13 says: "The prince of the Persian kingdom resisted me twenty-one days. Then Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me, because I was detained there." In Ephesians 2:2 (NKJV), Paul reminds his readers, "You once walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit who now works in the sons of disobedience."

Angels, good and evil, do God's bidding in heaven. Good angels are found around His throne. Ezekiel wrote, "In the thirtieth year, in the fourth month on the fifth day, while I was among the exiles by the Kebar River, the heavens were opened and I saw visions of God" (Ezek. 1:1). In his visions he saw "living creatures," and

Under their wings on their four sides they had the hands of a man. All four of them had faces and wings, and their wings touched one another. Each one went straight ahead; they did not turn as they moved. Their faces looked like this: Each of the four had the face of a man, and on the right side each had the face of a lion, and on the left the face of an ox; each also had the face of an eagle. (Ezek. 1:8–10)

Likewise, John records in Revelation:

In the center, around the throne, were four living creatures, and they were covered with eyes, in front and in back. The first living creature was like a lion, the second was like an ox, the third had a face like a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle. (Rev. 4:6–7)

In the next chapter he said, “I saw a mighty angel proclaiming in a loud voice, ‘Who is worthy to break the seals and open the scroll?’ ” (Rev. 5:2). Again, he penned, “I watched as the Lamb opened the first of the seven seals. Then I heard one of the four living creatures say in a voice like thunder, ‘Come!’ ” (Rev. 6:1).

In the gospel of Luke, “The angel answered, ‘I am Gabriel. I stand in the presence of God, and I have been sent to speak to you and tell you this good news’ ” (Luke 1:19).

Again, even evil angels are called before God’s throne. Job 1:6 records: “One day the angels came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan also came with them” (cf. 2:1). Hebrews 1:14 adds, “Are not all angels ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation?”

Special Abilities of Angels

Angels can do superhuman things. This may be due to their nature as spirits, their not having spatio-temporal limits, and/or that they can move in and out of the space-time dimension.

Whatever the case, they have the following abilities.

To Traverse Great Distances in a Short Time

Daniel records (in 10:2, 12) how “At that time I, Daniel, mourned for three weeks.... Then [the angel] continued, ‘Do not be afraid, Daniel. Since the first day that you set your mind to gain understanding and to humble yourself before your God, your words were heard, and I have come in response to them.’ ” Thus, he would have had to traverse the universe in mere days, having been delayed at that.

To Perform Miracles

As we have seen, Genesis 19:11 relates that the “two angels” (Gen. 19:1) that came to Sodom “struck the men who were at the door of the house, young and old, with blindness so that they could not find the door” (cf. Rev. 16:14).

To Materialize (Assume Bodily Form)

The two angels in Sodom had bodily form; they even ate food that Abraham set before them, for “he insisted so strongly that they did go with him and entered his house. He prepared a meal for them, baking bread without yeast, and they ate” (Gen. 19:3). This is also true of the same angels when they appeared to Abraham in the previous chapter (Gen. 18:2, 8), for Abraham “brought some curds and milk and the calf that had been prepared, and set these before them. While they ate, he stood near them under a tree.”

It would appear that only some, not all, angels have this ability. This may be inferred from the fact that some angels only appear in visions (not materializations) and that some evil angels

To Communicate

Although as spirits they have no bodies, angels can communicate with God. Again, Job 1:6 and 2:1 declare: “One day the angels came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan also came with them.... On another day the angels came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan also came with them to present himself before him.”

Angels can also communicate with one another. Revelation 7:1–3 affirms:

After this I saw four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding back the four winds of the earth to prevent any wind from blowing on the land or on the sea or on any tree. Then I saw another angel coming up from the east, having the seal of the living God. He called out in a loud voice to the four angels who had been given power to harm the land and the sea: “Do not harm the land or the sea or the trees until we put a seal on the foreheads of the servants of our God.”

To Occupy No Space

As spirits, angels occupy no space, though they can relate to beings in space. This is especially evident in fallen angels (demons), who sometimes possess human beings. As stated before, one person out of whom Jesus cast demons had a “legion” of them (Luke 8:27–34). If we employ the number of a Roman military legion at that time, this would mean some six thousand demons, all of which indwelt one and the same finite creature. Obviously, having many in one space was not a problem for them.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR ANGELOLOGY

Summarizing the thought of the “angelic doctor,” the comparison of angels to God and humans is instructive. The following chart illustrates the contrasts:

	GOD	ANGELS	HUMANS
Mode of Being	Uncreated	Created	Created
Limits	Infinite	Finite	Finite
Nature	Spirit	Spirit	Spirit-Body
Simplicity	Absolute simplicity	Relative simplicity	No simplicity (A-Complex)
Duration	Eternal (uncreated eternity)	Aeviternal (created eternity)	Temporal (created temporality)
Change	None	None in essence, only in will	Changeable in nature and will
Relation to Change	Cannot be joined to	Not changing, but can	Can be joined to change	be joined to change	change by nature

Measurability	Only by His own absolute simplicity	By degrees of unity and perfection	By plurality in matter (i.e., in space and time)
Space	Time above it and cannot be in it	Above it, but can be in it	In it by nature
Actuality	Pure Actuality	Completed actuality	Progressively completed actuality
Potentiality	None	None uncompleted	Uncompleted potentials
Nature/Will	Neither can change	Only will can change	Both can change
Classification (Species)	Beyond all classes	Each a class of one	All in one class (a race)
Redemption	Source of redemption	Irredeemable	Redeemable
Free Will	Unchangeable before and after the choice	Changeable before but not after choice	Changeable before and after choice

Several important points emerge from such a comparison and also from the study of angels. These can be summarized as follows.

Angels Are Above Humans

As established previously, angels are lower than God, but higher than human beings. Hebrews speaks about humans being “made a little lower than the angels” (2:9). Angels are pure spirits (Luke 24:37–39; Heb. 1:14), while humans are a unity of spirit and matter, soul and body. Angels are greater in knowledge (Matt. 24:36) and power (Gen. 19:11) than human beings.

Angels Are Pure Spirits

Like God, and unlike humans, angels are pure spirits (Luke 24:37–39; Heb. 1:14); they have no matter in their beings. Indeed, they have no divisibility, being simple created beings. Being pure spirit beings, the only way they can be seen by mortal human beings is by a miracle in one of two ways. Either God must perform a miracle so that mortal man can see the spirit world (as in 1 Kings 22:19–23), or else He must perform a miracle so that an essentially spirit being can materialize and be seen with mortal eyes (Gen. 18–19).

Angels Are Aeviternal

Angels are not temporal beings, nor are they essentially eternal like God; rather, they are aeviternal—that is, they are by nature not in time, but they can relate to it. By nature, they are not eternal as God is, but they can relate to Him. They are what humans will be when they are beatified (Matt. 18:10; Luke 20:35–36) (see Volume 4, chapter 9).

Angels Are Immortal

Having no bodies or parts, angels cannot die or be torn apart. Of course, God holds them in existence like every other creature (Col. 1:16–17); however, as simple spirits they are not subject to death, which is the separation of body and spirit (James 2:26). Luke 20:36 declares: “They can no longer die; for they are like the angels. They are God’s children, since they are children of the resurrection.”

Each Angel Is a Species (Kind)

Apparently, each angel is a species of its own. Thus, they cannot reproduce within their kind, as human beings can do; they are simple created beings and have no way to divide and/or multiply (Matt. 22:30). Each is one of a kind, even though there are groups or classes of them, such as cherubim and seraphim.

Angels Do Not Change in Nature

Also, angels apparently have a fixed nature from the moment of their creation; angels do not change—unlike human beings, they do not grow up or grow old. They have no age, nor do they undergo any other kind of change in their nature. They have no accidents (characteristics not essential to them); hence, they cannot change accidentally. The only change they can undergo is creation or annihilation by God, since, like all creatures, they exist only because God holds them in existence (Col. 1:17).

Angels Are Irredeemable

Since angels cannot change, they are fixed in their nature; hence, once an angel sins, he is doomed forever (2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). Indeed, the Bible says explicitly that Christ did not die to redeem angels, “for surely it is not angels he helps, but Abraham’s descendants” (Heb. 2:16). Those angels who sinned are never called upon to repent, nor can they be. The Cross is never presented as a means of their salvation, but only of their condemnation, for Jesus, “having disarmed the powers and authorities ... made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross” (Col. 2:15).

Like all of God’s rational and moral creatures, angels were given a choice. And, like humans at death (Heb. 9:27), once they have made their final choice, it is forever too late. Since they cannot change by nature, once angels make their decision, it is final and they know it (Matt. 8:29).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR ANGELOLOGY

The belief in angels was taken for granted by the great Fathers of the church and not infrequently mentioned. However, few of them gave any systematic treatment of these spirit beings until the “angelic doctor,” Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), so named because of his highly sophisticated angelology.

The Early Church Fathers on Angels

Polycarp

“O Lord God Almighty, the Father of thy beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the knowledge of Thee, the God of angels and powers, and of every creature” (ECMP, 14 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I).

Irenaeus

Those, moreover, who say that the world was formed by angels, or by any other maker of it, contrary to the will of Him who is the Supreme Father, err first of all in this very point, that they maintain that angels formed such and so mighty a creation, contrary to the will of the Most High God. This would imply that angels were more powerful than God. (AH, 2.2.1 in ibid.)

With justice, therefore, according to an analogous process of reasoning, the Father of all will be declared the Former of this world, and not the angels, nor any other [so-called] former of the world, other than He who was its Author, and had formerly been the cause of the preparation for a creation of this kind. (AH, 2.2.3 in ibid.)

It is not seemly, however, to say of Him who is God over all, since He is free and independent, that He was a slave to necessity, or that anything takes place with His permission, yet against His desire; otherwise they will make necessity greater and more kingly than God, since that which has the most power is superior to all [others]. (AH, 2.5A in ibid.)

If, however, [the things referred to were done] not against His will, but with His concurrence and knowledge, as some [of these men] think, the angels, or the Former of the world [whoever that may have been], will no longer be the causes of that formation, but the will of God. For if He is the Former of the world, He too made the angels, or at least was the cause of their creation; and He will be regarded as having made the world who prepared the causes of its formation. (AH, 2.2.3 in ibid.)

“Therefore the Father will excel in wisdom all human and angelic wisdom, because He is Lord, and Judge, and the Just One, and Ruler over all” (AH, 3.25.3 in ibid.).

But He Himself in Himself, after a fashion which we can neither describe nor conceive, predestinating all things, formed them as He pleased, bestowing harmony on all things, and assigning them their own place, and the beginning of their creation. In this way He conferred on spiritual things a spiritual and invisible nature” (AH, 2.2.4 in ibid.).

Theophilus

When God said, “Let Us make man in Our image, after Our likeness,” He first intimates the dignity of man. For God having made all things by His Word, and having reckoned them all mere by works, reckons the creation of man to be the only work worthy of His own hands. (TA, 2.18 in ibid., II)

The Medieval Fathers on Angels

The doctrine of angels developed considerably during the Middle Ages and reached its apex in Thomas Aquinas.

Augustine on the Creation of Angels

Here [in Ps. 148:5] the angels are most expressly and by divine authority said to have been made by God, for of them among the other heavenly things it is said, He commanded, and they were created. Who, then, will be bold enough to suggest that the angels were made after the six days [of] creation? (CG, 11.9)

“The angels therefore existed before the stars; and the stars were made the fourth day” (ibid.).

When God said, let there be light, and there was light [on Day One], if we are justified in understanding in this light the creation of the angels, then certainly they were created partakers of the eternal light which is the unchangeable Wisdom of God. (ibid.)

Augustine on the Rank of Angels

But of such consequence in rational natures is the weight, so to speak, of will and of love, that though in the order of nature angels rank above men, yet, by the scale of justice, good men are of greater value than bad angels, (ibid., 11.16)

Augustine on the Fall of Angels

Since these things are so, those spirits whom we call angels were never at any time or in any way darkness, but, as soon as they were made, were made light; yet they were not so created in order that they might exist and live in any way whatever, but were enlightened that they might live wisely and blessedly. Some of them, having turned away from this light, have not won this wise and blessed life, which is certainly eternal, and accompanied with the sure confidence of its eternity; but they have still the life of reason, though darkened with folly, and this they cannot lose even if they would, (ibid., 11)

If it seems hard to believe that, when the angels were created, some were created in ignorance either of their perseverance or their fall, while others were most certainly assured of the eternity of their felicity; if it is hard to believe that they were not all from the beginning on an equal footing, until these who are now evil did of their own will fall away from the light of goodness, certainly it is much harder to believe that the holy angels are now uncertain of their eternal blessedness, and do not know regarding themselves as much as we have been able to gather regarding them from the Holy Scriptures, (ibid., 11.16)

That the contrary propensities in good and bad angels have arisen, not from a difference in their nature and origin, since God, the good Author and Creator of all essences, created them both, but from a difference in their wills and desires, it is impossible to doubt. While some steadfastly continued in that which was the common good of all, namely, in God Himself, and in His eternity, truth, and love; others, being enamored rather of their own power, as if they could be their own good, lapsed to this private good of their own, from that higher and beatific good which was common to all, and, bartering the lofty dignity of eternity for the inflation of pride, the most assured verity for the slyness of vanity, uniting love for factious partisanship, they became proud, deceived, envious. (ibid., 12.1)

There is, then, no natural efficient cause or, if I may be allowed the expression, no essential cause, of the evil will, since itself is the origin of evil in mutable spirits, by which the good of their nature is diminished and corrupted; and the will is made evil by nothing else than defection from God, a defection of which the cause, too, is certainly deficient. But as to the good will, if we should say that there is no efficient cause of it, we must beware of giving currency to the opinion that the good will of the good angels is not created, but is co-eternal with God. For if they themselves are created, how can we say that their good will was eternal? But if created, was it created along with themselves, or did they exist for a time without it? If along with themselves, then doubtless it was created by Him who created them, and, as soon as ever they were created, they attached themselves to Him who created them, with the love He created in them. And they are separated from the society of the rest, because they have continued in the same good will; while the others have fallen away to another will, which is an evil one, by the very fact of its being a falling away from the good. (ibid., 12.9)

Augustine on the Mind-to-Mind Communication of Angels

What He says is accurately heard, not by the bodily but by the mental ear of His ministers and messengers, who are immortally blessed in the enjoyment of His unchangeable truth; and the directions which they in some ineffable way receive, they execute without delay or difficulty in the sensible and visible world. (ibid., 10.15)

Augustine on the Destiny of Angels

Wherefore, although everything eternal is not therefore blessed (for hell-fire is eternal), yet if no life can be truly and perfectly blessed except it be eternal, the life of these angels was not blessed, for it was doomed to end, and therefore not eternal, whether they knew it or not. In the one case fear, in the other ignorance, prevented them from being blessed. And even if their ignorance was not so great as to breed in them a wholly false expectation, but left them wavering in uncertainty whether their good would be eternal or would some time terminate, this very doubt concerning so grand a destiny was incompatible with the plenitude of blessedness which we believe the holy angels enjoyed. (ibid.)

Thus the true cause of the blessedness of the good angels is found to be this, that they cleave to Him who supremely is. And if we ask the cause of the misery of the bad, it occurs to us, and not unreasonably, that they are miserable because they have forsaken Him who supremely is, and have turned to themselves who have no such essence. And this vice, what else is it called than pride? For pride is the beginning of sin. (ibid., 12.6)

Aquinas on the Creation of Angels

The Canonical Scriptures tell us that the angels were created before men. Reason also suggests that they were not more recent than the physical universe, for it is unfitting that the more perfect should tag along after the less perfect. This is confirmed by scriptural authority: when all the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. (OSS, 16)

Aquinas on the Nature of Angels

“They are intellectual natures, at the peak of creation” (SCG, 42). “And, further still, the species of the angelic intellect, which are, as it were, the seminal types of corporeal forms, must be referred to God as the first cause” (ST, Ia.65.4).

Mind is richer than matter. We can think of objects which cannot exist as material things; for example, mathematics treats of terms which cannot physically exist. Let us take this as a hint, when we assess the proper natures of both, that incorporeal substances, whose reality is intellectual, are more profuse than physical substances, and that the angels outnumber physical bodies. Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. (SCG, 2.92)

Aquinas on the Rank of Angels

Substance can exist without body. All possible types of being can be discovered in the universe, which otherwise would be deficient. Possible and actual are the same in everlasting duration. Thus substances can exist complete without matter: they rank below the first substance, which is God, and above human souls united to bodies. (SCG, 2.91)

Aquinas on the Fall of Angels

An angel or any other rational creature, considered in his own nature, can sin.... Mortal sin occurs in two ways in the act of free choice. First, when something evil is chosen.... In another way, sin comes of free choice by electing something good in itself, but not according to the proper measure or rule [as angels did]. (ST, Ia.63.1)

Now a spiritual nature cannot be affected by such pleasures as pertain to bodies, but only such as can be found in spiritual beings.... But there can be no sin when anyone is incited to a good of the spiritual order, unless in such affection the rule of the superior be not kept. Such is precisely the sin of pride—not to be subject to the superior where subjection is due. Consequently the first sin of the angel can be none other than pride. (ibid., Ia.63.2)

Aquinas on the Purpose of Angels

“Angels mean messengers and ministers. Their function it is to execute the plan of divine providence, even in earthly things: who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire” (ibid., 2.79).

“He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.” [Thus], angels are appointed to guard us. God’s universal providence works through secondary causes. All things are cared for, but especially rational beings, for they, born to possess divine goodness, operate from will, a principle higher than instinct or unconscious impulse. The world of pure spirits stretches between the divine nature and the world of human beings; because divine wisdom has ordained that the higher should look after the lower, angels execute the divine plan for human salvation: they are our guardians, who free us when hindered and help to bring us home. (CSPL, 10.1.1)

Aquinas on the Knowledge of Angels

Angels are called intellectual because of their immediate and complete insight into all objects within their natural field. Human souls are called rational because their knowledge is acquired by a process of reasoning. Unlike the angels, they do not apprehend at once the full evidence of an object presented to them; they are convinced by formal argument, not by intuition. (ST, Ia.18.3)

We approach truth through logic, by adding a predicate to a subject. A pure spirit, however, sees immediately the truth in a subject, and by simple insight knows what we have to arrive at through affirmative or negative judgments. (OE, 6)

The Reformation Leaders on Angels

As with most major doctrines, the Reformers inherited the medieval view of angels. Preoccupied as they were with more pressing theological issues, they did add somewhat to the doctrine of angelology.

Martin Luther

Luther said, “An angel is a spiritual creature created by God without a body, for the service of Christendom and of the church” (TT, 565). He added,

The acknowledgment of angels is needful in the church. Therefore godly preachers should teach them logically. First, they should show what angels are, namely, spiritual creatures without bodies. Secondly, what manner of spirits they are, namely, good spirits and not evil; and here evil spirits must also be spoken of, not created evil by God, but made so by their rebellion against God, and their consequent fall; this hatred began in Paradise, and will continue and remain against Christ and his church to the world’s end. Thirdly, they must speak touching their function, which, as the epistle to the Hebrews (chap. 1:14) shows, is to present a mirror of humility to godly Christians, in that such pure and perfect creatures as the angels do minister unto us, poor and wretched people, in household and temporal policy, and in religion. They are our true and trusty servants, performing offices and works that one poor miserable mendicant would be ashamed to do for another. In this sort ought we to teach with care, method, and attention, touching the sweet and loving angels. (ibid., 566)

Further,

It were not good for us to know how earnestly the holy angels strive for us against the devil, or how hard a combat it is. If we could see for how many angels one devil makes work, we should be in despair. Therefore the Holy Scriptures refers to them in few words: “He hath given his angels charge over thee,” etc. Also, “The angel of the Lord encampeth round about those that fear him,” etc. Now, whosoever thou art, that fearest the Lord, be of good courage, take thou no care, neither be faint-hearted, nor make any doubt of the angels’ watching and protection; for most certainly they are about thee, and carry thee upon their hands. How or in what manner it is done, take thou no heed. God says it, therefore it is most sure and certain. (ibid., 568)

John Calvin

Calvin stated,

Angels being the ministers appointed to execute the commands of God, must, of course, be admitted to be his creatures, but to stir up questions concerning the time or order in which they were created ... bespeaks more perverseness than industry. (ICR, 1.14.4)

He went on,

In Scripture, then, we uniformly read that angels are heavenly spirits, whose obedience and ministry God employs to execute all the purposes which he has decreed, and hence their name as being a kind of intermediate messengers to manifest his will to men. The names by which several of them are distinguished have reference to the same office. They are called hosts, because they surround their Prince as his court—adorn and display his majesty—like soldiers, have their eyes always turned to their leader’s standard, and are so ready and prompt to execute his orders, that the moment he gives the nod, they prepare for, or rather are actually at work. [Dan. 7:10] (ICR, 1.14, 5)

As to guardian angels, Calvin said,

Whether or not each believer has a single angel assigned to him for his defence, I dare not positively affirm. When Daniel introduces the angel of the Persian and the angel of the Greeks, he undoubtedly intimates that certain angels are appointed as a kind of presidents over kingdoms and provinces. Again, when Christ says that the angels of children always behold the face of his Father, he insinuates that there are certain angels to whom their safety has been entrusted. But I know not if it can be inferred from this, that each believer has his own angel. (ibid., 1.14.7)

He continued,

There is one passage which seems to intimate somewhat more clearly that each individual has a separate angel. When Peter, after his deliverance from prison, knocked at the door of the house where the brethren were assembled, being unable to think it could be himself, they said that it was his angel. This idea seems to have been suggested to them by a common belief that every believer has a single angel assigned to him. (ibid.)

Further,

It is certain that spirits have no bodily shape, and yet Scripture, in accommodation to us, describes them under the form of winged Cherubim and Seraphim; not without cause, to assure us that when occasion requires, they will hasten to our aid with incredible swiftness, winging their way to us with the speed of lightning. Farther than this, in regard both to the ranks and numbers of angels, let us class them among those mysterious subjects, the full revelation of which is deferred to the last day, and accordingly refrain from inquiring too curiously, or talking presumptuously. (ibid., 1.14.8)

Calvin concluded, “Whatever, therefore, is said as to the ministry of angels, let us employ for the purpose of removing all distrust, and strengthening our confidence in God” (ibid., 1.14.12).

The Post-Reformation Theologians on Angels

The long tradition of teaching on angels was continued by the great theologians after the Reformation as well. Not until the rise of modern materialism, which excludes spiritual entities, was there a serious challenge to the biblical teachings on angels.

Jacob Arminius

This entire universe is, according to the Scriptures, distributed in the best manner possible into three classes of objects: (1) Into creatures purely spiritual and invisible; of this class are the angels; (2) into creatures merely corporeal; and (3) into natures that are, in one part of them, corporeal and visible, and in another part, spiritual and invisible; men are of this last class. (WJA, II.56)

We think this was the order observed in creation: Spiritual creatures, that is, the angels, were first created. Corporeal creatures were next created, according to the series of six days, not together and in a single moment. Lastly, man was created, consisting both of body and spirit; his body was, indeed, first formed; and afterwards his soul was inspired by creating, and created by inspiring; that as God commenced the creation in a spirit, so he might finish it on a spirit, being himself the immeasurable and eternal Spirit. (ibid., 56–57)

Not much has been added to angelology by modern and contemporary thought. Indeed, until relatively recent preoccupation with alleged angelic appearances in “near-death experiences,” there has been a general neglect of the subject.

ANSWERING QUESTIONS ABOUT ANGELS

Question One—Regarding the Fall of Lucifer

The Bible declares that God made all things perfect (Gen. 1:31; 1 Tim. 4:4). This would include the angel Lucifer, who became known as Satan. In God and in His heaven, there was no sin (Hab. 1:13; James 1:13), yet Lucifer sinned and rebelled against God (1 Tim. 3:6), leading one-third of all the angels with him (Rev. 12:4). How could a perfect creature, made by a perfect God and placed in a perfect environment (heaven), commit a sin? Sin could not arise from God, nor from Lucifer’s environment, nor from his perfect nature. Whence, then, sin?

Response to Question One

Sin arose from Lucifer’s free will. God made perfect creatures and gave them perfect natures and perfect freedom. But with freedom, though good in itself, comes the ability to sin. So, sin arose in the breast of an archangel in the presence of God.

Freedom is good, but it contains the possibility of evil. God made Lucifer perfectly good; Lucifer made evil. God gave him the fact of freedom (which is good); Lucifer performed the act of freedom to rebel against God (which is evil). God provided the good power of free will, but Lucifer performed the bad action of free will.

Question Two—Regarding the Irredeemability of Angels

One-third of the angels sinned and became demons. When Adam sinned, he and his followers were offered salvation (Gen. 3:15). What about angels—can they be saved?

Response to Question Two

The biblical answer as to the redeemability of angels seems to be a clear negative for the following reasons.

First, once again, the Scriptures say emphatically, “Surely it is not angels he helps, but Abraham’s descendants” (Heb. 2:16). That is to say, Christ assumed human nature (v. 14), not an angelic nature, to redeem human beings, not angels.

Second, the Cross of Christ, which is declared to be the source of human salvation, is proclaimed by contrast to be the source of the demons’ condemnation. Paul wrote, “Having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross” (Col. 2:14–15).

Third, the lost state of demons is always portrayed in the Bible as final and eternal. Peter wrote, “God did not spare angels when they sinned, but sent them to hell, putting them into gloomy dungeons to be held for judgment” (2 Peter 2:4; cf. Jude 6). Even the demons appear to recognize their eternal doom, for as one said in the Gospels to Jesus, “Have you come here to torture us before the appointed time?” (Matt. 8:29). Satan too, in Revelation, is said to know “that his time is short” (Rev. 12:12).

Fourth, and finally, Aquinas argued that since angels are unchangeable in their natural knowledge and in their nature, there is no way for them to be redeemed (as redemption involves a change of mind).

Question Three—Regarding the Justice of Angelic Condemnation

It seems unfair to some that humans were given an opportunity for redemption after they fell, while angels were not. Why did God not offer salvation for them as well?

Response to Question Three

In response to this question, several things are noteworthy.

First, angels, like human beings, have a choice in their destiny. They freely chose to rebel against God; they were not forced to do so. They were not doomed against their will.

Second, like human beings, angels were only doomed after their final choice—the only difference is that their first choice was also their final one. Humans too have a cut-off point, for “Man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment” (Heb. 9:27).

Third, the very nature of angels makes their first choice also their last one, for they are created simple beings. Hence, once angels make a choice to serve or rebel against God, it is permanent (one way or the other), just as once humans make their final choice (by death), it is forever (one way or the other).

Fourth, unlike human beings (Acts 17:30; 2 Peter 3:9), angels are never called on to repent.

In short, what is a lifetime for us is an instant for an angel. Once their mind is made up (by free choice), it is permanent. Since by nature angels cannot change, there is no possibility of redemption for them. God, knowing this, had no need to provide salvation for them; hence, the Cross pronounces their condemnation but does not provide their salvation.

CONCLUSION

In addition to the physical universe and human beings, God also created spiritual beings called angels. The physical universe is material; angels are immaterial, while human beings are composed of both matter and spirit. The hierarchy of beings ranges from God to angels to human beings to animals to inanimate matter. Angels are beneath God; man is a little lower than the angels (Heb. 2:7), and humans are the crown of all creatures below them (Ps. 8:4–5).

In addition to glorifying God, the purpose of good angels is to minister to God’s elect (Heb. 1:14). Evil angels (called demons) followed Satan in his rebellion and are doomed with him to an eternal hell (Matt. 25:41). This is just, since they, like human beings, freely chose their own destiny, and their decision by its very nature is final.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

THE SUSTENANCE OF ALL CREATION

Creation is utterly dependent on God; this dependence applies to creation's present status as well as to its past start. The universe and everything in it began as God's creation, and it continues to be God's creation. God is the originating Cause as well as the sustaining Cause of everything that exists. The Scriptures are explicit on this.

It is true that the Bible usually reserves the word creation for the past event of origin. However, there is more to the doctrine of Creation than a study of origins reveals, for even though God has completed His work of Creation, nevertheless, He is not finished with His work in creation. That is to say, there is a difference between God's work in the origin of the world and His work in the operation of it.

That God is both Creator and Sustainer of the entire universe can be supported biblically, theologically, and historically.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD AS CREATOR AND SUSTAINER OF CREATION

God as the Originating Cause of Creation

When used in this context, the Hebrew word for “creation” (bara) and its Greek counterpart (ktisis) are usually reserved for the original acts of Creation in the past; that is, they are generally employed of the origin or beginning of things. This can be illustrated by examining several key passages.

Old Testament Usage of the Word Create (Bara)

Genesis 1:1 (cf. 1:21–27) speaks of creation as a finished event: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.” This is obviously not referring to the present functioning of the universe, but rather to its past formation.

Genesis 2:3 also points to the acts of creation by which the world began: “God blessed the seventh day and made it holy, because on it he rested from all the work of creating that he had done.” The fact that God rested and is still in that rest (Heb. 4:4–5) is proof that the word creation is used here of the past, singular, unrepeatable events of origin. Likewise, the next verse (Gen. 2:4) places the Creation event in the past when it declares, “This is the account of the heavens and the earth when they were created.”

Genesis 5:1–2 delineates Adam and Eve’s creation as a past event “when God created man,” saying, “He created them male and female and blessed them. And when they were created, He called them ‘man.’”

In Genesis 6:7, God spoke to Noah, crying out, “I will wipe mankind, whom I have created, from the face of the earth.” Even though the reference here seems to be to the whole human race alive in Noah’s time, nonetheless, their creation as a race through Adam (Rom. 5:12) was a past event of origin. Of course, God is active in the propagation of the race from this point of origin (Gen. 1:28; 4:1, 25); however, the creation of Adam was a past event of beginning that has not been repeated since.

Deuteronomy 4:32 makes it plain that the Creation of humankind is a unique event of origin long ago. Moses said, “Ask now about the former days, long before your time, from the day God created man on the earth.”

In Psalms 89:11–12, the word creation is used of the original Creation of heaven and earth. The writer declared, “The heavens are yours, and yours also the earth; you founded the world and all that is in it. You created the north and the south.”

Psalms 148:5 refers to the Creation of angels: “He commanded and they were created.” Job tells us the angels were already there when God “laid the earth’s foundation” (Job 38:4, 7). So the references to Creation take us back to the very beginning.

Isaiah 40:26 says that God “created” the stars as well as numbered and named them. In Isaiah 42:5 he also declares that God “created the heavens and ... the earth and all that comes out of it.” He also created Jacob and “everyone who is called by my [God’s] name” (Isa. 43:1, 7). The heavens and earth were “created” by the Lord (Isa. 45:8, 12).

Malachi 2:10 also refers to the Creation of the human race, saying, “Did not one God create us?” Again, while the race has been propagated since Adam, the Bible makes it clear that it was created in Adam (Gen. 1:27; cf. Rom. 5:12); therefore, the Creation of humankind is viewed as an event of origin. Even Jesus referred to it as an event that occurred “at the beginning [when] the Creator ‘made them male and female’” (Matt. 19:4).

New Testament Usage of the Word Create (ktisis)

Like the Old Testament, the New Testament consistently uses the word creation (ktisis) as a past event of origin, not as a present process. Mark 10:6 teaches, “At the beginning of creation God ‘made them male and female.’ ” This leaves no doubt that he is referring to Creation as a past and unrepeated singularity, not a regular process observable in the present.

Mark 13:19 employs the word creation in the same way, saying, “Those will be days of distress unequalled from the beginning, when God created the world, until now.” This is an unmistakable reference to Creation as the point of beginning, not a process of continuing.

In Romans 1:20, Paul declares, “For since the creation of the world ... [God’s] eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made” (emphasis added). The italicized words reveal that his use of the word creation is about God’s original work of making the world, not His continuous acts of caring for it.

In 1 Corinthians 11:8–9, Paul uses “creation” of the acts by which God made (in the past) “woman from man” and “for man.” Once again, the original creation of a literal Adam and Eve are in view here.

Ephesians 3:9 speaks of Creation as a past completed action, referring to the God “who created all things.” Paul adds in Colossians 1:16 (emphasis added) that “all things were created by him and for him [Christ].”

First Timothy 4:3 declares: “God created [all foods] to be received with thanksgiving.” Now, while foods are being produced in the present, the reference here is to the original creation of food. This is evident from the use of the aorist tense, indicating completed action. Also, the phrase “to be received” points to the original purpose of the creation of food.

Revelation uniformly refers to Creation as the past work of God by which things began. John noted Christ’s preeminence from the very “beginning of God’s creation” (Rev. 3:14; cf. Col. 1:15, 18). The heavenly host around God’s throne praise Him because by Him all things “were created” (Rev. 4:11). In addition, the angel swore by Him “who created the heavens and all that is in it, and the sea and all that is in it” (10:6; cf. 14:7).

In the vast majority of these references, there is no doubt that the word creation is reserved for the origination of the universe (including life and humankind), not for its continual operation since then. In the couple of passages where a process may be implied, it is not the creation of the physical universe in view, but rather the propagation of animal or human life. And even though the word creation is sometimes used in other contexts than the origin of the universe and living things (e.g., Isa. 45:7), nevertheless, there is a clear preponderance of usage saved for the original, un-repeated events of origin by which God brought matter, living things, and human beings into existence.

In addition to the rare use of the word creation in a continuous sense (see Ps. 104:30), there are, of course, many other words more commonly used of God’s continuous operation in and sustenance of the created universe.

God as the Operating Cause in Creation

Once the world was created, God did not cease to relate to it; in fact, He continually operates in it—He even sustains its very existence. God is the unmoved Mover (see part 1, chapter 3), but He is not an unmoving Mover. He is unmovable, but not immobile. He does not change, but He is the unchanging Changer of the changing world. When a person moves on a cement floor, the floor does not move in relation to him; rather, he moves in relation to the floor. God, like the analogy of the floor, serves as the unchanging Foundation on which all things rest (and in respect to which all things move).

The Use of the Word Creation for God's Present Work

Rarely does the Bible refer to God's work at present in the operation of the world as "creation," but there are a few exceptions. Psalm 104:30 declares: "When you send your Spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth." Here the word create (bara) is used, not of the initial generation of life on earth, but of the continual regeneration of it. The context speaks of God making "grass grow for the cattle, and plants for man to cultivate" (v. 14). He is a God who "makes springs pour water into the ravines" (v. 10) and who "bring[s] darkness, [and] it becomes night" (v. 20). He is a God who continually provides food for all living things (v. 27). In short, the repeated emphasis of this passage is on God's continual operation and preservation of His world, and the word creation is used to describe this continual activity within His creation.

Amos 4:13 (NKJV) says that God "creates the wind ... and makes the morning darkness." Here too it seems that the word creation is used of God's work in His creation, not simply of His original work of Creation. And, in point of fact, the word makes, which is often used interchangeably with the word creates (cf. Gen. 1:26–27; 2:18), is used on several occasions to describe God's continual work in the world (cf. Ps. 104:3–4, 10).

God as the Sustaining Cause of Creation

There are numerous ways the Bible exhibits God as presently at work in His creation: He is "making," "doing," "causing," "upholding" the operations of nature in various ways. He sustains it (Heb. 1:3); holds it together (Col. 1:17); causes it to have being (Rev. 4:11); and produces life in it (Ps. 104:14). In short, God is not only the Originator but also the Operator of His world. He is not simply the original Cause but also the continual Cause of its existence. He is Creator and Preserver; there would be no world, past or present, were it not for God.

God's dual work of creating and preserving the world are often presented in the same passage, even in the same verse. The following contrasts reveal both aspects of God's work.

God Created in the Past, and God Is Producing in the Present

Genesis 1:1 says: "God created the ... earth" (citational emphasis added), and later He is at work through the land to "produce vegetation" (v. 11). The first was an act of origin; the second was one of operation. Both are actions of God.

God Rested in the Past, and God Is Now at Work

Genesis 2:3 declares: "[God] rested" from His original "work of creating," but Jesus affirmed that God "is always at his work" (John 5:17). The former describes the commencement of His work of creation; the latter depicts the continuance of His work in creation.

God Laid the Foundations of the Earth, and God Is Making the Earth Productive

Psalm 104:5 declares that God "set the earth on its foundations," but a few verses later, God is seen as the one who is "bringing forth food from the earth" (v. 14). The first is a work of God in originating; the second is His work of operating; He does both.

God Made the World, and God Keeps It in Being

In Acts 17:24, the Scriptures teach that God “made the world.” Later it says: “In him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28). God is both the past cause of its becoming and also the present cause of its being.

God Created the World, and God Holds It Together

Colossians 1:16 expresses God’s past work as one by which “all things were created.” The very next verse explains: “In him all things hold together” (Col. 1:17). The former is God’s act of causing it to come to be; the latter is God’s act of causing it to continue to be.

God Made, and God Sustains

Psalms 95:3–5 proclaims: “The LORD is the great God, the great King above all gods. In his hand are the depths of the earth, and the mountain peaks belong to him. The sea is his, for he made it, and his hands formed the dryland.” Likewise, Hebrews 1:2 declares: “Through whom [Christ] he [God the Father] made the universe.” Yet, the very next verse reveals that Christ is also “sustaining all things by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:3). Here again, the one refers to creating the world and the other to preserving it.

The Cosmos Was Created by God, and the Cosmos Has Its Being Through God

In one verse the apostle John contrasts God’s works of Creation and preservation. He wrote, “By your will they were created and have their being” (Rev. 4:11). All things received being from God and also still have being from Him.

In summation, the doctrine of Creation is not limited to the discussion of its past origin; it also includes its present sustenance and operation. The Creator is necessary not only to make it but also to sustain it—He is both Producer and Preserver. No picture of Creation is complete that neglects God’s role in both areas.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD AS CREATOR AND SUSTAINER OF CREATION

As we have seen, God’s work in relation to the world’s existence falls into two broad categories: creating and preserving. In each of these, there are three areas of contrast: the Actor (God), His acts, and the result of His actions. Let us begin with the acts of God in examining the theological basis for His Creation and preservation.

God’s Acts of Creating and Preserving

According to the Scriptures above, God’s acts are necessary for the world’s coming to be as well as for its continuing to be. He brought it from nothing in the past, and He also keeps it from returning to nothing in the present. In other words, God is both the beginning and the conserving Cause of all that exists. God was active both in life’s production and reproduction. He was operative in the generating of the world, and ever since He has been operative in governing it.

GOD’S ACTS OF

Creating the World

Preserving the World

Coming to be (bringing from nothing)

Continuing to be (keeping from nothing)

Beginning

Conserving

Producing

God as Actor: Primary and Secondary Causality

Focusing on God as Actor rather than on His actions reveals two of His distinctly different functions in relation to His creation. In one role He is the Originator of it, and in the other He is the chief Operator of it. He is both the Source and the Sustainer of the universe; He is not only Creator but also the Conserver of all that is; God is at once Producer and Provider of all living things. These roles depict His direct involvement in His world at all times, from beginning to end.

God also has some indirect roles in creation. While He is the primary Cause of all things, He also works through secondary causes. What we commonly refer to as the processes of nature are in reality God's indirect work through natural causes. In this capacity, God is the remote Cause, while natural forces are the proximate causes of events; that is, God is the ultimate Cause, but nature is the immediate cause of most happenings. God is the original Commander, but He works through a chain of command when acting through natural laws. The relation between God's two roles of Originator and Operator can be summarized as follows:

God as:

Originator

Source

Creator

Producer

Operator

Sustainer

Conserver

Provider

God Working in Creation:

Working as:

Primary Cause

Working through:

Secondary causes

Results of God’s Action:

Direct intervention

Indirect action

Immediate	Mediate
Discontinuous	Continuous

Unobserved	Observed

The Reason God Is Needed to Sustain the Universe

God’s sustaining causality is derived from the very nature of creation itself. Once its created and contingent nature is understood, the need for God’s continual sustaining activity is comprehended.

Creation Is Contingent

Creation by nature is contingent; only God is a necessary Being. As we have seen, a contingent being is one dependent on the necessary Being for its very existence, and once a contingent being, always a contingent being. No contingent being can become a necessary Being, for a necessary Being by its very nature cannot come to be or cease to be. If a necessary Being exists, it must exist necessarily.

However, if a contingent being is always contingent, then it is always dependent for its existence on a necessary Being; it can no more not be dependent for its existence at any time than it can cease being a contingent being. Dependent beings are not only dependent when they come to be; they are dependent whenever they are (exist). Hence, all of creation, being contingent (i.e., something that could not be), is dependent for its existence at all times.

Creation Is an Effect

To be a creature means to be an effect. The Creator is the Cause, and the creature is the effect. An effect is not free-floating—it needs a cause as long as it is an effect, because if it ever ceased being an effect, then it would be uncaused. Only God the Creator is uncaused; hence, creation as an effect of God must be in a state of being effected at every moment of its existence. In brief, existence only comes one instant at a time; therefore, if one is a creature, then he is dependent on a Cause at each moment of his being.

The Result of God's Actions in Creation

Not only does God continuously act in sustaining the existence of all things, He also is active in intervening in His creation. He is both the Sustainer of and the Operator in creation.

God acts in His world in two ways: by direct intervention (as in Creation), and by indirect action (as in preservation). The first is an immediate act of God, and the other is a mediate action. The direct acts of God are instantaneous; the indirect ones involve a process. Also, God's acts of Creation were discontinuous with what went before: They were ex nihilo (out of nothing) or de nova (brand-new). For example, He produced something from nothing, life from nonlife, and the rational from the nonrational. These are discontinuities spanned by a direct action of God.

Further, God's acts of Creation brought about unique events of origin, whereas His acts of preservation involve a repetition of events. The one produced singularities, and the other produces regularities. The original Creation events are unobserved today, but God's operation of the world can be seen in the present. The result of God's actions can be contrasted like this:

RESULT OF GOD'S ACTION(S)

Direct intervention	Indirect action
Immediate	Mediate
Instantaneous	A process
Discontinuous	Continuous
Unique event (singularity)	Repetition of events (regularities)
Unobserved	Observed

ORIGIN SCIENCE VS. OPERATION SCIENCE

The roots of modern science are firmly planted in the Christian view of Creation. Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) observed, “The faith in the possibility of science, generated antecedently to the development of modern scientific theory, is an unconscious derivative from medieval theology” (SMW, 11). M. B. Foster, writing about the origin of modern science, asked, “What is the source of the un-Greek elements which were imported into philosophy by the post-Reformation philosophers? ... [And] what is the source of those un-Greek elements in the modern theory of nature?” The answer to the first question is the Christian revelation, and the answer to the second is the Christian doctrine of Creation (“CDC” in M, 448).

Most of the early founders of modern science believed in Creation. Francis Bacon (1561–1626) pointed to the Creation mandate in Genesis 1:28 as his impetus for scientific research (NO, 1.129 ad 119). Indeed, Galileo (1564–1642), Copernicus (1473–1543), Kepler (1571–1630), Kelvin (1824–1907), Newton (1642–1727), and others all saw evidence in nature for Creation. After carefully studying the universe, Isaac Newton concluded:

It is not to be conceived that mere mechanical causes could give birth to so many regular motions, since the comets range over all parts of the heavens in very eccentric orbits.... [Hence,] this most beautiful system of the sun, planets, and comets could only proceed from the counsel and dominion of an intelligent and powerful Being. (“GS” in MPNP, 369)

From the very beginning of modern science, there was a belief in a Creator (primary Cause) who created the universe and then operated in it by natural laws (secondary causes—see Geisler and Anderson, OS, chapter 2). The study of these regular ways God operates in His universe produced astounding results. More and more scientists were able to give natural explanations for things once believed to be the result of direct supernatural intervention (ibid., 3–4).

When Newton strayed from this course, Pierre-Simon Laplace (1749–1827) corrected his misbelief that God intervened to correct the elliptical orbits of planets. Laplace (and Immanuel Kant before him) offered a naturalistic explanation of the development of the solar system. James Hutton (1726–1797) and Charles Lyell (1797–1875) explained geological processes by natural causes apart from supernatural interference. Charles Darwin (1809–1882) later offered a natural explanation for the emergences of species (OOS). Gradually this widely accepted success in explaining the operation of the natural world overshadowed the question of its ultimate origin; the search for secondary causes obscured the need for a primary cause (see Geisler and Anderson, OS, chapter 6). Theism degenerated to deism and set the stage for atheism.

Departure from the Creator was not envisioned by the early modern scientists. In their view, the primary Cause was needed both directly (for the origin of the universe and living things), and indirectly (for the operation of the world) through secondary causes. It was not their intention that secondary (natural) causes should be used to eliminate the need for a primary Cause (Creator), either in the realm of origin or the operation of the universe. Forgotten was the twofold need of a primary Cause (1) as the immediate Cause for the origin of the universe and living things, and (2) as the Sustainer of the secondary (mediate) causes of the operation of the universe.

The failure to make this distinction between the origin and the operation of the universe has led to much misunderstanding in the ongoing debate between creationists and evolutionists. The latter often claim that macroevolution is a well-established scientific fact and that Creation is not scientific. This, however, confuses two kinds of science: origin science and operation science. The only sense in which evolution can be called a “fact” is in the sense of microevolution, meaning, of course, small changes (within each species) that can be observed in the present. Microevolution is a part of operation science because it is about a continual process that can be observed in the present; that is, there is a regularly recurring pattern of events against which our views can be tested. This is crucial to operation science.

Origin science is different. Unlike operation science, when dealing with origin events, there is no regularly recurring observable pattern of events against which to test our theories. Origins are not present regularities; they are past singularities; hence, they are not observable. In this way, origin science is more like a forensic science than an empirical science, for a forensic scientist did not see, for example, a murder he is investigating, nor can he have it repeated for observation. He simply uses the remaining bits of evidence as part of a speculative reconstruction of an unobserved past singularity.

Singularities and the Miraculous

Another important distinction emerges from the foregoing discussion: An origin event, such as the Creation of the universe, is the result of an immediate, abrupt, discontinuous action of a primary Cause (God)—it is an unrepeated singularity. The Creation of life is an intelligent intrusion or intervention into the inanimate world that is not in continuity with what went before it. A supernatural Creation is direct and immediate (see Volume 1, chapter 3): It moves from nothing to something, or from the non-living to the living, or from the non-intelligent to the intelligent. It is a miracle. Even Darwin believed, “Nature makes no jumps. But God does” (cited by Gruber, DM).

Now, this same pattern for miraculous events of origin has been manifest in miraculous events since the time of origins. For example, the incarnation of Christ was a direct, abrupt, and discontinuous intervention of God in human history; it can be known in the same way that supernatural events of origin are known, for it too is an unrepeated, unobserved (by us), past singularity. We know it by examining the record of the past (mainly the New Testament), by which we can reconstruct the story (i.e., history) of what occurred. Thus, the identification of miraculous events since the time of origins follows the same general procedure of that used in origin science (see Geisler and Anderson, OS, chapter 6).

God of the Gaps and Nature of the Gaps

The way God operates regularly in His world is the object of operation science, to which belong cosmology, geology, biology, and anthropology. The origins of these areas are the object of origin science. They have been called cosmogony, geogeny, biogeny, and anthrogeny.

With these distinctions in mind, we are equipped to avoid two unfortunate extremes. On the one hand, some have yielded to the temptation to explain certain anomalous operations of the universe as miracles. As alluded to previously, Sir Isaac Newton explained the regular elliptical orbit of the planets as a divine intervention. Eventually, however, Pierre-Simon Laplace provided a purely natural explanation for this phenomena (SW, 2.4.331). Many early Christians invoked divine intervention to explain geological processes, but later James Hutton and Charles Lyell were able to give satisfactory natural explanations for these phenomena. Before the time of Darwin, it was assumed by many creationists that all species were fixed by a direct supernatural act of God. Likewise, earthquakes, meteors, and volcanoes were all once explained as divine interruptions of nature. The mistake in each case was to assume that the naturally unexplained functioning of nature was naturally unexplainable. This error has been called the God of the Gaps. As it turned out, the gap was not really in the operation of nature, but in the human understanding of it.

There is another equally harmful mistake that may be called the Nature of the Gaps error, not a folly of supernaturalists but of naturalists. Here the temptation is not to interject a supernatural cause into the regularities of the world (as in God of the Gaps), but rather to assume there is always a natural cause for singularities in the world. However, it is no more justifiable to presume there is always a natural cause for unexplained regularities in nature than it is to necessarily plead a direct supernatural cause for unexplained singularities. Indeed, a continuous regular process, by its very nature, can be assumed to have a natural cause—this is so even if we do not know what it is—and, thus, the God of the Gaps fallacy has no place in operation science. On the other hand, if there is an abrupt, discontinuous singularity or origin, then it is wrong to presume it must have a natural cause. The Nature of the Gaps presumption has no place in origin science.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD AS CREATOR AND SUSTAINER OF CREATION

The doctrine of God's conserving causality was not wasted on the Fathers of the church. From earliest times they saw and wrote of its importance.

The Early Church Fathers on God as Creator and Sustainer

Clement of Alexandria

The heavens, revolving under His government, are subject to Him in peace. Day and night run the course appointed by Him, in no wise hindering each other. The sun and moon, with the companies of the stars, roll on in harmony according to His command, within their prescribed limits, and without any deviation. The fruitful earth, according to His will, brings forth food in abundance, at the proper seasons, for man and beast and all the living beings upon it, never hesitating, nor changing any of the ordinances which He has fixed. The unsearchable places of abysses, and the indescribable arrangements of the lower world, are restrained by the same laws.... The ocean, [thought to be] impassible to man, and the worlds beyond it, are regulated by the same enactments of the Lord. The seasons of spring, summer, autumn, and winter, peacefully give place to one another. The winds in their several quarters fulfill, at the proper time, their service without hindrance. The ever-flowing fountains, formed both for enjoyment and health, furnish without fail their breasts for the life of men. The very smallest of living beings meet together in peace and concord. (ECC, 1.20 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I)

Theophilus

In like manner, as any person, when he sees a ship on the sea rigged and in sail, and making for the harbor, will no doubt infer that there is a pilot in her who is steering her; so we must perceive that God is the governor [pilot] of the whole universe, though He be not visible to the eyes of the flesh, since He is incomprehensible.... For as the pomegranate, with the rind containing it, has within it many cells and compartments which are separated by tissues, and has also many seeds dwelling in it, so the whole creation is contained by the spirit of God, and the containing spirit is along with the creation contained by the hand of God. (TA, 1.5 in ibid., II)

Irenaeus

The God, therefore, who does benevolently cause His sun to rise upon all, and sends rain upon the just and unjust, shall judge those who, enjoying His equally distributed kindness, have led lives not corresponding to the dignity of His bounty; but who have spent their days in wantonness and luxury, in opposition to His benevolence, and have, moreover, even blasphemed Him who has conferred so great benefits upon them. (AH, 3.25.4 in ibid., I)

Again, the apostles taught the Gentiles that they should leave vain sticks and stones, which they imagined to be gods, and worship the true God, who had created and made all the human family, and, by means of His creation, did nourish, increase, strengthen, and preserve them in being; and that they might look for His Son Jesus Christ. (AH, 3.53 in ibid., I)

The Medieval Fathers on God as Creator and Sustainer

It is evident that God's relation to the world was not conceived in deistic terms by the Christian thinkers of the Middle Ages; rather, they viewed God as the active Sustainer of all things.

Augustine

For though the voices of the prophets were silent, the world itself, by its well-ordered changes and movements, and by the fair appearance of all visible things, bears a testimony of its own, both that it has been created, and also that it could not have been created save by God, whose greatness and beauty are unutterable and invisible. (CG, 11.4)

What, therefore, we do not find in that which is our own best, we ought not to seek in Him who is far better than that best of ours; that so we may understand God, if we are able, and as much as we are able, as good without quality, great without quantity, a creator though He lack nothing, ruling but from no position, sustaining all things without "having" them, in His wholeness everywhere, yet without place, eternal without time, making things that are changeable, without change of Himself, and without passion. (OT, 1, 160–61)

Anselm

Since it cannot but be that those things which have been created live through another, and that by which they have been created lives through itself, necessarily, just as nothing has been created except through the creative, present Being, so nothing lives except through its preserving presence. (M, XIII)

Further,

In this way God is said to do many things that he does not, as when he is said to lead us into temptation when he does not prevent temptation that he could, and to cause what is not since he could make it be and does not. But if you consider the things which pass into non-being, you will see that it is not God who causes them not to be. For not only is there no essence he does not make, but nothing he does make could last if he did not preserve it, for when he stops preserving what he made, it is not the case that he turns what was a being into non-being, as if he caused non-being, but only that he stops causing it to be. And even when in anger, as it were, he destroys something by taking away its existence, the non-being is not from him; rather when God's creative and preserving causality is removed, the thing reverts to the non-being it had of itself before it was created and does not have from God. If you were to ask someone for the cloak you had lent when he was naked, he does not receive his nakedness from you, but by the fact that you take back what is yours, he reverts to the condition that was his before you clothed him. (ACMW, 195)

Thomas Aquinas

Therefore, as the becoming of a thing cannot continue when the action of the agent, which causes the becoming of the effect, ceases, so neither can the being of a thing continue after the action of the agent, which is the cause of the effect not only in becoming but also in being, has ceased.

Reply Obj. 4. The conservation of things by God is not by a new action, but by a continuation of that action whereby He gives being, which action is without either motion or time; so also the conservation of light in the air is by the continual influence of the sun. (ST, Ia.104.1)

The Reformation Leaders on God as Creator and Sustainer

The great Reformers build on the metaphysics of the medieval theologians; hence, they did not treat extensively and philosophically those attributes and activities of God. Nonetheless, it is evident that they accepted them.

Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560)

Our Churches, with common consent, do teach that the decree of the Council of Nicaea concerning the Unity of the Divine Essence and concerning the Three Persons, is true and to be believed without any doubting; that is to say, there is one Divine Essence which is called and which is God: eternal, without body, without parts, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, the Maker and Preserver of all things, visible and invisible. (AC, Article I)

John Calvin

It were cold and lifeless to represent God as a momentary Creator, who completed his work once for all, and then left it. Here, especially, we must dissent from the profane, and maintain that the presence of the divine power is conspicuous, not less in the perpetual condition of the world than in its first creation.... To this effect is the passage of the Apostle already quoted that by faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God (Heb. 11:3), because without proceeding to his Providence, we cannot understand the full force of what is meant by God being the Creator, how much soever we may seem to comprehend it with our mind, and confess it with our tongue. The carnal mind, when once it has perceived the power of God in the creation, stops there, and, at the farthest, thinks and ponders on nothing else than the wisdom, power, and goodness displayed by the Author of such a work (matters which rise spontaneously, and force themselves on the notice even of the unwilling), or on some general agency on which the power of motion depends, exercised in preserving and governing it.

In short, it [unbelief] imagines that all things are sufficiently sustained by the energy divinely infused into them at first. But faith must penetrate deeper. After learning that there is a Creator, it must forthwith infer that he is also a Governor and Preserver, and that, not by producing a kind of general motion in the machine of the globe as well as in each of its parts, but by a special providence sustaining, cherishing, superintending, all the things which he has made, to the very minutest, even to a sparrow.

To this we may refer our Saviour's words, that he and his Father have always been at work from the beginning (John 5:17); also the words of Paul, that "in him we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17:28); also the words of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who, when wishing to prove the divinity of Christ, says that he upholdeth "all things by the word of his power" [Heb. 1:3] (ICR, 1.16.1, 4).

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God As Creator and Sustainer

Among the theological offspring of the Reformers, the belief in God's current causality of the universe was consistently reaffirmed.

Jonathan Edwards

[God] must also be of infinite knowledge; for if he made all things, and upholds and governs all things continually, it will follow that he knows and perfectly sees all things, great and small, in heaven and earth, continually at one view; which cannot be without infinite understanding. (WJE, 2, "Seven Sermons," 107)

Charles Hodge

Creation and preservation differ, first, as the former is the calling into existence what before did not exist; and the latter is continuing, or causing to continue what already has a being; and secondly, in creation there is and can be no cooperation, but in preservation there is a concursum of the first, with second causes. (ST, 1, 578)

The idea that God would create this vast universe teeming with life in all its forms, and exercise no control over it, to secure it from destruction or from working out nothing but evil, is utterly inconsistent with the nature of God. (ibid., 583)

He upholds as He creates all things, by the word of His power. How He does this it is vain to inquire. So long as we cannot tell how we move our lips, or how mind can operate on matter, or in what way the soul is present and operative in the whole body, it requires little humility to suppress the craving curiosity to know how God sustains the universe with all its hosts in being and activity.

It is best, therefore, to rest satisfied with the simple statement that preservation is that omnipotent energy of God by which all created things, animate and inanimate, are upheld in existence, with all the properties and powers with which He has endowed them, (ibid., 581)

Karl Barth

In the same way that He willed and gave it to the creature to become and to be, so He wills and gives to the creature to be again and again, to continue to be. This is how He preserves it. And He preserves it as is fitting that He the Creator should persevere, and that the creature should be preserved by Him. He preserves it eternally. He does not allow His creation to perish. He keeps faith with the creature. And yet He does not preserve it illimitably, but within the limits which correspond to its creaturely existence. The fact that He preserves is not exclusive but inclusive. (CD, part 3, 61)

Its actual preservation is no less the free act of God because in this case He acts indirectly and not directly. Hence it is not really the creature which sustains the creature. It is not the context of the whole which guarantees the continuance of the individual, nor is it the individual which guarantees the continuity of the whole. And there can be no question of the creature being able even vicariously to do in its own strength that which God wills it to do. It is God alone who does everything to His own free good-pleasure, (ibid., 65)

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

God's activity can be seen in making the world as well as in preserving it: He is both the Creator and Sustainer of the universe. God not only causes the universe to come to be, He also causes it to continue to be. He is both Maker and Upholder of all things. Indeed, two famous arguments are based respectively on these two teachings: The "horizontal" (kalam) cosmological argument is based on the fact that the universe had a Cause at the beginning (see Craig, KCA), and the "vertical" cosmological argument is based on the fact that the universe is contingent and needs a Cause right now for its existence (see Geisler and Corduan, PR, chapter 9).

Further, God is both the Originator and the Operator of His universe; in addition to the sustaining of the universe, God is continually active in operating it. The acts of origination are always immediate acts of God as the primary Cause; however, the operation of the universe God has ordained to be carried on through the instrumentality of secondary causes. These we call natural (indirect) causes because they are regular, observable, and predictable; they are the way God operates in His world regularly.

The direct act of a primary Cause is different—it is the way God especially intervenes in His world. These are not regular, nor are they predictable, acts of God; hence, we call them supernatural. These events have the same characteristics, whether they are miraculous events of creation or incarnation (see Lewis, M).

The distinguishing traits of natural events are continuity, regularity, and predictability; none of these is true of a miraculous origin event. Thus, it is wrong to assume that God directly intervenes in the continuous natural processes of the world (God of the Gaps). Likewise, it is equally wrong to presume that a discontinuous, singular, and unpredictable event of origin must have a natural event (Nature of the Gaps). God is involved in the world directly as a supernatural Cause for origins, and indirectly through secondary causes in operation.

GOD'S TRANSCENDENCE OVER AND IMMANENCE IN CREATION

Transcendence and immanence—two characteristics of God—are a natural pair. God is both transcendent over and immanent in His creation; that is, God is both beyond the world and in the world. In the former, the theistic God is distinct from pantheism, and in the latter, He is distinguished from deism (see Volume 1, chapter 2). Deism affirms God's transcendence but denies His immanence, whereas pantheism asserts God's immanence but denies His transcendence. Theism affirms that God is both transcendent and immanent.

THE TRANSCENDENCE OF GOD

The transcendence of God entails the assertions that He is above, beyond, other than, and more than the world. It stands in contrast, but not in contradiction, to His immanence, by which He is in the world.

Literally, transcendence means “to be above” or “beyond.” Theologically, it refers to the fact that God is above and beyond all creation. Thus, transcendence is not an inherent trait of God, but a relational one. Inherently, God is infinite, but in relation to His universe He is transcendent.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S TRANSCENDENCE

The biblical foundation for God's transcendence begins in the very first verse and permeates the whole of Scripture: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). “Will God really dwell on earth? The heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built!” (1 Kings 8:27). “Can you probe the limits of the Almighty? They are higher than the heavens—what can you do?” (Job 11:7–8). “O LORD, our Lord, how majestic is your name in all the earth! You have set your glory above the heavens” (Ps. 8:1). “Be exalted, O God, above the heavens; let your glory be over all the earth” (Ps. 57:5). “For you, O LORD, are the Most High over all the earth; you are exalted far above all gods” (Ps. 97:9). “In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple” (Isa. 6:1). “Who has measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, or with the breadth of his hand marked off the heavens? Who has held the dust of the earth in a basket, or weighed the mountains on the scales and the hills in a balance?” (Isa. 40:12). “ ‘For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways,’ declares the LORD. ‘As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts’ ” (Isa. 55:8–9). “This is what the high and lofty One says—he who lives forever, whose name is holy” (Isa. 57:15). “This is what the LORD says: ‘Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool. Where is the house you will build for me? Where will my resting place be? Has not my hand made all these things, and so they came into being?’ ” (Isa. 66:1–2). [There is] “one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all” (Eph.

4:6). “He is before all things, and in him all things hold together” (Col. 1:17). In short, God is before, over, beyond, and above all things.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S TRANSCENDENCE

In addition to the biblical basis for God’s transcendence, there are strong theological grounds. These are anchored in three other attributes or characteristics of God: His infinity, sovereignty, and majesty.

Transcendence Follows From God’s Infinity

God’s infinity has already been discussed (in chapter 5). If God is infinite and creation is finite, then God must transcend all creation, for the infinite is above and beyond the finite. Hence, God is above and beyond His creation.

Transcendence Follows From God’s Sovereignty

God’s transcendence can also be deduced from His sovereignty; the Bible teaches that God is in sovereign control of the universe (see chapter 23). The One who is in control of all creation must be beyond all creation, and the One who is beyond all creation is transcendent.

Transcendence Follows From God’s Majesty

God’s majesty is also a ground for His transcendence, for what has majesty is exalted beyond all else (see chapter 10), and what is exalted beyond all else is transcendent.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S TRANSCENDENCE

That God is above and beyond all things has been an essential teaching of the Christian church from the very beginning.

The Early Church Fathers on God’s Transcendence

The earliest Fathers were emphatic about God’s transcendence. Following their apostolic predecessors, the patristic teachers placed God above and beyond the created world.

Irenaeus

To what distance above God do ye lift up your imaginations, O ye rashly elated men? Ye have heard “that the heavens are meted out in the palm of [His] hand”? Tell me the measure, and recount the endless multitude of cubits, explain to me the fullness, the breadth, the length, the height, the beginning and end of the measurement, things which the heart of man understands not, neither does it comprehend them. For the heavenly treasures are indeed great: God cannot be measured in the heart, and incomprehensible is He in the mind; He who holds the earth in the hollow of His hand. (AH, 4.19.2 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I)

It is proper, then, that I should begin with the first and most important head, that is, God the Creator, who made the heaven and the earth, and all things that are therein (whom these men blasphemously style the fruit of a defect), and to demonstrate that there is nothing either above Him or after Him; nor that, influenced by any one, but of His own free will, He created all things, since He is the only God, the only Lord, the only Creator, the only Father, alone containing all things, and Himself commanding all things into existence. (AH, 2.1.1 in ibid.)

They also overthrow the faith of many, by drawing them away, under a pretense of [superior] knowledge, from Him who founded and adorned the universe; as if, forsooth, they had something more excellent and sublime to reveal, than that God who created the heaven and the earth, and all things that are therein. (AH, preface in ibid.)

We shall not be wrong if we affirm the same thing also concerning the substance of matter, that God produced it. For we have learned from the Scriptures that God holds the supremacy over all things. (AH, 2:28:7 in ibid.)

Papias (fl. second century)

He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For in the times of the kingdom the just man who is on the earth shall forget to die. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all. (FP, 5 in ibid.)

Clement of Alexandria

This discourse respecting God is most difficult to handle. For since the first principle of everything is difficult to find out, the absolutely first and oldest principle, which is the cause of all other things being and having been, is difficult to exhibit. For how can that be expressed which is neither genus, nor difference, nor species, nor individual, nor number; nay more, is neither an event, nor that to which an event happens? No one can rightly express Him wholly. For on account of His greatness He is ranked as the All, and is the Father of the universe. (S, 5:12 in ibid., II)

Tertullian

This rule is required by the nature of the One-only God, who is One-only in no other way than as the sole God; and in no other way sole, than as having nothing else (co-existent) with Him. So also He will be first, because all things are after Him; and all things are after Him, because all things are by Him; and all things are by Him, because they are of nothing. (AH, 17 in ibid., III)

The Medieval Fathers on God's Transcendence

With one accord the giants of the Middle Ages affirmed God's absolute transcendence. This they did in several ways, often stressing God's transcendence via His being the Creator of all things.

Augustine

Will you say that these things are false, which, with a strong voice, Truth tells me in my inner ear, concerning the very eternity of the Creator, that His substance is in no wise changed by time, nor that His will is separate from His substance? Wherefore, He willeth not one thing now, another anon, but once and for ever He willeth all things that He willeth; not again and again, nor now this, now that; nor willeth afterwards what He willeth not before, nor willeth not what before He willed. Because such a will is mutable, and no mutable thing is eternal; but our God is eternal.... Moreover, all thought which is thus varied is mutable, and nothing mutable is eternal; but our God is eternal. These things I sum up and put together, and I find that my God, the eternal God, hath not made any creature by any new will, nor that His knowledge suffereth anything transitory. (C, 12.15)

Anselm

Of all the things that can be said of something, could any be appropriate to the substance of so wonderful a nature as this? This is the question to ask as carefully as possible at this point. I would be surprised if we could find anything from among the nouns and verbs which we apply to things created from nothing that could worthily be said of the substance that created all. Nonetheless we must see where reason takes us.... Something said, therefore, of the supreme nature in respect of relation does not signify its substance. Hence, the mere fact that the supreme nature is greater than everything that it has created clearly does not specify its natural essence.

The claim “nothing was before the supreme being” must be taken in the second way. It must not be taken to mean that there was a time when the supreme being did not, and when nothing did, exist. On the contrary, it means that before the supreme being it was not the case that there was something. And the same double meaning applies to the claim that nothing will exist after the supreme being. (ACMW, 26, 33)

Thomas Aquinas

“God is above all things by the excellence of His nature” (ST, Ia.8.1 ad 1).

The Reformation Leaders on God’s Transcendence

There was no reformation about the nature of God. The Reformers took aim at ecclesiology (the study of the church) and soteriology (the study of salvation), but not theology proper (the study of God Himself).

Martin Luther

God is not to be excluded from, or limited to, any place. He is everywhere and nowhere. If it is asked whether He is everywhere only according to the exercise of His power (potentialiter) or according to His essence (substantialiter), I reply: He is in every creature in both ways; for while a creature works through its attribute (per qualitatem), God does not work through His attribute but through His essence (essentialiter). (WLS, 543–44)

John Calvin

Because our weakness cannot reach his height, any description which we receive of him must be lowered to our capacity in order to be intelligible. And the mode of lowering is to represent him not as he really is, but as we conceive of him. Though he is incapable of every feeling of perturbation, he declares that he is angry with the wicked. Wherefore, as when we hear that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any emotion in him, but ought rather to consider the mode of speech accommodated to our sense. (ICR, 1.17.13)

Away, then, with all gross conceptions of God; for his greatness far exceeds all creatures, so that heaven, and earth, and sea, and all that they contain, however vast may be their extent, yet in comparison of him are nothing. (C, on Isa. 40:12)

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God's Transcendence

The sons of the Reformation were true to their Fathers' view of God. They too stressed His absolute transcendence over His creation.

Jacob Arminius

As we ought to enunciate negatively the mode by which the Essence of God pre-eminently both is and is not spiritual, above the excellence of all Essences, even of those which are spiritual; so this may be done first and immediately in a single phrase, "He is ... without beginning and without cause either external or internal." ... For since there cannot be any advancement in infinitem, (for if there could, there would be no Essence, no Knowledge,) there must be one Essence, above and before which no other can exist: But such an Essence must that of God be; for, to whatsoever this Essence may be attributed, it will by that very act of ascription be God himself. (WJA, I.437)

Francis Turretin

God is said to be infinite in essence in three ways: (1) originally, because he is absolutely independent, who neither has nor can have anything prior or superior to himself; (2) formally, because he has an absolutely infinite (apeiron) essence; (3) virtually, because his activity has no finite sphere, nor does he need the concurrence of any cause in acting, but does all things whatsoever he wills. (IET, 195)

Jonathan Edwards

It may be noted particularly, that though we are obliged to conceive of something in God as consequent and dependent on others, and so some things pertaining to the Divine Nature and Will as the foundation of others, and so before others in the order of nature: as we must conceive of the knowledge and holiness of God as prior, in the order of nature, to his happiness; the perfection of his understanding, as the foundation of his wise purposes and decrees; the holiness of his nature, as the cause and reason of his holy determinations. (WJE, 1.70)

Stephen Charnock

A creature's praises of God are as much below the transcendent eminency of God, as the meanness of a creature's being is below the eternal fullness of the Creator. (EAG, 2.109)

It is as impossible for a creature to be a Creator, as for a creature to have naturally an incommunicable property of the Creator. All things, whether angels or men, are made of nothing, and therefore, capable of defection; because a creature being made of nothing, cannot be good, or essentially good, but by participation from another. (ibid., II.230)

He is the sovereign Lord, as he is the almighty Creator. The relation of an entire Creator induceth the relation of an absolute Lord; he that gives being, motion, that is the sole cause of the being of a thing, which was before nothing, that hath nothing to concur with him, nothing to assist him, but by his sole power commands it to stand up into being, is the unquestionable Lord and proprietor of that thing that hath no dependence but upon him; and by this act of creation, which extended to all things, he became universal Sovereign over all things: and those that waive the excellency of his nature as the foundation of his government, easily acknowledge the sufficiency of it upon his actual creation. His dominion of jurisdiction results from creation, (ibid., 2.368)

William G. T. Shedd

The Divine being is of an essence whose spirituality transcends that of all other spirits, human, angelic, or arch-angelic; even as his immortality transcends that of man or angel.... The transcendent nature of the Divine spirituality is seen in the fact of its being formless and unembodied. "No man hath seen God at any time," John 1:18. "Ye saw no similitude," Deut. 4:12. The Infinite Spirit cannot be so included in a form as not to exist outside of it. The finite spirit can be, and in all its grades is both embodied and limited by the body. (DT, 152)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S TRANSCENDENCE

A number of problems with God's attribute of transcendence come from various quarters. Each will be briefly stated with a response to it.

Objection One: Transcendence Makes God Unknowable

The first protest is a serious one for an evangelical, because if it is true, then we are left in skepticism about God.

The objection may be stated thus: A transcendent God is a wholly other God. If He were not wholly other, He would not be transcendent. If, however, God is wholly other, then we cannot know Him, for "wholly other" means that God is not like us at all, and not to be like His creation at all is to make all our talk about Him equivocal (see Volume 1, chapter 9). Equivocal God-talk is totally different from the way God is; thus, transcendence makes God totally unknowable.

Response to Objection One

God can be, and is, transcendent without being "wholly other." There is indeed an infinite difference between the infinite God and finite creatures, but there is not a total lack of similarity. There is a third alternative between "wholly other" (equivocal) and "wholly the same" (univocal), namely, there is a similarity (analogy). As was demonstrated earlier (in Volume 1, chapter 9), God must be similar to His creatures because He caused their existence; an effect must be similar to its efficient cause, since a cause cannot give what it hasn't got, and it can't produce what it does not possess. God is Being, and He gave being; He is Existence, and He gave existence to His creatures; He is Pure Actuality, and he made creation actual. Of course, there is a difference: Creatures have potentiality, and God does not. Without a difference there would be no transcendence.

Objection Two: Transcendence Puts God Out of Touch With Us

A God who is so far above and beyond the world, such as transcendence demands, is allegedly out of touch with our reality. He is so remote as not to be relatable; He is so distant as not to be able to be near; He is so far that He can't be close to us.

Response to Objection Two

Whatever validity this argument may have for other forms of theism, such as Islam or even deism, it has none for the Christian view of God's transcendence. There are two reasons for this: (1) God's immanence and (2) the Incarnation.

First, God is not simply transcendent; He is also immanent (see below). He is not only up there; He is in here. He is not simply beyond us, but He is also with us.

Second, whatever remoteness may be suggested of the Christian God is removed by the Incarnation, for in Christ, God became man and dwelled among us. Indeed, He assumed humanity and is one of us. He is not merely up there—He came down here. Hence, an objection that the God of Christianity is out of touch with reality is itself out of touch with reality: "We do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but we have one who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin" (Heb. 4:15).

Objection Three: Transcendence Is Contradictory to Immanence

It would appear that the solution to the above objections creates another. Granting that God's immanence offsets the problems of His transcendence, it can then be objected, How can God possess contradictory characteristics? How can He be both up there and down here, both beyond the world and in the world at the same time? These very concepts appear to be mutually exclusive.

Response to Objection Three

For one thing, as detailed previously, transcendence and immanence are not intrinsic attributes of God; rather, they show His relationship to His creation. For example, God is intrinsically infinite (whether there is a Creation or not), but God can only be transcendent if there is a creation over which to be transcendent. Transcendence and immanence are not contradictory: The law of noncontradiction demands that something is contradictory only if it is opposite things at the same time and in the same sense or relationship. God is immanent in a different sense than He is transcendent—His transcendence is not the same relationship as His immanence. They are, in fact, two different relationships God has to the world.

Further, transcendence and immanence are not logical opposites. A contradiction would be this: God is in the universe and not in the universe at the same time and in the same sense. It is not contradictory to say that a person can be both in the water (with part of his body) and yet also be out of the water (with the rest of his body). Better yet, since God has no parts, it is not contradictory to affirm that while my mind is in my brain, it also is beyond it in the sense that it can roam the universe while it never leaves my head. So while there is a mystery in how God can be both beyond and within the world, there is no contradiction.

AN APPROPRIATE RESPONSE TO GOD'S TRANSCENDENCE

The transcendence of God should elicit a sense of awe from His creatures. Psalm 8:1 says: "O LORD, our Lord, how majestic is your name in all the earth! You have set your glory above the heavens."

It should also prompt a sense of our own insignificance. Psalm 48:1 declares: "Great is the LORD, and most worthy of praise, in the city of our God, his holy mountain."

Likewise, we should derive a sense of sinfulness from meditating on God's transcendence. Isaiah 6:1–5 proclaimed: "I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple.... And they [the seraphs] were calling to one another: 'Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory'.... 'Woe to me!' I cried. 'I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty.' "

Further, a sense of submission ought to emerge from thinking about the transcendence of God. Philippians 2:9–11 affirms: "God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is LORD, to the glory of God the Father."

Finally, a sense of reverence is a natural consequence of contemplating God's transcendence. Revelation 4:11 asserts: "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being."

THE IMMANENCE OF GOD

God's immanence is the flip side of His transcendence. In His relation with His creation, God is not only over it, but He is also in it. He is both far and near. As infinite, God must be beyond His creation, yet as its sustaining Cause He must be within it.

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S IMMANENCE

The literal meaning of immanence is "to be within" or "near." Theologically, God's immanence means that He is within or present to the entire universe. Immanence is closely associated with God's omnipresence (see chapter 7), though there is a distinction between them. By His omnipresence God is present to all of His creation, but by His immanence He is within it.

However, God is not within the universe in the sense of being part of it, for He is the Creator and it is His creation. He is within the universe as its sustaining Cause, but not in it in the sense of its being a part of His nature.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S IMMANENCE

The Bible provides abundant evidence for God's immanence. Again, "Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence? If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there. If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast" (Ps. 139:7–10). "'Am I only a God nearby,' declares the LORD, 'and not a God far away? Can anyone hide in secret places so that I cannot see him?' declares the LORD. 'Do not I fill heaven and earth?' declares the LORD." (Jer. 23:23–24). "God did this so that men would seek him and perhaps reach out for him and find him, though he is not far from each one of us. 'For in him we live and move and have our being' " (Acts 17:27–28). "What may be known about God is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them" (Rom. 1:19). "In [Christ] all things hold together" (Col. 1:17). "Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13). "By your [God's] will they ... have their being" (Rev. 4:11).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S IMMANENCE

God's immanence follows from other theological truths. Two of these are His sustaining causality of the universe and His infinity.

Immanence Follows From God's Causality

The Bible affirms that God is not only the originating Cause of the universe, but He is also the sustaining Cause of it: "The Son is ... sustaining all things by his powerful word" (Heb. 1:3), and "in him all things hold together" (Col. 1:17). The fact is, as we have seen, that all creatures are constantly dependent for their continued existence. Continual dependence demands a continual Cause, and the Cause of existence is at the core of everything else that exists. Therefore, God is in this sense at the core of everything else that is.

Immanence Follows From God's Infinity

What is infinite must include, in some way, everything else that exists, for if it did not, then it would not be infinite or all-inclusive. To put it another way, if God were not in even a tiny section of His universe, then there would be somewhere that the infinite Being is not. However, by its very nature, an Infinite cannot be absent anywhere; hence, God must be within the entire universe.

More appropriately stated, God is not only within the universe, but the universe is within God: "In Him we live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:28). As the ultimate efficient Cause of all things, He does not participate in the effect, but the effect participates in the Cause. This being the case, it is perhaps more fitting to say that the universe is within God than that God is within the universe, though the latter is true as well.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S IMMANENCE

In addition to the biblical and theological basis for God's immanence, there is ample testimony in the early history of the church to support this activity of God.

The Early Church Fathers on God's Immanence

From the inception of the post-apostolic period, there are numerous references to God's immanence. Thus, His transcendence is balanced by His immanent presence in the world.

Ignatius

God is at work within the believer.

A Christian has not power over himself, but must always be ready for the service of God. Now, this work is both God's and yours, when ye shall have completed it to His glory. For I trust that, through grace, ye are prepared for every good work pertaining to God. Knowing, therefore, your energetic love of the truth, I have exhorted you by this brief Epistle. (EIP, 7 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I)

Irenaeus

“Now, that this God is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Paul the apostle also has declared, [saying,] ‘There is one God, the Father, who is above all, and through all things, and in us all’ ” (AH, 2.3.5 in ibid.).

This is also made clear from the words of the Lord, who did truly reveal the Son of God to those of the circumcision “Him who had been foretold as Christ by the prophets; that is, He set Himself forth, who had restored liberty to men, and bestowed on them the inheritance to incorruption. And again, the apostles taught the Gentiles that they should leave vain sticks and stones, which they imagined to be gods, and worship the true God, who had created and made all the human family, and, by means of His creation, did nourish, increase, strengthen, and preserve them in being; and that they might look for His Son Jesus Christ.” (AH, 3.5.3 in ibid.)

Athenagoras

First, as to our not sacrificing: the Framer and Father of this universe does not need blood, nor the odor of burnt-offerings, nor the fragrance of flowers and incense, forasmuch as He is Himself perfect fragrance, needing nothing either within or without.... When holding God to be this Framer of all things, who preserves them in being and superintends them all by knowledge and administrative skill, we “lift up holy hands” to Him. (WA, 13 in ibid., II)

The Medieval Fathers on God’s Immanence

Augustine

The truth is that all these actions and energies belong to the one true God, who is really a God, who is wholly present everywhere, is confined by no frontiers and bound by no hindrances, is indivisible and immutable, and, though His nature has no need of either heaven or of earth, He fills them both with His presence and His power. (CG, 7.30)

What is more wonderful than what happens in connection with the sound of our voices and our words, a thing, forsooth, which passes away in a moment? For when we speak, there is no place for even the next syllable till after the preceding one has ceased to sound; nevertheless, if one hearer be present, he hears the whole of what we say, and if two hearers be present, both hear the same, and to each of them it is the whole; and if a multitude listen in silence, they do not break up the sounds like loaves of bread, to be distributed among them individually, but all that is uttered is imparted to all and to each in its entirety. Consider this, and say if it is not more incredible that the abiding Word of God should not accomplish in the universe what the passing word of man accomplishes in the ears of listeners, namely, that as the word of man is present in its entirety to each and all of the hearers, so the Word of God should be present in the entirety of His being at the same moment everywhere. (L, 137.2)

Anselm

God’s preservation of all things manifests His intimate immanence in them. In this way God is said to do many things that he does not, as when he is said to lead us into temptation when he does not prevent temptation that he could, and to cause what is not since he could make it be and does not. But if you consider the things which pass into non-being, you will see that it is not God who causes them not to be. For not only is there no essence he does not make, but nothing he does make could last if he did not preserve it, for when he stops preserving what he made, it is not the case that he turns what was a being into non-being, as if he caused non-being, but only that he stops causing it to be. And even when in anger, as it were, he destroys something by taking away its existence, the non-being is not from him; rather when God's creative and preserving causality is removed, the thing reverts to the non-being it had of itself before it was created and does not have from God. If you were to ask someone for the cloak you had lent when he was naked, he does not receive his nakedness from you, but by the fact that you take back what is yours, he reverts to the condition that was his before you clothed him. (ACMW, 195)

Thomas Aquinas

God is said to be in all things by essence, not indeed by the essence of the things themselves, as if He were of their essence; but by His own essence; because His substance is present to all things as the cause of their being. (ST, 1a.8.3 ad 1)

Since God is very being by His own essence, created being must be His proper effect. Now God causes this effect in things not only when they first begin to be, but as long as they are preserved in being. Therefore as long as a thing has being, God must be present to it, according to its mode of being. Hence it must be that God is in all things, and innermost. (ibid., 1a.8.1)

No action of an agent, however powerful it may be, acts at a distance, except through a medium. But it belongs to the great power of God that He acts immediately in all things. Hence nothing is distant from Him, as if it could be without God in itself. (ibid., 1a.8.1 ad 3)

The Reformation Fathers on God's Immanence

John Calvin

It were cold and lifeless to represent God as a momentary Creator, who completed his work once for all, and then left it. Here, especially, we must dissent from the profane, and maintain that the presence of the divine power is conspicuous, not less in the perpetual condition of the world than in its first creation. (ICR, 1.16.1)

Martin Luther

The word "mighty" does not denote a quiescent power, as one says of a temporal king that he is mighty, even though he be sitting and doing nothing. But it denotes an energetic power, a continuous activity, that works and operates without ceasing. For God does not rest, but works without ceasing, as Christ says in John 5, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (WL, 3.163–64).

The Post-Reformation Theologians on God's Immanence

Jonathan Edwards

It is most evident by the works of God, that his understanding and power are infinite; for he that hath made all things out of nothing, and upholds, and governs, and manages all things every moment, in all ages, without growing weary, must be of infinite power. (WJE, 2.107)

In divine ordinances, persons have immediate intercourse with God, either in applying to him, as in prayer and singing praises, or in receiving from him. (ibid., 2.186)

Stephen Charnock

This power is divided ordinarily into absolute and ordinate. Absolute, is that power whereby God is able to do that which he will not do, but is possible to be done; ordinate, is that power whereby God doth that which he hath decreed to do, that is, which he hath ordained or appointed to be exercised; which are not distinct powers, but one and the same power. His ordinate power is a part of his absolute; for if he had not a power to do every thing that he could will, he might not have the power to do everything that he doth will. The object of his absolute power is all things possible; such things that imply not a contradiction, such that are not repugnant in their own nature to be done, and such as are not contrary to the nature and perfections of God to be done. (EAG, 2.12)

R. L. Dabney

Once more, God's power must be conceived of as primarily immediate; i.e., His simple volition is its effectuation; and no means interpose between the will and the effect. Our wills operate on the whole external world through our members; and they, often, through implements, still more external. But God has no members; so that we must conceive of His will as producing its effects on the objects thereof as immediately as our wills do on our bodily members. Moreover the first exertion of God's power must have been immediate; for at first nothing existed to be means. God's immutability assures us that the power of so acting is not lost to Him. The attribution of such immediate power to God does not deny that He also acts through "second causes" (LST, 47).

William G. T. Shedd

While, however, there is this transcendence in the spirituality of God, there is also a resemblance between the Infinite and the finite spirit. The invisible, immortal, and intelligent mind of man is like in kind to the Divine nature, though infinitely below it in the degree of excellence. (DT, 155)

Charles Hodge

The infinitude of God, so far as space is concerned, includes his immensity and his omnipresence. These are not different attributes, but one and the same attribute, viewed under different aspects. His immensity is the infinitude of his being, viewed as belonging to his nature from eternity. He fills immensity with his presence. His omnipresence is the infinitude of his being, viewed in relation to his creatures. He is equally present with all his creatures, at all times, and in all places. He is not far from any one of us. "The Lord is in this place" may be said with equal truth and confidence, everywhere. (ST, 383–84)

J. I. Packer

The psalmist meditates on the infinite and unlimited nature of God's presence, and knowledge, and power, in relation to people. We are always in God's presence, he says. You can cut yourself off from your fellow human beings, but you cannot get away from your Creator. (KG, 85)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S IMMANENCE

Two primary objections present themselves here. First, how can God be both within and beyond the universe? Second, how can God be in the universe without being limited?

Objection One—Based on God's Alleged Identity With the Universe

This objection alleges that God cannot be in the universe without being limited, for whatever is within something is limited by it. "Within" implies being encompassed by some boundaries around it, and whatever is so limited is finite. Nevertheless, God is not finite; hence, He cannot be within the universe.

Response to Objection One

God is in the universe, but not of it. Since God is indivisible (see chapter 2), all of God must be everywhere He is. All of God is everywhere, but no part of God is anywhere (since He has no parts). Therefore, in whatever sense God is “in” the universe, He is in it with His entire Being, which is infinite. Further, the sense in which God is “in” the universe is not ontological but relational; He is in the universe as the infinite sustaining Cause, of it, not as being part of the effect. So God is present in the entire universe, and His presence is infinite, not finite. He is present as its infinite and sustaining Cause, but not as part of a finite effect. And, as noted earlier, the universe is really in God, since it is finite and He is its infinite Cause (cf. Acts 17:28).

Objection Two—Based on Limitation

The universe is limited, as is every space in it. Thus, if God is in the universe, then He must be limited, for the only way something can be in a limited place is in a limited way.

Response to Objection Two

The universe is limited, but God is not. God is “in” the universe the only way an unlimited Being can be in it: He is not in it as being part of the effect, but as being its Cause. The Cause is unlimited, and the universe is limited; the Cause is causing the effect, but it transcends, rather than being part of, the effect.

Here again, it may be more helpful to speak of the universe being in God, as the Bible does: “In Him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28). The universe is in God the way a cause is in its effect, and a cause transcends its effect. It is because God transcends the universe He is in that He can be infinite, while what He is in is only finite.

Since God is a simple Being, He cannot be partly anywhere—all of Him must be everywhere. So all of God is in all of the universe: The infinite God is present in every finite space.

This does not limit God, because while He is present within the universe, He is not part of it. Like the mind that is present in every part of the brain without being a part of the brain, so too is God in the universe without being of part of it.

SUMMARY

God’s transcendence and immanence are complementary characteristics, each manifesting a different relationship with His creation. God is both transcendent over and immanent in His creation. In the former, He is distinct from pantheism, and in the latter He is different from deism. Both attributes are firmly based in the Bible, sound reasoning, and the history of Christian theology.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY OVER CREATION

Technically, sovereignty is not an attribute of God, but rather an activity of God in relation to His universe. Sovereignty is God's control over His creation, dealing with His governance over it: Sovereignty is God's rule over all reality.

Sovereignty should be distinguished from other related activities of God. Creation and preservation are the conditions of God's control over all things; by the former creation comes to be, and by the latter it continues to be. Without these there would be no creation for God to be sovereign over. More technically, dominion is God's control of all things; providence (see chapter 24) is the means by which God is in control over all, and sovereignty is God's right to control all things.

THE MEANING OF GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY (GOVERNANCE)

However, in this chapter, sovereignty is presented not simply as God's right to control all, but also as His actual sovereign dominion over all things. Generally, sovereignty (governance) means "to be in control of" or "to be in charge of." Theologically, sovereignty refers to God's complete control of all things. The Westminster Confession of Faith states: "God, from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of His own will, freely, and unchangeably ordain whatever comes to pass" (chapter III).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY

God's sovereignty is based in several of His attributes, especially omnipotence, omnibenevolence, omniscience, and omnisapience. Since God is all-powerful, all-good, all-knowing, and all-wise, He both knows the best thing to do and has the power to do it. Further, since God is before all things, created all things, upholds all things, is above all things, and owns all things, He is the rightful ruler of all things.

God Is Prior to All Things

God is "before all things" (Col 1:17). "In the beginning God ..." (Gen. 1:1). Before there was anything else, God existed. Moses wrote, "From everlasting to everlasting, thou art God" (Ps. 90:2 KJV). He is called "the First" (Rev. 22:13); "the Beginning" (Rev. 21:6); and "the Alpha" (Rev. 1:8). Repeatedly, the Bible speaks of God as being there "before the foundation of the world" (John 17:24 KJV; cf. Matt. 13:35; 25:34; Rev. 13:8; 17:8).

God was not only prior to all things, He was there "before the beginning of time" (2 Tim. 1:9). In fact, God brought time into existence when he "framed the world" (lit: "the ages"—Heb. 1:2). God "alone is immortal" (1 Tim 6:16); we receive immortality only as a gift (Rom. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:53; 2 Tim. 1:10).

God Produced All Things

Not only is God prior to all things, but He also produced all things. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). "Through [Christ] all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made" (John 1:3). "By him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him" (Col. 1:16).

God Sustains All Things

Further, God also upholds all things. Hebrews declares that God is "sustaining all things by his powerful word" (Heb. 1:3). Paul adds, "He is before all things, and in him all things hold together" (Col. 1:17). John informs us that God not only brought all things into existence, but He keeps them in existence: "They were created and have their being" from God (Rev. 4:11). Paul says that there is “one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live” (1 Cor. 8:6; cf. Rom. 11:36). Hebrews asserts “it was fitting that God, for whom and through whom everything exists, should make the author of their salvation perfect through suffering” (Heb. 2:10).

God Transcends All Things

The God who is prior to all things He created, and who is upholding all things, is also above all things, is transcendent. The apostle affirmed that there is “one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all” (Eph. 4:6). The psalmist declared, “O LORD, our Lord, how majestic is your name in all the earth! You have set your glory above the heavens” (Ps. 8:1). “Be exalted, O God, above the heavens; let your glory be over all the earth” (Ps. 57:5). “For you, O LORD, are the Most High over all the earth; you are exalted far above all gods” (Ps. 97:9; cf. 108:5).

God Knows All Things

What is more, the God of the Bible is omniscient (see chapter 8); that God is all-knowing is clear from numerous passages of Scripture. The psalmist declared, “Great is our Lord, and mighty in power; His understanding is infinite” (Ps. 147:5 NKJV). God knows “the end from the beginning” (Isa. 46:10). He knows the very secrets of our heart; the psalmist confessed, “Before a word is on my tongue you know it completely, O LORD. ... Such knowledge is too wonderful for me, too lofty for me to attain” (Ps. 139:4, 6). Indeed, “nothing in all creation is hidden from God’s sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account” (Heb. 4:13). The apostle exclaimed, “Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!” (Rom. 11:33).

Even the elect were known by God (1 Peter 1:2) before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4). By His limitless knowledge, He is able to predict the exact course of human history (Dan. 2, 7), and He is able to predict the names of individuals generations before they were born (cf. Isa. 45:1). Nearly two hundred prophecies were recorded by God about the Messiah, not one of which failed. God knows all things—past, present, and future.

God Can Do All Things

Furthermore, God is all-powerful: He not only knows all things, eternally and unchangeably, but He can do all things. Before performing a great miracle, He said to Abraham, “Is anything too hard for the LORD?” (Gen. 18:14). In fact, “With God all things are possible” (Matt. 19:26).

God is literally omnipotent: He is not only infinite (not-limited) in His knowledge, He is also infinite in His power. He declared, “I am the LORD, the God of all mankind. Is anything too hard for me?” (Jer. 32:27). That God’s power is supernatural is evident by the miracles He performs that overpower the forces of nature. Jesus, as the Son of God, walked on water (John 6:19); stilled the storm (Matt. 8:23–27); and even raised the dead (John 11:38–45).

What is more, God’s omnipotent power is manifest in the creation of the world from nothing—He simply spoke and things came into being (Gen. 1:3, 6, 9, 11). Paul described Him as the “God, who said, ‘Let light shine out of darkness’ ” (2 Cor. 4:6).

Of course, as we have seen, God cannot do what is actually impossible to do. Since it is impossible for God to do things contrary to His unchanging nature, it is understandable that He cannot do any contradictory thing. The Bible says, “God ... cannot lie” (Titus 1:2 NKJV), for “it is impossible for God to lie” (Heb. 6:18); “He who is the Glory of Israel does not lie or change his mind; for he is not a man, that he should change his mind” (1 Sam. 15:29). For example, God cannot create another God equal to Himself; it is literally impossible to create another being that is not created. There is only one Uncreated Creator (Deut. 6:4; Isa. 45:18); everything else is a creature.

So God can do whatever is possible to do—there are no limits on His power except that it be consistent with His own unlimited nature. He can do anything that does not involve a contradiction. The Bible describes Him as “the Almighty” in numerous places (e.g., Gen. 17:1; Ex. 6:3; Num. 24:4; Job 5:17). He has all the might or power there is to have.

God Owns All Things

Since God created this universe, He is the rightful owner of it. David affirmed, “The earth is the LORD’S, and everything in it, the world, and all who live in it” (Ps. 24:1). God declared, “Every animal of the forest is mine, and the cattle on a thousand hills” (Ps. 50:10). Solomon added, “Who am I, and who are my people, that we should be able to give as generously as this? Everything comes from you, and we have given you only what comes from your hand” (1 Chron. 29:14). The apostle Paul asserted, “You are not your own” (1 Cor. 6:19). James added, “Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows” (James 1:17). And since God gives life, He has the right to take it: “See now that I myself am He! There is no god besides me. I put to death and I bring to life, I have wounded and I will heal” (Deut. 32:39).

God Rules Over All Things

It is because God is the all-powerful, all-wise Creator of all things that He can rule over all. The Bible affirms God’s sovereignty in many ways. Just as every sovereign controls his domain, even so the Ruler of the universe governs His creation. Isaiah’s vision of God was of a heavenly King whose train filled the temple (Isa. 6:1). Yahweh is called “the Great King” (Ps. 48:2); His reign is eternal, for “the LORD is enthroned as King forever” (Ps. 29:10). He is king over all the earth, for “the LORD is King for ever and ever; the nations will perish from his land” (Ps. 10:16). He is also the almighty king: “Who is this King of glory? The LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle” (Ps. 24:8). As such, God rules over all things: “Yours, O LORD, is the greatness and the power and the glory and the majesty and the splendor, for everything in heaven and earth is yours. Yours, O LORD, is the kingdom; you are exalted as head over all. Wealth and honor come from you; you are the ruler of all things (1 Chron. 29:11–12).

God Is in Control of All Things

Not only is God in charge of all things, He is also in control of them—nothing happens apart from God’s will. Job confessed to God, “I know that you can do all things; no plan of yours can be thwarted” (Job 42:2). The psalmist added, “Our God is in heaven; he does whatever pleases him” (Ps. 115:3). Again, “the LORD does whatever pleases him, in the heavens and on the earth, in the seas and all their depths” (Ps. 135:6).

Earthly Kings Are Under God's Control

The great king Solomon acknowledged, "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; he directs it like a watercourse wherever he pleases" (Prov. 21:1). God is the Sovereign over all sovereigns; He is "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS" (Rev. 19:16). There is nothing any human power does that is not done under God's power.

Human Events Are Under God's Control

God not only controls the hearts of kings, He ordains the course of history before it occurs, as He predicted through Daniel the great world kingdoms of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome (Dan. 2, 7). Indeed, mighty Nebuchadnezzar learned the hard way that "the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes and sets over them the lowliest of men" (Dan. 4:17). "The LORD Almighty has sworn, 'Surely, as I have planned, so it will be, and as I have purposed, so it will stand' .... For the LORD Almighty has purposed, and who can thwart him?" (Isa. 14:24, 27). Again, "So is my word that goes out from my mouth: It will not return to me empty, but will accomplish what I desire and achieve the purpose for which I sent it" (Isa. 55:11).

Good Angels Are Under God's Control

God not only rules in the visible realm but also in the invisible domain. He is "over all creation," including "visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities" (Col. 1:15–16). The angels come before His throne to get their orders to obey (1 Kings 22:19–23; Job 1:6; 2:1) and constantly worship God (Neh. 9:6). Indeed, they are positioned before His throne, and "Day and night they never stop saying: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come'" (Rev. 4:8).

Evil Angels Are Under God's Control

God's sovereign domain includes not only the good angels but also the free choices of evil ones (Eph. 1:21). They too will bow before God's throne one day in total subjection to Him, for "at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth [evil spirits], and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is LORD, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:10–11). Indeed, the evil spirits who deceived King Ahab were dispatched from the very throne of God:

I saw the LORD sitting on his throne with all the host of heaven standing round him on his right and on his left. And the LORD said, "Who will entice Ahab into attacking Ramoth Gilead and going to his death there?" One suggested this, and another that. Finally, a spirit came forward, stood before the LORD and said, "I will entice him."

"By what means?" the LORD asked.

"I will go out and be a lying spirit in the mouths of all his prophets," he said.

"You will succeed in enticing him," said the LORD. "Go and do it" (1 Kings 22:19–22).

Satan Is Under God's Control

Even Satan came among the good angels before God's throne in the book of Job (1:6; 2:1). Although he wished to destroy Job, God would not permit him. Satan complained, saying, "Have you not put a hedge around him and his household and everything he has? You have blessed the work of his hands, so that his flocks and herds are spread throughout the land" (Job 1:10). God has power to bind Satan anytime He desires, and He does it for a thousand years in the book of Revelation (20:2).

The devil's demons, who fell with him (Rev. 12:9; Jude 6), know they are eventually doomed; they cried out to Jesus, "What do you want with us, Son of God? ... Have you come here to torture us before the appointed time?" (Matt. 8:29). Satan was defeated by Christ at Calvary: "Having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:15). The devil himself "knows that his time is short" (Rev. 12:12), and while he is presently roaming the earth (1 Peter 5:8), he does so only on a leash, one held firmly by God's sovereign hand.

Christ came "that by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death—that is, the devil" (Heb. 2:14). John said that "the reason the Son of God appeared was to destroy the devil's work" (1 John 3:8). John also foretells how "the devil, who deceived them, was thrown into the lake of burning sulfur, where the beast and the false prophet had been thrown. They will be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. 20:10).

All Human Decisions Are Under God's Control

The Bible affirms that God is in sovereign control of everything we choose, even our own salvation: "In him we were also chosen, having been predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will" (Eph. 1:11). "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:29–30). According to Paul, "He chose us in him before the creation of the world" (Eph. 1:4). Peter said of Jesus to the Jews, "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:23). Indeed, only those who are elect will believe, for Luke wrote, "All who were appointed for eternal life believed" (Acts 13:48).

Other verses confirm God's actions involving the human will, even in matters of salvation. John declared that we are "children [of God] born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God" (John 1:13). Likewise, Paul affirmed, "It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy" (Rom. 9:16 NKJV). He added in even stronger terms, "God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:18).

God's sovereignty over human decisions includes both those for Him and against Him. Peter wrote of Christ: He is "a stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall." They stumble because they disobey the message—which is also what they were destined for" (1 Peter 2:8). Likewise, God has destined the "vessels of wrath" who were "prepared for destruction" (Rom. 9:22 NKJV) as well as the "vessels of mercy" (Rom. 9:23 NKJV). No one comes to the Father except he is drawn by God (John 6:44).

Even actions that the Bible declares as freely chosen by human beings are said to be determined by God in advance. For example, Jesus said, "I lay down my life—only to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord" (John 10:17–18). However, in Acts 2:23, the Cross is said to be a result of God's "set purpose and foreknowledge." This can also be rendered "determinate counsel" (KJV) or "God's definite plan" (TCNT). In short, God determined His plan from all eternity, and yet Christ fulfilled it freely.

Jesus proclaimed, “Truly the Son of man goes as it has been determined, but woe to that man by whom He is betrayed!” (Luke 22:22 NKJV). In other words, God determined that it must happen, but when it occurred it did so as a result of a free and responsible act of Judas.

Sometimes, in one and the same text, both God’s determination and human free choice are affirmed. Again, Peter said, “This man [Jesus] was handed over to you by God’s set purpose and foreknowledge; and you ... put him to death by nailing him to the cross” (Acts 2:23). While God determined their actions from all eternity, nevertheless, those responsible for crucifying Jesus were free to perform these actions—and they were morally responsible for them (Acts 4:28; see Volume 3, chapter 3).

In summary, the Bible declares that God is in complete control of everything that happens in the whole course of history. This includes even free choices, both good and evil, which He ordained from all eternity.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S SOVEREIGNTY

As mentioned earlier, God’s sovereignty is grounded in several of His attributes, especially His omniscience, omnipotence, and omnisapience.

Omniscience Is Necessary for Complete Sovereignty

Granted that there are free creatures (with the power of contrary choice), God’s omniscience is a necessary condition for complete sovereignty, for if God does not know for sure everything that will happen in advance, then He cannot be sure how free creatures will use their free will. Conversely, if God has infallible foreknowledge of how all free creatures will choose, then He can determine in advance for sure how everything will turn out. To have this kind of advanced certainty is to be in complete control of the results; hence, God’s omniscience makes His minimal sovereignty possible.

Omnipotence Is Necessary for Complete Sovereignty

A completely sovereign God must not only know what will come to pass, but He must also be able to make it come to pass. Omnipotence makes this possible; therefore, a God who is both all-knowing and all-powerful can be in complete sovereign control of all things.

However, as already established, omnipotence does not include the power to do what is not possible to do, and it is impossible to force a free creature to do what it does not freely choose to do, since forced freedom is a contradiction in terms. Even a completely sovereign God cannot guarantee that all will be saved (universalism); thus, omnipotence does not guarantee that a completely sovereign God can save everyone (see Volume 3).

Omnisapience Is Necessary for Complete Sovereignty

Further, sovereignty is not only the ability to do everything God wills but also to do it in the best way possible. Consequently, omnisapience (all-wisdom) is necessary for proper sovereignty (see chapter 9). Since God is not only all-knowing but is also all-wise, He not only has complete sovereignty, but He has proper sovereignty as well; an all-wise Being not only knows all ends, but He also knows the best means to the best ends.

In summary, given these attributes (God being all-knowing, all-powerful, and all-wise), He can completely control every future event, including free ones, knowing for certain that everything will turn out for the best. Thus, not only are there no surprises for Him, but the way the world will turn out is exactly the way He chose it and knew it would turn out from all eternity (see chapter 8).

The Relationship Between Sovereignty and Free Choice

The nature of human free choice, particularly since the fall of humankind, is an intramural debate among those who hold to the classical view of God. Most theists hold to a libertarian view of the power of contrary choice (see immediately below). However, some, following the late Augustine, Luther, Calvin, and Jonathan Edwards, claim that since the Fall human beings have no free choice with regard to their salvation. This will be discussed later (in Volume 3, chapters 5 and 16); meanwhile, it is important to point out that virtually all Christian theists believe that Lucifer and Adam were free before the Fall. And many believe that human beings are free to do otherwise by God's grace even since the Fall. This libertarian view of free will, which entails the power of contrary choice, is not incompatible with God's complete sovereignty over human freedom, for the Omniscient Mind knows for sure in advance what every free choice will be (see "Answering Objections to God's Sovereignty" below).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY

In addition to the strong biblical and theological arguments for God's complete sovereignty, there is an unbroken tradition from the earliest times in favor of this doctrine.

The Patristic Fathers on God's Sovereignty

The Didache (c. 80–140) states, "Accept as blessing all of the things that befall toil for nothing comes to pass apart from God" (7.378). The Martyrdom of Polycarp (c.135) affirms, "All the martyrdoms were blessed and noble, and they took place according to the will of God. For it befits those of us who profess greater piety than others to ascribe to God authority over all things" (MP, 1.39).

Irenaeus

Irenaeus stated, "The Maker of the universe is the Father, for He exercises a providence over all things and arranges the affairs of our world" (AH, 3.25.1 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I). Furthermore, "God rules over men and Satan too. In fact, without the will of our Father in heaven not a sparrow falls to the ground" (AH, 5.22.2 in ibid.).

"Therefore the Father will excel in wisdom, all human and angelic wisdom, because He is Lord, and Judge, and the Just One, and Ruler over all. For He is good, and merciful, and patient, and saves whom He ought: nor does goodness desert Him in the exercise of justice, nor is His wisdom lessened; for He saves those whom He should save, and judges those worthy of judgment" (AH, 3.25.3 in ibid.).

Clement of Alexandria

“Nothing happens without the will of the Lord of the universe.... He overrules for good the crimes of His enemies” (S, 4.12 in ibid., II). Further,

Sovereignty and free will are compatible, for many things in life take rise in some exercise of human reason, having received the kindling spark from God.... Now, all these things truly have their origin and existence because of divine providence—yet not without human cooperation as well. (S, 6.17 in ibid.)

Tertullian

Tertullian pointed out that “God hardened the heart of Pharaoh. However, he served to be influenced to his destruction, for he had already denied God” (FBAM, 2.14 in ibid., III). Indeed,

Some things seem to indicate the will of God, seeing that they are allowed by Him. However, it does not necessarily follow that everything that is permitted proceeds out of the unqualified and absolute will of Him who permits it. (OEC, 3 in ibid., IV)

Origen

Origen contended, “Among those events that happen to men, none occur by accident or chance.... [For] this Providential government extends even to caring for the sale of two sparrows for a denarius” (DP, 2.11.5 in ibid.). Yet God’s control is in accord with free choice:

Some say that we are moved externally, and they put the blame away from ourselves by declaring that we are like stones and pieces of wood. They say we are dragged about by those forces that act upon us externally. However, this is neither true nor in conformity with reason. Rather, it is the statement of someone who desires to destroy the conception of free will, (ibid., 3.1.5)

No matter what happens to a Christian,

In respect of all these occurrences, every believer should say, “You would have no power at all against me, unless it were given you from above.” For notice that the house of Job did not fall upon his sons until the devil had first received power against them, (ibid., 3.2.6)

Cyprian

“In our temptations, nothing is permitted to do evil unless power is given from Him” (TC, 4.25 in ibid.). “This includes pestilence and plague, which seems horrible and deadly and searches out the righteousness of each one” (TC, 4.25 in ibid., V).

Lactantius

The Most High Father arranged from the beginning, and ordained all things that were accomplished.... All the events that were necessary to carry out the plan of salvation had been orchestrated by God from the beginning—from the first Adam to the last Adam all things were ordained by God. (DI, 4.26 in ibid., VII)

The Medieval Fathers on God’s Sovereignty

Although they generally spoke of it as God's governance or rule, the great theologians of the Middle Ages did not neglect treating His sovereignty. Indeed, the Reformers later drew upon their teaching.

Augustine

Augustine questioned that in view of God's care for every detail of creation "can anyone believe that it was the will of God to exempt from the laws of His providence the rise and fall of political societies?" (CG, 5.10). "God allows nothing to remain unordered and ... knows all things before they come to pass" (ibid., 5:8).

Nor are we dismayed by the difficulty that what we choose to do freely is done of necessity, because He whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived foreknew that we would choose to do it.... We do not deny, of course, an order of causes in which the will of God is all-powerful. On the other hand, we do not give this order the name fate. (ibid., 5.8–9)

However,

Our main point is that, from the fact that to God the order of all causes is certain, there is not [a] logical deduction that there is no power in the choice of our will. [The fact of the matter is that] our choices fall within the order of the causes which is known for certain to God and is contained in His foreknowledge—for human choices are the causes of human acts.... [Thus,] absolutely all bodies are subject to the will of God; as, indeed, are all wills, too, since they have "no power save what He gave them" and He knows exactly what they will do with it.... Our conclusion is that our wills have the power to do all that God wanted them to do and foreknew that they could do. Their power, such as it is, is a real power, (ibid.)

As to evil choices,

He whose foreknowledge cannot be deceived foresaw, not the man's fate or fortune or what not, but that the man himself would be responsible for his own sin. No man sins unless it is his choice to sin; and his choice not to sin, that, too, God foresaw, (ibid., 5.10)

"He is the Cause of all causes, although not of all choices" (ibid., 5.8).

Anselm

Anselm affirmed that God can control the entire universe, including free actions, because of His infallible foreknowledge: "God, who knows all truth and only truth, sees all things just as they are—whether they be free or necessary; and, conversely, as He sees them so they are" (TIR, 159). Therefore, the future is certain, because "what is foreknown must happen in the future, and what is able not to happen in the future can't be foreknown" (TFE, 185). This, of course, does not mean humans are not free, "for God, who foresees what you are willingly going to do, foreknows that your will is not compelled or prevented by anything else; hence this activity of the will is free" (TIR, 154).

God's control of all events is secure because, for example,

When Satan turned his will to what he should not, both that willing and that turning were something; and yet he had this something only from God and by the will of God, since he could neither move his will nor will anything except through the permission of the One who makes all substantial and accidental and universal and individual natures.... [Thus,] insofar as Satan's will and its turning, or movement, are something, they are good and they are from God. But insofar as his will lacks the justice that it shouldn't lack, it is something evil—though not purely evil; and whatever is evil is not from God but from willing, or from the moving of the will. (TFE, 183)

Thomas Aquinas

For Thomas Aquinas, a Sovereign is one who governs—God, as the supreme Sovereign, governs the whole universe. In his “Treatise on Divine Government” in the Summa Theologica, Aquinas argued against “certain philosophers [who] denied the government of the world, saying that all things happened by chance” (ibid., 1.103.1).

Further, “God possesses, in its very essence, the government of all things, even the very least” (ibid., 1.103.6). With the exception of His sustaining causality of all things, God does not govern all things directly, for “God so governs things that He makes some of them to be causes of other things in government; as in the case of a teacher, who not only imparts knowledge to his pupils but also makes some of them to be the teachers of others” (ibid.).

What is more, nothing “happens outside the order of the divine government,” for while “it is possible for an effect to happen outside the order of some particular cause, [it is] not possible outside the order of the universal cause” (ibid., 1.103.7). Since God is the universal Cause of all being, “it is impossible for anything to occur outside the order of the divine government” (ibid.). Even evil does not escape God’s sovereign control, for “from the very fact that from one point of view something seems to evade the order of divine providence considered in regard to one particular cause, it must necessarily come back to that order as regards some other cause” (ibid.).

As to how God controls the future and yet humans are free, Aquinas’s answer is twofold.

First, “things known by God are contingent because of their proximate causes, while the knowledge of God, which is the first cause, is necessary” (ibid., 1a.4.14).

Second,

When a thing is properly disposed to receive the movement of the first mover, a perfect action in accord with the intention of the first mover follows, but if a thing is not properly disposed and suited to receive the motion of the first mover, an imperfect action follows. [Consequently,] for this reason we maintain that the action pertaining to sin is from God, but the sin is not from God. (OE, 110)

“Similarly, when something moves itself [in an act of free will], it is not precluded that it is moved by another from whom it has this very ability to which it moves itself” (ibid., 111). That is, God gives us the power of free choice, but we are responsible for exercising it. Once again, He gave the fact of freedom, but we are responsible for the acts of freedom.

Finally, according to Aquinas, nothing “can resist the order of the divine government” (ST, 1.103.8) in general, for “every inclination of anything, whether natural or voluntary, is nothing but a kind of impression from the first mover: just as the inclination of the arrow toward a fixed point is nothing but an impulse received from the archer.” Therefore, every agent, whether natural or voluntary, attains to its divinely appointed end, as though through its own accord—for this reason God is said “to order all things sweetly” (ibid.).

As for predestination, Aquinas wrote,

Thus, as men are ordained to eternal life through the providence of God, it likewise is part of that providence to permit some to fall away from that end; this is called reprobation. Thus, as predestination is a part of providence, in regard to those ordained to eternal salvation, so reprobation is a part of providence in regard to those who turn aside from that end. Hence reprobation implies not only foreknowledge, but also something more, as does providence, as was said above (Question 22, Answer 1). Therefore, as predestination includes the will to confer grace and glory; so also reprobation includes the will to permit a person to fall into sin, and to impose the punishment of damnation on account of that sin. (ibid., 1a.23.3)

The Reformers on God's Sovereignty

The sovereignty of God was a hallmark of Reformation theology. God is in complete and sovereign control not only of the universe but also of the process of salvation.

Martin Luther

Martin Luther observed that God has in His hand the hearts of all human beings. Thus in Job 38:10–11, “God said, ‘Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further; and here shall the proud waves be stayed’.... Just so hearts of men, inflamed by anger rage terrible. But God has set limits for their fury and angers—limits which they are not allowed to pass” (WLS, 879). Also, Luther wrote, “The saying of Augustine if sensibly understood fits this thought. He remarks that God controls the things He has created in such a way that He allows them to take their own natural course” (ibid., 1453).

John Calvin

Since the arrangement of all things is in the hand of God, since to him belongs the disposal of life and death, he arranges all things by his sovereign council, in such a way that individuals are born who are doomed from the womb to certain death and to glorify him by their destruction. (ICR, 3.23.6)

Further, “we must consider, that what each individual possesses has not fallen to him by chance, but by the distribution of the sovereign Lord of all” (ibid., 2.8). Thus, divine risk was not an option for Calvin, because he stated that “the conditions of men do not come about by chance. God directs in hidden ways all that takes place” (CC, 23.6).

Furthermore, although God sovereignly ordains all things, evil is not attributable to Him, for “we must also hold that God's action is distinct from Man's, so that Providence is free from all iniquity and his decrees have not affinity with the wrong doing of man” (ibid.).

In addition,

God is deemed omnipotent, not because he can act though he may cease or be idle, or because by a general instinct he continues the order of nature previously appointed; but because, governing heaven and earth by his providence, he so overrules all things that nothing happens without his counsel. For when it is said in the Psalms, “He has done whatsoever he has pleased” (115: 3), the thing meant is his sure and deliberate purpose. It were insipid to interpret the psalmist's words in philosophic fashion, to mean that God is the primary agent.... This rather is the solace of the faithful, in their adversity, that every thing which they endure is by the ordination and command of God, that they are under his hand. (ICR, 1.16.3)

Hence, “there is no random power, or agency, or motion in the creatures, who are so governed by the secret counsel of God, that nothing happens but what he has knowingly and willingly decreed” (ibid., 1.16.1–9).

what seems to us contingency, faith will recognize as the secret impulse of God. The reason is not always equally apparent, but we ought undoubtedly to hold that all the changes which take place in the world are produced by the secret agency of the hand of God. At the same time, that which

God has determined, though it must come to pass, is not, however, precisely, or in its own nature, necessary.... Hence, again, we see that there was good ground for the distinction which the Schoolmen made between necessity, secundum quid, and necessity absolute, also between the necessity of consequent and of consequence, (ibid., 1.16.9)

The Post-Reformers on God's Sovereignty

Jacob Arminius

[God's providence] preserves, regulates, governs and directs all things, and nothing in the world happens fortuitously or by chance.... [Beside this,] I place in subjection to Divine Providence both the freewill and even the actions of a rational creature so that nothing can be done without the will of God, not even any of those things which are done in opposition to it. (WJA, 1.251)

Furthermore,

Through creation, dominion over all things which have been created by himself, belongs to the Creator. It is, therefore, primary, being dependent on no other dominion or on that of no other person; and it is, on this account, chief because there is none greater.... [And,] it is absolute, because it is over the entire creature, according to the whole, and according to all and each of its parts, and to all the relations which subsist between the Creator and the creature. It is, consequently, perpetual, that is, so long as the creature itself exists, (ibid., 2.66)

It is not agreeable to this right of God, either that he delivers up his creature to another who may domineer over such creature, at his arbitrary pleasure, so that he be not compelled to render to God an account of the exercise of his sovereignty, and be able, without any demerit on the part of the creature, to inflict every evil on a creature capable of injury, or, at least, not for any good of this creature; or that he [God] command an act to be done by the creature, for the performance of which he neither has, nor can have, sufficient and necessary powers; or that he employ the creature to introduce sin into the world, that he may, by punishing or by forgiving it, promote his own glory; or, lastly, to do concerning the creature whatever he is able, according to his absolute power, to do concerning him, that is eternally to punish or to afflict him, without [his having committed] sin. (ibid., 2.66–67)

Francis Turretin

Francis Turretin stated that God's sovereignty is founded on His preeminence and beneficence:

First is eminence of power above others, for it is in accordance with the nature of things that the superior and more excellent should have dominion over the inferior and more ignoble.... Second is beneficence by which one man acquires a right over another. He is therefore lord because He is kind. Since, then, God is established in the highest preeminence and has bestowed upon his creatures as his work innumerable blessings, he is most justly called the Lord of all. (IET, 250)

Furthermore, Turretin wrote,

The former [natural dominion] is founded upon the decree of Providence by which He [God] predetermined all things and events.... The principal property of God's dominion is that it is not only universal but also absolute and unlimited.... As God is an independent and truly self-powerful being, so he is evidently liable to no censure or judgment (Job 9:12; Dan. 4:25), who can do with his own what he will (Matt. 20:15), and with whom no one can contend or say to him, why hast thou done this? although the reason of his works and judgments may be hidden from us [Job 33:13]. (ibid., 251)

Stephen Charnock

[God] hath an absolute right over all things within the circuit of heaven and earth; though his throne be in heaven, as the place where his glory is most eminent and visible, his authority most exactly obeyed, yet his kingdom extends itself to the lower parts of the earth.... [For] He doth not muffle and cloud up himself in heaven, or confine his sovereignty to that place, his royal power extends to all visible, as well as invisible things: he is proprietor and possessor of all (Deut. 10:14).... He hath the right to dispose of all as he pleases. (EAG, 2:362)

[God] is not determined by his creatures in any of his motions, but determines the creatures in all; his actions are not regulated by any law without him, but by a law within him, the law of his own nature.... [So] it is impossible he can have any rule without himself, because there is nothing superior to himself, nor doth he depend upon any in the exercise of his government; he needs no servants in it, when he uses creatures: it is not out of want of their help, but for the manifestation of his wisdom and power. What he doth by his subjects, he can do by himself, (ibid., 373)

He is the sovereign Lord, as he is the almighty Creator. The relation of an entire Creator induceth the relation of an absolute Lord; he that gives being motion, that is the sole cause of the being of a thing, which was before nothing, that hath nothing to concur with him, nothing to assist him, but by his sole power commands it to stand up into being, is the unquestionable Lord and proprietor of that thing that hath no dependence but upon him; and by this act of creation, which extended to all things, he became universal Sovereign over all things: and those that waive the excellency of his nature as the foundation of his government, easily acknowledge the sufficiency of it upon his actual creation. His dominion of jurisdiction results from creation. (ibid., 368)

Jonathan Edwards

Jonathan Edwards stated that God is the absolute Sovereign, and that Christ, as He is God, is absolutely sovereign, for it is most evident by the works of God, that his understanding and power are infinite; for he that hath made all things out of nothing, and upholds, and governs, and manages all things every moment, in all ages, without growing weary, must be of infinite power. (WJE, 2.107)

In the person of Christ are conjoined absolute sovereignty and perfect resignation. This is another unparalleled conjunction. Christ, as he is God, is the absolute sovereign of the world; the sovereign disposer of all events.... [Thus,] the decrees of God are all his sovereign decrees; and the work of creation, and all God's works of providence, are his sovereign works. It is he that worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will. Col. 1:16–17: "By him, and through him, and to him, are all things." John 5:17: "The Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Matt. 8:3: "I will, be thou clean" (ibid., 1.682).

The sovereignty of God is his ability and authority to do whatever pleases him: whereby he doth according to his will in the armies of heaven and amongst the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him what dost thou? The following things belong to the sovereignty of God: (1) Supreme, universal and infinite Power; whereby he is able to do what he pleases.... (2) That he has supreme authority; absolute and most perfect right to do what he wills, without subjection to any superior authority or any derivation of authority from any other, or limitation by any distinct independent authority, either superior, equal, or inferior.... (3) That his Will is supreme, underived, and independent on any thing without himself; being in every thing determined by His own counsel, having no other rule but his own wisdom; his Will not being subject to or restrained by the will of any other, and other wills being perfectly subject to His. (4) That his Wisdom, which determines His Will is supreme, perfect, underived, self-sufficient, and independent... It is the glory and greatness of the Divine Sovereign that His Will is determined by his own infinite, all-sufficient wisdom in everything; and is in nothing at all directed either by inferior wisdom, or by no wisdom; whereby it would become senseless arbitrariness, determining and acting without reason, design, or end. (ibid., 1.71)

Charles Hodge

The same doctrine is involved in the absolute dependence of all things on God, and in his absolute sovereignty over them. "Thou, even thou, art Jehovah alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all" (Neh. 9:6). "By Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" (Col. 1:16–17). "Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. 4:11). The all things spoken of in these passages is made to include everything out of God. There can, therefore, be no preexisting matter, existing independently of his will. Everything out of God is said to owe its existence to his will. (ST, 1.X.3)

It is enough for us to know that God does govern all his creatures and all their actions, and that his government while absolutely efficacious is infinitely wise and good, directed to secure the highest ends, and perfectly consistent with his own perfections and with the nature of his creatures.

The Scriptures are full of this doctrine. God uses the nations with the absolute control that a man uses a rod or a staff. They are in his hands, and He employs them to accomplish his purposes. He breaks them in pieces as a potter's vessel, or He exalts them to greatness, according to his good pleasure.

The Bible no less clearly teaches that God exercises a controlling power over the free acts of men, as well as over their external circumstances. This is true of all their acts, good and evil. It is asserted in general terms, that his dominion extends over their whole inward life, and especially over their good acts.

With regard to the sinful acts of men, the Scriptures teach that they are so under the control of God that they can occur only by his permission and in execution of his purposes. He so guides them in the exercise of their wickedness that the particular forms of its manifestation are determined by his will, (ibid., 1.XI.2)

Karl Barth

God the Father as the ruling Creator is obviously not an oppressor, and Christ as a subject creature is obviously not oppressed. There is nothing here which need frighten him. There is nothing here which need cause him to flee or rebel. To be wholly and unreservedly under the universal lordship of God, to be wholly and unreservedly a creaturely subject, is not in any sense a constraint, a misfortune, an outrage or a humiliation for the man who as a Christian can see actualized in Jesus Christ both the lordship of God and also the subordination of the creature. (CD, part 3, 241)

J. I. Packer

As our Maker, he owns us, and as our Owner, he has a right to dispose of us. He has, therefore, a right to make laws for us and to reward us according to whether or not we keep them. In most modern states, the legislature and the judiciary are divided, so that the judge does not make the laws he administers; but in the ancient world this was not so, and it is not so with God. He is both Lawgiver and Judge. (KG, 141)

The making known of God's name, that is, as always in Scripture, his nature and character, is a basic theme in Exodus. In chapter 3, God had declared his name as "I am who I am" or "I am" simply, and in chapter 6, as "Jehovah." These names spoke of him as self-existing, self-determining, and sovereign, (ibid., 168)

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY

Many objections have been leveled against God's sovereignty. While most of these come from outside of theism, recently neotheists have offered objections from within a broad theistic perspective. While nontheistic views have already been addressed (see Volume 1, chapter 2), theistic protests to their view of sovereignty and free choice will largely be the focus of concern here.

Objection One—Based Upon Prayer for God's Will to Be Done

Neotheist John Sanders wrote,

Finally, in that most familiar of prayers, the Lord's Prayer, Jesus instructs us to pray that the Father's will be done on earth as it is in heaven (Matt. 6:10). Requesting that God's will be done recognizes that God's sovereignty has not been realized yet.... There is an eschatological element to the divine project, for not everything happens on earth as the Father desires. We are to work and pray for God's will to be done in our lives now and in the age to come. But it is not yet a complete reality in our world. This Jesus well knew. (GWR, 114–15)

Response to Objection One

Actually, Sanders' qualified use of "not yet" answers his own objection. Of course, God's sovereign will is not yet completely accomplished on earth; He only willed that it would be so in the end. Thus, there is nothing in this or any other passage of Scripture to hint that in the end the complete, sovereign will of God will fail.

The many passages cited above affirm the contrary. For instance, "Our God is in heaven; he does whatever pleases him" (Ps. 115:3). Again, "The LORD does whatever pleases him, in the heavens and on the earth, in the seas and all their depths" (Ps. 135:6).

Objection Two—Based Upon Humankind's Dominion

Using Genesis 1:28, another neotheist, Clark Pinnock, argues,

In a world reflecting a triune community, God does not monopolize the power. Were he to do so, there could be no created order, certainly not a dynamic one with free agents, and not one producing love and communion.... [Hence,] to achieve that kind of creation, God needs to deploy his power in more subtle ways. Though no power can stand against him, God wills the existence of creatures with the power of self-determination. This means that God is a superior power who does not cling to his right to dominate and control but who voluntarily gives creatures room to flourish.... [So,] by inviting them to have dominion over the world (for example), God willingly surrenders power and makes possible a partnership with the creature. (OG, 113)

Response to Objection Two

One problem here is the failure to see that a God with infallible foreknowledge can sovereignly will to accomplish things through the free will He gives to His creatures. Just the fact that God infallibly knows what each creature will do with his freedom in advance is sufficient to assure that He has complete sovereign control over every event and the final outcome (see chapter 2). Otherwise, He would not have willed to create such a world; this is to say nothing of the power that God has to persuade and even overrule free choices, which even neotheists admit God does on occasion (see Boyd, GP, 34).

Another way to pinpoint the difficulty is to note that the neotheistic objection seems to be based on the idea that God cannot give power to free creatures without giving away power. This is a denial of infinite power, for when an infinitely powerful Being exercises power, He does not have only a finite amount of power remaining; He still has infinite power. God does not cease being an infinite power by giving us power any more than He ceases being a Creator by making a creation. Likewise, He is not transformed into less than completely sovereign by giving creatures the power of free choice.

In short, God gives power to creatures without giving it away, for He is the primary Cause, and free choice is only a secondary cause. All effects preexist in their primary cause; as a result, we can see that God is in ultimate and complete control of the entire universe through the causes He has produced, including free causes. Again, as Aquinas put it,

When something moves itself [in an act of free will], it is not precluded that it is moved by another from whom it has this very ability to which it moves itself. And therefore it is not contrary to liberty that God is the cause of the act of free will. (OE, 11)

Objection Three—Based Upon Alleged Limited Foreknowledge

Neotheists claim that God does not have infallible foreknowledge of future free acts; since this has already been discussed (in chapter 2), it will only be briefly summarized here. At the heart of the neotheistic view of limited omniscience is this reasoning:

- (1) God infallibly knows whatever is possible to know.
- (2) It is not possible to infallibly know future free acts.
- (3) Therefore, God does not infallibly know future free acts.

Response to Objection Three

Classical theists have no difficulty with the logical form of this basic argument about God's omniscience. Of course, God cannot know the impossible; the disagreement is with the content of the second premise, namely, that it is not possible to infallibly know any future free acts. Classical theists contend that the defense given for this premise is seriously lacking. An examination of each of neotheism's arguments for the nature of free choice will reveal why (see chapter 8).

Objection Four—Based Upon the Nature of Free Choice

The basis of the neotheist's objection to God's complete sovereignty (control) is that people are free in a libertarian sense of having the ability to choose otherwise. However, many strong Calvinists (see Volume 3, chapter 3) do not grant this definition of free will, and even if one accepts it, neotheists have not demonstrated that this is incompatible with God's complete sovereignty.

According to this reasoning,

- (1) Free acts (in the libertarian sense) are those that could have been otherwise.
- (2) God's infallible knowledge of events means they cannot be otherwise (for if they could, then God would have been mistaken and not infallible in His knowledge).
- (3) Hence, infallible knowledge of free acts is impossible.

Response to Objection Four

In reply, this conclusion can be challenged in at least two ways.

First, it assumes a particular view of free choice called libertarianism that not all theists accept. Many, particularly in the strong Calvinistic tradition, argue that free acts are "doing what one desires." God is capable of giving free agents the desires He decrees; hence, future free acts in this sense can be free and yet determined and, therefore, infallibly known in advance.

Second, classical theists in the tradition of the medieval Fathers—the early Augustine, Anselm, and Aquinas—point out that there is no contradiction involved in claiming that (1) a future free act is determined from the relationship of God's infallible foreknowledge, and yet (2) also free when viewed from the relationship of our free choice (in the sense of the power to do otherwise). Thus, infallible foreknowledge and free choice are not contradictory, for the law of noncontradiction demands that to be contradictory, two propositions must affirm and deny the same thing at the same time and in the same relationship. In this case, one and the same event is determined in one relationship, but not determined in a different relationship—one in relation to God's knowledge, and the other in relation to our free choice.

Augustine's Response

As to the relation between God's absolute and unchangeable foreknowledge and man's free will, the early Augustine held that God's "foreknowledge cannot be deceived" (CG, 5.10), for God infallibly foreknows exactly how we are going to use our free choice. Thus, "the conclusion is that we are by no means under compulsion to abandon free choice in favor of divine foreknowledge, nor need we deny—God forbid!—that God knows the future, as a condition for holding free choice" (ibid.). Hence,

A man does not sin because God foreknew that he would sin. Nay, it cannot be doubted but that it is the man himself who sins when he does sin, because He, whose foreknowledge is infallible, foreknew ... that the man himself would sin, who if he wills not, sins not. But if he shall not will to sin, even this did God foreknow, (ibid.)

Anselm's Response

Anselm argued that God's omniscience includes infallible foreknowledge of everything, including free acts: "He foreknows every future event. But what God foreknows will necessarily occur in the same manner as He foreknows it to occur" (TIR, 153). "God, who foresees what you are willingly going to do, foreknows that your will is not compelled or prevented by anything else; hence this activity of the will is free" (ibid., 154).

Anselm hastened to point out that God's necessary foreknowledge does not make the event necessary: "Although He foreknows all future events, nevertheless He does not foreknow every future event as occurring by necessity, [for] He foreknows that some things are going to occur through the free will of rational creatures” (ibid., 158). Also, “He sees only what is true—whether this results from necessity or from freedom” (ibid., 161). Consequently, “God, who knows all truth and only truth, sees all things just as they are—whether they be free or necessary; and, conversely, as He sees them so they are” (ibid., 159). Thus, God’s knowledge of everything, including future free acts, is “necessary,” “unchangeable,” “eternal,” and “immutable” (ibid., 162–63).

Thomas Aquinas’s Response

God is the efficient Cause of all things, and all effects preexist in their efficient cause; thus, whatever exists must preexist in God. He knows Himself perfectly, and to know Himself perfectly entails knowing all of the various kinds of perfection in Himself, as well as those who can participate in His likeness. Therefore, it follows that God knows whatever exists or will exist perfectly insofar as they all preexist in Him (ST, Ia.14.5).

God knows everything in one eternal Now, including the past, present, and future, and He knows the future before it happens in time. So when time changes, God’s knowledge does not change, since He knew in advance it would change. In other words, God knows what we know, but not in the way we know it; that is, in successive time frames. God knows the whole of time from (in) eternity, but He knows what is before and what is after the present momentum (now) of human history (ibid., Ia.14.15). He knows the whole series of temporal moments in His one eternal Now.

God does not know things sequentially, since He is timeless and knows all things eternally at once. Nor can God know things inferentially, for He is simple and knows all things through the oneness of Himself (ibid., Ia.14.7). Therefore, God does not have to wait for things to happen before He can know them: He knows them eternally in Himself as the primary Cause of all things, including the power of free choice. In brief, God knows the created effects in Himself, but not through other things in a discursive way (ibid., Ia.14.7 ad 2). He knows them this way because, again, all effects preexist in their first Cause.

God not only knows all things in and through Himself, but He also causes all things by His knowledge, for God causes all things by His being. His Being is the cause of all other beings, and God’s Being and His knowledge are identical. Hence, God causes all things by His knowledge, including future free choices (ibid., Ia.14.8).

Further, God’s knowledge is not simply of the actual; He also knows the potential. He knows both what is and what could be, for God can know whatever is real in any way it can be known. Now, both the actual and the potential are real—only the impossible has no reality (ibid., Ia.14.9). Thus, God cannot know what is impossible to know, since contradictions do not fall under the omniscience of God. However, God can know future contingents; that is, things that are dependent on free choice. The future is a potential that preexists in God, and He knows whatever exists in Himself as the Cause of those things (ibid., Ia.14.13).

Therefore, as the omniscient Being, God necessarily knows true future contingents. This He can do because He knows necessarily that what will be must be; that is, if it will be and God knows it, then what God knows about what will be, must happen. The omniscient Mind cannot be wrong about what it knows; therefore, the statement that “everything known by God must necessarily be” is true if it refers to the statement of the truth of God’s knowledge, but it is false if it refers to the necessity of the contingent events (ibid., Ia.14.4).

In summary, God has infallible knowledge from all eternity of everything that would ever occur, including all free actions. This infallible knowledge does not diminish the freedom of the creature, since God knew for sure (i.e., determined) what they would freely do (i.e., by free acts). Consequently, no contradiction is involved with God's complete control of the world in advance; He has absolute certainty of how everything will turn out, including our free choices.

Objection Five—Based Upon the Presence of Evil

Finally, one objection from outside theism: If God is sovereign and can do whatever He pleases, then why is there evil in the world? Surely, a God who is all-powerful could eliminate evil, and a God who is all-good would want to do so. Yet evil is not eradicated—it is alive and well on planet earth. Hence, it would seem to follow that no such sovereign God exists.

Response to Objection Five

In reply, the traditional theist notes several things.

First, the logic of this argument fails, for simply that God has not yet vanquished evil does not mean He never will. Indeed, according to Scripture, God will eventually defeat evil (see Rev. 21–22).

Second, God's sovereignty does not mean He can do anything; He is a good Sovereign, not a tyrannical one. God must act in accordance with His unchangeably good nature, and He must act in accordance with His infinite wisdom. However, an infinitely good and wise Being is in a much better position than finite and evil beings to know what is the best way to achieve the best world.

Third, since God in His infinite goodness and His wisdom has granted human beings the power of free choice, He cannot violate this without a contradiction. As we have seen, forced freedom is not freedom at all; hence, even an all-powerful God cannot do what is contradictory, and it is contradictory to force a creature to act freely.

In summation, God is sovereign, but in His sovereignty He has willed that we are free. Thus, Jesus mourned, “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing” (Matt. 23:37, emphasis added). Likewise, Jesus said to the Jews, “You are not willing to come to me that you may have life” (John 5:40, emphasis added). As to why God has allowed so much evil and so long, Peter wrote, “The Lord is not slow in keeping his promise, as some understand slowness. He is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance” (2 Peter 3:9). In short, God is patient and He desires all to repent, but in the end God will defeat evil (1 Cor. 15:24–28; Rev. 21:4). In fact, His nature, as all-good and all-powerful, guarantees it, for an all-good God will defeat evil, and an all-powerful God can defeat evil.

CONCLUSION

The biblical, theological, and historical foundation of God's complete and sovereign control over all human events—past, present, and future—stands firm. Challenges both from within and without are easily answered. Even without the exercise of His persuasive influence on free creatures, God could control the destiny of all things simply by His infallible foreknowledge of how every free creature will choose to exercise freedom.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

GOD'S PROVIDENCE IN CREATION

Providence is related to other activities of God but should be distinguished from them. God's sovereignty or governance (see chapter 23) denotes the fact of His control of all things, but His providence is the means by which He controls everything.

God is not only the Producer of creation, but He is also the Preserver of it (see chapter 22). Further, He not only produced it and preserves it, but He also provides for it. The contrast can be charted as follows:

- (1) Creation—explains the world's existence (its coming to be);
- (2) Preservation—explains the world's continuance (its continuing to be);
- (3) Providence—explains the world's control (its direction of being).

THE DEFINITION OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE

The word providence comes from the Latin pro and video, meaning “foresight,” and by that “a careful arrangement prepared beforehand for the accomplishment of predetermined ends” (A. A. Hodge, OT, 258). Although providence is sometimes used to include God's sustenance and preservation of the universe, it is here used of how He governs it. As Archibald Alexander Hodge (1823–1886) put it, providence is the means by which He continually controls and directs the actions of all his creatures thus preserved, so that he never violates the law of their several natures, yet he infallibly causes all actions and events singular and universal to occur according to the eternal and immutable plan embraced in his decree, (ibid., 262)

A. H. Strong said, “Providence is that continuous agency of God by which he makes all the events of the physical and moral universe fulfill the original design with which he created it” (ST, 419).

God's providence relates to the means by which He controls His creation so as to accomplish His sovereign will for it. It also speaks of His care for His creatures in bringing about His purposes. This care is both general and particular, manifested in the universe as a whole and in each part of the universe specifically. It extends on earth from the tiniest particle of matter to the pinnacle of God's creation—human beings.

By God's infinite wisdom, He established a definite goal and will use the best means to achieve it. Because of His infinite goodness, He makes certain He will do the best for His creatures, and infinite righteousness makes certain that all is governed rightly, punishing evil and rewarding good. Providence is the means by which this is executed in the universe.

Providence stands between two extremes: fatalism and indeterminism. The former maintains certainty but denies freedom, while the latter maintains spontaneity but denies certainty. Divine providence, however, maintains both certainty and liberty.

THE CHARACTERISTICS OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE

Within the context of the Christian theistic worldview, providence takes on seven characteristics. It is

- (1) personal,
- (2) thoughtful,
- (3) careful,
- (4) universal,
- (5) particular,
- (6) effectual, and
- (7) supernatural.

This is so because it is exercised by a personal, thoughtful, careful, and powerful God who is interested in His creation as a whole and in each particular part of it.

Providence is personal because God is a personal Being who is concerned about the persons and things He has made.

Providence is thoughtful because God is an intelligent Person who takes thought in the care of His creation.

Providence is careful because God is a loving Person who cares for His creatures.

Providence is universal because God is all-knowing and all-loving and, hence, He knows and cares for all He has made.

Providence is particular because in God's omniscience nothing escapes notice of His omnibenevolent care.

Providence is effectual because God is omnipotent, and nothing hinders the accomplishment of His will. He can do anything that is possible to do.

Providence is supernatural because the all-powerful God exists beyond the natural world and is able to intervene in it (see Volume 1, chapter 3).

PROVIDENCE CONTRASTED WITH OTHER WORLDVIEWS

Providence is defined differently by different worldviews (see Volume 1, chapter 2). A God who has no personality or intelligence (such as in many forms of pantheism) has no personal providential care for the universe. Likewise, a God who does not perform miracles exercises no supernatural providential care for His creation. A finite God is limited in what kind of providential care He performs for His creation. In short, only a theistic God has general, special, miraculous, and totally effective providence of all creation. Generally, the differences may be stated as follows.

Theism and Providence

Again, within the context of a Christian theistic worldview, providence takes on several characteristics: It is personal, thoughtful, careful, universal, particular, supernatural, and completely effective. This is so because it is exercised by a God characterized by these attributes who is deeply interested in His creation.

Neotheism and Providence

Neotheism (or “openness theology”) is a significant deviation from the classical theistic view of providence, since it insists that God does not have infallible foreknowledge of future free events. If this were so, then His ability to providentially preplan events for the care of His creation would be limited in important ways, since God too would be surprised by events that happen as a result of human choices (see chapter 8).

Deism and Providence

Most traditional deists hold to all the characteristics of providence that theists do, except sustenance in existence and supernatural care, since traditional deism denies that miracles occur. This is why deists like Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) could call for prayer at the First Continental Congress. It is also why Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) could speak of God’s providence in the Declaration of Independence, saying, “For the support of this Declaration, with firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor.” Pondering the incredible design in nature, Jefferson wrote, “It is impossible, I say, for the human mind not to believe that there is in all this, design, cause and effect up to an ultimate cause, a Fabricator of all things from matter and motion, their Preserver and Regulator.”

Finite Godism and Providence

As deism is a truncated form of theism, modern finite godism is a truncated form of deism. In general, finite godists hold to deism minus God’s omnipotence, though some question also His complete omnibenevolence. John Stuart Mill (1806–1873) spoke of God as “a Being of great but limited power, how or by what limited we cannot even conjecture; of great, and perhaps unlimited intelligence, but perhaps, also, more narrowly limited than his power.” This God “desires, and pays some regard to, the happiness of his creatures, but who seems to have other motives of action which he cares more for, and who can hardly be supposed to have created the universe for that purpose alone” (TER, 194). “If the maker of the world can [do] all that he will, he wills misery, and there is no escape from the conclusion” (ibid., 37).

Atheism and Providence

Strictly speaking, atheism denies all providential activity, since it does not believe there is a God of any kind who can exercise care for the world. What theists call providence, atheists call luck, chance, coincidence, or even fate. They point to the fact that highly improbable events do occur—the unlikelihood of getting six sixes on the first roll of six dice does not mean it never happens. The same is allegedly true no matter the odds; atheists claim that unusual results can be obtained on the first “roll” in the universe as well.

Polytheism and Providence

Polytheists fall into two broad categories: those who are connected with pantheism (see next) and those who are not. Since the latter deny any ultimate good or personal force in the universe, they are often left with some form of fate. This was particularly evident in the Greek tragedies, where gods, like Zeus, encounter a fate beyond themselves. Fate, so conceived, is a determined destiny beyond any individual's control, whether a mortal human or an immortal god.

Pantheism and Providence

There are many forms of pantheism (see Volume 1, chapter 2), and what is called "providence" by theists is understood differently by different types of pantheism.

For absolute pantheism, as represented by the Greek philosopher Parmenides and the Advaita Vedanta school of Hinduism, all is absolutely one, and everything else is an illusion.

For emanational pantheism, as represented by the third-century philosopher Plotinus, everything flows from God as a flower unfolds from a seed. "Providence" can mean no more than the absolutely predetermined flow of all things from God and back to God.

In the developmental pantheism of G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), the events of history are the inevitable unfolding manifestations of Absolute Spirit.

According to the modal pantheism of the rationalist Benedict Spinoza (1632–1677), all finite events are merely modes or moments in the thought of an infinite Being whose determined drive produces all things.

Multilevel pantheism, as expressed by Radhakrishnan's form of Hinduism, sees various levels, or God's determined manifestations, in the cycles of reincarnation.

Permeational pantheism, such as the impersonal Force of Taoism, penetrates all things. Zen Buddhism and the Star Wars movies of George Lucas exemplify this view, as does The Celestine Prophecy of James Redfield, who replaces personal providences with synchronicity.

Those like Plotinus, Spinoza, Christian Science, and others that see a Mind present within the universe often have a form of immanent providence. That is, contrary to theism, which affirms a transcendent God who exercises providential care over the universe, these forms of pantheism have a Mind working within the universe. Hence, unlike atheists, all is not the result of chance, but the working of Intelligence within the world process. Hegel said this is manifest in the developmental outworking of Absolute Spirit in history.

No form of pantheism, however, allows for supernatural providence, since in pantheism there is no supernatural power beyond the world who can intervene in it. Furthermore, omnibenevolence and omnipotence are not attributes of God in most forms of pantheism; therefore, effectual and loving care are not characteristics of "providence" as understood by them.

Even some pantheists who do not attribute Mind to God speak of a "cosmic synchronicity" in life. James Redfield's so-called "First Insight" claims that "a new spiritual awakening is occurring in human culture—an awakening brought about by a critical mass of individuals who experience their lives as a spiritual unfolding, a journey in which we are led forward by mysterious coincidences." In the "Seventh Insight," he adds, "Knowing our personal mission further enhances the flow of mysterious coincidences as we are guided toward our destinies" (CP).

The problem emerges when one tries to make any sense out of terms like a "forward" journey toward our "destinies" when there is no intelligent, personal God who knows the future in advance in order to make it possible to explain all these synchronistic "coincidences" in life. It would seem that this can happen only if a theistic God exists.

Panentheism and Providence

One final worldview is positioned between pantheism and theism, called panentheism (lit. “God in all”). In some forms, panentheism holds more promise as a basis for the concept of providence, but only within the confines of a finite and morally progressing God. This view originated with Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947), was continued by Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000), and is found in the works of Schubert Ogden, John Cobb, and Lewis Ford. It is also called “process theology” and “bipolar theism.”

According to this perspective, God has two poles, one actual and the other potential. One pole is God’s Mind, and the other is His Body (the entire universe). Of course, God is actually finite; consequently, He is neither omnipotent nor omnibenevolent. However, He is super-intelligent and morally progressive; thus, as He unfolds in His own self-creation, God is doing His best to maximize good in the universe.

One expression of “providence” within this camp explains it in terms of “resonance” (Korsmeyer, “RMR” in PS, 195). A providential act of God supposedly is not characterized by any supernatural intervention from without, nor by any specially preplanned event using infallible foreknowledge and the special timing of events. Rather, it results from a high degree of resonance between God’s aim and human aims (ibid., 195–96).

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR GOD’S PROVIDENCE

The biblical basis of God’s providence is both direct and indirect. The indirect support comes from the very nature of a theistic God. Those properties for which biblical support has already been provided (see part 1) include primarily the following three attributes of God: omniscience (with omnisapience), omnipotence, and omnibenevolence.

The Extent of God’s Providence

Some claim that God has only general providence over the world, but not over every particular in it. However, God’s providence must be both general and particular (see immediately below). General providence refers to God’s superintendence over the general flow of events, and particular (or special) providence relates to His superintendence over each thing. These two are interrelated and inseparable.

That God’s providence for His creation is particular, and not only general, is emphasized by the following:

- (1) God can’t control the general without controlling the particular.
- (2) God’s love for the general prompts concern for the smallest detail that affects the general.
- (3) The Bible confirms particular providence: Job 23:10; 2 Corinthians 2:14; Ephesians 3:1.

A general and a special Providence cannot be two different modes of divine operation.... A General Providence is special because it secures general results by the control of every event, great and small, leading to that result. A Special Providence is general because it specially controls all individual beings and actions in the universe. (A. A. Hodge, OT, 266)

Since God is infinite in knowledge, wisdom, and power (see part 1), it follows that His providence must be particular as well as general. He not only knows all things, general and particular, but in His omnisapience (see chapter 9) He knows the best way to utilize them in accomplishing His overall purpose.

The Spheres of God's Providence

The direct support for God's providence is manifested in numerous passages of Scripture. These fall into various categories, revealing God's complete and meticulous providence for every minute part of His creation.

Two Great Passages on Providence

First, there is Psalm 104:1–23:

Praise the LORD, O my soul. O LORD my God, you are very great; you are clothed with splendor and majesty. He wraps himself in light as with a garment; he stretches out the heavens like a tent and lays the beams of his upper chambers on their waters. He makes the clouds his chariot and rides on the wings of the wind. He makes winds his messengers, flames of fire his servants. He set the earth on its foundations; it can never be moved. You covered it with the deep as with a garment; the waters stood above the mountains. But at your rebuke the waters fled, at the sound of your thunder they took to flight; they flowed over the mountains, they went down into the valleys, to the place you assigned for them. You set a boundary they cannot cross; never again will they cover the earth. He makes springs pour water into the ravines; it flows between the mountains. They give water to all the beasts of the field; the wild donkeys quench their thirst. The birds of the air nest by the waters; they sing among the branches. He waters the mountains from his upper chambers; the earth is satisfied by the fruit of his work. He makes grass grow for the cattle, and plants for man to cultivate—bringing forth food from the earth: wine that gladdens the heart of man, oil to make his face shine, and bread that sustains his heart. The trees of the LORD are well watered, the cedars of Lebanon that he planted. There the birds make their nests; the stork has its home in the pine trees. The high mountains belong to the wild goats; the crags are a refuge for the coneys. The moon marks off the seasons, and the sun knows when to go down. You bring darkness, it becomes night, and all the beasts of the forest prowl. The lions roar for their prey and seek their food from God. The sun rises, and they steal away; they return and lie down in their dens. Then man goes out to his work, to his labor until evening.

A perusal of this passage reveals that God's providence extends to

- (1) the prearrangement of the universe for the development of life (vv. 1–9);
- (2) the operation of natural processes for the perpetuation of life (vv. 10–23). This includes:
  - (a) springs of water to quench the thirst of animals (vv. 10–11);
  - (b) trees for birds to nest in (v. 12);
  - (c) rain and snow on the mountains to irrigate the earth (v. 13);
  - (d) food for animals and people (vv. 14, 16–17);
  - (e) the fruit of the vine and grain for humankind's existence and happiness (v. 15);
  - (f) mountains for the refuge of animals (v. 18);
  - (g) sun and moon for seasons (v. 19);
  - (h) night for nocturnal animals (vv. 20–21);
  - (i) day so that people can see to work (v. 23)

All these are part of God's general providence for all His creatures.

Second, there is Matthew 6:25–33. This passage speaks of providence for both subhuman creation and humankind, but especially the latter.

Therefore I tell you, do not worry about your life, what you will eat or drink; or about your body, what you will wear. Is not life more important than food, and the body more important than clothes? Look at the birds of the air; they do not sow or reap or store away in barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not much more valuable than they? Who of you by worrying can add a single hour to his life? And why do you worry about clothes? See how the lilies of the field grow. They do not labor or spin. Yet I tell you that not even Solomon in all his splendor was dressed like one of these. If that is how God clothes the grass of the field, which is here today and tomorrow is thrown into the fire, will he not much more clothe you, O you of little faith? So do not worry, saying, "What shall we eat?" or "What shall we drink?" or "What shall we wear?" For the pagans run after all these things, and your heavenly Father knows that you need them. But seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things will be given to you as well.

It is clear from this text that God cares about our need for water, food, clothes and shelter (v. 25); His care for birds is used as an example (v. 26). Likewise, we need not worry about our need for clothes (v. 28), for God arrays the lilies in splendor (vv. 28–29), and, thus, we should have faith that He will care for our need for clothes and shelter (v. 30). Further, God providentially provides for human need for food and drink (vv. 31–32), for "your heavenly Father knows that you need them." Therefore, we should seek God and His righteousness, knowing all these things will added to us.

Numerous Other Passages on Providence

God is provident over every aspect of creation: This includes the natural, animal, and human kingdoms, as well as every detail within these domains. The extent of providence is manifest in all the following areas.

Providence Over the Natural World

"He moves mountains without their knowing it and overturns them in his anger. He shakes the earth from its place and makes its pillars tremble" (Job 9:5–6).

He says to the snow, "Fall on the earth," and to the rain shower, "Be a mighty downpour." So that all men he has made may know his work, he stops every man from his labor. The animals take cover; they remain in their dens. The tempest comes out from its chamber, the cold from the driving winds. The breath of God produces ice, and the broad waters become frozen. He loads the clouds with moisture; he scatters his lightning through them. At his direction they swirl around over the face of the whole earth to do whatever he commands them. He brings the clouds to punish men, or to water his earth and show his love. (Job 37:6–13)

"The LORD has established his throne in heaven, and his kingdom rules over all" (Ps. 103:19). "For you, O LORD, are the Most High over all the earth" (Ps. 97:9). "The LORD does whatever pleases him, in the heavens and on the earth, in the seas and all their depths. He makes clouds rise from the ends of the earth; he sends lightning with the rain and brings out the wind from his storehouses" (Ps. 135:6–7). "He covers the sky with clouds; he supplies the earth with rain and makes grass grow on the hills ... He sends his word and melts them; he stirs up his breezes, and the waters flow" (Ps. 147:8–18). "He causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Matt. 5:45). "God clothes the grass of the field, which is here today and tomorrow is thrown into the fire" (Matt. 6:30). "He has not left himself without testimony: He has shown kindness by giving you rain from heaven and crops in their seasons; he provides you with plenty of food and fills your hearts with joy” (Acts 14:17). God “works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will” (Eph. 1:11).

Providence Over the Animal World

“Their homes are safe and free from fear; the rod of God is not upon them. Their bulls never fail to breed; their cows calve and do not miscarry. They send forth their children as a flock; their little ones dance about” (Job 21:9–11). “The lions roar for their prey and seek their food from God” (Ps. 104:21). “These all look to you to give them their food at the proper time. When you give it to them, they gather it up; when you open your hand, they are satisfied with good things” (Ps. 104:27–28). “He provides food for the cattle and for the young ravens when they call” (Ps. 147:9). “Look at the birds of the air; they do not sow or reap or store away in barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them” (Matt. 6:26).

Providence Over Human Affairs in General

“Let the heavens rejoice, let the earth be glad; let them say among the nations, ‘The LORD reigns!’ ” (1 Chron. 16:31). “All the peoples of the earth are regarded as nothing. He does as he pleases with the powers of heaven and the peoples of the earth. No one can hold back his hand or say to him: ‘What have you done?’ ” (Dan. 4:35). “God is the King of all the earth” (Ps. 47:7; cf. Isa. 10:12–15; Dan. 2:21; Dan 4:25).

Providence Over the Affairs of Nations

“He makes nations great, and destroys them; he enlarges nations, and disperses them” (Job 12:23). “Dominion belongs to the LORD and he rules over the nations” (Ps. 22:28). “He rules forever by his power, his eyes watch the nations—let not the rebellious rise up against him” (Ps. 66:7). “The king’s heart is in the hand of the LORD; he directs it like a watercourse wherever he pleases” (Prov. 21:1). “From one man he made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth; and he determined the times set for them and the exact places where they should live” (Acts 17:26).

Providence Over Humankind’s Lot in Life

“The LORD brings death and makes alive; he brings down to the grave and raises up” (1 Sam. 2:6). “The LORD said to Samuel, ‘How long will you mourn for Saul, since I have rejected him as king over Israel? Fill your horn with oil and be on your way; I am sending you to Jesse of Bethlehem. I have chosen one of his sons to be king’ ” (1 Sam. 16:1). “As for God, his way is perfect; the word of the LORD is flawless. He is a shield for all who take refuge in him” (Ps. 18:30). “No one from the east or the west or from the desert can exalt a man. But it is God who judges: He brings one down, he exalts another” (Ps. 75:6–7). “Your eyes saw my unformed body. All the days ordained for me were written in your book before one of them came to be” (Ps. 139:16). “In his heart a man plans his course, but the LORD determines his steps” (Prov. 16:9). “I am the LORD, and there is no other; apart from me there is no God. I will strengthen you, though you have not acknowledged me” (Isa. 45:5). “He has brought down rulers from their thrones but has lifted up the humble” (Luke 1:52). “He has filled the hungry with good things but has sent the rich away empty” (Luke 1:53). “But when God, who set me apart from birth and called me by his grace, was pleased to reveal his Son in me so that I might preach him among the Gentiles, I did not consult any man” (Gal. 1:15–16). “Why, you do not even know what will happen tomorrow. What is your life? You are a mist that appears for a little while and then vanishes. Instead, you ought to say, ‘If it is the Lord’s will, we will live and do this or that’ ” (James 4:14–15).

Providence Over Seemingly Fortuitous Events

Nothing happens by chance in God’s universe; what appears to be “by chance” to us is preplanned by Him. Exodus 21:13 affirms that God even plans for “accidental” deaths: “However, if he does not do it intentionally, but God lets it happen, he is to flee to a place I will designate.” Even the roll of the dice is determined by God—Proverbs 16:33 informs us that “the lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the LORD.” Jesus said in Matthew 10:30, “The very hairs of your head are all numbered.”

Even evil events are permitted in God’s providence for a greater good. Joseph said to his brothers, who left him for dead, “You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives” (Gen. 50:20). No detail is too small for God’s concern.

Providence Over Humanity’s Free Acts

God’s providence covers even the free actions of His creatures (Ex. 12:36; 1 Sam. 24:9–15; Ps. 33:14–15; Prov. 21:1; 19:21; 20:24; 21:1; Jer. 10:23; Phil. 2:13). This includes good acts (which He prompts—Phil. 2:13; 4:13; 2 Cor. 12:9–10; Eph. 2:10; Gal. 5:22–25), and it includes evil acts (which He permits but does not produce—2 Sam. 16:10; 24:1; Ps. 136:10; Rom. 11:32; Acts 2:23; 3:18; 4:27–28; 1 Sam. 6:6; Ex. 7:13; 14:17; Isa. 66:4; 2 Thess. 2:11). God also restrains and controls evil acts (Ps. 66:10–12; Gen. 50:20; Isa. 10:5, 15), overruling them for our good (Gen. 50:20; Acts 3:13–15). Nothing is beyond God’s cognizance and ultimate control (see chapters 7 and 8).

Providence in Protection of the Righteous

God’s providence is also manifested in the preservation of His saints. The psalmist said, “I will lie down and sleep in peace, for you alone, O LORD, make me dwell in safety” (Ps. 4:8). David added, “My soul clings to you; your right hand upholds me. They who seek my life will be destroyed” (Ps. 63:8–9). Further, “He will not let your foot slip—he who watches over you will not slumber” (Ps. 121:3).

Providing for the Needs of His People

David said, “I was young and now I am old, yet I have never seen the righteous forsaken or their children begging bread” (Ps. 37:25). Paul assured the Philippians, “My God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 4:19). Indeed, the psalmist confessed to God, “You open your hand and satisfy the desires of every living thing” (Ps. 145:16).

Providence in Answering Prayer

The providence of God is His usual way of answering our prayers. This is often manifest in His pre-timing of events to bring about unusual occurrences in response to our requests He wishes to honor. God, to Isaiah, said, “Before they call I will answer; while they are still speaking I will hear” (Isa. 65:24). Jesus reminded us, “Do not be like them [unbelievers], for your Father knows what you need before you ask him” (Matt. 6:8; cf. 6:32). As Isaiah confessed, “Since ancient times no one has heard, no ear has perceived, no eye has seen any God besides you, who acts on behalf of those who wait for him” (Isa. 64:4).

Providence in Exposing and Punishing the Wicked

God’s providence is also evident in His punishment of evil ones. “If he does not relent, [God] will sharpen his sword; he will bend and string his bow. He has prepared his deadly weapons; he makes ready his flaming arrows” (Ps. 7:12–13). Further, “On the wicked he will rain fiery coals and burning sulfur; a scorching wind will be their lot” (Ps. 11:6). Of course, sometimes the wicked prosper—at least for a time (Hab. 2:1f.)—yet God’s providence does not complete all His tasks within time; some await eternity, where all the wicked will receive their due (Rev. 20:11–14).

God’s Special Providence

Special providence is sometimes confused with miracles (see Volume 1, chapter 3). Both are unusual acts of God to preserve His creation and perpetuate His plan, but special acts of providence do not involve any direct supernatural intervention: No natural law is suspended to perform them. Normally, they are simply a matter of pre-timing natural events so as to produce an unusual effect. God causing strong winds to blow on the waters of the Red Sea so that Israel could cross may be an example of special providence (Ex. 14:21–22). Or, consider the wind blowing quail into the wilderness for the hungry Israelites (Num. 11:31–32), or Jesus’ disciples catching a great draught of fish (Luke 5:6). Also, avalanches have been known to occur from spring rains and form a natural but temporary dam in the Jordan, which God could have pre-timed so that Israel could cross it on foot (see Josh. 3:15–17).

Often answers to petitionary prayer fit into this category. Unanticipated gifts after praying for one’s financial needs are rarely if ever created ex nihilo—they usually come out of someone’s bank account. Even speedy or unusual recoveries from sickness are usually acts of special providence by which God uses a healthy mental attitude and the natural regenerative processes of the body. The casting of lots after prayer to determine God’s will as to which man should replace Judas the apostle may also be an example of special providence (Acts 1:23–26; cf. Prov. 16:33).

However, whether God indirectly works through natural law or directly intervenes in a supernatural act (such as the Virgin Birth or the resurrection of Christ), it is He who is ultimately responsible and who deserves the glory for it.

God’s Miraculous Providence

There are times when God deems it necessary to transcend a law of nature (see Volume 1, chapter 3) in order to exercise providential care for His creatures; the smiting of the wicked men of Sodom to preserve the lives of God’s servants is an instance of this (Gen. 19:1–29). The resurrection of Christ is a prime example, since it was necessary for our salvation (Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:12f.). The plagues by which the chosen people were enabled to get to the Promised Land and produce the promised Messiah contain numerous miracles. Even the magicians who emulated miracles by trickery admitted once: “This is the finger of God” (Ex. 8:19). Without miraculous intervention at many points, God could not have accomplished His plan to preserve His chosen people and provide salvation for the world (cf. Gen. 12:1–3; Gal. 4:4).

Some Qualifications on God's Providence

Some important distinction must be made for a proper understanding of God's providence. For one thing, He promises protection for the righteous, not for the presumptuous. For another, He provides for the needs of His creatures, but not all actually receive these provisions.

Protection, Not Presumption

The Scriptures make it clear that God's protection does not extend to every presumptuous act we commit. The psalmist wrote, "He will command his angels concerning you to guard you in all your ways; they will lift you up in their hands, so that you will not strike your foot against a stone" (Ps. 91:11–12). When the devil cited this text to Jesus, alleging that it guaranteed His protection if He jumped off the temple, Jesus rebuked his misinterpretation with these words: "It is also written: 'Do not put the Lord your God to the test' " (Matt. 4:7). The lesson is this: We can trust God's providence to care for us if we live reasonable lives according to His laws, but we should not presume upon God's providence to protect us if we take unnecessary risks.

Provision, Not Satisfaction

As is painfully evident to anyone aware of world conditions, not everyone on earth has adequate food, drink, clothes, and shelter. Is this evidence against God's general providence? The answer is clearly negative: That God has provided enough water, material for clothes, and shelter for everyone does not in and of itself guarantee that everyone gets it. It is a fact that even most countries that have vast numbers of people starving produce more food than is needed for the minimal requirements of all of their people.

A view from an airplane is a helpful perspective. One sees vast patches of blue water, far more than is necessary for human drink and cleansing. Then there are vast patches of green—most of it is edible, and it keeps on growing. The truth is that there is much more water and food than is needed for every person on earth.

What, then, is the problem? In some cases, it is the lack of proper human cultivation and conservation. Barren land can result from improper treatment or overuse.

Nevertheless, in spite of some poor usage of the land and water God has given, there is still more than enough food in the world to feed all the hungry. The issue is one of distribution. What is the bottleneck? Corruption. Human depravity, manifested in greed and the quest for power, hinders getting what God abundantly provided to all the stomachs of those who need it. So human lack is due not to a failure of God's providential provision, but to our sinfulness.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S PROVIDENCE

The theological basis for God's providence must be comprehended within a theistic worldview. A review of each paradigm (see above) on providence will set the stage for a better understanding.

Some Theological Arguments for Providence

The providence of God can be derived from a combination of other attributes, namely, His omniscience (and omnisapience), omnipotence, and omnibenevolence. Of course, God's sovereignty, which also flows from these attributes, is related to providence.

God's Sovereignty As a Basis for His Providence

Since the foundation for God's sovereignty has already been established (see chapter 23), we will proceed here to draw the logical conclusion from it. The argument for providence from God's sovereignty can be stated as follows:

- (1) God's sovereignty means He controls all things.
- (2) He who controls all can also provide for all things.
- (3) Hence, sovereignty guarantees the possibility of God's providential care for all things.

A God who can control everything can also provide for all things, since He has, by virtue of His complete control, the resources necessary to providentially provide for everything.

God's Omniscience As a Basis for His Providence

Another attribute necessary for God's complete providence is His omniscience. The reasoning goes like this:

- (1) A God who knows all knows what care His creation needs.
- (2) An omniscient God knows all things (see chapter 8).
- (3) An omniscient (all-wise) God knows the best way to care for everything (see chapter 9).
- (4) Therefore, an omniscient and omniscient God can exercise providence over all things in the best way possible.

God's Omnipotence as a Basis for His Providence

Another condition for God's providence is found in His omnipotence (see chapter 7). The logic can be stated in this way:

- (1) A God who has all power has the ability to meet all needs.
- (2) God has all power (i.e., He is omnipotent).
- (3) Thus, God has the ability to provide for the needs of all things.

It is one thing to know a need, and quite another to be able to fulfill it. A God who is both omniscient and omnipotent, as the God of the Bible is, can do both.

God's Omnibenevolence as a Basis for His Providence

Omniscience and omnipotence are the necessary conditions for complete providence, but they are not the sufficient condition for it. Providence means care, and complete providence means complete care. Thus, in order for God to be completely provident He must be completely caring. Because of this, it is necessary for God to be omnibenevolent (completely caring) in order for there to be complete providence. The thought process behind this can be summarized thus:

- (1) A God who is all-good has the desire to provide for all His creatures' needs.
- (2) Complete providence entails a God who desires to provide for all His creatures' needs.
- (3) Therefore, God has the desire to provide complete providence.

The Combined Argument for God's Complete Providence

The above reasoning provides both the necessary and sufficient condition for God's complete providential care over all His creation. Thus, combined, it goes like this:

- (1) An omnibenevolent God desires to provide complete providential care for all His creatures.
- (2) An omniscient God knows all the providential care that is needed for all His creatures.
- (3) An omnispient God knows the best way to provide this care.
- (4) An omnipotent God has the ability to execute all His desires that are possible.
- (5) Consequently, such a God will provide all providential care for all His creatures in the best way possible.

To summarize, any denial of God's full and complete providence is in principle a denial of one or more of these attributes of God, for if God is all-knowing, all-wise, all-powerful, and all-loving, then He will by nature be all caring.

In addition to the nature of God, other arguments for providence include the nature of created things, the order in the world, divine prediction (which is only possible if He is in control), God's blessing on good and judgment on evil; and the human conscience (which is based in the God-given moral law informing us that good should be sought and evil avoided).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR GOD'S PROVIDENCE

The doctrine of complete divine providence is firmly rooted in the teachings of the great fathers of the church, beginning from the earliest times.

The Early Fathers on God's Providence

Polycarp

O Lord God Almighty, the Father of Thy beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the knowledge of Thee, the God of angels and powers, and of every creature, and of the whole race of the righteous who live before Thee, I give Thee thanks that Thou hast counted me worthy of this day and this hour, that I should have a part in the number of Thy martyrs, in the cup of Thy Christ, to the resurrection of eternal life, both of soul and body, through the incorruption [imparted] by the Holy Ghost. Among whom may I be accepted this day before Thee as a fat and acceptable sacrifice, according as Thou, the ever-truthful God, hast foreordained, hast revealed beforehand to me, and now hast fulfilled. (EECS, 14 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, I)

Irenaeus

"Therefore the Father will excel in wisdom all human and angelic wisdom, because He is Lord, and Judge, and the Just One, and Ruler over all" (AH, 3.25.3 in ibid.).

The God, therefore, who does benevolently cause His sun to rise upon all, and sends rain upon the just and unjust, shall judge those who, enjoying His equally distributed kindness, have led lives not corresponding to the dignity of His bounty; but who have spent their days in wantonness and luxury, in opposition to His benevolence, and have, moreover, even blasphemed Him who has conferred so great benefits upon them, (ibid.)

Not a single thing that has been made or that will be made, escapes the knowledge of God. Hither, through his Providence, every single thing has obtained its nature, rank, number, and special quantity. Nothing whatever has been produced (or is produced) in vain or by accident. Instead, everything has been made with precise suitability and through the exercises of transcendent knowledge, (ibid., 2:26:3)

Lactantius

“There is no one, who possesses intelligence and uses reflection, who does not understand that it is one Being who both created all things and governs them with the same energy by which He created them” (DI, 1.3 in ibid., VII).

Clement of Alexandria

Nothing happens without the will of the Lord of the universe. It remains to say that such things happen without the prevention of God. For this alone saves both the providence and the goodness of God... Rather, we must be persuaded that He does not prevent those beings who cause them. Yet, He overrules for good the crimes of His enemies. (S, 4:12 in ibid., II)

Origen

After the resurrection a person will also learn the judgment of the Divine Providence on each individual thing. He will learn that among those events that happen to men, none occur by accident or chance, but in accordance with a plan so carefully considered and so stupend [sic] that it does not overlook even the number of hairs on the heads.... I speak not only of the saints, but perhaps of all human beings. A son will learn that the plan of this Providential government extends even to caring for the sale of two sparrows for a denarius. (DP, 2.11.5 in ibid.)

Novatian

We should not think that such an inexhaustible providence of God does not reach to even the very least of things. For the Lord says, “One of two sparrows will not fall without the will of the Father. For even the very hairs of your head are all numbered.” ... [Thus,] His care and providence did not permit even the clothes of the Israelites to “wear out.” ... Since He embraces all things and contains all things ... His care consequently extends to all things. (TCT, 8 in ibid.)

The Medieval Fathers on God’s Providence

Augustine

He left no part of this creation without its appropriate peace, for in that last and least of all His living things the entrails are wonderfully ordered—not to mention the beauty of birds’ wings, and the flowers of the fields and the leaves of trees. Can anyone believe that it was the will of God to exempt from the laws of His providence the rise and fall of political societies? (CG, 5.10)

Thomas Aquinas

Nothing “happens outside the order of the divine government,” for while “it is possible for an effect to happen outside the order of some particular cause, [it is] not possible outside the order of the universal cause” (ST, Ia.103.7). Even evil does not escape God’s sovereign control, for “from the very fact that from one point of view something seems to evade the order of divine providence considered in regard to one particular cause, it must necessarily come back to that order as regards some other cause” (ibid.).

Dearest Jesus! I know well that every perfect gift, and above all others that of chastity, depends upon the most powerful assistance of Thy Providence, and that without Thee a creature can do nothing. Therefore, I pray Thee to defend, with Thy grace, chastity and purity in my soul as well as in my body. (“PP”)

It is necessary to attribute providence to God. For all the good that is in created things has been created by God, as was shown above (Question 6, Answer 4). In created things good is found not only as regards their substance, but also as regards their order towards an end and especially their last end, which, as was said above, is the divine goodness (Question 21, Answer 4). This good of order existing in things created, is itself created by God. Since, however, God is the cause of things by His intellect, and thus it behooves that the type of every effect should pre-exist in Him, as is clear from what has gone before (Question 19, Answer 4), it is necessary that the type of the order of things towards their end should pre-exist in the divine mind: and the type of things ordered towards an end is, properly speaking, providence. (ST, Ia.22.1)

In God Himself there can be nothing ordered towards an end, since He is the last end. This type of order in things towards an end is therefore in God called providence. Whence Boethius says (De Consol., 4, 6) that “Providence is the divine type itself, seated in the Supreme Ruler; which disposeth all things”: which disposition may refer either to the type of the order of things towards an end, or to the type of the order of parts in the whole [Question 21, Answer 4]. (ibid.)

Two things belong to providence—namely, the type of the order of things foreordained towards an end; and the execution of this order, which is called government. As regards the first of these, God has immediate providence over everything, because He has in His intellect the types of everything, even the smallest; and whatsoever causes He assigns to certain effects, He gives them the power to produce those effects. Whence it must be that He has beforehand the type of those effects in His mind. As to the second, there are certain intermediaries of God’s providence; for He governs things inferior by superior, not on account of any defect in His power, but by reason of the abundance of His goodness; so that the dignity of causality is imparted even to creatures [Answer 3]. (ibid.)

As is clear from what has been stated above (ibid., Ia.22. ad 3), Divine Providence produces effects through mediate causes. We can therefore consider the ordering of the effects in two ways. Firstly, as being in God Himself: and thus the ordering of the effects is called Providence. But if we consider this ordering as being in the mediate causes ordered by God to the production of certain effects, thus it has the nature of fate. This is what Boethius says (De Consol., 4): “Fate is worked out when Divine Providence is served by certain spirits; whether by the soul, or by all nature itself which obeys Him, whether by the heavenly movements of the stars, whether by the angelic power, or by the ingenuity of the demons, whether by some of these, or by all, the chain of fate is forged. (ibid., Ia.116. ad 2)

The Reformation and Post-Reformation Teachers on God’s Providence

John Calvin

He puts suffering first and the glories which are to follow second. It is clear that this order can neither be changed nor reversed.... Since God himself has ordained this conjunction, it is not for us to tear one part away from the other.... Hence we also know that we suffer not by chance but by the solid providence of God. (CC, 23.4)

The psalmist now comes to another commendation of God's providence as manifested in the beautiful arrangement by which the course of the sun and moon alternately succeed each other; for the diversity in their mutual changes is so far from producing confusion, that all must easily perceive the impossibility of finding any better method of distinguishing time. (ibid., Psalm 104:19)

The true doctrine of Providence has not only been obscured, but almost buried. If one falls among robbers, or ravenous beasts; if a sudden gust of wind at sea causes shipwreck; if one is struck down by the fall of a house or a tree; if another, when wandering through desert paths, meets with deliverance; or, after being tossed by the waves, arrives in port, and makes some wondrous hairbreadth escape from death—all these occurrences, prosperous as well as adverse, carnal sense will attribute to fortune. But [he who] has learned from the mouth of Christ that all the hairs of his head are numbered (Matt. 10:30), will look farther for the cause, and hold that all events whatsoever are governed by the secret counsel of God. With regard to inanimate objects again we must hold that though each is possessed of its peculiar properties, yet all of them exert their force only in so far as directed by the immediate hand of God. (ICR, 1.16.2)

First, then, let the reader remember that the providence we mean is not one by which the Deity, sitting idly in heaven, looks on at what is taking place in the world, but one by which he, as it were, holds the helms and overrules all events. Hence his providence extends not less to the hand than to the eye.

Those do not err quite so grossly who attribute government to God, but still, as I have observed, a confused and promiscuous government, which consists in giving an impulse and general movement to the machine of the globe and each of its parts, but does not specially direct the action of every creature. It is impossible, however, to tolerate this error. For, according to its abettors, there is nothing in this providence, which they call universal, to prevent all the creatures from being moved contingently, or to prevent man from turning himself in this direction or in that, according to the mere freedom of his own will. In this way they make man a partner with God—God, by his energy, impressing man with the movement by which he can act, agreeably to the nature conferred upon him while man voluntarily regulates his own actions. (ibid., 1.16.4)

In short, Augustine everywhere teaches that if anything is left to fortune, the world moves at random. And although he elsewhere declares (Quaestionum, lib. 83) that all things are carried on, partly by the free will of man, and partly by the Providence of God, he shortly after shows clearly enough that his meaning was, that men also are ruled by Providence, when he assumes it as a principle, that there cannot be a greater absurdity than to hold that anything is done without the ordination of God; because it would happen at random. For which reason, he also excludes the contingency which depends on human will, maintaining a little further on, in clearer terms, that no cause must be sought for but the will of God. (ibid., 1.16.8)

Let us suppose, for example, that a merchant, after entering a forest in company with trustworthy individuals, imprudently strays from his companions and wanders bewildered till he falls into a den of robbers and is murdered. His death was not only foreseen by the eye of God, but had been fixed by his decree. For it is said, not that he foresaw how far the life of each individual should extend, but that he determined and fixed the bounds which could not be passed (Job 14:5). Still, in relation to our capacity of discernment, all these things appear fortuitous. How will the Christian feel? Though he will consider that every circumstance which occurred in that person's death was indeed in its nature fortuitous, he will have no doubt that the Providence of God overruled it and guided fortune to his own end. The same thing holds in the case of future contingencies. All future events being uncertain to us, seem in suspense as if ready to take either direction. Still, however, the impression remains seated in our hearts that nothing will happen which the Lord has not provided, (ibid., 1.16.9)

Understand this verse with reference to the admirable work of God to be seen in the heavens, where we behold his matchless wisdom, in regulating, without one degree of aberration, the manifold, complex, winding courses of the stars. To each of them he assigns its fixed and distinct office, and in all the multitude there is no confusion. He therefore exclaims immediately—Great is God, and boundless, both in power and understanding. We learn from this that there cannot be greater folly than to make our judgment the measure of God's works, displaying in these, as he often does, his incomprehensible power and wisdom. (CC, on Psalm 147:4–5)

Those who attribute due praise to the omnipotence of God thereby derive a double benefit. He to whom heaven and earth belong, and whose nod all creatures must obey, is fully able to reward the homage which they pay to him, and they can rest secure in the protection of Him to whose control everything that could do them harm is subject, by whose authority, Satan, with all his furies and engines, is curbed as with a bridle, and on whose will everything adverse to our safety depends. In this way, and in no other, can the immoderate and superstitious fears, excited by the dangers to which we are exposed, be calmed or subdued. (JCR, 1.16.3)

In the Law and the Prophets he repeatedly declares that as often as he waters the earth with dew and rain, he manifests his favour, that by his command the heaven becomes hard as iron, the crops are destroyed by mildew and other evils, that storms and hail, in devastating the fields, are signs of sure and special vengeance. This being admitted, it is certain that not a drop of rain falls without the express command of God. David, indeed (Ps. 147:9), extols the general providence of God in supplying food to the young ravens that cry to him but when God himself threatens living creatures with famine, does he not plainly declare that they are all nourished by him, at one time with scanty, at another with more ample measure? It is childish, as I have already said, to confine this to particular acts, when Christ says, without reservation, that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the will of his Father (Matt. 10:29). Surely, if the flight of birds is regulated by the counsel of God, we must acknowledge with the prophet, that while he “dwelleth on high,” he “humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth!” [Ps. 113:5–6 KJV] (ibid., Book 1).

Ulrich Zwingli

Thus the young man is taught that all things are ordained by the providence of God: for of the two sparrows sold for a farthing not one can fall to the ground except by decision of the divine providence (which has also numbered the very hairs of our head), nothing being too insignificant for its care. (Zwingli, “CCWG” in Bromley, ed., ZB, 104)

Jacob Arminius

“I declare that it [God's providence] preserves, regulates, governs and directs all things, and that nothing in the world happens fortuitously or by chance” (WJA, I.210).

I consider Divine Providence to be that solicitous, continued, and universally present inspection and oversight of God, according to which he exercises a general care over the whole world, but evinces a particular concern for all his [intelligent] creatures without any exception, with the design of preserving and governing them in their own essence, qualities, actions, and passions, in a manner that is at once worthy of himself and suitable to them, to the praise of his name and the salvation of believers.... I place in subjection to Divine Providence both the freewill and even the actions of a rational creature, so that nothing can be done without the will of God, not even any of those things which are done in opposition to it; only we must observe a distinction between good actions and evil ones, by saying, that “God both wills and performs good acts,” but that “He only freely permits those which are evil.” Still farther than this, I very readily grant, that even all actions whatever, concerning evil, that can possibly be devised or invented, may be attributed to Divine Providence. Employing solely one caution, not to conclude from this concession that God is the cause of sin. (ibid., I.251)

Divine providence does not determine a free will to one part of a contradiction or contrariety, that is, by a determination preceding the actual volition itself; under other circumstances the concurrence of the very volition with the will is the concomitant cause, and thus determines the will with the volition itself, by an act which is not previous but simultaneous, as the schoolmen express themselves, (ibid., II.489)

The Westminster Confession of Faith

The Westminster Larger Catechism asks in Question 19, “What is God’s providence towards the angels?” Answer:

God by his providence permitted some of the angels, willfully and irrecoverably, to fall into sin and damnation, limiting and ordering that, and all their sins, to his own glory; and established the rest in holiness and happiness; employing them all, at his pleasure, in the administrations of his power, mercy, and justice.

The Belgic Confession

The Belgic Confession, in Article 13, the Doctrine of God’s Providence states,

We believe that this good God, after he created all things, did not abandon them to chance or fortune but leads and governs them according to his holy will, in such a way that nothing happens in this world without his orderly arrangement.

Yet God is not the author of, nor can he be charged with, the sin that occurs. For his power and goodness are so great and incomprehensible that he arranges and does his work very well and justly even when the devils and wicked men act unjustly....

This doctrine gives us unspeakable comfort since it teaches us that nothing can happen to us by chance but only by the arrangement of our gracious heavenly Father. He watches over us with fatherly care, keeping all creatures under his control, so that not one of the hairs on our heads (for they are all numbered) nor even a little bird can fall to the ground without the will of our Father.

In this thought we rest, knowing that he holds in check the devils and all our enemies, who cannot hurt us without his permission and will.

For that reason we reject the damnable error of the Epicureans, who say that God involves himself in nothing and leaves everything to chance (Matt. 10:29–30).

Article 12, “the Creation of All Things,” declares,

We believe that the Father created heaven and earth and all other creatures from nothing, when it seemed good to him, by his Word—that is to say, by his Son. He has given all creatures their being, form, and appearance, and their various functions for serving their Creator. Even now he also sustains and governs them all, according to his eternal providence, and by his infinite power, that they may serve man, in order that man may serve God. He has also created the good angels that they might be his messengers and serve his elect. Some of them have fallen from the excellence in which God created them into eternal perdition; and the others have persisted and remained in their original state, by the grace of God.

Article 14:

“For there is no understanding nor will conforming to God’s understanding and will apart from Christ’s involvement, as he teaches us when he says, ‘Without me you can do nothing’ [John 15:5]. Providence is the work of Christ: 1 Cor. 8:6; John 5:17.”

Francis Turretin

Turretin said that providence is “first eminence of power above others, for it is in accordance with the nature of things that the superior and more excellent should have dominion over the inferior and more ignoble” (IET, 250).

Furthermore, he added, “The former [natural dominion] is founded upon the decree of Providence by which He [God] predetermined all things and events.... The principal property of God’s dominion is that it is not only universal but also absolute and unlimited” (ibid., 251).

Also, providence is not incompatible with human freedom:

Therefore since Providence does not concur with the human will, either by the way of co-action, forcing an unwilling will, nor by way of a physical determinism, as though it were a thing brutish and blind, devoid of all judgment, but rationally by turning the will in a manner congruous to itself that it may determine itself, it follows, that the proximate cause of each man’s action being in the judgment of his own understanding, and spontaneous election of his own will, it exerts no constraining force upon our liberty, but rather sustains it. (ibid., 50.6)

Charles Hodge

God’s works of providence are his most holy, wise, and powerful, preserving and governing all his creatures and all their actions. Providence, therefore, includes preservation and government. By preservation is meant that all things out of God owe the continuance of their existence, with all their properties and powers, to the will of God.

Providence includes not only preservation, but government. The latter includes the ideas of design and control. It supposes an end to be attained, and the disposition and direction of means for its accomplishment. If God governs the universe He has some great end, including an indefinite number of subordinate ends, towards which it is directed, and He must control the sequence of all events, so as to render certain the accomplishment of all his purposes. (ST, I.XI.1–2)

The doctrine of providence excludes both necessity and chance from the universe, substituting for them the intelligent and universal control of an infinite, omnipresent God.

The Scriptures teach that God’s providence in relation to the sins of men is such that the sinfulness thereof proceedeth only from the creature and not from God; who neither is nor can be the author or approver of sin.

The fact of this universal providence of God is all the Bible teaches. It nowhere attempts to inform us how it is that God governs all things, or how his effectual control is to be reconciled with the efficiency of second causes. All the attempts of philosophers and theologians to explain that point, may be pronounced failures, and worse than failures, for they not only raise more difficulties than they solve but in almost all instances they include principles or lead to conclusions inconsistent with the plain teachings of the word of God. These theories are all founded on some a priori principle which is assumed on no higher authority than human reason. (ibid.)

As the stability of the universe, and the welfare, and even the existence of organized creatures, depend on the uniformity of the laws of nature, God never does disregard them except for the accomplishment of some high purpose. He, in the ordinary operations of his Providence, operates with and through the laws which He has ordained. He governs the material as well as the moral world by law.

It is obvious that the Scriptural doctrine of providence is not inconsistent with the “Reign of Law” in any proper sense of the words. The Scriptures recognize the fact that the laws of nature are immutable; that they are the ordinances of God; that they are uniform in their operation; and that they cannot be disregarded with impunity. But as man within his sphere can use these fixed laws to accomplish the most diversified purposes, so God in his unlimited sphere has them always and everywhere under his absolute control, so that, without suspending or violating them, they are ever subservient to his will.

Such are the general principles involved in this most difficult doctrine of Divine Providence. We should be equally on our guard against the extreme which merges all efficiency in God, and which, in denying all second causes, destroys human liberty and responsibility, and makes God not only the author of sin, but in reality the only Being in the universe; and the opposite extreme which banishes God from the world which He has made, and which, by denying that He governs all his creatures and all their actions, destroys the foundation of all religion, and dries up the fountains of piety, (ibid., 1.XI. 4)

The whole universe, so far as it can be subjected to our observation, exhibits evidence of God's omnipresent intelligence and control. Mind is everywhere active. There is everywhere manifest the intelligent adaptation of means to an end; as well in the organization of the animalcule, which it requires the microscope to reveal, as in the order of the heavenly bodies. This mind is not in matter. It is not a blind vis naturae. It is, and must be, the intelligence of an infinite, omnipresent Being. It is just as much beyond the power of a creature to form an insect as it is to create the universe. And it is as unreasonable to assume that the organized forms of the vegetable and animal worlds are due to the laws of nature, as it would be to assume that a printing-press could be constructed to compose a poem. (ibid., 1.XI. 2)

“Thus the fact that God does govern all his creatures and all their actions, is clearly revealed in the Scriptures” (ibid., 1.XI. 609). And, “we should be as helpless orphans were it not for this constant oversight and protection of our heavenly Father” (ibid., 1.XI. 590).

B. B. Warfield (1851–1921)

A firm faith in the universal providence of God is the solution of all earthly troubles. It is almost equally true that a clear and full apprehension of the universal providence of God is the solution of most theological problems. Most of the religious difficulties with which men disturb their minds, rest on the subtle intrusion into our thinking of what we may call Deistic postulates, and would vanish could but the full meaning of God's universal providence enter and condition all our thinking. It is because we forget this great truth that we vex and puzzle ourselves over difficulties which seem to be insoluble, but which cease to be difficulties at all so soon as we remember that God's providence extends over all.... The real contrast is not between the divine and human in the Bible; but between the inspirational and the providential factors which have entered into the divine making of the Bible. It is all from God.... Is it not easy for him to convey the gospel to the remotest isle? And may we not be perfectly certain that no man was ever lost for lack of power on God's part to convey to him the gospel? His providence is over all; and by his providence he both can and will always present the means where his grace has determined in the end.... His purposes of mercy will never fail because of our unfaithfulness, for his providence is over all. And there are none of us—not the neediest, not the meanest, not the most remote who can be robbed of God's providence.... Thus we can better understand what he means when he declares that all power and authority have been committed to Christ, and that he has been made head over all things for his Church. Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of men, is now the God of providence, and all providence is administered, now, for the interests of his saving work. That work, therefore, cannot fail in a single particular for lack of providential co-operation. (SSWBBW, I:114–15)

Karl Barth

That the creature is, presupposes this finished act in all the temporal developments, extensions and relationships of this being, in all the individual forms of the creaturely world and in all the historical manifestations and modifications of its existence. It also presupposes a further action of God, namely, His activity in providence. But it does not presuppose further acts of creation. As distinct from creation, providence is God's knowledge, will and action in His relation to the creature already made by Him and not to be made again. Providence guarantees and confirms the work of creation. And no creature could be if it did not please God continually to confirm and guarantee and thus to maintain it. This does not mean, however, that He continually creates it afresh. It is presupposed that the work of creation is done, and done perfectly, and therefore concluded. (CD, part 3, 6)

The recognition that of His free and unmerited goodness, and therefore with the highest degree of certainty, God alone guarantees the existence of the creature, its being and nature and the whole expression of its life belongs indeed to the very beginning of the doctrine of the divine providence, (ibid., 60)

Creation and providence are not identical. In creation it is a matter of the establishment, the incomparable beginning of the relationship between Creator and creature; in providence of its continuation and history in a series of different but comparable moments. In creation we see particularly the difference of the nature, position and function of the Creator on the one side and the creature on the other; in providence their reciprocal relationship, the address of the Creator to the existence of His creature on the one side, and the participation of the creature in the existence of its Creator on the other. The act of creation takes place in a specific first time; the time of providence is the whole of the rest of time right up to its end. Creation has no external basis apart from the free will and resolve of God, and no internal apart from the mystery of the election of grace in the divine being itself; providence has its basis not only in God's unconditioned freedom and decision and the mystery of His election of grace, but also externally in the presupposed being of the creature and internally in its neediness in relation to the Creator. (ibid., 8)

Millard Erickson

By Providence we mean the continuing action of God by which he preserves in existence the creation which he has brought into being, and guides it to his intended purposes for it....

The major features of God's governing: God's governing activity is universal.... God's providence does not extend merely to his own people.... God is good in his government.... God is personally concerned about those who are his.... Our activity and divine activity are not mutually exclusive.... God is sovereign in his government.

We need to be careful as to what we identify as God's providence. (CT, 387–404)

OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S PROVIDENCE

In view of the biblical and theological claims for divine providence, several problems emerge. Most of them center around either the apparent dysteleology (lack of design) in the world or the problem of evil.

Objection One—Based Upon Apparent Randomness in the Natural World

Nature has seemingly random processes. For instance, there is no order in the mixture of molecules in the air one exhales—they tumble around randomly as they mix into the atmosphere. The same is true of seeds blowing in the wind, or sand on the seashore.

Response to Objection One

This objection overlooks the fact that there is order and purpose in this apparent randomness. For example, when one exhales carbon dioxide, if the molecules did not randomly mix in the air, then he would be inhaling the same poisonous gas he just exhaled instead of the oxygen he needs. Hence, there is a providential purpose for the supposed randomness. The same is true of other seemingly random processes of nature.

Indeed, scientists inform us that even the apparently random explosion of the universe was so perfectly fine-tuned from its inception that, without this meticulous tweaking, life on earth would not be possible: This is called the anthropic principle. Famous astronomer Alan Sandage remarked,

The world is too complicated in all of its parts to be due to chance alone. I am convinced that the existence of life with all its order in each of its organisms is simply too well put together. Each part of a living thing depends on all its other parts to function. How does each part know? How is each part specified at conception? The more one learns of biochemistry the more unbelievable it becomes unless there is some kind of organizing principle—an architect for believers.... (“SRRB” in T, 54)

And all of the conditions for this were set from the very moment of the universe’s origin.

Albert Einstein (1879–1955) said that “the harmony of natural law ... reveals an intelligence of such superiority that, compared with it, all the systematic thinking and acting of human beings is an utterly insignificant reflection” (IO, 40). Even agnostic astronomer Robert Jastrow acknowledged,

The anthropic principle is the most interesting development next to the proof of the creation, and it is even more interesting because it seems to say that science itself has proven, as a hard fact, that this universe was made, was designed, for man to live in. It is a very theistic result. (“SCBTF” in CT, 17)

Objection Two—Based Upon Indeterminacy in the Subatomic World

Some have taken Werner Heisenberg’s “principle of uncertainty” or “indeterminacy” as support for their rejection of God’s meticulous providence over every detail of creation. This is a principle of quantum mechanics stating that “the position and speed of a particle cannot be simultaneously known with complete certainty. If one is known with high certainty, the other becomes very uncertain” (Lightman, O, 560). For example, according to this theory, “it is possible to accurately predict what fraction of the [uranium atoms] will radioactively disintegrate over the next hour, but it is impossible to predict which atoms will do so” (ibid.).

Response to Objection Two

This principle of uncertainty does not support the view that events arise without a cause or that human actions are uncaused. This is clear for many reasons.

First, Heisenberg’s principle of uncertainty does not say there is no cause or purpose for the events, but that one cannot predict the course of a given particle. Hence, it is not to be understood as the principle of uncausality, but the principle of unpredictability.

Second, the principle of indeterminacy does not even deny predictability in general; it states only that “physical systems must be described in terms of probabilities” (Lightman, O, 553). That is, one can accurately predict what fraction of the particles will react in a certain way, but not which atoms will do so (ibid.). What is more, even though a particular particle’s position cannot be predicted, nonetheless, the overall pattern can be predicted, which implies a causal connection. Nor does this axiom deny that even given particles are predictable, but only that scientists, with their limited instruments and observational abilities, cannot (at present) predict the course of individual subatomic particles. The principle does not mean that the course of given subatomic particles is absolutely unpredictable. If an infinite Mind exists, He could predict both.

Third, Heisenberg's principle describes the subatomic realm, which is not known without investigator interference. The electron microscopes, by which the subatomic realm is observed, bombard the subatomic particles in order to "see" them. Mortimer Adler noted,

At the same time that the Heisenberg uncertainty principles were established, quantum physics acknowledged that the intrusive experimental measurements that provided the data used in the mathematical formulations of quantum theory conferred on subatomic objects and events indeterminate character.... It follows, therefore, that the indeterminacy cannot be intrinsic to subatomic reality. (TR, 96–100)

Hence, the unpredictable behavior may result in part from the bombardment in the very attempt to observe the

Fourth, not all modern physicists accept quantum physics and the uncertainty theory; one of the greatest physicists of the twentieth century rejected it. In response to it, Albert Einstein affirmed that "God does not play dice with the universe."

Objection Three—Based Upon the Problem of Evil

How can God be in control of the world when there is so much evil in it? It would seem that if He were in complete control, then there would be no evil. Conversely, if there is so much evil, it would appear that God is not in control of the world.

Response to Objection Three

In response, God's providence in relation to evil is preventive (Gen. 20:6; 31:24; Ps. 19:13; Hos. 2:6); permissive (2 Chron. 32:31; Deut. 8:2; Ps. 17:13–14; 81:12–13; Isa. 53:4, 10; Hos. 4:17; Acts 14:16; Rom. 1:24–25; 3:25; Ps. 29:3; 2 Sam. 24:1; 1 Chron. 22:1); providential (Gen. 50:20; Ps. 76:10; Isa. 10:5–6; John 13:27; Acts 4:27–28); and productive (Job 1:12; Ps. 124:2; 1 Cor. 10:13; 2 Thess. 2:7; Rev. 20:2–3). While God permits evil for now, He oversees its process providentially, and ultimately He produces a greater good out of it.

Objection Four—Based Upon Disproportionate Distribution of Happiness

Another problem with providence is the apparently unfair distribution of happiness in the world. It is clear upon observation that not all persons in the world are equally happy; good fortune has not been shared equally among the inhabitants of this planet.

Response to Objection Four

In reply, several comments are in order.

First, as fallen human beings, no matter what our lot, we have more good from God's hand than we deserve.

Second, even if we all deserved some happiness, there is no moral obligation upon God to make everyone equally happy.

Third, happiness and misery are more equally distributed than they appear. As a general rule, virtue is rewarded and vice is punished in this life.

Fourth, and finally, this life is only a preparation for the next, where all inequities here will be rectified.

CONCLUSION

The biblical, historical, and theological foundation of God's complete and sovereign control over all human events—past, present, and future—stands firm. Challenges both from within and without are answerable. Even without the exercise of His persuasive influence on free creatures, God can control the destiny of all things simply by His infallible foreknowledge of how every free creature will choose to exercise freedom.

Likewise, God exercises both general and particular providential control over all creation. Even evil is permitted for His ultimate and good end. Nothing in all of creation escapes His careful eye and loving concern.

APPENDIX ONE

CHRISTOLOGY

Christology is discussed in three other places in these volumes: The work of Christ on the cross is treated under soteriology in Volume 3, chapters 8–9; the nature of Christ as a member of the Trinity is discussed in this volume in chapter 12; and Christ’s future reign is examined in Volume 4 on eschatology (“last things”). Other elements of Christology are outlined here in this appendix.

CHRIST’S PREINCARNATE STATE

That Christ is the eternal Son of God is clear from both Old and New Testaments. As Son, He is eternally submissive to the Father, which is evident in eternity past from His willingness to submit to the will of the Father to be the Redeemer of humankind. Jesus proclaimed,

“Here I am—it is written about me in the scroll—I have come to do your will, O God.” First he said, “Sacrifices and offerings, burnt offerings and sin offerings you did not desire, nor were you pleased with them.” ... Then he said, “Here I am, I have come to do your will.” He sets aside the first to establish the second. And by that will, we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. (Heb. 10:7–10)

While on earth, Christ always obeyed the will of the Father (John 15:10):

[Jesus], being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross! (Phil. 2:6–8)

In eternity to come, Christ will still submit to the Father. Paul wrote,

Then the end will come, when he hands over the kingdom to God the Father after he has destroyed all dominion, authority and power. For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death.... When he has done this, then the Son himself will be made subject to him who put everything under him, so that God may be all in all. (1 Cor. 15:24–28)

Christ’s Eternal Sonship According to the New Testament

As the second person of the blessed Trinity (see chapter 12), Christ had no beginning. John wrote, “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God” (John 1:1). In fact, “Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made” (John 1:3). Paul added, “By him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him. He is before all things, and in him all things hold together” (Col. 1:16–17).

Jesus prayed, “Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began” (John 17:5). “ ‘I tell you the truth,’ Jesus answered, ‘before Abraham was born, I am!’ ” (John 8:58). Christ is the eternal Son of the eternal Father. When He said, “I and the Father are one” (John 10:30), [the Jews] took up stones, claiming the right to kill him “for blasphemy, because you, a mere man, claim to be God” (10:33).

Christ's Eternal Sonship According to the Old Testament

Even the Old Testament speaks of the eternal Son. Psalm 2 reads:

“I have installed my King on Zion, my holy hill.” I will proclaim the decree of the LORD: He said to me, “You are my Son; today I have become your Father. Ask of me, and I will make the nations your inheritance, the ends of the earth your possession.” ... Kiss the Son, lest he be angry and you be destroyed in your way, for his wrath can flare up in a moment, (vv. 6–8, 12)

Proverbs adds,

Who has gone up to heaven and come down? Who has gathered up the wind in the hollow of his hands? Who has wrapped up the waters in his cloak? Who has established all the ends of the earth? What is his name, and the name of his son? Tell me if you know! (30:4)

Of His virgin birth, Isaiah wrote, “The Lord himself will give you a sign: The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel [i.e., God with us]” (Isa. 7:14). Isaiah also declared, “To us a child is born, to us a son is given, and the government will be on his shoulders. And he will be called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace” (9:6).

Christ as the Messenger of Yahweh in the Old Testament

One of the striking proofs of Christ's preincarnate sonship and deity in the Old Testament is His appearance as “the Angel [Messenger] of the Lord.” Consider the following.

The Messenger of Yahweh Is Yahweh

The term “Yahweh” (LORD) is used exclusively of God in the Old Testament. Indeed, God Himself proclaimed,

This is what the LORD says—he who created the heavens, he is God; he who fashioned and made the earth, he founded it; he did not create it to be empty, but formed it to be inhabited—he says, “I am the LORD [Yahweh], and there is no other” (Isa.45:18).

God calls this title His “Name,” saying, “I am the LORD [Yahweh]. I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob as God Almighty, but by my name the LORD I did not make myself known to them” (Ex. 6:2–3).

The Messenger of the Lord Is Yahweh

This was made clear when He appeared to Moses, for “There the angel of the LORD appeared to him in flames of fire from within a bush” (Ex. 3:2). He is called “the LORD” [Yahweh] in verse 8, and He gives His Name as “I AM WHO I AM” in verse 14.

Elsewhere in the Old Testament, the Messenger of the Lord is called God; one of the messengers (angels) who appeared to Abraham was called Yahweh (“the LORD”) in Genesis 18:1. When the other two angels left to go to Sodom, it says, “Abraham remained standing before the LORD [Yahweh]” (Gen. 18:22). Likewise, the “angel of the LORD” who appeared to Manoah's wife (Judg. 13:3) accepted and answered Manoah's prayer, which he “prayed to the LORD [Yahweh]: ‘O Lord, I beg you, let the man of God you sent to us come again to teach us how to bring up the boy who is to be born’ ” (Judg. 13:8). In fact, when asked, He gave his name as “Wonderful” (Judg. 13:18 NKJV cf. Isa. 9:6).

The Angel of the LORD Is a Different Person Than the LORD

On occasion in the Old Testament, the Angel of the LORD, who is the Lord, spoke with another person who is called “the LORD” (Yahweh). For example, Zechariah recorded, “Then the angel of the LORD said, ‘LORD Almighty, how long will you withhold mercy from Jerusalem and from the towns of Judah, which you have been angry with these seventy years?’ So the LORD [Yahweh] spoke ... to the angel” (Zech. 1:12–13). The same kind of conversation took place between the Father and the Son in Psalm 110:1, where David wrote, “The LORD [Yahweh] says to my Lord [adonai]: ‘Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet.’ ” (Jesus verified this understanding of the text in Matthew 22:42–45.) In Psalm 45, the Father speaks to the Son, saying, “Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever; a scepter of justice will be the scepter of your kingdom” (Ps. 45:6; cf. Heb. 1:8).

The Angel of the LORD Is Christ

That the Angel of the Lord is the second person of the Trinity is derived from two main lines of evidence.

First, the Angel of the Lord in the Old Testament serves the same role as does Christ in the New Testament: The Father is the one who plans and sends the Redeemer, the Son is the one who is the Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit is the one who convicts and applies redemption to those who are redeemed. In fact, all three members of the Godhead are found in one passage in the Old Testament. Isaiah wrote,

I will tell of the kindnesses of the LORD [the Father], the deeds for which he is to be praised, according to all the LORD has done for us—yes, the many good things he has done for the house of Israel, according to his compassion and many kindnesses. He said, “Surely they are my people, sons who will not be false to me”; and so he became their Savior. In all their distress he too was distressed, and the angel of his presence [the Son] saved them. In his love and mercy he redeemed them; he lifted them up and carried them all the days of old. Yet they rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit [the Spirit]. (Isa. 63:7–10)

Second, once the Son (Christ) came in permanent incarnate form (John 1:1, 14; 1 John 4:2), never again does the Angel of the Lord appear, though an angel appears from time to time (cf. Acts 12:7ff.). No angel that commands or accepts worship or claims to be God ever appears again.

Other references to the Angel of the Lord, though sometimes with different names, confirm the same conclusions. For example, the Angel of the Lord (Christ) appeared to Joshua to confirm that He was the real leader of Israel:

Now when Joshua was near Jericho, he looked up and saw a man standing in front of him with a drawn sword in his hand. Joshua went up to him and asked, “Are you for us or for our enemies?”

“Neither,” he replied, “but as commander of the army of the LORD I have now come.” Then Joshua fell facedown to the ground in reverence, and asked him, “What message does my Lord have for his servant?” (Josh. 5:13–14)

CHRIST’S VIRGIN BIRTH

The evidence for the miraculous conception of Christ in the virgin’s womb begins in the Old Testament.

Old Testament Anticipations of the Virgin Birth

The earliest messianic prediction in the Bible (called the protoevangelium) foreshadows the Virgin Birth.

Genesis 3:15

Speaking to the tempter (serpent), God said, “ ‘I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel.’ ” That the coming Redeemer was to be the “offspring” or “seed” of the woman is important in a patriarchal culture. Normally, descendants were traced through their father (cf. Gen. 5; 11:10f.); even the official genealogy of the Messiah (in Matt. 1) is traced through Jesus’ legal father (Joseph). In the “seed of the woman,” there is an implication that the Messiah would not have a natural father, that is, He would be virgin-born.

Jeremiah 22:30 (cf. 2 Samuel 7:11ff.)

Another possible intimation of the Virgin Birth in the Old Testament is found in the curse placed on Jeconiah, which says, “Record this man as if childless, a man who will not prosper in his lifetime, for none of his offspring will prosper, none will sit on the throne of David or rule any more in Judah” (Jer. 22:30). The potential problem with this prediction is that Jesus was the descendant of the throne of David through Jeconiah (cf. Matt. 1:12). However, since Joseph was only Jesus’ legal father (by virtue of being engaged to Mary when she became pregnant), he did not inherit the curse on Jeconiah’s actual descendants. Since Jesus was the actual son of David through Mary, according to Luke’s patriarchal genealogy (cf. Luke 3), He fulfilled the conditions of coming “from the loins of David” (2 Sam. 7:11f.) without losing legal rights to the throne of David by falling under the curse upon Jeconiah. Thus, the Virgin Birth is implied in the consistent understanding of these Old Testament passages.

Isaiah 7:14

The Virgin Birth of Christ is not only implied in the Old Testament, but it is also predicted in Isaiah 7:14: “Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign: The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel.” Critics, following the interpretation of many Bible scholars, use Isaiah 7:16 to place the birth of the prophesied child before the invasion of the Assyrian armies and the fall of Samaria (in 722 B.C.). Further, they argue that Isaiah 8:3 is the fulfillment of this prophecy in the natural birth of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. If so, Isaiah 7:14 cannot be used as a prediction of the Virgin Birth of Jesus.

However, in response to this, many biblical scholars have contended as follows.

First, the word almah in this text should be translated “virgin,” since there are no examples in the Old Testament where it means anything but a young unmarried girl. And, since she was to conceive and bear the child as a virgin, it cannot refer to someone who conceived in a natural way.

Second, bethulah was not used here because it does not always mean a young unmarried girl. It can even refer to a married person (Joel 1:8).

Third, the Greek Old Testament (LXX) translated almah by the unambiguous word parthenos, which can only mean “virgin.” Hence, the translators of the Hebrew Old Testament believed that this was a prediction of the Virgin Birth of the Messiah.

Fourth, the inspired New Testament sanctioned the LXX translation of almah as “virgin” when it quoted the LXX of Isaiah 7:14, in which parthenos is used to show that this prophecy was fulfilled in the Virgin Birth of Christ (Matt. 1:23).

Fifth, since almah always means a young girl who is not yet married, it follows that to deny it refers to a virgin demands that she get married before the child is born. Nevertheless, if she is married, then it is no longer a virgin who is conceiving, but a married woman. This is contrary to Isaiah 7:14 (KJV), which says clearly, “The virgin shall conceive, and bear a son.” That is, both the conception and birth were by a virgin—this would not be true of a natural birth.

Sixth, there are dimensions of this prophecy that can only refer to Christ. For example, the one born of a virgin will be called “Immanuel” (“God with us”), used both here and in the New Testament, which quotes it as a reference to the deity of Christ (cf. Matt. 1:23).

Seventh, the prediction obviously goes beyond King Ahaz, since it is given to the whole “house of David” (Isa. 7:13). Therefore, it cannot be limited to the natural birth by the prophetess in Isaiah’s day.

Eighth, since the emphasis is on some wonderful, unheard-of “sign” (Isa. 7:11–14), it is best explained by the supernatural birth of Christ, not just to the natural birth of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. Why should an ordinary birth be understood as an extraordinary sign?

Ninth, the whole context of Isaiah 7–11 (cf. Micah 5:2ff.) forms an unbreakable chain of messianic prophecy (cf. Isa. 7:14; 8:8; 9:6; 11:1–5).

Tenth, the New Testament interprets Isaiah 7:14 as prophetic. This is indicated by

- (1) the phrase “that it might be fulfilled” (Matt. 1:22);
- (2) the intensifying phrase used with it, namely, “all this was done that it might be fulfilled”;
- (3) the manner in which the passage is used to show the supernaturalness of the birth and deity of Christ (Matt. 1:23).

Eleventh, and finally, one and the same verse cannot refer to the birth of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz in Isaiah’s day. Otherwise, either he was virgin-born, or else Christ was not—the same verse cannot mean two different (opposing) things. If both the LXX and the inspired New Testament affirm that it refers to someone who was a virgin, it would not apply to the birth of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. Thus, it seems best to take it as referring to Christ.

The New Testament Basis for the Virgin Birth

While some of the Old Testament references are only implicit, the New Testament is explicit about Christ’s virgin birth.

Matthew 1:18–23

The New Testament clearly affirms that Christ was born of a virgin. Matthew wrote,

This is how the birth of Jesus Christ came about: His mother Mary was pledged to be married to Joseph, but before they came together, she was found to be with child through the Holy Spirit. Because Joseph her husband was a righteous man and did not want to expose her to public disgrace, he had in mind to divorce her quietly. But after he had considered this, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream and said, “Joseph son of David, do not be afraid to take Mary home as your wife, because what is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit. She will give birth to a son, and you are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins.” All this took place to fulfill what the Lord had said through the prophet: “The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and they will call him Immanuel”—which means, “God with us” (Matt. 1:18–23, emphasis added).

The italicized sections point to four factors demonstrating that Christ was virgin-born.

First, Mary conceived “before they came together,” thus revealing that Christ’s was not a natural conception.

Second, Joseph’s initial reaction reveals that he had not had sexual relations with Mary, since when he found that she was pregnant “he had in mind to divorce her quietly.”

Third, the phrase “what is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit” reveals the supernatural nature of the event.

Fourth, and finally, the citation of the prophet about a “virgin” giving “birth” to a child indicates that she had not had sexual relations with anyone. She was not simply a virgin before the baby was conceived, but also during and after He was conceived—even when He was born.

Luke 1:26–35

Mark says nothing about Jesus’ ancestry, birth, or childhood, beginning immediately with His ministry, which is in accord with his stress on Christ as a Servant (cf. Mark 10:45).

However, Dr. Luke gives great attention to all of these. He begins with the announcement of Christ’s birth of a virgin:

In the sixth month, God sent the angel Gabriel to Nazareth, a town in Galilee, to a virgin pledged to be married to a man named Joseph, a descendant of David. The virgin’s name was Mary. The angel went to her and said, “Greetings, you who are highly favored! The Lord is with you.” Mary was greatly troubled at his words and wondered what kind of greeting this might be. But the angel said to her, “Do not be afraid, Mary, you have found favor with God. You will be with child and give birth to a son, and you are to give him the name Jesus.... The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. So the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God. (Luke 1:26–31, 35, emphasis added)

Here again, the italicized text demonstrates that the conception of Christ was supernatural.

First, Mary was a “virgin” (parthenos) at the time, a Greek word that always means someone who had not had sexual relations with a man.

Second, Mary’s reaction of being “greatly troubled” and being “afraid” reveals that she knew she was a virgin.

Third, the angel said the conception would be from “the power of the Most High.”

Luke 2:1–19

Luke records:

[Joseph] went [to Bethlehem] to register with Mary, who was pledged to be married to him and was expecting a child.... And there were shepherds living out in the fields nearby, keeping watch over their flocks at night. An angel of the Lord appeared to them, and the glory of the Lord shone around them, and they were terrified. But the angel said to them, “Do not be afraid. I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all the people. Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord.” ... Suddenly a great company of the heavenly host appeared with the angel, praising God and saying, “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men on whom his favor rests.” ... But Mary treasured up all these things and pondered them in her heart. (2:5, 8–11, 13–14, 19, emphasis added)

When Luke records the actual birth of Christ, there is further indication that it was a virgin birth.

First, he stresses both that Mary was only “pledged to be married” but not married, which in those days meant she had not yet had sexual relations with Joseph.

Second, the supernatural appearance of the angel and the heavenly choir point to something amazing that had happened.

Third, Mary’s reaction and her meditation on the mystery of the event shows that she knew it was supernatural.

John 2:1–5

There are also a couple of strong intimations in John’s gospel that Jesus was virgin-born. When Christ performed His first miracle at Cana, His mother revealed an awareness of His supernatural origin by her confidence that He could do the supernatural. John wrote,

On the third day a wedding took place at Cana in Galilee. Jesus’ mother was there, and Jesus and his disciples had also been invited to the wedding. When the wine was gone, Jesus’ mother said to him, “They have no more wine.” “Dear woman, why do you involve me?” Jesus replied. “My time has not yet come.” His mother said to the servants, “Do whatever he tells you” (John 2:1–5, emphasis added).

The italicized text reveals that Mary seems not only to have believed that Jesus could do a miracle but also that she was requesting one, even though she had never seen Him perform a miracle, since this was Jesus’ “first” (John 2:11). This is a strong indication that she knew of His supernatural origin via His virgin birth.

John 8:41

Later in John, even the insult of Jesus’ enemies provides a backhanded compliment (that He was born of a virgin). Jesus said to them, “ ‘You are doing the things your own father does.’ ”

“ ‘We are not illegitimate children,’ they protested” (John 8:41). Their response implies they were aware of the claim that Jesus was virgin-born and did not accept it, but rather charged that He was born of fornication. Of course, even Joseph thought this until he was supernaturally convinced by an angel (Matt. 1:20). The problem with this accusation is, how could someone born in sin live a sinless and miraculous life? Jesus boldly challenged in response, “Can any of you prove me guilty of sin?” (John 8:46).

Galatians 4:4

The New Testament epistles are filled with references to Jesus’ sinlessness, which, again, imply His virgin birth (2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 1 John 3:3). Even so, Paul’s reference to Jesus being “born of a woman” is even more explicit: “But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law” (Gal. 4:4). This is a hearkening back to Genesis 3:15 (see above). In a Jewish patriarchal culture, one is begotten of a male (the father), and to bring attention to Christ’s being “born of a woman” is to show that something unusual is occurring—in Jesus’ case, a virgin birth.

CHRIST’S MINISTRY AND MIRACLES

Miracles are not only a possibility but also a reality in a theistic universe (see Volume 1, chapter 3). As God-incarnate, Jesus performed miracles to demonstrate His deity and to confirm His message.

The Purpose of Jesus' Miracles

The purpose of Jesus' miracles can be derived from the three basic words for miracles used in the New Testament.

Miracle as a "Sign"

The word sign (semeion) is used seventy-seven times (forty-eight times in the Gospels). "Sign" is used of the most significant miracle in the New Testament, the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the grave. Jesus said to His unbelieving generation, "[No sign] will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah.... The Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:39–40). Jesus repeated this prediction of His resurrection when He was asked for a sign in Matthew 16:1, 4. Not only was the Resurrection a miracle, but it was also a miracle that Jesus predicted (John 2:19; Matt. 12:39–40; 16:21; 20:19).

Miracle as a "Wonder"

The word wonder (teras) is used sixteen times in the New Testament and almost always refers to a miracle. In fact, in every occurrence it is used in combination with the word sign. Teras is used of the supernatural events before the second coming of Christ (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22; Acts 2:19–20), of Jesus' miracles (John 4:48; Acts 2:22), of the apostles' miracles (Acts 2:43; cf. 4:30; 5:12; Heb. 2:3–4), of Stephen's miracles (Acts 6:8), of Moses' miracles in Egypt (Acts 7:36), and of Paul's miracles (Acts 14:3; 15:12; Rom. 15:19). Teras means a "miraculous sign, prodigy, portent, omen, wonder" (Brown, MCM, 2:633), carrying with it the idea of "that which is amazing or astonishing" (ibid., 623–25).

Miracle as "Power"

The word power (dunamis) is used on numerous occasions in the New Testament, occasionally of human power (2 Cor. 1:8) or abilities (Matt. 25:15), and sometimes of spiritual (satanic) powers (Luke 10:19; Rom. 8:38). Like its Old Testament parallel, the New Testament term “power” is often translated “miracles.” Dunamis is used in combination with “signs and wonders” (Heb. 2:4), of Christ’s miracles (Matt. 13:58), of the power to raise the dead (Phil. 3:10), of the Virgin Birth of Christ (Luke 1:35), of the special gift of miracles (1 Cor. 12:10), of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 1:8), and of the “power” of the gospel to save sinful people (Rom. 1:16). The emphasis of the word is on the divine energizing aspect of a miraculous event.

In summary, a miracle is an unusual event (“wonder”) that has its source in God (“power”) and its significance in that it is a confirmation of God’s message (“sign”). Thus, the purpose of miracles in the New Testament follows that of the Old Testament: They are the divine confirmation of a prophet or spokesperson for God. Moses was told a miracle was given “that they may believe that the LORD, the God of their fathers ... has appeared to you” (Ex. 4:1–5). When Israel hesitated between Baal and Yahweh, God confirmed Elijah over the prophets of Baal by sending fire from heaven to consume the sacrifices: “Let it be known today that you are God in Israel and that I am your servant” (1 Kings 18:36).

Miracles in the New Testament have a confirmatory purpose. John said, “This, the first of his miraculous signs, Jesus performed at Cana in Galilee. He thus revealed His glory, and His disciples put their faith in him” (John 2:11). He also wrote, “Jesus did many other miraculous signs.... These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God” (John 20:30–31).

Therefore, the reason for miraculous “signs” is divine confirmation of a prophet of God. Nicodemus said of Jesus: “We know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him” (John 3:2). Indeed, many people followed Him because they saw the signs He performed on those who were sick (John 6:2). When some rejected Jesus, even though He had cured a blind man, others said, “How can a sinner do such miraculous signs?” (John 9:16). The apostles were confident in proclaiming, “Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him, as you yourselves know” (Acts 2:22).

Perhaps the most definitive passage on miracles in the New Testament is Hebrews 2:3–4:

How shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation? This salvation, which was first announced by the Lord, was confirmed to us by those who heard him. God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will.

In summary, miracles are God’s way of accrediting His spokespersons. There is a miracle to confirm the message as true, a sign to substantiate the sermon, an act of God to verify the Word of God.

Of course, not all believe, even when they witness a miracle. In this event, says the New Testament, the miracle is a witness against them. John grieved that “even after Jesus had done all these miraculous signs in their presence, they still would not believe in him” (John 12:37). Jesus Himself said of some, “They will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead” (Luke 16:31). So in this sense the result (not the purpose) of disbelieving in miracles is the condemnation of the unbeliever (cf. John 12:31, 37).

CHRIST’S SINLESS LIFE AND HUMANNESS (see Vol. 1, pp. 275–277)

CHRIST'S VICARIOUS DEATH

Jesus was not only a Prophet to His people but was also a Priest for them and will one day be King over them.

Christ as Prophet

God, through Moses, said of Jesus, "I will raise up for them a prophet like you from among their brothers; I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him" (Deut. 18:18). The New Testament confirms that Moses spoke here of Christ (Acts 7:37). Jesus' teachings recorded in the Gospels were part of His prophetic ministry.

Christ as Priest

Jesus did not come simply to speak to His people but also to be a sacrifice for them. He said, "Even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). In John, He promised, "The thief comes only to steal and kill and destroy; I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full ... and I lay down my life for the sheep" (John 10:10, 15).

Christ's atoning death was not merely exemplar, but it was also sacrificial. He died in our place as a substitute for our sins (Isa. 53:4-7; 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 7-10; 1 Peter 2:24; 3:18). This is discussed more completely elsewhere (in Volume 3, chapters 8-9).

Christ as King

One day Jesus will literally be King over His people. He affirmed, "I tell you the truth, at the renewal of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). John added,

I saw thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge. And I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their testimony for Jesus and because of the word of God. They had not worshiped the beast or his image and had not received his mark on their foreheads or their hands. They came to life and reigned with Christ a thousand years. (Rev. 20:4-6)

Indeed, Christ is called "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS" (Rev. 19:16). For a more detailed discussion of this, see Volume 4.

CHRIST'S RESURRECTION

The crowning miracle of Jesus' life was His resurrection, predicted in the Old Testament and reaffirmed in the New Testament.

Old Testament Predictions of Christ's Resurrection

Two Old Testament passages are cited as predictions of Christ's resurrection by the New Testament. Psalm 2:7 reads: "I will proclaim the decree of the LORD: He said to me, 'You are my Son; today I have become your Father.'" This is repeated in Hebrews 1:5, and it is specifically applied to the Resurrection in Acts 13:33-34, where it says:

What God promised our fathers he has fulfilled for us, their children, by raising up Jesus. As it is written in the second Psalm: “You are my Son; today I have become your Father.” The fact that God raised him from the dead, never to decay, is stated in these words: “I will give you the holy and sure blessings promised to David.”

The resurrection of Christ is also predicted in Psalm 16:10, which affirms: “You will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay.” Peter argues explicitly in Acts 2:29–32 that this could not refer to David but must refer to Christ, declaring, Brothers, I can tell you confidently that the patriarch David died and was buried, and his tomb is here to this day. But he was a prophet and knew that God had promised him on oath that he would place one of his descendants on his throne. Seeing what was ahead, he spoke of the resurrection of the Christ, that he was not abandoned to the grave, nor did his body see decay. God has raised this Jesus to life, and we are all witnesses of the fact.

Another explicit Old Testament reference to the Resurrection is in Job 19:25–26, where Job pronounced triumphantly: “I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth. And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God.” This, too, emphasizes the physical nature of the resurrection of the “flesh,” as did Peter in Acts 2.

Jesus’ Predictions of His Own Resurrection

The prediction of His own resurrection began early in Christ’s ministry and continued to the very end.

Early Prediction of His Resurrection

Just after Jesus performed His first miracle, He predicted His resurrection, declaring, “ ‘Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days.’ ... But the temple he had spoken of was his body. After he was raised from the dead, his disciples recalled what he had said” (John 2:19–22).

Later Prediction of His Resurrection

Later in His ministry, Jesus repeated His claim: “He answered, ‘A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign! But none will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of a huge fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth’ ” (Matt. 12:39–40).

Final Predictions of His Resurrection

As He approached the cross, His predictions became more frequent and specific: “When they came together in Galilee, he said to them, ‘The Son of Man is going to be betrayed into the hands of men. They will kill him, and on the third day he will be raised to life.’ And the disciples were filled with grief” (Matt. 17:22–23). Jesus added, “No one takes [my life] from me, but I lay it down of my own accord. I have authority to lay it down and authority to take it up again” (John 10:18).

CHRIST’S PHYSICAL DEATH

The evidence of Jesus' death is overwhelming and is found both inside and outside the Bible.

First, the Old Testament predicted (see "PPB" in Geisler, BECA) that the Messiah would die (Isa. 53:5–10; Ps. 22:16; Dan. 9:26; Zech. 12:10), and that Jesus fulfilled the Old Testament prophecies about the Messiah (cf. Matt. 4:14–16; 5:17–18; 8:17; John 4:25–26; 5:39).

Second, the historicity of the gospel records have been confirmed by the multitudinous manuscripts of contemporary eyewitnesses (see Volume 1, chapter 26).

Third, Jesus announced many times during His ministry that He was going to die and rise again (John 2:19–21; 10:10–11; Matt. 12:40; 17:22–23; Mark 8:31).

Fourth, all the predictions of His resurrection, both in the Old Testament (cf. Ps. 16:10—see also Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2) and in the New Testament (cf. John 2:19–21; Matt. 12:40; 17:22–23), are based on the fact that He would die. Only a dead body can be resurrected.

Fifth, the nature and extent of Jesus' injuries indicate that He must have died: He had no sleep the night before He was crucified, He was beaten several times and whipped, and He collapsed on the way to His execution while carrying His cross. This in itself, to say nothing of the crucifixion to follow, was totally exhausting and life-draining.

Sixth, the nature of crucifixion assures death. Jesus was on the cross from nine in the morning until just before sunset (Mark 15:25, 33). He bled from wounded hands and feet and also from the thorns that pierced His head (in addition to His shredded back). There would have been a tremendous loss of blood after more than six hours. Plus, crucifixion demands that a man constantly pull himself up in order to breathe, thus causing excruciating pain from the nails. Doing this all day would quickly kill nearly anyone who might even have been in good health before.

Seventh, the piercing of Jesus' side with the spear, from which came "blood and water" (John 19:34), is proof that He had physically died before the piercing. When this has happened, it is a medical fact that the person has already expired (see "Twelfth" below). This detail may also be seen to validate the claim that we are reading an eyewitness account.

Eighth, Jesus said He was in the act of dying on the cross when He declared, "Father, into Your hands I commit My spirit!" (Luke 23:46). And, "after he had said this he breathed his last." John renders this, "He gave up his spirit" (John 19:30). His death cry was heard by those who remained (Luke 23:47–49).

Ninth, the Roman soldiers, accustomed to crucifixion and death, pronounced Jesus dead. Although it was a common practice to break the legs of the victim to speed death (so that the person can no longer lift himself and breathe), they did not do so with Jesus (John 19:33; cf. Ps. 34:20).

Tenth, Pilate double-checked to make sure Jesus was dead before he relinquished the corpse to Joseph to be buried: "Summoning the centurion, he asked him if Jesus had already died. When he learned from the centurion that it was so, he gave the body to Joseph" (Mark 15:44–45).

Eleventh, Jesus was wrapped in about seventy-five pounds of cloth and spices and placed in a sealed tomb for three days (John 19:39–40; Matt. 27:63). If He was not dead by then (which He clearly was), He would have died from lack of food, water, and medical treatment.

Twelfth, medical authorities who have examined the circumstances and nature of Christ's death have concluded that He actually died on the cross. An article in the Journal of the American Medical Society concluded:

Clearly, the weight of historical and medical evidence indicates that Jesus was dead before the wound to his side was inflicted and supports the traditional view that the spear, thrust between his right ribs, probably perforated not only the right lung but also the pericardium and heart and thereby ensured his death. Accordingly, interpretations based on the assumption that Jesus did not die on the cross appear to be at odds with modern medical knowledge. (JAMA [Mar. 21, 1986]: 1463)

In addition, many other medical authorities have come to the same conclusion, beginning with Dr. Stroud (On the Physiological Cause of Christ's Death, 1871); Pierre Barbet (A Doctor at Calvary, 1953); C. Truman Davis ("The Crucifixion of Jesus: The Passion of Christ From a Medical Point of View" in Arizona Medicine [March 1965]); Robert Bucklin ("The Legal and Medical Aspects of the Trial and Death of Christ" in Medicine, Science and Law [January 1970]); and Robert Wassenaar ("A Physician Looks at the Suffering of Christ" in Moody Monthly [March 1979]).

Thirteenth, non-Christian historians and writers from the first and second centuries recorded the death of Christ. Flavius Josephus (c. 37–100), a Jewish historian of the time of Christ, believed that Jesus died on the cross: "Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross" (AJ, 18:3, 379, emphasis added). Likewise, the Roman historian Cornelius Tacitus (c. 55–117) wrote: "A wise man who was called Jesus.... Pilate condemned Him to be condemned and to die" (ibid., emphasis added). He also noted that Jesus' disciples "reported that He had appeared to them three days after His crucifixion and that He was alive" (A, 15.44). According to Julius Africanus (c. A.D. 211), the first-century Samaritan-born historian Thallus (c. A.D. 52), "when discussing the darkness which fell upon the land during the crucifixion of Christ," spoke of it as an eclipse (F. F. Bruce, The New Testament Documents: Are They Reliable? 113, emphasis added). The second-century Greek writer Lucian referred to Christ as "the man who was crucified in Palestine because he introduced a new cult into the world." He calls him the "crucified sophist" (Habermas, Ancient Evidence on the Life of Jesus, chap. 4). The "Letter of Mara Bar-Serapion" (c. A.D. 73), housed in the British Museum, mentions Christ's death, asking, "What advantage did the Jews gain from executing their wise King?" (ibid., op. cit., 114, emphasis added). Indeed, even the Talmud says, "on the eve of Passover they hanged Yeshu (of Nazareth).... Let everyone knowing aught in his defense come and plead for him. But they found naught in his defense and hanged him on the eve of Passover" (Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 43a, emphasis added). Finally, there was the Roman writer Phlegon, who referred to Christ's death and resurrection in his Chronicles, noting, "Jesus, while alive, was of no assistance to himself, but that he arose after death, and exhibited the marks of his punishment, and showed how his hands had been pierced by nails" (C, cited by Origen, Against Celcus, 2.23, emphasis added). Phlegon even mentioned "the eclipse in the time of Tiberius Caesar, in whose reign Jesus appears to have been crucified, and the great earthquakes which then took place" (ibid., 445).

Fourteenth, and finally, the earliest Christian writers after the time of Christ affirmed His death on the cross by crucifixion. Polycarp (fl. second century), a disciple of the apostle John, repeatedly affirmed the death of Jesus, speaking, for example, of "our Lord Jesus Christ, who for our sins suffered even unto death" (Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, chap. 1, 3). Ignatius (d. c. 110) was a friend of Polycarp who clearly confirmed the suffering and death of Christ, saying, "He really suffered and died, and rose again" (emphasis added). Otherwise, he adds, all His apostles who suffered for this belief, died in vain. "But (in truth), none of these sufferings were in vain; for the Lord was really crucified by the ungodly" (ibid., 107, emphasis added). In his Dialogue With Trypho, Justin Martyr (c. 100–165) noted that Jews of his day believed that "Jesus [was] a Galilean deceiver, whom we crucified" (DT, 253).

This unbroken testimony from the Old Testament to the early church Fathers, including believers and unbelievers, Jews and Gentiles, is overwhelming evidence that Jesus really suffered and died on the cross. The death of Christ by crucifixion is an historical fact beyond all reasonable doubt.

CHRIST'S PHYSICAL RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD

Since Jesus truly died on the cross, the evidence that He was actually raised from the dead consists of the empty tomb and His numerous appearances.

Direct Evidence for the Physical Resurrection of Christ

Again, the direct evidence for the resurrection of Christ is both the empty tomb and His physical appearances in the same body, now raised, in which He died.

The Empty Tomb

While the empty tomb in and of itself is not proof of the Resurrection, it is an indispensable prerequisite to the evidences (the physical appearances of Christ). Even the physical appearances themselves would not be convincing proof that Jesus was resurrected bodily if His body was rotting in some grave. The appearances alone, in another body or physical form, are not proof that the body that died had indeed been raised again, as Jesus said it would be (John 2:19).

Each gospel provides an empty tomb scene (Matt. 28:1–8; Mark 16:1–8; Luke 24:1–12; John 20:1–8). In each case they see a vacated tomb, and in each case there was the appearance of angels to confirm that “He is not here. He is risen” (cf. Matt. 28:6; Mark 16:6; Luke 24:6; John 20:12). John mentions the empty graveclothes with the headcloth folded up in a place by itself, evidence enough to convince John that Jesus had risen (John 20:6–8).

The Appearance to Mary Magdalene (John 20:10–18)

It is an unmistakable sign of the authenticity of the gospel record that in the male-dominated Jewish culture, Jesus appeared first to a woman. In the first century, for example, a woman’s testimony was invalid in court. Certainly, anyone faking the record would have Jesus appearing first to a more prominent disciple, such as Peter, James, or John. During this appearance, there were several proofs of the visibility, materiality, and identity of the resurrection body.

First, Mary saw Christ with her natural eyes. The text says, “She turned around and saw Jesus standing there” (v. 14). The word “saw” (theoreo) is a normal term for seeing with the naked eye; it is used many times of seeing human beings in their physical bodies (Mark 3:11; 5:15; Acts 3:16) and even of seeing Jesus in His pre-resurrection body (Matt. 27:55; John 6:19).

Second, Mary heard Jesus: “Woman, why are you crying? Who is it you are looking for?” (v. 15). Then, again, she heard Jesus say, “Mary,” and she recognized His voice (v. 16). Of course, hearing alone is not a sufficient evidence of materiality. God is immaterial, and yet His voice was heard in John 12:28. Nevertheless, physical hearing connected with physical seeing is significant supportive evidence of the physical nature of what was seen and heard. Mary’s familiarity with Jesus’ voice is also evidence of the identity of the resurrected Christ.

Third, Mary touched Christ’s resurrected body. Jesus replied, “Do not hold on to me, for I have not yet returned to the Father” (v. 17). The word “hold” (aptomai) is a term for the physical touching of a material body; it too is used of the physical touching of other human bodies (Matt.

8:3; 9:29) and of Christ's pre-resurrection body (Mark 6:56; Luke 6:19). The context indicates that Mary was grasping on to Him so as not to lose Him again. In a parallel experience, the women "clasped his feet" (Matt. 28:9).

Fourth, Mary also "went to the tomb and saw that the stone had been removed from the entrance." Then she ran to Peter and announced that the body was gone (v. 2). This would imply that she saw the empty tomb. The parallel account in Matthew informs us that the angels said to her, "Come and see the place where he lay" (Matt. 28:6). Later Peter and John also went into the tomb; John "bent over and looked in at the strips of linen lying there," and Peter "went into the tomb ... and saw the strips of linen lying there, as well as the burial cloth that had been around Jesus' head" (vv. 5–7). Seeing the same physical body that once lay there is proof of the numerical identity of the pre-and post-resurrection body.

In this one account Jesus was seen, heard, and touched. In addition, Mary witnessed both the empty tomb and Jesus' graveclothes. All the evidence for an unmistakable identity of the same visible, physical body that was raised immortal is present in this first appearance.

Jesus' Appearance to Mary Magdalene and the Other Women (Matthew 28:1–10)

Jesus not only appeared to Mary Magdalene but also to the other women with her, including Mary the mother of James and Salome (Mark 16:1). During this appearance there were four evidences presented that Jesus rose in the same tangible, physical body in which He was crucified.

First, the women saw Jesus. They were told by the angel at the empty tomb, "He has risen from the dead and is going ahead of you into Galilee. There you will see him" (v. 7). And, as they hurried away from the tomb, "suddenly Jesus met them. 'Greetings,' he said" (v. 9). Thus, they received visual confirmation of His physical resurrection.

Second, when the women saw Jesus, "they came to him, clasped his feet, and worshiped him." That is, they not only saw His physical body, but they felt it as well. Since spiritual entities cannot be sensed with any of the five senses, the fact that the women actually handled Jesus' physical body is a convincing proof of the tangible, physical nature of the resurrected body.

Third, the women heard Jesus speak. After giving greetings (v. 9), Jesus said to them, "Do not be afraid. Go and tell my brothers to go to Galilee; there they will see me" (v. 10). Therefore, the women saw, touched, and heard Jesus with their physical senses, a threefold confirmation of the physical nature of His resurrection body.

Fourth, in addition to all this, the women saw the empty tomb where that same resurrected body once lay. The angel said to them at the tomb, "He is not here; he has risen, just as he said. Come and see the place where he lay" (v. 6). The same "He" who had been dead is not living, demonstrated by the fact that the same body that once lay there is now alive forevermore. So in both the cases of Mary Magdalene and the other women, all four evidences of the visible, material resurrection of the numerically identical body were present. They saw the empty tomb where His physical body once lay, and they saw, heard, and touched that same body after it came out of the tomb.

Jesus' Appearance to Peter (1 Corinthians 15:5; cf. John 20:3–9)

First Corinthians 15:5 declares that Jesus "was seen of Cephas (Peter)." There is no narration of this event, but the text says He was seen (Gk: ophthe) and implies that He was heard as well. Certainly Peter was not speechless. Jesus definitely spoke with Peter in a later appearance when He asked him to feed His sheep (John 21:15–17). Mark confirms that Peter (and the disciples) would “see him, just as he told you” (Mark 16:7). Peter, of course, saw the empty tomb and the graveclothes just before this appearance (John 20:6–7). Hence, Peter experienced four of the evidences of the physical resurrection; he saw and heard Jesus, and he observed the empty tomb and graveclothes. These are definite pieces of evidence that the body that rose is the same, visible, material body He had before the Resurrection.

Jesus’ Appearance to Two Disciples on the Way to Emmaus (Luke 24:13–35; Mark 16:12–13)

During this appearance there were three evidences of the Resurrection presented. They not only saw and heard Jesus, but they also ate with Him. Combined, these provide clear proof of the tangible, material nature of the resurrection body.

First, there were two disciples, one of whom was named Cleopas (v. 18). As they were walking toward Emmaus, “Jesus himself came up and walked along with them” (v. 15). Although at first they did not recognize who He was, they nevertheless clearly saw Him. When they finally realized who it was, the text says, “He disappeared from their sight” (v. 31). So when present, Jesus’ resurrection body was as visible as any other material object.

Second, they heard Jesus with their physical ears (vv. 17, 19, 25–26). In fact, Jesus carried on a lengthy conversation with them: “Beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself” (v. 27). Of course, they were not the only ones Jesus taught after the Resurrection. Luke informs us elsewhere, “He appeared to them [the apostles] over a period of forty days and spoke about the kingdom of God” (Acts 1:3). During these times He “gave many convincing proofs that he was alive.”

Third, one further evidence of Jesus’ physical resurrection was that He ate with the two disciples. Luke says, “When he was at the table with them, he took bread, gave thanks, broke it and began to give it to them” (v. 30). Although the text does not say specifically that Jesus also ate, it is implied by being “at the table with them.” Later in the chapter it is explicitly stated that he ate with the ten apostles (v. 43). And, in two other places, Luke states that Jesus ate with the disciples (Acts 1:4; 10:41). Thus, on this appearance, the eyewitnesses saw Him, heard Him, and ate with Him. It is difficult to imagine how Jesus could have done anything more to demonstrate the genuine physical nature of the resurrection body.

Jesus’ Appearance to the Ten Disciples (Luke 24:36–49; John 20:19–23)

Later, when Jesus appeared to the ten apostles (Thomas being absent), He was seen, heard, touched, and they saw Him eat fish. Thus, four major evidences of the visible, material nature of the resurrection body were present on this occasion.

First, “while they were still talking about this, Jesus himself stood among them and said to them, ‘Peace be with you.’ ” In fact, Jesus carried on a conversation with them also about how “everything must be fulfilled that is written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms” (v. 44). So Jesus obviously was heard by the disciples.

Second, the disciples also saw Jesus on this occasion. In fact, they thought at first that He was a spirit (v. 37). However, Jesus “showed them his hands and his feet.” Therefore, they clearly saw Him as well as heard Him. In the parallel account, John records that “the disciples were overjoyed when they saw the Lord” (20:20; cf. 25).

Third, it may be inferred from the fact that they were at first unconvinced of His tangible materiality when Jesus presented His wounds to them, that they touched Him as well. In fact, Jesus clearly said to them, “Touch me and see; a ghost does not have flesh and bones as you see I have” (v. 39). The use of “I” and “me” in connection with His physical resurrection body indicates that He is claiming to be numerically identical with His preresurrection body. Jesus also “showed them his hands and feet,” confirming to His disciples that His resurrection body was the very same nailscarred body of flesh and bones that was crucified.

Fourth, on this occasion Jesus actually ate physical food. In order to convince the disciples that He was raised in a literal, physical body, Jesus asked, “Do you have anything here to eat?” In response, “they gave him a piece of broiled fish, and he took it and ate it in their presence” (vv. 41–43). What makes this passage such a powerful proof is that Jesus offered His ability to eat physical food as a demonstration of the material nature of His body of flesh and bones. Jesus literally exhausted the ways in which He could prove the corporeal, material nature of His resurrection body. Thus, if Jesus’ resurrection body was not really the same material body of flesh and bones in which He died, then He cannot be exonerated from the charge of deception.

Jesus’ Appearance to the Eleven Disciples (John 20:24–31)

Again, Thomas was not present when Jesus appeared to the ten apostles (John 20:24). Even after they reported whom they had seen, Thomas refused to believe unless he could see and handle Christ for himself. A week later his wish was granted (John 20:26): When Jesus appeared to Thomas, he got to see, hear, and touch the resurrected Lord.

First, Thomas saw the Lord: “A week later his disciples were in the house again, and Thomas was with them. Though the doors were locked, Jesus came and stood among them and said, ‘Peace be with you!’ ” (v. 26). Jesus was clearly visible to Thomas and later said to him, “You have seen me” (29).

Second, Thomas also heard the Lord. In fact, he heard Jesus say, “Put your finger here; see my hands. Reach out your hand and put it into my side. Stop doubting and believe” (v. 27). To this unquestionably convincing display of physical evidence, Thomas replied, “My Lord and my God!” (v. 28).

Third, it can be inferred from this that Thomas also touched the Lord. Certainly this is what Thomas said he wanted to do (v. 25), and this is precisely what Jesus told him to do (v. 27). Although the text only says that Thomas saw and believed (29), it is natural to believe that he also touched Jesus. Jesus was touched on at least two other occasions: John 20:27. At any rate, Thomas certainly encountered a visible, physical resurrection body with his natural senses.

Fourth, whether or not Thomas touched Christ, he certainly saw His crucifixion wounds (John 20:27–29). And the fact that Jesus still had these physical wounds from His crucifixion is an unmistakable proof that He was resurrected in the very same material body in which He was crucified. This was the second time that Jesus “showed them his hands and feet” (Luke 24:40). Once again, it is difficult to suggest that greater proof could be offered that the resurrection body was the same body of flesh that was crucified and is now glorified.

Jesus’ Appearance to the Seven Disciples (John 21)

John records Jesus’ appearance to the seven disciples who went fishing in Galilee. On this occasion the disciples saw, heard, and ate breakfast with Jesus, thus manifesting again the tangible, physical nature of His resurrection body, as well as its real activity in space and time.

First, they saw Jesus, for the Bible says that “Jesus appeared again to his disciples, by the Sea of Tiberias” (John 21:1). Early in the morning they saw Him standing on the shore (v. 4), and after He talked and ate with them, the text says this was “now the third time Jesus appeared to his disciples after he was raised from the dead” (v. 14).

Second, the disciples heard Jesus speak on this occasion (vv. 5–6, 10, 12). Jesus carried on an extended conversation with Peter in which he was asked three times whether he loved Jesus (vv. 15–17). Since Peter had denied Jesus three times, not only did Peter hear Jesus speak, but Jesus’ words no doubt rang in his ears. Jesus also told Peter how he would die (vv. 18–19).

Third, Jesus apparently also ate with the disciples during this time. He asked them, “Friends, haven’t you any fish?” (v. 5). After telling them how to catch some (v. 6), Jesus requested them to “bring some of the fish you have just caught” (v. 10). Then He said, “Come and have breakfast” (v. 12). As they did, “Jesus came, took the bread and gave it to them, and did the same with the fish” (v. 13). Although the text does not explicitly state that Jesus ate; nevertheless, as host of the meal it would have been strange for Him not to have partaken with them. So in addition to seeing and hearing Jesus, He evidenced the material nature of His resurrection by eating physical food.

Jesus’ Appearance to All the Apostles at the “Great Commission” (Matthew 28:16–20; Mark 16:14–18)

The next appearance of Christ was at the Great Commission. As Jesus commanded them to disciple all nations, He was both seen and clearly heard by all the apostles.

First, the text says that the disciples went to Galilee, where Jesus had told them to go (v. 16), and “when they saw him, they worshiped him” (v. 17). Mark adds, “Jesus appeared to the Eleven as they were eating” (Mark 16:24). However, it was not simply what they saw, but what they heard that left a permanent impression as Jesus made His last appearance to them.

Second, the apostles heard Jesus, since on this occasion He “spoke about the kingdom of God” (Acts 1:3). During this specific appearance Jesus commanded them: “Do not leave Jerusalem, but wait for the gift my Father promised, which you have heard me speak about” (Acts 1:4). Thus, it was not only a familiar voice, but a familiar teaching that confirmed to the apostles that it was the very same Jesus speaking to them after the Resurrection as before.

Third, Luke also says in this passage that Jesus ate with the disciples. This last appearance to them before the Ascension was “on one occasion, while he was eating with them” (Acts 1:4). This is the fourth recorded instance of Jesus eating after the Resurrection. It was apparently something He did often, since even the short summary of His ministry by Peter in Acts 10 declares that the apostles “ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead” (v. 41). Surely both the intimate fellowship and the physical ability to eat food were more than sufficient proof that Jesus was appearing to them in the same tangible, physical body He possessed before His resurrection.

Jesus’ Appearance to Paul After the Ascension (1 Corinthians 15:8; Acts 9:1–9)

Jesus also appeared to Paul; this was actually Jesus’ “last” appearance (1 Cor. 15:8). It is important to note that this appearance was not a mere vision; that is, something occurring only within the mind of Paul. Rather, it was an objective, external event observable to all who were within visual distance. This is clear from several facts.

For one thing, Paul called this an “appearance” (Gk: ophthe), the same word used of Christ’s literal appearance to the other apostles (1 Cor. 15:5–7), which Paul calls His “last” appearance to them.

For another, seeing the resurrected Christ was a condition for being an apostle (Acts 1:22), and Paul claimed to be one, saying, “Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?” (1 Cor. 9:1).

Also, mere visions do not have physical manifestations connected with them, such as light and a voice.

In addition, the resurrection experiences, including Paul’s, are never once called “visions” (optasia) anywhere in the Gospels or the Epistles: They are real physical appearances. During the appearance to Paul, Jesus was both seen and heard, which is always indicative of a true physical appearance rather than a mere vision. The Gospels do speak of a “vision” of angels (Luke 24:23), and Acts refers to Paul’s “vision from heaven” (Acts 26:19), which may be a reference to the vision(s) he and Ananias received later (Acts 9:11–12; cf. 22:6–11). Indeed, speaking of visions, Kittel’s Theological Dictionary of the New Testament declares that the New Testament “distinguishes them ... from the Damascus experience” (5:357). Even if it could be shown that this was a reference to Paul’s Damascus-Road experience, it would only prove that the word vision had an overlapping usage with the kind of literal physical appearance Christ made to Paul.

As for the actual appearance to Paul, Christ was both seen and heard with the physical senses of those present.

First, the physical manifestation of the resurrected Jesus to Paul was both heard and seen by the apostle. In 1 Corinthians 15, Paul said that Jesus “appeared to me also” (v. 8). In the detailed account of this in Acts 26, Paul said, “I saw a light from heaven” (v. 13). That Paul is referring to a physical light is clear from the fact that it was so bright it blinded his physical eyes. Paul not only saw the light, but he saw Jesus (1 Cor. 9:1).

Second, Paul also heard the voice of Jesus speaking distinctly to him “in Aramaic” (Acts 26:14). The physical voice Paul heard asked, “Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?” (Acts 9:4). Paul carried on a conversation with Jesus (vv. 5–6) and was obedient to His command to go into the city of Damascus (v. 8). Paul’s miraculous conversion, his tireless efforts for Jesus, and his strong emphasis on the literal Resurrection (Rom. 4:25; 10:9; 1 Cor. 15) all show what an indelible impression the appearance made upon him.

Not only did Paul see the light and hear the voice, but those who were with him did as well. This shows that the experience was not private; it was not purely subjective but had an objective referent. It happened “out there” in the real physical world, not merely in the world of his exclusive spiritual experience. Anyone who had been there could also have seen and heard the physical manifestation.

The sum total of the direct evidence for the physical resurrection of Christ is massive. Compared to the evidence for other events from the ancient world, it is overwhelming (see chart). During these twelve recorded appearances, Jesus was seen by more than five hundred people over a forty-day period of time (Acts 1:3; cf. 1 Cor. 15:6). On all twelve occasions Jesus was not only seen, but probably heard. Four times He offered Himself to be touched.

THE TWELVE APPEARANCES OF CHRIST

Persons	Saw	Heard	Touched	Other Evidence
Mary	•	•	•	Empty tomb
Mary & women	•	•	•	Empty tomb
Peter	•	•		Empty tomb, graveclothes

(John)				(Empty tomb, graveclothes)
Two disciples	•	•		Ate food
Ten apostles	•	•	•	Death wounds, ate food
Eleven apostles	•	•	•	Death wounds
Seven apostles	•	•		Ate food
All apostles	•	•
500 brethren	•	•
James	•	•
All apostles	•	•		Ate food
Paul	•	•

(He was definitely touched twice.) Jesus revealed His crucifixion scars on two occasions. There were four times the empty tomb was seen, and twice the empty graveclothes were viewed. In another four instances Jesus ate food.

The sum total of this evidence is tremendous confirmation that Jesus rose and lived in the same visible, material body He possessed before His resurrection.

Indirect Evidence for the Physical Resurrection of Christ

In addition to all the direct evidence for the bodily resurrection of Christ, there are many lines of confirming evidence. These include the immediate transformation of the disciples, the reaction of those who rejected Christ, the existence of the early church, and, among other things, the amazingly rapid spread of Christianity.

The Immediate Transformation of the Disciples

After Jesus' death His disciples were scared, scattered, and skeptical. Only one apostle (John) was present at the Crucifixion (John 19:26–27); the rest had fled for their lives (Matt. 26:56). Mary, the first one to whom Jesus appeared, doubted, thinking she had seen a gardener (John 20:15). The apostles doubted the women who first reported seeing the empty tomb (Luke 24:11) and the risen Christ. Some doubted until they saw Christ for themselves (John 20:25). One would not believe when all the other apostles told him Christ had appeared to them. Two disciples on the road to Emmaus doubted even as they talked with Jesus, thinking He was a stranger (Luke 24:16–18).

Yet within a few weeks these very same skeptical disciples, who were earlier huddling in secret for fear of their lives (John 20:19), were fearlessly and openly proclaiming the resurrection of Christ in the face of death (Acts 4–5). The best explanation for this immediate and miraculous change is that they were absolutely convinced they had encountered the bodily resurrected Christ.

The Predominant Theme of Apostolic Preaching

Of all the wonderful things Jesus taught them about love (Matt. 22:36–37), non-retaliation (Matt. 5), and the kingdom of God (cf. Matt. 13), the prevailing theme of apostolic preaching was none of these: It was the resurrection of Christ. This was the subject of both Peter’s first sermon at Pentecost (Acts 2:22ff.) and his next sermon in the temple (Acts 3:15, 26). It was also the content of his message to the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:10). Indeed, they went everywhere, and “with great power the apostles continued to testify to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus” (Acts 4:33; cf. 4:2). Again, in point of fact, being “a witness ... of His resurrection” was a condition for being an apostle (Acts 1:21–22; cf. 1 Cor. 9:1). The best explanation of why this theme, out of all Jesus’ teaching, was their immediate preoccupation within weeks of His death was that they had, as the Gospels tell us, repeatedly encountered Him alive a few days after His crucifixion and resurrection.

The Reaction of Those Who Rejected Christ

The reaction of the Jewish authorities is also testimony to the fact of Christ’s resurrection.

First, they did not refute it; rather, they resisted it (cf. Acts 4:2ff.). Surely if they could have found Jesus’ dead body somewhere they would have produced it and defeated once and for all the claim of His disciples. But they did not—instead of finding the dead body, they fought the disciples who testified that they had seen the body alive. The very fact that they persecuted the witnesses to the Resurrection, rather than disproving them, is evidence that what the disciples witnessed was real.

Second, the authorities tried to discredit the Resurrection by bribing the soldiers who guarded the tomb (Matt. 28:11ff). The claim that Jesus’ body was stolen shows how desperate they were in their attempts to resist the reality of the Resurrection.

The Existence of the Early Church

Another indirect proof of the Resurrection is the very existence of the early church. There are good reasons why the church should not have arisen.

First, the original church consisted largely of Jews who believed there was only one God (Deut. 6:4), and yet they proclaimed that Jesus was God (see “CD” in Geisler, BECA.) They prayed to Jesus (Acts 7:59), baptized in His Name (Acts 2:38), claimed He was exalted to God’s right hand (Acts 2:33; 7:55), and called Him Lord and Christ (2:34–36), the very title that earned Jesus the charge of blasphemy from the Jewish high priest at His trial (Matt. 26:63–65).

Second, they were persecuted, beaten, threatened with death, and even martyred (Acts 7:57–60). Even so, they not only maintained their belief but quickly grew in number. If what they testified to was not real, they had every reason and opportunity to give it up. But they did not. Only a real encounter with the resurrected Christ can adequately account for their existence as a Jewish sect that later came to be known as the “Christians” (Acts 11:26).

The Immediate Amazingly Rapid Growth of Christianity

In contrast to other religions, which grew slowly at first, Christianity experienced an immediate and rapid growth. Three thousand were saved the very first day (Acts 2:41), while many others were added to their ranks daily (Acts 2:47), and within days five thousand more became believers (Acts 4:4). The “number of the disciples was increasing” so rapidly that deacons had to be appointed to care for the widows (Acts 6:1). And all of this occurred in the very city (Jerusalem) in which Jesus had been crucified and from where the disciples had fled. Surely nothing other than the bodily resurrection of Christ and His promised power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8) can sufficiently account for this amazing growth.

When taken together, the evidence for the resurrection of Christ is both voluminous and compelling: There is nothing like it for any other historical event from the ancient world. There are more documents, more eyewitnesses, and more corroborative evidence than anything from ancient history. In addition, the secondary and supplementary evidence is convincing in its own right—combined with the direct evidence, it presents an overwhelming case for the physical resurrection of Christ, placing it, to borrow legal terminology, “beyond all reasonable doubt.”

The Early Conversion of Jewish Priests

The most unlikely group to be converted to early Christianity were the Jewish priests. They were the guardians of first-century Judaism with whom Jesus and His followers found themselves in constant conflict. However, we read that very soon after Jesus’ resurrection many Jewish priests who had the best access to the evidence and the strongest motive not to convert became believers. Acts 6:7 records that “the word of God spread ... [and] the number of disciples in Jerusalem increased rapidly, and a large number of priests became obedient to the faith.”

The Conversion of the Apostle Paul

Perhaps the least likely person to be converted to Christianity was Saul of Tarsus, student of the great Jewish Rabbi Gamaliel. He assisted in the first martyrdom of a Christian, Stephen (Acts 7:58; 8:1). He persecuted Christians (9:1) and was one of the most devout and zealous anti-Christians of the day (Phil. 3:4–6). Nothing short of an appearance of the resurrected Christ can account for His sudden and miraculous conversion (Acts 9). Indeed, later he lists himself along with Peter and James as one who had “seen Jesus our Lord” (1 Cor. 9:1) after His resurrection.

Objections to the Physical Resurrection of Christ

There are, of course, many objections leveled against the physical resurrection of Jesus. Some claim that this would be a miracle and that miracles are not believable, but this has already been refuted (see Volume 1, chapter 3). Others claim that the New Testament documents and witnesses recording these events were not reliable, yet this too has been rebutted (see Volume 1, chapter 26). Still others have devised alternative theories opposing the Resurrection, such as the “swoon theory” or the “stolen-body hypothesis,” or that the alleged appearances were cases of mistaken identity. But all of these fly in the face of the evidence for Christ’s death and the evidence for His resurrection just presented. The facts are that Jesus of Nazareth really died and actually came back from the dead on the third day in the same physical body.

CHRIST'S BODILY ASCENSION INTO HEAVEN

Several New Testament texts affirm clearly that Jesus rose in the same body in which He died. This physical body was made immortal at His resurrection (1 Cor. 15:20; cf. 15:53), and it was glorified (John 17:1, 5; 1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Peter 1:11) at His ascension—the same physical body in which He lived and died (cf. John 2:19; Luke 24:39).

Luke 9:51

“As the time approached for him to be taken up to heaven, Jesus resolutely set out for Jerusalem.” In this passage, Jesus is looking forward to Jerusalem, where He will be crucified, and to the final assumption into heaven after His resurrection.

Luke 24:49–51

“I am going to send you what my Father has promised; but stay in the city until you have been clothed with power from on high. When he had led them out to the vicinity of Bethany, he lifted up his hands and blessed them. While he was blessing them, he left them and was taken up into heaven.”

John 6:62

“What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before!” Here Jesus appears to allude to His later ascension, noting that He will return to the Father from whom He came—this time, of course, in bodily form.

John 14:2–3

“In my Father’s house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am.”

Christ’s ascension was necessary to complete the work of salvation by preparing a place for His bride. Paul said, “Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word, and to present her to himself as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless” (Eph. 5:25–27).

John 14:12, 28

“I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father.... You heard me say, ‘I am going away and I am coming back to you.’ If you loved me, you would be glad that I am going to the Father.”

Without Christ’s ascension, the Holy Spirit would not have descended to indwell and empower the disciples.

John 16:10, 28

“I am going to the Father, where you can see me no longer.... I came from the Father and entered the world; now I am leaving the world and going back to the Father.”

The language is unequivocal. Jesus came from and returned to His Father; He descended and then ascended.

John 20:17

“Jesus said [to Mary Magdalene], ‘Do not hold on to me, for I have not yet returned to the Father. Go instead to my brothers and tell them, “I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God.” ’ ”

Here the resurrected Christ predicted His ascension and told Mary to stop clinging to Him, since He had not completed His work by ascending to the Father and receiving the Father’s acceptance of His completed work of salvation.

Ephesians 4:9–10

“What does ‘he ascended’ mean except that he also descended to the lower, earthly regions? He who descended is the very one who ascended higher than all the heavens, in order to fill the whole universe.”

Just as Jesus in His humiliation descended to the earth, so in His exaltation He ascended into heaven.

Philippians 2:8–11

Being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross! Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Acts 1:9–11

After he said this, he was taken up before their very eyes, and a cloud hid him from their sight. They were looking intently up into the sky as he was going, when suddenly two men dressed in white stood beside them. “Men of Galilee,” they said, “why do you stand here looking into the sky? This same Jesus, who has been taken from you into heaven, will come back in the same way you have seen him go into heaven.”

This is the chief text on Christ’s bodily assumption into heaven; it affirms that it was a literal, visible ascension in Jesus’ resurrection body. His body was not, as some suggest, transformed into being invisible, but rather His physical body simply passed out of their sight behind “a cloud [which] hid him from their sight.”

This also raises the question of where Jesus’ body is at the present time. Evangelical scholars offer two views. One is that Jesus’ body moved literally and physically into another dimension. This, they suggest, is evidenced by the apparent immediacy with which Jesus appeared and disappeared after His resurrection (cf. Luke 24:31). Modern physics, with its many dimensions, appears to make something like this possible. It would also provide an answer to the problem of Jesus' being physical and, thus, visibly present somewhere in the physical cosmos where, say, a high-powered telescope could see Him. However, none of these are insurmountable difficulties, since Jesus could surely hide behind a cloud of His shekinah glory in some remote place in the universe that we could not penetrate.

The other view is that Jesus is still present in this space-time dimension. The fact that the text implies He did not disappear immediately but ascended gradually until He was hidden by a cloud would seem to lend support to the view that His body is still present but hidden in the space-time universe. Whichever view, Christ still exists in the numerically same physical body, now glorified, in which He died, rose, and ascended.

CHRIST'S PRESENT SESSION

In addition to Christ's physical death, literal bodily resurrection, and bodily ascension, He has an important present priestly session for believers in heaven.

1 John 2:1–2

My dear children, I write this to you so that you will not sin. But if anybody does sin, we have one who speaks to the Father in our defense—Jesus Christ, the Righteous One. He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world.

Satan is the accuser of God's people (cf. Rev. 12:8–10; Job 1–2). John testified,

I heard a loud voice in heaven say: "Now have come the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ. For the accuser of our brothers, who accuses them before our God day and night, has been hurled down" (Rev. 12:10).

In view of this, Christ—our Advocate—counters by pleading the efficacy of His blood, shed for our sins.

Hebrews 7:17–26

It is declared: "You are a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek." ... Because of this oath, Jesus has become the guarantee of a better covenant. Now there have been many of those priests, since death prevented them from continuing in office; but because Jesus lives forever, he has a permanent priesthood. Therefore he is able to save completely those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them. Such a high priest meets our need—one who is holy, blameless, pure, set apart from sinners, exalted above the heavens.

Because Christ has humanity as well as deity, He can sympathize with our human frailties:

Therefore, since we have a great high priest who has gone through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold firmly to the faith we profess. For we do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but we have one who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin. (Heb. 4:14–15)

Since He Himself was tempted in all points that we are, He can, by His present session, overcome these temptations: "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor. 10:13). This “way out” is provided by Christ’s present intercession for us—it is His present priestly ministry on our behalf.

CHRIST’S RETURN AND REIGN

As noted above, Christ will come again literally and physically to fulfill His role as King over His people. A complete discussion of Christ’s second coming and subsequent reign is found under eschatology (“last things”) in Volume 4, chapters 15–16.

APPENDIX THREE

VARIOUS VIEWS ON ORIGINS

There are four basic views on origins (see Geisler and Anderson, Origin Science, 165 ff.); two are naturalistic, and two are super naturalistic. The naturalistic views are called naturalistic creation and naturalistic evolution. The super-natural views are named theistic creation and theistic evolution. They can be diagrammed as follows.

Naturalistic Evolution

Naturalistic evolution believes there is no God involved in creation—things emerged by purely natural processes. Carl Sagan (1934–1996) and Isaac Asimov (1920–1992) are examples of adherents to this view.

Naturalistic Creation

Naturalistic creation believes there is no theistic Creator beyond the world—only a creative Mind within the universe that creates. This view is represented by Sir Fred Hoyle (1915–2001) and Nalin Chandra Wickramasinghe (b. 1939).

Theistic Evolution

Theistic evolution holds that there is a theistic God beyond the world who created it, but that from that point on all living things emerged under His control by largely natural processes. This position has been held by Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955) and by many Christian scholars, such as Howard Van Till.

Theistic Creation

Theistic creation contends that God directly created the universe, living things, and human beings. Those in this camp differ on how many things were created and how much time it took God to create them, but there is agreement that God was directly involved in creating the world, life, and humankind. Most believe, as I do, that God directly created different forms of plant and animal life, from which all variety of living things has emerged.

Both theistic evolution and theistic creation believe in a supernatural primary Cause of the universe. They disagree on whether/to what degree God used secondary causes to bring about living things (and especially human beings).

Both naturalistic evolution and naturalistic creation hold that there is no supernatural Cause beyond the universe. They disagree, however, on whether there is an intelligent primary Cause (Mind) within the universe that accounts for its design and complexity. C. S. Lewis's note on this view is penetrating:

To be complete I ought to mention the in-between view called Life Force philosophy, or Creative Evolution, or Emergent Evolution.... One reason why many people find Creative Evolution so attractive is that it gives one much of the emotional comfort of believing in God and none of the less pleasant consequences. When you are feeling fit and the sun is shining and you do not want to believe that the whole universe is a mere mechanical dance of atoms, it is nice to be able to think of this great mysterious Force rolling on through the centuries and carrying you on its crest. If, on the other hand, you want to do something rather shabby, the Life-Force, being only a blind force, with no morals and no mind, will never interfere with you like that troublesome God we learned about when we were children. The Life-Force is a sort of tame God. You can switch it on when you want, but it will not bother you. All the thrills of religion and none of the cost. Is the Life-Force the greatest achievement of wishful thinking the world has yet seen? (Mere Christianity, 35, note)

APPENDIX FOUR

VARIOUS VIEWS OF THE “DAYS” OF GENESIS

There are two major views with regard to the time involved in Creation: the old earth view and the young-earth view. The latter believes the universe is no more than approximately 15,000 years old, while the former holds that it is probably about 15,000,000,000 years old.

Young-earthers take the “days” of Creation to be six successive, literal, solar days of twenty-four hours each, totaling 144 hours of Creation. They also reject any significant time gaps between the accounts in Genesis 1 or within the genealogies in Genesis 5 and 11.

THE SIX TWENTY-FOUR-HOUR-DAY VIEW OF CREATION

Not all scholars who take the days of Genesis to be twenty-four hour days are young-earthers (some hold a gap theory); however, all who hold to a young earth hold to the twenty-four-hour-day view.

Arguments Offered for the Twenty-Four-Hour-Day View

There are many biblical arguments presented in favor of the twenty-four-hour-day position. These include the following.

The Normal Meaning of the Word Day (Yom)

It is contended that the usual meaning of the Hebrew word yom (“day”) is twenty-four hours unless the context indicates otherwise. The context does not indicate anything but a twenty-four-hour-day in Genesis 1; hence, the days should be taken as solar days.

The Use of Numbered Series

Further, it is noted that when numbers are used in a series (1, 2, 3 ... ) in connection with the word day (yom) in the Old Testament, it always refers to twenty-four-hour-days. The absence of any exception to this in the Old Testament is given as evidence of the fact that Genesis 1 is referring to twenty-four-hour-days.

The Use of “Evening and Morning”

Another line of evidence is the use of the phrase “evening and morning” in connection with each day in Genesis 1. Since the literal twenty-four-hour-day on the Jewish calendar began in the “evening” (by sunset) and ended in the “morning” (before sunset) the next day, it is concluded that these are literal twenty-four-hour-days.

The Comparison With a Six-Day Workweek

According to the law of Moses (Ex. 20:11), the Jewish workweek (Sunday through Friday) was to be followed by a day of rest on Saturday, just as God had done in His “six-day week” of creation. The Jewish workweek refers to six successive twenty-four-hour-days. This being the case, it seems that the creation week, like the workweek, was only 144 hours long.

Life Cannot Exist for Thousands of Years Without Light

Young-earthers claim that according to Genesis 1, light was not made until the fourth day (v. 14), but there was life on the third day (v. 1:11–13). However, life on earth cannot exist for millions (or even thousands) of years without light; thus, the “days” must not have been long periods of time.

Plants Cannot Live Without Animals

Plants were created on the third day (1:11–13), and animals were not created until later (1:20–23). There is a symbiotic relation between plants and animals, one depending on the other for its life. For example, plants give off oxygen and take in carbon dioxide, and animals do the reverse. Therefore, plants and animals must have been created closely together, not separated by long periods of time.

The Old Earth View Implies Death Before Adam

According to the old-earth position, there was death before Adam. Nevertheless, the Bible declares that death came only after Adam, as a result of his sin: “Just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned” (Rom. 5:12; cf. 8:20–22).

The Old-Earth View Is an Accommodation to Evolution

It is well known that the theory of evolution (or common ancestry) depends on very long periods of time for life to develop from a one-celled animal to human beings. Without these long periods of time, evolution would not be possible. Thus, it is argued by young-earthers that granting long periods of time is an accommodation to evolution.

Mark 10:6 Affirms That Adam and Eve Were Created at the Beginning

According to this text, “At the beginning of creation God ‘made them male and female.’ “If God created humankind at the beginning of Creation, then they were not created at the end of millions of years, as the old-earth view contends.

A Response to the Arguments Offered for the Twenty-Four-Hour-Day View

In spite of the fact that many find these arguments convincing proof of six successive twenty-four-hour-days of Creation, the case is less than definitive for several reasons. Those who reject the six-successive-solar-day view reply as follows.

The Normal Meaning of the Word Day (Yom)

It is true that most often the Hebrew word yom (“day”) means “twenty-four hours.” However, this is not definitive for its meaning in Genesis 1 for several reasons.

First, the meaning of a term is not determined by majority vote, but by the context in which it is used. It is not important how many times it is used elsewhere, but how it is used here.

Second, even in the creation story in Genesis 1–2, “day” (yom) is used of more than a twenty-four-hour period. Speaking of the whole six “days” of creation, Genesis 2:4 refers to it as “the day” (yom) when all things were created.

Third, and finally, yom is elsewhere used of long periods of time, as in Psalm 90:4, which is cited in 2 Peter 3:8: “A day is like a thousand years.”

The Use of Numbered Series

Critics of the twenty-four-hour-day view point out that there is no rule of the Hebrew language demanding that all numbered days in a series refer to twenty-four-hour-days. Further, even if there were no exceptions in the rest of the Old Testament, it would not mean that “day” in Genesis 1 does not refer to more than a twenty four hour period of time: Genesis 1 may be the exception! Finally, contrary to the solar-day view, there is another example in the Old Testament of a numbered series of days that are not twenty-four-hour-days. Hosea 6:1–2 reads: “Come, let us return to the LORD. He has torn us to pieces but he will heal us; he has injured us but he will bind up our wounds. After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will restore us, that we may live in his presence.” It is clear that the prophet is not speaking of twenty-four-hour “days,” but of longer periods of time in the future. Even so, he uses numbered days in a series.

The Use of “Evening and Morning”

First, the fact that the phrase “evening and morning” is often used in connection with twenty-four-hour-days does not mean it must always be used in this way.

Second, if one is going to take everything in Genesis 1 in a strictly literal way, then the phrase “evening and morning” does not encompass all of a twenty-four-hour-day, but only the late afternoon of one day and the early morning of another. This is considerably less than twenty four hours.

Third, technically, the text does not say the “day” was composed of “evening and morning” (thus allegedly making a twenty four hour Jewish day); rather, it simply says, “And there was evening, and there was morning—the first day” (Gen. 1:5). Further, the phrase may be a figure of speech indicating a beginning and end to a definite period of time, just as we see in phrases like “the dawn of world history” or the “sunset years of one’s life.”

Fourth, if every day in this series of seven is to be taken as twenty-four hours, why is the phrase “evening and morning” not used with one of the days (the seventh)? In fact, as we shall see (below), the seventh day is not twenty-four hours, and thus there is no necessity to take the other days as twenty four hours either, since all of them alike use the same word (yom) and have a series of numbers with them.

Fifth, and finally, in Daniel 8:14, “evenings and mornings” (cf. v. 26) refer to a period of 2,300 days. Indeed, often in the Old Testament the phrase is used as a figure of speech meaning “continually” (cf. Ex. 18:13; 27:21; Lev. 24:3; Job 4:20).

The Comparison With a Six-Day Workweek

It is true that the creation week is compared with a workweek (Ex. 20:11); however, it is not uncommon in the Old Testament to make unit-to-unit comparisons rather than minute-for-minute ones. For example, God appointed forty years of wandering for forty days of disobedience (Num. 14:34). And, in Daniel 9, 490 days equals 490 years (cf. 9:24–27). What is more, we know the seventh day is more than twenty-four hours, since according to Hebrews 4 the seventh day is still going on. Genesis says that “on the seventh day [God] rested” (Gen. 2:2), but Hebrews informs us that God is still in that Sabbath rest into which He entered after He created: “There remains, then, a Sabbath-rest for the people of God; for anyone who enters God’s rest also rests from his own work, just as God did from his” (Heb. 4:10).

Life Cannot Exist for Thousands of Years Without Light

Light was not created on the fourth day, as defenders of the solar day argue; rather, it was made on the very first day when God said, “Let there be light” (Gen. 1:3). As to why there was light on the first day when the sun did not appear until the fourth day, there are various possibilities. Some scholars have noted a parallelism between the first three days (light, water, and land—all empty) and the second three days (light, water, and land—all filled with bodies). This may indicate a parallelism in which the first and fourth days cover the same period, in which case the sun existed from the beginning.

Others have pointed out that while the sun was created on the first day, it did not appear until the fourth day. Perhaps this was due to a vapor cloud that allowed light through, but not the distinct shape of the heavenly bodies from which the light emanated.

Plants Cannot Live Without Animals

Some plants and animals are interdependent, but not all. Genesis does not mention all the plants and animals, but only some. If the “days” are six successive periods, then those forms of plant and animal life that need each other could have been created together. In fact, the basic order of events is the order of dependence. For instance, many plants and animals can exist without humans (and they were created first), but humans (who were created on the sixth day) cannot exist without certain plants and animals. In addition, if the “days” are parallel, then the problem does not exist, since plants and animals would exist at the same time. In any event, the argument from the symbiotic relation of plants and animals does not prove that the six “days” of Genesis 1 must be only 144 hours in duration.

The Old-Earth View Implies Death Before Adam

There are several problems with this argument.

First, Romans 5:12 does not say all animals die because of Adam’s sin, but only that “all men” die as a consequence.

Second, Romans 8 does not say that animal death results from Adam’s sin, but only that the “creation was subjected to frustration” as a result of it (v. 20).

Third, if Adam ate anything—and he had to eat in order to live—then at least plants had to die before he sinned.

Fourth, and finally, the fossil evidence indicates animal death before human death, since people are found only on the top (later) strata while animals are found in lower (earlier) strata.

The Old-Earth View Is an Accommodation to Evolution

In response to this charge, it must be observed that allowing for long periods of time for the development of life came long before the idea of evolution. Augustine (354–430), for one, held to long periods of time for the development of life (CG, 11.6).

Also, even in modern times, scientists had concluded that long periods of time were involved before Darwin wrote in 1859.

Furthermore, long periods of time do not help evolution, since without intelligent intervention, more time does not produce the specified complexity involved in life. Natural laws randomize, not specify. For example, dropping red, white, and blue bags of confetti from a plane at 1,000 feet in the air will never produce an American flag on the ground. Giving it more time to fall by dropping it at 10,000 feet will diffuse it even more.

Mark 10:6 Affirms That Adam and Eve Were Created at the Beginning

First, Adam was not created at the beginning but at the end of the creation period (on the sixth day), no matter how long or short the days were.

Second, the Greek word for “create” (ktisis) can and sometimes does mean “institution” or “ordinance” (cf. 1 Peter 2:13). Since Jesus is speaking of the institution of marriage in Mark 10:6, it could mean “from the beginning of the institution of marriage.”

Third, and finally, even if Mark 10:6 is speaking of the original creation events, it does not mean there could not have been a long period of time involved in those creative events.

THE “DAYS” OF GENESIS MAY INVOLVE LONG PERIODS OF TIME

Other orthodox Christians believe that the “days” of Genesis 1 may involve significant periods of time. They offer two lines of evidence in support of this view: biblical and scientific.

The Biblical Evidence for Long Days in Genesis

There are many indications within the text of Scripture to support the belief that the creation “days” were longer than twenty-four hours. The following are those most often given in support of this position.

The Word Day (Yom) Often Means a Long Period of Time

The fact is that the same word that can mean twenty-four hours also often means a longer period of time. First of all, “day” sometimes means a prophetic day; that is, a future time period of differing lengths, as in “the day of the Lord” (Joel 2:31; cf. 2 Peter 3:10). Furthermore, as we have seen, 2 Peter 3:8—“A day is as a thousand years”—is based on Psalm 90:4: “A thousand years in your sight are like a day that has just gone by.” As with any other word, the meaning of the word day must be determined by the context in which it is used. In many contexts, “day” means much more than twenty-four hours. It can mean thousands, or even more.

The Word Day Is More Than Twenty-Four Hours Even in Genesis 1–2

Even in the creation passage, yom is used of a period of time longer than twenty-four hours. Summing up the entire six “days,” the text declares: “This is the history of the heavens and earth when they were created, in the day [yom] that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens” (Gen. 2:4 NKJV). “The day” here means six “days,” which indicates a broad meaning of the word day in the Bible, just as we have in English.

The Seventh “Day” Is Thousands of Years Long

Everyone agrees that it has been at least thousands of years since the time of creation, yet the Bible declares that God rested on the seventh day after His six days of creation (Gen. 2:2–3). According to the book of Hebrews, God is still in His Sabbath rest from creation (4:3–5); hence, the seventh day has been at least six thousand years long, even on the shortest of all the chronologies of humankind.

The Third “Day” Is Longer Than Twenty-Four Hours

On the third “day,” God not only created vegetation, but it grew to maturity. The text says that on the third day “the land produced vegetation: plants bearing seed according to their kinds and trees bearing fruit with seed in it according to their kinds” (Gen. 1:12, emphasis added). To grow from seeds to maturity and produce more seeds is a process that takes much longer than a day, a week, or even a month for most plants. There is no indication in the text that its growth was anything but natural; it is its origin that was supernatural.

The Sixth “Day” Is Longer Than Twenty-Four Hours

It would also appear that the sixth “day” of creation was considerably longer than a solar day. Consider everything that happened during this one “day.”

First, God created all the many hundreds (or thousands) of land animals (Gen. 1:24–25).

Second, God “formed” man of the dust of the earth (Gen. 2:7). This Hebrew word (yatsar) means “to mold” or “form,” which implies time. Yatsar is used specifically of the work of a potter (cf. Jer. 18:2f.).

Third, God said, “I will make a helper suitable for him” (Gen. 2:18, emphasis added). This indicates a time subsequent to the time of the announcement.

Fourth, Adam observed and named this whole multitude of animals (Gen. 2:19). As Robert Newman noted, “If every one of the approximately 15,000 living species of such animals (not to mention those now extinct) were brought to Adam to be named, it would have taken ten hours if he spent only two seconds on each.” This is hardly enough time for Adam to study each animal and determine an appropriate name for it. Assuming a minimum of only two minutes each, the process would have taken six hundred hours (or twenty-five days).

Fifth, Adam searched for a helpmate for himself, apparently among all the creatures God had made. “But for Adam no suitable helper was found” (implying a time of searching) (Gen. 2:20, emphasis added).

Sixth, God put Adam to sleep and operated on him, taking out one of his ribs and healing the flesh (Gen. 2:21). This too involved additional time.

Seventh, Eve was brought to Adam, who observed her, accepted her, and was joined to her (Gen. 2:22–25).

In conclusion, it seems highly unlikely that all of these events—especially the fourth one—were compressed within a twenty-four-hour period or, more precisely, within the approximately twelve hours of light each day afforded.

The Scientific Evidence for Long Days in Genesis

In addition to the biblical evidence for long periods of time, there are scientific arguments that the world has existed for billions of years. The age of the universe is based on

(1) the speed of light and the distance of the stars;

- (2) the rate of expansion of the universe;
- (3) the fact that early rocks have been radioactively dated in terms of billions of years;
- (4) the rate that salt runs into the sea and the amount of salt there, which indicates multimillions of years.

While all of these arguments have certain unprovable presuppositions, nonetheless, they may be true and, hence, point to a universe that is billions rather than thousands of years in age (see Ross, CT).

OTHER VIEWS OF THE “DAYS” OF GENESIS

If, of course, the “days” of Genesis are long periods of time, there is no conflict with modern science on the age of the earth. Nevertheless, even if the “days” of Genesis are twenty-four hours, there are still many ways to reconcile long periods of time with Genesis 1–2.

The Revelatory-Day View

Some conservative scholars have suggested that the “days” of Genesis may be twenty-four-hour days of revelation, not days of Creation (see Wiseman, CRSD, all). That is, they propose that it took God a literal solar week (of 144 hours) to reveal to Adam (or Moses) what He had done in the long ages before humans were created. Even in the Exodus passage (20:11) that speaks of the heavens and earth being “made” (asah) in six days, the word can mean “revealed.” Just as a prophet can get revelation from God looking forward to a future series of events (cf. Dan. 2, 7, 9; Rev. 6–19), even so God can reveal a past series of events to one of His servants. Indeed, Moses was on Mount Sinai for forty days (Ex. 24:18), and God could have taken six of these days to reveal the past creation events to him. Or, after God created Adam, He could have taken six literal days to reveal to him what He had done before Adam was created. Some scholars believe this material could have been memorized and passed on as the first “account of the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 2:4), just as the other “histories” (or “genealogies”) were apparently recorded and passed on (cf. Gen. 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; etc.).

The Alternate-Day-Age View

Other evangelical scholars have suggested that the “days” of Genesis are twenty-four-hour periods of time in which God created the things mentioned, but that they are separated by long periods of time in between. This would account for the indications in Genesis 1 that these are twenty-four-hour days (like numbered days and “evening and morning”), while at the same time leaving room for the geological ages demanded by modern science.

Gap Theories

C. I. Scofield (1843–1921) made popular the view that there could be a great gap of time between the first two verses of the Bible into which all of the geological ages fit. In this way, the “days” could be twenty-four hours each, and yet the world could still be many millions of years old or more.

Others believe that there may be a “gap” or, better, a lapse of time before the six twenty-four-hour days of Genesis begin. In this case, the first verse of the Bible would not necessarily indicate the original ex nihilo creation of God, but more recent acts of God forming a world He had previously created (see Waltke, CAG, all).

The Ideal-Time View

There is also a position variously known as the prochronism, apparent-age, or ideal-time view. According to this perspective, the earth and all living things were created with the appearance of age (see Gosse, O, chapters 6–7)—that is, they were created mature. For example, Adam may have looked twenty-one years old a minute after he was created, but he was really only a minute old. Likewise, it is argued that Adam may have had a naval, like all his descendants do, even though he was never connected by an umbilical cord to a mother. Also, it is theorized that the first trees may have been created with rings in them rather than receiving them from annual growth. If this is so, then the world can be actually young and only apparently very old.

The Literary-Framework View

Still others, like Herman Ridderbos (b. 1900), have suggested that the use of “days” and “evening and morning” are merely ancient literary devices to frame certain periods of time in order to encapsulate them in literary form much like we use a “chapter” to do the same. It is reasoned that since evening and morning were natural ways to point to a period of time with a beginning and an end, this was an appropriate way for God to reveal to Adam (or Moses) what He had done in certain periods of time before humans arrived on the scene.

In summary, there are numerous ways that one can account for long periods of time and still accept a literal understanding of Genesis 1–2. That is, one does not have to give up the normal historical-grammatical way of interpreting the Bible in order to embrace these views. Therefore, there is no necessary conflict between Genesis and the belief that the universe is millions or even billions of years old. Indeed, of all the ways of interpreting Genesis 1–2, only the “religious only” or “myth” view is flatly incompatible with an evangelical understanding of Scripture, since it rejects that Genesis 1 is providing literal information about the origin of the space-time universe and all living things.

APPENDIX FIVE

THE AGE OF THE EARTH

There seems to be no way to actually prove how old the universe really is, either from science or from the Bible, for there are known and possible gaps in the biblical genealogies (see below). In addition, there are unprovable presuppositions in most, if not all, the scientific arguments for an old earth (see below); that is, an earth of millions or billions of years is biblically possible but not absolutely provable.

Gaps in the Biblical Record

Bishop James Usher (1581–1656), whose chronology was used in the old Scofield Reference Bible, argued that Adam was created in 4,004 B.C. However, his calculations are based on the assumption that there are no gaps in the genealogical tables of Genesis 5 and 11, while we know this is false. For instance, the Bible says: “Arphaxad ... became the father of Shelah” (Gen. 11:12), but in Jesus’ genealogy in Luke 3:35–36, “Cainan” is listed between Arphaxad and Shelah. If there is one gap, there may be more—indeed, we know there are more. For example, Matthew 1:8 says: “Jehoram the father of Uzziah,” but the parallel listing in 1 Chronicles 3:11–14 illustrates missing generations between Jehoram and Uzziah (Azariah), namely, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah. Just how many gaps there are in biblical genealogies and how much time they represent is not known. Even so, gaps there are and, hence, complete chronologies cannot be made; only accurate genealogies (lines of descent) are given.

Presuppositions in the Scientific Arguments

There are many scientific arguments for an old universe, some of which one may find persuasive. However, none of these is foolproof, and all of them may be wrong. A few examples will illustrate the point of why we should not be dogmatic one way or the other.

The Speed of Light Is Not Guaranteed

In spite of the facts that Albert Einstein (1879–1955) considered it to be absolute and that modern science has held it to be unchanging, it has not been proven that the speed of light has never changed. The speed of light (about 186,000 miles per second) is an assumption for many arguments favoring an old earth. However, if the speed of light is constant, and if God did not also create the light rays when He created the stars, then it would appear that the universe is billions of years old, for it has apparently taken millions of years for that light to get to us. Nevertheless, these are big “ifs” that have not been proven, and they would actually appear to be unprovable. So while the arguments from the speed of light to an old universe may seem plausible, they fall short of being a demonstrable proof.

Radioactive Dating

It is well known that the elements U235 and U238 give off lead isotopes at a known rate per year. By measuring the amount of their deposit, one can calculate when the decay began. Many early rocks in the earth’s crust have been dated in billions of years by this method. But, again, as plausible as this may be, it is not a proven fact, for one must assume at least two things that apparently cannot be proven in order to come to the conclusion that the world is billions of years old.

First, it must be assumed that there were no lead deposits at the beginning.

Second, it must be assumed that the rate of decay has been unchanged throughout its entire history. This has not been proven; hence, radioactive dating has not proved beyond all doubt that the world is billions of years old.

The Amount of Salt in the Sea

The same is apparently true of all arguments for an old earth. For example, the oceans have a known amount of salt and minerals in them, and these go into the ocean at a given rate every year. By simple mathematics, it can be determined how many years this has been going on. However, here also it must be assumed (1) that there were no salts and minerals in the ocean to begin with, and (2) that the rate has not changed over the years. A worldwide flood, such as the Bible describes, would certainly have changed the rate of deposits during that period.

All of this is not to say that the universe is not billions of years old—it may be. However, this has not been proven beyond question, and the arguments given in favor of it all possess presuppositions that have not been or cannot be proven. Nonetheless, given the basics of modern physics, it seems plausible that the universe is billions of years old. And, as shown above, there is nothing in Scripture that contradicts this. With that in view, the following conclusions are appropriate:

- (1) There is no demonstrated conflict between Genesis 1–2 and scientific fact.
- (2) The real conflict is not between God’s revelation in the Bible and scientific fact; it is between some Christians’ interpretation of the Bible and many scientists’ theories about the age of the world.
- (3) Science has not proven that a six-successive-twenty-four-hour-day view is impossible.

- (4) A literal interpretation of Genesis is consistent with a universe that is billions of years old.
- (5) Since the Bible does not say exactly how old the universe is, the age of the earth should not be a test for orthodoxy. In fact, many orthodox scholars have held the universe to be millions of years old or more (such as Augustine, B. B. Warfield, C. I. Scofield, John Walvoord, Francis Schaeffer, Gleason Archer, Hugh Ross, and most of the leaders of the movement that produced the famous “Chicago Statement” [1978] on the inerrancy of the Bible [see Systematic Theology, Volume 1, chapters 14 and 27]).

APPENDIX SIX

THE SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE FOR CREATION

The scientific evidence for creation is found in three different areas. First, there is the scientific evidence for the creation of the physical universe.

Second, there is the scientific evidence for the creation of first life.

Third, there is the scientific evidence for the creation of all basic life forms, including human beings.

OPERATION (EMPIRICAL) SCIENCE VERSUS ORIGIN (FORENSIC) SCIENCE

Before this evidence is examined, it is necessary to distinguish two basic kinds of science, one dealing with the present world and the other with the past. The first is called operation science, the other, origin science (see Geisler and Anderson, OS, chapters 6–7). Operation science is an empirical science; origin science is more like a forensic science. Operation science deals with present regularities, while origin science deals with past singularities. The latter deals with the origin of the universe and life, and the former deals with its functioning.

The crucial difference between origin and operation science is that in operation science there is a recurring pattern of events against which a theory can be tested. In origin science, there is no such recurring pattern in the present, since it deals with a past singularity. Hence, there is no direct way to test a theory or model of origin science: It must be judged as plausible or implausible on how consistently and comprehensively it reconstructs the unobserved past on the basis of evidence available in the present.

The basic principles of these two kinds of science are also different. Operation science is based on observation and repetition. The laws of physics and chemistry, for example, are founded on the observation of some recurring patterns of events. Such observations can be made with the naked eye or with the aid of instruments, such as the telescope and microscope. Observation is crucial to operation science—there must be a repetition or recurring pattern to be observed. No empirical scientific analysis can be made on the basis of a singular event, for operation science involves not only present regularities but also future ones that can be projected from a present pattern. Again, no scientific trend or prediction can be made from a singular event; it takes a series or pattern of events before a valid scientific law can be posited or a projection can be made.

Origin science, on the contrary, is not based on either the observation or repetition of the events of origin, since we did not observe them, nor are they being repeated in the present. So origin science deals with unobserved past singularities, such as the origin of the universe and the origin of life. Since no human was there to observe the origin of life, it is not the subject of operation science. The operation of the cosmos, for example, is the science of cosmology, but the origin of the cosmos is the science of cosmogony. The former deals with its present operation; the latter treats the genesis of the world. The operational science of biology does not deal with the beginning of life, but with its continual functioning since that point of origin. How life began is biogeny; how it continues is biology. Basically, then, there are two kinds of science.

Origin Science

Operation Science

Past singularities

Present regularities

Beginning of universe

Running of universe

The Cause of Origin Versus the Laws of Operation

It is important to note that the laws by which something operates are not the same as the cause (s) by which it began. For example, the laws necessary for running a windmill are not sufficient to produce one; a windmill functions by the purely natural laws of physics (pressure, motion, inertia, etc.). However, these natural laws do not create windmills; they only operate by them. The reason for this is that natural laws deal with the continuation of things, but they are not sufficient to explain their commencement.

It is only because things operate in a regular way in the present that it is possible to make observations and predictions based on them; thus, both observation and repetition are necessary for natural (operational) science. The origin of past events, whether the universe or life, was not observed and it is not repeated; therefore, it does not fall under the domain of natural (operation) science. Since an origin event is by its very nature not repeated, it falls into a class of its own—it is an unobserved singularity, and it has not happened again. Hence, it must be approached in a different way than empirical (natural, observational) science is. Actually, as we have seen, origin science is more like a forensic science, which is where there was no observation of the event and it cannot be repeated. For instance, take the case of an unobserved death by an unknown cause. Since no one saw it, the principle of observation used in operation science cannot be invoked, and since the person is dead, it cannot be repeated. Likewise, the principle of repetition is not present—so neither of the two bases of operation science is present in origin science.

Lacking the principles of empirical science does not totally frustrate a scientific analysis of a death, for example—the principles of forensic science can be evoked. Using the evidence that remains (such as weapons, wounds, fingerprints, DNA, etc.), the forensic scientist can make a plausible reconstruction of the original event. In a similar way, the origin scientist attempts to reconstruct past unobserved singularities, such as the origin of the universe and the origin of life.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ORIGIN SCIENCE

Every discipline has its own principles. Operation science is based on observation and repetition: Without a recurring pattern of events against which to measure theories, there is no valid operational science. Since origin science lacks both the observation and repetition of origin events, it must depend on other principles. Besides the two obvious ones (consistency and comprehensiveness) that every theory or model should employ, the most crucial principles of origin science are causality and uniformity (analogy). This contrast can be diagrammed as follows:

Principles of Origin Science	Principles of Operation Science
Causality	Observation
Uniformity (analogy)	Repetition

The Principle of Causality

Like the forensic scientist, the origin scientist believes that every event has an adequate cause, which is true of unobserved events as well as observed ones. This principle has a venerable history in science and scarcely needs justification. It is sufficient to note that Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) held that “the wise man seeks causes,” while Francis Bacon (1561–1626) believed that true knowledge is “knowledge by causes” (NO, 2.2.121), and even the skeptic David Hume (1711–1776) said, “I never asserted so absurd a Proposition as that anything might arise without a cause” (LDH, 1.187). It is self-evident to rational beings, uncorrupted by philosophical speculation, that everything that comes to be has a cause: Nothing does not produce something. If something came into existence, then something caused it. Indeed, without the principle of causality, there would be no science of operation or origins.

It is important to note that the principle of causality does not claim that everything has a cause. The principle of causality does not apply to everything but only to

- everything that begins;
- everything that is finite;
- everything that is contingent;
- everything that is dependent.

That is, every event needs a cause, but every thing does not. If there is some thing (being) that is eternal and independent (whether it is the universe or God), then it does not need a cause. Causality applies to things that come to be, not to what simply is. Whatever simply is, does not need a cause; it is uncaused. The question to be answered is whether the cosmos (space-time universe) came to be (as creationists hold) or whether it always was (as many noncreationists believe).

The Principle of Uniformity (Analogy)

There is another principle of origin science, known as the principle of uniformity (or analogy). Generally stated, it affirms that “the present is the key to the past.” Applied more specifically to the question of past unobserved causes, the principle of uniformity (analogy) asserts that the kind of cause that regularly produces a certain kind of event in the present is the kind of cause that produced a like effect in the past. Or, more briefly, past events have causes similar to the causes of like present events.

The principle of uniformity derives its name from the uniform experience on which it is based; that is, repeated observations reveal that certain kinds of causes regularly produce certain kinds of events. For example, water flowing over rocks has a rounding effect on them. Likewise, wind blowing on sand (or water) produces waves, and heavy rain on dirt results in erosion, and so on. All of these causes are natural (i.e., secondary) ones, meaning that their effects are produced by natural forces whose processes are an observable part of the ongoing operation of the physical universe.

There is another kind of cause, known as primary. Intelligence is a primary cause, and the principle of uniformity (based upon constant conjunction) informs us that certain kinds of effects come only from intelligent causes. Human language, pottery, portraits, and symphonies all have intelligent causes. So convinced are we by previous repeated experience that only intelligence produces these kinds of effects that when we see even a single event that resembles one of these kinds of effects, we invariably posit an intelligible cause for it.

For example, when we see “Buy Fords” written in the sky, we never assume it was placed there by a secondary cause (like wind and clouds). In a similar manner, when we see the faces of four presidents on Mount Rushmore, we always conclude that some intelligence caused them, and when we come across “John loves Mary” written on the beach, we never assume the waves did it. The reason we unhesitatingly posit intelligent causes for these kinds of things is that we have repeatedly observed that similar kinds of effects are produced by intelligent causes. Now, the question is whether the origin of the first living organism (which we did not observe) was by a secondary (natural) cause or by a primary (intelligent) cause. The only scientific way to determine this is by analogy with our experience of what kind of cause regularly produces that kind of effect in the present.

Another thing to observe about the principle of uniformity is that it is an argument from analogy: It is an attempt to get at the unknown (past) through the known (present). Since we do not have direct access to the past, we can “know” it only indirectly by analogies with the present. This is how human history is reconstructed, and it is the way earth history and life history are recreated as well. Historical geology is a case in point—it is totally dependent as a science on the principle of uniformity. Unless we can presently observe in nature or in the laboratory certain kinds of causes producing certain kinds of events, we cannot validly reconstruct geological history. However, since we can observe natural causes producing these kinds of effects today, we can postulate that similar natural causes produced similar effects in the geological record of the past.

The same point can be made for human history, where primary intelligent causes are involved. Archaeology as a science is possible only because we assume the principle of uniformity. Thus, when we find certain kinds of tools, art, or writing, we posit intelligent beings who produced them. Even finding simple arrowheads leads us to the conclusion that intelligent beings produced them, not natural forces like wind and water. When past remains contain writing, art, poetry, or music, we have no problem whatsoever in insisting on intelligent primary causes for them. So whether it is a secondary or primary cause that is called for, the principle of uniformity is the basis, for unless we have a constant conjunction of a certain kind of cause with a certain kind of effect in the present, we have no grounds on which to apply this principle of analogy to past events known only from their remains.

The SETI (Search for Extra-Terrestrial Intelligence) program is also based on the principle of analogy. Carl Sagan (1934–1996) affirmed that “the receipt of a single message from space would show that it is possible to live through such technological adolescence” (BB, 275). The reason this can be done is that the letter sequences in a human language are recognizably different from that which results from natural laws. This has been established scientifically in the studies on information theory by Claude E. Shannon at the Bell Laboratories.

THE PRACTICE OF ORIGIN SCIENCE

Now that we have an understanding of the basic principles of origin science, let us apply them to the three main areas of origin: the beginning of the universe (cosmogony), the emergence of first life (biogeny), and the appearance of human (rational) beings (anthrogeny).

ORIGIN SCIENCE

OPERATING SCIENCE

Universe

Cosmogony

Cosmology

Life	Biogeny	Biology
Humans	Anthrogeny	Anthropology

In each of the areas of origin—the cosmos, first life, and human beings—we will try to determine whether the scientific evidence favors positing the direct action of a primary cause or only a secondary cause for these events. The main two principles used to determine this will be the principle of causality and the principle of uniformity (analogy). The question is this: Was the cause of the origin event (by analogy to the present) a natural cause or an intelligent one?

The Origin of the Universe (Cosmogony)

The Christian doctrine of Creation states that there was a beginning of the universe (see chapters 2–3). The universe is not eternal; it came into existence out of nothing. The question here is whether there is any scientific evidence to support this belief.

Evidence From the Second Law of Thermodynamics

There are several lines of evidence that convince even agnostic scientists that the universe came into existence out of nothing. One of the most important is the second law of thermodynamics, which states that the amount of usable energy in the universe is decreasing. Nuclear fission is occurring in the stars, and, thus, the universe is running out of usable fuel to keep itself going—energy is being transformed into unusable heat. Another way to put it is that in the universe as a whole, things are generally moving from order to disorder, for in a closed, isolated system, such as the physical universe is, things left to themselves tend to become more random and disordered.

This disorder is not always true of smaller areas within the universe, because these smaller areas are open systems that receive energy from outside themselves. A living organism, for instance, receives outside energy (from the sun) that keeps it from going into disorder and using up its energy. Nevertheless, since the universe as a whole is a closed system, there is by definition no outside source of physical energy to help it overcome the degenerating effects of the second law.

The universe as a whole is running down, and if it is running down, it is not eternal. If the universe were infinite, it would not be running down, for something cannot run out of an infinite amount of energy. In short, whatever is petering out must have had a beginning, because it does not take forever to run out of a limited amount of energy. So the second law of thermodynamics points to a beginning of the universe.

Looking at this evidence, the agnostic astrophysicist Robert Jastrow concluded that “three lines of evidence—the motions of the galaxies, the laws of thermodynamics, and the life story of the stars—pointed to one conclusion; all indicated that the Universe had a beginning” (GA, 111). If so, then this is scientific support for the Christian doctrine of the creation of the universe, for it is a rational inference based on scientific evidence that the physical universe is not eternal. It came into being, and whatever comes to be needs a cause, so it is reasonable to posit a Creator of it.

Evidence From the Expanding Universe

Most contemporary astronomers believe that the universe is expanding; measurements indicate that stars are moving apart. Indeed, the analogy often given is that of dots and a balloon that is increasing in size so that the dots (stars) are getting farther away from one another. One of the most significant studies undertaken on this was by Allan Sandage. “He compiled information on 42 galaxies, ranging out in space as far as six billion light years from us.” His measurements indicate “that the universe was expanding more rapidly in the past than it is today. This result lends further support to the belief that the universe exploded into being” (Jastrow, ibid., 95).

If these observations and inferences are correct, then they are further confirmation that the cosmos had a point of beginning, for if one reverses the “camera” of time, the universe gets smaller and smaller until it is invisible. Indeed, if it is carried back mathematically and logically, one reaches a point where there is no space, no time, and no matter: There is literally nothing.

So there was nothing, and then suddenly there was something out of nothing. Needless to say, if this was the case, as many scientists are now claiming, then it is scientific confirmation of the belief in Creation ex nihilo; even many nontheistic astronomers and scientists are speaking of “creation out of nothing.” Some who want to avoid God are claiming that “the universe came into existence from nothing and by nothing” (see Kenny, FW, 147). This, however, is a denial of the principle of causality and is contrary to the very nature of science, which is to find an adequate cause for events. Even so, it does show that the evidence for the universe coming into existence out of nothing is so persuasive to them that they have had to stop positing an eternal, and therefore uncaused, universe. Thus, they have not been able to avoid a Creator.

Evidence From the Radiation Echo

A third line of evidence has convinced many scientists that the universe had a beginning. Two scientists, Arno Allan Penzias (b. 1933) and Robert Woodrow Wilson (b. 1936), were given a Nobel Prize for the discovery of the radiation fireball (see Jastrow, GA, 5). The entire universe is giving off a radiation glow, the exact wavelength of that produced by a gigantic explosion. Penzias and Wilson postulate that this could have been the “big bang” produced when the universe exploded on the scene some billions of astronomical years ago. Since the evidence for the expanding universe shows the universe expanded faster in the past, this fits with the concept of an explosion, which also produces greater velocities at first but later slow down and eventually peter out. And, the petering-out fits the data from the second law, which indicates the universe is running down.

Thus, these three lines of evidence converge to show that the cosmos had a beginning—exactly the point of the biblical teaching about creation. Indeed, Robert Jastrow declared, “Science has proven that the universe exploded into being at a certain moment.” So he concluded, “The scientist’s pursuit of the past ends in the moment of creation” (GA, 114–15). If the universe was created, then it is reasonable to posit a Creator for it.

In addition, Einstein’s general theory of relativity and the large mass of energy discovered by the Hubble Space Telescope (a mass predicted by the big bang theory) confirm the view that the universe had a beginning.

Of course, this scientific evidence is not absolute proof that the physical universe had a beginning for at least two reasons.

First, scientific evidence by its nature does not yield full proof of things.

Second, other more satisfactory explanations may be found for the expanding universe and the radiation. Some have even suggested that the second law does not apply to the whole universe, but only to closed isolated systems within it. Most often, they suggest a rebound theory: The universe will bounce back from its expansion and start over again, and so on infinitely. Although this view lacks convincing evidence, it does show that one must temper dogmatism about scientific arguments. Perhaps it is simply sufficient to say that the prevailing view in the scientific community presents evidence that strongly supports what Christians have always believed on biblical (and some even on philosophical) grounds, namely, that the universe had a beginning.

Now, if the evidence supports the view that the cosmos came into existence out of nothing, then it is reasonable to posit a Cause for it. In addition, since the cosmos is the natural universe, then, by its very nature, as a Cause beyond the natural world, this first Cause would be a supernatural Cause. This is, of course, what Christian theists have always affirmed: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1).

Evidence From the Great Mass of Energy

It is widely accepted in the scientific community that when a theory can predict a result that is later acquired by observation, this counts as confirmation of that theory. This is precisely what happened when, in 1992, it was reported that the Hubble Space Telescope discovered a great mass of energy in outer space that was predicted from the big bang theory. After viewing the evidence from the Hubble, one scientist, George Smoot, exclaimed, “If you are religious, it is like looking at God!” (“Science, God and Man” in Time, Dec. 28, 1992).

Evidence From General Relativity

In addition to these four lines of evidence, there is Einstein’s general theory of relativity. According to this view, the universe must have had a beginning.

De Sitter studied Einstein’s equations, and discovered that they had an expanding-Universe solution. [Arthur Eddington] acclaimed it as “a revolution of thought,” and set out to work to organize the eclipse expedition that proved the validity of Einstein’s ideas in 1919. The expedition measured the bending of light by gravity—an effect predicted by relativity, (cited by Jastrow, GA, 36)

This dramatic verification of Einstein’s theory confirmed that the universe had a beginning.

However, Einstein failed to draw this conclusion, introducing a “fudge factor” into his formula. After being challenged and recanting, he later called it the biggest error of his career (ibid., 25–27). Indeed, general relativity demands a beginning of the universe, thus providing a fifth line of scientific evidence for the Creator.

Conclusion From the Astronomical Evidence

In view of the strong scientific evidence, Robert Jastrow concluded, “That there are what I or anyone would call supernatural forces at work is now, I think, a scientifically proven fact” (ibid., 18). He further observed, “Astronomers now find that they have painted themselves into a corner because they have proven, by their own methods, that the world began abruptly in an act of creation.... And they have found that all this happened as a product of forces they cannot hope to discover” (ibid., 15). Thus, he notes that “the scientist’s pursuit of the past ends in the moment of creation,” and “this is an exceedingly strange development, unexpected by all but theologians. They have always accepted the word of the Bible: ‘In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth’ ” (“SCBTF” in CT, 115).

The Origin of Life (Biogeny)

The Bible declares, “God created ... every living thing” (Gen. 1:21 NKJV). By contrast, the prevailing theory among scientists is that life began by spontaneous generation from nonliving chemicals. As a matter of fact, there are only two possible views: Either life originated by an Intelligent Creator, or else it resulted by purely natural processes from nonliving matter. Robert Jastrow said, “Either life was created on the earth by the will of a being outside the grasp of scientific understanding, or it evolved on our planet spontaneously, through chemical reactions occurring in nonliving matter lying on the surface of the planet” (USD, 62).

Which view of the origin of life is more scientifically plausible? Before answering this, we must remind ourselves that in origin science there is no direct way to measure our theory against the origin event (of the emergence of first life) by observation. No scientist observed the origin of first life, and it is not being repeated over and over again. Ever since Francesco Redi (1626–1697) and Louis Pasteur’s (1822–1895) experiments, the theory of the spontaneous (unsupernatural) generation of life has been discredited. In spite of this, many scientists hold out hope that life in the past arose contrary to the evidence in the present. This, of course, is a violation of the principles of uniformity and causality, by which theories of origin are tested. Since the second principle simply says there must be an adequate cause, attention will be focused on the first principle, which deals with what kind of cause is adequate to explain the origin of life.

Distinguishing Different Kinds of Effects

The principle of uniformity (analogy) declares that the kinds of causes that produce certain kinds of effects in the present should be posited for these kinds of effects in the past. That being so, the question is: What kind of effect takes the direct action of an intelligent cause, and what kind takes only a natural cause? First, let’s consider a series of illustrations that make the point intuitively. We know by observing constant conjunction in the present that natural causes can and do produce sand dunes, but that it takes intelligent causes to produce sand castles. Likewise, natural causes make crystals, but only intelligent causes create chandeliers. The following contrasts will further this distinction.

sand dunes	sand castles
crystals	chandeliers
waterfalls	power plants
round stones	arrowheads
Mt. McKinley	Mt. Rushmore
clouds	skywriting
arrangement of letters in alphabet soup	arrangement of letters in an encyclopedia

When looking at these two lists, we know that natural causes alone never produce the kinds of effects in the right-hand column. Why? The answer is the principle of uniformity—our uniform experience, based on constant conjunction of intelligent causes with these kinds of effects, leads us to believe that other similar effects will also have an intelligent cause. This being the case, we need only ask: Is a living cell more like an encyclopedia or a bowl of alphabet soup?

The intelligent-design movement is based on this distinction. Both Phillip Johnson (see his DT) and William Dembski (see his ID) use it to demonstrate that irreducible complexity and specified complexity, such as found in living cells, are best explained by positing an Intelligent Designer.

Specified Complexity Distinguishes Life

Definitions of biological life are hard to come by; however, some distinguishing characteristics are clear. The famous biologist Leslie Orgel observed the important differences when he said, “Living organisms are distinguished by their specified complexity. Crystals ... fail to qualify as living because they lack complexity; random mixtures of polymers fail to qualify because they lack specificity” (OL, 189). That is to say,

- (1) Crystals are specified but not complex.
- (2) Random polymers are complex but not specified.
- (3) Life is both specified and complex.

In brief, life on the genetic level is characterized by specified complexity. What this means can be understood by the concept of boundary conditions. Michael Polanyi explains,

When a saucepan bounds a soup that we are cooking, we are interested in the soup; and, likewise, when we observe a reaction in a test tube, we are studying the reaction, not the test tube. The reverse is true for a game of chess. The strategy of the player imposes boundaries on the several moves which follow the laws of chess, but our interest lies in the boundaries—that is, in the strategy, not in the several moves as exemplification of the laws. And similarly, when a sculptor shapes a stone or a painter composes a painting, our interest lies in the boundaries imposed on a material, and not in the material itself. (“LTPC” in CEN)

These boundary conditions

- (1) transcend the laws of physics and chemistry;
- (2) result in letter sequences that are mathematically identical to those in a human language;
and
- (3) resemble those made by an intelligent sculptor who imposes boundaries on stone.

So life is made up of a (four-letter) genetic alphabet that manifests the characteristics of intelligently imposed boundary conditions, such as a skywriter imposes on smoke, a potter on clay, or an author on letters. In fact, studies done by Hubert Yockey on the application of information theory (developed for human language) reveal that the pattern sequence in the genetic code and that in a human language are “mathematically identical.” Yockey concludes, “The sequence hypothesis applies directly to the protein and the genetic text as well as to written language and therefore the treatment is mathematically identical” (JTB, 16).

Boundary Conditions

Now we have an answer on the genetic level to our question: Is life more like a bowl of alphabet soup or an encyclopedia? It is exactly like an encyclopedia. In fact, the genetic information in a single-celled animal, if spelled out in English, is equal to that of a thousand volumes of the Encyclopedia Britannica. In spite of his confessed agnosticism, Carl Sagan provided powerful proof for an intelligent Creator of life when he argued that “a single message” (BB, 275) from outer space would prove to him that there is supernormal intelligence behind it. If one short message takes superhuman intelligence, then how much more would a whole volume of an encyclopedia? Famous contemporary American astronomer Allan Sandage said it well:

The world is too complicated in all its parts and interconnections to be due to chance alone. I am convinced that the existence of life with all its order in each of its organisms is simply too well put together. Each part of a living thing depends on all its other parts to function. How does each part know? How is each part specified at conception? The more one learns of bio-chemistry the more unbelievable it becomes unless there is some type of organizing principle. (“SRRB” in T, 20)

Evidence of intelligence behind living things is not limited to the cosmic or microscopic genetic level: It can be observed with the naked eye. Renowned Harvard biologist Louis Aggasiz observed,

[Darwin] has lost sight of the most striking of the features, and the one which pervades the whole, namely, that there runs throughout Nature unmistakable evidence of thought, corresponding to the mental operations of our own mind, and therefore intelligible to us as thinking beings, and unaccountable on any other basis than that they own their existence to the working of intelligence; and no theory that overlooks this element can be true to nature. (AJS, 1860)

Irreducible Complexity Is Evidence of Design

Discoveries in microbiology also confirm that life is designed. In Michael Behe’s revolutionary book Darwin’s Black Box, the argument for intelligent design of life is clearly set forth. Behe notes that Darwin admitted, “If it could be demonstrated that any complex organ existed which could not possibly have been formed by numerous, successive, slight modifications, my theory would absolutely break down” (from Darwin, OOS, sixth ed., 154). Evolutionist Richard Dawkins agrees:

Evolution is very possibly not, in actual fact, always gradual. But it must be gradual when it is being used to explain the coming into existence of complicated, apparently designed objects, like eyes. For if it is not gradual in these cases, it ceases to have any explanatory power at all. Without gradualness in these cases, we are back to miracle, which is a synonym for the total absence of [naturalistic] explanation. (ROE, 83)

However, remarks Behe, this is precisely the case with what was a “black box” in Darwin’s day, namely, the human cell. Now microbiologists have peered into the human cell and discovered an irreducibly complex organism that cannot be explained in incremental, step-by-step stages:

No one at Harvard University, no one at the National Institutes of Health, no member of the National Academy of Sciences, no Nobel Prize winner—no one at all can give a detailed account of how the cilium, or vision, or blood clotting, or any complex biochemical process might have developed in a Darwinian fashion. But we are here. All these things got here somehow; if not in a Darwinian fashion, then how? (DBB, 187)

Behe concludes that “other examples of irreducible complexity abound, including aspects of DNA reduplication, electron transport, telomere synthesis, photosynthesis, transcription regulation, and more” (ibid., 160). Hence, “Life on earth at its most fundamental level, in its most critical components, is the product of intelligent activity” (ibid., 193). It follows, then, that “the conclusion of intelligent design flows naturally from the data itself—not from sacred books or sectarian beliefs. Inferring that biochemical systems were designed by an intelligent agent is a humdrum process that requires no new principles of logic or science” (ibid.). So the result of these cumulative efforts to investigate the cell—to investigate life at the molecular level—is a loud, clear, piercing cry of “design!” The result is so unambiguous and so significant that it must be ranked as one of the greatest achievements in the history of science. The discovery rivals those of Newton and Einstein, (ibid., 232–33)

Even before Behe, it was observed that nature manifests amazing designs that are like things known to have intelligent causes. The human eye is an incredible camera that human inventors have not yet rivaled. A bird’s wing is amazingly adapted to flight and would have to be completely and wholly intact before flight was possible. Furthermore, nature’s anticipatory design bespeaks of intelligent forethought. Bodily glands anticipate danger and secrete appropriate chemicals into the blood to enable one to react. Many animals lay their eggs, in advance, where food and survival are possible for their offspring. All of this resembles an advance plan of some Mind beyond creatures that has preprogrammed their “instincts” for the ongoing of life. Even the casual observer cannot avoid seeing the similarities between the kinds of effects known to be produced by intelligent causes and those present in living things.

Of course, some have suggested that this could have happened by purely natural processes apart from an intelligent intervention; natural selection is often suggested as one such mechanism that makes this possible. However, this response will not suffice when speaking of the origin of first life, for there was no natural selection on the prebiotic level. Natural selection is a process that operates only after life has begun. Evolutionist Theodore Dobzhansky declared, “Prebiotic natural selection is a contradiction in terms” (OPSTMM, 311).

Some naturalists have speculated that the first living organism could have been more simple than one-celled organisms alive today. Nevertheless, this response is insufficient to negate the argument for an intelligent Cause of first life for at least two reasons.

First, it is purely speculative, without any basis in fact.

Second, even if first life were more simple, it would still have specified complexity, which is known to require an intelligent Cause. For example, even if the first living thing did not have as much information as an encyclopedia, but only as much as one essay in it, it would still need an intelligent Cause. Only intelligent beings write articles, or even paragraphs. If an agnostic like Carl Sagan would accept a “single message” as proof of intelligence, then why not the highly complex message known to be in a living cell?

The Anthropic Principle

Another bit of evidence for an intelligent Creator of life is the anthropic principle. According to it, the universe from its very inception was amazingly fine-tuned for the emergence of human life. From the beginning of the cosmos, to the formation of the earth, to the emergence of living things, all conditions were incredibly adapted to the eventual appearance of human life. Again, commenting on this phenomena, one agnostic scientist confessed,

The anthropic principle is the most interesting development next to the proof of the creation, and it is even more interesting because it seems to say that science itself has proven, as a hard fact, that this universe was made, was designed, for man to live in. It's a very theistic result. (Jastrow, "SCBTF" in CT, 17)

Highly regarded physicist and astronomer Stephen Hawking described how the value of many fundamental numbers in nature's laws "seem to have been very finely adjusted to make possible the development of life" and how God appears to have "very carefully chosen the initial configuration of the universe" (cited by Heeren, SMG, 67). Albert Einstein said, "The harmony of natural law ... reveals an intelligence of such superiority that, compared with it, all the systematic thinking and acting of human beings is an utterly insignificant reflection" (IO, 40).

Examples of the fine-tuning of the universe are listed by Hugh Ross (see FG, 119–38). A select sample includes the following:

- (1) The 21 percent oxygen in the atmosphere is just right. At 25 percent, spontaneous fires would break out, and at 15 percent, humans would suffocate.
- (2) If the gravitational force were altered by only 1 part in 10 to the fortieth, the sun would not exist, and the moon would crash into the earth.
- (3) If the centrifugal force of planetary movement did not precisely balance the gravitational forces, nothing could be held in orbit around the sun.
- (4) If the universe were expanding at a rate of one-millionth more slowly, the temperature on earth would be 10,000°.
- (5) If the average distance between stars (of thirty trillion miles) were altered only slightly, there would be extreme temperature variations on earth.
- (6) Even a slight variation in the speed of light would alter the other constants and make life on earth impossible.
- (7) If Jupiter were not in its current orbit, we would be bombarded by space material.
- (8) If the thickness of the earth's crust were altered, volcanic and tectonic activity would make life impossible.
- (9) If the rotation of the earth took longer than twenty-four hours, temperature variations would be too great between night and day. If it were shorter, atmospheric wind velocities would be too great.
- (10) If the axial tilt of the earth were altered slightly, surface temperatures would be too great for life on earth.
- (11) If the lightning rate were greater, there would be too much fire and destruction. If less, there would be too little nitrogen (fertilizer) in the soil.
- (12) If there were more seismic activity, much life would be lost. If less, nutrients on the ocean floor would not be recycled to the continents through tectonic uplift, etc.

In short, without intelligent advanced planning of all the factors in the universe, human life would never have emerged, nor would it be sustained.

Nobel Prize-winning atheist/agnostic Steven Weinberg even went so far as to say,

It seems to me that if the word "God" is to be of any use, it should be taken to mean an interested God, a creator and lawgiver who established not only the laws of nature and the universe but also standards of good and evil, some personality that is concerned with our actions, something in short that is appropriate for us to worship. (DFT, 244, emphasis added)

The Origin of Human Beings (Anthrogeny)

The third area of origin is that of human beings, which, since the time of Darwin, has been hotly debated. Macroevolutionists, on the one hand, claim a common ancestry of all living things; creationists, on the other hand, insist on separate ancestry of all basic forms of life, including human life. The former views all living things as a tree, and the latter like a forest. The question, then, is: What does the scientific evidence indicate—is there evidence of a distinct origin of human life separate and above the level of animals?

Rational Evidence

One fundamental law of thought denied by macroevolution is that “an effect cannot be greater than its cause.” In popular language, “water does not rise any higher than its source.” Philosophically put, the effect cannot have any more than what the cause placed in it.

However, according to naturalistic evolution, not only did nothing produce something, and the nonliving produced the living, but with regard to human beings, the nonrational produced the rational. We know, though, that the rational does not emerge from the nonrational any more than being is caused by nonbeing.

Linguistic Evidence

Human language is another distinctive evidence of human creation by a rational Creator. Human language is unique—no animals speak it or can learn it. There are several things particular to language; Clifford Wilson and Donald McKeon list twelve of them in their excellent book The Language Gap:

- (1) Discreteness of sound/form;
- (2) Symbolic nature of the units;
- (3) Rule-governed system;
- (4) Compositional;
- (5) Complex;
- (6) Displacing;
- (7) Unbounded in scope (open-ended);
- (8) Independent of stimulus control;
- (9) Suitable for contextualized communication;
- (10) Independent of need satisfaction;
- (11) Spontaneously acquired; and
- (12) Culturally transmitted. (LG, 147–53)

Look at the words of a scientist who unsuccessfully attempted to teach a chimpanzee how to speak a human language:

Despite the frustrations of Project Nim, I knew that there could be no substitute for that intelligent bundle of playfulness and mischief, a creature more human than any other nonhuman I knew. One of the reasons this parting was so painful was that there was no way to talk with him about it. Nim and I were able to sign about simple events in his world and mine. But how could I explain why I and the other project members who came along to Oklahoma suddenly abandoned him? How could we explain that it was necessary to leave him forever in a totally new environment, with a totally new group of human and nonhuman primates? (ibid., 153)

Another scientist, who once believed chimps could learn to speak our language, eventually discarded his belief in the face of the experimental evidence:

Chimps do not have any significant degree of human language and when, in two to five years, this fact becomes properly disseminated, it will be of interest to ask, Why were we so easily duped by the claim that they do? (ibid., 154)

Anthropological Evidence

Despite highly touted “missing links” between primates and humans, no undisputed examples have ever been produced (Gish, EFSN, chapter 6). Some instances have turned out to be frauds, like Piltdown Man. The evidence for Nebraska Man was later discovered to be nothing but an extinct pig’s tooth! Neanderthal Man was as upright and human as we are; his bent-over posture was found to be the result of arthritis. The Peking-Man evidence has mysteriously disappeared, but since he died from sharp blows on the head, it is clear that he was not the ancestor of tool-making primates. Australopithecus is believed by many scientists to be an orangutan. So far as the actual, indisputable evidence goes, there is a big difference between human beings, who can produce pottery, culture, and religious practices, for instance, and primates, which can do none of these.

Further, similarity in structure between humans and primates is not a proof of common ancestry; it may very well be an indication of common design. Just as human designers utilize many of the same basic patterns over and over in their various creations, it is not unusual that the Creator of the universe has made many similar structures. Consider the similarity of the following utensils in one’s kitchen. Does their similarity prove that the canning kettle evolved from a teaspoon?

Genetic Evidence

Human genes are unique. Humans do not interbreed with animals; they reproduce only their kind. Although humans share a high percent of chromosome similarity with some primates, this similarity is no more a proof of common ancestry than this year’s Chevrolet is proof that it evolved naturally from last year’s model without some intelligent creation of a new one. Actually, the so-called “evolution” of the car is not really an evolution at all; rather, it is a better model for successive creation. Each new creation is the result of the direct intelligent intervention of the Creator, not of common ancestry by natural processes.

The truth is that there is a huge discontinuity between human beings and their animal predecessors. Human life appeared abruptly and completely—characteristics of which are indications of direct intervention of a Creator. Purely natural causes are continuous and gradual, and they do not produce the rational from the nonrational. This gap is spanned only by an intelligent Creator.

A powerful argument for the creation of human beings comes from the genetic information in the human brain. Carl Sagan, who, as cited before, believed a “single message” from space would prove a highly intelligent cause, observed,

The information content of the human brain expressed in bits is probably comparable to the total number of connections among the neurons—about a hundred trillion,  $10^{14}$  bits. If written out in English, for instance, that information would fill some twenty million volumes, as many as in the world’s largest libraries—the equivalent of twenty million books is inside the heads of every one of us. The brain is a very big place in a very small space.... The neurochemistry of the brain is astonishingly busy, the circuitry of a machine more wonderful than any devised by humans. (C, 278, emphasis added)

If a single message from space takes an intelligent Creator, how about twenty million volumes full of information? If ordinary machines need an intelligent cause, then how about one that is more wonderful than any devised by humans?

Of course, again, noncreationists often point to natural selection as a means by which simple information (life) can evolve into more complex information (life forms). This, however, is a highly dubious alternative to the intervention of an intelligent Creator for at least two reasons.

First, natural selection does not really produce new (higher) forms of life; it simply preserves old ones. Natural selection is a survival principle—the survival of the fittest. It does not create new forms, but only helps preserve old ones (Geisler and Anderson, OS, 149). It is a survival—not an arrival—principle.

Second, the comparison between artificial selection, on which macro-evolution is based, and natural selection is erroneous. It is argued by evolutionists that if artificial selection can produce significant changes in a short time, then natural selection can produce even greater changes over long periods of time. This assumes that there is a significant similarity between artificial selection and natural selection; on the contrary, there is a significant difference between them at every major point (Matthews, “Introduction” to Darwin’s OOS, xi). For example, artificial selection (AS) has an aim in view, but natural selection (NS) does not. Further, AS is an intelligently guided process, but NS is not. Also, in AS there are intelligent choices of breeds, which are then protected from destructive processes, whereas neither is true of NS. In addition, AS preserves desired freaks, while NS eliminates almost all freaks. Finally, AS continually interrupts the process to reach its goal, but NS does not. Thus, AS has preferential survival, as opposed to NS. So rather than being similar, artificial selection and natural selection are in the most crucial aspects exactly opposite. In chart form:

THE CRUCIAL DIFFERENCES

	Artificial selection	Natural selection
Goal	Aim (end) in view	No aim (end) in view
Process	Intelligently guided process	Blind process
Choices	Intelligent choice of breeds	No intelligent choice of breeds
Protection	Breeds guarded from destructive processes	Breeds not guarded from destructive processes
Freaks	Preserves desired freaks	Eliminates most freaks
Interruptions	Continued interruptions to reach desired goal	No continued interruptions to reach any goal

Natural selection and artificial selection are radically disparate. Consequently, the comparison fails, and, with it, the crucial mechanism for Darwinian evolution. Natural selection fails because, as a purely natural process, it lacks intelligence to do what can be done by artificial (i.e., intelligent) selection. The only way natural selection can be made to work is to endow it with intelligent powers, which evolutionists often do.

For example, evolutionists frequently say things like the following about natural selection: It “designed” our survival (Sagan, BB, 11). It “arranged” for the continuance of life (Sagan, C, xiii). To claim that natural selection can “design” or “arrange” is to say that it has the power of intelligence. In fact, evolutionists endow natural selection not only with the powers of intelligence but also with the power of godhood; Charles Darwin himself referred to it as “my deity Natural Selection” (LL, Oct. 20, 1859). The co-inventor of natural selection with Charles Darwin, Alfred Wallace (1823–1913) said that natural selection is “a Mind not only adequate to direct and regulate all the forces at work in living organisms, but also the more fundamental forces of the whole material universe” (WL [1910] as cited in Edwards, ed., EP, 8.276).

In brief, in order to avoid the intelligent Creator of human life, naturalistic evolution postulates natural selection as a “supreme” intelligent “deity” that “guides” the process of evolution toward its eventual “goal” of producing life. In fact, by attempting to avoid an intelligent Cause, they substitute one of their own.

Geological Evidence

It is frequently forgotten that the only real evidence for or against evolution is in the fossil record of the past. Every other argument for evolution is only what could have been; only the fossil record contains what actually did happen. Darwin recognized this as a problem as well, and he wrote in On the Origin of Species,

Why then is not every geological formation and every stratum full of such intermediate links? Geology assuredly does not reveal any such finely graduated organic chain, and this, perhaps, is the most obvious and gravest objection which can be urged against my theory. (280)

In the almost one hundred fifty years since Darwin wrote, the situation has only become worse for his theory. Noted Harvard paleontologist Stephen Jay Gould (1941–2002) has written,

The extreme rarity of transitional forms in the fossil record persists as the trade secret of paleontology. The evolutionary trees that adorn our textbooks have data only at the tips and nodes of their branches; the rest is inference, however reasonable, not the evidence of fossils. (“EEP,” 14 in NH)

Niles Eldredge and Ian Tattersall agree, saying,

Expectation colored perception to such an extent that the most obvious single fact about biological evolution, “non-change,” has seldom, if ever, been incorporated into anyone’s scientific notions of how life actually evolves. If ever there was a myth, it is that evolution is a process of constant change. (MHE, 8)

What does the fossil record suggest? Evolutionists like Stephen Jay Gould came to agree with what creationists from Louis Agassiz to Duane Gish have said all along, namely,

The history of most fossil species includes two features particularly inconsistent with gradualism:

(1) Stasis. Most species exhibit no directional change during their tenure on earth. They appear in the fossil record looking much the same as when they disappear; morphological change is usually limited and directionless. (2) Sudden appearance. In any local area, a species does not arise gradually by the steady transformation of its ancestors: it appears all at once and “fully formed” (Gould, “EEP” in NH, 13–14).

The fossil evidence clearly gives a picture of mature, fully functional creatures suddenly appearing and staying very much the same. There is no real indication that one form of life transforms into a completely different form. Some evolutionists, like Gould, have attempted to deal with the fossil evidence by introducing the idea of punctuated equilibrium. These scientists say that the jumps in the fossil record reflect real catastrophes that brought on major changes in the existing species. Therefore, in this view, evolution is not gradual, but rather punctuated by sudden leaps from one stage to the next. The theory has been criticized because its adherents cannot produce any evidence for a mechanism of secondary causes that makes these sudden advances possible. Their viewpoint, then, appears to be based solely on the absence of transitional fossils. However, Darwin understood such suddenness to be evidence of creation. Therefore, punctuated equilibrium is not an explanation but a description—a description of the evidence, which is best explained by Creation, not evolution.

SUMMARY

Christians believe in the Creation of the universe, of life, and of human beings. Science (as ordinarily conceived) does not deal with the origin of things but simply with their operation. Nevertheless, even though the study of origins cannot be done in an empirical way, it can be approached as a forensic science; that is, scientists can attempt to reconstruct the past on the basis of similarities in the present. This is done by way of the principles of causality and uniformity (analogy). When the principle of causality is applied to the scientific evidence that the universe had a beginning, it is concluded that there was a cause of the universe’s coming into existence.

Further, when by analogy with the present it is asked what kind of cause best explains the vast amount of intelligent information (specified complexity) in even a single-celled animal, the answer is: an intelligent Cause. Similarly, when we analyze the great gap between animals and human beings, whose brains contain some twenty million volumes of genetic information, it is reasonable to postulate an intelligent Cause for the first human.

Thus, in many crucial ways, the present scientific evidence supports the reality of Creation as presented in the Bible. Since science is limited and progressive, we should not expect complete agreement in every detail with the biblical presentation. However, the amount of present agreement is striking, and it strongly supports the biblical teaching that God created the universe (Gen. 1:1), every living thing (1:21), and human beings (in His image—1:27).

APPENDIX SEVEN

PNEUMATOLOGY

The person and work of the blessed third person of the Trinity is found throughout the Bible and in different places in this work. A brief outline pulling the various parts together will help us to better see the person and ministry of the Holy Spirit.

THE DEITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

That the Holy Spirit is God, equal in power, attributes, and glory with the Father and the Son, is clear from many verses of Scripture (see chapter 12).

The deity of the Holy Spirit is indicated by His (1) possessing the names of God, (2) having the attributes of God, (3) performing the acts of God, and (4) association with God in benedictions and baptismal formulas.

The Holy Spirit Is Given the Names of Deity

The Holy Spirit is referred to as “God” or “Lord” (Acts 5:3–4), “God’s Spirit” (1 Cor. 3:16), “Lord” (1 Cor. 12:4–6), and “eternal Spirit” (Heb. 9:14).

The Holy Spirit Possesses the Attributes of Deity

The Holy Spirit has attributes of God such as life (Rom. 8:2), truth (John 16:13), love (Rom. 15:30), holiness (Eph. 4:30), eternity (Heb. 9:14), omnipresence (Ps. 139:7), and omniscience (1 Cor. 2:11).

The Holy Spirit Performs Acts of Deity

The divine works of the Holy Spirit include the act of Creation (Gen. 1:2; Job 33:4; Ps. 104:30), the acts of redemption (Isa. 63:10–11; Eph. 4:30; 1 Cor. 12:13), the performance of miracles (Gal. 3:2–5; Heb. 2:4), and the bestowal of supernatural gifts (Acts 2:4; 1 Cor. 12:11).

The Holy Spirit Is Associated With God in Prayers and Benedictions

Jude 1:20 exhorts readers to “build yourselves up in your most holy faith and pray in the Holy Spirit.” The benediction of 2 Corinthians 13:14 contains all three members of the Godhead: “May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God [the Father], and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all” (emphasis added). The baptismal formula of Matthew 28:19 also contains the Holy Spirit, along with the other members of the Trinity, all under one “name” (essence).

THE PERSONHOOD OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

All the elements of personhood are attributed to the Holy Spirit in Scripture: He has a mind (John 14:26; 1 Cor. 2:11), He has will (1 Cor. 12:11), and He has feeling (Eph. 4:30).

Further, personal pronouns (“He” and “His”) are attributed to the Holy Spirit: “But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth, will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come” (John 16:13, emphasis added; cf. John 14:26).

The Holy Spirit also does things that only a person can do, such as teach, command (Acts 16:6), know and search the mind (1 Cor. 2:11), and pray (Rom. 8:26).

THE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

There is an order in the Trinity, and each member has a specific role to play. With regard to salvation, the Father plans and sends; the Son is sent and accomplishes; and the Holy Spirit convicts unbelievers and applies salvation to believers.

Procession From the Father

The Holy Spirit was sent by the Father. Jesus said, “I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever.” He added, “The Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, will teach you all things and will remind you of everything I have said to you” (John 14:16, 26).

Procession From the Son

Although the Eastern and Western churches split long ago on this matter, the Bible indicates that the Holy Spirit also proceeds from the Son. Jesus said clearly, “When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me.” So the Holy Spirit is sent “from the Father” as well as from the Son.

THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

The work of the Holy Spirit can be placed in two broad categories: His work in Creation and His work in redemption.

His Work in Creation

Like the Son (John 1:3; Col. 1:16), the Holy Spirit was active in creating the world. In the very first verses of the Bible, “the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters” (Gen. 1:2). Likewise, Job declared: “The Spirit of God has made me; the breath of the Almighty gives me life” (Job 33:4). The psalmist added, “When you send your Spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth” (Ps. 104:30).

His Work in Redemption

The Holy Spirit has an active role in redemption (see Volume 3, chapter 9). He convicts unbelievers of sin (Gen. 6:3; John 16:8); He regenerates those dead in trespasses and sin (Eph.

2:1); He seals believers till the day of redemption (Eph. 4:30); He baptizes all believers into the spiritual body of Christ at the moment of salvation (1 Cor. 12:13), assuring us of salvation (Rom. 8:16); He performed miracles to confirm the truth of Christianity (Gal. 3:2–5; Heb. 2:4); He bestowed spiritual gifts on believers (Acts 2:4; 1 Cor. 12:11—see Volume 4, chapter 6). He reveals (1 Cor. 2:10) and teaches (Luke 12:12). He inspired the Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Peter 1:20–21), and He is also enlightening believers to God’s truth (Eph. 1:17–18) and witnessing to God’s Word (1 John 5:9–10). He anoints believers for service (1 John 2:20) and fills those who yield to Him (Eph. 5:18). Of course, the Holy Spirit indwells all believers forever (John 14:16–17).

Many other acts are attributed to the Holy Spirit. He searches (1 Cor. 2:10), knows (1 Cor. 2:11), speaks (2 Peter 1:20), invites to salvation (Rev. 22:17), testifies (Acts 20:23), commands (Acts 16:6), calls to missions (Acts 13:2), moves (Gen. 1:2), helps (John 14:26), renews (Ps. 104:30), sanctifies (Heb. 9:14), intercedes (Rom. 8:26), unifies (Eph. 4:3), glorifies Christ (John 16:14), orders the affairs of the church (1 Cor. 14:32–33); and guides (Acts 8:29).

In general, the Holy Spirit applies the salvation the Father provided and the Son achieved (see Volume 3, chapter 9).

SYNOPSIS FOR VOLUME THREE

In Volume 1 we discussed Introduction to Theology (Prolegomena) and the Bible (Bibliology). These serve as the method and basis for doing systematic theology.

In Volume 2 we focused on Theology proper, that is, on the attributes and activities of God. In the first half, attention was centered on God Himself—His attributes and His characteristics, both nonmoral (metaphysical) and moral. After we addressed who God is, in the second half we discussed what God does (in relation to His creation).

PART ONE: HUMANITY AND SIN (ANTHROPOLOGY AND HAMARTIOLOGY)

Volume 3 also is comprised of two parts. Part 1 deals with the doctrine of sin, known as hamartiology (from the Greek words hamartios, “sin,” and logos, “study of”). First, a brief but necessary discussion of human beings covers the origin (chapter 1) and nature (chapter 2) of humanity. (This discipline is called anthropology, from the Greek words anthropos, “human being,” and logos, “study of.”) Then, we will examine the origin of sin (chapter 3), followed by the nature of sin (chapter 4), the effects of sin (chapter 5), and finally, the defeat of sin (chapter 6).

PART TWO: SALVATION (SOTERIOLOGY)

Part 2 discusses the doctrine of salvation, called soteriology (from the Greek words soterios, “bringing salvation,” and logos, “study of”). Here we will cover the origin of salvation (chapter 7), followed by the theories of salvation (chapter 8), the nature of salvation (chapter 9), the evidence of salvation (chapter 10), and the assurance of salvation (chapter 11). Next, we will study the extent and exclusivity of salvation in regard to the theories of limited atonement (chapter 12), universalism (chapter 13), and pluralism (chapter 14). Then, we will consider the results of salvation in relation to infants and the heathen (chapter 15). Last, we will examine the condition of salvation (chapter 16) and the content of salvation (chapter 17).

CHAPTER ONE

THE ORIGIN OF HUMAN BEINGS

As discussed in Volume 2, all evangelical theologians believe in the creation of the first human beings by God. With this in view, the focus here is on the original created conditions of Adam and Eve in which temptation and the Fall occurred. All of this will set the stage for a treatment of the origin of the soul in each human being after Adam, and it will serve as background for understanding the inherent and inherited depravity of each person born since Creation.

THE ORIGINAL CREATED CONDITIONS

God is absolutely perfect, and it follows, therefore, that His creation was also perfect. Moses declared, “He is the Rock, his works are perfect” (Deut. 32:4). David added, “As for God, his way is perfect” (2 Sam. 22:31). Jesus said, “Your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). Nothing less than the perfect can come from an absolutely perfect Being, and it befits the perfect Being to make only perfect beings, for the effects bear the image of their Cause.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE ORIGINAL STATE OF INNOCENCE AND PERFECTION

According to Genesis 1–2, Adam and Eve were created with complete innocence. They had no evil in their natures or their environment. They “were not ashamed” (Gen. 2:25 NASB), and they did not yet know “good and evil” (3:5). In short, they were not only guiltless of any sin but also innocent of sin.

Further, the very temptation to “be like God, knowing good and evil” (Gen. 3:5) implies they did not know evil before they fell. Indeed, when they ate the forbidden fruit, “the eyes of both of them were opened, and they realized they were naked; so they sewed fig leaves together and made coverings for themselves” (3:7). According to the New Testament, by disobedience Adam and Eve became sinful (Rom. 5:12; 1 Tim. 2:14) and brought condemnation on themselves and their posterity: “The result of one trespass was condemnation for all men” (Rom. 5:18). Before this, they were flawless.

A State of Virtue and Uprightness

Not only were Adam and Eve innocent (without evil), they were morally virtuous by virtue of their created state, for God endowed them with moral perfection. Solomon wrote, “This only have I found: God made mankind upright, but men have gone in search of many schemes” (Eccl. 7:29). The Hebrew word for “upright” is yashar, meaning “straightness,” “uprightness,” “honesty,” or “integrity”; it is the same word used in connection with “righteous” (Deut. 32:4 NASB), “blameless” (Job 1:1), and “pure” (Job 8:6). Consequently, yashar does not merely denote the absence of evil but also the presence of good—it is not simply the lack of vice but the presence of virtue. There are two basic views as to the origin of this created state of purity.

The Supernatural View

Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758) held that this original status was a supernaturally created state of grace that Adam had before the Fall and then lost by his sin:

The history [of Genesis 1–3] leads us to suppose that Adam’s sin, with relation to the forbidden fruit, was the first sin he committed. Which could not have been had he not always, till then, been perfectly righteous, righteous from the first moment of his existence; and consequently, created or brought into existence righteous. [Further], in a moral agent, subject to moral obligations, it is the same thing, to be perfectly innocent as to be perfectly righteous. It must be the same, because there can no more be a medium between sin and righteousness, or between being right and being wrong, in a moral sense, than there can be a medium between being straight and being crooked, in a natural sense. (WJE, 1.178)

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) and Catholics following him have held the same view, viz., that original righteousness was not natural but supernatural. One Catholic scholar affirmed that it was necessary for God to give Adam this supernatural righteousness at creation “in order to provide a remedy for this disease or languor of human nature, which arises from the nature of material organization” (cited by Shedd, HCC, 1.143).

Noted Reformed theologian William G. T. Shedd (1820–1894) criticized this view as “a relic of the Gnostic idea of matter” (ibid., 1.147) and rejected it because: “If so, then God creates man in a sinful state” (ibid., 1.148).

The Natural View

Shedd argued that this created state of perfection was natural, viz., the very created nature God gave Adam was a morally upright and perfect one. He noted that the same word (Heb: yashar) is used by God of Job: “This man was blameless and upright; he feared God and shunned evil” (Job 1:1).

Original righteousness enters into the very idea of man as coming from the hands of the Creator. It is part of his created endowment, and does not require to be superadded. The work of the Creator is perfect, and needs no improvement, (op. cit., 1.145)

In short, according to the natural view, since God is perfect, He cannot make an imperfect creature. Hence, the natural state of Adam and Eve, from the moment of Creation, must have been perfect.

A Perfect Environment

Not only was Adam given a perfect nature, but he also had a perfect environment. There was no sin in Eden, a paradise of goodness. God had made it (Gen. 2:8ff.), and everything God made was “very good” (Gen. 1:31).

There was no moral (or metaphysical) imperfection in Eden; it was flawless in every way. There was no tendency toward evil from within Adam, and there was nothing evil about his created environment around him. Creation was not subject to corruption, as it was after the Fall (Rom. 8:22). There was no human death (Rom. 5:12), and both internal and external natures were absolutely perfect.

A State of Dominion

In the original created state, humankind was not a servant of nature but master over it. Man did not serve under its strong hand; rather, it served his, for nature was subject to humanity. God said to them, “Fill the earth and subdue it. Rule over the fish of the sea and the birds of the air and over every living creature that moves on the ground” (Gen. 1:28; cf. Psa. 8).

A State of Moral Responsibility

All of this is not to say that Adam had no moral accountability to anyone over him. He did, for “the LORD God commanded the man, ‘You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die’ ” (Gen. 2:16–17). God had given an order, and Adam had a responsibility to obey His Creator. As we know, at this Adam failed miserably (Gen. 3:1ff.; cf. Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Tim. 2:14).

Adam was free in that his actions were self-determined; God specifically said, “You are free” (Gen. 2:16). When Adam chose to disobey, God blamed him, asking, “Have you eaten from the tree of which I commanded you that you should not eat?” (3:11 AMP). The emphasized words clearly point to a self-determined act (cf. v. 13). You did it, God said. Your “self” is responsible, He maintained. No one else made Adam and Eve commit sin, including the devil, who tempted them. Such is the self-determining nature of freedom.

The Presence of the Tempter

Of course, these perfect persons in a perfect paradise were not without an imperfect intruder. Satan, a fallen archangel of God, had rebelled against his Creator, sweeping with him a third of all the angels (Rev. 12:4, 9). By clever deception, the great deceiver led Eve and then, through her, Adam into disobedience against God (Rom. 5:19; 1 Tim. 2:14). By a free and uncoerced choice of their wills, the perfect pair in the perfect paradise fell into imperfection—and their world with them. Their disobedience led to death and destruction (Rom. 5:12–21; 8:20–23).

It is noteworthy that Adam and Eve were not enticed to lie, cheat, steal, or curse. Indeed, their moral nature was perfect; thus, they were not vulnerable to these kinds of temptations. The command of God for them not to eat the forbidden fruit was not a command to stay away from what was intrinsically evil. With this, they had no problem, for their upright and virtuous state protected them from it. What they were vulnerable to was a test as to whether they would obey God simply because He said it.

“Hath God said?” was the snare they faced from the devil (Gen. 3:1 KJV). Their moral responsibility to God was with regard to an object that was morally neutral. God could have said, for instance, “Don’t pick the daisies.” Again, the issue was not that the sin was inherent in the substance in which they partook; the temptation to sin was in the enticement to defy God, and subsequently to be conscious of the evil of choosing against Him. No evil from within or from without drew them to their transgression. Only a raw act of freedom, wrongly exercised, carried out their disobedience and sealed their doom.

Herein, perhaps, lies the solution to a thorny problem: If Adam and Eve had committed some other sin before eating the forbidden fruit, would it have precipitated the Fall? The answer may very well be that it was impossible for them to sin on another issue, since they were created morally perfect. Surely Satan would have so tempted them if he could have, but there is no indication that he did. Most likely, only disobedience to God’s specific command would precipitate the Fall and plunge the whole creation into death and disaster.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR THE ORIGINAL STATE OF INNOCENCE AND PERFECTION

The perfect condition of the original state of creation is derived from the nature of God as an absolutely perfect Being. The argument goes as follows:

- (1) God is an absolutely perfect Being.
- (2) An absolutely perfect Being cannot produce an imperfect creation.
- (3) Therefore, the original creation God made was perfect.

God Is an Absolutely Perfect Being

Since this point has been established elsewhere, only the outline will be restated here. The biblical basis for God's moral perfection is found in numerous passages.

"He is the Rock, his works are perfect, and all his ways are just. A faithful God who does no wrong, upright and just is he" (Deut. 32:4). "As for God, his way is perfect... It is God who arms me with strength and makes my way perfect" (2 Sam. 22:31, 33). "Do you know how the clouds hang poised, those wonders of him who is perfect in knowledge?" (Job 37:16). "His way is perfect; the word of the LORD is flawless" (Ps. 18:30). "The law of the LORD is perfect, reviving the soul" (Ps. 19:7). "O LORD, you are my God; I will exalt you and praise your name, for in perfect faithfulness you have done marvelous things, things planned long ago" (Isa. 25:1).

"Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). "When perfection comes, the imperfect disappears" (1 Cor. 13:10). "We proclaim him, admonishing and teaching everyone with all wisdom, so that we may present everyone perfect in Christ" (Col. 1:28). "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). "There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear" (1 John 4:18).

The theological basis for God's perfection can be supported by other reasoning as well. For one thing, our knowledge of the imperfect implies a Perfect; because we cannot know what is not perfect unless we know what is Perfect, there must be a Perfect (God). Just as we cannot know a circle is flawed unless we have an idea of a flawless one, moral imperfections cannot be detected unless we possess some concept of moral perfection.

Furthermore, granted that God is a moral Being, it follows from three of His metaphysical attributes that He must be morally perfect. The reasoning goes like this:

- (1) God's nature is morally perfect.
- (2) God is infinite, unchangeable (immutable), and necessary by nature.
- (3) Therefore, God is infinitely, unchangeably, and necessarily morally perfect.

An Absolutely Perfect Being Cannot Produce an Imperfect Creation

Again, this premise is based on the principles of analogy and causality, which have been defended earlier. Briefly, the effect must resemble the cause in its actuality, but not in its potentiality.<sup>12</sup> Thus, if the Creator makes something with moral perfection, He too must have the same characteristic, for a cause cannot give a perfection it doesn't possess, and it cannot share with others what it does not have to share.

However, unlike the Cause of all things, the effect must be limited—it must have potentiality to be and/or not to be something other than it is, either accidentally or substantially. Thus, while the effect is similar to the Cause in its actuality, it must be dissimilar in its potentiality and limitations, since God is Pure Actuality. From this it follows that if creatures were given perfection in a limited way, then their Cause (God) must have perfection in an unlimited way; if creatures are relatively perfect, then God must be absolutely perfect, and so on. Whatever perfection creatures have, the Creator must have it absolutely, infinitely, and immutably.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE ORIGINAL STATE OF INNOCENCE AND PERFECTION

Early Church Fathers

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

Irenaeus contended that God did not bestow absolute perfection upon humanity—only God is absolutely perfect. Adam was finitely perfect, yet he was untested. Hence,

If ... anyone says, “What then? Could not God have exhibited man as perfect from the beginning?” let him know that, inasmuch as God is indeed always the same and unbegotten as respects Himself, all things are possible to Him. But created things must be inferior to Him who created them, from the very fact of their later origin; for it was not possible for things recently created to have been uncreated. But inasmuch as they are not uncreated, for this very reason do they come short of the [absolutely] perfect. (AH, I.4.38.2)

God had power at the beginning to grant [absolute] perfection to man; but as the latter was only recently created, he could not possibly have received it, or even if he had received it, could he have contained it, or containing it, could he have retained it. (ibid.)

Theophilus (c. 130–190)

God having thus completed the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and all that are in them, on the sixth day, rested on the seventh day from all His works which He made.... And after the formation of man, God chose out for him a region among the places of the East, excellent for light, brilliant with a very bright atmosphere, [abundant] in the finest plants; and in this He placed man. (TA in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, II.2.19)

Scripture thus relates the words of the sacred history: “And God planted Paradise, eastward, in Eden; and there He put the man whom He had formed. And out of the ground made God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of Paradise” (TA in ibid., II.2.20).

Medieval Fathers

The great theologians of the Middle Ages concurred on Adam’s perfection from the moment of his creation. Augustine is a case in point.

Augustine (354–430)

Man's nature, indeed, was created at first faultless and without any sin; but that nature of man in which every one is born from Adam, now wants the Physician, because it is not sound. (ONG, 3)

Accordingly we say that there is no unchangeable good but the one, true, blessed God; that the things which He made are indeed good because from Him, yet mutable because made not out of Him, but out of nothing. (CG, 12.1)

Anselm (1033–1109)

Man being made holy was placed in paradise ... as it were, in the place of God, between God and the devil, to conquer the devil by not yielding to his temptation, and so to vindicate the honor of God and put the devil to shame, because that man, though weaker and dwelling upon earth, should not sin though tempted by the devil. (CDH, I.XXII)

This is clear also from the very rectitude of the first state, by virtue of which, while the soul remained subject to God, the lower powers in man were subject to the higher, and were no impediment to their action. And from what has preceded it is clear that as regards its proper object the intellect is always true.... Therefore, it is clear that the rectitude of the first state was incompatible with any deception of the intellect. (ST, 1a.94.4)

Paradise was a fitting abode for man as regards the incorruptibility of the first state. Now this incorruptibility was man's, not by nature, but by a supernatural gift of God. Therefore that this might be attributed to the grace of God, and not to human nature, God made man outside of paradise, and afterwards placed him in paradise to live during the whole of his animal life; and, having attained to the spiritual life, to be transferred thence to heaven. (ibid., 1a.102.4)

Reformation Leaders

Martin Luther (1483–1546)

The image of God in which Adam was made was something most beautiful and noble. The leprosy of sin adhered neither to his reason nor to his will, but, within and without, all his senses were pure. His intellect was very clear, his memory very good, and his will very sincere. His conscience was clean and secure, without any fear of death and without care. To these inner perfections came also that beautiful and superb strength of the body and all its members, by which he surpassed all the other animate creatures in nature. For I fully believe that before he sinned, the eyes of Adam were so clear and their vision so acute that he excelled the lynx and the eagle. Stronger than they, Adam handled lions and bears, whose strength is very great, as we handle little dogs. (WLS, 878)

If we want to speak about outstanding philosophers, let us speak about our first parents while they were pure and unstained by sin. For they had the most perfect knowledge of God. And indeed, how could they be ignorant of Him whose image they had and felt in themselves? (ibid., 1046–47)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

Our definition of the image seems not to be complete until it appears more clearly what the faculties are in which man excels, and in which he is to be regarded as a mirror of the divine glory. This, however, cannot be better known than from the remedy provided for the corruption of nature. It cannot be doubted that when Adam lost his first estate he became alienated from God. Wherefore, although we grant that the image of God was not utterly effaced and destroyed in him, it was, however, so corrupted, that anything which remains is fearful deformity; and, therefore, our deliverance begins with that renovation which we obtain from Christ, who is, therefore, called the second Adam, because he restores us to true and substantial integrity. (ICR, I.XV.V)

Post-Reformation Teachers

Jacob Arminius (1560–1609)

Man, having been previously placed in a state of integrity, walked with unshuffling feet in the way of God's commandments; by this foul deed he impinged or offended against the law itself, and fell from his state of innocence (Rom. 5:15–18)... Man perpetrated this crime, after he had been placed in a state of innocence and adorned by God with such excellent endowments as those of "the knowledge of God" and "righteousness and true holiness" [Gen. 1:26–27; Col. 3:10; Eph. 4:24] (WJA, I.485).

"So many facilities existed for not sinning, especially in the act itself, yet man did not abstain from this sin" [Gen. 2:16–17] (ibid.).

Charles Hodge (1797–1878)

In the moral image of God, or original righteousness, are included (1) the perfect harmony and due subordination of all that constitutes his reason; his affections and appetites to his will; the body was the obedient organ of the soul. There was neither rebellion of the sensuous part of his nature against the rational, nor was there any disproportion between them needing to be controlled or balanced by extra gifts or influence. (2) But besides this equilibrium and harmony in the original constitution of man, his moral perfection in which he resembled God, included knowledge, righteousness, and holiness. (ST, II.99)

Schubert Ogden (b. 1928)

To some extent, of course, Protestant theology has always been critical of this distinction as understood and employed by Catholic theologians. Lutheran and Reformed orthodoxy alike rejected the doctrine that "original righteousness" is a donum superadditum, on the ground that its implication that our natural state was imperfect clearly conflicts with Gen. 1:31 (Schmid: 158; Heppé: 190–191). And yet [Catholic theologians'] own understanding that God's original gifts to human beings were natural did not preclude speaking of God's revelation in Jesus Christ as supernatural. For even these natural gifts themselves must be called supernatural, insofar as they are "above the nature corrupted by sin and are not restored except by supernatural grace" [Heppé: 191] (OT, 33).

THREE VIEWS ON THE ORIGIN OF THE HUMAN SOUL

Three primary views on the origin of the soul have been held by Christians. One, the preexistence view, has subsequently been declared heretical, since it contradicts the clear teaching of Scripture about the creation of human beings. The preexistence view has two forms: platonic (uncreated) and Christian (created). The former serves as a backdrop for understanding the latter.

Two Forms of the Preexistence View

The Uncreated-Preexistence View

According to Plato (c. 427–347 B.C.), human souls are not only intrinsically immortal but they are also eternal (see P); they were never created but are part of the eternal world that exists outside of God (the Demiurgos). Just like Plato's proposed world of eternal Forms (Ideas), there are also eternal souls that exist by virtue of the World Soul, which animates all things. Before birth, allegedly, these souls enter a body (in a woman's womb) and become incarnate in human flesh. Thus, human beings essentially are eternal souls in temporal bodies.

So goes the uncreated-preexistence view, and the problems with it fall into three categories: (1) It isn't biblical, (2) it isn't scientific, and (3) it isn't philosophically sound.

First, the Bible clearly declares that human beings were created, body and soul. If they were brought into being at a point in time, then they have not existed from eternity.

Second, the scientific evidence points to individual human life beginning at conception.

Third, an infinite number of moments is impossible, since the present moment is the end of all moments before it, and there cannot be an end of an infinite series of moments (see Craig, KCA). Thus, no human (temporal) being can be eternal.

The Created-Preexistence View

The created-preexistence view, maintained by some early Christians, borrowed heavily from Plato. Origen (c. 185–c. 254) and even Augustine (earlier in his life) believed that the soul existed before birth, but that rather than having existed without creation from eternity, it was created by God from eternity. By insisting on creation, adherents to the created-preexistence view hoped to preserve the Christian dimension of the platonic view, but it was condemned as heresy nonetheless. Augustine rightly reversed this erroneous allegiance with preincarnationism in his Retractions; the Bible declares that human beings had a beginning (cf. Gen. 1:27; Matt. 19:4).

The Creation View: The Soul Is Created Directly by God

Having addressed the two untenable forms of the preexistence view, there are still two other basic perspectives, embraced by orthodox theologians, on the origin of the human soul after the original creation. The first is creationism, examined here, and the second is traducianism, which we will address next.

The essence of creationism, in regard to the human soul, is that God directly creates a new individual soul for everyone born into this world. While the body of each new human being is generated by his or her parents through a natural process, the soul is supernaturally created by God.

Various Christian writers have placed the moment of this direct creation of the soul at different points in the development of the human body. There are several main subviews.

Creation of the Soul at Conception

Most evangelical Christians who hold the creationist view maintain that the creation of the soul by God occurs at the moment of conception. There is both biblical and scientific evidence in favor.

The Biblical Evidence

David wrote, “Surely I was sinful at birth, sinful from the time my mother conceived me” (Ps. 51:5). Jesus was the God-man from the moment of conception, for the angel said, “Joseph son of David, do not be afraid to take Mary home as your wife, because what is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 1:20).

The Scientific Evidence

Modern science has provided a window to the womb. As a result, the evidence is now clearer than ever that an individual human life (soul) begins at the very moment of conception (fertilization).

First, it is a genetic fact that a fertilized human ovum is 100 percent human. From that very moment, all genetic information is present, and no more is added from the point of conception until death.

Second, all physical characteristics for life are contained in the genetic code present at conception.

Third, the sex of the individual child is determined at the moment of conception.

Fourth, a female ovum has twenty-three chromosomes; a male sperm has twenty-three chromosomes; a regular human being has forty-six chromosomes. At the very moment of conception, when male sperm and female ovum unite, a new tiny forty-six-chromosome human being emerges.

Fifth, from conception until death, nothing is added except food, air, and water.

Sixth, and finally, world-famous geneticist Jerome LeJeune (b. 1925) declares:

To accept the fact that after fertilization has taken place a new human has come into being is no longer a matter of taste or opinion. The human nature of the human being from conception to old age is not a metaphysical contention, it is plain experimental evidence. (As cited in Geisler and Beckwith, MLD, 16)

Creation of the Soul at Implantation

Other Christian writers maintain that the soul is created at implantation of the fertilized egg in the uterus. The basis for this is alleged to be in the fact that identical twinning can occur up to the embryo stage (two weeks, or fourteen days, after conception); thus, it seems implausible to speak of an individual human being where there is still the possibility of two. In such a case we would have to assume, for example, that the original individual (zygote) dies when it becomes the two twins. Further, it is argued that experiments on sheep and mice, which, like humans, have intrauterine pregnancies, show that there is not one individual being before the completion of implantation into the uterus.

However, there are good reasons to reject this conclusion.

For one thing, at best, this argument shows only that individual human life begins two weeks after conception, not that actual human life begins then. Indeed, it is acknowledged that there is a living human nature from the very moment of conception.

In addition, if human life begins from conception, it is moot to debate when a continuous individual (person) begins. Human life has sanctity whether or not it is yet individuated (cf. Gen. 1:27; 9:6).

Further, as even proponents of this position agree, this argument is ultimately philosophical, not factual, and, therefore, it should not be used as a basis for treating a conceptus with anything but full rights as a human being.

Finally, the later zygotic split (into twins) could be a nonsexual form of “parenting” akin to cloning. Consequently, it does not logically follow that a zygote prior to twinning is not fully human simply because identical twins result from a zygotic split.

Creation of the Soul After Implantation

Thomas Aquinas, following the lead of Aristotle (384–322 B.C.), placed the creation of the human soul well after conception. He argued that while the animal soul was generated by the parents, nonetheless, the rational soul, in which is found one’s humanness, was not created until forty days after conception for boys and ninety days for girls (CSPL, Dist. III, Art. II).

This view was based on an outdated aristotelian model of biology that has no basis in either science or Scripture. It is an embarrassment both to Roman Catholics and to the pro-life movement in general, since if it were true, a fertilized ovum, initially, would not be truly human, and hence subject to abortion for the first few weeks after conception. Most Catholic theologians are convinced that Aquinas would have repudiated the after-implantation view if he would have been made aware of the scientific facts available today (see Heaney, “AHC” in HLR, 63–74).

Creation of the Soul at Animation

Some theologians have speculated that God does not create a human soul until just before the baby starts moving in the mother’s womb. This, however, is based on outdated scientific theory as well as an inadequate understanding of soul. (Soul was thought to be “the principle of self-motion”; thus, when life began to move in the womb, the mother assumed that God had given a life [soul] to it.)

Creation of the Soul at Birth

Finally, some Christians have argued for the view that individual human souls are created at birth. For this they offer two main arguments.

First, human life is biblically designated from the point of birth (cf. Gen. 5:1ff.).

Second, Adam was not human until he began to breathe, as Genesis 2:7 declares: “The LORD God formed man from the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and [then] man became a living soul” (KJV).

Responding in reverse order, Adam was a unique case, since he was directly created by God. Therefore, the fact that he did not become human until he breathed is not decisive for determining when individual human life begins, for several reasons.

First, Adam wasn’t conceived and born like other humans; again, he was directly created.

Second, the fact that Adam was not human until he began to breathe no more proves when individual human life begins today than does the fact that he was created as an adult prove that individual human life does not begin until we are adults.

Third, breath in Genesis 2:7 (Heb: ruach) denotes the origin of “life” (cf. Job 33:4). This indicates, then, that life began when God gave human life to Adam, not simply because Adam began breathing. Human life was later given to his posterity at fertilization or conception (Gen. 4:1).

Fourth, other animals breathe but are not people (Gen. 7:21–22). Obviously, breath, in and of itself, did not make Adam human.

Fifth, medically, many who at some point in life stop breathing later revive (or, they live by the aid of a machine). The unborn human cannot be seen (without instruments) in the womb, and hence is not a part of the social scene until birth.

Sixth, if “breath” is equated with “the presence of human life,” then the loss of breath would mean the loss of humanness. However, God’s Word teaches that human beings continue to exist after they stop breathing (Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:6–8; Rev. 6:9).

Seventh, and finally, the Scriptures speak of human life in the womb long before breathing begins, namely, from the point of conception (Ps. 51:5; Matt. 1:20).

As to the other argument (that human life is designated from birth in the Bible [Gen. 5:1ff.]), it should be noted that the verses on breath do not speak of the beginning of human life but simply of the initial “coming out” event (when the human being begins to breathe). These passages speak about the beginning of observable life, not the beginning of life itself. Even in biblical times, people knew the baby was alive in the womb (cf. Luke 1:44). Birth was not seen as the beginning of human life but simply as the beginning or emergence—the human debut—of life into the naturally visible world.

The Traducian View: The Soul Is Created Indirectly Through Parents

The word traducian comes from the Latin tradux, meaning “branch of a vine.” As applied to the origin of the soul, it means that each new human being is a branch off of his or her parents; that is to say, in the traducian model both soul and body are generated by father and mother.

In response to the creation view (which says that God creates each new life directly in the womb), traducianists observe, first of all, that creation was completed on the sixth day (Gen. 2:2; Deut. 4:32; Matt. 13:35) and that God is resting and has not created since (Heb. 4:4).

Further, traducianists note that the scientific evidence for how an individual human life (soul) begins is clear: It comes from the sperm and ovum of its parents and is first conceived in the womb as a fully individual person.

Finally, traducianists point out that the creationist view does not explain the inheritance of original sin. Certainly a perfect God would not create a fallen soul, nor can we accept the gnostic<sup>25</sup> idea that the contact of a pure soul with the material body (in the womb) precipitates its fall. The most reasonable explanation is that both fallen soul and body are naturally generated from one’s parents.

SUMMARY AND CONTRAST OF THE THREE BASIC VIEWS

While both creationists and traducianists believe that God creates all souls, creationists claim He does it directly in the womb, and traducianists insist He does it indirectly through parents. Specifically, creationism holds that while each new human body is generated by parents, each new human soul is directly created by God.

The preexistence view, stemming from Plato, asserts that all souls existed before the world began—they are eternal and uncreated. In a variant of this ideological model, some early Christian thinkers believed each soul was created by God before the world began and then later, before birth, came into a body. However, unlike the platonic and other non-Christian views, Origen and the early Augustine, for example, did not believe there was a reincarnation of the soul after death (see Geisler and Amano, RS). The three main views can be summarized as follows:

THREE VIEWS ON THE ORIGIN OF THE HUMAN SOUL

	Preexistence	Creationism	Traducianism

EVIDENCE FOR THE TRADUCIAN VIEW

The evidence for the traducian view of the origin of the soul is biblical, theological, and scientific. The heart of the traducian view is that human life (soul) can be divided and passed on to others.

The Biblical Evidence for Traducianism

First, from the beginning, male and female were considered one species, two sharing human life (Gen. 1:26).

Second, both male and female, not just male, were broadly called "Adam" (5:1–2).

Third, Eve was made from Adam, not separately (2:21–22).

Fourth, creation was complete from the beginning (2:1–3), and God has rested from creating ever since (Heb. 4:4).

Fifth, the Bible speaks of the unity of male and female (1 Cor. 11:8), one coming from the other.

Sixth, Eve is called “the mother of all the living” (Gen. 3:20), a title most appropriate if all other human life came from her.

Seventh, Adam had children in his image (5:3; cf. 1:26), which makes sense if his life was truly transmitted to them by natural generation.

Eighth, flesh (Gk: sarx) can mean “whole person with body” (John 3:6; cf. 1:14; Acts 2:17; Rom. 3:20) rather than just the transmission of a physical body (as is contended by the creationist view of the origin of the soul).

Ninth, likewise, in Romans 1:3, flesh, which comes from physical generation, refers to one’s whole humanity, not just to the body.

Tenth, Acts 17:26 KJV says that all who are God’s offspring (image) are made of “one blood,” which is accomplished by natural processes.

Eleventh, Hebrews 7:10 teaches that Levi was in Abraham’s loins and came by physical transmission from him.

Twelfth, Psalm 139:13–16 reveals that our personal substance, which is more than physical, was made in the womb by a natural, God-ordained process.

Thirteenth, the body in the womb is referred to as a person in many passages (e.g., Job 10:10; Ps. 22:9–10; Jer. 1:5). In addition, person is more than the physical aspect of humanity.

Fourteenth, Romans 5:12 says we all sinned “through one man” [Adam]. This implies that sin, which is possible only for a person, can be transmitted by natural processes.

Fifteenth, 1 Corinthians 15:22–27 affirms that all humans were “in Adam.”

Sixteenth, Ephesians 2:3 makes plain that we were all born with a sinful nature, and mere bodies without souls cannot sin.

Seventeenth, Psalm 51:5 declares that we were conceived in sin, something not possible unless there is a human soul at conception.

Eighteenth, and finally, Jesus is said to be from the “loins” of David (1 Kings 8:19 KJV), indicating His genetic connection through His mother.

The Theological Evidence for Traducianism

There are several theological truths that are best explained by the traducian view of the human soul’s origin.

First, the Bible speaks of the imputation (attribution) of sins from Adam to his entire posterity (Rom. 5:13, 18). It is extremely difficult to interpret this in any actual sense of the term unless sin is transmitted through natural processes.

Second, the fact that we are born with a natural inclination to sin (Eph. 2:3; John 3:6) favors the traducian view.

Third, the universality of sin supports traducianism, for if sin is not inherited by all at birth, then why are all people born in sin?

Fourth, and finally, the soul/body unity of human nature favors traducianism, since it makes sense that soul and body, together, are transmitted from parent to child.

The Scientific Evidence for Traducianism

Remembering that soul (Heb: nephesh and Gk: psyche) means “life,” and that a human life is a human soul, the scientific evidence that human life (the soul) begins at conception is strong.

First, it is a scientific fact that individual human life (with unique DNA) is passed on by natural generation, from parents to child.

Second, cloning produces the same kind of life without a new creation. Hence, the possibility of human cloning argues in favor of traducianism.

Third, by analogy, human souls, like animal souls, are passed on from parents to offspring.

Fourth, and finally, because humans are a psychosomatic (soul/body) unity, the body is only part of, not the whole, person. Again, it makes sense that both are passed on together, from parents to child.

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO THE TRADUCIAN VIEW

Many arguments have been set against the traducian paradigm. However, as will be seen, none of them provides a definitive refutation.

Objection One—Based on God as the Father of Spirits

This objection is based on Hebrews 12:9, which says, “How much more should we submit to the Father of our spirits and live!” This phrase, “Father of our spirits,” is taken to mean that God directly fathers (creates) all human spirits.

Response to Objection One

In reply, the text does not say that God created our spirit at conception or that He fathered all human spirits directly (rather than indirectly, through our parents). God is also said (in Genesis) to be the Creator of all animals, yet He created only the first pair directly—the rest came about by a divinely given process of natural conception.

Further, even if the term Father implies creation, it does not indicate how or when God produced us. He certainly could have fathered us through an indirect process of human generation.

Also, the term Father in Hebrews 12:9 may not be a reference to the generation of human beings, but instead may describe the care given to them by God after they are conceived. This fits the immediate context of God, our Father, disciplining us, His children (cf. 12:3ff.).

Objection Two—Based on God Making Souls

According to this argument, Isaiah affirmed that God made souls, saying,

“I will not accuse forever, nor will I always be angry, for then the spirit of man would grow faint before me—the breath of man [soul] that I have created” (Isa. 57:16).

Response to Objection Two

As with Objection One, the passage does not say why, how, or when God created all souls. There is no question that He is the ultimate efficient Cause of all souls; the issue is whether He used intermediate (or instrumental) causes (such as parents) to create them.

In addition, the word soul (Heb: nephesh and Gk: psyche) is often biblically used of the whole person, including the body, which we know is generated through natural processes.

Finally, the word made (Heb: asah), instead of create (Heb: bara), is used in this verse; asah seldom means “to create from nothing.”

Objection Three—Based on God Creating People Since Adam

It is also objected that the Bible presents God as having created people since Adam. Zechariah affirms that “the LORD ... stretches out the heavens, [He] lays the foundation of the earth, and [He] forms the spirit of man within him” (Zech. 12:1). Malachi challenges, “Have we not all one Father? Did not one God create us?” (Mal. 2:10).

Response to Objection Three

Once more, it does not say how God did it. The word create sometimes can even refer to “a natural process in the present” (e.g., Ps. 104:30), and it does not always mean “to create something from nothing.” Even in Genesis, when God created Adam (1:27), He used dust to do part of it (2:7).

Objection Four—Based on the Dependence of All Creation Upon God’s Necessity

Thomas Aquinas opposed traducianism on the grounds that only God can create and that all creative acts are direct and immediate (see ST, 1a.44.1). No creature can create, because every creature depends, for its existence, on a Cause that is not a creature. Every contingent being, for its existence, at every moment of its existence, is dependent on the necessary Being, for the contingent being never ceases to be a contingent being.<sup>45</sup> Thus, for Aquinas, parents cannot possibly be the cause of the existence of their children.

Response to Objection Four

Traducianism does not hold that the parents are the efficient cause of their child’s existence but only the instrumental cause. The parents cause the becoming of their child; only God can cause his or her being. However, as instrumental causes, the parents do pass on to their posterity the soul, which only God can and did create, and which only God can and does sustain in existence. The question is not about the origin and sustenance of a human soul, which, clearly, only God can perform and uphold. Rather, the question pertains to the transmission of the soul, which, as instrumental causes, parents facilitate.

THE HISTORICAL TESTIMONY ON THE ORIGIN OF THE SOUL

Long before Christian theologians philosophized on the soul, two brilliant ancient thinkers, Plato and Aristotle, provided a foundation for the divergent perspectives among Christians, depending on whether they followed Plato’s dualistic preexistence view, as Augustine did, or Aristotle’s hylomorphic view,<sup>47</sup> as Aquinas did.

Ancient Greek Philosophers

Aristotle (384–322 B.C.)

The question might also be raised about the parts of the soul: What is the separate role of each in relation to the body? For, if the whole soul holds together the whole body, we should expect each part of the soul to hold together a part of the body. But this seems an impossibility; it is difficult even to imagine what sort of bodily part [that] mind will hold together, or how it will do this. (C, I.5)

“The soul, therefore, is the primary act of a physical body potentially possessing life” (DA, II.1.412). “The soul is that whereby we primarily live and perceive and move and understand” (ibid., II.2.414).

Plato (c. 427–347 B.C.)

Our soul also exists before we were born; and if these do not exist, would the argument thus be saying otherwise? Then is it so, and is it equally necessary these things exist and our souls also did before we were born. (P, 4.76d)

“So answer,” [Socrates] said, “what makes the body to be alive?”

“The soul,” [Cebes] said.

“Then is this always the case?”

“Of course,” he said.

“Then the soul that takes possession of it, does it always come bringing life to that?”

“It does,” he said.

“And first is there anything opposite to life or not?”

“There is,” he said.

“What?”

“Death.”

“Then will the soul ever accept the opposite to what it always brings, as out of the previous agreement?”

“Most certainly not,” said Cebes.

“Then does the soul not accept death?”

“No.”

“So the soul is immortal.”

“Immortal.”

“Well,” he said; “then shall we say this is demonstrated; how does it seem?”

“And most sufficiently, Socrates” (ibid., 13.105e).

Hence, “If the immortal is also indestructible, it is impossible for the soul, when death comes upon it, to perish; for out of what was said before it will not accept death, nor will it be dead” (ibid., 13.106b).

[Socrates asked,] “When did our souls acquire this knowledge of them? For it was not after being born as humans.”

[Simmias answered,] “Definitely not.”

“Then previously.”

“Yes.”

“Then, Simmias, souls existed previously, before they were born in human form, without bodies, and they had wisdom.”

“Unless we receive this knowledge when born, Socrates; for this time still remains” (ibid., 4.72e–77d).

Early Church Fathers

Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225)

We have already decided one point in our controversy with Hermogenes, as we said at the beginning of this treatise, when we claimed the soul to be formed by the breathing of God, and not out of matter. We relied even there on the clear direction of the inspired statement which informs us how that “the Lord God breathed on man’s face the breath of life, so that man became a living soul”—by that inspiration of God, of course. On this point, therefore, nothing further need be investigated or advanced by us. (TS in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, III.1.9.3–4)

Further,

When we acknowledge that the soul originates in the breath of God, it follows that we attribute a beginning to it. This Plato, indeed, refuses to assign to it, for he will have the soul to be unborn and unmade. We, however, from the very fact of its having had a beginning, as well as from the nature thereof, teach that it had both birth and creation. And when we ascribe both birth and creation to it, we have made no mistake: for being born, indeed, is one thing, and being made is another—the former being the term which is best suited to living beings.... Thus, the being made admits of being taken in the sense of being brought forth; inasmuch as everything which receives being or existence, in any way whatever, is in fact generated. For the maker may really be called the parent of the thing that is made: in this sense Plato also uses the phraseology. So far, therefore, as concerns our belief in the souls being made or born, the opinion of the philosopher is overthrown by the authority of prophecy even. (TS in ibid., III.1.9.3–4)

It is essential to a firm faith to declare with Plato that the soul is simple; in other words, uniform and uncompounded; simply that is to say in respect of its substance.... If indeed the soul and the spirit are two, they may be divided; and thus, by the separation of the one, which departs from the one which remains, there would accrue the union and meeting together of life and of death. But such a union never will accrue: therefore, they are not two, and they cannot be divided; but divided they might have been, if they had been (two).... How much firmer ground have you for believing that the soul and the spirit are but one, since you assign to them no difference; so that the soul is itself the spirit, respiration being the function of that of which life also is! (TS in ibid., III.1.9.10)

How, then, is a living being conceived? Is the substance of both body and soul formed together at one and the same time? Or does one of them precede the other in natural formation? We indeed maintain that both are conceived, and formed, and perfectly simultaneously, as well as born together; and that not a moment’s interval occurs in their conception, so that a prior place can be assigned to either. (TS in ibid., III.1.9.27)

We allow that life begins with conception, because we contend that the soul also begins from conception; life taking its commencement at the same moment and place that the soul does. Thus, then, the processes act together to produce separation by death. (TS in ibid.)

Forasmuch, therefore, as these two different and separate substances, the clay and the breath, combined at the first creation in forming the individual man, they then both amalgamated and mixed their proper seminal rudiments in one, and ever afterwards communicated to the human race the normal mode of its propagation, so that even now the two substances, although diverse from each other, flow forth simultaneously in a united channel; and finding their way together into their appointed seed-plot, they fertilize with their combined vigor the human fruit out of their respective natures. And inherent in this human product is his own seed, according to the process which has been ordained for every creature endowed with the functions of generation. Accordingly from the one (primeval) man comes the entire outflow and redundancy of men’s souls—nature proving herself true to the commandment of God, “Be fruitful, and multiply” (TS in ibid.).

We must now speak with respect to those who think meanly of the flesh, and say that it is not worthy of the resurrection nor of the heavenly economy, because, first, its substance is earth; and besides, because it is full of all wickedness, so that it forces the soul to sin along with it. But these persons seem to be ignorant of the whole work of God, both of the genesis and formation of man at the first, and why the things in the world were made. For does not the word say, “Let Us make man in our image, and after our likeness”? What kind of man? Manifestly He means fleshly man, for the word says, “And God took dust of the earth, and made man.” It is evident, therefore, that man made in the image of God was of flesh. Is it not, then, absurd to say that the flesh made by God in His own image is contemptible, and worth nothing? But that the flesh is with God a precious possession is manifest, first from its being formed by Him, if at least the image is valuable to the former and artist; and besides, its value can be gathered from the creation of the rest of the world. For that on account of which the rest is made, is the most precious of all to the maker. (FLWJ in ibid., 1.1.7)

Origen (c. 185–c. 254)

“The soul, when implanted in the body, moves all things in it, and exerts its force over everything on which it operates” (DP in ibid., IV.2.8.1).

But with respect to the soul, whether it is derived from the seed by a process of traducianism, so that the reason or substance of it may be considered as placed in the seminal particles of the body themselves, or whether it has any other beginning; and this beginning, itself, whether it be by birth or not, or whether bestowed upon the body from without or no, is not distinguished with sufficient clearness in the teaching of the Church. (ibid., IV, preface, 5)

Medieval Fathers

Augustine (354–430)

As for the opinion that new souls are created by inbreathing without being propagated, we certainly do not in the least object to its maintenance—only let it be by persons who have succeeded in discovering some new evidence, either in the canonical Scriptures, in the shape of unambiguous testimony towards the solution of a most knotty question, or else in their own reasonings, such as shall not be opposed to catholic [universal] truth, but not by such persons as this man has shown himself to be. If the doctrine of the propagation of souls is false, may its refutation not be the work of such disputants; and may the defense of the rival principle of the insufflation of new souls in every creative act, proceed from better hands. (OSO, 1.33)

What shall I say, moreover, as to the [difficulty which besets the theory of the creation of each soul separately at the birth of the individual in connection with the] diversity of talent in different souls, and especially the absolute privation of reason in some? This is, indeed, not apparent in the first stages of infancy, but being developed continuously from the beginning of life, it becomes manifest in children, of whom some are so slow and defective in memory that they cannot learn even the letters of the alphabet, and some (commonly called idiots) so imbecile that they differ very little from the beasts of the field. Perhaps, I am told, in answer to this, that the bodies are the cause of these imperfections. (L, 166.6)

“Now that it is actually such a body, it owes to some principle, which is called its act. Therefore the soul, which is the first principle of life, is not a body, but the act of a body” (ST, I.75.1).

It is clear that the first thing by which the body lives is the soul. And as life appears through various operations in different degrees of living things, that whereby we primarily perform each of all these vital actions is the soul. For the soul is the primary principle of our nourishment, sensation, and local movement; and likewise of our understanding. Therefore this principle by which we primarily understand, whether it be called the intellect or the intellectual soul, is the form of the body. This is the demonstration used by Aristotle. [De Anima, ii.2] (ibid., I.76.1)

Reformation Leaders

We thus see that the impurity of parents is transmitted to their children, so that all, without exception, are originally depraved. The commencement of this depravity will not be found until we ascend to the first parent of all as the fountainhead. We must, therefore, hold it for certain, that, in regard to human nature, Adam was not merely a progenitor, but, as it were, a root, and that, accordingly, by his corruption, the whole human race was deservedly vitiated. This is plain from the contrast which the Apostle draws between Adam and Christ, “Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned; even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord” [Rom. 5:19–21] (ICR, I.2.1.6).

To the understanding of this subject, there is no necessity for an anxious discussion (which in no small degree perplexed the ancient doctors) as to whether the soul of the child comes by transmission from the soul of the parent. It should be enough for us to know that Adam was made the depository of the endowments which God was pleased to bestow on human nature, and that, therefore, when he lost what he had received, he lost not only for himself but for us all. (ibid., I.2.1.7)

The children, being vitiated in their parents, conveyed the taint to the grandchildren; in other words, corruption commencing in Adam, is, by perpetual descent, conveyed from those preceding to those coming after them. The cause of the contagion is neither in the substance of the flesh nor the soul, but God was pleased to ordain that those gifts which he had bestowed on the first man, that man should lose as well for his descendants as for himself, (ibid.)

Post-Reformation Theologians

Jacob Arminius (1560–1609)

[The soul’s] origin ... is from nothing, created by infusion, and infused by creation, a body being duly prepared for its reception, that it might fashion matter as with form, and, being united to the body by a native bond, might, with it, compose one ... production. Created, I say, by God in time, as he still daily creates a new soul in each body.

[The soul’s] substance ... is simple, immaterial, and immortal. Simple, I say, not with respect to God; for it consists of act and power (or capability), of being and essence, of subject and accidents; but it is simple with respect to material and compound things. It is immaterial, because it can subsist by itself, and, when separated from the body, can operate alone. It is immortal, not indeed from itself, but by the sustaining grace of God. (WJA, II.26.63)

The body is of a different nature and substance from the soul: Genesis 2:7, “God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul,” a breath, or soul of life. According to this statement, man is composed of a material part, resulting from the vivification of the dust of the ground by creative energy, and of an immaterial part resulting from the spiration or inbreathing of God. The Creator first enlivens inorganic matter into a body, and then creates a rational spirit which he infuses into it. (DT, II.II.5)

Shedd maintained that “the ‘soul of life’ in the instance of the man is a higher principle, the rational soul, which was inbreathed by the Creator, and made in his image” (ibid., II.II.6). However, with regard to Adam’s posterity, Shedd defended traducianism, asserting:

There are three principal supports of Traducianism: (1) Scripture; (2) Systematic Theology; [and] (3) Physiology. The preponderance of the Biblical representations favor it. The Bible teaches that man is a species, and the idea of species implies propagation of the entire individual out of it. (ibid., II.18)

The Early Church and its theology, while rightly insisting on the gulf between Creator and creature, thought that the problem of the origin of the soul, and therefore of human life, could be solved in various ways between which we do not need to choose. Some, following Plato, and within the Church (Origen), talked of the pre-existence of created souls. These [souls] were ... represented as a kingdom of spirits which had to relate themselves to the material bodies allotted to them...

The theory of a pre-temporal or at least pre-historical fall, championed in modern times by Julius Miller, might conceivably be adapted to this view—or it was assumed that when God created the first man they were all breathed into him and therefore created with and included in Adam, to be later distributed among his posterity. On both views it was possible to hold the particular doctrine of the migration of souls (metempsychosis or reincarnation), i.e., that the same souls could enter into many associations with different bodies.

Partly in opposition to the doctrine of pre-existence, yet inevitably connected with it, and represented particularly by Tertullian in earlier days, and later (surprisingly enough) by Luther and Lutheran theology, was the traducianist doctrine that the soul originates in the act of conception [generated by the father and mother]. A soul-seed, distinct from the body-seed, is supposed to be detached from the soul of the parents, thus becoming the independent soul of the child. The doctrine prevailing in the Roman Church, which again surprisingly was followed in traditional Reformed theology, is creationism. On this view each individual soul originates in a divine creative act, an immediate ex nihilo [“out of nothing”]. This creative act is supposed (cf. F. Diekamp, Kath. Dogmatik, Vol. II, 1930, P, 119f.) to take place at the moment of conception when the parents create the requisite physiological conditions for the existence of a human being in this act. The parents are, of course, only causae secundae, God Himself Being the causa prima. And simultaneously God in heaven, this time as the causa unica, creates the soul and associates it with this new human body. (CD, III.II.573)

CONCLUSION

The original created conditions were perfect, but they included a perfection called free will, and, while good in itself, free will made evil possible. Originally, both body and soul were created by God. As to the dispute concerning how individual souls have come into being after

Adam, it appears that traducianism, rather than direct creationism, better fits all the data. Indeed, as we have seen, it is difficult to comprehend how each human being could be born in sin unless fallen souls are generated from parents, for surely God does not create a fallen soul each time a human is conceived.

CHAPTER TWO

THE NATURE OF HUMAN BEINGS

For our comprehension of the doctrines of sin and salvation, the nature of human beings is of utmost importance, second only to the nature of the God from whom they come. Human nature will be discussed both in its original created state and in its subsequent fallen condition.

VARIOUS BIBLICAL TERMS USED TO DESCRIBE HUMAN BEINGS

Humans are described by many different words in Scripture. Some refer to the spiritual dimension, others to the physical dimension, and some to both.

Terms Used of the Immaterial Dimension of Human Beings

Humans have an inner (immaterial) dimension and an outer (material) dimension. The former is often called soul (or spirit), and the latter is usually called body.

Soul

Unlike its popular English usage, the term soul (Heb: nephesh and Gk: psuche) is often biblically used of more than the spiritual dimension of human beings; sometimes the body is included (e.g., Gen. 2:7; Ps. 16:10).

However, there are also scriptural references to the soul as being distinguished from the body. Genesis 35:18 (KJV) speaks of the soul leaving the body at death: “And it came to pass, as [Rachel’s] soul was in departing, (for she died) that she called his name Benoni.”

First Thessalonians 5:23 differentiates soul from body, saying, “May God himself, the God of peace, sanctify you through and through. May your whole spirit, soul and body be kept blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Revelation 6:9 speaks of souls totally separated from their bodies in heaven: “When he opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of those who had been slain because of the word of God and the testimony they had maintained.”

Basically, the word soul means “life”; it refers to the principle of life in a human being, or to that which animates the body. Sometimes the word even refers to a dead body (e.g., Lev. 19:28; 21:1; 23:4) in the way we may speak of a departed loved one as “that poor soul.” The primary meaning of soul can most often be captured best by translating it as person, which usually is embodied but is sometimes disembodied.

Spirit

The word spirit (Heb: ruach and Gk: pneuma) almost always refers to “the immaterial dimension of a human being.” It is often used interchangeably with the word soul, as is indicated by many verses (e.g., cf. Luke 1:46). The body without the soul is dead (James 2:26); at death, Jesus “bowed his head and gave up his spirit” (John 19:30).

Spirit is immaterial, for Jesus said to His disciples, “Why are you troubled, and why do doubts rise in your minds? Look at my hands and my feet. It is I myself. Touch me and see; a ghost [spirit] does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have” (Luke 24:38–39). Indeed, the invisible God “is spirit” and must be worshiped “in spirit and in truth” (John 4:24).

Heart

The term heart (Heb: leb and Gk: kardia) has a broader meaning than is commonly thought, sometimes even including the mind. Proverbs, for instance, speaks of a person who “thinks in his heart” (23:7 AMP). Essentially, heart refers to the whole inner person; it is the heart from which true faith springs, for in order to be saved one must “believe in [his] heart” (Rom. 10:9). The heart is the instrument with which we are to worship God, since we are exhorted: “Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength” (Deut. 6:5).

The heart is also the seat of evil, for Jesus confirmed that “out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks” (Matt. 12:34 NKJV). The prophet said, “The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure” (Jer. 17:9). In short, for better or for worse, the heart reflects the whole inner being.

Mind

The mind (Gk: nous) refers to the immaterial dimension of a human being by which he or she thinks and imagines. Jesus included it in the great commandment, saying, “Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind and with all your strength” (Mark 12:30). Paul included the mind in that which needs renewal by God’s sanctifying power, declaring, “Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind” (Rom. 12:2). This is because “the mind of sinful man is death, but the mind controlled by the Spirit is life and peace; the sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God’s law, nor can it do so” (Rom. 8:6–7). Hence, “we demolish arguments and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and we take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ” (2 Cor. 10:5).

Inward Man

The spiritual dimension of human beings is also called the inward man: “Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day” (2 Cor. 4:16 KJV). The inward man is related to the “things which are not seen,” the things that are “eternal” and never pass away (v. 18).

Terms Used of the Material Dimension of Human Beings

Body

The biblical word body (Heb: basar and Gk: soma) is normally used of the outer (material) aspect of human nature. Jesus said, “Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather be afraid of the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28). The body, then, can decay and be destroyed; in fact, it is the body that is called “dead” when the spirit leaves it (James 2:26). However, the body is reconstructable by God, and it will be resurrected from the dead:

The body that is sown is perishable, it is raised imperishable; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.... The perishable must clothe itself with the imperishable, and the mortal with immortality. (1 Cor. 15:42–44, 53)

Flesh

The word flesh (Heb: basar and Gk: sarx), when referring to a physical human being, nearly always includes the outer dimension, made of matter. Again, Jesus said, “Look at my hands and my feet. It is I myself! Touch me and see; a ghost does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have” (Luke 24:39). The same word is also used of the resurrection body in Acts 2:31: “Seeing what was ahead, [David] spoke of the resurrection of the Christ [in Ps. 16], that he was not abandoned to the grave, nor did his body [flesh] see decay.”

Earthen Vessel

Paul demonstrates an analogy between an earthenware pot and the human body: “We have this treasure [the light of Christ] in jars of clay to show that this all-surpassing power is from God and not from us” (2 Cor. 4:7). Earthen vessel (KJV) is an appropriate illustration of the human body, since it is an outer structure containing something else (a soul) inside. The same is true of the following example, a figure of speech presenting the body as a tent or house.

Earthly Tent

Paul, as a tentmaker, understood the purpose of the human body: “Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands” (2 Cor. 5:1). Indeed, when Jesus assumed a body in the Incarnation, He dwelled (lit. “pitched his tent”) in our midst: “The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us” (John 1:14). In the same way, the body is the material shell that in this world houses the presence of the immaterial soul.

Outward Man

If the soul is the “inner man,” then the body is the “outer man.” Again, Paul wrote, “Though our outward man perish, yet the inward [man] is renewed day by day” (2 Cor. 4:16 KJV). The outward person is visible, material, and tangible; as we have seen, it is subject to decay and destruction, since it can “perish.”

Concluding this brief biblical description of the two basic dimensions of a human being, we now turn to the manner in which the body and soul relate. There are many views on this topic, several of which have been held by Christians.

VARIOUS PERSPECTIVES ON HUMAN NATURE: THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN SOUL AND BODY

There is an important debate among Christians over the relationship between the two human dimensions. Of course, in the broader (non-Christian) spectrum, there are even more perspectives. We will survey them now.

Anthropological Materialism

Materialism affirms that humans have a material body but denies that they have an immaterial soul. Materialism maintains that only the body exists; what we call a rational soul does not. Therefore, according to materialism, the body is to the mind (soul) what the brain is to a dream; mind is simply a manifestation of matter. (Thomas Hobbes [1588–1679], for example, was an adherent.)

Anthropological Epiphenomenalism

One modified form of materialism is called epiphenomenalism. The French thinker Pierre-Jean Georges Cabanis (1757–1808) proposed that the soul is only a silhouette of the body; that is, the body is to the soul what a tree is to its shadow. Mind is just a dependent by-product of matter; it is merely a sign of matter rather than something separate from it or a cause of it. Soul is like an image in a mirror; it only reflects the body. Thus, while the soul is not the equivalent of the body, it is reducible to the body.

Anthropological Idealism

On the other end of the non-theistic spectrum from materialism is idealism, which affirms that humans have a soul but not a body. English Bishop George Berkeley (1685–1753) embraced this perspective, claiming that while the soul exists, the body does not. Allegedly, the body is to the soul what a mirage is to a mind. The body is merely an illusion; it simply does not exist. Only the mind exists.

Anthropological Monism (The Double-Aspect View)

Benedict Spinoza (1632–1677) held the double-aspect view (also called “anthropological monism”), according to which soul and body are two sides (inner and outer) of the same thing. The soul and body are both of one substance; that is, the soul is to body what one side of a plate is to the other, namely, just another aspect of the same entity. Though Spinoza was a pantheist, holding that all things are of the same substance, there have also been Christians who embraced anthropological monism. Creatures, supposedly, differ from God only as modes or moments of one and the same thing.

Anthropological Dualism/Dichotomy

According to dualism, soul and body are separate and parallel entities; like railroad tracks, they run side by side but never intersect with each other. The problem with dualism is the lack of any contact, unity, or interaction with soul and body, which, in actuality, appears to occur. This view has been attributed to Plato (c. 427–347 B.C.) and some of his followers, though Plato himself likened the relation of a soul to a body as that of a rider to a horse, claiming that the soul influences the body but not the reverse. Indeed, Plato held a form of occasionalism, meaning that on the occasion of a sensory experience, the mind recollects what it had known in a previous life, where it beheld the true Ideas of all things. Like anthropological monism, different elements of dualism also have been espoused by some Christians.

Anthropological Interactionism

René Descartes (1596–1650) asserted that body and soul are two different substances: The intellectual soul (mind) is a thinking, non-extended entity, and the physical body is a non-thinking, spatially extended entity. These two different substances, soul and body, only interact with each other as two boxers interact with each other, though not necessarily in an antagonistic way. Opponents have described interactionism as the “ghost in a machine” view.

Anthropological Occasionalism (Recollectionism)

Augustine (354–430) maintained a platonic dualism of soul and body, but he added a dimension to Plato’s paradigm, wherein the rational soul relates to the body by direct divine action. The body connects to the mind the way a reminder does to our memory, meaning that on the occasion of the physical reminder (sensory perception), God causes ideas in our minds. According to occasionalism, the body, which is lower, cannot directly impact the soul, which is higher. This view is also called “illuminationism,” since God is said to illumine the mind (or soul) as to what is going on in the body.

Anthropological Pre-Established Harmony

Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716) attempted to explain the relationship between soul and body alternatively. He saw a pre-established harmony between them, like two clocks wound up by God to run parallel to each other. Therefore, mind and body, while not directly aware of each other, are synchronized by God. God is the Super Monad who keeps all created monads properly related to each other, including their souls to their bodies.

Anthropological Hylomorphism

The term hylomorphism comes from two Greek words; the theory proposes that there is a form/matter unity between the soul and the body, just as there is a unity between the shape (form) of a statue and the rock (material) out of which it is made. Hylomorphism asserts that the soul (mind) is to the body (matter) what ideas are to words: They form a unity, one being the inner and the other the outer dimension of their holistic oneness. The soul animates the body and forms one hylomorphic (form/matter) substance called a human being. The Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) and the Christian thinker Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) embraced this view.

OUTLINE OF THE BASIC SOUL/BODY VIEWS

View	Primary Proponent	Soul/Body	Illustration (Soul/Body As ...)	Explanation
Materialism	Thomas Hobbes	Body only	As dream to brain	Only body exists; mind (soul) is nothing but a manifestation of matter.
Epiphenomenalism	Pierre-Jean Georges Cabanis	Soul is a by-product of body.	As shadow to tree	Body causes mind; mind is only a sign (not a cause) of matter.
Idealism	George Berkeley	Soul only	As mind to mirage	Only mind (soul) exists; body is merely an illusion.
Monism (Double-Aspect View)	Benedict Spinoza	Two aspects of the same thing	As inner to outer	Mind (soul) and body are two sides of same substance.
Dualism (Dichotomy or Parallelism)	Plato	Two different but parallel realities	As railroad tracks	Soul and body never interact; they only exist simultaneously.
Interactionism	René Descartes	Two different substances mutually interacting	As two boxers	Mind and body interact with each other.
Occasionalism (Recollectionism)	Augustine	Two different substances	As memory to reminder	God causes ideas in the coordinated by God		mind on the occasion of sensory perception.

Pre-Established Harmony	Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz	Two different, synchronized substances	As two clocks	Mind and body are synchronized by God.
Hylomorphism	Thomas Aquinas	Soul animates body	As ideas to words	Mind and body are a holistic unity.

Of these diverse anthropological views, the biblical data surveyed above (see sections under “Various Biblical Terms Used to Describe Human Beings”) exclude those that deny one of the two basic dimensions of human beings. For example, this eliminates both materialism and epiphenomenalism, which deny any real immaterial soul, and idealism, which rejects any real material body. As parallelism, pre-established harmony, interactionism, and occasionalism are all forms of dualism, they are treated under “Dualism (Dichotomy)” below. The other three perspectives are anthropological monism, trichotomy, and hylomorphism.

We will now examine in more detail six primary categories of models for the relationship between body and soul:

- (1) materialism/epiphenomenalism;
- (2) idealism;
- (3) monism;
- (4) dualism/dichotomy (including parallelism, pre-established harmony, interactionism, and occasionalism);
- (5) trichotomy; and
- (6) hylomorphism.

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL MATERIALISM

Anthropological materialism is without either biblical or philosophical foundation.

Biblical Arguments Against Anthropological Materialism

The Bible not only affirms that both soul and body exist, but it also distinguishes them in several ways.

First, even in this life they are distinct: The body will perish, but the soul does not (e.g., 2 Cor. 4:16; 5:1); the soul leaves the body at death (Gen. 35:18 KJV).

Second, Scripture describes the soul (or spirit) as being consciously separated from the body after death.

Third, and finally, the Bible everywhere refers to the body and the material world as things that are tangibly existent, apart from the mind.

Philosophical Arguments Against Anthropological Materialism

Materialism Is Self-Defeating

As former atheist C. S. Lewis (1898–1963) observed, the materialist view (that matter exists but mind does not) is clearly self-defeating, for the theory of materialism is not made up of matter: The theory about matter has no matter in it. The idea that all is made of molecules does not itself consist of molecules—the thought about all matter must itself stand over and above the matter it is talking about.

If the thought about matter is part of matter, then it cannot be a thought about all matter, since being a part of matter it cannot transcend itself to make a pronouncement about all matter. The only way that mind (or its thoughts) can transcend matter is if the mind is more than matter. And if it is more than matter, then matter is not all that exists.

Modified Materialism Is Also Self-Defeating

As previously implied, some materialists are not strict materialists. Epiphenomenalists, for instance, admit that mind is more than matter but deny that mind can exist independently of matter, arguing that mind is simply the reflection of matter and is therefore reducible to it. They insist that mind is only more than matter in the way that the whole is more than the sum of its parts. Even so, the “whole” ceases to exist when the parts do; when the body expires, so also does the soul. Basically, though epiphenomenalists allow for mind being more than matter, they maintain that mind is merely a silhouette that ceases to exist when a human’s material parts dissolve.

Although this materialistic argument is apparently less self-defeating than the first one, it is nonetheless wrong. Epiphenomenalism affirms that mind is ultimately dependent on matter, but the statement “Mind is dependent on matter” does not claim to depend upon matter for its truth—in fact, it claims to be a truth about all matter and mind. No truth about all mind and matter can be dependent for its truth upon matter, for one cannot stand outside of all matter to make an affirmation about all matter and yet simultaneously claim he is really standing inside matter while being dependent only upon it and nothing else. If my mind is completely dependent on (and is only a reflection of) matter, then it can’t make statements from a vantage point that is independent of matter, and if its statements are not from a vantage point that is independent of matter, then they are not really statements about all matter: One must step beyond something to see all of it (implying, of course, that mind, after all, is beyond matter).

In short, epiphenomenalism claims to have a transcendent basis of knowledge with only an immanent<sup>18</sup> basis of operation. What epiphenomenalism tries to do is transcend matter (with mind) to make truth statements about all mind and matter to prove that mind is within (and, therefore, dependent upon) matter. In order for epiphenomenalism to succeed in this (and not be self-defeating), mind would have to be independent of matter. If mind to body, though, is only like a shadow to a tree (as epiphenomenalism argues), how can a mere reflection (which allegedly depends for its existence on the matter that projects it) be independent of its source?

According to epiphenomenalism, mind is not independent from matter. If this is correct, then epiphenomenalism’s “truth statements” are untrue, having no basis. If this is incorrect, then epiphenomenalism’s fundamental foundation crumbles. Either way, it is self-defeating.

A Transcendental Argument Against Materialism

Materialists attempt to reduce everything to matter, to the exclusion of mind. This is self-defeating because whatever analysis I make of matter, there is always an “I” that stands outside the object of my analysis. Even when I analyze myself, there is an “I” that transcends the “me.” I can never capture my transcendental “I” (ego); I can only catch it, as it were, out of “the corner of my eye.” If I attempt to put my “I” in the test tube of analysis, it then becomes a “me” at which the elusive “I” is looking. There is always more than “me”; there is the “I” that is not merely “me.” Contrary to materialism, then, everything is not ultimately reducible to the “I.” Mind is prior to and independent of matter.

The Universe Has a Non-Material Origin

As was demonstrated earlier, there is a supernatural, immaterial Cause of the universe. Since scientific evidence shows that the whole material universe came into existence out of nothing, the Cause of the universe cannot be a material something; hence, there is more than matter. As the materialist Karl Marx (1818–1883) put it, either matter produced mind or mind produced matter. Since matter was produced, it must have been Mind that produced it. Consequently, the more-than-matter that exists is mind.

The Moral Lawgiver Is Not Material

Another way to demonstrate that all is not matter is known as the moral argument for God’s existence. It can be put this way:

- (1) There is an objective moral law.
- (2) Moral law is prescriptive (tells us what we ought to do and what not to do).
- (3) What is prescriptive is not part of the descriptive material world.
- (4) Thus, there is an objective reality that is not material; that is, more than matter exists.

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL IDEALISM

Anthropological idealism also is opposed by both biblical and philosophical evidence.

Biblical Arguments Against Anthropological Idealism

First, the Bible unequivocally teaches that God created a material universe (Gen. 1–2) and that matter is truly different from God, who is purely Spirit (John 4:24).

Second, matter is finite and destructible (1 Cor. 15:42), whereas God is infinite and indestructible (1 Tim. 6:16).

Third, and finally, the human soul, as already stated, is set out as different from the body (e.g., Luke 24:39) in that the two are separated at death (e.g., James 2:26).

Philosophical Arguments Offered for Anthropological Idealism

George Berkeley insisted that only minds and ideas exist, for supposedly to be is either “to perceive” (Lat: esse est percipi) or “to be perceived” (Lat: esse est percipere). Idealism alleges, for several reasons, that no “matter” exists.

First of all, there is said to be no way to separate being from being perceived.

In addition, the arguments against existence of secondary qualities (like color) also apply to primary ones (like number and extension). For example, says idealism, extension cannot be known apart from color and bulk; number is based on unity, which cannot be perceived; figure changes with one’s perspective; motion is relative.

Also, things (matter) cannot be known apart from thought; therefore, they exist only in thought.

Furthermore, belief in matter charges God with a useless creation, since we are able to have an idea of it without its existing.

In short, idealism maintains that it is impossible to conceive of anything existing outside of a mind. To “conceive of something” is a power of mind to form an idea in the mind (not outside of it). Nothing can be conceived as existing unconceived. That is, nothing can be thought to exist apart from one’s thought.

Response to the Philosophical Arguments for Anthropological Idealism

Although Berkeley was a Christian theist, his anthropological idealism is contrary to the entire classical theistic position. Several criticisms are worthy of note.

Idealism’s Basic Assumption Begs the Question

The fundamental premise of idealism is that only minds and ideas exist; once this is granted, everything else in the theory follows. However, there is no compelling reason to grant it. Indeed, it begs the entire question by assuming, to begin with (a priori), that only minds and ideas exist. We certainly receive no surprise, then, in discovering Berkeley’s conclusion that there is nothing else. The existence of extra-mental and non-mental reality is not eliminated by any of the arguments.

Idealism’s Basic Premises Fail

Berkeley’s arguments for idealism, at root, are based on the mistaken notion that “knowing” involves a sensing of ideas rather than a sensing of things through ideas. This again begs the question, for if ideas are not the formal object of knowledge but instead are merely the instruments through which knowledge of the external world is conveyed to us, then idealism collapses.

Idealism Is Contrary to Experience

To speak, as Berkeley did, of bodies, matter, and nature—which we all experience—as mere ideas that God regularly excites in us, is possible but not really credible. When one eats food, he is not eating the idea of food or having the idea of eating the idea of food. Furthermore, it undermines the Resurrection to imply that God only raised up a cluster of ideas.

Idealism Charges God With Deception

Berkeley, in arguing that there is no external world, charged God with deception. Certainly God is powerful enough to create the ideas of things in us that do not exist; even so, God is not merely all-powerful—He is also all-perfect, and He cannot deceive. To have created in every human being the vivid perception that there is an extra-mental, material world, if there wasn’t one, would be dishonest.

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL MONISM

Unlike either materialism or idealism, anthropological monism, which is the first of four views that have been held by some professed Christians and cults (the other three are examined below), does not deny either mind or matter.<sup>30</sup> Rather, it affirms both while identifying them as one. As mentioned previously, Benedict Spinoza held this view (see E), as do Jehovah's Witnesses.

Many arguments have been offered in favor of this view, both biblical and philosophical.

Biblical Arguments Given for Anthropological Monism

The basic arguments from Scripture for anthropological monism are (1) from the nature of human beings and (2) from the alleged oneness of soul and body. Monism maintains that humans have only one nature—a human nature: "From one man he made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth" (Acts 17:26). This original man's nature is shared equally by all human beings; consequently, it must be one nature, not many.

Another argument has been offered from 2 Corinthians 5:1, which appears to affirm that a person's resurrection body is received at the moment of physical death: "Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands."

Response to the Biblical Arguments Given for Anthropological Monism

The biblical data put forward for monism—such as Acts 17:26—can also be interpreted another way. Scripture demonstrates the unity of the two human dimensions, but not their identity. For example, there is a unity between the words of this sentence and the idea expressed in it, but the words and the idea are not identical.

Further, it is true that we have one nature, but it has two dimensions, as was shown above. The two dimensions cannot be identical, because one is material, and the other is immaterial; one is perishable, and the other is imperishable.

As to the use of 2 Corinthians 5:1 on the behalf of monism, there are at least two other interpretations.

First, some hold that there is an intermediate spiritual body provided at death so that the soul is never disembodied (e.g., see Chafer, ST, 2.506–07).

Second, others point out that Paul (in 2 Cor. 5:1) does not teach that a person receives the eternal body at the instant of death but merely that he anticipates the final resurrection. This view fits better with Paul's statements about the final resurrection body in 1 Corinthians 15:42–44.

Third, monism contradicts clear biblical references to a disembodied state (soul/spirit being separated from the body at death). Thus, in 2 Corinthians 5:1, Paul is simply speaking in the knowledge that after death there is the ultimate anticipation of the permanent resurrection body. This correlates, also, with what he says regarding death and the resurrection in 1 Corinthians 15:50–54.

Philosophical Arguments for and Against Anthropological Monism

The Parmenidean Paradox

On the level of being, the ancient Greek philosopher Parmenides (fl. c. 485 B.C.) gave a powerful argument for metaphysical monism, namely, that all being is one. It runs like this:

(1) It is impossible for there to be two things (beings), for to be two things they must differ.

- (2) Things can only differ by either being or nonbeing, but to differ by nonbeing (or, to differ by nothing) is not to differ at all.
- (3) To differ by being is not possible, since being is the only thing that all beings have in common.
- (4) Things cannot differ by what they have in common; that is, they cannot differ by the very respect in which they are identical.

Response

We have seen that this argument, unassailable as it may seem, actually begs the question, since it assumes what is to be proven, which is that all things are identical in their being (monism). If, on the other hand, we posit and then demonstrate that all things are similar in their being, monism does not follow. Only by assuming that being is univocal (entirely the same) rather than analogical (similar) does monism follow. If the term being is predicated of (ascribed to) God in an analogous (similar) way, then all things are not identical; the argument for metaphysical monism does not stand.

Anthropological monism, being a subspecies of metaphysical monism, suffers the same fate. Unless one assumes that the terms body and soul are univocal (identical) in regard to the same human being, it does not follow that body and soul are the same. There can be different truths about one and the same thing without these different truths being the same. For instance, one and the same rock can be both round (which is not necessarily material in itself) and hard (which applies only to material things). Likewise, one and the same human essence can be both material and immaterial without having two different essences, provided that one is the form (soul) and the other is the matter (body).

The Attack on Anthropological Dualism

Another argument given for anthropological monism is that the dualist (dichotomist) view, which monism opposes, is Greek (rather than Hebrew) in origin; that is, anthropological dualism (see below) finds its roots in Hellenic philosophy, not Jewish theology.

Response

In reply, there are several serious problems with this contention.

First, this is a classic case of poisoning the well. The issue is not whether dualism comes from Greek philosophy (it does); a view should not be judged false (or true, for that matter) by its cultural origin but instead by the evidence for and against it.

Second, it is unhelpful and incorrect to administer the broad label of Greek to dualism, as though being Greek means “being a dualist.” Aristotle, for instance, was Greek, and he rejected anthropological dualism. It is more precise to call dualism platonic. Nevertheless, even if the specific dualism being evaluated is platonic, it should not be rejected simply because Plato embraced it. Christians (even many anthropological monists) hold to a great number of Plato’s ideas, including the objectivity of morality, meaning, and truth, as well as belief in God and an afterlife. Plato, like any other person, did not create the ideas but rather discovered them.

Third, this argument for monism is based on a false disjunction. Specifically, it fails to note that not all non-monisms are dualisms. Aristotle and Aquinas, for example, were opposed to platonic dualism, but they did not hold to anthropological monism; instead, they embraced hylomorphism, a unity (rather than identity) of soul and body.

Other Evidence Against Anthropological Monism

In addition to the failure of the philosophical arguments for monism, there are many arguments against it.

First, monism denies that there are two dimensions in the human nature, which the Bible affirms.

Second, monism does not explain scriptural texts where the soul (or spirit) survives death in a disembodied state. If soul and body were one and the same, then the soul would die when the body does. It doesn't.

Third, monism does not account for Jesus being spiritually alive between His death and resurrection (Luke 24:46; John 19:30). He is the second person of the Godhead; He didn't go out of existence.

Fourth, monism necessitates either annihilationism or immediate resurrection at the point of death—both are unorthodox and unacceptable. If body and soul are one, as monism claims, then either (1) both go out of existence, together, at death (which is annihilationism), or else (2) a new body is given to the soul at the instant of death (which is immediate resurrection). As for the first, annihilationism is plainly unscriptural, and regarding the second, the giving of new bodies to the souls of believers at the instant of death would make their resurrection a past event, a view the New Testament condemns as heretical (cf. 2 Tim. 2:18). There can be no resurrection of the body while it is still in the grave, since resurrection involves the dead body being raised up (John 5:28–29), just as Jesus was, in the same body, crucifixion scars and all (Luke 24:39; John 20:27). Further, the resurrection of the body is set forth (e.g., in 1 Thess. 4:13–18) as a future event that will take place when Jesus returns to earth.

Fifth, monism is contrary to our consciousness of having two dimensions, a body and a mind (soul). My thoughts are clearly different from my body.

Sixth, and finally, all the arguments and texts used to show a so-called identity between body and soul can be explained instead as references to psychosomatic unity.

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL DUALISM (DICHOTOMY)

Anthropological dualism, springing from Plato, is the view affirming that soul and body are of two different substances—a human being is a soul and merely has a body. The primary analogy is the soul as being to the body what a rider is to a horse; other non-Christian dualists spoke of the soul as being like a bird in a cage or a person in prison—when the soul is released from the body (at death), it is permanently freed from the shackles of earthly incarceration.

Although Christian dualists hold that the soul will be reunited with the resurrection body, they nevertheless maintain a psychosomatic dualism, which is evident in the occasionalism (recollectionism) of Augustine and many in the Reformed tradition to this date.

Two Arguments Offered for Anthropological Dualism (Dichotomy)

The Argument From the Soul Surviving Death

Against monists, dualists point out that since the soul survives death, it cannot be the same substance as the body. If it were, it would die with the body, but it does not, as both sides admit. The problem with this argument is that it is a false disjunction, wrongly assuming that if a view is not dualistic, then it must be monistic. As already observed, there is at least one other tenable alternative, namely, a soul/body unity (without identity) known as anthropological hylomorphism (see below).

The Argument That Interchangeability of “Soul” and “Spirit” Proves Their Identity

Against trichotomists, who hold that a human being is tripartite (“having three parts”), dualists (dichotomists) argue that since soul and spirit are used interchangeably in many passages, a human being has only two parts (body and soul/spirit); soul and spirit must refer to one and the same thing.

Further, dualists observe, soul and spirit are also used synonymously in poetic parallel (cf. Luke 1:46–47), and they often have the same functions (e.g., sighing, grieving, and refreshing).

In response, it should be noted that if this argument is correct, at best it would only prove that trichotomy is wrong, not that dualism is right. In addition, once again, these same functions can also be explained by hylomorphism (see below).

Other Evidence Against Anthropological Dualism (Dichotomy)

In addition to the failure of these arguments to support dualism, there are several noteworthy reasons to reject it, including the following.

First, dualism denies biblical teaching on the essential unity of the human being.

Second, dualism confuses dimensions with parts. Just as a work of art has two dimensions—the form and the medium—human nature has both inner (soul) and outer (body).

Third, dualism denigrates the body by excluding it from the image of God, whereas the Bible presents the body as part of His likeness.

Fourth, dualism leads to untenable asceticism and otherworldliness, since it proposes that the essence of humanity is purely spiritual and excludes the material.

Fifth, and finally, platonic dualism’s representation of human nature, even without its reincarnational (rebirth) and soteriological (salvific) aspects, is not biblical (see Ladd, “GVHVM” in PNTT).

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL TRICHOTOMY

The third view held by Christians is called trichotomy, which insists that a human being is tripartite: body, soul, and spirit. It has origins in Plato and Plotinus (205–270) and was adopted by the early Christian father Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225). In one popular version of the trichotomist perspective, a human being is said to be self-conscious by virtue of her soul, world-conscious through her body, and God-conscious in her spirit.

Arguments Offered for Anthropological Trichotomy

The biblical basis for trichotomy is sought in passages where soul and spirit appear to be clearly differentiated, such as the following.

Hebrews 4:12

“The word of God is living and active. Sharper than any double-edged sword, it penetrates even to dividing soul and spirit, joints and marrow; it judges the thoughts and attitudes of the heart.” Trichotomists reason that if the soul and spirit can be divided, then they cannot be one and the same (synonymous).

In response, many expositors take this apparent contrast between soul and spirit to be a figure of speech describing the power of the Word of God. It is so powerful that it can, as it were, divide the indivisible. In this sense, rather than being a proof of trichotomy, Hebrews 4:12 actually is evidence for the unity (but not identity) of human nature.

1 Thessalonians 5:23

Here the apostle prays, “May God himself, the God of peace, sanctify you through and through. May your whole spirit, soul and body be kept blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Trichotomists argue that all three being listed separately, in the same passage, reveals that the soul and the spirit cannot be one.

Opponents make three points in response.

First, the emphasis in 1 Thessalonians 5:23 is on the wholeness of human nature, since it refers to all these dimensions as being part of one whole.

Second, the words soul and spirit could still be interchangeable. For instance, both could be listed for completeness, in case some of those in the reading audience believed that part of the human being was omitted because the particular word (soul or spirit) was not used.

Third, and finally, there is no textual indication, in any event, that body, soul, and spirit are three separate parts of a human being. Perhaps they describe different aspects of one and the same human nature.

Romans 8:16

In this passage the apostle Paul declares that “the Spirit himself testifies with our spirit that we are God’s children.” Proponents of trichotomy suggest that the word spirit distinguishes a unique part of a human being that has unshared reference to (connection with) God. They likewise insist that the word soul is never used in such a context.

In reply, opponents claim that even if this trichotomist observation were true, the logic would involve special pleading, since this supposed function or connection may be another aspect of what a soul does. However, at best, this trichotomist point is a traditionally weak argument from silence.<sup>55</sup> Furthermore, there are texts that use the word soul in reference to God. Jesus, for example, commanded us to love God “with all your ... soul” (Matt. 22:37), and Mary proclaimed, “My soul glorifies the Lord” (Luke 1:46).

1 Corinthians 15:44

Paul writes, “[The body] is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. If there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body.” Nowhere in Scripture is the resurrection body described as soulish (rather than spiritual). Trichotomists, accordingly, insist that the spirit is uniquely and exclusively adapted to the glorified body in which we will see God.

In response, critics of trichotomy are quick to point out that the term spiritual body means “a body dominated by the Holy Spirit”; that is to say, the spiritual body is a body with a supernatural source of energy (rather than a natural source, as our earthly body has). The same word spiritual (Gk: pneumatikos), for instance, is also used of the Rock (Christ) that supernaturally provided water for Israel in the desert (1 Cor. 10:4; cf. Ex. 32:5–6).

Mark 10:45

Some trichotomists interpret Jesus' statement that "the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life [Gk: psuche, soul] as a ransom for many" as evidence for their view; they allege that Jesus does not say He will give His spirit (Gk: pneuma) because the spirit does not die.

In response, it is noteworthy that when Jesus died, the gospel account says, "He gave up His spirit" (John 19:30). Further, if soul is only a reference to a part of Christ's humanity that was given for our sins, then trichotomy involves a heresy, for, in such a case, Jesus would not have given His full humanity to redeem our transgressions.

In addition, no distinction is made in Mark 10:45 between soul and spirit. Jesus was not saying here that His soul, exclusively, was going to be offered as the ransom; rather the one term, soul, which often stands for the whole person, says it all.

1 Corinthians 6:19

Since Paul contends, "The spirit belongs to God," and the soul is said to be man's possession ("my life," 1 Kings 19:4), trichotomists argue that soul and spirit are distinct.

In reply, this too is a false disjunction. All belongs to God (1 Chron. 29:14; James 1:17), including the body, as 1 Corinthians 6 itself affirms (v. 20). Consequently, this argument is a distinction without an actual difference.

AN EXAMINATION OF ANTHROPOLOGICAL HYLOMORPHISM (SOUL/BODY UNITY)

The fourth and final view maintained by Christians is called hylomorphism, which, as stated previously, holds that there is a form/matter unity between soul and body. The roots of the view are found in the beliefs of Aristotle, though it has earlier basis in the Old Testament, and it was later corroborated by Thomas Aquinas. The evidence for hylomorphism can be divided into biblical and philosophical.

The Biblical Basis for Anthropological Hylomorphism

Human beings are described as a soul/body unity from the very beginning. As we have seen, Genesis says, "The LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being [soul]" (2:7). That is, the whole unity of dust (matter) and breath (life) was a vital being.

Furthermore, the word soul means "person," and it often includes the body. For instance, in Psalm 16:10, David records, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption" (KJV). Obviously, soul here includes the body, which, as prophesied (regarding Jesus Christ), did not see corruption but was resurrected (cf. Acts 2:30–31).

Also, as we have seen, the word soul sometimes even refers to a dead body (e.g., Lev. 19:28; 21:1; 23:4).

In addition, if both soul and body were not created as a unity, then the murder of a body would not be wrong. But it is, for God said, "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man" (Gen. 9:6). This, again, implies that the image of God includes the body, otherwise the prohibition against murdering a body would not apply.

Even more, the Bible declares that a soul without a body is naked and incomplete (2 Cor. 5:1–4). This would not be so unless there was a powerful unity between them.

Finally, resurrection makes no sense unless we are incomplete without a body, and God's Word declares that all human beings, saved and lost, will be resurrected (John 5:25–29). Without the body we are unwhole, lacking in our very nature as a human being.

The Philosophical/Psychological Basis for Anthropological Hylomorphism

In addition to the biblical data, there are psychological and philosophical reasons to support the form/matter unity of soul and body. Consider the following arguments.

The Analogy With Animals

Higher forms of animals do have a soul; the same Hebrew word used for the soul of humans (nephesh) is also used of animals. Indeed, even the word spirit is used of an animal (see Eccl. 3:21). Therefore, while animals are alive, there is a form/matter unity between their soul and their body. The same is true of human beings, the only difference being that the human soul survives death and lives on consciously between death and resurrection (e.g., Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:8; Rev. 6:9).

The Psychosomata Interpenetration

What is more, there is clearly an interpenetration of the soul and body, which befits a form/matter unity. Interpenetration means that the soul influences the body and vice versa. For example, grief in the soul affects the body, and pain in the body affects the mind. This psychosomatic affiliation indicates not identity but unity.

An Objection to Anthropological Hylomorphism

Like all other views, hylomorphism is subject to criticism. The primary opposition has to do with the disembodied intermediate state (between death and resurrection).

The Objection Stated—Regarding the Survival of the Soul

This argument contends that if the soul and body are a unity in this life, then it would seem that the soul could not exist in a disembodied state. If embodiment is a necessary vehicle for the soul, how can it survive alone?

Response

In reply, as already established, soul and body are a unity, not an identity. If they were identical, then of course one could not survive without the other. Again, by way of analogy, the soul is to the body what thought in the mind is to words on paper; the concept remains when the material perishes.

The Bible informs us that the soul does survive when the body dies. To be sure, the soul is incomplete without the body, and it does await the resurrection of the body, when it will once again be complete (2 Cor. 5:1), but survival as a soul without a body is not impossible or contradictory. Both God and angels are purely spiritual (John 4:24; Heb. 1:14), yet they exist without physical form. It is assumed, then, that in the intermediate, disembodied state between death and resurrection, human beings will exist as angels presently do.

George Eldon Ladd (1911–1982) wrote a masterful analysis of the contrast between the dualist view and the hylomorphic (unity) view of soul and body; this is summarized in the following chart (with the change of one word—Greek to Platonic).

Two Contrasting Views of Human Nature: Platonic vs. Christian

THE HISTORICAL TESTIMONY ON THE NATURE OF HUMAN BEINGS

Early Fathers

Theophilus (c. 130–190)

Someone will say to us, “Was man made by nature mortal?” Certainly not. “Was he, then, immortal?” Neither do we affirm this. But one will say, “Was he, then, nothing?” Not even this hits the mark. He was by nature neither mortal nor immortal. For if [God] had made him immortal from the beginning, He would have made him God. Again, if He had made him mortal, God would seem to be the cause of his death. Neither, then, immortal nor yet mortal did He make him, but ... capable of both; so that if he should incline to the things of immortality, keeping the commandment of God, he should receive as reward from Him immortality ... but if, on the other hand, he should turn to the things of death, disobeying God, he should himself be the cause of death to himself.

For God made man free, and with power over himself. That, then, which man brought upon himself through carelessness and disobedience, this God now vouchsafes to him as a gift through His own philanthropy and pity, when men obey Him. For as man, disobeying, drew death upon himself; so, obeying the will of God, he who desires is able to procure for himself life everlasting. For God has given us a law and holy commandments; and everyone who keeps these can be saved, and, obtaining the resurrection, can inherit incorruption. (TA, xxvii in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, II.2.27)

If some had been made by nature bad, and others good, these latter would not be deserving of praise for being good, for such were they created; nor would the former be reprehensible, for thus they were made [originally]. But since all men are of the same nature, able both to hold fast and to do what is good—and, on the other hand, having also the power to cast it from them and not to do it—some do justly receive praise even among men who are under the control of good laws (and much more from God), and obtain deserved testimony of their choice of good in general, and of persevering therein; but the others are blamed, and receive a just condemnation, because of their rejection of what is fair and good. And therefore the prophets used to exhort men to what was good, to act justly and to work righteousness ... because it is in our power so to do, and because by excessive negligence we might become forgetful, and thus stand in need of that good counsel which the good God has given us to know by means of the prophets. (AH in ibid., 1.4.37.2)

Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225)

We have assigned, then, to the soul both ... freedom of the will ... and its dominion over the works of nature, and its occasional gift of divination, independently of that endowment of prophecy which accrues to it expressly from the grace of God. (TS in ibid., III.1.9.22)

“That position of Plato’s is also quite in keeping with the faith, in which he divides the soul into two parts—the rational and the irrational” (TS, III.XVI in ibid., 194).

Come now, you who deny the salvation of the flesh, and who, whenever there occurs the specific mention of body in a case of this sort, interpret it as meaning anything rather than the substance of the flesh, (tell me) how is it that the apostle has given certain distinct names to all (our faculties), and has comprised them all in one prayer for their safety, desiring that our “spirit and soul and body may be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord and Savior (Jesus) Christ”? Now he has here propounded the soul and body as two separate and distinct things. For ... the soul has a kind of body of a quality all its own, just as the spirit has. (FBAM, III.XV in ibid., 462–63)

Clement of Alexandria (150–c. 215)

There are other things, in which there is a power of will, and which have a free choice of doing what they will. These, as I have said, do not remain always in that order in which they were created: but according as their will leads them, and the judgment of their mind inclines them, they effect either good or evil; and therefore He hath proposed rewards to those who do well, and penalties to those who do evil. (ROC in ibid., VIII.3.24)

Medieval Fathers

Augustine (354–430)

If, again, we were so to define man as to say, Man is a rational substance consisting of mind and body, then without doubt man has a soul that is not body, and a body that is not soul. (OT, 15.7)

It is with reference to the [human] nature, then, and not to the wickedness of the devil, that we are to understand these words, “This is the beginning of God’s handiwork”; for, without doubt, wickedness can be a flaw or vice only where the nature previously was not vitiated. Vice, too, is so contrary to nature that it cannot but damage it. And therefore departure from God would be no vice, unless in a nature whose property it was to abide with God.

So even the wicked will is a strong proof of the goodness of the nature. But God, as He is the supremely good Creator of good natures, so is He of evil wills the most just Ruler; so that, while they make an ill use of good natures, He makes a good use even of evil wills. Accordingly, He caused the devil (good by God’s creation, wicked by his own will) to be cast down from his high position, and to become the mockery of His angels—that is, He caused his temptations to benefit those whom he wishes to injure by them. And because God, when He created him, was certainly not ignorant of his future malignity, and foresaw the good which He Himself would bring out of his evil, therefore says the psalm, “This leviathan whom Thou hast made to be a sport therein,” that we may see that, even while God in His goodness created him good, He yet had already foreseen and arranged how He would make use of him when he became wicked. (CG, 11.17)

The state of the human soul may be distinguished in two ways. First, from a diversity of mode in its natural existence; and in this point the state of the separate soul is distinguished from the state of the soul joined to the body. Secondly, the state of the soul is distinguished in relation to integrity and corruption, the state of natural existence remaining the same: and thus the state of innocence is distinct from the state of man after sin. For man’s soul, in the state of innocence, was adapted to perfect and govern the body; wherefore the first man is said to have been made into a “living soul”; that is, a soul giving life to the body—namely animal life. But he was endowed with integrity as to this life, in that the body was entirely subject to the soul, hindering it in no way....

Since the soul is adapted to perfect and govern the body, as regards animal life, it is fitting that it should have that mode of understanding which is by turning to phantasms. Therefore this mode of understanding was becoming to the soul of the first man also. (ST, I.94.4)

In the natural order, perfection comes before imperfection, as act precedes potentiality; for whatever is in potentiality is made actual only by something actual. And since God created things not only for their own existence, but also that they might be the principles of other things; so creatures were produced in their perfect state to be the principles as regards others. Now man can be the principle of another man, not only by generation of the body, but also by instruction and government. Hence, as the first man was produced in his perfect state, as regards his body, for the work of generation, so also was his soul established in a perfect state to instruct and govern others, (ibid., I.94.3)

Some virtues of their very nature do not involve imperfection, such as charity and justice; and these virtues did exist in the primitive state absolutely, both in habit and in act. But other virtues are of such a nature as to imply imperfection either in their act, or on the part of the matter. If such imperfection be consistent with the perfection of the primitive state, such virtues necessarily existed in that state; as faith, which is of things not seen, and hope which is of things not yet possessed. For the perfection of that state did not extend to the vision of the Divine Essence, and the possession of God with the enjoyment of final beatitude.

Hence faith and hope could exist in the primitive state, both as to habit and as to act. But any virtue which implies imperfection incompatible with the perfection of the primitive state, could exist in that state as a habit, but not as to the act; for instance, penance, which is sorrow for sin committed; and mercy, which is sorrow for others' unhappiness; because sorrow, guilt, and happiness are incompatible with the perfection of the primitive state.

Wherefore such virtues existed as habits in the first man, but not as to their acts; for he was so disposed that he would repent, if there had been a sin to repent for; and had he seen unhappiness in his neighbor, he would have done his best to remedy it. (ibid., I.95.3)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

In general, they are wont to place under the free will of man only intermediate things, viz., those which pertain not to the kingdom of God, while they refer true righteousness to the special grace of God and spiritual regeneration. The author of [On the Calling of the Gentiles], wishing to show this, describes the will as threefold, viz., sensitive, animal, and spiritual. The two former, he says, are free to man, but the last is the work of the Holy Spirit. (ICR, I.2.2.5)

Therefore, God has provided the soul of man with intellect, by which he might discern good from evil, just from unjust, and might know what to follow or to shun, reason going before with her lamp; whence philosophers, in reference to her directing power, have called her "to hegemonikon." To this God has joined will, to which choice belongs. Man excelled in these noble endowments in his primitive condition, when reason, intelligence, prudence, and judgement, not only sufficed for the government of his earthly life, but also enabled him to rise up to God and eternal happiness. Thereafter choice was added to direct the appetites, and temper all the organic motions; the will being thus perfectly submissive to the authority of reason, (ibid., I.XV)

Calvin continued, “In this upright state, man possessed freedom of will, by which, if he chose, he was able to obtain” (ibid.).

Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560)

Originally man was thus created, to be God’s image; that is, his understanding [verstand] was endowed with a great light. He knew about number, he had knowledge of God and the divine laws, and he could distinguish virtue and vice. With this light his heart, his heart’s desire, and his will were without hypocrisy. His heart was created full of the love of God, free of all evil desires. His will was free, so that he could choose to keep God’s law, and his heart and external members could be fully obedient without any hindrance. It was also possible for his understanding and will to choose something else, as happened later.

Accordingly, when free will is mentioned, we mean understanding and will, heart and will; and they belong together, without hypocrisy. Man was created wise and upright, and before the Fall he had a free, unimpeded will. However, as Adam and Eve fell into sin and incurred God’s wrath, God withdrew from them and man’s natural powers became very weak. The light in his understanding became very dim, although some remained, for man can still use numbers and make distinctions between good and evil works and the teachings of the law. God wants all men to recognize sin; he wants to punish us by means of our own conscience; and he wants all men to maintain external discipline. For that reason knowledge remains in this corrupted nature, although it is dim and full of doubt and uncertainty about God, not knowing whether God wants to be man’s judge or helper, or whether God wants to receive and listen to men....

Further, all good virtues toward God in the heart and will were also lost—love of God, trust in God, and true fear of God. God is not received where the Holy Spirit has not first enlightened and kindled the understanding, will, and heart. Without the Holy Spirit man cannot of his own powers perform virtuous works, such as true faith, love of God, and true fear of God. And therefore the miserable human heart stands like a desolate, deserted, old and decaying house, God no longer dwelling within and winds blowing through. That is, all sorts of conflicting tendencies and lusts drive the heart to the manifold sins of uncontrolled love, hate, envy, and pride. The devils also spread their poisons.

When we speak about this great ruin of human powers, we are talking about free will, for man’s will and heart are wretchedly imprisoned, impaired, and ruined, so that inwardly man’s heart and will are unlike the divine law, offensive and hostile to it, and man cannot by his own inward natural powers be obedient. This is said about true inner obedience, without hypocrisy.

Now to speak of the movement and motion of external members of the body. Although the heart and the inner will, as we ourselves are aware, neither hear nor inwardly obey the law without hypocrisy, nevertheless God has left the understanding free to govern in that it can move and control the external members of the body. The understanding may say to one who is sick with a fever and very thirsty that he should hold his hand and not drink, and he restrains his hand from seizing the mug. Even in this corrupted nature God has allowed such freedom with regard to external motions of the body. He wants all men to have external morality [zucht], and thereby learn the distinction between powers that are free and powers that are bound; thus we can think in some degree that God acts freely and is not a prisoner or a bound Lord, as the Stoics have pictured him with regard to his created nature. (OCD, 51–52)

Post-Reformation Theologians

Jacob Arminius (1560–1609)

[The soul's] faculties, which are two, the understanding and the will, as in fact the object of the soul is two-fold. For the understanding apprehends eternity and truth both universal and particular, by a natural and necessary, and therefore by a uniform act. But the will has an inclination to good. Yet this is either according to the mode of its nature, to universal good and to that which is the chief good; or according to the mode of liberty, to all other [kinds of] good. (WJA, II.63)

Karl Barth (1886–1968)

In these circumstances how can we possibly reach a doctrine of man in the sense of a doctrine of his creaturely essence, of his human nature as such? For what we recognize to be human nature is nothing other than the disgrace which covers his nature; his inhumanity, perversion and corruption. If we try to deny this or to tone it down, we have not yet understood the full import of the truth that for the reconciliation of man with God nothing more nor less was needed than the death of the Son of God, and for the manifestation of this reconciliation nothing more nor less than the resurrection of the Son of Man, Jesus Christ. But if we know man only in the corruption and distortion of his being, how can we even begin to answer the question about his creaturely nature? (CD, II)

Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834)

“Fullness of experience in the sphere of faith is due to the individual development, in virtue of this original perfection of human nature, of each life brought into existence by procreation” (OCF, 247).

William G. T. Shedd (1820–1894)

“Man is a species, and the idea of a species implies the propagation of the entire individual out of it.... Individuals are not propagated in parts” (DT, 2.19).

A BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE ELEMENTS OF HUMAN NATURE

There is some truth in all of the Christian anthropological views. Monists are right in claiming that human nature is one. Dualists are correct in that there are two dimensions to human nature (inner and outer). Trichotomists are on the right track in that human beings do operate in three directions (self-consciousness, world-consciousness, and God-consciousness). And hylomorphists are correct in their insistence that the oneness of human nature is that of a unity (not an identity) of form and matter.

VARIOUS ELEMENTS OF HUMAN PERSONHOOD

Human beings, like God and angels, are not androids, or automations of human form. They are persons, with intellect (mind), emotion (feeling), will (choice), and conscience (moral capacity). The Bible spells out all of these aspects of human personhood.

Intellect (Mind)

Human beings were created with self-reflective minds that have the power of syllogistic reasoning. Solomon urged: “Buy the truth and do not sell it; get wisdom, discipline and understanding” (Prov. 23:23). The power of human reasoning also places people above the “unreasoning animals” (Jude 1:10).

While intellect enables humans to worship God (Matt. 22:37), its inventiveness also makes it capable of great evil (Eccl. 7:25). However, by redemption the mind is “renewed in knowledge in the image of its Creator” (Col. 3:10; cf. Rom. 12:2).

Emotion (Feeling)

In addition to rational thinking, human beings are capable of deep emotions and feelings, such as joy and sorrow. Unlike the mythical androids, humans are more than minds and wills—they have heart.

Will (Choice)

Unlike animals, human beings were created with the moral capacity (see below) to know right from wrong and the will to choose one over the other. This responsibility was entailed in God’s command to Adam: “You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die” (Gen. 2:16–17). The original state of the will is discussed earlier and the fallen state later.<sup>71</sup>

Conscience (Moral Capacity)

Human beings are unique from all other creatures on earth in that within their very natures they have a God-given moral capacity called conscience. Even in our fallen state, God holds us responsible for avoiding evil. Paul states:

All who sin apart from the law will also perish apart from the law, and all who sin under the law will be judged by the law.... (Indeed, when Gentiles, who do not have the law, do by nature things required by the law, they are a law for themselves, even though they do not have the law, since they show that the requirements of the law are written on their hearts, their consciences also bearing witness, and their thoughts now accusing, now even defending them.) (Rom. 2:12–15)

Of course, a fallen conscience is fallible. It reflects an innate capacity to know right from wrong, but it does not guarantee that it will always be accurate; it can be distorted (Rom. 2:15) by culture and choices and, at times, even “seared” by intense evil (1 Tim. 4:2).

There is, nonetheless, an objective moral law, even though our fallen understanding of it is obscured by sin. God’s moral law is reflective of His very nature: It is prescriptive (“You ought not ...”), perfect (Ps. 19:7), objective (not subjective), and universal (for all persons everywhere—cf. Rom. 2:15).

The evidence for this objective moral law is found in:

- (1) the universality of basic moral beliefs;
- (2) the unavoidability of making moral judgments;
- (3) the inescapability of there being a perfect standard by which we measure the imperfections in the world (we can’t know injustice unless we know what is just);
- (4) the impossibility of making judgments about the progress (or regress) of the human race unless there is an external objective moral standard by which we measure the human race;
- (5) the fact that we make excuses for ourselves when we break the moral law;
- (6) the moral guilt we suffer from breaking the moral law;

- (7) the fact that the moral law, like the laws of mathematics, is discovered and not invented;
- (8) the reality that we sometimes act from a sense of duty (e.g., to save a life), even when our strongest instinct to survive tells us not to risk our lives or safety to do so;
- (9) the truth that we find some things in all cultures (like genocide or rape) that we perceive are wrong and evil;
- (10) the fact that some things we do (such as kill, cheat, steal, or be disloyal), we do not want others to do to us.

Of course, humans have other abilities as well; one is the capacity to laugh (risibility). However, risibility flows from rationality, which gives us the ability to perceive the incongruous—which is at the heart of what is humorous.

Then, in addition, there is the ability to enjoy music and art, which also is only possible for rational beings. The inherent capacity to appreciate and savor beauty is a God-given part of human nature that is part of His universal revelation to all human beings.

CONCLUSION

Human beings are reducible neither to pure matter nor to pure spirit. They have two dimensions: body and soul. Nevertheless, these two aspects form one nature composed of form and matter, and they are a form/body unity, not an identity. The soul survives the dissolution of the body and is conscious, albeit incompletely (apart from the body), between death and resurrection.

In addition to being one in nature (soul/body) and two in dimension (inner and outer), human beings are three in direction: They have self-consciousness, world-consciousness, and God-consciousness. Only one of these dimensions—world-consciousness—is lost in the intermediate state between death and resurrection. The resurrection will restore the wholeness and completeness of a human being as created by God—in unity.

The human person embodied in flesh possesses intellect, emotion, will, and conscience. That is, he or she is capable of thinking, feeling, and choosing, and also has the moral capacity to know right from wrong. As such, humans are morally responsible to the Moral Lawgiver—God, the Creator.

CHAPTER THREE

THE ORIGIN OF SIN

GOD'S PERMISSION OF SIN

The origin of sin is a difficulty for any worldview, but it is a particularly acute problem for Christian theology. The three basic perspectives on evil bring the issue into focus: Atheism affirms evil but denies God; pantheism affirms God but denies evil; and theism affirms both God and evil, which appear to be incompatible. Herein lies the dilemma.

To make the predicament worse, among those paradigms that, like theism, acknowledge both God and evil—deism, finite godism, and panentheism (process theology)—theism is the only one that maintains belief in an infinitely powerful God who can and does perform miracles. Hence, according to theism, He alone could intervene and destroy evil, yet He has not and does not. We see, then, that theism faces the greatest difficulty: It posits a God who both could and should be able to prevent and/or destroy evil; however, evil is still with us. Why?

A further issue relates to the very origin of evil itself. According to theism, God is absolutely perfect, and He freely created the world; knowing that evil would arise, He made the world anyway. If God is perfect, and if the world He made is not eternal but was made perfect, from whence did evil come?

The response of theism consists in pointing out several basic facts. God cannot produce or promote evil; He can only permit it. Nevertheless, since He is all-powerful, He can both defeat evil and also bring about a greater good when He allows it.

God Cannot Produce Sin

God is absolutely perfect (cf. Deut. 32:4; 2 Sam. 22:31; Ps. 18:30), and, as such, He cannot either perform or produce sin. Jesus declared, “Your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). An absolutely flawless Being cannot act in any way that is flawed; the world God made, and everything in it, was “very good” (Gen. 1:31).

God Cannot Promote Sin

Furthermore, God cannot encourage sin; He is completely holy and cannot endorse sin in any way. The prophet wrote, “Your eyes are too pure to look on evil; you cannot tolerate wrong” (Hab. 1:13). Indeed, God cannot entice us to sin: “When tempted, no one should say, ‘God is tempting me.’ For God cannot be tempted by evil, nor does he tempt anyone” (James 1:13).

In the Lord’s Prayer, the phrase “lead me not into temptation” doesn’t imply that God does the tempting unless we ask Him not to do so. Indeed, it is a prayer that God not allow us to be led into temptation. He provides the deliverance from sin, as the phrase “deliver us from evil” affirms (Matt. 6:13 KJV).

God Can Permit Sin

Though He cannot produce or promote sin, God can and does permit it. In allowing sin to occur, He accomplishes His own higher purpose. For example, God allowed Joseph’s brothers, by selling him into slavery, to sin in order to save Israel and keep His promise to bring the Messiah through His chosen people to provide salvation for the world (Gen. 12:3). Joseph recognized this when he said to his brothers, “You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives” (Gen. 50:20).

When parents allow a teenage driver to use the family car, they are permitting the potential for evil (calamity), but it is necessary to allow for the possibility of wrongdoing or accident for the greater good of the adolescent learning responsibility and driving skills. God, our heavenly Father, also gives us freedom—permitting the potential for us to produce evil—so that we can grow and learn responsibility. When we choose wrongly and fail, we endure the consequences of our error; God uses our failures to strengthen us and to bring us from immaturity and incompleteness into spiritual adulthood. The writer of Hebrews saw this: “No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful. Later on, however, it produces a harvest of righteousness and peace for those who have been trained by it” (12:11).

God Can Produce a Greater Good by Allowing Sin

The apostle Paul realized that God permits evil to produce superior results:

We also rejoice in our sufferings, because we know that suffering produces perseverance; perseverance, character; and character, hope. And hope does not disappoint us, because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us. (Rom. 5:3–5)

James had the same insight:

Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds, because you know that the testing of your faith develops perseverance. Perseverance must finish its work so that you may be mature and complete, not lacking anything. (James 1:2–4)

THE ORIGIN OF SIN BY CREATURES

According to Scripture, the origin of sin is found in free will. God gave us the power of choice, which in itself is a good thing. Tragically, human beings misuse their God-given freedom.

The Origin of Sin in Heaven by Angels

Actually, evil originated in heaven before it did on earth. Evil was born in the breast of an archangel in the presence of God. This is a tremendous mystery, but it is, nonetheless, the essence of Christian teaching on the source of evil.

Lucifer's Sin

The traditional name given to this archangel is taken from Isaiah 14:12:

How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! ... For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High. (Isa. 14:12–14 KJV)

While most contemporary biblical scholars believe that this passage, in context, refers to “the king of Babylon” (v. 4), the pride and fall of this man is an emulation of the choices of the first archangel, who rebelled against God by a similar but primeval hubris. Paul exhorted, “[An overseer] must not be a recent convert, or he may become conceited and fall under the same judgment as the devil” (1 Tim. 3:6).

Other Angels Also Rebelled

According to Revelation, other angels followed suit. A third of them rebelled with Lucifer and became demons (as he had become the devil). John wrote:

Then another sign appeared in heaven: an enormous red dragon with seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns on his heads. His tail swept a third of the stars out of the sky and flung them to the earth.... The great dragon was hurled down—that ancient serpent called the devil, or Satan, who leads the whole world astray. He was hurled to the earth, and his angels with him. (Rev. 12:3–9)

Clearly, then, sin was in the universe before it was in the world; there was sin in heaven before there was sin on earth. This is made evident by the presence of the tempter (Satan) in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:1ff.).

The Origin of Sin on Earth by Humans

The story of the sin of Adam and Eve is infamous. The perfect pair brought imperfection into their perfect paradise.

The Origin of Evil: The Six Causes

In order to enhance our understanding of the nature of human sin, an examination of the six types of causes will be helpful. First set forth by Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) and later expanded by the scholastics, the six causes are defined (and illustratively applied to the process of constructing a house) as follows:

- Efficient Cause—that by which something comes to be (the carpenter)
- Final Cause—that for which something comes to be (the dwelling in which to live)
- Formal Cause—that of which something comes to be (the house’s form or structure)
- Material Cause—that out of which something comes to be (the building materials)
- Exemplar Cause—that after which something comes to be (the blueprint)
- Instrumental Cause—that through which something comes to be (the tools)

Applying these six causes to Adam and Eve’s sin yields the following results:

- Efficient Cause—person (that by which sin came to be)
- Final Cause—pride (that for which sin came to be)
- Formal Cause—disobedience (that of which sin came to be)
- Material Cause—eating forbidden fruit (that out of which sin came to be)
- Exemplar Cause—none; it was the first human sin (that after which sin came to be)
- Instrumental Cause—power of free choice (that through which sin came to be)

THE NATURE OF HUMAN FREE WILL

There are three basic logical possibilities regarding the nature of human free choice: determinism, indeterminism, and self-determinism.

Determinism is the view that all human actions are caused by another, not by one’s self. Hard determinism does not allow for any free choice at all. Soft determinism posits free choice but sees it as completely controlled by God’s sovereign power.

Indeterminism is the position that human actions are not caused by anything. They are simply indeterminate.

Self-determinism is the doctrine that human free actions are self-caused, that is, caused by one’s self.

HUMAN FREE WILL: THREE VIEWS

	Determinism	Indeterminism	Self-Determinism
Cause	Choices are caused by another	Choices are uncaused	Choices are caused by self
Model	Puppet	Erratic electron	Free agent
Contrary act	Could not do	Could have been	Could have been otherwise	otherwise	otherwise

Illustration	Hard determinism: Being carried out (as against one's will) Soft determinism: Being forced out (as by a weapon)	Blown out (as by the wind)	Lured out (as by someone else)
Previous conditions	Causal	Non-causal	Non-causal
Future	Determined (like dominos)	Undetermined (like dice)	Determined by God, free for humankind (like foreseeing an accident)
All- Knowing Mind	Knows all future acts	Knows all except free acts	Knows all future acts

THE ORIGIN OF EARTHLY EVIL THROUGH HUMAN FREE WILL

Adam and Eve's disobedience raises significant questions about human free will. Were the original humans free? If so, of what did this freedom consist? Are we free in the same sense? Is God free? If so, then why can't He sin? And if God is free but can't sin, then why can't we be free but not able to sin? In response to these queries, there are considerable theological differences. However, some answers do seem clear, and subsequently other solutions can be reasonably deduced from them.

Adam's Freedom Involved Self-Determination

First of all, Adam was free in the sense that his act was self-determined. Indeed, God said, "You are free" (Gen. 2:16). When Adam chose to disobey, God held him accountable, asking, "Have you eaten from the tree of which I commanded you that you should not eat?" (Gen. 3:11 NKJV). The emphasized words, as previously mentioned, specifically indicate a self-determined act on Adam and Eve's part (cf. v. 13). You (your self) did it, God said.

Logically, there are only three possibilities. Either Adam's action was caused by another (which is determinism), was uncaused (which is indeterminism), or was caused by himself (which is self-determinism).

As for determinism, God did not cause Adam to sin, for, again, God can neither sin nor tempt anyone else to do so. Neither did Satan cause Adam to sin, for the tempter did only what his name implies, neither forcing him to do it nor doing it for him.

As for indeterminism, there was no evil (or lack of wholeness) in Adam's nature that gave rise to his sin, for he had none—God created him perfect. And there are no uncaused actions', this would violate the principle of causality.

No event is without a cause, and there was nothing in heaven or on earth, outside of Adam, that caused his sin; he must have caused it himself; Adam's choice was self-determined. This is the heart of human freedom; namely, the ability to be the efficient cause of one's own moral actions. Acts of which one is not the efficient cause, but rather which are forced, are not free moral acts.

Adam's Freedom Involved a Choice Regarding Evil

Further, Adam's act involved a decision between good and evil, and it was free in that he was free to do evil. Had he not been free to opt for evil over good, he could not have done so. He had the power to obey or disobey—whichever he chose.

Adam's Choice for Evil Could Have Been Avoided

In addition, evil was not inevitable for Adam. This is clear from the fact that God said Adam "should not" or "ought not" (cf. Gen. 2:17) to have sinned. Ought implies can—what one should do implies that he is able to do it. Furthermore, again, Adam's decision was something for which God held him responsible, punishing him for choosing wrongly. There is no response-ability without the ability to respond, and the consequences that followed the chosen evil indicate that it could have been avoided.

THE NATURE OF GOD'S FREE WILL

The original humans were free to sin or not to sin. God is free, yet He cannot sin (Hab. 1:13; Heb. 6:18). Indeed, as we have seen, God cannot even be tempted to sin (James 1:13)—He is absolutely impervious to evil. How, then, can God be free if there is no possibility that He can choose wrongly?

The answer is that God is free in the sense of having the power of self-determination, but not in the libertarian sense of having the ability to choose to do other than good.<sup>17</sup> While humans have the ability to choose either good or evil, God, in His very essence, is all-goodness, and, therefore, He can only do good, being subject to His own nature.

The Nature of Human Freedom in Heaven

It appears that regarding freedom and free will, the state of the perfected saints in heaven is similar to God's. While we are still in the world, human free choice involves not only self-determinism (to be the efficient cause of our own choices) but also the ability to do other than good (that is, evil). This sense of freedom, however, is only temporary; it is for the purpose of being tested:

Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds, because you know that the testing of your faith develops perseverance. Perseverance must finish its work so that you may be mature and complete, not lacking anything.... Blessed is the man who perseveres under trial, because when he has stood the test, he will receive the crown of life that God has promised to those who love him. (James 1:2–4, 12)

This is the reason that, before heaven, humans are not both free and unable to sin. When the test is over—when our earthly race is run—then free choice becomes what it, from all eternity, is for God: the self-determined ability to choose only the good.

Freedom to Do Only Good Is Not the Loss of True Freedom

It is important to note that heaven is not the destruction of true freedom but the fulfillment of it. On earth, we choose whether we want to do God’s will or our own; once the choice is made, our destiny is sealed at death (Heb. 9:27). Then, if we have chosen God’s will instead of our own, the freedom to do evil vanishes and we are free to do only the good. Since the freedom to do evil is also the freedom to destroy oneself, it is not perfect (complete) freedom. The essence of true freedom is self-determination; true freedom is the kind that God has (and, in eternity, believers will have), namely, the self-determined ability to choose only the good. Likewise, in hell, evil persons no longer under the influence of God’s grace will be solidified in their will to do evil.

Heaven, then, is the completion of our freedom, not a negation of it. All true believers yearn to have the Lord’s Prayer fulfilled: “Your will be done, [O God,] on earth as it is in heaven” and “lead us not into temptation” (see Matt. 6; Luke 11). Therefore, when God brings us to heaven, where this will be true, He will not have eliminated our freedom but instead fulfilled it. In summary, the loss of the ability to do evil is not an evil of any kind; it is, rather, a profound good.

The Christian concept of lifelong, monogamous marriage is an example of this. When a bride and groom pledge before God, for all time, “Forsaking all others, to you will I cling, until death do us part,” they are making a free choice—to have, for life, intimate relations that they will share with no one else. In a way, it could be said that this limits their freedom, since they have now chosen, for the duration, to go in one direction and not in another. However, this decision does not eradicate their freedom; indeed, it is a fulfillment of their true God-given desire to have such a bond with one and only one person until heaven.

Likewise, in continuing the analogy, neither in marriage nor in heaven does the Lord give us “freedom” to break our vows; such would not be “freedom” at all but rather would bring the potential for (and reality of) evil (bondage to sin). We are free only to keep the covenant, as this is the greatest good both for us and for those to whom we pledge our love.

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO HUMAN FREE WILL

The difficulties that call for an answer in this context can be separated into several questions and responses.

Objection One—Based on Causality

If every action needs an efficient cause—as the principle of causality demands—then who, or what, caused Adam to sin? Each of the possible answers seems to have shortcomings.

Response to Objection One

We will scrutinize several potential responses to this objection.

The Devil Did Not Make Adam Sin

Since the time of Adam, people have used the widely popularized disclaimer “The devil made me do it.” Some believers have been known to excuse their sin in this way, just as Adam blamed Eve, and Eve passed the buck to the evil one. But, as we have seen, Satan did not make Adam sin; he only tempted him. Adam was not forced but lured. In the same way, the devil beguiled Judas to betray Christ: “The devil had already prompted<sup>21</sup> Judas Iscariot, son of Simon, to betray Jesus” (John 13:2).

God Did Not Make Adam Sin

Likewise, God neither placed the desire in Adam’s heart to disobey Him nor compelled him to sin.

Few venture intentionally or overtly into this arena, but some have a view of freedom that logically leads to it. If the sovereignty of God is truly as these people understand it—that is, if God is in direct sovereign control of all things, including human choices—then it would appear that God forced Adam to sin.

Indeed, following Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), some extreme Calvinists claim that free will is simply doing what we desire, and that no one, ever, desires to do any good unless God gives him the desire to do so. If this is the case, then it would seem that God is responsible for all human actions; no one can desire to do evil unless his evil nature gives him the desire to do it. But he could have done good if God had given him the desire.

Neither Lucifer nor Adam, before their respective falls, had an evil nature. From whence, then, the desire to sin? Even Edwards’ defenders admit that this has not been solved within their theology. R. C. Sproul (b. 1939), for instance, calls this an “excruciating problem,” adding: “One thing is absolutely unthinkable, that God could be the author or doer of sin.” Nonetheless, that is the apparent result of this determinist logic.

Therefore, this argument that God has kept all power in His own hands is fraught with serious implications. Most fundamentally, determinism makes God responsible for evil. Put bluntly, this means that when a murder occurs, it is God who is accountable for the death of the victim, and when an assault takes place, it is God who causes the attack. Some ideas don’t require refutation but, instead, simple clarification to see what doesn’t hold up to scrutiny. God is absolutely good and, as such, He cannot do (or be responsible for) evil. Period.

An Imperfect Nature in Adam Did Not Make Him Sin

A second alternative is the argument that Adam was not perfect; his weak and imperfect nature caused him to sin. However, here again, this is ultimately to lay blame at God’s doorstep, since weak and imperfect would be how God made Adam. Unlike the previously addressed theories (both of which are determinist), the indeterminist blame is not direct but indirect; nonetheless, human sin would still be God’s fault.

The Bible, by contrast, affirms that God made only good creatures. After almost every day of Creation Genesis says, “It was good” (1:4, 10, 18, 21, 25), and after the sixth day, “God saw all that he had made, and it was very good” (1:31). Solomon added, “This only have I found: God made mankind upright” (Eccl. 7:29). We are told explicitly that “every creature of God is good” (1 Tim. 4:4 KJV). Once again, an omnibenevolent (absolutely good) God cannot make an evil thing; only a perfect creature can come from the hands of a perfect Creator.

Adam Sinned by His Own Free Will

The true answer is that Adam sinned by his own free choice. The reasoning runs like this:

- (1) One of the things God gave His good creatures was a good power called free will.
- (2) Even unbelievers understand that freedom is good. What people march against freedom? One never sees a crowd carrying placards that say “Down With Liberty!” or “Back to Bondage!”
- (3) Even if someone did speak against freedom, he would thereby be speaking for it, since he clearly values his freedom to express that idea.
- (4) In short, free choice is an undeniable good.

Even so, the power of moral free choice entails the ability to either embrace God’s designed good or to reject it—the latter is called evil. God revealed that freedom is good—so good, in fact, that He granted it to us—but freedom does make evil possible. If God made free creatures, and if it is good for us to be free, then the origin of evil is in the misuse of freedom.

This is not difficult to comprehend. Most of us, for example, enjoy the freedom to drive a car, but many abuse this freedom and drive dangerously. We don’t (and shouldn’t) blame the government that licenses us to drive for all the evil done with vehicles. Those whose reckless or malicious driving wounds or kills others are responsible for the results of their actions. Even though there is evil that results from misuse or malice, the government perceives that it is more beneficial to our society for its citizens to be able to utilize vehicles than it would be for us to have to walk everywhere, just as God has demonstrated that it is better for us to have the freedom to misuse our will than it would be for us not to have it at all.

While God is morally accountable for giving us the good thing called free will, He is not morally responsible for any evil we commit with our freedom. Again, Solomon said it succinctly: “God made mankind upright, but men have gone in search of many schemes” (Eccl. 7:29). In brief, God made the fact of freedom; we are responsible for the acts of freedom. The fact of freedom is good, even though some of the acts of freedom are evil. God is the cause of the former, and we are the cause of the latter.

Objection Two—Based on the Need for a Cause

The “self-determination solution” leads to another problem: If every event has a cause, then what caused Adam to exercise his freedom to sin? Free choice is an action, and every action, even the action of free will, needs an efficient cause. Tracing sin back to free choice does not completely solve the overall issue; it raises another one.

Response to Objection Two

This objection is based upon misunderstanding.

First, admittedly, every event does have a cause; that is, every effect has a cause. However, not every cause has a cause. For example, every painting has a painter, but every painter is not painted. If every cause had a cause, then God could not be the first, uncaused Cause that He is. It is absurd to ask, “Who made God?” for this is the same as the question “Who made the unmade Maker?” Further pursuing “Who caused Adam to sin?” is like insisting that there must be an answer to the question “Who is the bachelor’s wife?” A bachelor does not have a wife any more than an uncaused Being has a cause. Likewise, if Adam’s choice for evil (his wrong use of free will) is the first cause of human sin, then no other cause should be sought.

Second, this objection wrongly assumes a false disjunction—that an action must be either uncaused or caused by someone other than one’s self, since every event is either caused or uncaused (there apparently being no other logical alternatives). This is not the case, for there is a third option: An action may be either

- (1) uncaused,
- (2) caused by someone (or something) else, or
- (3) caused by me.

It is the third alternative that is meant by freedom or free will; a free act is a self-determined act. As we have seen and will continue to see, there is great reason to support the last view.

Objection Three—Based on Alleged Logical Impossibility

Again, the answer to the second objection leads to another question: If Adam’s free will was the cause of his disobedience to God, then what was the cause of his free will? If every effect needs a cause, and if our free will is an effect, then free will needs a cause. Thus, the question “Who (or what) caused Adam to sin?” still remains.

Response to Objection Three

First, it must be noted, again, that this question confuses the fact of freedom with the acts of freedom. God is the cause of the former, but Adam was the cause of the latter. God created the person, Adam, and the power of free will that Adam had, but it was Adam who exercised that power for evil.

Second, there is an important distinction overlooked by this objection; namely, that distinction between the person and his powers. Free will is a power that was given to Adam, the person. Adam, that person, was the efficient cause of his disobedience to God; the power he used to do it was the power of free will granted to him. It is meaningful to ask who the person was that used the power of free will, but it is meaningless to ask who caused the person to do it. Adam, the person himself, was the cause of his disobedience by means of the power of free will, which God gave him and which he abused.

Objection Four—Based on the Impossibility of Self-Causality

This leads to another issue. If the person (Adam) was the cause of the action, then it was an action caused by his self (i.e., it was a self-caused action). Opponents of self-determination argue that to be self-caused is a contradiction in terms, for nothing can cause itself. We cannot lift ourselves by our own bootstraps. A cause is always prior to its effect (in being, even if not in time), and we cannot be prior to ourselves. Thus, it would seem to follow that a self-caused action is rationally absurd.

Response to Objection Four

Here again there is a confusion: A self-caused being is impossible, for the reason just given, but there is nothing contradictory about a self-caused action. Certainly we cannot exist before we exist or be before we are, but we can and must be before we can do—that is, we must exist before we can act. Self-caused actions, then, are not impossible; if they were, then even God, who cannot do what is impossible (cf. Heb. 6:18), would not have been able to create the world (for there was no one or nothing else, except Him, to cause the world to exist before it existed). If the act of Creation was not self-caused, then God could not have performed it.

Likewise, if self-caused actions are not possible, then neither is there an explanation for Lucifer's sin. A sinless, perfect God could not have caused Lucifer to sin, and since Lucifer was the first being to sin, his action must have been self-caused; otherwise he would never have been able (i.e., had the freedom) to sin. Consequently, it follows that self-caused actions are possible, even though a self-caused being is impossible.

Perhaps the reason it seems to some that self-caused actions are not possible is the term self-caused itself. It is clearer to speak, for example, of my actions as caused by myself (as opposed to caused by another), or, better yet, actions caused by my self (that is, by me). Speaking this way eliminates the ambiguity of language that gives rise to the false belief that a self-caused action is impossible.

OTHER QUESTIONS ABOUT FREEDOM AND EVIL

There are, of course, other questions about free will, such as, “In what sense, if any, are human beings free after the Fall?” “Do we still retain freedom in the self-determined sense?” “How about in the libertarian sense?” These issues will be addressed in chapter 5.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR ADAM'S FREE WILL

The origin of sin in a self-determined free choice of Adam (and Lucifer before him) has been a hallmark of Christian thought from the beginning. The following samples illustrate the point.

Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165)

God, wishing men and angels to follow His will, resolved to create them free to do righteousness. But if the word of God foretells that some angels and men shall certainly be punished, it did so because it foreknew that they would be unchangeably [wicked], but not because God created them so. (DJ, I.142)

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

This expression, “How often would I have gathered thy children together and thou wouldst not” [Matt. 23:37], set forth the ancient law of human liberty, because God made man a free [agent] from the beginning, possessing his own soul to obey the behests of God voluntarily, and not by compulsion of God. For there is no coercion with God, but a good will [toward us] is present with Him continually. (AH, I.4.36.8)

Athenagoras (fl. second century)

Just as with men who have freedom of choice as to both virtue and vice (for you would not either honor the good or punish the bad; unless vice and virtue were in their own power, and some are diligent in the matters entrusted to them, and others faithless), so is it among the angels. (PC, II.24)

Theophilus (c. 130–190)

God made man free, and with power over himself... God vouchsafes to him as a gift through His own philanthropy and pity, when men obey Him. For as man, disobeying, drew death on himself; so, obeying the will of God, he who desires is able to procure for himself life everlasting. (TA, II.27)

Tatian (120–173)

Our free-will has destroyed us; we who were free have become slaves; we have been sold through sin. Nothing evil has been created by God; we ourselves have manifested wickedness; but we, who have manifested it, are able again to reject it. (ATG, II.11)

Bardesanes (c. 154–222)

How is it that God did not so make us that we should not sin and incur condemnation? If man had been made so, he would not have belonged to himself but would have been the instrument of him that moved him... And how, in that case, would a man differ from a harp, on which another plays; or from a ship, which another guides: where the praise and the blame reside in the hand of the performer or the steersman ... they being only instruments made for the use of him in whom is the skill? (E, VII)

Clement of Alexandria (150–c. 215)

We, who have heard by the Scriptures that self-determining choice and refusal have been given by the Lord to men, rest in the infallible criterion of faith, manifesting a willing Spirit, since we have chosen life and believe God through His voice. (S, II.2.4)

Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225)

I find, then, that man was by God constituted free, master of his own will and power; indicating the presence of God's image and likeness in him by nothing so well as by this constitution of his nature... Therefore, both the goodness and purpose of God are discovered in the gift to man of freedom in his will. (FBAM, III.2.5)

Novatian (c. 200–c. 258)

He also placed man at the head of the world, and man, too, made in the image of God, to whom He imparted mind, and reason, and foresight, that he might imitate God... And when He had given him all things for his service, He willed that he alone should be free. And lest, again, an unbounded freedom should fall into peril, He laid down a command, in which man was taught that there was no evil in the fruit of the tree; but he was forewarned that evil would arise if perchance he should exercise his freewill in the contempt of the law that was given. (CT, V.1)

Origen (c. 185–c. 254)

“This also is clearly defined in the teaching of the church that every rational soul is possessed of free-will and volition” (DP, IV, preface). “There are, indeed, innumerable passages in the Scriptures which establish with exceeding clearness the existence of freedom of will” (ibid., IV.3.1).

Methodius (c. 260–311)

“Now those who decide that man is not possessed of free-will, and affirm that he is governed by the unavoidable necessities of fate ... are guilty of impiety toward God Himself, making Him out to be the cause and author of human evils” (BTV, VI.8.16).

“I say that man was made with free-will, not as if there were already existing some evil, which he had the power of choosing if he wished ... but that the power of obeying and disobeying God is the only cause” (CFW, 362).

Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 315–c. 387)

Know also that thou hast a soul self governed, the noblest work of God, made after the image of its Creator, immortal because of God that gives it immortality, a living being rational, imperishable, because of Him that bestowed these gifts: having free power to do what it willeth. (CL, II.VII.IV.18)

“The soul is self-governed: and though the Devil can suggest, he has not the power to compel against the will. He pictures to thee the thought of fornication: if thou wilt, thou rejectest” (ibid., 21).

Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335–c. 395)

“Being the image and the likeness ... of the Power which rules all things, man kept also in the matter of a free-will this likeness to Him whose will is over all” (OV, II.V.12).

Jerome (c. 340–420)

It is in vain that you misrepresent me and try to convince the ignorant that I condemn free-will. Let him who condemns it be himself condemned. We have been created endowed with free-will.... It is true that freedom of the will brings with it freedom of decision. Still man does not act immediately on his free-will but requires God’s aid who Himself needs no aid. (LSJ, II.VI.133.10)

John Chrysostom (347–407)

“God, having placed good and evil in our power, has given us full freedom of choice; he does not keep back the unwilling, but embraces the willing” (HG, 19.1).

All is in God’s power, but so that our free-will is not lost.... It depends therefore on us and on Him. We must first choose the good, and then He adds what belongs to Him. He does not precede our willing, that our free-will may not suffer. But when we have chosen, then He affords us much help.... It is ours to choose beforehand and to will, but God’s to perfect and bring to the end. (HEH, 12)

Early Augustine (354–430)

“Free will, naturally assigned by the creator to our rational soul, is such a neutral power, as can either incline toward faith, or turn toward unbelief” (OSL, 58). “In fact, sin is so much a voluntary evil that it is not sin at all unless it is voluntary” (OTR, 14). “Either, then, will is itself the first cause of sin, or the first cause is without sin” (OGFW, 3.49).

Augustine added,

Sin is indeed nowhere but in the will, since this consideration also would have helped me, that justice holds guilty those sinning by evil will alone, although they may have been unable to accomplish what they willed. (TSAM, 10.12)

Every one also who does a thing unwillingly is compelled, and every one who is compelled, if he does a thing, does it only unwillingly. It follows that he that is willing is free from compulsion, even if any one thinks himself compelled. (ibid., 10.14)

Anselm (1033–1109)

No one deserts uprightness except by willing to desert it. If “against one’s will” means “unwillingly,” then no one deserts uprightness against his will.... But a man cannot will against his will because he cannot will unwillingly to will. For everyone who wills, wills willingly. (TFE, 130)

Although they [Adam and Eve] yielded themselves to sin, they could not abolish in themselves their natural freedom of choice. However, they could so affect their state that they were not able to use that freedom except by a different grace from that which they had before their fall. (ibid., 125)

We ought not to say that they [Adam and Eve] had freedom for the purpose of receiving, from a giver, the uprightness which they didn’t have, because we have to believe that they were created with upright wills—although we must not deny that they had freedom for receiving this same uprightness again, should they once desert it and were it returned to them by the one who originally gave it. (ibid., 126)

Don’t you see it follows from these considerations that no temptation can conquer an upright will? For if temptation can conquer the will, it has the power to conquer it, and conquers the will by its own power. But temptation cannot do this because the will can be overcome only by its own power. (ibid., 132)

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274)

Necessity comes from the agent when the latter so coerces something that he cannot do the contrary.... Such necessity by coercion is contrary to the will. [Thus,] something cannot be absolutely coerced or violent and simultaneously voluntary.... Consequently man does not choose necessarily but freely. (in Clark, AR, 291–92)

Therefore, “man has free choice, otherwise counsels, exhortations, precepts, prohibitions, rewards, and punishment would all be pointless.” Consequently, a free choice “leaves intact the power of being able to decide otherwise” (ibid., 259).

With the exception of the later Augustine, this view of self-determined free will was the virtually unanimous view of the Fathers up to the time of the Reformation, and with the exception of Calvin and Luther, it has continued to be the consistent view since the time of the Reformation.

CONCLUSION

The origin of evil is a problem for any worldview, but particularly so for theism, which must account for how evil arose in a universe where God and everything He made were perfectly good. The answer is found in one of God’s good gifts: free will. While freedom is good in itself, it also allowed the potential for evil. Hence, free will made evil possible.

However, while God is responsible for the fact of freedom (which made evil possible), free creatures themselves (e.g., Lucifer and Adam) are responsible for their acts of freedom (which make evil actual). God gave them the power of choice, and instead of choosing to obey and follow the good, they disobeyed and exercised free choice for sin. Hence, evil arose from the free will of the good creatures that God made.

CHAPTER FOUR

THE NATURE OF SIN

The originally created conditions were perfect, and a perfect God can make nothing less than a perfect world. Eventually, however, by a misuse of free will,<sup>2</sup> sin entered the world and vitiated God's perfect creation. There followed a state of human sinfulness—in which we now find ourselves—that is humanly irreparable. Our imperfection is best understood in light of the ultimate Standard of perfection, which is God Himself. The vivid contrast reveals a deplorable picture of human depravity.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF HUMAN SINFULNESS

Sin is an ugly reality, especially as seen through God's eyes. In the famous Romans 3 passage (based on Psalm 14), Paul described man's total depravity, insisting,

There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one. Their throats are open graves; their tongues practice deceit. The poison of vipers is on their lips. Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness. Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, and the way of peace they do not know. There is no fear of God before their eyes. (vv. 10–18)

A horrid image, to say the least.

Two Basic Kinds of Sin

All sins can be placed into two broad categories: sins of commission and sins of omission. This means that some sins are doing what we should not do, and others are not doing what we should do.

Sins of Commission

Sins of commission, doing what we should not do, are described by the apostle John in this verse: "Everyone who sins breaks the law; in fact, sin is lawlessness" (1 John 3:4). The law of Moses was recorded in the Old Testament, and its basic moral principles are repeated in the New Testament.

Sins of Omission

Sins of omission are not doing what we should do. As James put it, "Anyone ... who knows the good he ought to do and doesn't do it, sins" (James 4:17). Perhaps this latter category contains even more sins than the former.

Seven Detestable Sins

God singled out seven particular sins He cannot abide:

There are six things the LORD hates, seven that are detestable to him: [1] haughty eyes, [2] a lying tongue, [3] hands that shed innocent blood, [4] a heart that devises wicked schemes, [5] feet that are quick to rush into evil, [6] a false witness who pours out lies and [7] a man who stirs up dissension among brothers. (Prov. 6:16–19)

Simply stated, these are pride, deceit, murder, plotting evil, quickness to do wrong, false testimony, and troublemaking.

The Chief Names for Sin

There are numerous biblical terms for sin in the Bible, many more than there are names for good. Each word adds to the overall picture of heinous action against a holy God.

Sin

The Hebrew word often translated sin is chata, meaning “to miss,” “to forfeit,” or “to lack.” The use of chata in Psalm 51:4 captures the idea behind it. After committing adultery and planning a murder, David confessed to God: “Against you, You only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Your sight” (NKJV).

The basic Greek word for sin is hamartia, which means “to miss the mark” (“and so not share the prize”), “to err,” “to sin.” Hamartia is used in Romans 3:23: “For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God.”

Trespass

The Hebrew root word for trespass is maal, which means “to cover up,” “to act covertly, that is, treacherously, grievously.” Numbers 31:16 declares: “Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the LORD” (KJV).

The Greek word for trespass is paraptoma, which means “to slip,” “to lapse,” “to fall,” “to stumble aside,” “to offend,” or “to sin.” Paul used paraptoma in Galatians 6:1: “Brothers, if someone is caught in a sin, you who are spiritual should restore him gently. But watch yourself, or you also may be tempted.”

Iniquity

Another term for violating God’s law is iniquity. The basic Hebrew word is avon, which means “perversity,” “fault,” “iniquity.” In Isaiah (53:11) God declares: “My righteous servant will justify many, and he will bear their iniquities.”

The Greek word for iniquity is adikia, meaning “morally wrong,” “unjust,” “unrighteous.” James said, “The tongue also is a fire, a world of evil among the parts of the body. It corrupts the whole person, sets the whole course of his life on fire, and is itself set on fire by hell” (James 3:6).

Evil

A common Hebrew word for sin is ra, which means “bad,” “harmful,” “wrong,” even “calamity.” For example, Isaiah spoke of the ability to “reject the wrong and choose the right” (Isa. 7:15).

Among the common Greek words for evil are poneros, meaning “evil in effect”—Jesus spoke of fallen human beings as evil (Matt. 7:11)—and kakos, denoting what is “evil in character.” Paul said, “When I want to do good, evil is right there with me” (Rom. 7:21). What the apostle meant is that there was a worthless, degenerate, depraved (evil) nature within him.

Wickedness

Another biblical term for sin is wickedness. In the Old Testament, wickedness is often a translation of the Hebrew word rasha, which means “morally bad” or “ungodly.” The psalmist said, “Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked” (Ps. 1:1). The New Testament Greek word anomia is also translated as wickedness (cf. Matt. 23:28; 24:12; Rom. 6:19; 2 Cor. 6:14).

Other Terms for Sin

There are many other scriptural names and descriptions of evil. In portraying the pagan world, Paul lists at least forty-one different designations and characterizations of sin in Romans 1:

The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness [1] and wickedness [2] of men who suppress the truth [3] by their wickedness.... For although they knew God, they neither glorified him [4] as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile [5] and their foolish [6] hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images [7] made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles. Therefore God gave them over in the sinful desires [8] of their hearts to sexual impurity [9] for the degrading [10] of their bodies with one another. They exchanged the truth of God for a lie [11], and worshiped and served created things [12] rather than the Creator—who is forever praised. Amen. Because of this, God gave them over to shameful lusts [13]. Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural [14] ones. In the same way the men also abandoned natural relations with women and were inflamed with lust [15] for one another. Men committed indecent acts [16] with other men, and received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion [17]. Furthermore, since they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God [18], he gave them over to a depraved mind [19], to do what ought not to be done [20]. They have become filled with every kind of wickedness [21], evil [22], greed [23] and depravity [24]. They are full of envy [25], murder [26], strife [27], deceit [28] and malice [29]. They are gossips [30], slanderers [31], God-haters [32], insolent [33], arrogant [34] and boastful [35]; they invent ways of doing evil [36]; they disobey their parents [37]; they are senseless [38], faithless [39], heartless [40], ruthless [41]. (vv. 18–31)

A more succinct but equally dreadful list (of fifteen different depictions of sin) is found in “the works of the flesh” of Galatians 5:

The acts of the sinful nature are obvious: sexual immorality [1], impurity [2] and debauchery [3]; idolatry [4] and witchcraft [5]; hatred [6], discord [7], jealousy [8], fits of rage [9], selfish ambition [10], dissensions [11], factions [12] and envy [13]; drunkenness [14], orgies [15], and the like. I warn you, as I did before, that those who live like this will not inherit the kingdom of God. (vv. 19–21)

The Nature of Sin in Relation to God

As committed against God, sin is described in several ways. It is unbelief in Him, rebellion against Him, transgression against His law, and pride that exalts self above Him.

Sin As Unbelief

Paul bluntly declared, “Everything that does not come from faith is sin” (Rom. 14:23). Thus, according to Jesus, “Whoever believes in [me] is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God’s one and only Son” (John 3:18). And so, “Without faith it is impossible to please God, because anyone who comes to him must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him” (Heb. 11:6).

Sin As Rebellion

Samuel forthrightly affirmed, “Rebellion [is as] the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness [is as] iniquity and idolatry” (1 Sam. 15:23 KJV). Solomon added, “An evil man is bent only on rebellion” (Prov. 17:11). Nehemiah described Israel in these words: “They became stiff-necked and in their rebellion appointed a leader in order to return to their slavery” (Neh. 9:17). God is King, and we, his subjects, have rebelled against His rule in our lives.

Sin As Transgression

As the Sovereign, God revealed inviolable guidelines by which His servants should live. However, Adam broke His law, as have all Adamites since. These transgressions are at the heart of sin; the Scriptures assert, “Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude [likeness] of Adam’s transgression, who is the figure of him [Jesus] that was to come” (Rom. 5:14 KJV). Indeed, “sin is the transgression of the law” (1 John 3:4 KJV). Again, even when David’s sin was clearly directed toward the wife and life of another, he nonetheless cried out to God in confession, “Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight, so that you are proved right when you speak and justified when you judge” (Ps. 51:4).

Sin As Pride

At the root of all sin is pride, which was the evil that prompted Lucifer’s rebellion against God. Thus Paul exhorted about elders: “He must not be a recent convert, or he may become conceited [proud] and fall under the same judgment as the devil” (1 Tim. 3:6). As the one who inspired the sin of the king of Tyre, Satan’s wickedness is emulated and described in these words: “Your heart became proud on account of your beauty, and you corrupted your wisdom because of your splendor” (Ezek. 28:17). John lists pride as one of the three basic sins, saying, “All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world” (1 John 2:16 KJV).

The Degrees of Sin

Contrary to widely held opinion, not all sins are considered (by God) to be equal. Jesus said there were “weightier matters of the law” (Matt. 23:23 KJV), such as, for example, mercy and justice over tithing. He also declared our love for God to be a higher duty than our love for human beings, calling the former “the first and greatest commandment” (Matt. 22:38). He told Pilate that “the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin” (John 19:11).

The more severe eternal punishment for some is due to the heaviness of the sins they have committed (Rev. 20:12). John spoke of a sin so monstrous that God took the guilty person's life (1 John 5:16). Paul said some were disciplined with death by God for partaking of the Lord's table in an unworthy manner (1 Cor. 11:29–30), indicating that this is a particularly substantial sin. Not only are some sins greater, there is also a "greatest" sin, the blasphemy of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:32).

The Metaphysical Nature of Sin

One of the difficulties regarding sin can be illustrated by the objection that if God created everything, and if sin is real, then God must have created sin. Since Christian theism denies the conclusion (that "God must have created sin"), it would seem necessary, then, for Christian theism to deny one or both of the two premises (that "God created everything" and that "sin is real"). However, we cannot deny that God created everything, since He alone existed before anything else did, and everything else that exists He created.<sup>8</sup> As for the other premise, to deny that sin is real is to reduce it to a non-reality or illusion. In short, to deny that God created everything is to admit materialism and reject theism, and to deny that sin exists (as a reality) is to reject theism and accept pantheism. Therefore, how can the conclusion (that "God must have created sin") be incorrect?

Unsolvable as the dilemma seems, Christian theism gives a forthright answer. God did create every thing (substance), but sin is not a thing or substance: Sin is a privation or lack in a good substance, a distortion of something pure. Evil is an ontological parasite—it exists only in something good, as a corruption of its goodness. For example, evil is like rot to a tree or rust to a car; both rot and rust corrupt the good substance (tree or car), but neither rot nor rust exists in and of itself.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF HUMAN SINFULNESS

From a theological standpoint, sin is anything that falls short of God's perfect moral nature. Paul wrote that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). God said, "I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy" (Lev. 11:45). It is plain, then, that the ultimate objective standard is God's absolute moral perfection, and anything that falls short of it is sin.

As previously established, God possesses both nonmoral (metaphysical) and moral attributes. The moral attributes are the final standard for what is right and wrong. Since God has at least six basic moral attributes—holiness, justice, perfection, jealousy, goodness (love), and truthfulness—a brief description of each is necessary so that it is clear what sin is and how it falls short of God's ultimate objective standard, which is His own moral nature.

God Is Holy

The biblical Hebrew words for holy are godesh, meaning "apartness" or "sacredness," and gadosh, which is translated "sacred" or "holy." The Greek word hosios means "righteous," "holy," or "pious." In the moral sense, that God is holy means He is totally and utterly set apart from all evil. His holiness is associated with His jealousy (Josh. 24:19), His exaltation (Ps. 99:9),

His righteousness (Isa. 5:16; Luke 1:75), His almightiness (omnipotence—Rev. 4:8), His absolute uniqueness (Ex. 15:11), His moral purity (2 Cor. 7:1), and His being vexed by evil (Ps. 78:41).

God is holy by His very nature. Exodus 15:11 inquires: “Who among the gods is like you, O LORD? Who is like you—majestic in holiness, awesome in glory, working wonders?” In Leviticus 11:44–45 God affirms:

I am the LORD your God; consecrate yourselves and be holy, because I am holy.... I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt to be your God; therefore be holy, because I am holy.

In Joshua 24:19 the people were told, “You are not able to serve the LORD. He is a holy God; he is a jealous God.” First Samuel 2:2 confirms that “there is no one holy like the LORD; there is no one besides you [God]; there is no Rock like our God.” First Samuel 6:20 adds, “Who can stand in the presence of the LORD, this holy God?” Psalm 78:41 laments that “again and again they put God to the test; they vexed the Holy One of Israel.”

Numerous biblical passages speak of God as “the Holy One.” Isaiah the prophet said, “The LORD Almighty will be exalted by his justice, and the holy God will show himself holy by his righteousness” (Isa. 5:16). Paul exhorts:

Since we have these promises, dear friends, let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God. (2 Cor. 7:1)

John informs us:

Each of the four living creatures [around God’s throne] had six wings and was covered with eyes all around, even under his wings. Day and night they never stop saying, “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come” (Rev. 4:8).

In addition to direct biblical references to God as holy, the Godhead has a Holy Spirit, God has a holy Name, God makes the ground (where He stands) holy (Ex. 3:5), and God has holy ways (Ps. 77:13).

God takes an unchangeable oath by His holiness (Ps. 89:35), God has a holy arm (1 Chron. 6:35; Isa. 52:10), God sits on a holy throne (Ps. 47:8), God’s throne is on a holy mountain (Ezek. 28:14), God has holy angels, and God has a holy place (heaven) where He dwells.

Sin Is Being Unholy

If God’s moral nature is the ultimate standard for what is right, and if God is absolutely holy, then it follows that sin is being unholy. Indeed, the Bible uses this very term of sin; for example, Paul said, “We also know that law is made not for the righteous but for lawbreakers and rebels, the ungodly and sinful, the unholy and irreligious” (1 Tim. 1:9). Again,

People will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boastful, proud, abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy, without love, unforgiving, slanderous, without self-control, brutal, not lovers of the good, treacherous, rash, conceited, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God—having a form of godliness but denying its power. Have nothing to do with them. (2 Tim. 3:2–5)

God Is Just (Righteous)

To be righteous means “to be just” or “right.” Used of God, righteous refers to the intrinsic characteristic wherein He is absolutely just or right and is the ultimate standard of justice and rightness.

The biblical basis for God’s righteousness is found in the many ways the words (Heb: tsadaqah, and Gk: dikaioo, diakaiosune) are used.

First, righteousness involves God’s true ordinances (Ps. 19:9): “The fear of the LORD is pure, enduring forever. The ordinances of the LORD are sure and altogether righteous.”

Second, righteousness is the basis of God’s throne (Ps. 89:14): “Righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne; love and faithfulness go before you.”

Third, righteousness is the royal power of God’s domain (Heb. 1:8): “Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever, and righteousness will be the scepter of your kingdom.”

Fourth, righteousness does no injustice (Zeph. 3:5): “The LORD... is righteous; he does no wrong. Morning by morning he dispenses his justice, and every new day he does not fail.”

Fifth, righteousness will always remain (2 Cor. 9:9): “As it is written: ‘He has scattered abroad his gifts to the poor; his righteousness endures forever.’ ”

Sixth, righteousness is the ultimate standard of judgment (Acts 17:31): “He has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed.”

Seventh, righteousness renders to all in keeping with their deeds (Rom. 2:6): God “will give to each person according to what he has done.”

Eighth, righteousness is the basis for the believer’s rewards (2 Tim. 4:8): “Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day—and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing.”

Ninth, and finally, righteousness is revealed in the law of God (Rom. 10:5): “Moses describes in this way the righteousness that is by the law: ‘The man who does these things will live by them.’ ”

Sin Is Unrighteousness (Injustice)

While righteousness is a moral attribute of God, righteousness is also one of His communicable characteristics and can be possessed by His creatures. Hence, righteousness is something that we should be instructed in (2 Tim. 3:17); that we should seek (Matt. 6:33); that we should pursue (2 Tim. 2:2); that we should thirst after (Matt. 5:6); that we should suffer for (1 Peter 3:14; 2 Tim. 3:12); that we should submit to (Rom. 10:3); that we should be slaves of (Rom. 6:18); and that we should practice (1 John 3:7).

Insofar as human beings fall short of God’s righteousness (justice), they are in sin. Paul wrote of his Jewish brethren, “Since they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own, they did not submit to God’s righteousness” (Rom. 10:3). In fact, the Bible describes sin as “unrighteousness” itself, saying, “Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts” (Isa. 55:7 KJV). Paul adds,

Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. (1 Cor. 6:9–10 KJV)

This list explicitly spells out what God by His very nature regards as unrighteousness: that which falls short of His absolute Tightness.

God Is Perfect

God is absolutely morally perfect—impeccable. This flawless excellence of God is expressed by several Hebrew words for our English word perfect: tamim, meaning “complete,” “sound,” “blameless,” “perfect,” “without blemish”; shalem, which means “complete,” “safe,” “blameless”; tam, which is rendered “complete,” “blameless,” “perfect;” omen, translated “perfect” and “faithful”; kalil, meaning “entire,” “whole,” “perfect”; and taman, which is expressed by words like complete, finished, and blameless.

The Greek words for perfect are teleios, which means “complete,” “perfect,” “mature”; teleiōo, which bears the idea of “bringing to an end,” “completing,” “perfecting”; teleiotes, a kindred concept that can be rendered “completeness” and “perfection”; and katartizo, which means “to complete,” “to perfect,” “to prepare.”

God is perfect in every way (Deut. 32:4; 2 Sam. 22:31). “Do you know how the clouds hang poised, those wonders of him who is perfect in knowledge?” (Job 37:16). “The law of the LORD is perfect, reviving the soul” (Ps. 19:7). “The LORD will fulfill his purpose for me [that is, “will perfect” me]; your love, O LORD, endures forever—do not abandon the works of your hands” (Ps. 138:8). “O LORD, you are my God; I will exalt you and praise your name, for in perfect faithfulness you have done marvelous things, things planned long ago” (Isa. 25:1).

“Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). “Then you will be able to test and approve what [is] God’s ... good, pleasing and perfect will” (Rom. 12:2). “When perfection comes, the imperfect disappears” (1 Cor. 13:10). “We proclaim him, admonishing and teaching everyone with all wisdom, so that we may present everyone perfect in Christ” (Col. 1:28). “Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows” (James 1:17). “The man who looks intently into the perfect law that gives freedom ... will be blessed in what he does” (James 1:25). “There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear” (1 John 4:18).

Sin Is Moral Imperfection

Since God’s moral nature is the standard of perfection, it follows that whatever is imperfect is sinful by nature. Thus, the Bible exhorts believers to perfection (Matt. 5:48) by following His perfect will (Rom. 12:2): “Therefore let us leave the elementary teachings about Christ and go on to maturity [perfection]” (Heb. 6:1). In addition, we are to “stand perfect and complete in all the will of God” (Col. 4:12 KJV). In short, imperfect thoughts, intentions, or actions are sinful, and the flawless standard of the Holy One’s absolute perfection clearly cannot be achieved by human flesh but only by the enabling of God (Phil. 2:13). Humans are totally depraved.

God Is Jealous

As mentioned in Volume 2, many are surprised that one of God’s attributes is jealousy; however, His Word lists it as an essential characteristic, even declaring that it is part of His “name” (Ex. 34:14). God is jealous for what rightly belongs to Him, which is everything that He created.

The biblical Hebrew word for jealous (kannaw) means “to be desirous of,” “to be zealous about,” “to be excited to anger over,” “to execute judgment because of.” The primary Greek term (zeloo) means “to have strong affection toward,” “to be ardently devoted to,” “to desire earnestly,” “to be fervent.” God’s jealousy is never wrong because He is never jealous about something that doesn’t belong to Him (Ps. 24:1).

God’s jealousy connotes anger (Deut. 29:20), fury (Zech. 8:2), and wrath (Isa. 42:13); His jealousy is carried out against sin, a violation of His perfect nature. The Bible describes God’s passionate opposition to idols (1 Cor. 10:19–22), images (Ps. 78:58), other gods (Deut. 32:16), and other sins (1 Kings 14:22). God is jealous for His holy name (Ezek. 39:25), His holy people (Zech. 8:2), His holy land (Joel 2:18), and His holy city (Zech. 1:14). Foremost is God’s jealousy for His holy nature, His uniqueness:

- (1) God is unique and supreme.
- (2) God is holy, loving, and morally perfect.
- (3) Thus, God is uniquely and supremely holy, loving, and morally perfect.
- (4) Whatever is supremely holy, loving, and perfect is to be preserved with the utmost zeal.
- (5) God’s jealousy is His zeal to preserve His own holy supremacy.
- (6) Therefore, God is eminently justified in His jealousy (cf. Ex. 34:14).

Sin Is the Absence of Godly Jealousy and the Presence of Ungodly Jealousy (Envy)

In regard to humans, Scripture speaks of both righteous and unrighteous jealousy; we are to embrace the first and reject the second. Right jealousy is valuing and preserving what belongs to us, while wrong jealousy is being possessive of and demanding what does not belong to us. It is sinful for us not to guard and protect what God has entrusted to us; it is likewise sinful for us to be envious or covetous of what He has not given us.

Jealousy, then, is not an inherent evil. God is jealous for what is right, true, and unchanging—as we should be. For instance, Paul was zealously impassioned for the church: “I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy. I promised you to one husband, to Christ, so that I might present you as a pure virgin to him” (2 Cor. 11:2). In the same way, because it is God who ordains marriage, a husband and wife belong to each other (cf. Num. 5:14; 1 Cor. 7:4) and are rightly jealous to protect their love.

God Is Love

The Bible says that “God is love” (1 John 4:16). If love is defined as “that which wills the good of its object,” then God is good. Indeed, He is goodness itself; God, truly, is all-good (or “omnibenevolent”). Biblically, the basic Hebrew term for “love” (chesed), used of God, means “lovingkindness” or “tender lovingkindness.” The Greek word agape, used of God’s love, means “selfless” or “sacrificial” love.

“The LORD appeared to us in the past, saying: ‘I have loved you with an everlasting love; I have drawn you with loving-kindness’” (Jer. 31:3). “The LORD your God is with you, he is mighty to save. He will take great delight in you, he will quiet you with his love, he will rejoice over you with singing” (Zeph. 3:17). “God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life” (John 3:16). “God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us” (Rom. 5:5). “God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8).

“Because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ” (Eph. 2:4–5). “[I want you] to know this love that surpasses knowledge—that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God” (Eph. 3:19). “Live a life of love, just as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us as a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God” (Eph. 5:2). “How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!” (1 John 3:1). “This is how we know what love is: Jesus Christ laid down his life for us. And we ought to lay down our lives for our brothers” (1 John 3:16).

Dear friends, let us love one another, for love comes from God. Whoever does not love does not know God, because God is love. This is how God showed his love among us: He sent his one and only Son into the world that we might live through him. This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins. (1 John 4:7–10)

Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres. Love never fails.... And now these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love. (1 Cor. 13:4–8, 13)

Sin Is Being Unloving

If God, our ultimate moral standard, is love, then to be unloving is sin. Indeed, Jesus said that love is the greatest moral good (Matt. 22:37), and He added, “You have heard that it was said, ‘Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.’ But I tell you: Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you” (Matt. 5:43–44). The law said, “Do not hate your brother in your heart” (Lev. 19:17). Those who do not love their fellow believers do not love God, because “if anyone says, ‘I love God,’ yet hates his brother, he is a liar. For anyone who does not love his brother, whom he has seen, cannot love God, whom he has not seen” (1 John 4:20).

God Is Truth

The Hebrew word for truth (emeth) means “firm,” “stable,” “faithful,” “reliable,” “correct.” The Greek word for truth (aletheia) means “truthful,” “dependable,” “upright,” “real.” Truth, as taught in Scripture, means “that which, because it corresponds to reality (the facts, the original), is reliable, faithful, and stable.” Used of words, truth is telling it like it is. True statements are those that correspond to reality, and hence are dependable.

By contrast, falsehood is telling it like it is not (1 John 2:21), and therefore is not reliable. False expressions do not correspond to reality. The devil is the father of all lies (John 8:44); God, on the other hand, cannot lie (2 Cor. 1:18; Titus 1:2; Heb. 6:18), and His Word cannot pass away (Mark 13:31; cf. Ps. 117:2).

God by His very nature is truthfulness. Creatures have truth, but God is truth: “[He is] ... a God of truth” (Deut. 32:4 KJV). “God is not a man, that he should lie, nor a son of man, that he should change his mind. Does he speak and then not act? Does he promise and not fulfill?” (Num. 23:19). “Redeem me, O LORD, the God of truth” (Ps. 31:5). “The word of the LORD is right and true; he is faithful in all he does” (Ps. 33:4). “I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me” (John 14:6). “The Spirit of truth ... will testify about me” (John 15:26).

“You turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God” (1 Thess. 1:9). “God did this so that, by two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we who have fled to take hold of the hope offered to us may be greatly encouraged” (Heb. 6:18). “This is how we recognize the Spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood” (1 John 4:6). Because God is truthful, we can trust His promises (Ps. 89:35), we can be assured of our salvation (2 Tim. 2:13), we are protected (Ps. 91:4), we are saved (Eph. 1:13), we are sanctified (2 Thess. 2:13), we are liberated (John 8:32), and we are established forever (Ps. 117:2).

Sin Is Being Untruthful

Again, if God’s nature as truth is the ultimate standard of righteousness, then to be untruthful is sin. Thus, the Bible exhorts us to always speak the truth (Eph. 4:25), to walk in His truth (Ps. 86:11), to serve Him in truth (1 Sam. 12:24), to diligently study His truth (2 Tim. 2:15; John 17:17), to worship Him in truth (John. 4:24), and to pray to be led in truth (Ps. 25:5).

Lying is sinful and is pointedly forbidden in the Ten Commandments: “Thou shalt not bear false witness” (Ex. 20:16 KJV). The Bible commands us, “Do not lie to each other, since you have taken off your old self with its practices” (Col. 3:9). Liars eventuate in eternal judgment: “Those who practice magic arts, the idolaters and all liars—their place will be in the fiery lake of burning sulphur” (Rev. 21:8).

AN OBJECTION TO THE DOCTRINE OF HUMAN SINFULNESS

There is a significant objection to this doctrine of human sinfulness: It is alleged that such a high and lofty standard is impossible for human beings to attain.

The Objection Stated—Avoiding Sin Appears to Be Impossible

In the light of God’s absolute standard of perfection, it is argued that it is irrational to demand that mortal human beings comply. In effect, God is commanding the impossible and then blaming humans for not being able to measure up.

A Response to the Objection

In the first place, Adam was created with the ability to adhere to this standard of absolute perfection by his divine endowment of original righteousness. As previously established, he was not tempted on ordinary moral matters but rather on whether he would obey God because God said that he must.<sup>22</sup> Before the Fall, then, humans were capable, in and of themselves, of living up to God’s absolute standard of moral perfection. If they had not been given this ability, God could be charged with making imperfect creatures.

Further, even after the Fall, God could not have lowered or diminished the ultimate moral standard—His very nature, which He cannot change (Heb. 6:18; 2 Tim. 2:13). Being holiness itself, He cannot even look on sin (Hab. 1:13), and as it violates His very essence and thus the essence of reality and truth, sin absolutely cannot go unnoticed or unpunished before Him.

How, then, is it fair or just for God to demand of us, in our sinful state, what is impossible? The answer lies in His enabling grace. It is impossible for us to please God in our sinful flesh. “All our righteous acts are like filthy rags” (Isa. 64:6), and “he saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy” (Titus 3:5). Paul declared, “I know that nothing good lives in me, that is, in my sinful nature. For I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out” (Rom. 7:18). Indeed, Jesus said, “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15:5 NKJV).

What we cannot do in our own strength, though, we can do by the Lord’s grace: “It is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose” (Phil. 2:13). Paul said, “I can do everything through him who gives me strength” (Phil. 4:13).

No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it. (1 Cor. 10:13)

Consequently, even in our fallen state it is possible to live a holy life—which is developed in us when we accept the enabling and saving grace of God. God never commands what is actually impossible; to suggest otherwise is to attribute irrationality to the ultimate Source of rationality itself. As we have seen, ought implies can—and we can, not in our own strength but by His grace.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF HUMAN SINFULNESS

Throughout the history of the Christian church, its great teachers have affirmed the awful nature of human sin in contrast to God’s wondrous perfection. The following citations illustrate the unity and continuity of their conviction regarding human depravity, stressing its nature as based upon free action, and its corruption (or privation) of the perfect good that God created.

Early Fathers

The biblical teaching on the nature of sin was carried on in the writings of the early Fathers.

Clement of Alexandria (150–c. 215)

Man directs the voluntary motions of his own actions. And thus there are some things which have been created for this end, that in their services they should be subject to necessity, and should be unable to do aught else than what has been assigned to them; and when they have accomplished this service, the Creator of all things, who . . . arranged them according to His will, preserves them. But there are other things, in which there is a power of will, and which have a free choice of doing what they will. These, as I have said, do not remain always in that order in which they were created, but according as their will leads them, and the judgment of their mind inclines them, they effect either good or evil; and therefore He hath proposed rewards to those who do well, and penalties to those who do evil. (ROC in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, VIII.3.24)

Some things, as we have said, He [God] has so willed to be, that they cannot be otherwise than as they are ordained by Him; and to these He has assigned neither rewards nor punishments; but those which He has willed to be so that they have it in their power to do what they will, He has assigned to them according to their actions and their wills, to earn either rewards or punishments. Since, therefore, as I have informed you, all things that are moved are divided into two parts, according to the distinction that I formerly stated, everything that God wills is, and everything that He wills not is not. (ROC in ibid., VIII.3.25)

You will meet me by saying, “Even if it has come to this through freedom of will, was the Creator ignorant that those whom He created would fall away into evil? He ought therefore not to have created those who, He foresaw, would deviate from the path of righteousness.”

Now we tell those who ask such questions that the purpose of assertions of the sort made by us is to show why the wickedness of those who as yet were not [created], did not prevail over the goodness of the Creator. For if, wishing to fill up the number and measure of His creation, He had been afraid of the wickedness of those who were to be, and like one who could find no other way of remedy and cure, except only this, that He should refrain from His purpose of creating, lest the wickedness of those who were to be should be ascribed to Him; what else would this show but unworthy suffering and unseemly feebleness on the part of the Creator, who should so fear the actings of those who as yet were not [created], that He refrained from His purposed creation? (ROC in ibid.)

By the freedom of the will, every man, while he is unbelieving in regard to things to come, by evil deeds runs into evils. And these are the things in the world which seem to be done contrary to order, which owe their existence to unbelief. Therefore the dispensation of divine providence is [in addition] to be admired, which [was granted] to those men in the beginning, walking in the good way of life, to enjoy incorruptible good things; but when they sinned, they gave birth to evil by sin. (ROC in ibid., VIII.8.51)

Behold, [the heretics] say, how He acknowledges Himself to be the creator of evil in the passage “It is I who create evil” [Isa. 45:7]. They take a word whose one form reduces to confusion and ambiguity two kinds of evils (because both sins and punishments are called evils), and will have Him in every passage to be understood as the creator of all evil things, in order that He may be designated the author of evil.

We, on the contrary, distinguish between the two meanings of the word in question, and, by separating evils of sin from penal evils, mala culpae from mala poenae, confine to each of the two classes its own author—the devil as the author of the sinful evils (culpae), and God as the creator of penal evils (poenae); so that the one class shall be accounted as morally bad, and the other be classed as the operations of justice passing penal sentences against the evils of sin. Of the latter class of evils which are compatible with justice, God is therefore avowedly the creator. (FBAM in ibid., III.2.2.2.14)

Medieval Fathers

Beginning with Augustine and concluding with Thomas Aquinas, the great theologians of the Middle Ages stressed the same themes of the nature of evil as a privation of the good natures God had made brought about by granting free will to His creatures.

Augustine (354–430)

That the whole human race has been condemned in its first origin, this life itself, if life it is to be called, bears witness by the host of cruel ills with which it is filled. Is not this proved by the profound and dreadful ignorance which produces all the errors that enfold the children of Adam, and from which no man can be delivered without toil, pain, and fear? Is it not proved by [man’s] love of so many vain and hurtful things, which produces gnawing cares, disquiet, griefs, fears, wild joys, quarrels, lawsuits, wars, treasons, angers, hatreds, deceit, flattery, fraud, theft, robbery, perfidy, pride, ambition, envy, murders, parricides, cruelty, ferocity, wickedness, luxury, insolence, impudence, shamelessness, fornications, adulteries, incests, and the numberless uncleannesses and unnatural acts of both sexes? (C, 22.22)

Neither are we to suppose that because sin shall have no power to delight ... [that] free will must be withdrawn. It will, on the contrary, be all the more truly free, because [they will be] set free from delight in sinning to take unfailing delight [in God's goodness] in not sinning. For the first freedom of will which man received when he was created upright consisted in an ability not to sin, but also in an ability to sin; whereas this last freedom of will shall be superior, inasmuch as it shall not be able to sin. This, indeed, shall not be a natural ability, but the gift of God. For it is one thing to be God, [and it is] another thing to be a partaker of God. God by nature cannot sin, but the partaker of God receives this inability from God. (CG, XXII, 30)

Our first parents fell into open disobedience because already they were secretly corrupted; for the evil act [would] never [have] been done had not an evil will preceded it. And what is the origin of our evil will but pride? For "pride is the beginning of sin" (C, 14.13).

The will which cleaves to the unchangeable good that is common to all, obtains man's first and best good things though it is itself only an intermediate good. But the will which turns from the unchangeable and common good and turns to its own private good or to anything exterior or inferior, sins. (OFW, 2.53)

What cause of willing can there be which is prior to willing? Either it is a will, in which case we have not got beyond the root of evil will, or it is not a will, and in that case there is no sin in it. Either, then, will is itself the first cause of sin, or the first cause is without sin. (ibid., 3.49)

"The absence of good, taken in a privative [negative] sense, is an evil; as, for instance, the privation of sight is called blindness" (ST, 48.3).

Evil ... is the privation of good, which chiefly and of itself consists in perfection and act. Act, however, is twofold; first, and second. The first act is the form and integrity of a thing; the second act is its operation. Therefore evil also is twofold. In one way it occurs by the subtraction of the form, or of any part required for the integrity of the thing, as blindness is an evil, as also it is an evil to be wanting in any member of the body. (ibid., 48.4)

The Reformation Leaders

While the Reformers stressed the extent and depth of human depravity, as well as its absolute irredeemability apart from God's grace, the roots for their emphases were taken from the great medieval teachers before them, particularly Augustine.

Martin Luther (1483–1546)

No suffering in a man's experience, be it never so severe, can be the greatest of the evils that are within him. So many more and far greater evils are there within him than any that he feels. And if he were to feel those, he would feel the pains of hell, for he holds a hell within himself. Do you ask how this can be? The Prophet says, "All men are liars"; and again, "Every man at his best state is altogether vanity." But to be a liar and vanity is to be without truth and reality; and to be without truth and reality is to be without God and to be nothing; and this is to be in hell and damned. Therefore, when God in His mercy chastens us, He reveals to us and lays upon us only the lighter evils; for if He were to lead us to the full knowledge of our evil, we should straightway perish. (WL, I.115)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

Original sin, then, may be defined a hereditary corruption and depravity of our nature, extending to all the parts of the soul, which first makes us obnoxious to the wrath of God, and then produces in us works which in Scripture are termed works of the flesh. This corruption is repeatedly designated by Paul by the term sin (Gal. 5:19), while the works which proceed from it, such as adultery, fornication, theft, hatred, murder, revellings, he terms, in the same way, the fruits of sin, though in various passages of Scripture, and even by Paul himself, they are also termed sins. (ICR, II.1.8)

Philip Melancthon (1497–1560)

It is very necessary to recognize that sin is not caused by God. God has no pleasure in it, does not will it, and does nothing to effect it; he neither compels nor drives anyone to sin. On the contrary, he is an earnest enemy and punisher of sin. Man's will and the devil's will are the sources of sin! First the devils and then men themselves, of their own free wills, unforced by God, departed from God and fell into sin. (OCD, 45)

Post-Reformation Teachers

The results of the teaching of the Reformation continue on into the contemporary world, stressing the heinous nature of sin, resulting from the misuse of Adamic freedom, which polluted the bloodstream of all humankind.

Charles Hodge (1797–1878)

The effects of sin upon our first parents themselves, were, (1) Shame, a sense of degradation and pollution. (2) Dread of the displeasure of God; or, a sense of guilt, and the consequent desire to hide from his presence. These effects were unavoidable. They prove the loss not only of innocence but of original righteousness, and with it of the favour and fellowship of God. The state therefore to which Adam was reduced by his disobedience, so far as his subjective condition is concerned, was analogous to that of the fallen angels. He was entirely and absolutely ruined. It is said that no man becomes thoroughly depraved by one transgression. In one sense this is true. But one transgression by incurring the wrath and curse of God and the loss of fellowship with Him, as effectually involves spiritual death, as one perforation of the heart causes the death of the body; or one puncture of the eyes involves us in perpetual darkness. (ST, II.VII)

William G. T. Shedd (1820–1894)

The tendency to sin implies that the origination or self-determining power has been inwardly exerted, though it may not have been externally. A tendency to sin is an inclination to sin. It is a propensity of the heart, and a disposition of the will. The possibility of sinning is innocent; the tendency to sin is sinful. (DT, II.IV.150n)

Millard Erickson (b. 1932)

Our sinful nature does not only affect us as individuals, but it affects our relationships as well. We become competitive, and want someone else's car, wife or husband, or house. We get to the point where we cannot empathize with others because the only thing we are concerned about is ourselves. We reject authority, because we must be free to do what we want to do. We become unable to love others, because if all we are is self-seeking, then even helping someone else out should only be done for the sake of making us look good. (CT, 615–19)

CONCLUSION

The originally created conditions for and in humankind, designed by God, were perfect. However, by an illicit usage of free choice, sin made its entrance into the world, leaving a ghastly marring of God's unblemished creation. The subsequent state of human sinfulness left Adam's race humanly (but not divinely) irreparable. When this fallen condition is viewed in the light of God's absolutely perfect nature—the ultimate standard of purity and holiness—the stark contrast reveals a horrible picture of human depravity.

Human beings are totally depraved; that is, sin extends to every part of human nature, including body and soul, mind, will, and emotion. No facet of our being is immune to sin's pervasive influence. However, while total depravity is extensive, extending to every part of a human being, nonetheless, it is not intensive, for it does not destroy a person's humanness. If it did, he would not be able to think, feel, or choose; without rational and volitional capability, a person would not be able to sin.

Fallen human beings are clearly in the image of God (Gen. 9:6; James 3:9), an image effaced but not erased by sin. While humans are totally incapable of initiating or attaining salvation on their own, they are capable of rejecting it (John 3:18, 36; cf. Rom. 1:18). And, as we will see, they are capable, under the pervasive influence of the Holy Spirit, of accepting the gospel and being saved.

CHAPTER FIVE

THE EFFECTS OF SIN

THE EFFECTS OF SIN ON ADAM AND EVE

God created the first human beings in a state of perfection (see chapter 1). One of the perfections God gave was the power of free choice (see chapter 2). Adam and Eve exercised this freedom to disobey God (see chapter 3). What followed this wrong use of free will was a state of human sinfulness that we cannot reverse (see chapter 4).

As we shall see here in chapter 5, the disobedience of the original humans brought death into the world. There are three kinds of death: spiritual, physical, and eternal. Adam and Eve died spiritually the moment they sinned. They also began to die physically that very day. Had Adam and Eve not accepted God's provision of salvation,<sup>2</sup> they would have eventually died eternally, which would have meant everlasting separation from God.

Spiritual Death

Death is separation from God, and spiritual death is spiritual separation from God. Isaiah said, "Your iniquities have separated you from your God; your sins have hidden his face from you, so that he will not hear" (Isa. 59:2). The instant Adam sinned, he experienced spiritual isolation from God; this is evidenced by his shame and his hiding from his Creator.

Then the eyes of both of them were opened, and they realized they were naked; so they sewed fig leaves together and made coverings for themselves. Then the man and his wife heard the sound of the LORD God as he was walking in the garden in the cool of the day, and they hid from the LORD God among the trees of the garden. (Gen. 3:7–8)

Every descendant of Adam—every person born of natural parents since the Fall—is spiritually dead as well.

As for you, you were dead in your transgressions and sins.... [We who are saved have been] made ... alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. (Eph. 2:1, 5)

Thus, Jesus said to Nicodemus,

I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again.... No one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit. Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, "You must be born again" (John 3:3, 5–7).

The new birth of which Jesus speaks is the act of regeneration, whereby God imparts spiritual life to the believer's soul (1 Peter 1:23). Paul says of this,

He saved us through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit, whom he poured out on us generously through Jesus Christ our Savior, so that, having been justified by his grace, we might become heirs having the hope of eternal life. (Titus 3:5–7)

Without this regeneration, every human being is spiritually dead in sin.

Physical Death

After creating Adam, “the LORD God commanded the man, ‘You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die’ ” (Gen. 2:16–17). The very moment Adam partook of the forbidden fruit, he began to die physically, despite the lie of Satan that “you will not surely die” (Gen 3:4).

Physical death is the inevitable result of Adam’s sin not only for himself but for all of his natural descendants (except Christ):

Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned [in Adam] ... death reigned from the time of Adam to the time of Moses, even over those who did not sin by breaking a command, as did Adam, who was a pattern of the one to come [Jesus]. (Rom. 5:12, 14)

Eternal Death

Had Adam not accepted God’s provision of salvation (Gen. 3:15–24), he would have eventually experienced “the second death,” which is eternal separation from God. John wrote of this, saying, “The lake of fire is the second death. If anyone’s name [is] not found written in the book of life, he [will be] thrown into the lake of fire” (Rev. 20:14–15). Those who are born only once (physically) will die twice (physically and eternally); however, those who are born twice (physically and spiritually) will die only once (physically). Jesus said, “Whoever lives and believes in me will never die” (John 11:26).

THE EFFECTS OF SIN ON ADAM’S DESCENDANTS

Adam’s sin affected not only himself but also all of his offspring—all of us have sinned “through one man” (Rom. 5:12). All of Adam’s descendants were present in him potentially, seminally, and/or legally (judicially), since as the head of the race he was our legal representative (Rom. 5:18–21).

The Judicial (Legal) Effects of Adam’s Sin

As our legal representative, Adam sinned on our behalf, and we received the legal consequences of his choice. In other words, Adam had the God-given power of attorney for the whole human race, and when he exercised it for ill, the consequences of his sin were directly imputed to all of his posterity—which is all of us. Paul says,

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass [Adam’s sin] was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness [Christ’s death] was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man [Adam] the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man [Jesus] the many will be made righteous. (Rom. 5:18–19)

As legally or judicially, then, the consequences of Adam’s sin were imputed to all his natural offspring, we will later learn that Christ, “the last Adam” (1 Cor. 15:45), revoked what Adam did, making every human being legally and potentially savable.

Hence, all of us stand guilty before God because of what Adam did on our behalf; his sin on behalf of the race was imputed to the race. Clearly, the all (or many) were not made sinners actually, since they did not actually exist at that time. However, they were potentially and legally present in Adam, and, as such, received the imputation of the consequences of his sin.

The Transmissional Effects of Adam's Sin

Not only was the effect of Adam's sin (fallenness or depravity) imputed to his descendants directly and immediately, but it was also transmitted to us indirectly and mediately. Everyone who is naturally generated from Adam—every human—inherits a sinful nature from him. This is sometimes called the doctrine of “original sin” (or “inherited sin” [see Ps. 51:5]). Again, Paul confirms,

You were dead in your transgressions and sins.... All of us also lived among [the unsaved] at one time, gratifying the cravings of our sinful nature and following its desires and thoughts. Like the rest, we were by nature objects of wrath. (Eph. 2:1, 3)

We are sinners not only because we sin, but also because we were born sinners. Being sinners by nature, short of and without salvation, we inevitably are and do what comes naturally: We sin.

Just how this sinful nature is transmitted from parents to child is a subject of substantial theological debate. Undebatable, however, is the Bible's teaching that it is transmitted. The best explanation seems to come from the traducian view of the human soul's origin:

- (1) Since Adam's direct creation by God, each soul that comes into this world arrives by natural generation from his or her parents.
- (2) Surely God does not directly create fallen souls.
- (3) Just as certainly, each new soul is not created sinless; it is sinful from its conception.
- (4) The most reasonable conclusion appears to be that a sinful soul is transmitted from sinful parents by the natural process of conception.

The Relational Effects of Adam's Sin

Adam's sin also had an immediate effect upon his relationship with God, with other human beings, and with his environment.

The Effects of Sin on Relationship With God

Adam's fall affected his relationship with God in several ways.

Spiritual Separation

Death is separation, and spiritual death is spiritual separation from God. Consequently, by spiritual death, which occurred at the very moment he sinned, Adam lost his relationship with his Creator. Likewise, as we have seen, all his descendants are naturally “dead in trespasses and sins” (Eph. 2:1 KJV). Hence, without a new birth (John 3:3), also known as “regeneration” (Titus 3:5 KJV), no one can be saved.

However, spiritual death should not be misunderstood as referring to, for example, the notion of human beings so depraved that they have no capacity to understand and respond to God's message. In the very context of Paul's letter to the Ephesians, cited above, their salvation from spiritual death comes “through faith” (2:8–9).

Other figures of speech describing total depravity likewise imply that a sinner is not dead in the sense of not being able by God's grace to understand and accept salvation." For instance, the sinner is

- (1) polluted, in need of purification/cleansing;
- (2) sick, in need of healing; and
- (3) in the dark, in need of light.

Clearly a sick person is able to receive a cure, just as a dirty person can embrace cleansing and a person in the dark can accept light. In every case, the sinner is incapable of doing these things by himself (in his own strength); lacking spiritual life, he needs the aid of the grace of God. Total depravity, then, means "total inability to achieve/obtain the solution to our sin by ourselves," not "total inability to accept it from God."

Guilt and Shame

According to Romans 5, Adam's act of disobedience was a "sin," a "trespass," resulting in "condemnation" (vv. 12, 17, 18). It is in view of the law "that every mouth may be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God" (Rom. 3:19). Therefore, Adam's sin brought on him guilt, as well as the shame he expressed in view of it (Gen. 3:7).

Loss of Fellowship

Not only did Adam lose his relationship with God, he also lost his fellowship with Him. Adam no longer wanted to talk with his Creator but instead hid from Him in the Garden. John reminds us:

If we claim to have fellowship with him yet walk in the darkness, we lie and do not live by the truth. But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus, his Son, purifies us from all sin. (1 John 1:6–7)

The Effects of Sin on Relationship With Other Human Beings

Along with the loss of relationship (and fellowship) with God, the relationship between Adam and other people was also disturbed; sin has a horizontal as well as vertical effect, which is evident in two events that followed.

First, Adam blamed Eve for his situation. Responding to God's questioning about the forbidden fruit, he said, "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it" (Gen. 3:12).

Second, sibling relationship was disrupted by sin when, because of anger, Cain killed his brother Abel (Gen. 4:1–8).

The Effects of Sin on Relationship With the Environment

Adam's sin affected his relationship with God, other human beings, and the environment. Before the Fall, Adam and Eve were told to "subdue" the earth (Gen. 1:28); they were to "work" and "take care of" the Garden (Gen. 2:15), not destroy it; to rule over it, not ruin it; to cultivate it, not pollute it.

However, after the Fall, Adam's connection with his environment was disrupted. Thorns and thistles appeared. He had to work by the sweat of his brow. Death became a fact of life. Indeed, everything, because of his sin, was put under bondage. Paul writes:

The creation was subjected to frustration, not by its own choice, but by the will of the one who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself will be liberated from its bondage to decay and brought into the glorious freedom of the children of God. (Rom. 8:20–21)

The Volitional Effects of Adam's Sin

In addition to Adam's sin affecting his relationship with God, other human beings, and the environment, it also had an effect on his will.

Free Will Before the Fall

The power of free choice is part of humankind having been created in the image of God (Gen. 1:27). Adam and Eve were commanded to multiply their kind (1:28) and to refrain from eating the forbidden fruit (2:16–17). Both of these responsibilities imply the ability to respond. As noted above, the fact that they ought to do these things implied that they could do them.

The text narrates their choice, saying, “She took some and ate it. She also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate it” (Gen. 3:6). God's condemnation of their actions makes it evident that they were morally free to choose (Gen. 3:11, 13).

The New Testament references to Adam's action make it plain that he made a free choice for which he was responsible. Again, Romans 5 calls it “sin” (v. 16); a “trespass” (v. 15); and “disobedience” (v. 19). First Timothy 2:14 (RSV) refers to Eve as a “transgressor,” pointedly implying culpability.

Free Will After the Fall

Even after Adam sinned and became spiritually “dead” (Gen. 2:17; cf. Eph. 2:1) and thus, a sinner because of “[his] sinful nature” (Eph. 2:3), he was not so completely depraved that it was impossible for him to hear the voice of God or make a free response: “The LORD God called to the man, ‘Where are you?’ He answered, ‘I heard you in the garden, and I was afraid because I was naked; so I hid’ ” (Gen. 3:9–10). As already noted, God's image in Adam was effaced but not erased by the Fall; it was corrupted (damaged) but not eliminated (annihilated). Indeed, the image of God (which includes free will) is still in human beings—this is why the murder or cursing of anyone, Christian or non-Christian, is sin, “for in the image of God has God made man” (Gen. 9:6).

Fallen Descendants of Adam Have Free Will

Both Scripture and good reason inform us that depraved human beings have the power of free will. The Bible says that fallen humans are ignorant, depraved, and slaves of sin—all involving choice. Peter speaks of depraved ignorance as being “willingly” ignorant (2 Peter 3:5 KJV). Paul teaches that unsaved people perceive the truth, but they willfully “suppress” it (Rom. 1:18–19), so that they are, as a result, “without excuse” (v. 20). He adds, “Don't you know that when you offer your selves to someone to obey him as slaves, you are slaves to the one whom you obey?” (Rom. 6:16). Even our spiritual blindness is a result of the choice not to believe.

With respect to initiating or attaining salvation, both Martin Luther and John Calvin were right—fallen humans are not free with regard to “things above.” Salvation is received by a free act of faith (John 1:12; Eph. 2:8–9), yet it does not find its source in our will but in God (John 1:13; Rom. 9:16). With respect to the freedom of accepting God’s gift of salvation, the Bible is clear: fallen beings have the ability to so do, since God’s Word repeatedly calls upon us to receive salvation by exercising our faith (cf. Acts 16:31; 17:30; 20:21).

Thus, the free will of fallen human beings is both “horizontal” (social) with respect to this world and “vertical” (spiritual) with respect to God. The horizontal freedom is evident, for instance, in our choice of a mate: “If her husband dies, she is free to marry anyone she wishes, but he must belong to the Lord” (1 Cor. 7:39). This freedom is described as having “no constraint,” a freedom where one has “authority over his own will” and where one “has decided this in his own heart” (v. 37 NASB). This is also described in an act of giving “entirely on their own” (2 Cor. 8:3) as well as being “spontaneous and not forced” (Philem. 14).

The vertical freedom to believe is everywhere implied in the gospel call (e.g., cf. John 3:16; Acts 16:31; 17:30). That is, humans are offered salvation as a gift (Rom. 6:23) and called upon to believe it and accept it (John 1:12). Never does the Bible say, “Be saved in order to believe”; instead, repeatedly, it commands, “Believe in order to be saved.” Peter describes what is meant by free choice in saying that it is “not under compulsion” but “voluntarily” (1 Peter 5:2 NASB). Paul depicts the nature of freedom as an act where one “purposed in his heart” and does not act “under compulsion” (2 Cor. 9:7 NASB). In Philemon 14 he also says that choice is an act of “consent” and should “not be ... by compulsion, but of your own free will” (NASB).

Unsaved people have a free choice regarding the reception or rejection of God’s gift of salvation (Rom. 6:23). Jesus lamented the state of those who rejected Him: “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem ... how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing” (Matt. 23:37). John affirmed, “All who received him [Christ], to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God” (John 1:12). Indeed, as we have frequently observed, God desires that all unsaved people will change their mind (i.e., repent), for “he is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance” (2 Peter 3:9).

Like the alternatives of life and death that Moses gave to Israel, God says, “Choose life” (cf. Deut. 30:19). Joshua said to his people: “Choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve” (Josh. 24:15). God sets morally and spiritually responsible alternatives before human beings, leaving the choice and responsibility to them. Jesus said to the unbelievers of His day: “If you do not believe that I am ... you will indeed die in your sins” (John 8:24), which implies they could have and should have believed.

Over and over, “belief” is declared to be something we are accountable to embrace: “We believe and know that you are the Holy One of God” (John 6:69); “Who is he, sir?... Tell me so that I may believe in him” (John 9:36); “Then the man said, ‘Lord, I believe,’ and he worshiped him” (John 9:38); “Jesus answered, ‘I did tell you, but you do not believe’” (John 10:25). This is why Jesus said, “Whoever believes in [me] is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God’s one and only Son” (John 3:18).

The General Effects of Sin and Common Grace

The effects of sin on fallen human beings are so great that without God’s common grace (i.e., His nonsaving grace that is available to all persons), society would be unlivable and salvation unattainable. Without common grace:

- (1) The judicial effects of sin (Rom. 5:12–21) would produce overwhelming guilt.
- (2) The blinding effects of sin (2 Cor. 4:4) would make it impossible for us to recognize evil as such.
- (3) The deceiving effects of sin (Jer. 17:9) would make rational thought and action virtually impossible.
- (4) The debasing effects of sin (Rom. 1:21–32) would be destructive of self and others.
- (5) The corrupting effects of sin (Eph. 2:1–3) would produce moral decay that would dominate society.
- (6) The debilitating effects of sin (Rom. 3:10–18) would make the performance of social good unachievable, (cf. Radmacher, S, 80)

It is God's common grace to unsaved persons that makes living in this corrupt world possible. This common grace is provided through His natural revelation (Rom. 1:19–20), through the moral law written on human hearts (Rom. 2:12–15), through His image (Gen. 9:6; James 3:9), through marriage (Heb. 13:4), through the family structure (Eph. 6:1–4), through human government (Rom. 13:1–7), and through many other nonredemptive means.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR HUMAN SIN AND HUMAN FREE WILL

Early Fathers

That human beings have free will was held by the great Fathers of the Christian church.

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

Vain, too, are Marcion and his followers when they seek to exclude Abraham from the inheritance, to which the Spirit through many men, and now by Paul, bears witness, that “he believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness” (AH, I. 4.8.1 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1:470).

Origen (c. 185–c. 254)

We hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law.... If an example is required, I think it must suffice to mention the thief on the cross, who asked Christ to save him and was told: “Truly, this day you will be with me in paradise” [Luke 23:43] (CR, 3.28).

Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 315–c. 387)

Just as a writing-pen or a dart has need of one to employ it, so also does grace have need of believing hearts.... It is God's part to confer grace, but yours to accept and guard it. (CL, I.1)

Ambrose (339–397)

“For what does the Scripture say? ‘Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness.’ ” Abraham believed God. Let us also believe, so that we who are the heirs of his race may likewise be heirs of his faith. (ODHBS, 2.89 in Oden, FC, 22:236, as cited in ACCS, 6:111)

In order to stop anyone from asking: “How can we be saved without contributing anything at all to our salvation?” Paul shows that in fact we do contribute a great deal toward it—we supply our faith! (HE in Schaff, NPNF, 1.11.377, as cited in ibid., 6:100)

So that you may not be elated by the magnitude of these benefits, see how Paul put you in your place. For “by grace you are saved,” he says, “through faith,” then, so as to do no injury to free will, he allots a role to us, then takes it away again, saying “and this not of ourselves” (HE, 2:8 in IOEP, 2:160, as cited in Oden, JR, 44).

Ambrosiaster (c. fourth century)

“They are justified freely, because they have not done anything nor given anything in return, but by faith alone they have been made holy by the gift of God” (CSEL, 81, ad loc in Oden, ACCSNT, 6:101, as cited in ibid., 108).

Medieval Fathers

The teachers of the Middle Ages were no less definite with this message, carrying on the salvific tradition from both the apostles and the patristics.

Jerome (c. 340–420)

“Paul shows clearly that righteousness depends not on the merit of man, but on the grace of God, who accepts the faith of those who believe, without the works of the Law” (EG, 1.2.16 in Oden, FC, 53:306, as cited in ibid., 6:106).

Augustine (354–430)

God is said to be “our Helper”; but nobody can be helped who does not make some effort of his own accord. For God does not work out salvation in us as if he were working in insensate stones, or in creatures in whom nature has placed neither reason nor will. (OFSB, 2.28)

Theodoret of Cyrrhus (c. 393–c. 466)

“The Lord Christ is both God and the mercy seat, both the priest and the lamb, and he performed the work of our salvation by his blood, demanding only faith from us” (ILR, 82, ad loc as cited in Oden, ACCS, 6:102).

Anselm (1033–1109)

This is the question which you ought to ask those in whose behalf you are speaking, who have no faith in the need for Christ for man’s salvation, and you should also request them to tell how man can be saved without Christ.... And if this terrifies them, let them believe in Christ as we do, that they may be saved. (CDH, I.XXIV)

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274)

This salvation of grace is by faith in Christ. In the justification of an adult who has sinned, the movement of faith toward God coincides with the infusion of grace. “Thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace” [Luke 8:48 KJV] (CE, 95).

Of course, grace is necessary to aid the will. So, any human act, then, that is under the control of free will, can be meritorious, if it is directed towards God. Now, to believe is an act of mind assenting to the divine truth by virtue of the command of the will as it is moved by God through grace; in this way the act stands under the control of free will and is directed toward God. (ST, 2a2ae.2, 9)

Reformation Leaders

The main point of the Reformation was, at its heart, that “the just shall live by faith—and faith alone.” Therefore, the exercise of faith is the one condition (action) necessary for a person to receive justification before God. Nevertheless, both ironically and contradictorily, Martin Luther (1483–1546) insisted, against the mainstream of fifteen hundred years of church teaching and history, that a free act of belief is not a condition for receiving salvation at all. Rather, he argued that “this is plainly to ascribe divinity to ‘free will,’ for to will to embrace the Law and the Gospel ... belongs to the power of God alone” (BW, sect. 44, final emphasis original).

Addressing John’s statement that a man must “receive” Christ (John 1:12), Luther contended,

This man is merely passive (as the term is used), nor does he do anything, but is wholly mad; and John is speaking of being made; he saith we are made the sons of God by a power given unto us from above, not by the power of “free will” inherent in ourselves, (ibid., 74)

He added,

How could reason then think that faith in Jesus as the Son of God and man was necessary, when even at this day it could neither receive nor believe it? ... so far is it from possibility that it should either will it, or believe it. (ibid.)

Luther was not timid in carrying his view to its logical conclusion, namely, that even evil men are caused to act by God:

He uses evil instruments, which cannot escape the sway and motion of [His] omnipotence.... Hence it is, that the wicked man cannot but always err and sin; because, being carried along by the motion of the Divine Omnipotence, he is not permitted to remain motionless, but must will, desire, and act according to his nature. All this is fixed certainty, if we believe that God is Omnipotent! (ibid., 84)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

Calvin also swam against the current of church history when he argued that faith is a gift of God only to the elect, who make no free decision to accept or reject it. He acknowledged the same when he wrote of God’s alleged influence on the human will:

This movement of the will is not of that description which was for many ages taught and believed—viz., a movement which thereafter leaves us the choice to obey or resist it—but one which affects us efficaciously. We must, therefore, repudiate the oft-repeated sentiment of Chrysostom, “Whom he draws, he draws willingly;” insinuating that the Lord only stretches out his hand, and waits to see whether we will be pleased to take his aid. We grant that, as man was originally constituted [before the Fall], he could incline to either side, but since he has taught us by his example how miserable a thing free will is if God works not in us to will and to do, of what use to us were grace imparted in such scanty measure? (ICR, 260–61)

Interestingly, both Calvin and Luther admitted that their views left some nagging questions. Calvin wrote:

Perseverance is the gift of God, which he does not lavish promiscuously on all, but imparts to whom he pleases. If it is asked how the difference arises—why some steadily persevere, and others prove deficient in steadfastness—we can give no other reason than that the Lord, by his mighty power, strengthens and sustains [those who persevere], so that they perish not, while he does not furnish the same assistance to [those who do not], but leaves them to be monuments of instability, (ibid., 275)

Luther confessed:

Why does He not then change, in His motion, those evil wills which He moves? This belongs to those secrets of Majesty, where “His judgments are past finding out.” Nor is it ours to search into, but to adore these mysteries. (BW, 88)

The answer, in reality, is that there isn’t a need to ask these questions. Whatever God does is right by definition. Luther’s own words, however, contradict this truth: “What God wills is not therefore right because He ought or ever was bound so to will; but on the contrary, what takes place is therefore right, because He so wills” (ibid., emphasis added). This radical voluntarism (as opposed to essentialism) is addressed in chapter 12

ANSWERING EXTREME CALVINISM ON HUMAN FREE WILL

Can Everyone Believe?

Contrary to the extreme Calvinist view, faith is not a gift that God offers only to some (“the elect”). All are responsible to believe, and whoever decides to believe can believe: Jesus said, “Everyone who believes in [me] will not perish but have eternal life” (John 3:16 NLT). He added, “Whoever believes in [me] is not condemned” (v. 18).

Some, however, have objected that if everyone (or anyone) can believe, then how can John 12:37–40 be explained?

Even after Jesus had done all these miraculous signs in their presence, they still would not believe in him. This was to fulfill the word of Isaiah the prophet: “Lord, who has believed our message and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?” For this reason they could not believe, because, as Isaiah says elsewhere: “He has blinded their eyes and deadened their hearts, so they can neither see with their eyes, nor understand with their hearts, nor turn—and I would heal them.”<sup>34</sup>

The answer is found in the context.

First, belief was obviously their responsibility, since God held them responsible for not believing. As John himself records, “They still would not believe in him.”

Second, Jesus was speaking to hardhearted Jews, people who had seen numerous indisputable miracles and who had been called upon repeatedly, before this point, to believe (cf. John 8:24–26). This manifests the fact that they were able to do so.

Third, and finally, it was their own stubborn unbelief that caused their blindness. Jesus had already said to them, “If you do not believe that I am the one I claim to be, you will indeed die in your sins” (8:24). Thus, their blindness was chosen and avoidable.

Can Anyone Believe Unto Salvation Without God’s Special Grace?

Even though faith is possible for the unsaved, nonetheless, no one can believe unto salvation without the aid of God’s special grace. Jesus says, “No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him” (John 6:44). Paul adds, “By the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace to me was not without effect” (1 Cor. 15:10). Jesus promises, “My grace is sufficient for you” (2 Cor. 12:9). Paul confessed, “I can do everything through him who gives me strength” (Phil. 4:13). Indeed, David acknowledged to God, “Everything comes from you, and we have given you only what comes from your hand” (1 Chron. 29:14).

However, although no one can believe unto salvation without the aid of God’s saving grace, the gracious action by which we are saved is not monergistic (an act of God alone) but synergistic (an act of God and our free choice). Salvation comes from God, but it is received by our cooperation; as we have noted, His grace is not exercised on a passive object but on an active agent. Again, Augustine said,

God is said to be “our Helper”; but nobody can be helped who does not make some effort of his own accord. For God does not work out salvation in us as if he were working in insensate stones, or in creatures in whom nature has placed neither reason nor will. (OFSB, 2.28)

The difference between the extreme and moderate Calvinistic position on the need for God’s grace for our salvation can be summarized as follows:

THE RELATION OF GRACE AND FREE WILL

Position	Extreme Calvinism	Moderate Calvinism
Grace	Operative	Cooperative
Action	Monergistic	Synergistic
Recipient	Passive object	Active agent
Free act	No	Yes
Resistibility	Irresistible on the unwilling	Irresistible on the willing

SOVEREIGNTY AND FREE WILL?

God’s sovereignty and human freedom: Is it either one or the other, or is it both one and the other? The Bible says both. Earlier we saw that on the one hand God is sovereign over all things, including human events and choices. Nothing catches Him by surprise, and nothing is outside His control. On the other hand, in this chapter we have seen that human beings possess the God-given power of free will.<sup>38</sup> This applies to many earthly elements here “below” as well as to some heavenly elements from “above,” specifically our reception of God’s magnificent salvation.

The mystery of the relationship between divine sovereignty and human free will has challenged the greatest Christian thinkers down through the centuries. Unfortunately, some have purged human responsibility in order to seemingly preserve divine prerogative. Likewise, others have sacrificed God’s sovereignty in order to hold on to humanity’s free choice. Each of these alternatives is wrong and leads to subsequent error.

THE EFFECTS OF SIN ON ANGELS

While not resulting from Adam’s sin, nonetheless, evil had an effect on angels as well. As was shown earlier, angels sinned prior to the creation of humankind—Satan, the fallen angel Lucifer, was already on the scene and solidified in wickedness when Adam arrived (Gen. 3:1; cf. Rev. 12:9). While the sin of angels directly affects only themselves, by virtue of their presence in the world to tempt human beings into sin, Satan and all his demons have had an indirect effect on the sins of humans as well.

Angels Are Irredeemable by Choice

Paul, in speaking of Satan, who chose to rebel against God, commands that an elder should not be “a new convert, so that he will not become conceited and fall into the condemnation incurred by the devil” (1 Tim. 3:6 NASB). Jude 6 adds, “Angels who did not keep their own domain, but abandoned their proper abode, He has kept in eternal bonds under darkness for the judgment of the great day” (NASB).

Peter notes that “God did not spare angels when they sinned, but cast them into hell and committed them to pits of darkness, reserved for judgment” (2 Peter 2:4 NASB). As established previously, angels are never called upon to repent in the Bible, nor do they manifest any desire to do so. As C. S. Lewis said, for angels, “Their freedom is simply that of making a single naked choice—of loving God more than the self or the self more than God” (PP, 18, emphasis added). Thus, by the very nature of their freedom, angels are irredeemable once they have made their decision.

Angels Are Irredeemable by Nature

Like God, angels are immaterial, being pure spirits. Therefore, they have an invisible nature, though some angels have taken on physical forms and appeared to human beings (cf. Gen. 18; Josh. 5:13–15). Colossians 1:16 declares: “By Him all things were created, both in the heavens and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or rulers or authorities—all things have been created through Him and for Him” (NASB). Hebrews 1:14 calls angels “ministering spirits,” and in Luke 24:39 Jesus said that spirits do not have “flesh and bones” (NKJV).

Further, each angel is a species of its own—each is one of a kind, even though there are groups or classes (such as cherubim or seraphim). Unlike the human species, whose members can multiply, angels by nature are simple, created, and indivisible. They are not sexual beings, nor do they engage in marriage; hence, they can produce no offspring (Matt. 22:30). In Luke 20:35–36, Jesus said,

Those who are considered worthy of taking part in that [eternal] age and in the resurrection from the dead will neither marry nor be given in marriage, and they can no longer die; for they are like the angels. They are God’s children, since they are children of the resurrection.

Having a fixed nature from the moment of their creation, angels do not change. Unlike human beings, they do not grow up or grow old; they have no age, nor are they subject to any other kind of natural alteration. They thus have no accidents, and, hence, they cannot change accidentally. The only essential change they can undergo is creation or annihilation by God (if He chose to do so).

Since angels have no body, they are not subject to decay and death; they are immortal (Matt. 25:41). Since they cannot change, they are fixed in their nature; consequently, once an angel sins, he is doomed forever (2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). Indeed, the Bible says explicitly that Christ did not die to redeem angels: “It is not angels he helps, but Abraham’s descendants” (Heb. 2:16). Again, those angels who sinned are never called upon to repent, nor can they. Christ’s death is never presented as a means of their salvation but only of their condemnation: Jesus, “having disarmed the [spiritual] powers and authorities ... made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross” (Col. 2:15).

Like all of God’s creatures who possess both rationality and morality, angels were given a choice. And, like humans at the point of physical death (Heb. 9:27), once angels have made their final choice, it is eternally too late. Since by nature they cannot change, once they have made their decision, it is final, and they know it (Matt. 8:29).

Church Fathers on the Fall of Angels

The great ecclesiastical teachers, especially Augustine, Anselm, and Aquinas, have had much to say about the sin of angels.

Augustine on the Fall of Angels

Since these things are so, those spirits whom we call angels were never at any time or in any way darkness, but, as soon as they were made, were made light; yet they were not so created in order that they might exist and live in any way whatever, but were enlightened that they might live wisely and blessedly. Some of them, having turned away from this light, have not won this wise and blessed life, which is certainly eternal, and accompanied with the sure confidence of its eternity; but they have still the life of reason, though darkened with folly, and this they cannot lose even if they would [desire or aspire to do so]. (CG, 11)

That the contrary propensities in good and bad angels have arisen, not from a difference in their nature and origin, since God, the good Author and Creator of all essences, created them both, but from a difference in their wills and desires, it is impossible to doubt. While some steadfastly continued in that which was the common good of all, namely, in God Himself, and in His eternity, truth, and love; others, being enamored rather of their own power, as if they could be their own good, lapsed to this private good of their own, from that higher and beatific good which was common to all, and, bartering the lofty dignity of eternity for the inflation of pride, the most assured verity for the slyness of vanity, uniting love for factious partisanship, they became proud, deceived, envious, (ibid., 12.1)

There is, then, no natural efficient cause or, if I may be allowed the expression, no essential cause, of the evil will, since ... the will is made evil by nothing else than defection from God, a defection of which the cause, too, is certainly deficient, (ibid., 12.9)

Anselm on the Fall of Angels

As man must not be restored by a man of a different race, though of the same nature, so are not angels to be saved by any other angel, though all were of the same nature, for they are not like men, all of the same race. For all angels were not sprung from one, as all men were. (CDH, 2.21)

Further,

There is another objection to their restoration, viz., that as they fell with none to plot their fall, so they must rise with none to aid them; but this is impossible, [for] had they not sinned, they would have been confirmed in virtue without any foreign aid, simply by the power given to them from the first, (ibid.)

Thomas Aquinas on the Fall of Angels

An angel or any other rational creature, considered in his own nature, can sin.... Mortal sin occurs in two ways in the act of free choice. First, when something evil is chosen.... In another way, sin comes of free choice by electing something good in itself, but not according to the proper measure or rule [as angels did]. (ST, 1a.63.1)

A spiritual nature cannot be affected by such pleasures as pertain to bodies, but only such as can be found in spiritual beings.... But there can be no sin when anyone is incited to a good of the spiritual order, unless in such affection the rule of the superior be not kept. Such is precisely the sin of pride—not to be subject to the superior where subjection is due. Consequently the first sin of the angel can be none other than pride, (ibid., 1a.63.2)

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS ABOUT THE EFFECTS OF ANGELIC SIN

Many protests have been leveled at the above conclusions. The first, and one of the most perplexing, is about how sin could arise in a perfect creature.

Objection One—Based on the Perfect Nature of Lucifer

The Bible declares that God made all things perfect (Gen. 1:31; 1 Tim. 4:11), which would include the angel Lucifer, who became known as Satan. In God and in His heaven, there is no sin (Hab. 1:13; James 1:13), yet Lucifer sinned and rebelled against God (1 Tim. 3:6), leading a third of all the angels with him (Rev. 12:4). How could a perfect creature, made by a perfect God and placed in a perfect environment (heaven), commit evil? Sin could not have arisen from a perfect God, or from Lucifer's perfect environment, or from his perfect nature. Whence, then, sin?

Response to Objection One

Sin first arose in the universe from Lucifer's free will. As laid out before, God made perfect creatures and gave them both perfect natures and perfect freedom. With freedom, though it is good in itself, comes the ability to sin.

Creaturely freedom is good, but it does, by nature, contain the possibility of evil. God made Lucifer perfectly good; Lucifer was made evil by choosing it. God gave him the good fact of freedom; Lucifer performed the evil act of freedom. God provided the good power of free choice, but Lucifer performed the bad action of free choice.

Even the Calvinistic Westminster Confession of Faith (1648) acknowledged that some actions are not necessary or inevitable but instead arise from the secondary cause known as free will: “Neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established” (3.1). Hence, “God hath endued the will of man with the natural liberty that is neither forced nor any absolute necessity of nature determined to good or evil” (9.1).

Objection Two—Based on the Irredeemability of Angels

A third of the angels sinned and became demons (Rev. 12:4). When Adam sinned, he and his progeny were offered salvation (Gen. 3:15). What about angels? Can they be saved?

Response to Objection Two

The biblical answer is no.

First, the Scriptures say emphatically, “It is not angels he helps, but Abraham’s descendants” (Heb. 2:16). That is, Christ assumed human nature (v. 14), not angelic nature, to redeem human beings, not angels.

Second, the cross of Christ, which is declared to be the source of human salvation, is by contrast proclaimed to be the source of demons’ condemnation (Col. 2:14–15).

Third, the lost state of demons is always portrayed in the Bible as final and eternal (2 Peter 2:4; cf. Jude 6). Even they appear to recognize their everlasting doom; as one asked of Jesus, “Have You come here to torment us before the time?” (Matt. 8:29 NASB). Satan actually “knows that his time is short” (Rev. 12:12).

Fourth, and finally, Aquinas offers an explanation as to why angels are naturally irredeemable:

The angel’s apprehension differs from man’s in this respect, that by his intellect the angel apprehends immovably ... whereas man by his reason apprehends movably, proceeding discursively from one thing to another, and having the way open by which he may proceed to either of two opposites; whereas the angel’s will adheres fixedly and immovably. [In brief,] as Damascene [c. eighth century] says, “Death is to men what the fall is to the angels.” Now, it is clear that all the mortal sins of men, grave or less grave, are pardonable before death; whereas after death they are without remission, and endure forever. (ST, Ia.64.2)

Objection Three—Based on the Justice of Angelic Condemnation

It seems unfair to some that humans were given an opportunity for redemption after they fell, while angels were not. Why did God not offer salvation for them as well?

Response to Objection Three

In reply, we must observe several important facts.

First, angels, like humans, do have a choice in their destiny. They freely chose to rebel against God. They were not forced to do so; they were not doomed against their will but in accordance with their will.

Second, like humans, angels were doomed after their final choice. The only difference is that their first choice was also their last. Even as humans have a cut-off point (Heb. 9:27), angels too make a final decision.

Third, as noted above (by Aquinas), the very nature of angels makes their first choice final, for they are created simple beings who are by their very nature unchangeable (except by annihilation). Hence, once they make a choice to serve or rebel against God, it is permanent, one way or the other.

Fourth, and finally, unlike human beings, angels are never called upon to repent (Acts 17:30; 2 Peter 3:9). In short, what is a lifetime for us is an instant for an angel. Once their minds are freely made up, they are naturally immutable, and, since by nature they cannot change, there is no possibility of their redemption. God, knowing this, did not need to provide salvation for angels.

THE EXTENT OF SIN (DEPRAVITY): VARIOUS VIEWS

As observed above, humans—Adam and Eve after the Fall, as well as all of their natural descendants—are totally and wholly depraved. Just how far this depravity extends (and therefore what is meant by “total depravity”) has been a matter of theological dispute for centuries. A brief survey of the various views on total depravity will be helpful before making a determination.

Pelagianism

The Pelagian perspective on human depravity emanates from the British monk Pelagius (c. 354–c. 420), whose alleged views (and/or those of his followers) on the matter were condemned by the Council of Carthage (416–418). He and/or his followers held that human beings are born innocent, just as Adam was created. In this state they are able to obey God, since they inherit no sin from Adam and did not sin “in Adam” (cf. Rom. 5) but instead sin like Adam. The only thing, then, that Adam bequeathed to us is a bad example.

According to Pelagianism, only our own sins are imputed to us (rather than both our sins and Adam’s). Spiritual and eternal death can only be activated by one’s personal sins. Even our physical death is not the result of Adam’s sin, as his sin was not transmitted to us. Allegedly, humans were simply created mortal; the original image of God is untarnished from the time of creation, and no grace is needed for salvation, which can be attained by our unaided free choice.

Arminianism

This view gets its name from Jacob (James) Arminius (1560–1609), a Reformed theologian from Holland, although “Arminianism” also bears resemblance to a view called semi-Pelagianism. However, the popular version of what we know today as “Arminianism” springs from John Wesley (1703–1791) and is more properly called “Wesleyanism.”

Since subviews in the overall Arminian camp differ significantly, it is difficult to point to a single person who held to all the elements listed here. Even so, a general Arminian view of depravity, in contrast to Pelagianism, maintains that all people are born depraved and cannot on their own power obey God. Each human was either potentially or seminally in Adam when he chose evil, and, hence, he or she is born with a corrupt nature, under the stigma of Adam's sin.

Arminianism (Wesleyanism) believes that all human beings are born with both the bent toward sin and the unavoidability of physical death; and should they not repent of their sins, they will die eternally. The image of God in humans is so effaced that they need His grace to overcome it and to move in His direction, as He alone can save them. In contrast to the insistence of extreme Calvinism, however, God's grace does not work irresistibly on all (or on the elect only). Rather, God's grace works sufficiently on all, awaiting their free cooperation before it becomes savingly (salvifically) effective. H. Orton Wiley (1877–1961) was a theologian in the Arminian (Wesleyan) tradition, as was Richard Watson (1781–1833) before him.

Moderate Calvinism

Unlike Arminianism, moderate Calvinism holds that we inherit a judicial guilt from Adam's sin and that we are legally (and/or naturally) connected to him. As a result of Adam's choice for evil, all human beings, apart from salvation, suffer spiritual death and will undergo both physical and eternal death. Further, God's grace is not merely sufficient for all; it is efficient for the elect. In order for God's grace to be effective, there must be cooperation by the recipient on whom God has moved.

In common with strong Calvinism, moderate Calvinism maintains that all human beings sinned in Adam, either legally or naturally, and that we all inherit a sinful nature—Adam's guilt is imputed to all his posterity. This guilt can only be overcome by God's saving grace, which, according to moderate Calvinism, is irresistible only on the willing.

Strong Calvinism

Strong Calvinism is on the opposite pole from Pelagianism; it affirms that we are not only born depraved but that we are also totally depraved. According to strong Calvinism, the spiritual image of God<sup>53</sup> in human beings has not only been marred, it has been destroyed—not only effaced, but for all practical purposes erased. The natural person cannot understand or respond to the gospel; God must, by irresistible grace, regenerate the sinner (against his will) before he can be saved. Adam's sin has been imputed to the entire human race, and being completely dead in trespasses and sins (totally depraved), the sinner cannot even cooperate with God's saving grace. As with moderate Calvinism, every person born since Adam, apart from Christ, is spiritually dead; those who are not rescued will undergo both physical and eternal death. However, with strong Calvinism, only those select few (the elect) whom God irresistibly regenerates—meaning, they have no choice—will be able to understand and believe the gospel. Strong Calvinism finds its roots in Theodore Beza (1519–1605) and blossomed in Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758).

The various perspectives can be summarized as follows:

VARIOUS VIEWS ON HUMAN DEPRAVITY

	Pelagianism	Arminianism	Moderate Calvinism	Strong Calvinism
State at birth	Innocent	Depraved	Totally Depraved	Totally depraved

			(extensively)	(intensively)
Ability	Can obey God	Can cooperate with God	Can cooperate with God	Can't cooperate with God
Guilt	None	Potential	Judicial (and/ or actual)	Actual (and/ or judicial)
“In Adam” (Rom. 5:12)	Not at all (rather, we sinned like Adam)	Potentially (or seminally)	Legally (and/ or naturally)	Naturally (and/ or legally)
What is inherited from Adam	Bad example	Propensity to sin; necessity to die	Propensity to sin; necessity to die	Necessity to sin; necessity to die
Deaths incurred	Spiritual and eternal	Physical and spiritual	Physical, spiritual, and eternal	Physical, spiritual, and eternal
What is imputed	One's own sin	One's own sin (we ratify Adam's sin)	One's own sin and Adam's sin	One's own sin and Adam's sin
Spiritual image of God	Retained	Effaced	Effaced	Erased
Effect of grace	None	Sufficient for all	Irresistible on the willing	Irresistible on the unwilling

Of course, there are other shades and variations of views, but Pelagianism, Arminianism (Wesleyanism), moderate Calvinism, and strong Calvinism are the four main perspectives. As the foregoing and following analysis shows, the biblical, theological, and historical evidence favors the moderate Calvinist view.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE EFFECTS OF HUMAN SIN

According to the Bible, the effects of sin upon human beings are vast and pervasive. Sin reaches to the very core of our beings, corrupting the totality of human nature—nothing is left untouched.

The Effects of Sin on the Image of God in Humans

Numerous passages speak of humans as created in God's image, beginning with Genesis 1:27 (cf. 5:1; 9:6; Col. 3:10). The relation of sin to this image is theologically important, and it can be summarized in two major points.

The Image of God in Humans Is Effaced but Not Erased

Even in their fallen state, human beings are still in the image of God; His image in people is damaged but not destroyed by sin. Again, it is for this reason that we are forbidden to murder anyone, whether saved or unsaved: “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man” (Gen. 9:6). If unsaved persons were not still in the image of God, this prohibition (against murdering them) would make no sense.

Likewise, we are told not to curse other human beings, since they are in God’s image, and hence we would thereby be cursing God in effigy: “With the tongue we praise our Lord and Father, and with it we curse men, who have been made in God’s likeness. Out of the same mouth come praise and cursing. My brothers, this should not be” (James 3:9–10).

In brief, sin effaces but does not erase the image of God in human beings; it is marred but not eliminated. Even the most vile of human beings retain God’s likeness, be it oh so vitiated within.

Total Depravity Is Extensive, Not Intensive

Since the whole person is made in God’s image, and since sin affects the whole person, the first thing to be said is that the effect of sin on God’s image in fallen human beings is pervasive, extending to every dimension of his being—body and soul, mind and will. Hence, it is in this sense that sinful humanity is appropriately described by moderate Calvinism as “totally depraved.” This does not mean that fallen humans are as sinful as they could be, but it does mean that apart from Christ we are not as good as we should be (in accordance with God’s perfect nature and the perfection with which He created us).

Sin does penetrate and permeate our whole being. Humans are born wholly, not partially, depraved; that is, every aspect of our being is affected by sin. No element of human nature is unaffected by inherited evil, even though no aspect is completely destroyed by it.

While this pervasive depravity is extensive, it is not intensive. That is to say, even though fallenness extends to every dimension of human nature, it does not destroy either human nature or any of its essential powers. For example, fallen human beings can still think, feel, and choose (see below); they have not, because of sin, lost any of these abilities of personhood. If they had, they would no longer be persons. They are still human, and therefore they are still in the image of God, even though they are fallen humans, consequently incapable of either initiating or attaining their own salvation.

Ironically, if one takes total depravity too far, he destroys a person’s ability to be depraved. For if total depravity means “one’s ability to know and chose good over evil is destroyed,” then the person whose knowledge and volition have been eliminated is no longer able to sin, because then he would have had no access to the good (only evil would have been available to him). There are creatures without these abilities, but they are subhuman animals and plants that cannot sin. What has no moral capacity and ability has no moral responsibility.

The Noetic Effects of Human Sin

Sin also has noetic effects on human beings. When Adam chose evil, his mind was darkened by sin, as are the minds of his posterity. Depravity brings spiritual darkness and blindness to unbelievers. Paul said of pagan minds, “Since they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God, he gave them over to a depraved mind, to do what ought not to be done” (Rom. 1:28). He told the Corinthians that “the god of this age has blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God” (2 Cor. 4:4).

Jesus said, “I have come into the world as a light, so that no one who believes in me should stay in darkness” (John 12:46). Paul reminded the Ephesians, “You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord” (Eph. 5:8). The purpose of salvation is “to open their eyes [unbelievers] and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God” (Acts 26:18).

The Volitional Effects of Human Sin

Sin makes its indelible mark not only on the human mind but also on the human will. The result is that there are several actions the unaided human will cannot perform.

For one thing, human will cannot, unmoved by divine grace, seek God. Paul said, “There is no one who understands, no one who seeks God” (Rom. 3:11).

Further, human will cannot initiate salvation. John declared emphatically that believers are “children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband’s will, but born of God” (John 1:13).

Also, by the human will one cannot attain his own salvation: “It does not, therefore, depend on man’s desire or effort, but on God’s mercy” (Rom. 9:16).

Nonetheless, while the unaided human will cannot do any of the above, there are certain things, by God’s grace, that fallen human beings can do.

First of all, as both Luther and Calvin acknowledged, the human will is free in the “things below”; that is, there is freedom in social and moral matters. For example, one is free to choose a school, a job, and a life-partner; he is also free to either care for or abuse his children.

In addition, one is free in the choice to receive or reject the gift of salvation (Rom. 6:23). God not only wants all to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9) but He also provides the ability for all who choose to believe (John 1:12). While we cannot believe without God’s grace, neither can we receive God’s grace of salvation without believing. Again, as John Chrysostom put it:

In order to stop anyone from asking: “How can we be saved without contributing anything at all to our salvation?” Paul shows that in fact we do contribute a great deal toward it—we supply our faith! (in Schaff, NPNF, 1.11:377)

Of course, our act of faith is itself prompted and aided by God: “What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you did not?” (1 Cor. 4:7). Again, “not that we are competent in ourselves to claim anything for ourselves, but our competence comes from God” (2 Cor. 3:5). While God, though, prompts our act of faith, He does not perform it—it is, after all, our act. While God aids our choice, He does not choose for us. He provides the impetus and assistance, but we must make the decision to believe.

As to the charge that even the act of receiving salvation as a gift from God would be meritorious:

A rich man bestows, on a poor and famished beggar, alms by which he may be able to maintain himself and his family. Does it cease to be a pure gift, because the beggar extends his hand to receive it? Can it be said with propriety that “the alms depend partly on the liberality of the Donor, and partly on the liberty of the Receiver,” though the latter would not have possessed the alms unless he had received it by stretching out his hand? ... If these assertions cannot be truly made about a beggar who receives alms, how much less can they be made about the gift of faith, for the receiving of which far more acts of Divine Grace are required! (Arminius, WJA, 1.365–66, emphasis added)

The Effects of Sin on Human Nature

A human person has a human nature; hence, if the person is fallen, his nature is fallen. Just what does it mean to have a fallen nature? To begin, there are things this does mean.

First, having a fallen nature means we are born this way (Ps. 51:5). The psalmist says, “Even from birth the wicked go astray; from the womb they are wayward and speak lies” (Ps. 58:3; cf. Eph. 2:3).

Second, having a fallen nature means that it is natural for us to sin. Sin is not merely an acquired habit; it is a basic inclination. One does not have to be taught to sin.

Third, having a fallen nature means that one will inevitably sin. Given the opportunity, sin will manifest itself.

Fourth, and finally, having a fallen nature means we are incapable of saving ourselves. No matter how good we try to be, we are still sinners by nature and practice, and, as such, we cannot enter God’s perfect heaven without Jesus Christ. In short, having a fallen nature means that we are not simply sinners because we sin; we sin because we are sinners.

However, there are also several things having a sinful nature does not mean.

First, as even strong Calvinists agree, having a fallen nature does not mean that we are as sinful as we could be. Rather, as stated before, it means that we are not as good as we should be.

Second, having a fallen nature does not mean that sin is excusable. We are responsible for every sin we commit.

Third, having a fallen nature does not mean we’re unable to avoid sin; if we were, then we would not be responsible for our sins—but we are. Indeed, “each of us will give an account of himself to God” (Rom. 14:12), and “the dead [will be] judged according to what they [have] done as recorded in the books” (Rev. 20:12).

Fourth, having a fallen nature does not mean that any particular sin is inescapable. While sin in general is inevitable, no sin in particular is unavoidable. God’s grace is always available for the resistance of sin, both for the believer (1 Cor. 10:13) and for the unbeliever (Titus 2:11–13). As Calvin correctly noted, “It [is] beyond dispute that free will does not enable any man to perform good works, unless he is assisted by grace” (ICR, 1.2.2.6).

Fifth, and finally, as already established, having a fallen nature does not mean we have no choice in our salvation. While the unaided human will cannot believe unto salvation, nonetheless, all who are willing to receive God’s gift of salvation are aided by His grace to this end. He not only wants all to be saved, but He provides the ability for all who desire it (Phil. 2:13). Our free choice does not initiate (1 John 3:19) and cannot attain (John 1:13) the unmerited gift of salvation, but by God’s grace (Eph. 2:8–9) our will can receive it (John 1:12; 3:16–18).

CONCLUSION

The effects of sin are extensive, both on the human race overall and on individuals in particular (Rom. 3:23). The entire human race is fallen and irredeemable, except by God’s grace (Titus 3:5–7; Eph. 2:8–9). Furthermore, each individual is totally depraved, for sin has extended to every part of his being. He is a fallen person, including mind, emotions, will, and body.

While this depravity, however, does not mean that everyone is as evil as they are able to be, it does mean that they are not as good as they need to be. Hence, God’s grace is the only force in the universe that can overcome the natural irredeemability of human beings. “Grace alone” (Lat: sola gratia) is the only cure for humankind’s total depravity. Grace, and only grace, can overcome the vast and devastating effects of sin (Titus 2:11–13).

CHAPTER SIX

THE DEFEAT OF SIN

God chose not to annihilate sin but rather to defeat it. He chose to defeat it progressively instead of instantaneously. There are many possible reasons for this, but two prominent ones involve (1) the freedom God gave to humans and (2) God's desire to produce a more godlike (godly) product in the process. Defeating evil without destroying freedom, while at the same time perfecting free creatures—this appears to be at the heart of God's plan.

THE DIVINE PLAN TO DEFEAT EVIL

God's plan to defeat evil was devised in the council chambers of eternity. In order to conquer evil, God had to permit it. To permit evil in order to allow for greater good, He had to create free creatures. These he created in two kinds: angels (spirit) and human beings (spirit/body).

THE PREREQUISITES OF GOD'S PLAN

Since God is an eternal Being, His plan was willed from all eternity, rooted in several other divine attributes. Since God is all-knowing (omniscient), He knew how everything would turn out from the beginning. Further, because God is all-loving (omnibenevolent), it was assured from the start that He would honor the free will He gave to His creatures.<sup>5</sup> And, as God is all-powerful (omnipotent), it was certain from the outset that He would accomplish what He set out to do. As it has been said, the rest is history. Finally, God's freedom guarantees that He was not forced to do what He did,<sup>7</sup> and His omniscience (all-wisdom) insured that He would choose the wisest means to accomplish His ends.

THE PURPOSE OF GOD'S PLAN

If God knew evil would occur, why did He create at all? He was free to create or not to create, so why did He choose to make a world He knew would fall into sin? This appears to conflict with God being all-good and all-wise, for as an all-good God He must have had a good purpose for doing what He did, and as an all-wise God He must have chosen the best possible way to do it. Why, then, did He freely create a world of free creatures He knew would choose evil—many of whom would never recover? Critics often claim that there were other (better) alternatives open to God.

Alternative One: Not to Have Created

If God is all-knowing, all-good, and free in accordance with His own nature, then there were other options He could have chosen. As all-knowing, God foresaw evil, and as free He could have avoided creating any world at all. This would have avoided all of the evil this world contains and hence would seem to have been preferable.

Alternative Two: To Have Created a Non-Free World

Further, God could have created a nonmoral world where there would be no sin. Such a world, by virtue of having no free beings in it, would be void of any moral evil. This kind of world would seem to be an improvement over the evil one we have.

Alternative Three: To Have Created a Free World Where No One Ever Chooses to Sin

In addition, God could have created a world where no one ever decides for evil. That a free person can sin does not mean that he will sin. God knew who would sin and who would not, and it would seem that He could have simply created those He knew would not choose evil.

Alternative Four: To Have Created a Free World Where No One Is Allowed to Sin

God is all-powerful, and He could have created free creatures that He prevented from sinning, even if they would have otherwise (if given free will) chosen to do so. Since God does not will evil and has the power to prevent it, exercising His power to make sin impossible would seem to have been a better option. Surely this would appear to have been preferable to the world we have, wherein free creatures have been allowed to sin in such destructive ways.

Alternative Five: To Have Created a Free World Where Sin Occurs but Where All Are Eventually Saved

Finally, why didn't God make a world where everyone is free and where sin occurs, but where everyone is also eventually rescued from it? Such a world would have had the advantage of allowing the freedom to do evil while also including the time and circumstances necessary for us to learn the lessons from it and thus choose to reform. In the end, this would have provided an evil-free world.

The problem for the Christian theist can be summarized in this manner:

- (1) God could have chosen an alternative to this world (which contains free creatures who sin) by:
  - (a) not creating at all;
  - (b) not creating a free world;
  - (c) creating a free world that would not sin;
  - (d) creating a free world that could not sin; or
  - (e) creating a world that sinned but would all be saved in the end.
- (2) However, according to His own Word, God did not choose any one of these supposedly better alternatives. Rather, He created a world of free creatures who could and would sin, and yet would not all be saved in the end.
- (3) Since God did not choose one of these apparently "preferable" options, He is vulnerable to the charge that He did not do His best.
- (4) To do less than one's best is evil.
- (5) Therefore, no all-perfect God exists.

GOD'S PLAN IN PERMITTING EVIL

In response to this objection, one must demonstrate, from an evangelical Christian point of view, that no other possible alternatives would have been better than the one God chose:

- (1) In His infinite wisdom and goodness, God chose the plan that would bring the greatest good.
- (2) God deemed that the plan resulting in the greatest good would be to permit evil in order to defeat it, without destroying free will in the process.
- (3) As He is the greatest possible Good, God willed the greatest possible good for free creatures.
- (4) Furthermore, God used the greatest possible means to attain the greatest possible good.

An understanding of this plan will unfold as each of the above alternatives is addressed.

Some theologians challenge the fourth premise (“To do less than one’s best is evil”), arguing that God is not obligated to do His best; He merely has to do good. And what He did in creating this world was good, even if there could have been something better.

This, though, is problematic in view of God being all-good. How can the Best Being possible do less than what is best to do? It would seem that the perfect Being must perform perfect actions, for less than the best does not measure up to the standards of the Best. In any event, it is necessary to address the alternatives, for an opponent can also argue that it was not good for God to permit evil in the first place, since He had other alternatives that would have resulted in no evil.

Response to Alternative One (Not to Have Created)

In reply, the truth is that no world is not morally better than some world. Nothing is not better than something. This is a category mistake; something and nothing have nothing in common, so they cannot be compared. This is not even like comparing apples to oranges, since at least both of those are fruits. It is more like comparing apples and no apples, insisting that no apples tastes “better” or “worse.”

Further, the critic’s argument is that no world would have been morally better than this one. But no world is not a moral world (no world is not a world at all)—it is amoral. Here again, it is a category mistake to claim that an amoral world is morally better than a moral world. They aren’t in the same theological or ideological realm.

Therefore, to create was not better than to not create. Creation was a free choice; God was under no compunction to create something. He did not create because He had to (either metaphysically or morally)—He created because He wanted to.

Response to Alternative Two (To Have Created a Non-Free World)

In the same way, a non-free world is not morally better than a free world, for a non-free world is a nonmoral world—free will is necessary for morality. As just noted (in response to Alternative One), a nonmoral world cannot be morally better than a moral world, regardless of whether there is no world at all or whether the world is non-free. Since the posited world is not even a moral world (either being no world at all, as in Alternative One, or being a non-free world, as in Alternative Two), there is no moral basis for the comparison with the world God made. This alternative is a category mistake as well.

Response to Alternative Three (To Have Created a Free World Where No One Ever Chooses to Sin)

This alternative implies that it is possible to have a free world where no one ever decides for evil. This conclusion is questionable; in fact, it involves an equivocation on the word possible. Of course, it is logically possible that a free creature will never sin, since human freedom to sin involves the ability to do otherwise. However, not everything logically possible is actually achievable.

Given what we know about freedom, a world where no one exercised it in a wrong way (ever) is beyond highly unlikely. In a 50/50 situation, if there are really two possibilities—for example, heads and tails—and the coin is flipped a million times while never coming up tails, we suspect that the coin is loaded. And, unlike the coin, humans are free to choose otherwise.

At any rate, even if it is logically possible that God could have created a world in which no one ever sinned, it may have been actually un achievable, if we posit God's infallibly foreknowing that in every truly free world He could have created, at least some would freely sin. So while a free world where no one ever sins is logically possible, it may not be actually possible. Hence, it is possible that God could not have created only those who wouldn't sin, since He knew with certainty that in any group He made some would choose evil. For example, it is possible that had God created fewer angels, a third of them would have sinned.

In addition, even if God could have created a world where everyone was free but no one ever sinned, it is debatable whether this truly would be best. The best possible world is the one that achieves the greatest good—which, as Scripture makes clear, is achieved by allowing first-order (lower) evils in order to achieve second-order (higher) goods. For example, patience is not achievable without tribulation, nor forgiveness without sin, nor courage without fear, nor mercy without tragedy. All of these greater goods are dependent on permitting the precondition of evil. If, then, the greater good cannot be achieved without allowing evil, and if God must achieve the greatest good (because He is the greatest Good), then it seems to follow that it would not have been best for God to have chosen to create a free world where sin would not occur (even if it were actually possible).

If, as mentioned before, it is objected that God does not have to do His best and, consequently, did not have to achieve the greatest good but simply a good world, then the entire objection that God should have chosen a better world fails anyway. This present world that God created with allowance for sin is a good world, and if a good world will suffice, then this world meets the criterion and the objection is irrelevant.

Response to Alternative Four (To Have Created a Free World Where No One Is Allowed to Sin)

As to the view that God could have made a free world in which no one was permitted to do evil, it appears to be contradictory. God is omnipotent, but even an omnipotent Being cannot do what is contradictory, and it is a contradiction to say that one is free to sin but yet is not allowed to sin. The only logical way sin can be avoided is for there to be no ability to do otherwise. Once someone is forced not to sin, he is not free; we have noted that forced freedom is an absurd concept. God can, of course, make creatures that cannot sin; they are, for example, rocks and robots, not moral beings. A moral creature, by nature, is one who is free to choose, and it is antithetical to say one is free to do otherwise and also not free to do otherwise.

Response to Alternative Five (To Have Created a Free World Where Sin Occurs but All Are Eventually Saved)

Like Alternative Three, a free world where everyone sins and then gets saved is conceivable, but it may not be achievable. As long as everyone is truly free, it is always possible that in every possible world someone will refuse to be saved. Of course, if God forced everyone to be saved they would not be free—there is no such reality as coerced liberty. Since God is love, He does not and cannot force Himself on people against their will. So a sinful world where universal salvation occurs because of divine coercion upon the unwilling is untenable. In addition, while a world where everyone eventually is saved because they unilaterally refuse ever to choose sin would be evil-free in the end; nevertheless, it is possible that given what God foreknew from all eternity about their use of free will, such a world is not truly attainable.

Further, a world where sin never materializes is conceivable, but it may not actually be the most morally desirable.

For one thing, if evil is not permitted, it cannot be defeated. As with automobiles, a tested world is better than an untested one. Or to put it another way, no boxer can actually defeat an opponent unless he gets into the ring with him. God, then, may have permitted evil in order to defeat it (and thus achieve a greater good).

Also, if evil is not allowed, then higher virtues cannot be attained. To reemphasize a previously stated example, there is no way for us to experience the joy of being forgiven without God's allowance for our fall into sin (e.g., Luke 7:36–48). While a world where sin does occur and everyone is saved is theoretically conceivable, it seems, nevertheless, that such a world would be morally inferior.

In brief, since none of these alternative views is necessary (and some are impossible), it has not been demonstrated that any theorized world-variant is morally better than the one we have. As a result, opponents have failed to show that God did less than His best in creating our world. This, of course, does not mean we are committed to the belief that this present world is the best world achievable. God is not yet finished: This world is only the best way possible to the best world achievable.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENTS FOR AN ALTERNATIVE WORLD

Pulling the strings together, we have seen that no alternative has been demonstrated to be superior to the world God chose to create, namely, a world where evil is possible and in which it has actually happened. Surely nonmoral (amoral) worlds—Alternatives One and Two—cannot be morally better than this moral world. Likewise, a world of forced freedom—Alternative Four—is not even a logically viable alternative. And a world where persons are free but evil never occurs—Alternative Three—is theoretically conceivable but may not be actually achievable. The same is true of Alternative Five, for it may be that no such world would or could actually materialize where everyone freely willed to be saved. (And even if it were achievable, it would be morally inferior.) In short, it can be argued:

- (1) If the greatest possible Being (God) decides to create a moral world, then it is either
  - (a) necessary for Him to achieve the greatest possible good in it, or
  - (b) not necessary for Him to achieve the greatest possible good in it.

- (2) If it is not necessary for Him to achieve the greatest possible good in it, then this world meets the qualification, and the objection (that the world could have been better if He had chosen an alternative plan) fails.
- (3) If it is necessary for God to achieve the greatest possible good, then permitting this evil world as a necessary precondition for achieving the highest good would be the best alternative.
- (4) This world has not yet achieved the greatest good.
- (5) However, this present evil world is the best means of achieving the end of the greatest good, which could not be achieved without the preconditioning presence of evil.
- (6) An all-good God must accomplish the best end.
- (7) An all-wise God must choose the best means to the best end.
- (8) An all-powerful God can achieve an end that does not involve any contradiction.
- (9) It is contradictory to force freedom to achieve a moral end.
- (10) Hence, universalism, in which all are saved (including some against their will), is a contradiction.
- (11) Therefore, it is conceivable that this present evil world is the best possible means of obtaining the best world achievable (namely, (a) one where some are saved and some are lost and (b) where sin is defeated and a greater good is achieved).

According to the Bible, what has been shown here to be philosophically and logically possible is actually what God decided to do. That is, He chose to permit evil in order to defeat it, thus bringing about a greater good. He chose to create a perfect—and free—world, which He knew would become imperfect by free choices, so that He could bring about a more perfect world. In other words, He chose to permit a world that is not the best possible world in order to achieve one that is. In summary, while our world is not the best world possible, it is the best way possible to achieve the best of all possible worlds, namely, a world where (1) everyone freely chooses his own destiny and (2) where sin is forever defeated (hell) and righteousness reigns eternally (heaven).

GOD DESIRES TO, CAN, AND WILL DEFEAT EVIL

The very nature of God assures us that evil will eventually be defeated.

- (1) God is all-loving and wants to defeat evil.
- (2) God is all-powerful and can defeat evil.
- (3) Evil is not yet defeated.
- (4) Hence, evil will yet be defeated (in the future).

The fact that God is all-good and all-powerful guarantees this conclusion. Further, since God is all-wise, we can be sure that He has chosen the best means to that end (defeating evil).

Consequently, while this present world is not the best of all possible worlds, nonetheless, it must be the best means to the best world. Thus, a world in which evil is permitted is the best kind of world to permit as a means to produce the best kind of world—one that has no evil in it. That world is our promised destiny.

THE PROCESS OF DEFEATING EVIL

As previously established, God chose not to annihilate all evil immediately, for then He would have to destroy all the good made possible by freedom as well. Rather, in His infinite wisdom, God decided to defeat evil gradually, without destroying free will. God is doing this in stages through out the ages.

The Role of Dispensations

Dispensation is a biblical term (see Volume 4, chapters 13, and 15). Speaking of Christ's coming kingdom, Paul affirmed "that in the dispensation of the fullness of the times He might gather together ... all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth in Him" (Eph. 1:10 NKJV).

A dispensation is a "divine order of affairs" or a "period of administration." It is a specific time in the unfolding drama of redemption wherein God ordains a specific arrangement of events and commands for a specific purpose. His purpose includes the defeat of evil.

The Number of Dispensations

Most evangelical scholars believe in several administrations of God's plan, even if they do not use the term dispensation. For example, the divine economy God set up in the Garden of Eden, under which Adam and Eve were tested, is obviously not the same as the one set up between Eden and Moses, or the one after the time of Christ. Neither do we have the same conditions now that will prevail when Christ bodily returns to earth and reigns after His second coming (see Volume 4, chapter 17). In this sense, virtually all evangelical scholars are "dispensationalist," even those who disavow the label. The only question for everyone, then, is how many dispensations there are. Minimally, there would seem to be at least four or five. Some scholars see more. Be that as it may, it is not the number but the nature and purpose of dispensations that matter.

The Nature and Purpose of Dispensations

Relying upon the traditional seven dispensations, God's purpose to defeat evil seems to go something like this: In each age or period from Adam through Christ's return, God orchestrates a different condition, with a different test, to see whether human beings will obey Him. Each time they fail—under almost every conceivable condition. The sum total of the dispensational examinations demonstrates that it is always wrong to disobey God and that complete obedience to Him is the only true path to eternal satisfaction. The aforementioned seven dispensations can be delineated in Scripture.

DISPENSATIONS

The Dispensation of Probation (Innocence)

In the Garden of Eden, the test was whether in a state of innocent purity, when people did not know good or evil, they would obey God's command (Gen. 2:16–17). They failed miserably, and God, after judgment (Gen. 3), gave them another chance to prove themselves under a new condition—that of conscience.

The Dispensation of Conscience (Moral Sense)

After the Fall, human beings had a conscience that informed them what was right and what was wrong (Rom. 2:12–15). But here too they heeded not the command of God to do good and shun evil. The period of conscience also ended in tragedy and judgment when God sent the Flood (Gen. 6–9).

The Dispensation of Human Government

Since violence had filled the earth (Gen. 6:11) in the previous period, God established human government for humans to obey, providing the sword to enforce it (Gen. 9:6). However, here again human beings failed the test and used the powers of government to make a kingdom in defiance of God. This disobedience to God's established order led to disaster; He destroyed their tower and dispersed them by confounding their languages (Gen. 11).

The Dispensation of Promise

Thus began the period in which God, after judging the peoples at Babel, chose one nation through whom He would bless all others (Gen. 12:1–3). He gave Abraham the Promised Land and commanded him to dwell in it. Subsequently, as before, humans failed the test. Abraham (and his offspring after him) left the land and descended into Egypt, the land of bondage.

The Dispensation of Law

As before, God provided grace, giving humans another chance under new conditions to prove that they would not abuse their freedom. They accepted the law given by God through Moses, but then proceeded to disobey by engaging in idolatry and immorality down through the centuries, until God sent them into captivity, first by the Assyrians and then by the Babylonians. Indeed, even when He sent the promised Messiah, they crucified Him (John 1:10–12); consequently, their temple was destroyed, and God scattered them throughout the world. Yet God's moral law embedded in the Old Testament theocracy did not pass away with it, but continues in the New Testament as a reflection of His moral character.

The Dispensation of Grace

While God was gracious in every prior age, offering new opportunities to obey Him under new conditions, His unlimited benevolence was poured out through the Cross at the beginning of this new dispensation—the age of grace. Here too God's grace was spurned by the masses; this era will end in the tragedy of the Great Tribulation at the end of the age, though God's grace exists in every age.

The Dispensation of the Kingdom

Although God is sovereign and has always ruled the affairs of humanity, nonetheless, the promised reign of the Messiah in a visible, literal kingdom has not yet occurred (Matt. 19:28; Acts 1:5; Rev. 19–20). This dispensation will provide an opportunity to test human freedom under a new condition—one in which the devil will be bound for “a thousand years” (Rev. 20:2).

Unlike in previous periods, human beings will not be able to use the excuse that “the devil made me do it.” Even so, after the millennial reign of Christ—personally and physically, here on earth—there will be a mass rebellion against God (Rev. 20:7–8), an uprising that He will judge with fire from heaven (v. 9).

So concludes the series of the periods of human history in which people have been divinely examined under almost every conceivable condition: innocence, conscience, government, promise, law, grace, and the kingdom. In each case they proved (or will prove) that human freedom, left to itself, will always rebel against God. They have also demonstrated that God is always right and that real satisfaction comes only from obeying Him.

Again, the point is not how many of these periods existed or even what they should be called, but instead that there have been a number of different conditions at distinct time periods under which God has tested humankind in working out His plan to defeat evil. In the end, God will have used human history, with its varied conditions and administrations (dispensations), to show in eternity to come that (1) sin is always wrong, (2) God is always right, and (3) evil is justly put away forever.

Untold throngs from all the ages will be able to testify from their experience, under a wide variety of conditions, that God is just, that sin is destructive, and that submitting freely to His will is the only way to obtain true and permanent blessedness. In effect, God will have defeated sin by permitting it in virtually every possible way. This defeat will include a final separation of the wheat from the tares, the sheep from the goats—the latter being sent to eternal condemnation (Matt. 25:40–41; Rev. 20:14–15) and the former into everlasting bliss (Rev. 21–22). Sin will be quarantined forever, and each person will be assigned the permanent place of his or her own choosing. C. S. Lewis (1898–1963) put it:

I would pay any price to be able to say truthfully “All will be saved.” But my reason retorts, “Without their will, or with it?” If I say “Without their will,” I at once perceive a contradiction; how can the supreme voluntary act of self-surrender be involuntary? If I say “With their will,” my reason replies “How, if they will not give in?” (PP, 106–07).

Therefore,

There are only two kinds of people in the end: those who say to God, “Thy will be done,” and those to whom God says, in the end, “Thy will be done.” All that are in hell, choose it. (GD, 69)

Lewis believed that “without that self-choice there could be no hell. No soul that seriously and constantly desires joy will ever miss it. Those who seek find. To those who knock it is opened” (ibid.). God has determined not to rob His creatures of the freedom He gave them, and hence to instead defeat sin without destroying volition.

THE EXECUTION OF GOD’S PLAN

God’s plan to defeat evil was and is (and will be) carefully and gradually executed in seven primary stages:

- (1) the creation of free creatures;
- (2) the fall of humankind;
- (3) the preparation for the Savior;
- (4) the incarnation of the Savior;
- (5) the present session of the Savior (in heaven);

- (6) the return and reign of the Savior (the final judgment); and
- (7) the new heaven and new earth.

The Creation of Free Creatures

As omniscient, God knows the end from the beginning (Isa. 46:10). Before He created, He foresaw the fall of humanity and made plans for our salvation. Nonetheless, God created human beings innocent and perfect, endowing them with free will (Gen. 2:16) and, consequently, holding them responsible for their choices (Gen. 2:16–17).

The Fall of Humankind

Again, God foresaw the Fall, even planning for it from all eternity. John spoke of “the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world” (Rev. 13:8), and Paul said, “He hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love” (Eph. 1:4 KJV). Nothing catches the omniscient Mind by surprise. Permitting Adam and Eve to sin was part of God’s plan to defeat evil.

The Preparation for the Savior

Immediately following the Fall, God announced His eternal plan to provide salvation for all humankind. He said to the serpent, whom He had allowed to tempt Adam and Eve, “I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel” (Gen. 3:15). The Savior would be the Seed of the woman, and He would ultimately—fatally—crush the serpent’s head. This Christ did officially on the Cross (Col. 2:14) and will do actually when He returns (Rom. 16:20; Rev. 20:10).

The rest of the Old Testament is the preparation for the coming Savior. To begin, God called into existence the holy nation through which He would bring the Promised Seed. In the books of the law (Genesis through Deuteronomy), God laid the foundation for Christ. In the historical books (Joshua through Nehemiah), He made the provision for the holy nation to enter and obtain the Holy Land so that they could produce the Holy One (Christ).

We see, then, that in Genesis God chose the nation; in Exodus He redeemed them; in Leviticus He sanctified them; in Numbers He guided them, and in Deuteronomy He instructed them so that in Joshua they could be victorious. In Judges they were unsettled without a king, but in 1 Samuel the nation was established and in 2 Samuel it was expanded. After the reign of Solomon, the nation declined (in 1 Kings) and was deported (in 2 Kings—a prophetic history repeated from a priestly viewpoint in 1 and 2 Chronicles). In Esther the nation was protected, and in Ezra and Nehemiah they were returned and rebuilt.

Meanwhile, the poetic books express an aspiration for Christ. Job aspired for mediation, Psalms for communion with God, Proverbs for wisdom, Ecclesiastes for the greatest good (Lat: summum bonum), and Song of Solomon for intimate union—all of which was found ultimately in Jesus the Messiah.

Finally, the prophetic books (Isaiah through Malachi) earnestly proclaim an expectation for Christ. Each book in its own way anticipated the coming Savior, concluding the Old Testament preparation for the One who was to bring salvation.

The Incarnation of the Savior

When the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons [adoption]. (Gal. 4:4–5)

The anticipation of the Old Testament became the realization of the New Testament: The eternal Word assumed temporal flesh. He became incarnate (1) to fulfill prophecy, (2) to manifest deity, and (3) to redeem humanity.

First of all, as John says,

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God ... [And] the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth. (John 1:1, John 1:14)

Also, Jesus said, “Even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mark 10:45), and “The Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost” (Luke 19:10).

The Gospels detail the historic manifestation of Christ; Acts chronicles the spread of the sharing of Christ; the Epistles establish the interpretation and application of Christ; and Revelation reveals the final consummation in Christ.

Christ’s Substitutionary Death

Jesus did not come simply to speak to His people as their Prophet, but He also made a sacrifice for them as their Priest (see Mark 10:45): “I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full... and I lay down my life for the sheep” (John 10:10, 15). Christ’s atoning death was not merely exemplar, but it was also sacrificial and substitutionary.<sup>37</sup> He died in our place, as a substitute for our sins.

Christ’s Physical Resurrection

The resurrection of Christ is the kingpin of God’s plan of redemption. Paul wrote, “He was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification” (Rom. 4:25). Jesus, when asked for proof of His identity, answered,

A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign! But none will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of a huge fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. (Matt. 12:39–40)

As He approached the cross, Jesus said, specifically: “ ‘The Son of Man is going to be betrayed into the hands of men. They will kill him, and on the third day he will be raised to life.’ And the disciples were filled with grief” (Matt. 17:22–23).

The resurrection of Christ was the dominant theme of early apostolic preaching (e.g., Acts 2, 13). It is the culmination point of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, occupying the last sections of each. Indeed, Paul proclaimed that the resurrection of Jesus was at the heart of the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1–8) and that one could not be saved without believing in it (1 Cor. 15:14–19; cf. Rom. 10:9).

Christ’s Bodily Ascension Into Heaven

Christ’s work of salvation did not end with His death and resurrection. He told Mary, “Do not hold on to me, for I have not yet returned to the Father. Go instead to my brothers and tell them, 'I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God' " (John 20:17). He said this because He had not yet completed His work by ascending to the Father and receiving acceptance of His finished work of salvation. His ascension, like His resurrection, was announced in advance.

Luke wrote, "As the time approached for him to be taken up to heaven, Jesus resolutely set out for Jerusalem." Later, before His ascension, He said,

"I am going to send you what my Father has promised; but stay in the city until you have been clothed with power from on high." When he had led them out to the vicinity of Bethany, he lifted up his hands and blessed them. While he was blessing them, he left them and was taken up into heaven. (Luke 24:49–51)

In John 14:2–3, Jesus told His disciples,

In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am.

His ascension was necessary to complete the work of salvation by preparing a place for His bride. Paul said,

Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word, and to present her to himself as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless. (Eph. 5:25–27)

Jesus promised,

I tell you the truth, anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father ... You heard me say, "I am going away and I am coming back to you." If you loved me, you would be glad that I am going to the Father. (John 14:12, 28)

Without the Ascension, the Holy Spirit would not have descended to indwell and empower the disciples.

Jesus also said,

I am going to the Father, where you can see me no longer.... I came from the Father and entered the world; now I am leaving the world and going back to the Father. (John 16:10, 28)

The language is unequivocal: Jesus came from and returned to His Father—He descended and then ascended.

What "does he ascended" mean except that he also descended to the lower, earthly regions? He who descended is the very one who ascended higher than all the heavens, in order to fill the whole universe. (Eph. 4:9–10)

Just as Jesus in His humiliation descended to the grave, so in His exaltation He ascended into heaven.

The Ascension is implied in Philippians 2:8–11, regarding Christ's exaltation:

Being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross! Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above

every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Acts 1:9–11 is the chief text on Christ’s bodily assumption into heaven. It affirms that the Ascension was a literal, visible rising of His resurrection body. His body was not, as some suggest, transformed into an invisible one. Rather, His physical body simply passed out of their sight behind “a cloud”:

After he said this, he was taken up before their very eyes, and a cloud hid him from their sight. They were looking intently up into the sky as he was going, when suddenly two men dressed in white stood beside them. “Men of Galilee,” they said, “why do you stand here looking into the sky? This same Jesus, who has been taken from you into heaven, will come back in the same way you have seen him go into heaven.”

Christ’s Present Session (the Church)

In addition to Christ’s physical death, literal bodily resurrection, and actual ascension into heaven, He has an indescribably important “present priestly session” in heaven on behalf of believers.

My dear children, I write this to you so that you will not sin. But if anybody does sin, we have one who speaks to the Father in our defense—Jesus Christ, the Righteous One. He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world. (1 John 2:1–2)

According to John, Satan is the accuser of God’s people (Rev. 12; cf. Job. 1–2)

Then I heard a loud voice in heaven say: “Now have come the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ. For the accuser of our brothers, who accuses them before our God day and night, has been hurled down” (Rev. 12:10).

In view of this, Christ—our Advocate—counters by pleading (with His Father) the efficacy of His blood, which was shed for our sins.

It is declared: “You are a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek.” ... Because of this oath, Jesus has become the guarantee of a better covenant. Now there have been many of those priests, since death prevented them from continuing in office; but because Jesus lives forever, he has a permanent priesthood. Therefore he is able to save completely those who come to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them. Such a high priest meets our need—one who is holy, blameless, pure, set apart from sinners, exalted above the heavens. (Heb. 7:17, 22–26)

Because Christ is human as well as divine, He can sympathize with our human frailties:

Therefore, since we have a great high priest who has gone through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold firmly to the faith we profess. For we do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but we have one who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin. (Heb. 4:14–15)

Since He Himself was tempted in all points that we are, He can, by His present session, overcome these temptations:

No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it. (1 Cor. 10:13)

This “way out” is provided by Christ’s intercession for us, His present priestly ministry on our behalf.

The Return and Reign of the Savior

As noted above, Jesus will come again and fulfill His role as King over His people. The complete discussion of Christ’s second coming and subsequent reign is found under “Eschatology.”

Christ As King

Jesus is not only Prophet to and Priest for His people, but one day He will literally (actually, physically) be King over them as well: “I tell you the truth, at the renewal of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Matt. 19:28). John added,

I saw thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge. And I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their testimony for Jesus and because of the word of God. They had not worshiped the beast or his image and had not received his mark on their foreheads or their hands. They came to life and reigned with Christ a thousand years. (Rev. 20:4)

The Final Judgment

According to Revelation,

When the thousand years are over, Satan will be released from his prison and will go out to deceive the nations in the four corners of the earth—Gog and Magog—to gather them for battle. In number they are like the sand on the seashore. They marched across the breadth of the earth and surrounded the camp of God’s people, the city he loves. But fire came down from heaven and devoured them. And the devil, who deceived them, was thrown into the lake of burning sulfur, where the beast and the false prophet had been thrown. They will be tormented day and night for ever and ever. (20:7–10)

This is followed by the final judgment before the Great White Throne:

Then I saw a great white throne and him who was seated on it. Earth and sky fled from his presence, and there was no place for them. And I saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne, and books were opened. Another book was opened, which is the book of life. The dead were judged according to what they had done as recorded in the books. The sea gave up the dead that were in it, and death and Hades gave up the dead that were in them, and each person was judged according to what he had done. Then death and Hades were thrown into the lake of fire. The lake of fire is the second death. If anyone’s name was not found written in the book of life, he was thrown into the lake of fire. (Rev. 20:11–15)

The New Heaven and New Earth

Following this, John said,

Then I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away, and there was no longer any sea. I saw the Holy City, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband. And I heard a loud voice from the throne saying, “Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God. He will wipe every tear from their eyes. There will be no more death or mourning or crying or pain, for the old order of things has passed away.”

One of the seven angels who had the seven bowls full of the seven last plagues came and said to me, “Come, I will show you the bride, the wife of the Lamb.” And he carried me away in the Spirit to a mountain great and high, and showed me the Holy City, Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God. It shone with the glory of God, and its brilliance was like that of a very precious jewel, like a jasper, clear as crystal. It had a great, high wall with twelve gates, and with twelve angels at the gates....

The wall was made of jasper, and the city of pure gold, as pure as glass. The foundations of the city walls were decorated with every kind of precious stone. The first foundation was jasper, the second sapphire, the third chalcedony, the fourth emerald, the fifth sardonyx, the sixth carnelian, the seventh chrysolite, the eighth beryl, the ninth topaz, the tenth chrysoprase, the eleventh jacinth, and the twelfth amethyst. The twelve gates were twelve pearls, each gate made of a single pearl. The great street of the city was of pure gold, like transparent glass. I did not see a temple in the city, because the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple. (Rev. 21:1–4, 9–12, 18–22)

Also describing this great event, Peter wrote:

The day of the Lord will come like a thief. The heavens will disappear with a roar; the elements will be destroyed by fire, and the earth and everything in it will be laid bare. Since everything will be destroyed in this way, what kind of people ought you to be? You ought to live holy and godly lives as you look forward to the day of God and speed its coming. That day will bring about the destruction of the heavens by fire, and the elements will melt in the heat. But in keeping with his promise we are looking forward to a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness. (2 Peter 3:10–13; cf. Isa. 65:17–25)

THE RESULT OF GOD’S PLAN

God’s great plan culminates in the total defeat of evil. Evil was vanquished officially at the Cross (Col. 2:14; Heb. 2:14) and will be defeated actually at Christ’s return.

The Official and Actual Victories Over Sin

This official defeat of sin at the Cross notwithstanding, the fact is that Satan is still present and acting upon planet earth. He knows, however, that his doom is sealed (Matt. 8:29) and that his time is short (Rev. 12:12). The day of his destiny is coming:

Then the end will come, when he hands over the kingdom to God the Father after [God] has destroyed all dominion, authority and power. For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death. For he “has put everything under his feet.” Now when it says that “everything” has been put under him, it is clear that this does not include God himself, who put everything under Christ. When he has done this, then the Son himself will be made subject to him who put everything under him, so that God may be all in all. (1 Cor. 15:24–28)

We see, then, that the official defeat of sin came at the First Advent; the actual defeat will be at the Second Coming.

There are three stages in the overall battle to defeat sin in the lives of God's children.

Justification (deliverance from the penalty of sin) is a past action for all believers, accomplished at the Cross.

Sanctification (deliverance from the power of sin) is a present and continuous process of believers becoming Christlike, accomplished by the Holy Spirit's power and presence.

Finally, glorification (deliverance from the presence of sin) will take place at Christ's return—the dawning of the eternal kingdom.

The Eventual (Ultimate) Defeat of Sin

We speak of the defeat, not the destruction, of sin, because sin, in the sinner, will continue forever in hell. Even so, God will defeat sin without destroying the sinner. Thus, what is meant by defeat must be unpacked.

What does the defeat of sin not mean?

For one thing, it does not mean that God will annihilate sinners. This would be to attack His own immortal image, which all sinners, even those in hell, still bear.

Further, the annihilation of all sinners would not be punishment, since those who do not exist cannot feel any pain.

What is more, there are degrees of punishment in hell (Rev. 20:12–13), and clearly there cannot be “degrees of annihilation.”

Finally, it is contrary to the nature of an all-loving God to snuff out people who do not love Him in return. Rather, in His infinite love, God will allow even those who hate Him to “have it their way.” Again, as C. S. Lewis intoned, since they refuse to say to Him, “Thy will be done,” He will say to them, “Thy will be done.”

What does the defeat of sin mean?

For one thing, it means everlasting torment. Sin against the Eternal demands eternal consequence. God is forever just and hence cannot overlook sin forever.

For another thing, it involves eternal separation of the saved from the lost, of righteousness from sin. Today, good and evil exist side by side. As Jesus said, the wheat (saved) and the tares (lost) must live together for the time being: “Let both grow together until the harvest. At that time I will tell the harvesters: ‘First collect the weeds and tie them in bundles to be burned; then gather the wheat and bring it into my barn’ ” (Matt. 13:30). For, in the end,

The Son of Man will send out his angels, and they will weed out of his kingdom everything that causes sin and all who do evil. They will throw them into the fiery furnace, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. (Matt. 13:41–42)

What frustrates good people is evil, and what frustrates evil people is good. The final solution demands a separation, where there will be no more evil to frustrate good persons and no more good to frustrate evil persons. Each will have it according to their respective wills: Sin will be defeated in the saved, since they will be rescued from its very presence, and sin will also be defeated in the unsaved, since they will no longer be able to spread it to others. The infection of evil will be forever halted by its everlasting quarantine. Therefore, the good will be forever preserved from evil's deadly effects.

Finally, evil is defeated because the good is actually victorious over it. Evil has been proven to be wrong in every age and in every way. Good can no longer be contaminated by it, and the righteous will reign while the wicked are in pain. The good will be unshackled from the presence of sin, and the evil will be forever enslaved by it. There will indeed be “no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying. There shall be no more pain, for the former things have passed away” (Rev. 21:4 NKJV).

THE DEFEAT OF SATAN

Sin will not ultimately be defeated until Satan is defeated. God’s plan to defeat evil, then, is also a plan to defeat the devil and his demons.

The Creation of the Devil

We have noted that God did not create the devil as such. Rather, He created pure spiritual beings, and some of them rebelled against Him, becoming “the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41). God created only good things (Gen. 1:31), for “every creature of God is good” (1 Tim. 4:4 NKJV). And God created all the heavenly host: “Praise Him, all His angels.... For He commanded and they were created” (Ps. 148:2, 5 NKJV). Paul said,

By him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him. (Col. 1:16 KJV)

The Fall of the Devil

As we have seen, while Ezekiel 28 speaks directly about the prince of Tyre, nonetheless it eloquently expresses truths about the one who inspired him, for Paul reminds us that pride brought Lucifer down (cf. 1 Tim. 3:6).

Speaking of the King of Tyre, who emulated Satan, the Lord said,

“You were the model of perfection, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. You were in Eden, the garden of God; every precious stone adorned you: ruby, topaz and emerald, chrysolite, onyx and jasper, sapphire, turquoise and beryl.... You were anointed as a guardian cherub, for so I ordained you. You were on the holy mount of God; you walked among the fiery stones.

You were blameless in your ways from the day you were created till wickedness was found in you. Through your widespread trade you were filled with violence, and you sinned. So I drove you in disgrace from the mount of God, and I expelled you, O guardian cherub, from among the fiery stones. Your heart became proud on account of your beauty, and you corrupted your wisdom because of your splendor. So I threw you to the earth” (Ezek. 28:12–17).

Speaking of the king of Babylon, Isaiah’s words also describe the one who inspired and typified his fall:

How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High. Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit. (Isa. 14:12–15 KJV)

The Fall of the Demons

Many good angels followed Satan in His rebellion against God. John wrote:

There appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth ... And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. (Rev. 12:3–4, 7–9 KJV)

Peter said, “God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment” (2 Peter 2:4 KJV). Again, Jude added, “The angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day” (Jude 6).

The Plan of the Devil and His Demons

The purpose of Satan can be determined in large part from his many names. He is “the prince of this world” (John 12:31; John 16:11); “the prince of the power of the air” (Eph. 2:2 NASB); “the god of this age” (2 Cor. 4:4); “Satan” (“adversary”—Zech. 3:1; Rev. 12:9); “the Devil” (“slanderer”—Luke Rev 4:2; Rev. 12:9); “the serpent” (“crafty”—Gen 3:1; “that ancient serpent” (Rev. 12:9); “the great dragon” (“terrifying”—Rev. 12:3, 7, 9); “the evil one” (John 17:15; 1 John 5:18); “the Destroyer” (Rev. 9:11); “the Tempter” (Matt. 4:3; 1 Thess. 3:5); “the Accuser” (Job 1:9; Zech. 3:1; Rev. 12:10); “the Deceiver” (Rev. 12:10; cf. Eph. 6:11); “the spirit who now works in the sons of disobedience” (Eph. 2:2 NKJV); “Beelzebub” (“prince of demons”—Matt. 12:25; Luke 11:15); “Baal-Zebub” (“Lord of high places”—2 Kings 1:3); “Abaddon” (“Apollyon,” “destroyer”—Rev. 9:11); “Belial” (2 Cor. 6:15), an “angel of light” (2 Cor. 11:14), and “the evil one” (1 John 5:19).

In brief, like the antichrist whom he inspires, the devil “opposes and exalts himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he sits as God in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God” (2 Thess. 2:4 NKJV). He not only opposes God, but he opposes God’s plan and God’s people. As John stated, he “accuses them [the saints] before our God day and night” (Rev. 12:10).

Satan’s tactics are to cause doubt, denial, disobedience, deception, and the destruction of God’s people and plan. Paul said, “No wonder, for ... Satan disguises himself as an angel of light” (2 Cor. 11:14 NASB).

The Defeat of the Devil and His Demons

The defeat of the devil, like the defeat of sin, is not accomplished in one blow. It was promised from the beginning, when God said to the serpent: “I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel.” This was not officially accomplished, however, until Christ died on the cross and rose again:

He forgave us all our sins, having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross. (Col. 2:14–15)

Just how did this happen? While the serpent was biting the heel of the Savior (by His crucifixion), the Savior was crushing the head of the serpent (by His resurrection). As one writer put it, Satan bit on the bait of Christ's humanity and was caught on the hook of His deity. The writer of Hebrews said, "Since the children have flesh and blood, he too shared in their humanity so that by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death—that is, the devil" (2:14).

The defeat of Satan is also in three stages.

Officially, it occurred (as the above verses indicate) on the Cross.

Practically, it is occurring through the purification of believers.

Actually, it will not occur until Christ's return.

These correspond to the aforementioned three stages of salvation in the believer's life: justification (salvation from the penalty of sin—official); sanctification (salvation from the power of sin—practical), and glorification (salvation from the presence of sin—actual).

Satan was defeated officially (legally) by the death of Christ (Rom. 3–5). He is defeated practically (applicationally) in our lives when we resist him by the power of the Cross (Rom. 6–7). And He will be defeated finally (ultimately) when Christ returns (Rom. 8) and redeems our bodies from death. In this connection, Paul promised the Romans, "The God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet" (Rom. 16:20):

We know that the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth right up to the present time. Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies. (Rom. 8:22–23)

In this final stage of salvation, the defeat of Satan (and his demons) will consist of two main elements.

First, the wheat and the tares, the sheep and the goats, will be separated from each other.

All the nations will be gathered before him, and he will separate the people one from another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats. He will put the sheep on his right and the goats on his left. Then the King will say to those on his right, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world." ... Then he will say to those on his left, "Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. 25:32–34, 41).

Second, not only will Satan be separated from the good so that he can no longer corrupt it, but he will be quarantined from spreading evil:

The devil who deceived them was thrown into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are also; and they will be tormented day and night forever and ever. Likewise, all his demons will be cast into the Lake of Fire with him. (Rev. 20:10 NASB)

John wrote, "The Son of God appeared for this purpose, to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3:8 NASB). Finally, in the end, he who was the great destroyer will be destroyed.

CONCLUSION

God permitted evil to defeat evil. He created only good creatures, but He permitted evil in order that He might ultimately conquer it. Satan, who was the great deceiver, was self-deceived; Paul speaks of “the wisdom which none of the rulers of this age has understood; for if they had understood it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory” (1 Cor. 2:8 NASB). While the serpent bit the Savior’s heel, Christ crushed the devil’s head. The defeat of sin has not been swift and immediate, but it will be complete and final.

PART TWO

SALVATION (SOTERIOLOGY)

CHAPTER SEVEN

THE ORIGIN OF SALVATION

S is the precondition for salvation; salvation isn't necessary unless there are sinners in need of being saved. As to the origin of salvation, there is universal agreement among orthodox theologians: God is the author of our salvation, for whereas human sin originated with human beings on earth, salvation originated with God in heaven.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR SALVATION

The topic at hand is divided into several soteriological sections: the origin of God's decrees, the nature of God's decrees, the order of God's decrees, and the results of God's decrees.

The Origin of God's Decrees

The origin of salvation is the will of God, who decreed from all eternity to provide salvation for those who would believe: "Salvation is of the Lord" (Jonah 2:9 NKJV). As John puts it, believers are "children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God" (John 1:13). Paul adds, "It does not, therefore, depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy" (Rom. 9:16), for "he predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will" (Eph. 1:5). In short, salvation originated in God's decision to save us. Otherwise, no one would ever be rescued.

With God, as with human beings in His image, free choice is self-determination; salvation is based in a free, self-determined act of God. This decision was made in accordance with His good and gracious nature, but the choice was completely self-determined (cf. Eph. 1:5; 1 Peter 1:2). There was no external or internal compulsion for God either to create or to save. He did both freely.

Election According to God's Foreknowledge

Peter spoke of the "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father" (1 Peter 1:2 NKJV). Thus, it is necessary that God act lovingly, since He is love (1 John 4:16), and it is also necessary that God act justly, since He is just (Gen. 18:25; Rom. 2:11; 3:26). However, it was not required that God create moral creatures; what is incumbent is that if God chooses to create moral creatures, that He then act consistently with His unchanging nature of love and justice and with the freedom He chose to give His creatures.

The Condition for Giving vs. the Condition for Receiving

Likewise, it is necessary that upon the conditions that God chose to create and to save free moral creatures, He does so in accordance with the freedom He gave them. Hence, there is no condition for God's giving salvation, but there is one (and only one) condition laid down for receiving the gift of eternal life: faith (Acts 16:31; Rom. 4:5; Eph. 2:8–9). Therefore, the reception of salvation is conditioned on our belief. Salvation is unconditioned from the perspective of the Giver, but it is conditioned from the view of the receiver (who must believe in order to receive it). In short, salvation comes from God, but we receive it through faith: “For by grace you have been saved through faith” (Eph. 2:8 NASB).

The Nature of God's Decrees

Whereas the source of salvation is God's choice to save us, the nature of salvation is God's grace. The wondrous gift of everlasting life is by grace and grace alone, “and if by grace, then it is no longer by works; if it were, grace would no longer be grace” (Rom. 11:6). Soteriologically, grace and works are mutually exclusive. “Working for grace” is a contradiction in terms, for “when a man works, his wages are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation” (Rom. 4:4). “However, to the man who does not work but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited as righteousness” (Rom. 4:5).

The Nature of Grace: Unmerited Favor

Grace, then, is unmerited favor. What we work for, we earn, and what we do not work for, we do not earn. Since salvation comes to us without works on our part, it follows that we did not merit it: Salvation is “the gift of God” (Rom. 6:23). God's salvific grace is His unmerited favor for us.

Some have contrasted grace and mercy by noting that grace is giving us what we did not deserve (viz., salvation), whereas mercy is not giving us what we did deserve (viz., condemnation). Although biblical usage of these terms does not necessarily accord with this distinction, the point is biblical nonetheless. God's actions of grace and mercy are two sides of His unconditional love for us.

The Object of Grace: Repentant Sinners

According to the Bible, God's grace of salvation is not bestowed automatically or unilaterally on sinners but is received only through faith. Paul is careful to qualify how God's gracious provision of eternal life is received: “It is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God” (Eph. 2:8). Elsewhere he adds,

Now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. (Rom. 3:21–22)

Again,

There is no difference [between persons], for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. (Rom. 3:22–25)

Even in the strongly stated words of Romans 9, the “objects of his wrath” are such because they did not repent: “What if God, choosing to show his wrath and make his power known, bore with great patience the objects of his wrath—prepared for destruction?” (v. 4:22). Why is God salvifically patient with us? Because, as Peter says, He doesn't want "anyone to perish, but [He wants] everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9).

The Relation of Grace and Wrath

Therefore, the rejection of grace incurs wrath, and the acceptance of grace brings salvation. As we have seen, like a person standing under Niagara Falls with an upside-down cup, the emptiness comes from rejecting the flow. By a simple act of repentance (turning the "cup" of the soul right side up), one can receive the blessings intended for him from the abundant flow of God's love.

The Order of God's Decrees

Whereas there is general agreement on the origin of salvation, theologians have long debated the order of God's salvific decrees. The fact of God's election is clear in Scripture; it is the progression of His choices relating to election that is the subject of much dialogue.

The main discussion on the order of God's decrees has followed along the lines indicated by the chart below, the primary question being whether God decreed to elect before or after He decreed to permit the Fall (Lat: lapsus).

The chart begins with the most Calvinistic on the left and proceeds to the Arminian (i.e., Wesleyan) view on the right. Various terms on the chart will be subsequently defined and explained.

THE ORDER OF GOD'S DECREES

Supralapsarianism	Infralapsarianism	Sublapsarianism	Wesleyanism
(1) Elect some and reprobate others	(1) Create all	(1) Create all	(1) Create all
(2) Create both the elect and the non-elect	(2) Permit the Fall	(2) Permit the Fall	(2) Permit the the Fall
(3) Permit the Fall	(3) Elect some and pass others by	(3) Provide salvation for all	(3) Provide salvation for all
(4) Provide salvation only for the elect	(4) Provide salvation only for the elect	(4) Elect those who believe and pass by those who do not	(4) Elect based on the fore seen faith of believers
(5) Apply salvation only to the elect	(5) Apply salvation only to the elect	(5) Apply salvation only to believers (who cannot lose it)	(5) Apply salvation only to believers (who can lose it)

The term supralapsarian is from the Latin supra (above) and lapsus (fall), meaning that God's decree of election (predestination) is considered by supralapsarians to be above, or logically prior to, His decree to permit the Fall. Since infra means "below," the infralapsarians consider God's decree of election to be beneath, or logically after, His decree to permit the Fall. The sublapsarians (Amyraldians) are similar to the infralapsarians, except they place God's order to provide salvation before His order to elect (see Chafer, ST, 2.105). Wesleyans adhere to the same basic order as infralapsarians, except they hold that God's election is based on His foreknowledge rather than simply in accord with it. Hence, for Wesleyans (Arminians), God's decree is conditional instead of unconditional (which is maintained by the three Calvinistic views).

Supralapsarians are hypter-Calvinists, being double-predestinarians. Infralapsarians are strong Calvinists but are not double-predestinarians. Sublapsarians (Amyraldians) are moderate Calvinists, holding to unlimited atonement. Again, Wesleyans are Arminians, insisting that election is conditional, not unconditional. Wesleyans also do not believe in eternal security, while adherents to the other views do.

The Sequence of God's Decrees

One of the primary problems with this discussion is the way it has been framed, namely, on the assumption that there is an order in the decrees of God. In view of God's attributes, one thing is clear: Whatever order there may be in God's choices, it is not chronological, since an eternal Being has no chronological sequence. God is both simple and eternal, and, as such, He does not think or act sequentially.

There Is No Chronological Order in God's Decrees

Being eternal (nontemporal), God does not have any time-related sequence in His thoughts or decisions. Whatever things He has thought and whatever actions He has done, He has thought and done simultaneously, from all eternity.

There Is No Logical Order in God's Decrees

Is there a logical order, though, to God's decrees? Not for Him. God does not think sequentially (i.e., discursively, having one thought after another). He knows all things immediately and intuitively in Himself, since He is simple, eternal, and immutable in His Being. As such, all that He knows and chooses is known and performed immediately and intuitively, from all eternity.

There Is an Operational Order in God's Decrees

Of course, there is an operational order in the execution of God's decrees. God eternally willed things to happen in a certain temporal sequence (one after the other), just as a doctor wills in advance the patient's cure by prescribing, for instance, the ingestion of a pill a day for a week. Hence, God willed, for example, that Creation would occur before the Fall, and that salvation would be provided after the Fall.

It makes no sense to speak of God having a logical order in His mind, as though one of His thoughts followed after another. All thoughts are known by God in one eternal intuition (i.e., co-intuition). As a simple Being, He therefore knows all things simply, which is why the Bible speaks of election as being "in accordance with" His will (Eph. 1:5; cf. 1 Peter 1:2) and not based on or independent of other attributes. All of God's attributes, thoughts, and decisions are eternal in accord with one another, and none is logically dependent on or independent of another. If it were, there would be a contradictory logical sequence in a God who has no multiplicity, not even in His thoughts.

The Results of God's Decrees

The results of God's salvific decrees are twofold: to provide salvation for all, and to apply salvation to those who believe.

Salvation Is Provided for All

The Bible is clear and emphatic: God desires all to be saved and, thus, He provided salvation for all humankind. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" (John 3:16 NKJV).

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. (Rom. 5:18)

"Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died" (2 Cor. 5:14). "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men's sins against them" (2 Cor. 5:19). God "wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:4). "We have put our hope in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, and especially of those who believe (1 Tim. 4:10). "The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men" (Titus 2:11). "[Jesus] suffered death, so that by the grace of God he might taste death for everyone" (Heb. 2:9). "He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2).

God willed from all eternity, then, to provide salvation for all humankind. Hence, Christ is "the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world" (Rev. 13:8; cf. Eph. 1:4).

Salvation Is Applied to Those Who Believe

However, while salvation was provided for all, it is applied only to those who believe. Some ask the question, "For whom was the Atonement designed?" Strong Calvinists respond by asking why, if the Atonement was intended for all, all are not saved. How can a sovereign God's intention be thwarted? (see chapter 12).

If, as strong Calvinists argue, the Atonement was intended only for some (the elect), then limited atonement follows. This leads to the apparent dilemma that either (1) the Atonement was intended for all or (2) the Atonement was intended only for some (the elect). If it was intended for all, then all will be saved (since God's sovereign intentions must come to pass), and if it was not intended for all, then it was intended only for some (the elect). Therefore, it would appear that either universalism is true or else limited atonement is true (see Sproul, CG, 205).

Of course, both moderate Calvinists and traditional Arminians deny universalism. Hence, in response to the supposed problem, it is only necessary to point out that the argument contains a false dilemma. There is a third alternative: The Atonement was intended to provide (offer) salvation for all as well as to procure (apply) salvation for those who believe.

In short, the problem is a false dichotomy, wrongly assuming either (1) that there was only one intention for the Atonement, or if understood in terms of a primary or single intention, (2) that the one purpose of the Atonement was to procure salvation for the elect. Actually, since God also wanted everyone to believe, He also intended that Christ would die to provide salvation for all people. The alternative—limited atonement—leads to a denial that God truly wants all persons to be saved—a belief contrary to His omnibenevolence as revealed in Scripture.

Salvation, then, was provided for all, but it is only applied to those who believe. "It is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God" (Eph. 2:8). "This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe"

(Rom. 3:22). Again, we “are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood” (Rom. 3:24–25).

THE THEOLOGICAL AND HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE ORIGIN OF SALVATION

Since the origin of salvation is found in the will of God as a loving Being (His omnibenevolence), the basis for God’s will to save sinful human beings is found in His omnipotence and its application involves the God-given power of human free choice.<sup>20</sup>

Because God is loving, and because love cannot force itself on the beloved (since, again, “forced love” is a contradiction), it was necessary that if God wished to love and to be loved by His creatures, He had to create them free. Testimony to the doctrine of human free will (both before and after the Fall) is found in abundance throughout the history of the church. In fact, with the explainable exception of the later Augustine, virtually every major father of the church has held that salvation is received by the free choice of human beings.

Since God is all-loving, He must love all. And since love is impossible for God and creatures without free will, both must be free. If God freely loves all His creatures and cannot force His love upon them, then there is one condition for receiving this love: the willingness to be loved. In short, not everyone will be saved because not everyone wills to be saved (cf. Matt. 23:37; 2 Peter 3:9).

Theologically, then, salvation originates in divine omnibenevolence and is received by human choice. Salvation is given by an act of God’s freedom, and it is received by an act of our freedom. To be sure, this act of freedom is aided by God’s grace, but His grace does not save apart from the co-operation of our will.

The Nature of God’s Freedom

Freedom in God means that He is self-determined, neither determined by another nor undetermined in His actions (which are caused by Himself).

No External Compulsion

Logically, God’s actions must be (1) caused by another, (2) uncaused, or (3) caused by Himself. Uncaused actions (indetermined) are contrary to the principle of causality; there is a cause for every event. God’s actions cannot be caused by another (determined), since there is no force outside of Him capable of determining His actions (the sovereign God cannot be forced to do anything by anyone else). While self-caused being is contrary to the law of noncontradiction, God’s actions must be caused by Himself (self-determined).

No Internal Compulsion

Likewise, God’s actions cannot be internally compelled. “Forced freedom” is a contradiction regardless of whether the alleged force comes from without or from within. As opposed to the suggestion of pantheism, God’s choice to create (and to save) was not determined by His nature. Creation flows freely from God’s will, and, as God’s will is identical to His nature, it is of His nature that God is free to create or not to create. As we saw in Volume 2, He did not create because He had to but because He wanted to. Creation does not come from God like a flower unfolds from a seed; rather, it flows like love from a lover—freely.

Internal Consistency

While salvation does not flow from God necessarily (i.e., by compulsion) but freely, nevertheless, it is consistent with His moral nature that God chose to provide salvation for all and to save those who believe. Even so, it was not necessary that God create or elect anyone; election is an unconditional act. There are no conditions for God's choice to provide salvation; however, again, there is one condition for us to receive it—a free act of faith in God. This is demanded both by the nature of God as all-loving and by the nature of free creatures, who alone are able to love Him.

The Nature of God's Omnibenevolence

God's freedom is rooted in His unchanging love; He cannot act contrary to His own nature. For example, since God is truth, "it is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18; cf. Titus 1:2), and since God is love, it is impossible for Him not to love whatever is good. Since God's omnibenevolence has already been treated extensively,<sup>27</sup> the main points will be only summarized here.

God has said, "I have loved you with an everlasting love; I have drawn you with loving-kindness" (Jer. 31:3). "God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). "Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died" (2 Cor. 5:14). "Because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ" (Eph. 2:4–5). "Live a life of love, just as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us as a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God" (Eph. 5:2). "When the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared, he saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (Titus 3:4–5). "How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!" (1 John 3:1).

Dear friends, let us love one another, for love comes from God. Whoever does not love does not know God, because God is love. This is how God showed his love among us: He sent his one and only Son into the world that we might live through him. This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins. (1 John 4:7–10)

Theologically, God's omnibenevolence flows from a logical connection between love and several of His metaphysical attributes.

God's Infinity and Simplicity Imply Omnibenevolence

God is infinite in His essence, and love is of the essence of God (1 John 4:16). Therefore, God must be infinite love.

God's essence is also simple, which means that He is indivisible, having no parts. Therefore, God cannot be partly anything, and since God is loving, it follows that He must be wholly and completely loving.

God's Necessity Implies Omnibenevolence

God is a necessary Being, and God is love; hence, God necessarily is love—He cannot not love. He must love Himself, and if He chooses to create beings like Himself, then He must necessarily love them—all of them. In addition, there is no conflict between necessity and freedom in God, since it is of His necessary nature that all creation and salvation flow freely from Him. Further, freedom in God does not mean “the power of contrary choice in moral matters” (e.g., the ability to do evil rather than good). God’s freedom in moral matters, as His basic freedom in all matters, is the power of self-determined actions. In this sense, there is no logical contradiction between freedom and the necessity to love all He creates.

Implications of God’s Omnibenevolence

Two important soteriological implications, following from the omnibenevolence of God, must again be observed.

Implications for the Doctrine of Irresistible Grace

All Calvinists believe in some form of irresistible grace: Extreme Calvinists and strong Calvinists believe grace is irresistible on the unwilling, and moderate Calvinists believe grace is irresistible on the willing. In view of God’s omnibenevolence, it follows that grace cannot be irresistible on the unwilling, for a God of complete love cannot force anyone to act against his or her will. “Forced love” is intrinsically impossible; a loving God can work persuasively but not coercively. C. S. Lewis aptly commented,

The Irresistible and the Indisputable are the two weapons which the very nature of His scheme forbids Him to use. Merely to override a human will ... would be for Him useless. He cannot ravish. He can only woo. (SL, 38)

Implications for Universalism

As we saw in Volume 2 (chapter 15), God’s omnibenevolence renders universalism untenable. Though an omnipotent God can do whatever is possible, an omnibenevolent God is only able to do what is moral, and there would be nothing morally right about forcing moral beings to go against their will. God clearly wants all to be saved, but “irresistible grace on the unwilling” is in opposition to God-given human freedom. Hence, there is no guarantee (such as is offered by universalism) that all people will be saved; God’s omnibenevolence will not allow Him to do everything His omnipotence could otherwise do.

It simply begs the question to argue that all will eventually become willing. How? By having their freedom fettered? If so, then they would not truly be free, at any rate. It is contrary to both Scripture and experience to insist that all will eventually choose to follow God freely.

In addition, if strong Calvinism is correct in maintaining that God can force people (by irresistible grace) to be saved, then the only way supralapsarians and infralapsarians can avoid universalism (which, again, is plainly false) is by denying that God is omnibenevolent. The reason for this is that if God can save anyone He wants to save, even apart from the response of free will (the assertion of strong Calvinists), and if God really loves all (omnibenevolence) and wants all to be saved, then all will be saved ... which is universalism. Therefore, we insist that God is all-loving, and, as such, He cannot coerce free choices—it would be contradictory for Him to do so, and God cannot do what is contradictory.

Monergism vs. Synergism

This raises the hotly debated theological issue of monergism vs. synergism. Strong Calvinists maintain that the moment of conversion (regeneration) is totally the result of God's operation, without any cooperation on the human's part. This is sometimes called operative grace, as opposed to cooperative grace. Regeneration (conversion) is thus said to be a monergistic act (meaning, "His work alone"). However, according to strong Calvinists, at every point after regeneration, our will cooperates with God's actions for the purpose of our sanctification (purification); all of this subsequent work of grace is acknowledged to be synergistic (meaning, "our work together"; see Sproul, WB, 119).

That is, for the strong Calvinist, humans are completely passive with regard to the beginning of their salvation, but they are active in cooperating with God's grace from that point forward. This view was held, for instance, by the later Augustine, Martin Luther, John Calvin, Jonathan Edwards, and Francis Turretin. The Synod of Dort, following the later Augustine, even used the illustration of the "resurrection from the dead" of God's work on the unregenerate.<sup>35</sup>

As stated, the strong Calvinist view of an initial monergism is based on the belief that God exercises irresistible grace on the unwilling. This would be a violation of God-given human free choice. There are several reasons for rejecting monergism.

Monergism Is Not Supported by the Bible

Scripture does not support the view that irresistible grace is exercised on the unwilling; the Bible affirms that all can and some do resist the grace of God. Jesus lamented,

O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing. (Matt. 23:37; cf. 2 Peter 3:9)

Stephen spoke of the stiff-necked people of God, charging, "You always resist the Holy Spirit!" (Acts 7:51).

In the days of Noah, "The LORD said, 'My Spirit shall not strive with man forever'" (Gen. 6:3 NKJV). Indeed, while the Holy Spirit "will convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (John 16:8 NKJV), not all the world will respond. During His earthly ministry, and in spite of His supernatural works, Jesus did not convince everyone of the need to be saved. Indeed, He pronounced that some had so rejected the work of the Holy Spirit that they "blasphemed against" Him and, hence, would never receive forgiveness but would be "subject to eternal condemnation" (Mark 3:28–29 NKJV).

Monergism Is Not Supported by the Church Fathers

Besides the later Augustine, who was caught up in the donatist controversy, no major Fathers up to the Reformation held to irresistible grace on the unwilling. For example, Augustine earlier (and correctly) stated:

God is said to be “our Helper;” but nobody can be helped who does not make some effort of his own accord. For God does not work out salvation in us as if he were working in insensate stones, or in creatures in whom nature has placed neither reason nor will. (OFSB, 2.28)

Even Martin Luther’s perspective, the first major one after the later Augustine to argue for irresistible grace on the unwilling, was reversed by his disciple and systematizer, Philip Melancthon (1497–1560), whom subsequent Lutherans followed. Likewise, John Calvin’s view was opposed by Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) and is rejected by all moderate Calvinists.

Monergism Is Contrary to the “Protestant Principle”

One of the fundamental principles of Protestantism is “salvation by faith alone” (Lat: sola fidei). If salvation comes by faith—which Scripture plainly affirms—then faith is logically prior to being regenerated. Again, as to whether regeneration is prior to faith or faith is prior to regeneration, the Bible is clear. We are saved through faith (Eph. 2:8–9); we are justified by faith (Rom. 5:1); we must believe in Christ in order to be saved (Acts 16:31). In each case, faith is logically prior to salvation. We do not get saved in order to believe; rather, we believe in order to become saved.

Monergism Is Contrary to God’s Omnibenevolence

Strong Calvinists admit to believing that God is not all-loving in a redemptive sense: They maintain that He loves, sent Christ to die for, and attempts to save only the elect. However, this is contrary to Scripture; an all loving God (1 John 4:16) loves all (John 3:16) and wants all to come to salvation (1 Tim. 2:4–5; cf. 2 Peter 3:9).

Monergism Is Contrary to God-Given Free Will

Since love is always persuasive but never coercive, God cannot force anyone to love Him—and this is what “irresistible grace on the unwilling” would do. God’s persuasive but resistible love goes hand in glove with God-given human free choice. Again, human free will is self-determination, involving the ability to choose otherwise. We can either accept or reject God’s grace.

In brief, God’s saving grace works synergistically with free will; that is, it must be received to be effective. There are no conditions for giving grace, but there is one condition for receiving it—faith. Put in other terms, God’s grace works cooperatively, not operatively. Faith is the precondition for receiving God’s gift of salvation, and faith is prior to regeneration, since we are “saved through faith” (Eph. 2:8 NKJV) and “justified through faith” (Rom. 5:1).

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO THE ORIGIN OF SALVATION

Since many of the following objections revolve around the love of God and the freedom of humanity, they have already been addressed in some form. Only the prominent ones will be briefly repeated here.

Objection One—Based on the Idea That Necessary Love Is Contradictory

Love is a free act, flowing from one's free choice, and a person cannot be forced to love. If this is so, then love cannot flow from the essence of God, since God's essence is necessary. Hence, salvation must flow from God's will and not from His unchangeable nature.

Response to Objection One

Love and necessity are not contradictory, but love and compulsion are. It is of the nature of God that He loves, and since God's nature is necessary, it is necessary that God loves. Further, since love is a free act, it is necessary that God loves freely. Consequently, it is not contradictory for love to be both necessary and free; this simply means that God, by His very nature, must love. Since love must be expressed freely, then it is of the necessary nature of God that he loves freely; that is because His will is in accord with His nature, His freely chosen love is in accordance with His necessary and unchanging essence.

Objection Two—Based on God's Unique Love for the Elect

Strong Calvinists claim that God does not salvifically love all people, insisting that Christ died only for the elect. If this is true, then God is not omnibenevolent. For instance: "He chose us" (not "all"—Eph. 1:4); "Christ died for our sins" (1 Cor. 15:3); "I lay down my life for the sheep" (John 10:15); "Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her" (Eph. 5:25).

Response to Objection Two

The fact that only believers are mentioned in some passages as the object of Christ's death does not prove that the Atonement is limited, for several reasons.

First, Paul also said that Jesus "gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20), yet no proponent of limited atonement takes this to exclude the fact that Christ died for others as well.

Second, when the Bible uses terms like we, our, or us of the Atonement, it speaks only of those to whom it has been applied, not for all those for whom it was provided. In doing so, Scripture does not thereby limit the Atonement.

Third, and finally, the fact that Jesus loves His bride and died for her (Eph. 5:25) does not mean that God the Father and Jesus the Son do not love the whole world and desire them to be part of His bride, the church. John 3:16 explicitly says otherwise.

Objection Three—Based on God's Loving Jacob and Hating Esau

According to Romans 9, God loved Jacob and hated Esau (v. 13); He has mercy on some but not on others (v. 15); He destines some to destruction and not others (v. 22); He hardens the hearts of some (in unbelief) but not others (v. 18). From these examples, it seems obvious that God is not omnibenevolent when it comes to salvation.

Response to Objection Three

This is a misinterpretation of these texts.

First, the passage is not speaking about electing individuals but nations. Esau is the nation of Edom that came from him (cf. Mal. 1:2), and Jacob is the nation of Israel that came from him (cf. 9:2–3).

Second, the passage is not referring to the election of individuals to salvation but of Israel being chosen as a national channel through which the eternal blessing of salvation, through Christ, would come to all (cf. Gen. 12:1–3; Rom. 9:4–5). In addition, even though Israel as a nation was chosen by God, not every individual in Israel was elected to be saved (9:6).

Third, the word hate (Gk: emisesa, from miseo), in this case, means “to love less” or “to regard with less affection”; it does not mean “not to love at all” or “not to will the good of the person.” This is evident, for instance, from Genesis 29:30–31: The phrase “loved Rachel more than Leah” is used as the equivalent of “Leah was hated” (cf. also Matt. 10:37).

Fourth, Pharaoh hardened his own heart against God (cf. Ex. 7:13–14; 8:15, 19, 32) before God hardened it (Ex. 9:12). The purpose of the ten plagues upon Egypt was to convince Pharaoh to repent; since he refused, his heart was hardened as a result of his own actions. Repeatedly we have seen that the same sun that melts wax, hardens clay. The problem is not with the source but with the receptivity of the agent on which it is acting.

Fifth, and finally, the “vessels of wrath” (Rom. 9:22 NKJV) were not destined to destruction against their will. Indeed, they were such because they rejected God even as He “endured with much longsuffering,” waiting for them to repent (cf. 2 Peter 3:9).

Objection Four—Based on the Idea That Omnibenevolence Must Lead to Universalism

If God loves all people and therefore desires all of them to be saved, then why are not all people saved? He is omnipotent, and an all-powerful Being, allegedly, can do whatever He wants to do. Further, God is sovereignly in control of all things, and His will cannot be thwarted—He accomplishes whatever He sets out to do (Isa. 55:11). If God can accomplish whatever He desires, and if He desires to save all, then it seems to follow that all will be saved (universalism).

Response to Objection Four

As we have observed, God’s ultimate will is always accomplished, but His immediate will is not. This is because God wills some things conditionally and others unconditionally. Salvation is willed on the condition of our accepting it (cf. John 1:12; 3:16). Neither omnipotence nor omnibenevolence is in question (2 Peter 3:9; cf. Matt. 23:37).

In addition, it is not true that an all-powerful God can do anything and everything. Again: He cannot do what is contradictory (cf. Heb. 6:18; 2 Tim. 2:13). So while God is all-powerful (omnipotent) He must exercise His power in accordance with His love (all-goodness). His love cannot (and thus will not) force someone to love Him.

Objection Five—Based on God Having Power That Is Not Used

Extreme Calvinists argue that God is not obligated to exercise love toward everyone just because He is all-loving any more than He must exercise His power toward everyone just because He is omnipotent. Simply stated, from this viewpoint, God can have more love than He uses, just as He has more power than He uses.

Response to Objection Five

First of all, love is a moral attribute of God, while power is nonmoral; it is a category mistake to confuse them. Moral attributes bind God to act in a certain way because they are moral attributes; nonmoral attributes do not because they are not. For example, that God has the power to create more worlds does not mean He must do so.

Furthermore, it is inconsistent to argue (as extreme Calvinists do) that God must always act justly by virtue of His being all-just, while at the same time maintaining that He does not always have to act lovingly by virtue of His being all-loving. If God's omnibenevolence were not to compel Him to love all people, then, likewise, God's justice would not obligate Him to condemn all sin—but it does, just as His love binds Him to love all sinners.

Objection Six—Based on What Sinners Deserve

We are saved by God's grace, but grace isn't deserved by any sinner, which means any of us. On the contrary, justice demands that all sin be condemned.

Response to Objection Six

It is true that there is nothing in sinners that prompts God to save us. Rather, as rightly objected, justice must condemn us in our sinfulness. However, it is also true that there is something in God that prompts Him to save us: His love. Since God is essentially omnibenevolent, He must try to save His fallen creatures. Therefore, God does not have to show love because we deserve it (we don't), but because His nature demands it. Love is not an arbitrary attribute of God, but is rooted in His necessary nature. Hence, if He is all loving, then He must love all.

Objection Seven—From a Monergistic Perspective

The central argument against the salvific synergism implied in the above discussion is that it supposedly makes human beings responsible for their own eternal life. Thus, such synergism seems to suggest a kind of works salvation, taking the sole glory from God and making salvation dependent (in part) upon the actions of human beings.

Response to Objection Seven

This criticism overlooks several important factors.

First, in synergistic salvation, the origin and initiative of justification is solely from God. Humans simply respond to receive the gift He has offered.

Second, faith is not a form of works; rather it is an acknowledgment that as sinners we are totally incapable of saving ourselves and must depend upon God's grace to be eternally rescued. As the apostle Paul points out, there's a big difference between meriting something that is earned and receiving an unmerited gift (Rom. 4:4–5). It is a twisted logic that attempts to give the credit for salvation to the receiver rather than to the Giver.

Third, and finally, the monergist confuses an action (faith) with a work. All works are actions, but not all actions are works. The act of faith, by which we acknowledge that we cannot work for or merit our salvation, is not a work. Again, as Paul emphatically affirms,

When a man works, his wages are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation. However, to the man who does not work but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited as righteousness. (Rom. 4:4–5)

Objection Eight—From a Broadly Deterministic Vantage Point

Pantheists and other determinists contend that if God is a necessary Being, is it not necessary, on the basis of His necessity alone, that He wills to save? No, it isn't. The only necessity placed on a necessary Being is the necessity that it be what it is; therefore, God cannot be other than God, and no contingent being or thing can place any necessity on Him. How, then, can God be both free and necessary? How can He be a necessary Being and yet also free to create and to save?

Response to Objection Eight

By His very nature as a personal Being, it is necessary that God be free with regard to morality. That is, it is of necessity that as a moral Being, God must be a free Being. Hence, the will to create and to save free beings is a free moral decision of a free moral Being (God). Again, it is of the very nature of God that He be free; as such, God is both necessary and free—it is necessary that He be free.

Objection Nine—From a Neotheistic Perspective

So-called “open theists” suggest that if God originated and determined (by His free choice) who would be saved, from all eternity, then we cannot be free. Their argument can be stated as follows:

- (1) Whatever God knows infallibly must come to pass.
- (2) Whatever must come to pass could not have been otherwise.
- (3) What is freely chosen could have been otherwise.
- (4) Therefore, if God foreordained who would be saved, then none of us had a choice in the matter, and consequently we cannot be free.

Neotheists also contend that if God knows the future infallibly, then it must occur the way He knows it, or else He would be wrong in what He knows. If the future must occur according to that knowledge, then God is not free to change it. Hence, a God who knows the future infallibly is not really free (in the sense that He could have chosen otherwise regarding the future).

The argument can also be stated this way: If God knew eternally what would happen in the future, then God's knowing this is part of the past and is now fixed, impossible to change. And,

Since God is infallible, it is completely impossible that things will turn out differently than God expects them to turn out. [But] if God knows that a person is going to perform [a certain action], then it is impossible that the person fail to perform it—so one does not have a free choice whether or not to perform it. (Pinnock, OG, 147)

Response to Objection Nine

In reply, several things should be noted.

For one thing, God could be free in the non-libertarian sense of doing what He desires. As mentioned previously, this view is open to strong Calvinists in the tradition of Jonathan Edwards.

However, for moderate Calvinists and Arminians, another alternative is also possible. God could be free to create in a libertarian sense (of having the power of contrary choice, i.e., the freedom to do otherwise), or even in the broader sense of having the power of self-determining choice; either way, He could still know the future with certainty (meaning, the future is determined). As Anselm observed, there is a difference between antecedent and consequent necessity. If God wills the future to be a certain way, then by consequent necessity it must be that way. But God was free not to will it as such; hence, He had antecedent freedom with regard to which way the future would occur. God could have chosen to create a different world, yet when God decides to make a certain world, His omniscience knows how everything will occur by consequent necessity.

Being a simple Being, God's will and knowledge are coordinate; He knows what He wills, and He wills what He knows. In fact, He knows eternally what He wills eternally, and He wills eternally what He knows eternally. One is not subsequent to the other, either chronologically (since He is not temporal) or logically (since He knows intuitively, not sequentially).

Also, the argument from open theism wrongly assumes that God knows in the way we know and also wills in the way that we will—that God does have foreknowledge of what we will do and, thus, reacts accordingly. This is an incorrect perception. An eternal Being does not really fore know anything as future; He knows it all in His eternal Now. Hence, God's decisions are not determined "in advance" of His knowing our free choices. Indeed, God knew our temporal choices from eternity, not by foreseeing them outside Himself, but by seeing them inside Himself in the same way that effects preexist in their Cause. Our free choices, then, are not determined "in advance"; God does not actually fore see what will happen—He simply sees, within the infinity of His own nature, all that will proceed from it and participate in it. God, in everlasting perspective, sees in Himself the entire course of time. God is proactive, not reactive, in what He will in accord with what He knows.

Thus, no free action is so determined in advance so that it could not have been otherwise. If we had chosen otherwise, then God would have seen it from all eternity. As a result, humans can be free in the libertarian sense (of having the ability to do otherwise—contrary choice), and God can eternally know all of this without violating our freedom.

CONCLUSION

Salvation originates with God, being based in an unconditional act of His boundless love and unmerited favor (grace). Nonetheless, once again, while there are no conditions for God's giving salvation, there is one condition for our receiving it: faith. God has sovereignly willed it this way; salvation is by grace but comes through our belief. Faith is a free act on the part of the recipient, for an omnibenevolent God must not only love all, but He must respect the freedom He freely gave to His creatures. It is necessary for God to act in accordance with His own perfect nature, and love is of this very essence.

CHAPTER EIGHT

THEORIES OF SALVATION

All evangelical theologians agree that Christ died “for our sins” (1 Cor. 15:3). Likewise, all believe that Christ made atonement for us. However, there is considerable divergence among theologians on how the Atonement works.

This, naturally, has led to many theories of the Atonement. A review of the main viewpoints will be helpful in achieving a better understanding of salvation in its broadest dimensions.

VARIOUS THEORIES OF THE ATONEMENT

Not all theories of the Atonement can be justified biblically. Some are incompatible with others, and many, while having an element of truth, are not adequate explanations of how salvation is accomplished. All of them, however, are illuminating and in some way widen our knowledge of this profound and crucial subject.

Brief evaluation will accompany the theories, but an attempt to view salvation in an extensive, biblically based, theologically satisfactory manner is set forth in chapter 9. By and large, the views will be discussed in the order of their first appearance in history.

The Recapitulation Theory of the Atonement

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202) was the first church father to propose the recapitulation theory. He held,

The fully divine Christ became fully man in order to sum up all humanity in himself. What was lost through the disobedience of the first Adam was restored through the obedience of the second Adam. [That is,] Christ went through all the stages of human life, resisted all temptations, died and arose a victor over death and the devil. [Hence,] the benefits of Christ’s victory are available through participation in him. (Elwell, BDT, 569)

The primary text used to support this position is Romans 5:18–21, where Paul states:

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous.

In the words of Irenaeus,

[God] caused man (human nature) to cleave to and to become one with God. For unless man had overcome the enemy of man, the enemy would not have been legitimately vanquished.... Unless man had been joined to God, he could never have become partaker of incorruptibility.... Wherefore also He [Christ] passed through every stage of life, restoring to all communion with God. [For] as by the disobedience of the one man [Adam], who was originally moulded from virgin soil, the many were made sinners, and forfeited life; so was it necessary that, by the obedience of one man [Jesus], who was originally born from a virgin, many should be justified and receive salvation. [Thus,] God recapitulated in himself the ancient formation of man, that He might kill sin, deprive death of its power, and vivify man. (AH, 18.7)

The Ransom Theory of the Atonement

Forms of the ransom theory were widely held by various fathers of the church, beginning with Origen (c. 185–c. 254), who proposed that Christ's death was paid to Satan to purchase human beings, who were captive in sin, and set them free. Used as a basis is Mark 10:45, where Jesus said, "Even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many." Likewise, Paul reminded: "You were bought at a price" (1 Cor. 6:20).

Origen wrote: "Now it was the devil that held us, to whose side we had been drawn away by our sins. He asked, therefore, as our price the blood of Christ" (CR, 2.13). Of course, Satan got the short end of the deal, for after demanding Christ's blood from the Father, his own doom was sealed by Christ's death and victorious resurrection. According to the ransom theory, Satan released humankind (for the payment made to him by Christ to the Father), only to discover that he could not hold Christ (who rose and thus defeated death).

Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335–c. 395) explained the plot of redemption this way:

The Deity [of Christ] was hidden under the veil of our nature, so that, as with ravenous fish, the hook of the Deity might be gulped down along with the bait of flesh. (C, 22)

Because this idea seemed, to many Christians, to suggest a deceptive action on God's part, Gregory expanded the theory in an attempt to show how it maintained God's justice. He reasoned that since our bondage to Satan is of our own choosing, it would have been unjust to rob Satan of his captives by some arbitrary method (ibid.); therefore, a payment to Satan had to be made. Although the whole transaction may seem to have been a deception, Gregory reasoned that Satan got his due and that God's motive (His love of human beings) was pure. Gregory argued:

As regards the aim and purpose of what took place, a change in direction of the nobler is involved ... the enemy [Satan] effected his deception for the ruin of our nature.... He who is at once the just, and good, and wise one [God], used His device, in which there was deception, for the salvation of him [humanity] who had perished, and thus not only conferred benefits on the lost one, but on him too who had wrought our ruin. (ibid., 24)

Augustine (354–430), another ransom-theory adherent, differently explained God’s tactics in defeating Satan. Although he too thought of the Cross as bait or a trap, he maintained that Satan’s deception is not something God did but what Satan did to himself—God simply permitted the self-deception of Satan to accomplish our salvation (OT, 13.12). Satan was a victim of his own pride—the fatal flaw he had from the beginning (1 Tim. 3:6).

After Anselm, the ransom theory waned but was later resurrected by Gustaf Aulen (1879–1978) with a new emphasis—God’s triumph (CV, 26–27). This view is sometimes called the victory theory or drama theory of the Atonement, and it maintains that the central point of the Cross is God’s triumph over Satan. In Aulen’s own words:

Let it be added, in conclusion, that if the classic idea of the Atonement ever again resumes a leading place in Christian theology, it is not likely that it will revert to precisely the same forms of expression that it has used in the past; its revival will not consist in a putting back of the clock. It is the idea itself that will be essentially the same: the fundamental idea that the Atonement is, above all, a movement of God to man, not in the first place a movement of man to God. We shall hear again its tremendous paradoxes: that God, the all-ruler, the Infinite, yet accepts the lowliness of the Incarnation; we shall hear again the old realistic message of the conflict of God with the dark, hostile forces of evil, and His victory over them by the Divine self-sacrifice; above all, we shall hear again the note of triumph.

For my own part, I am persuaded that no form of Christian teaching has any future before it except such as can keep steadily in view the reality of the evil in the world, and go to meet the evil with a battle-song of triumph. Therefore I believe that the classic idea of the Atonement and of Christianity is coming back—that is to say, the genuine, authentic Christian faith, (ibid., 158–59)

Unlike other theories of the Atonement, in this case Christ’s work on the cross was not directed toward God or toward human beings, but instead toward victory over the devil: “The atonement is a divine victory overcoming the destructive powers of hell and death, making available and visible the reconciling love of God” (Elwell, BDT, 107).

The Moral-Example Theory of the Atonement

In the fourth century, Pelagius (c. 354–c. 420) offered a view of the Atonement called the moral-example theory. According to this position, Christ’s death provided an example of faith and obedience that inspires others to be obedient to God. The exhortation of 1 Peter 2:21 is often used to support this view: “To this you were called, because Christ suffered for you, leaving you an example, that you should follow in his steps.”

Translator Theodore De Bruyn states in Pelagius’s Commentary on St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans:

Adam and Christ are not, however, equal as antetype and type. Pelagius, following Paul, observes that Christ has begun something immeasurably greater than Adam. Whereas Adam led only himself and his descendants into death, Christ frees not only those who have lived after him, but also those who were born before him and were alive in his lifetime (Rom. 5:15). Furthermore, whereas Adam destroyed righteousness by his example of sin, Christ not only provides an example of righteousness, but also has the power to forgive past sins. [Rom. 5:16] (41)

De Bruyn continues:

The first verses of [Romans] 8 elaborate what was announced in the last verse of [Romans] 7 to show how Christ frees one from sin and enables one to be righteous—neither of which the law was able to effect (Rom. 8:1–4). By his death Christ makes it possible for the sins of the “carnal person” to be forgiven, and by his life Christ provides an example of the way sin can be overcome (Rom. 8:3). As a result one is expected to refrain from sin and increase in holiness, embarking on a process of sanctification ... in the gifts of the Spirit. (ibid., 44)

Faustus Socinius (1539–1604) perpetuated this view, which was later adopted by the unitarians. His followers (the socinians) minimized the role of Christ as Priest in favor of His other two ministries as Prophet and King. They stressed His beautiful and perfect moral example of God’s total love for us, which provides the inspiration for us to live life in honor of Christ (cf. Rom. 5:8). Socinians also appealed primarily to 1 Peter 2:21, and, as referenced in Millard Erickson’s Christian Theology,

Other passages appealed to include 1 John 2:6: “He who says he abides in him [Christ] ought to walk in the same way in which he [Christ] walked” (RSV). It is however, only in 1 Peter 2:21 that we find an explicit connection drawn between Christ’s example and his death. (Socinius, CRBI, 1.667, as cited in Erickson, CT, 784)

The Necessary-Satisfaction Theory of the Atonement

In the latter years of the Middle Ages, another view of the Atonement emerged in the famous writing of Anselm (1033–1109), called Cur Deus Homo (“Why the God-Man?”). This position is called the necessary-satisfaction theory because of its affirmation that it was necessary for God’s offended justice and honor to be satisfied by a penalty only Christ could pay. As the God-man, His death had infinite value and, therefore, could restore the honor due to an infinitely holy God. Since God cannot simply remit sins—reparation must be paid—this view is sometimes called the commercial theory of the Atonement.

However, Anselm, unlike with Origen’s ransom theory, held that the payment had to be paid to God, not to Satan, for it is God who is offended by sin and who, therefore, must be compensated. Anselm’s comments unfold naturally under several headings.

Sin Puts Us in Debt to God

What is the debt which we owe to God? Every wish of a rational creature should be subject to the will of God. Nothing is more sure. This is the debt which man and angels owe to God, and no one who pays this debt commits sins; but everyone who does not pay it sins. This is justice or uprightness of will, which makes a being just or upright in heart, that is, in will, and this is the sole and complete debt of honor which we owe to God, and which God requires of us... He who does not render this honor which is due to God, robs God of his own and dishonors him; and this is sin. (CDH, I.XI)

In the order of things, there is nothing less to be endured than that the creature should take away the honor due the Creator, and not restore what he has taken away. (ibid., I.XIII)

Can you think that man, who has sinned, and never made satisfaction to God for his sin, but only been suffered to go unpunished, may become the equal of an angel who has never sinned? (ibid., I.XIX)

God Is Just and Cannot Overlook Sin

Again, if there is nothing greater or better than God, there is nothing more just than supreme justice, which maintains God's honor in the arrangement of things, and which is nothing else but God himself. (ibid., I.XIII)

Therefore God maintains nothing with more justice than the honor of his own dignity. Does it seem to you that he wholly preserves it, if he allows himself to be so defrauded of it as that he should neither receive satisfaction nor punish the one defrauding him? (ibid.)

“Even God cannot raise to happiness any being at all by the debt of sin, because He ought not to” (ibid., I.XXI).

We Cannot Pay Our Own Debt of Sin

Listen to the voice of strict justice; and judge according to that whether man makes to God a real satisfaction for his sin, unless by overcoming the devil, man restores to God what he took from God in allowing himself to be conquered by the devil; so that as by this conquest over man the devil took what belonged to God, and God was the loser, so in man's victory the devil may be despoiled, and God recover his right. Surely nothing can be more exactly or justly conceived. Think you that supreme justice can violate this justice? I dare not think it. (ibid., I.XXIII)

When you render anything to God which you owe him, irrespective of your past sin, you should not reckon this as the debt which you owe for sin.... But what do you give to God by your obedience, which is not owed him already, since he demands from you all that you are and have and can become? (ibid., I.XX)

“If in justice I owe God myself and all my powers, even when I do not sin, I have nothing left to render to him for my sin” (ibid.). “Therefore you make no satisfaction unless you restore something greater than the amount of that obligation, which should restrain you from committing the sin” (ibid., I.XXI).

Moreover, so long as [man] does not restore what he has taken away, he remains in fault; and it will not suffice merely to restore what has been taken away, but, considering the contempt offered, he ought to restore more than he took away. For as one who imperils another's safety, without making some compensation for the anguish incurred; so he who violates another's honor does not enough by merely rendering honor again, but must, according to the extent of the injury done, make restitution in some way satisfactory to the person whom he has dishonored. (ibid., I.XI)

God Cannot Forgive Sins Without the Debt Being Paid

Let us return and consider whether it were proper for God to put away sins by compassion alone, without any payment of the honor taken from him.... To remit sin in this manner is nothing else than not to punish; and since it is not right to cancel sin without compensation or punishment; if it be not punished, then is it passed by undischarged. [And] it is not fitting for God to pass over anything in his kingdom undischarged.... There is also another thing which follows if sin be passed by unpunished, viz., that with God there will be no difference between the guilty and the not guilty; and this is unbecoming to God. (ibid., I.XII)

Truly, such compassion on the part of God is wholly contrary to the Divine justice, which allows nothing but punishment as the recompense of sin. Therefore, as God cannot be inconsistent with himself, his compassion cannot be of this nature. (ibid., I.XXIV)

It [is] not fitting for God to do anything unjustly, or out of course, it does not belong to his liberty or compassion or will to let the sinner go unpunished, who makes no return to God of what the sinner has defrauded him. (ibid., I.XII)

Therefore the honor taken away must be repaid, or punishment must follow; otherwise either God will not be just to himself, or he will be weak in respect to both parties; and this is impious even to think of. (ibid.)

Briefly put, “satisfaction or punishment must follow every sin” (ibid., I.XV).

If it is unfitting for God to elevate man with any stain upon him, to that for which he made him free from all stain, lest it should seem that God had repented of his good intent, or was unable to accomplish his designs; far more is it impossible, on account of the same unfitness, that no man should be exalted to that state for which he was made. (ibid., I.XXV)

Only the God-Man Can Pay the Debt of Sin

How, then, shall man be saved, if [man] neither pays what he owes, and ought not to be saved without paying? Or, with what face shall we declare that God, who is rich in mercy above all human conception, cannot exercise this compassion? (ibid., I.XXIV)

Thus,

The restoring of mankind ought not to take place, and could not, without man paid [paying] the debt which he owed God for his sin. And this debt was so great that, while none but man must solve the debt, none but God was able to do it; so that he who does it must be both God and man. And hence arises a necessity that God should take man into unity with his own person; so that he who in his own nature was bound to pay the debt, but could not, might be able to do it in the person of God... Moreover ... the life of this man [is] so excellent and so glorious as to make ample satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and even infinitely more. (ibid., I.XVIII.a)

No man except this one [Christ] ever gave to God what he was not obligated to lose, or paid a debt he did not owe. But he freely offered to the Father what there was no need of his ever losing, and paid for sinners what he owed not for himself. (ibid., I.XVIII.b)

Consequently,

It is sufficiently proved that a man can be saved by Christ... For either by Christ or by someone else can man be saved, or else not at all. If, then, it is false that man cannot be saved at all, or that he can be saved in any other way, his salvation must necessarily be by Christ. (ibid., II.XXV)

Further,

As God owed nothing to the devil but punishment, so man must only make amends by conquering the devil as man had already been conquered by him. But whatever was demanded of man, he owed to God and not to the devil. (ibid., II.XIX)

The Moral-Influence Theory of the Atonement

Peter Abelard (1079–1142) is credited with originating the moral-influence theory, which holds that the primary effect of Christ’s death was not as a moral example to us (as in the view of Pelagius) but as a demonstration of God’s great love for us. Abelard developed this theory in reaction to Anselm's (necessary-satisfaction) insistence that some sort of payment to God was required (CER 3.26; 5.5, as cited in Erickson, CT, 785).

This theory was not widely accepted until Horace Bushnell (1802–1876) and Hastings Rashdall (1858–1924) embraced it in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, when it became the heart of the liberal view of the Atonement. In the moral-influence view, God is perceived as essentially love, to the virtual exclusion of His justice and holiness. The primary difficulty of sin, proponents say, is not with God's need to punish evil or His necessity of being appeased, but with us in that we have a spiritual sickness from which we must be healed. Thus,

[Christ's] sacrifice, taken as a fact in time, was not before him as the end, or object of his ministry—that would have it as a mere pageant of suffering, without rational dignity, or character—but, when it came, it was simply the bad fortune such a work, prosecuted with such devotion, must encounter on its way. (Rashdall, *IAC*T, 26)

The Optional-Satisfaction Theory of the Atonement

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) offered the optional-satisfaction theory of the Atonement, which allowed for but did not require satisfaction of God for the sinner (see Stump, “AAA” in Morris, PCF). Aquinas made three important claims on the matter of Christ being the satisfaction for our sins:

- (1) Christ's passion caused God to be satisfied on behalf of our sins.
- (2) God could have forgiven us without Christ's death.
- (3) However there was no better or more fitting way to satisfy God than with the death of Christ.

First, to the question “Did Christ's passion cause our salvation by way of satisfaction?” Aquinas said yes (ST, 3a.48.2):

A man effectively atones for an offense when he offers to the one who has been offended something which he accepts as matching or outweighing the former offense. Christ, suffering in loving and obedient spirit, offered more to God than was demanded in recompense for all the sins of mankind.... Christ's passion, then, was not only sufficient but superabundant for the sins of mankind; as John says, “He is a propitiation for our sins, not for ours only but also for those of the whole world” (ibid.).

Second, as to whether God could have forgiven us without the death of Jesus: “Simply and absolutely speaking, God could have freed man otherwise than by Christ's passion, for ‘nothing is impossible with God’ ” (ibid., 3a.46.2). Aquinas explicitly rejected the argument that “God's justice required that man be free from sin by Christ's atoning passion”:

Even this justice depends upon the divine will.... For if God had wanted to free man from sin without any satisfaction at all, he would not have been acting against justice.... But God has no one above him, for he is himself the supreme and common good of the entire universe. If then, he forgives sin, which is a crime in that it is committed against him, he violates no one's rights. The man who waives satisfaction and forgives an offense done to himself acts mercifully, not unjustly. (ibid., 3a.46.2–3)

Third, by the reasoning of Aquinas, even though the Cross was not necessary for God to forgive us, nonetheless, there was no better or more fitting way:

First, man could thus see how much God loved him, and so would be aroused to love him.... Second, he gave us an example of obedience, humility, constancy, justice, and of other virtues which his passion revealed and which are necessary for our salvation.... Third, by his passion, Christ not only freed man from sin, but merited for him the grace of justification, and the glory of beatitude.... Fifth, in this way a greater dignity accrues to man. Man had been overcome and deceived by the devil. But it is a man [Jesus] who overcomes the devil.... It was therefore better for us to have been delivered by Christ's passion than by God's will alone. (ibid., 3a.46.3)

According to Aquinas, God is not an accountant, adding up our sins that must be paid for, but instead a parent wanting to forgive us while also desiring to change us so that we will not choose evil again. Hence, in the optional-satisfaction view, any punishment is strictly a means to an end, the end being the sinner's harmony with God.

When a person sins, he does not incur, on his celestial account, a debt of guilt that must somehow be paid back. In Aquinas's perspective, God is not concerned with balancing the account but with restoring the sinner. Therefore, the aim of satisfaction (including vicarious satisfaction) is not to cancel a debt incurred by sin but to restore a sinner to harmony with God.

Aquinas saw the problem not as one of God's wrath toward human sin, but of human withdrawal from God. Thus, Christ's atonement produced reconciliation with a loving God, not appeasement of an angry God. By Aquinas's argument, God does not require a penalty for sin, either from humanity or from Jesus, and, thus, He did not inflict suffering on Christ as a punishment for sin; rather, He accepted Christ's sacrifice as an act of making satisfaction aimed at restoration of the sinner (cf. Luke 19:10). As a result, when the sinner accepts that sacrifice for his sins, he is moved away from his sin to God.

Consequently, nothing compelled God to deal with sin by a vicarious substitute (Jesus), but there is, nonetheless, something appropriate about His doing it for two reasons: (1) When a person is made aware of his evil and sees his separation from God, he will want to undo what he has done, and (2) by God's wooing the sinner to repentance by vicarious satisfaction, hopefully he will not be so easily enticed back into the same sin again.

The Substitution Theory of the Atonement

The roots of the legal or penal substitution theory of the Atonement are found in the earlier ransom and optional-satisfaction views (see above), since both contain objective elements holding that a penalty was paid. Likewise, the substitution theory builds on Anselm's view that a satisfaction of God must be accomplished (i.e., it was necessary). On the other hand, the substitution argument insists that this necessity of satisfaction is not simply because God's perfect honor has been offended but also because His absolute justice has been violated, and, therefore, a substitution for our sins had to be made by the sinless Son of God. John Calvin (1509–1564) is credited with giving expression to this view, which subsequently moved to the front and center of evangelical soteriology.

Calvin asked the question: "How can it be said that God, who prevents us with his mercy, was our enemy until he reconciled to us by Christ?" He answered: "God was the enemy of men until they were restored in favour by the death of Christ (Rom. 5:10); they were cursed until their iniquity was expiated by the sacrifice of Christ" [Gal. 3:10, 13] (ICR, 2.16.2). Calvin added,

But again, let [man] be told, as Scripture teaches, that he was estranged from God by sin, and heir of wrath, exposed to the curse of eternal death. Excluded from all hope of salvation ... that then Christ interposed, took the punishment upon himself, and bore what by the just judgment of God was impending over sinners; with his own blood expiated the sins which rendered them hateful to God, by this expiation satisfied and duly propitiated God the Father, by this intercession appeased his anger, on this basis founded peace between God and men, and by this tie secured the Divine benevolence toward them. (ibid.)

This is a description of why a substitutionary atonement is not merely fitting (as Aquinas said) but is essential. In Calvin's words,

God, who is perfect righteousness, cannot love the iniquity which he sees in all. All of us, therefore, have that within which deserves the hatred of God. Hence, in respect, first, of our corrupt nature; and, secondly, of the depraved conduct following upon it, we are all offensive to God, guilty in his sight, and by nature the children of hell. (ibid., 2.16.3)

But, in short, from the moment when he [Christ] assumed the form of a servant, he began, in order to redeem us, to pay the price of deliverance.... He himself declares that he gave his life a ransom for many. [Matt. 20:28] (ibid., 2.16.5)

Moreover, as the curse consequent upon guilt remained for the final judgment of God, one principal point in the narrative [of Hebrews 10:5] is his condemnation before Pontius Pilate, the governor of Judea, to teach us that the punishment to which we were liable was inflicted on that Just One. (ibid.)

Therefore,

Our acquittal is in this—that the guilt which made us liable to punishment was transferred to the head of the Son of God (Isa. 53:12). We must specially remember this substitution in order that we may not be all our lives in trepidation and anxiety, as if the just vengeance, which the Son of God transferred to himself, were still impending over us....

Wherefore, in order to accomplish full expiation, he made his soul asham, i.e., “a propitiatory victim for sin” (as the Prophet says, Isa. 53:5, 10) on which the guilt and penalty being in a manner laid, ceases to be imputed to us. (ibid., 2.16.6, emphasis added)

It is clear from the emphasized words that Calvin pointed to a penal substitution for our sins. What is more, he made it plain that God's absolute holiness demands such a substitute to appease His wrath and release His mercy (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 3:21–25).

The Governmental Theory of the Atonement

Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) responded to the antinomian extremes he saw implied in the socinian (moral-example) view, which pictured a God of overindulgent love, lacking in emphasis upon justice and holiness. As a lawyer, Grotius formulated the governmental theory of the Atonement by stressing the law of God and reminding believers that any violation of it was a serious matter. In His holiness, God has established laws to which sin is in opposition. These are the primary tenets of the governmental view: God, as sovereign Ruler, has the right to punish sin, which is inherently deserving of punishment, but it is not mandatory that He do so. Love is God's dominant attribute. He desires to forgive sins, but He wishes to do it in such a way as to maintain His moral government (DFCSC, 20).

Just as a creditor may cancel a debt if he so chooses, he must still act in the best interest of those under his authority. Likewise, God, taking into consideration the best interest of humanity, sent Christ to die for our sins. The Atonement was necessary to provide forgiveness and simultaneously to retain the moral structure of the world. However, the death of Christ was not offered as payment for the penalty for our sins; rather, it was a substitute for the penalty. Christ's sacrifice demonstrated that God's justice will require us to suffer if we continue in sin.

Unlike with Anselm's necessary-satisfaction theory, Christ's death, according to the governmental view of Grotius, is not a satisfaction for our sin for breaking God's law—punishment, allegedly, cannot be transferred from one person to another. Christ's death, then, was a demonstration of God's hatred of sin. Sin is not punished because it deserves to be, but because of the demands of moral government. The point of punishment, according to the governmental perspective, is not retribution but deterrence of further sins.

Grotius believed that if the death of Christ were truly a punishment for the sins of humanity, then there would be no possibility of future punishment for us and, consequently, we could do whatever we wanted, knowing that there would be no penalty. Thus, says the governmental view, while there is an objective element in the Atonement—Christ's suffering as an acceptable substitute to the moral Ruler of the universe—the chief aim is its impact upon human beings, serving as a deterrent to sin. By the death of Jesus, God was able to forgive sins in such a way that there would be no adverse consequences for human beings. It was not a full payment of the debt of sin, but it was a sufficient satisfaction to provide God with grounds for forgiving sinners and yet without encouraging sin.

Grotius offers little explicit scriptural support for his governmental theory of the Atonement, though Isaiah 42:21 is used: "It pleased the LORD for the sake of his righteousness to make his law great and glorious." Psalm 2 is also referenced, since it refers to God as the Ruler whose wrath is kindled at the unruly:

Why do the nations conspire and the peoples plot in vain? The kings of the earth take their stand and the rulers gather together against the LORD and against his Anointed One.

"Let us break their chains," they say, "and throw off their fetters."

The One enthroned in heaven laughs; the Lord scoffs at them.

The Mystical Theory of the Atonement

One final perspective on the Atonement is the mystical theory, which comes from the "father of liberalism," Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834). He proposed that salvation is attained by a mystical union with Christ—in Him, the ideal of humanity is fully realized.

According to the mystical theory, since Christ was the absolute unity of divinity and humanity, God became man that man may become God. As "God-men," the redeemed partake of the divine human nature, or the life of Christ. For Schleiermacher, then, God and man become mystically united in the person of Jesus:

[This] presentation of the redeeming activity of Christ... exhibits it as the establishment of a new life common to Him and us (original in Him, in us new and derived), [and it] is usually called, by those who have not had the experience, "mystical." This expression is so extremely vague that it seems better to avoid it. But if we are willing to keep so close to [the term's] original use as to understand by ["mystical"] what belongs to the circle of doctrines which only a few share, but for others are a mystery, then we may accept [the definition]. Provided that we recognize that no one can be received into this circle arbitrarily, because doctrines are only expressions of inward experiences, whoever has these experiences ipso facto belongs to the circle. (CF, 428)

The original activity of the Redeemer, therefore, which belongs to Him alone, and which precedes all activity of our own in this challenge, would be that by means of which He assumes us into this fellowship of His activity and His life. The continuance of that fellowship, accordingly, constitutes the essence of the state of grace; the new corporate life is the sphere within which Christ produces this act; in it is revealed the continuous activity of His sinless perfection. (ibid., 425)

Hence we can know the fellowship of the Redeemer only in so far as we are not conscious of our own individual life; as impulses flow to us from Him, we find that in Him from which everything proceeds to be the source of our activity is also a common possession, as it were. This too is the meaning of all those passages in Scripture which speak of Christ being and living in us, of being dead to sin, of putting off the old and putting on the new man. But Christ can only direct His God-consciousness against sin in so far as He enters into the corporate life of man and empathetically shares the consciousness of sin, but shares it as something He is to overcome. This very consciousness of sin as something to be overcome becomes the principle of our activity in the action which He evokes in us. (ibid., 425–26)

Although Schleiermacher understood this mystical union in a pantheistic context, many of his followers have tried to translate it into a more theistic framework. In any event, adherents to this theory still believe that salvation is a mystical unity made possible by God becoming man in Christ, so that man may have a union with God in Christ (cf. Eph. 4:3–4). The Atonement, then, has a purely subjective basis—the mystical theory alleges that there is no objective basis in any redemptive act of Christ on the cross that makes salvation possible (see Hodge, ST, 3.204–08).

AN EVALUATION OF THE THEORIES OF THE ATONEMENT

There are dimensions of truth in all of these views.

First, as the recapitulation theory asserts, “Christ went through all the stages of human life, resisted all temptations, died and arose a victor over death and the devil,” thus making all “the benefits of [His] victory available to us through participation in him.”

Second, as the ransom theory affirms, Christ did pay the price to purchase us from the clutches of Satan, though the price was paid to God, not the devil. Without the Atonement, we would still be in bondage to Satan and, consequently, to sin (cf. Mark 10:45; 1 Cor. 6:20).

Third, the moral-example theory contains truth, for Christ’s death did provide an example of faith and obedience that inspires us to be obedient to God (cf. 1 Peter 2:21).

Fourth, the necessary-satisfaction theory gets to the very heart of the Atonement, affirming that it was necessary for God’s offended justice and honor to be satisfied by a penalty that only Jesus could pay. Because He is the God-man, Christ’s death had infinite value and, hence, could restore the honor due to an infinitely holy God. Since God cannot simply remit sins, a reparation must be paid, and only a sinless person could pay it for humanity.

Fifth, there is truth in even the liberal moral-influence theory. God is love; His demonstration of self-sacrificing love at the cross (Rom. 5:8) does have a moral influence on us (1 John 3:16; 2 Cor. 5:14–15).

Sixth, building on the necessary-satisfaction theory, the substitution theory rightly maintains that such an atonement was a substitution for the sins of all human beings. Absolute justice has been violated, and, therefore, a substitution for our sins had to be made by the sinless Son of God.

Seventh, although the need for God’s satisfaction is not optional, again, the optional satisfaction theory correctly affirms:

A man effectively atones for an offense when he offers to the one who has been offended something which he accepts as matching or outweighing the former offense. Christ, suffering in loving and obedient spirit, offered more to God than was demanded in recompense for all the sins of mankind.... Christ's passion, then, was not only sufficient but superabundant for the sins of mankind; as John says, "He is a propitiation for our sins, not for ours only but also for those of the whole world" (ST, 3a.48, 2).

Eighth, even the governmental theory is not without verity, for it truthfully affirms that, in His holiness, God has established laws of which sin is a violation. As the sovereign Ruler, God does have the right to punish sin, which is inherently deserving of punishment. Likewise, the governmental theory correctly stresses God's love and notes that while He does desire to forgive sins, He wishes to do it in such a way as to maintain His moral government.

Ninth, and finally, as inadequate as the mystical theory may be as a full explanation of the Atonement, there is an element of truth in it, for salvation does involve a mysterious spiritual union with Christ. Indeed, He is the absolute unity of divinity and humanity. In brief, God became man that man may become like God. Even Paul spoke of the "mystery" of the union of "Christ and the church" as Bridegroom and bride (Eph. 5:32).

A SUMMARY OF THE THEORIES OF THE ATONEMENT

Comparing and contrasting the main theories of the Atonement not only demonstrates the multifaceted realities contained in this momentous act of redemption, but it also puts them in focus with the foundation of all theological truth—the attributes of God. Each view of the Atonement appears to be related to one or more of God’s attributes, showing how His redemptive actions are rooted in His very nature and not simply His arbitrary will.

The recapitulation view stresses God’s omnipotence as He defeats Satan and reverses the effects of the Fall. The ransom view emphasizes God’s wisdom as He out-strategizes Satan through the Cross, where Satan bites on the bait of Christ’s humanity and gets caught on the hook of Christ’s deity. The moral-example view focuses on God’s love, revealed in Christ’s self-sacrificial and exemplar love for us. The optional-satisfaction view showcases God’s mercy in rescuing sinners and restoring them to Himself. The necessary-satisfaction view demonstrates the majesty of God, whose honor is violated and who must be appeased by His Son’s death for us. The substitution view stresses God’s justice, which must be satisfied to release His mercy on sinners. The moral-influence view demonstrates the motivating power of God’s love in Christ’s redemptive acts on our behalf. The governmental view is based on God’s sovereignty, since, as King, He must keep the moral order of the universe. Finally, the mystical view zeroes in on that mysterious oneness between Christ and His church, which is based on God’s attribute of unity.

While each of the aforementioned theories of the Atonement contributes some truth to the overall redemptive acts of Christ, the substitution view—meaning that Christ’s death brought substitutionary satisfaction to God—fully explains the necessary objective basis (in God) for the Atonement: Without Christ, the God-man, paying the price for our sins, God could not be just and yet also be the Justifier of the unjust, as Paul declared Him to be (Rom. 3:21–25). Without the Just dying for the unjust, God’s justice would not be satisfied, and without justice being appeased, God’s mercy could not be released to declare the otherwise unjust sinners to be justified in His eyes and, hence, qualified for heaven.<sup>17</sup> Most theories of the Atonement, instead of centering on Christ and offering an objective response, lean more heavily on subjective elements and focus primarily upon the Atonement’s effect on Satan (in defeating him) or on human beings (in delivering them and setting an example for them).

CHAPTER NINE

THE NATURE OF SALVATION

As we have seen, there are many theories of the Atonement, and all of them contain an element of truth. However, only the necessary-satisfaction and substitution views provide an objective basis for understanding and explaining the work of Christ. In this chapter, the biblical, theological, and historical bases of an objective view of the Atonement will be explored.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF SALVATION (SUBSTITUTIONARY ATONEMENT)

The Bible is a salvific book, and what Paul told Timothy is its central message: “From infancy you have known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus” (2 Tim. 3:15).

Pre-Salvation Acts of God

Salvation is not a single act but is provided for believers in three major stages. Further, there are pre-salvation acts of God that are important for our understanding of the salvific process.

Election

The word election (or elect) occurs fourteen times in the New Testament. An elect person is a chosen one; election (or elect) is used of Israel (Rom. 9:11; 11:28), of angels (1 Tim. 5:21), and of believers. In relation to believers, election is the decision of God from all eternity whereby He chose those who would be saved. Paul wrote, “Therefore I endure everything for the sake of the elect, that they too may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory” (2 Tim. 2:10). Peter said that the elect are those “who have been chosen according to the foreknowledge of God the Father” (1 Peter 1:2).

Chosen (or Chose)

The words chosen and chose are used numerous times. The terms are employed of Christ (Luke 23:35; 1 Peter 1:20; 2:4, 6), of a disciple (Acts 1:2, 24; 10:41; 22:14; John 15:10), and even of Judas (John 6:70; 13:18), who was chosen to be an apostle. Soteriologically, a chosen one is a person elected to salvation by God. Ephesians 1:11 is a key passage:

In him we were also chosen, having been predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will.

Predestined

Just as God predetermined from all eternity that Christ would die for our sins (Acts 2:23), He also predestined who would be saved. As Paul says, “Those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son” (Rom. 8:29).

He chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight. In love he predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will. (Eph. 1:4–5)

Foreknowledge

Being omniscient, God also eternally foreknew those who would be saved: “Those God foreknew he also predestined” (Rom. 8:29). Indeed, they were “elect according to the foreknowledge of God” (1 Peter 1:2 KJV). Since His foreknowledge is infallible (He is omniscient), whatever God foreknows will indeed come to pass. Hence, His foreknowledge of who would be saved assures that they will be.

Calling

God’s calling of persons to salvation is found in many passages. Paul summarizes the place of calling in salvation in Romans 8:28–30:

We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified.

Conviction

While the aforementioned acts are eternal, the next two are pre-salvation acts in time. The first is God's work in convincing a sinner of his sin (Gen. 6:3; John 8:9; 16:8). In the latter passage, Jesus promised: "When he [the Holy Spirit] comes, he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment." The act of convicting, then, is that by which God persuades a person that he is a sinner and, thus, is in need of the Savior.

Prevenient Grace

Prevenient means "before," and prevenient grace refers to God's unmerited work in the human heart prior to salvation, which directs people to this end through Christ. Paul speaks of it in Titus: "The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men" (2:11). He adds in 2 Corinthians,

You know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that you through his poverty might become rich. (8:9)

This grace is also seen in the fact that "the goodness of God leads you to repentance" (Rom. 2:4 NKJV). Thus, prevenient grace is God's grace exerted on our behalf even before He bestows salvation on us.

The Names Used of God's Saving Acts

Salvation is described by different terms in the Bible, the most prominent of which include the following.

Effectual Grace

God's grace is not only prevenient ("before" salvation), but it is also efficacious or effectual in producing salvation in the elect. That is, it accomplishes in the lives of believers the salvation God has foredetermined for them and by which He accomplishes what He has ordained.

So is my word that goes out from my mouth: It will not return to me empty, but will accomplish what I desire and achieve the purpose for which I sent it. (Isa. 55:11)

Being all-knowing and all-powerful, God never attempts what He does not accomplish. Thus, "He who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:6), "for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil. 2:13).

Sealing

Paul speaks of being sealed with the Holy Spirit as a salvific act that guarantees our ultimate salvation. He told the Ephesians that the Holy Spirit's presence in their life "is a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance until the redemption of those who are God's possession—to the praise of his glory" (Eph. 1:14). Later he adds, "Do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption" (Eph. 4:30). This seal of the Holy Spirit comes at the moment of justification (Rom. 8:9) and is the guarantee of our ultimate glorification.

Salvation (or Save)

The most common words for the process by which God fits someone for heaven are salvation or being saved. As Earl Radmacher notes,

The word salvation has its roots in the Hebrew word yasa, [meaning] “to be wide or roomy” in contrast to “narrow or restricted.” Thus words such as liberation, emancipation, preservation, protection, and security grow out of it. It refers to delivering a person or group of people from distress or danger, from a “restricted” condition in which they are unable to help themselves. (S, 3)

The Greek nouns for salvation are soteria and soterion; the adjective is soterios, from which we derive the word soteriology.

The meaning of soteria and soterion is “deliverance,” “preservation,” or “salvation.” Salvation is often used of physical deliverance (cf. Luke 1:69, 71; Acts 7:25; 27:37), such as Paul’s desire to be delivered or released from prison: “I know that through your prayers and the help given by the Spirit of Jesus Christ, what has happened to me will turn out for my deliverance” (Phil. 1:19).

Spiritually, salvation refers to the process by which God, through the work of Christ, delivers sinners from the prison of sin. Paul declared, “I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes” (Rom. 1:16; cf. Eph. 1:13). He later says, “It is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved” (Rom. 10:10). Peter announced; “Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved” (Acts 4:12).

As mentioned previously, salvation is a broad term that encompasses three stages: Salvation from the past penalty of sin, from the present power of sin, and from the future presence of sin. These are often called, respectively, justification, sanctification, and glorification.

Redemption

Another broad term, often used as the equivalent of salvation, is the term redemption. Several Greek words are translated redemption; one is apolutrosis, which means “to redeem,” “to ransom,” or “to deliver.” Apolutrosis is used ten times in the New Testament, once of physical deliverance (Heb. 11:35) and nine times primarily of spiritual deliverance.

Another Greek word for redemption is lutron, which is used twice (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45). Lutron means “to ransom,” “to redeem,” or “to buy back,” and its spiritual application pictures sinners being redeemed (purchased) from the marketplace of sin.

An additional term for redemption is antilutron, which means “re-adoption price” or “ransom.” In 1 Timothy 2:6, Paul speaks of Christ, “who gave himself as a ransom for all men—the testimony given in its proper time.”

Another word, agoradzo, which comes from the Greek word for the market (agora), carries the meaning of “buying,” “purchasing,” or “paying a price for” something. Agoradzo is used thirty-one times (usually of physical things—cf. Matt. 13:44, 46; 14:15).

Spiritually, agoradzo means “to redeem from the marketplace of sin,” “to purchase our salvation” (cf. 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23; 2 Peter 2:1; Rev. 14:3–4; 5:9). In this final passage we read:

They sang a new song: “You are worthy to take the scroll and to open its seals, because you were slain, and with your blood you purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation.

While some scholars have argued that the purchase price was paid to Satan, since sinners are his slaves, most orthodox scholars reject this, insisting that the price Christ paid for sin was to God, since sin makes us a debtor to Him. Without this price, which we couldn't pay and which Christ did pay for all humankind, we could never have been saved.

Mediation

As Savior, Christ is our mediator. The Hebrew word yakach is employed once in the Old Testament (Job 9:33): "If only there were someone to arbitrate [mediate] between us, to lay his hand upon us both."

A Greek word for mediate, mesitas, is used six times (Gal. 3:19–20—of Moses; Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24—of Christ; and 1 Tim. 2:5: "There is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" [cf. John 10:9]).

There are three aspects of Christ's mediation: (1) As Prophet (Heb. 1:2ff.), He represents God to man; (2) as Priest (Heb. 9:15), He represents man to God; (3) and as King (Ps. 2), He reigns over man for God.

Regeneration

The Greek word for regeneration is paliggenesia, which means "regeneration," "rebirth," or "spiritual renovation." Paliggenesia is used twice in the New Testament (Matt. 19:28—of Messianic renovation; Titus 3:5—of salvation). In Titus it refers to the impartation of spiritual life to the soul:

[God] saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy. He saved us through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit.

Regeneration is the impartation of spiritual life, by God, to the souls of those who were "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2:1 KJV) and who were "saved" made alive by God "through faith" in Jesus Christ (Eph. 2:8 NKJV).

The Source of regeneration is God; the result of regeneration is sonship; the means of regeneration is the Holy Spirit; and the duration of regeneration is eternal:

To all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God—children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God. (John 1:12–13)

"You are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:26). Parallel ideas are expressed in many biblical texts.

Born Again

Being born again or born from above is parallel to regeneration. Rebirth is the point at which a person "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2:1 KJV) receives spiritual life. Jesus said, "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, 'You must be born again' " (John 3:6–7). Peter adds, "You have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23; cf. John 1:13; 1 John 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18.). This idea was expressed in the Old Testament by Ezekiel when he spoke of God giving a new heart to Israel if they repented (Ezek. 11:19).

Adoption

Adoption (Gk: huiiothesia) means “placing as a son”; it signifies, literally, “a legal child” (Ex. 2:10) and is used five times in the New Testament. Theologically, adoption (Gal. 4:5) refers to the act of God that places a person as a son in God’s family. Adoption is a term of position whereby one becomes a son by the new birth (John 1:12–13), is redeemed from the bondage of the law (Gal. 4:1–5), and, although only a child (Gk: teknion), is by adoption made an adult son (Gk: huios), which is fully manifested at the resurrection of the body (Rom. 8:23; cf. 1 John 3:2).

Reconciliation

One Greek word for reconciliation is katallasso, which means “to reconcile” or “to bring together” (cf. Matt. 5:23–24). Katallasso is used five other times in the New Testament.

Another term for reconciliation is katallage, which means “bringing together.” Katallage is used four times.

Also, hilaskomai is translated reconciliation (Heb. 2:17 KJV):

In all things it behooved him to be made like unto [his] brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things [pertaining] to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.

Being alienated from God by sin, fallen human beings need reconciliation with Him.

All this is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ and gave us the ministry of reconciliation: that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men’s sins against them. And he has committed to us the message of reconciliation. We are therefore Christ’s ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us. We implore you on Christ’s behalf: Be reconciled to God. (2 Cor. 5:18–20)

There are two sides to reconciliation: the objective side, the potential for which Christ accomplished for all humankind (v. 19), and the subjective side, by which we actually become reconciled to God (v. 20). Once again, the whole world is reconciled in the sense of being made saveable by Christ (v. 19), but not in the sense of being saved (see Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:20).

It is also noteworthy that God is not reconciled to us; we are reconciled to Him. God does not move in relation to the sinner; the sinner moves in relation to Him. Both alienation and reconciliation are mentioned in Colossians 1:20–21, a powerful expression of what it means to be saved:

[It was God’s purpose] through him [Christ] to reconcile to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross. Once you were alienated from God and were enemies in your minds because of your evil behavior.

Forgiveness

The Greek word for forgiveness is aphesis, which means “to forgive” or “to remit” one’s sins. Hebrews declares that God cannot forgive without atonement, for “the law requires that nearly everything be cleansed with blood, and without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness” (9:22). Paul announced: “Through Jesus the forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you” (Acts 13:38). Forgiveness does not erase the sin; history cannot be changed. But forgiveness does erase the record of the sin. Like a pardon, the crime of the accused is not expunged from history but is deleted from his account. Hence, it is “in [Christ Jesus that] we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, in accordance with the riches of God’s grace” (Eph. 1:7; cf. Col. 1:14).

Justification

Justification is the act of God by which we who are unrighteous in ourselves are nevertheless declared righteous before God. It is a judicial (legal) act of pronouncing one to be right in God's sight.

Several Greek words describe the act of justification. Dikaios means "just" or "righteous"; it is used of humans (Matt. 1:19; 5:45; 9:13, etc.), of Christ (Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14; Rom. 5:7), of God (Rom. 3:26), and of salvation (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38).

Dikaiosune (righteousness) can refer to practical justification or to positional justification. Systematic theology speaks of it in the latter sense.

Dikaioo means "justify" or "justified." It sometimes refers to God (Luke 7:29; Rom. 3:4), to Christ (1 Tim. 3:16), or to salvation. Romans 4:2–5 is a foundational passage:

Was it because of [Abraham's] good deeds that God accepted him? If so, he would have had something to boast about. But from God's point of view Abraham had no basis at all for pride. For the Scriptures tell us, "Abraham believed God, so God declared him to be righteous." When people work, their wages are not a gift. Workers earn what they receive. But people are declared righteous because of their faith, not because of their work, (NLT)

God declares a sinner righteous before Himself on the basis of faith alone!

Dikaiosis is translated justification (Rom. 5:18); Paul says of Christ, "He was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (Rom. 4:25). It is important to point out that justification means "to declare righteous" (not "to make righteous"), because:

- (1) It is done apart from works (Rom. 1:17; 3:20; 4:2–5);
- (2) It is done on sinners (Rom. 3:21–23); and
- (3) It is a judicial act (Rom. 4:4–6; 5:18).

This is evident from words variously translated imputed, counted, or credited in regard to one's account with God (cf. Rom. 4:3, 6, 11, 22–24).

What does the Scripture say? "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness." Now when a man works, his wages are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation.... David says the same thing when he speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom God credits righteousness apart from works.... "Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him." ... We have been saying that Abraham's faith was credited to him as righteousness. Under what circumstances was it credited? Was it after he was circumcised, or before? It was not after, but before! ... So then, he is the father of all who believe but have not been circumcised, in order that righteousness might be credited to them.... This is why "it was credited to him as righteousness." The words "it was credited to him" were written not for him alone, but also for us, to whom God will credit righteousness—for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead. (Rom. 4:3–4, 6, 8–11, 22–24)

Even James, who stresses the works that flow naturally from saving faith, speaks of credited righteousness (called forensic righteousness): "And the scripture was fulfilled that says, 'Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness,' and he was called God's friend" (James 2:23).

In Paul's strong comparison between Adam and Christ (in Rom. 5), he uses the word justification twice to describe what Christ provided for all human beings:

The judgment followed one sin and brought condemnation, but the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification. ... Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. (vv. 16, 18)

Observe the following comparison of Romans 5:

Person	Adam	Christ
Act	Sin (vv. 12, 14, 16) Trespass (vv. 15–18) Disobedience (v. 19)	Grace (v. 15) Righteousness (v. 18) Obedience (v. 19)
Physical Results	Death for all (vv. 12, 14–15, 17)	Life for all (vv. 17–18, 21)
Moral Results	Sin enters for all (v. 12) Sin reigns on all (v. 21)	Grace enters for all (v. 15) Grace reigns for all (v. 21)
Legal Results	All made sinners (v. 19) Judgment for all (v. 18) Condemnation for all (16, 18)	All made righteous (v. 19) Gift for all (v. 18) Justification for all (16, 18)

Now, since it is evident from Scripture that not all people will eventually be saved, Paul cannot mean that everyone is actually justified because of Christ’s vicarious sacrifice, but rather is potentially justifiable, for many reasons.

First, Romans 5 clearly declares that some of the consequences of Adam’s sin (like physical death) are actually passed on to all human beings (vv. 12–14).

Second, the phrase “not like” (vv. 15–16) shows that the parallel is not perfect.

Third, the phrase “those who receive” (v. 17) implies that not all receive the gift of salvation, and that only those who do receive it will be saved.

Fourth, this fits with the context of Romans 4, which declares that salvation only comes to those who believe (vv. 3–5; as does Rom. 5:1).

Fifth, and finally, if the phrase “made righteous” (v. 19) is taken as actual, then universalism follows. Universalism is not taught in the Bible; hence, everything under “Christ” in the above chart is potential for all persons. It is available for all but is only appropriated by some.

It is also important to note in this connection that it does not follow from the preceding points, as some Arminians infer, that everything under “Adam” in the above chart is also only potential for all persons until they actualize it by their own personal sins.

First, again, the phrase “not like” (vv. 15–16) differentiates the two sides of the comparison.

Second, Romans 5 clearly says that some of the consequences of Adam’s sins (such as physical death) are automatic, without any choice on our part (vv. 12–14).

Third, and finally, no such qualifying terms like receive (v. 17) are used of the consequences of Adam’s sin, even though these terms are used in reference to the appropriation of the gift of salvation that Christ provided for all.

Propitiation (or Expiation)

The word propitiation appears in many English translations (e.g., KJV, ASV, NKJV), although others translate it expiation (e.g., RSV) or atonement sacrifice (e.g., NIV). Hilasmus, meaning “to satisfy God on behalf of the sinner,” is found in two places: “He is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world” (1 John 2:2 KJV); “Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son [to be] the propitiation for our sins” (1 John 4:10 KJV).

Another Greek term for propitiation, hilasterion, is used in two texts. Hebrews 9:5 refers to the mercy seat in the Old Testament tabernacle, and Romans 3:25 (KJV) says, “God hath set forth [Jesus to be] a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.”

A third word, hilaskomai, means “to propitiate,” “to satisfy,” or “to expiate.” Hilaskomai is used twice: once meaning “be merciful” (Luke 18:13) and the other pointing to Christ (Heb. 2:17):

For this reason he had to be made like his brothers in every way, in order that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in service to God, and that he might make atonement for the sins of the people.

In the Old Testament, the mercy seat was the throne of grace where, once the sacrificial blood was sprinkled, God was satisfied and released His mercy upon the sinner in forgiveness. In the New Testament, Christ forever satisfied God on our behalf (1 John 2:2) by one sacrifice (Heb. 10:14).

Other Figures of Speech for Salvation

In addition to those above, the New Testament speaks of salvation by many other terms and phrases. Believers are said to be “in Christ” (Eph. 1:3; 2:6; 2 Cor. 5:17); be “baptized by one Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:13); be a “new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15), and be a “new man” or “new self” (Eph. 2:15; 4:24; Col. 3:10). The saved undergo purification (or cleansing—Titus 2:14; Heb. 1:3; 9:14; 10:22); have identification (or union) with Christ (Rom. 6:2–4; 1 Cor. 12:13); experience healing (Isa. 53:5; Mark 2:17; 1 Peter 2:24); are offered enlightenment (John 8:12; 12:36; 2 Cor. 4:4–6; 1 Thess. 5:5); can live at peace with God (Rom. 5:1; 12:1; Eph. 2:14–15 [cf. 5:19, “aliens”; Col. 1:20]); and are made alive (Eph. 2:1; John 5:21, 24; 1 Cor. 15:22; 1 John 3:14).

Atonement

One of the most important expressions of salvation is the word atonement, translated from the Hebrew kaphar. Literally, kaphar means “to cover,” but it also carries a broader meaning of “expiation,” “condoning,” “wiping away,” “placating,” or “canceling.” The Authorized Version translates kaphar as “to appease,” “to disannul,” “to forgive,” “to be merciful,” “to pacify,” “to pardon,” “to purge,” “to put off,” and “to reconcile.” The key thoughts are “to cover over in God’s eyes” and/or “to wipe away.” Kaphar is used around one hundred times in the Old Testament (in verbal form).

The Greek term for atonement is hiloskomai, meaning “to propitiate,” “to expiate,” or “to conciliate.” It is used twice; once in Luke 18:13, when the penitent sinner asks God to “be merciful” to him, and once in Hebrews 2:17, where again we read:

Therefore he had to be made like his brethren in every respect, so that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God, to make expiation for the sins of the people, (RSV)

An elemental Old Testament text on atonement is Leviticus 4:14–21:

When they become aware of the sin they committed, the assembly must bring a young bull as a sin offering and present it before the Tent of Meeting. The elders of the community are to lay their hands on the bull's head before the LORD, and the bull shall be slaughtered before the LORD. Then the anointed priest is to take some of the bull's blood into the Tent of Meeting. He shall dip his finger into the blood and sprinkle it before the LORD seven times in front of the curtain. He is to put some of the blood on the horns of the altar that is before the LORD in the Tent of Meeting. The rest of the blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar of burnt offering at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting. He shall remove all the fat from it and burn it on the altar, and do with this bull just as he did with the bull for the sin offering. In this way the priest will make atonement for them, and they will be forgiven. Then he shall take the bull outside the camp and burn it as he burned the first bull. This is the sin offering for the community.

Several facts are noteworthy about this prototype of Christ our High Priest, who made atonement for our sins.

First, Old Testament atonement involved more than merely passing over their sins. The text says they were “forgiven.”

Second, forgiveness in the Old Testament was by looking forward to the Cross (John 8:56) on the basis that in God's eyes the Lamb (Christ) was slain before the foundation of the world (Rev. 13:8; Eph. 1:4). Abraham was justified when he believed (Gen. 15:6; cf. Gal. 3:8).

Third, and finally, atonement involved a blood sacrifice (Heb. 9:22).

Another important verse in this regard is Leviticus 17:11: “The life of a creature is in the blood, and I have given it to you to make atonement for yourselves on the altar; it is the blood that makes atonement for one's life.”

Hebrews 10:4, 11–14 provides an inspired commentary on Old Testament atonement:

It is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins ... Day after day every priest stands and performs his religious duties; again and again he offers the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But when this priest [Jesus] had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God. Since that time he waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy.

Sacrificial (Substitutionary) Atonement

Clearly contained in the many biblical passages on the Atonement is that it is substitutionary: Christ died in our place, punished for our sins that we might be set free. Consider the strong arguments in favor of substitutionary atonement.

First, God's absolute justice demands a perfect Substitute for us, since He cannot simply overlook sin. As we have seen, He is too holy to even look on sin with approval (Hab. 1:13); God is essentially just and cannot be otherwise, since He is unchanging by nature.

Second, our total depravity demands a sinless Substitute for our sins, because nothing we can do measures up to God's standard: "We know that whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law, so that every mouth may be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God" (Rom. 3:19). The only way we can enter the eternal presence of an immutable, holy God is by the substitutionary sacrifice of humankind's perfection: the man Christ Jesus.

Third, the Old Testament sacrifices imply substitutionary atonement, since in the one offering he laid his hands on the animal, symbolizing a transfer of guilt:

If the offering is a burnt offering from the herd, he is to offer a male without defect. He must present it at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting so that it will be acceptable to the LORD. He is to lay his hand on the head of the burnt offering, and it will be accepted on his behalf to make atonement for him. (Lev. 1:3–4)

Fourth, Isaiah 53:5–6 speaks explicitly about substitutionary suffering in several phrases:

[1] He was pierced for our transgressions, [2] he was crushed for our iniquities; [3] the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and [4] by his wounds we are healed....[5] The LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all.

What Christ did was "for" us, and our sins were laid "on him"—substitutionary atonement.

Fifth, Jesus was presented as the Passover Lamb, a substitutionary sacrifice. Just as the Old Testament Passover lamb was sacrificed for their sins, even so "Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed" for us (1 Cor. 5:7). John the Baptist declared: "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29).

Sixth, Jesus claimed to be a fulfillment of Isaiah 53, which portrays a substitutionary sacrifice. He said, "It is written: 'And he was numbered with the transgressors'; and I tell you that this must be fulfilled in me. Yes, what is written about me is reaching its fulfillment" (Luke 22:37).

Seventh, Jesus presented His death as a ransom (Gk: lutron), which usually meant (in the Greek Old Testament) "a deliverance from bondage in exchange for the payment of compensation or the offering of a substitute." Again, He said, "Even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45).

Eighth, Christ presented Himself as a consecrated priest and sacrifice: "For them I sanctify myself, that they too may be truly sanctified" (John 17:19). The term agiazō ("to sanctify"), used here, commonly carries this meaning. Many other passages likewise speak of Christ as our Sacrifice, which implies a substitution for us. The writer of Hebrews declares:

[In Old Testament times] only the high priest entered the inner room, and that only once a year, and never without blood, which he offered for himself and for the sins the people had committed in ignorance.... How much more, then, will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself unblemished to God, cleanse our consciences from acts that lead to death, so that we may serve the living God! For this reason Christ is the mediator of a new covenant, that those who are called may receive the promised eternal inheritance—now that he has died as a ransom to set them free from the sins committed under the first covenant. (9:7, 14–15)

Similarly, the next chapter reads:

Therefore, when Christ came into the world, he said: "Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me; with burnt offerings and sin offerings you were not pleased. Then I said, 'Here I am—it is written about me in the scroll—I have come to do your will, O God.' " ...

And by that will, we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. Day after day every [Old Testament] priest stands and performs his religious duties; again and again he offers the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But when this priest had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God. Since that time he waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy. (10:5–7, 10–14)

Ninth, Christ's death was "for," that is, on another's behalf. The Greek word for (huper) often implies substitution; Luke 22:19–20, for example, says:

He took bread, gave thanks and broke it, and gave it to them, saying, "This is my body given for you; do this in remembrance of me." In the same way, after the supper he took the cup, saying, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out for you."

Likewise, in John 10:15, the word for implies substitution: "I lay down my life for the sheep." Many other passages also use for in a substitutionary sense.

Tenth, in Christ's death for (Gk: anti, meaning "instead of") us, substitution is explicit. For example, as in Mark 10:45, Jesus said in Matthew 20:28, "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many." In addition to the idea of ransom, the great Greek scholar A. T. Robertson (1863–1934) noted that "there is the notion of exchange also in the use of anti." Robertson reserved rebuke for those who reject this, declaring that "those who refuse to admit that Jesus held this notion of a substitutionary death ... [take] an easy way to get rid of passages that contradict one's theological opinions" (WPNT, 1.163).

Eleventh, expiation (or atonement sacrifice—NIV), used of Christ's death, implies a substitutionary sacrifice. For instance, in 1 John 2:2 we read: "He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world." This text makes little sense unless Christ gave His sinless life as a substitute for our sins.

Twelfth, and finally, appeasing God's wrath by Christ's death implies a substitutionary death. Paul affirms, "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood" (Rom. 3:25). The Old Testament portrays the same idea (cf. Zech. 7:2; 8:22; Mal. 1:9), and numerous New Testament passages speak of God's wrath against sin, which implies that it must be appeased by a substitutionary sacrifice.

Combined, these arguments present a powerful case for the orthodox concept of a substitutionary atonement. Christ died in our place: "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21). "Christ died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, to bring you to God" (1 Peter 3:18).

THE THREE STAGES OF SALVATION

Salvation begins with the judicial act of justification, proceeds through the lifelong process of sanctification, and is completed when we meet Christ in an act of glorification.

Salvation From the Penalty of Sin (Justification)

The first stage of salvation is called justification, salvation from the penalty of sin. Justification is an instantaneous, past act of God by which one is saved from the guilt of sin—his record is cleared and he is guiltless before the Judge (Rom. 8:1).

The heart cry of the Reformation was “justification by faith alone!” This formula was strongly opposed by the Roman Catholic counterreformation that insisted on justification by faith and works. Interestingly, some modern Catholics claim that “Luther’s famous formula ‘faith alone’ ... can have a good Catholic sense” (CCA, 199). However, this is not the same sense in which Protestants believe it, for in Catholicism the performance of progressive works is added to faith as a condition for ultimate justification.

In order to appreciate this significant contribution of the Reformers, it is necessary to examine the biblical background of the term justification. As we will see, there are solid biblical grounds, in both testaments, revealing that the Protestant doctrine of forensic justification, expounded clearly by the Reformers and their followers, is correct.

The Old Testament Use of Forensic Justification

The background for the doctrine of forensic justification (as with other New Testament doctrines) is found in the Old Testament. More often than not, the Hebrew term hitsdiq, usually rendered justify, is “used in a forensic or legal sense, as meaning, not ‘to make just or righteous,’ but ‘to declare judicially that one is in harmony with the law’ ” (Hoekema, SBG, 154). George Eldon Ladd (1911–1982) remarked, “He is righteous who is judged to be in the right (Ex. 23:7; Deut. 25:1); i.e., who in judgment through acquittal thus stands in a right relationship with God” (TNT, 440).

The majority of Reformed scholars would agree:

In the Old Testament, the concept of righteousness frequently appears in a forensic or juridical context. A righteous man is one who has been declared by a judge to be free from guilt. (Erickson, CT, 955)

This thinking on the forensic nature of the Old Testament terms for justification and righteousness is not restricted to evangelicals. Hans Küng (b. 1928) agrees that “according to the original biblical usage of the term, ‘justification’ must be defined as a declaring just by court order” (J, 209).

The New Testament Use of Forensic Justification

Turning to the New Testament, the verb translated “to justify” is dikaioó. This word is used by Paul in a forensic or legal sense; the sinner is declared to be “righteous” (cf. Rom. 3–4). Justification is the opposite of condemnation; as observed by Anthony Hoekema (b. 1913), “The opposite of condemnation, however, is not ‘making righteous’ but ‘declaring righteous.’ ” Therefore, by dikaioó, Paul means the “legal imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believing sinner” (SBG, 154, emphasis added). When a person is justified, God pronounces him acquitted—in advance of the final judgment. Therefore,

The resulting righteousness is not ethical perfection; it is “sinlessness” in the sense that God no longer counts a man’s sin against him (2 Cor. 5:19). [Thus we find in the New Testament that] justification is the declarative act of God by which, on the basis of the sufficiency of Christ’s atoning death, he pronounces believers to have fulfilled all of the requirements of the law which pertain to them. (Erickson, CT, 956)

A Theological Explanation of Forensic Justification

Next to Martin Luther, John Calvin is usually regarded as the most important figure in the Reformation. On the subject of forensic justification, Calvin stated:

Man is not made righteous in justification, but is accepted as righteous, not on account of his own righteousness, but on account of the righteousness of Christ located outside of man. (As cited in McGrath, ID, 2.36)

The reason human beings need justification is that in our Christ-less state, we are totally depraved.

First, corruption is present at the center of the human being.

Second, depravity extends to every aspect of humanity.

Third, depravity prevents humans from pleasing God unless enabled by grace.

Fourth, and finally, corruption extends to every corner and culture of the human race (ibid., 2.90).

However, “total depravity” does not mean that humans are destitute of all natural goodness; as we have seen, the imago Dei has been effaced but not erased. The Reformers acknowledged that humans can horizontally do good (i.e., socially), yet vertically (i.e., spiritually) they are dead in trespasses and sins (Eph. 2:1) and can initiate no meritorious action toward God on behalf of their sinful condition; eternal life is received by faith and faith alone.

Charles Hodge (1797–1878) indicated that sin has predisposed humanity against any move toward God and His wondrous salvation. Hence,

Every man should bow down before God under the humiliating consciousness that he is a member of an apostate race; the son of a rebellious parent; born estranged from God, and exposed to his displeasure. (As cited in McGrath, ID, 2.92)

Likewise, for Calvin, the need for justification follows from the spiritual reality of total depravity, and this justification is judicial, or forensic, in nature.

“The term justification means ‘a declaring just.’ It really implies ‘a declaring just,’ in the sense of ‘a leaving out of the account,’ ‘a not imputing’ ” (Küng, J, 212). In the Old Testament, King David puts it in this way: “Happy are those whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Happy are those to whom the LORD imputes no iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no deceit” (Ps. 32:1–2 NRSV). Paul, in the New Testament, states that God was “reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men’s sins against them” (2 Cor. 5:19).

These valuable insights into the biblical doctrine of justification had been largely lost throughout much of Christian history, and it was the Reformers who recovered this Pauline truth. Although some contemporary Catholics are beginning to acknowledge the important Protestant emphasis on forensic justification, it was not spelled out by the counterreformational Council of Trent (1545–1563). Indeed, while there may be no logical incompatibility between forensic justification and the Roman Catholic idea of initial justification, nevertheless, there are other serious problems with the Roman Catholic concept of progressive justification. In short, salvation within Catholicism is a merit-based system of works that tends to negate in practice what has been affirmed in theory about justification by grace.

Salvation From the Power of Sin (Sanctification)

The second stage of salvation is called sanctification, salvation from the power of sin. Unlike justification, sanctification is not an act of God declaring us righteous; rather, it is a continual process in the present by which God is making us righteous. Justification is the act by which God gets us out of sin (legally). Sanctification is the process by which God gets sin out of us (actually).

There are three areas of victory over the power of sin:

- (1) Victory over the world (1 John 5:4);
- (2) Victory over the flesh (Rom. 7:24–25); and
- (3) Victory over the devil (James 4:7).

Three Steps to Sanctification

The path to sanctification is set forth in Romans 6:

- (1) Knowing we are dead to sin through Christ (v. 6);
- (2) Reckoning this to be a fact (v. 11); and
- (3) Yielding ourselves to God's righteous demands (v. 13).

Thus, purification does not follow automatically from justification. It involves cooperation on our part; we must yield to God's sanctifying grace.

The Wesleyan Doctrine of a Second Work of Grace

Wesleyans, following John Wesley (1703–1791), hold to a special second work of grace called entire sanctification, perfectionism, or, more popularly, called by some, baptism of the Holy Spirit/filling of the Holy Spirit. This is based on Wesley's Plain Account of Christian Perfection, in which he contended that one may attain a state of sinless perfection in this life. This state, according to Wesley, has been attained by only a few, but can and should be attained by all.

A Response to Wesleyan Perfectionism

In reply, several comments. Many people do experience a second work of grace in their hearts; this has different names in different traditions. In addition to the titles listed above, some, for instance, call it dedication or consecration. With regard to the need for a deeper, higher, or more Christ-like experience, there is little but semantic disagreement between Wesleyans and those outside their tradition. Indeed, Wesley himself often described this phenomenon in terms acceptable to almost all Christians, such as loving God with all one's heart or being crucified with Christ.

However, Wesley went beyond this (as does subsequent Wesleyanism), describing this occurrence as an instantaneous second work of grace by which one reaches, in this life, a state of sinlessness. With this most non-Wesleyan theologians disagree, for many reasons.

First, for those who, like Pentecostals, call this the baptism of the Holy Spirit, several things should be noted. The scriptural use of this phrase is as an act that occurs at justification (cf. Acts 1:5; 1 Cor. 12:13; Rom. 8:9); baptism of the Holy Spirit is never repeated, any more than being born again is repeated. Paul said, "We were all baptized by one Spirit into one body—whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free—and we were all given the one Spirit to drink" (1 Cor. 12:13). Baptism of the Spirit is a completed act and an unrepeated act, one by which we are saved (placed into Christ body).

Second, such an alleged second work of grace should not be confused with the filling of the Holy Spirit, which can be a continual or repeated process. Unlike the baptism of the Holy Spirit, which (1) happens only once, and (2) we are not commanded to subsequently seek, “filling” is both continual and mandated. Paul ordered the Ephesians, “Do not get drunk on wine, which leads to debauchery. Instead, be filled with the Spirit” (Eph. 5:18). This is in the present tense, implying that we should keep on being filled with the Holy Spirit. Indeed, in the book of Acts, those who were filled on the Day of Pentecost (2:4) were refilled later (4:31).

Third, those in the Wesleyan tradition who claim that one can reach a state of sinless perfection in this life (through a supposed “second work of grace”) lack both biblical and experiential support. Even saints with remarkable maturity confessed they never completely overcame sin. Take Paul for instance:

We know that the law is spiritual; but I am unspiritual, sold as a slave to sin. I do not understand what I do. For what I want to do I do not do, but what I hate I do. And if I do what I do not want to do, I agree that the law is good. As it is, it is no longer I myself who do it, but it is sin living in me. I know that nothing good lives in me, that is, in my sinful nature. For I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out. (Rom. 7:14–18)

The most devout of God’s prophets and servants considered themselves woefully sinful when God revealed Himself to them (cf. Isa. 6:1ff.). We can get to the place where we are able not to sin, but we can never in this life reach the point where we are not able to sin. Those who claim that they can (and/or have) often either redefine intentional sin to mean unintentional mistakes or are self-deceived.

Fourth, again, even the apostle Paul, well into his spiritual life, recognized his profound fallibility, claiming he was the chief among all sinners (cf. 1 Tim. 1:15). Indeed, there seems to be an inverse relation dictating that the less sinful we think we are, the more sinful we are; the more sinful we think we are, the less sinful we are. Like a person in a white suit who falls into a mud puddle in the dark but doesn’t realize his true condition, the closer we get to the Light, the more dirty we appear. John admonishes believers emphatically:

If we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness. (1 John 1:8–9)

Fifth, even Wesley’s criteria for what qualifies as sin reveal that those who claim to have reached this state of sinless perfection are still sinning, only under another name for it. For example, Wesley said that one could reach this supposed plateau of perfection and still commit numerous “mistakes,” have many “infirmities,” and possess “a thousand nameless defects” in one’s life. What is this but a redefinition of sin so as to accommodate belief in an alleged state of sinlessness?

Sixth, Wesleyans are no doubt right in speaking of peak experience via dedication, obedience, or yielding to God (cf. Rom. 12:1–2; Eph. 5:18), but during these times we do not get more of the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit simply gets more of us. Sanctification is not an instantaneous act but a lifelong process (Rom. 7:13ff.). “Yielding to the Spirit is also a daily task, not a onetime action (cf. Rom. 6–7).

Seventh, Wesley does not explain how one can be in a sinless state (which he repeatedly said was possible) and yet still commit a sin so serious as to lose his salvation (which he believed could happen). In his Journal (August 1743), Wesley wrote: “I cannot believe ... that there is a state attainable in this life, from which a man cannot finally fall” (in WJW, 1.427). But if one had attained a state where sin was no longer possible, how could he commit any sin by which he would lose salvation?

Eighth, and finally, while all believers should endeavor to have a higher, deeper, and more intimate relationship with God, experience is a notoriously faulty method for testing truth. Experience, rather, is a God-ordained method for expressing truth. We must always be careful to interpret our experience by the Word of Truth, never vice versa. Martin Luther wrote,

Feelings come and feelings go,
And feelings are deceiving.
My warrant is the Word of God,
Naught else is worth believing.

Once again, the biblical presentation of sanctification is as a continual, lifelong process in which we should grow to be more and more like Christ, awaiting our death or His return; then and only then will we reach true perfection. Paul reminds us, “When perfection comes, the imperfect disappears.... Now we see but a poor reflection as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face” (1 Cor. 13:10, 12). John adds, “We know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2–3). Meanwhile, Peter says that we must “grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and forever” (2 Peter 3:18).

Salvation From the Presence of Sin (Glorification)

The third stage of salvation is called glorification. Unlike justification (which saved us from the past penalty of sin) and sanctification (which is saving us from the present power of sin), glorification is the future act that will save us from the very presence of sin.

A few primary passages make the point. In Paul’s words:

I consider that our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us. The creation waits in eager expectation for the sons of God to be revealed. For the creation was subjected to frustration, not by its own choice, but by the will of the one who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself will be liberated from its bondage to decay and brought into the glorious freedom of the children of God. We know that the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth right up to the present time. Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies. (Rom. 8:18–23)

John’s vision of our future salvation includes this glorious description:

I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away....

And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal.... And the building of the wall of it was of jasper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass. And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones.... And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass. And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. (Rev. 21:1–4, 10–11, 18–19, 21–22 KJV)

John also assures believers,

Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure. Everyone who sins breaks the law; in fact, sin is lawlessness. (1 John 3:2–4)

Consider again the insight of Paul:

What is perfect will someday appear, and what isn't perfect will then disappear.... Now all we can see of God is like a cloudy picture in a mirror. Later we will see him face to face. (1 Cor. 13:10, 12 CEV)

In view of this day, the hymn writer Charles H. Gabriel (1856–1932) declared,

O that will be glory for me,
Glory for me, glory for me;
When by His grace I shall look on His face,
That will be glory, be glory for me.

Several important events will mark this third and final stage of salvation.

First, our sinful nature will be abolished. Currently, “if we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us” (1 John 1:8). But then we will be “perfect” (1 Cor. 13:10)—“we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2). On that day, Christ “will transform our lowly bodies so that they will be like his glorious body” (Phil. 3:21).

Second, the Beatific Vision (see vol. 4, chap. 9) will be accomplished. We will see God face-to-face. This is something that no mortal can do, for “no one has ever seen God, but God the One and Only, who is at the Father’s side, has made him known” (John 1:18). Indeed, even Moses, the great mediator who spoke directly with God, was forbidden to see His face. When he asked, God replied, “You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live” (Ex. 33:20).

Nonetheless, while mortal man cannot see God and live, immortal man will see God and live forever. John says, “They will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads” (Rev. 22:4). Jesus promises, “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God” (Matt. 5:8).

Third, our freedom will be perfected. While all freedom involves self-determination, in order to test His creatures, God also gave them the freedom to do otherwise, that is, the (libertarian) power of contrary choice. This freedom is still retained in fallen humans; however, it will not exist in heaven, where our freedom will be perfect and made more like God’s. Being absolutely perfect, God does not have the freedom to do evil (Heb. 6:18; James 1:13). Likewise, at the Beatific Vision, when we behold absolute Goodness, we too will no longer be able to sin.

Now, by God’s grace we are able not to sin (1 Cor. 10:13), but then we will no longer be able to sin. This is not the loss of true freedom but the actualization of it. Perfect freedom is not the freedom of being in bondage to sin; instead, it is the freedom of being delivered from sin. Again, heaven, like marriage, is not the deprivation of freedom but the fulfillment of it.

We will one day be liberated from all bondage, including bondage to Satan. As we have seen, by His first coming Jesus defeated Satan officially (Col. 2:14; Heb. 2:14), but at His second coming He will defeat Satan actually and finally (Rev. 20:10; Matt. 25:41).

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF SALVATION (SUBSTITUTIONARY ATONEMENT)

Salvation is rooted in several realities, including the nature of God and the nature of human beings. For reconciliation between God and His creation, salvation was necessary, since He is absolutely holy and we are completely sinful. Salvation is possible because God is loving and gracious, desiring all to be saved (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9).

Salvation Follows From the Nature of God As Completely Holy

Several attributes of God, both metaphysical and moral, serve as the background for salvation. God is not only holy, just, and perfect, but He is also infinite and immutable.<sup>40</sup> Hence, God is absolutely holy and unchangeably just, and He cannot merely turn His head from sin and arbitrarily forgive it. He must punish evil, or He would not be completely just, and He must punish it eternally, or He would not be eternally just.

Salvation Follows From the Nature of Humankind As Totally Imperfect

Not only is God morally perfect, but human beings are morally imperfect. God is not only absolutely holy, but fallen human beings are completely unholy.

As it is written: “There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one” (Rom. 3:10–12).

Thus, the entire world stands guilty before the Creator, “for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). All have broken His law and are culpable (cf. Rom. 2:12–15; 3:19). Even human “righteousness” is sinful before God:

All of us have become like one who is unclean, and all our righteous acts are like filthy rags; we all shrivel up like a leaf, and like the wind our sins sweep us away. (Isa. 64:6)

Moses had earlier written, “The LORD saw how great man’s wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time” (Gen. 6:5). Jeremiah proclaimed, “The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure” (Jer. 17:9). Whatever righteousness we have is self-righteousness, which Jesus condemned (Luke 18:10–14). Paul clarifies, “Since they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own, they did not submit to God’s righteousness” (Rom. 10:3).

Salvation Follows From the Nature of God As Wholly Loving

Given God’s unchanging moral perfection and humanity’s complete moral imperfection, salvation is necessary. And, granting that God is completely and unchangeably loving, salvation is possible, for while His holiness makes it necessary that He punish sin, His grace moves Him to try to save all sinners. In His infinite wisdom, God found a way to do both—exchanging the substitutionary death of His perfect Son for our imperfections. In this manner, God was able to remain just and yet also be the Justifier of the unjust; His Son, the God-man, died—the Just for the unjust—that He might bring us to the Father.

In perhaps the most theologically significant and compact text in the Bible, the apostle Paul puts it this way:

But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. There is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus. (Rom. 3:21–26)

This is not to say there are no other dimensions of the Atonement, regarding which, as we have seen, most of the main theories have an element of truth. However, at the heart of the Atonement is the idea of a sacrificial substitute who paid the penalty for our sins that we might be free. He became sin for us that we might be declared righteous. Alvin Kelly’s hymn says, “I gave him my old tattered garments; He gave me a robe of pure white.”

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO SUBSTITUTIONARY ATONEMENT

Many objections have been leveled against the idea of the Atonement, particularly a substitutionary atonement. The most prominent ones are briefly discussed here.

Objection One—Based on the Alleged Unfairness of Punishing Another for Our Sins

It is argued by some that it is unfair to punish one person in place of another. After all, the very principle of just punishment is that each person bears his own sin:

The soul who sins is the one who will die. The son will not share the guilt of the father, nor will the father share the guilt of the son. The righteousness of the righteous man will be credited to him, and the wickedness of the wicked will be charged against him. (Ezek. 18:20)

How, then, could justice be served in punishing Christ for our sins?

Response to Objection One

In reply, it is definitely unjust to punish an unwilling person for another’s sin. But Christ was willing to die for us. He died voluntarily: “I lay down my life—only to take it up again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord. I have authority to lay it down and authority to take it up again” (John 10:17–18). Even in ordinary life, some people (like soldiers) are willing to die for others (like their countrymen). Such a deed is considered not only moral but noble.

Further, Christ is God. The One who demanded the penalty (God) was the One who paid it. The Judge paid the fine for the defendant. Like an earthly judge who takes off his robe, reaches into his wallet, and pays the fine for his accused son, even so God did this for us. In such a case the complaint that it is unjust to pay the fine for another’s sin vanishes.

In addition, as mentioned earlier, it is unjust to charge another person for my crime, but it is not unjust for him to voluntarily pay the fine. Once again, a voluntary substitutionary atonement is the apex of morality:

Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5:7–8)

In short, God's justice demands that all sin be punished, but not necessarily that all sinners be punished for their sin.

Finally, there is a priority within morality: Mercy triumphs over justice. Thus, while God's justice demands the punishment of the sinner, in the Cross, His love wins out and forgives his sin by faith. When there is an unavoidable conflict between two moral principles, the higher takes precedence over the lower. For example, Jesus taught that when the two unavoidably conflict, our love for God should take precedence over love for our parents (Matt. 10:37). Likewise, even though God's justice demands that all sin be punished, His love compelled Him to provide forgiveness for all sinners who will receive it.

Hence, while justice as such demands that the guilty pay for their own sins, when there is a conflict with love as such, the latter takes precedence over the former. By way of comparison, a child should always obey his or her parents. However, when this is transcended by a greater duty to obey God (as when a parent commands the child to sin), we are not dealing with obedience to parents as such—when there is a discrepancy between commands, God is preeminent. In substitutionary atonement, we are not dealing only with God's justice but also with a conflict between God's love and God's justice. In this case, the obligation to what as such would always be wrong (viz., not to punish the guilty) is suspended in view of the higher obligation to what is always right (viz., to save the repentant sinner).

Objection Two—Based on the Alleged Implication of Universalism

Some object that substitutionary atonement implies that all will be saved (universalism), since Christ is said to have been substituted for all. Many strong Calvinists (particularists) use this argument in defense of limited atonement,<sup>45</sup> insisting that since all for whom Christ died will be saved—and not all will be saved—then it follows that Christ did not die for all. Universalists, on the other hand, agree that all for whom Christ died will be saved, but they argue that Christ died for all, and, hence, all will be saved. Accordingly, universalists and particularists agree that there can be no substitutionary atonement without the effective salvation of everyone for whom Christ was a substitute; the former hold that Christ died for all, and the latter maintain that He died for some (the elect).

Response to Objection Two

Moderate Calvinists and Arminians who maintain substitutionary atonement can respond by making a substantial distinction: There is a difference between procurement for all and application to some. Christ achieved procurement of eternal life for everyone; application of salvation happens only to those who believe. All persons are saved potentially through Christ's death, but only some are saved actually—those who receive it. Just as a prisoner who is given clemency is legally free but may actually die while still in jail, even so Christ's death has made all "righteous" potentially (Rom. 5:19), but not all have actually appropriated it. As the apostle states, Christ "is the Savior of all men [potentially], and especially [actually] of those who believe" (1 Tim. 4:10).

Objection Three—Based on an Alleged Double Jeopardy

Philosopher Eleonore Stump (b. 1947) objects to the substitutionary-atonement model based on the claim that the price for sins was paid twice for all who are lost (“AAA” in Morris, PCF, 61–91). According to the substitution view, Christ paid the penalty in full so that no human has to pay it. However, those who go to hell pay for their own sins. If Christ has already paid that price, how is it just to demand that someone pay again? Isn’t this double jeopardy?

Response to Objection Three

This contention, the error of universalism, wrongly assumes that the Atonement is unconditionally applied to all sinners. It is not. The Atonement is applied only when it is received; hence, again, the substitution is potentially available to all but is not automatically applied to all. Christ put more than enough funds in the account to cover the debt of all sinners to God. We must draw on the account by faith for this forgiveness to actually take place.<sup>49</sup>

Objection Four—Based on the Ability of God to Forgive

Substitutionary atonement implies a necessity for Christ to die in order for us to be forgiven. Nevertheless, God, as God, has the ability to forgive sins without Christ dying for those who commit them. After all, we can and do forgive people who sin against us without having to die in order to do so. Why couldn’t God do the same, without the sacrifice of His Son?

Response to Objection Four

For one thing, this analogy is flawed. Our ability to forgive is based on Christ’s forgiveness. As Paul said, we are to forgive one another “as Christ forgave you” (Col. 3:13 KJV). No mortal has the inherent ability to forgive; as the Pharisees recognized, only God can forgive sins (cf. Mark 2:7).

Also, even God, without atonement, cannot overlook or accept sin: “Your eyes are too pure to look on evil; you cannot tolerate wrong” (Hab. 1:13). Nor can He simply forgive sin arbitrarily. Sin has caused a debt with God, and the debt must be paid. Christ paid that debt and ransomed us. As we have repeatedly observed, God can no more wink at sin and turn His head than He can cease being holy, perfect, and absolutely unchangeable.

Objection Five—Based on an Alleged Internal Conflict Within God

The substitution view of the Atonement seemingly implies an internal conflict within God. His love and wrath are at war with each other: One demands that all sinners be punished, and the other insists that they be set free. Hence, apparently, the wrath of God had to be poured out on Christ.

Response to Objection Five

This objection involves a misunderstanding. Christ was not sent out of God’s wrath but because of His love: “God so loved the world that he gave his only Son” (John 3:16 NLT; cf. 1 John 3:16). Consequently, a wrathful God is not somehow made loving by Christ’s death; instead, by the substitutionary atonement of Christ, a just and loving God has His justice satisfied (propitiated) so that His love could be released. The justice of the Justifier was satisfied by the Just dying for the unjust so that they could be justified (cf. Rom. 3:21–24).

Objection Six—Based on Alleged Nontransferability of Righteousness

According to this objection, righteousness can no more be transferred or imputed to another person than can guilt (cf. Ezek. 18:20).

Response to Objection Six

First of all, while people cannot suffer for the guilt of another's sin (Ezek. 18:20), nevertheless, they can (and do) suffer for the consequences of others' sins. Exodus 20:5 speaks of God "punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation." Abused children, for example, suffer from the consequences of parental sin, and the whole human race suffers from the consequences of Adam's sin.

Further, the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us is judicial (legal), not actual. While the actual transfer of guilt from one person to another is not possible, the legal transfer is.

What is more, this perfect righteousness is what we are "in Christ," not in ourselves (2 Cor. 5:17): "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21). This is possible because in salvation we are united with Jesus:

Don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life. (Rom. 6:3–4)

Therefore,

What the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit. (Rom. 8:3–4)

Objection Seven—Based on an Alleged Incompatibility Between Forgiveness and Payment for Sin

Eleonore Stump contends that a substitutionary atonement is contrary to its own intention, since it does not really present God as forgiving sins but as exacting a payment for them. To forgive a debt is not to demand atonement for it, but rather not to exact all that justice demands. Even so, according to the substitution view, God does exact His due from every sin, since He allows no sin to go unpaid. Indeed, God Himself fully pays the debt, and, thus, does not overlook any of it. Allegedly, then, there is no real forgiveness in substitutionary atonement ("AAA" in Morris, PCF, 62).

Response to Objection Seven

This objection incorrectly assumes that the total debt of every sinner is automatically canceled by the Atonement. According to the Bible, the sacrifice must be received to be effectual. Christ's death was sufficient for all but only efficient for those who believe. The actual canceling of the debt is conditional upon belief, i.e., upon actual acceptance of it. Hence, there is no contradiction, since there is no forgiveness of those who choose to attempt to pay for their own debt.<sup>52</sup> Likewise, those who are forgiven do not have to pay for their own debt, since Christ's payment has been applied to them. The only incompatibility between forgiveness and substitutionary atonement, then, comes when the Atonement is misconceived as an automatic and unconditional payment applied to everyone's sins.

For example, when one buys a bank, he buys all the debts owed to that bank as well. If he decides to cancel (forgive) these debts, the debtor does not have to pay them, but the debt has still been paid for by the one who purchased the bank. Hence, forgiveness and paying the debt are not contradictory.

Objection Eight—Based on the Alleged Inequity of the Payment for Sins

The substitution view of the Atonement claims that Christ paid the full penalty for the sins of all human beings so that they would not have to pay it. The substitution view also claims that the penalty for sin is everlasting damnation. However, no matter what agony Christ suffered, it certainly was not equivalent to eternal punishment, since while Christ's suffering came to an end, the suffering of sinners who choose hell will never be finished (see ibid., 63).

Response to Objection Eight

This argument wrongly posits that Christ's death had only temporal value. To the contrary, since Christ is God, and because He suffered as the God-man, His death had infinite value. Hence, the sacrifice was more than enough to atone for a finite number of sins. Christ's death cannot be measured simply in quantitative, temporal terms—such as “how long did He suffer?”—but rather must be regarded in terms of the infinite quality of His suffering. Accordingly, the death of the infinite has infinite value, which is more than sufficient to atone for finite sins.

Further, this objection is misdirected in that it focuses only on the debt and the debtor; it fails to note the objective value for God of the death of Christ. The sacrifice of Jesus completely satisfied (propitiated) the Father, regardless of how many sins it would be applied to in forgiveness. Once God's justice is satisfied, He is free to release His love on the sins of all sinners.

Objection Nine—Based on an Alleged Inability to Change One's Life

It is further charged that substitutionary atonement does not accomplish what it intends, namely, overcoming our alienation with God and, thus, changing a sinner's life. Supposedly, nothing in the substitution view points to how the work of Christ redirects human behavior and alters our propensity to sin. This, it is said, is the whole point of salvation, and hence a substitutionary atonement misses the whole point of atonement itself, which is to bring at-one-ment with God (see ibid., 61–91).

Response to Objection Nine

First, this contention overlooks the fact that the primary objective of the Atonement is to satisfy God, not transform the sinner. Indeed, the word atonement does not mean “at-one-ment”; it means “to appease,” “to placate,” “to pacify,” or “to cover over” in the eyes of God. Atonement is a God directed term, for God must be propitiated (1 John 2:1), otherwise His justice is not satisfied so that He can release His mercy (Rom. 3:21–26).

Second, substitutionary atonement does lead to the transformation of a sinner in the most effective way possible; namely, by the grace of God. God’s great love for us motivates us to love Him in return (1 John 4:19): Grace “teaches us to say ‘No’ to ungodliness and worldly passions” (Titus 2:12), and “the love of Christ compels us” (2 Cor. 5:14 NKJV). Therefore, our understanding of the unparalleled sacrifice of Christ on our behalf provides the highest possible motivation to change our sinful lives.

Third, and finally, nominal faith in the Atonement will not effect change in the sinner; nominal faith is not saving faith (cf. James 2). Saving faith involves trust, dependence, and repentance—all of which bring change in—and of—one’s life.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE NATURE OF SALVATION (SUBSTITUTIONARY ATONEMENT)

From these numerous citations, it can be seen that the need for Christ’s blood atonement and sacrifice for our sins is deeply rooted in Judeo-Christian history.

Biblical Writers

The Old Testament teaching of the Passover Lamb (Ex. 12) was fulfilled by Christ, “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world” (John 1:29 NKJV): “Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed” (1 Cor. 5:7). Indeed, “the life of a creature is in the blood ... it is the blood that makes atonement for one’s life” (Lev. 17:11), and “the law requires that nearly everything be cleansed with blood, and without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness” (Heb. 9:22).

Early Church Fathers

In spite of many different views on the Atonement among church leaders, there was still a basic strain, from earliest times, that preserved elements of the substitution view.

Polycarp (fl. second century)

Let us then continually persevere in our hope, and the earnest of our righteousness, which is Jesus Christ, “who bore our sins in His own body on the tree, who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth,” but endured all things for us, that we might live in Him. (EPP in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1.8.)

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

Thus, then, was the Word of God made man, as also Moses says: “God, true are His works.” But if, not having been made flesh, He did appear as if flesh, His work was not a true one. But what He did appear, that He also was: God recapitulated in Himself the ancient formation of man, that He might kill sin, deprive death of its power, and vivify man; and therefore His works are true. (AH in ibid., 1.3.18.7)

And not by the aforesaid things alone has the Lord manifested Himself, but [He has done this] also by means of His passion. For doing away with [the effects of] that disobedience of man which had taken place at the beginning by the occasion of a tree, “He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross;” rectifying that disobedience which had occurred by reason of a tree, through that obedience which was [wrought out] upon the tree [of the cross]. (AH in ibid., 1.5.1.36)

Medieval Church Fathers

Augustine (354–430)

Now, if infants are not embraced within this reconciliation and salvation, who wants them for the baptism of Christ? But if they are embraced, then are they reckoned as among the dead for whom He died? ... Nor can they be possibly reconciled and saved by Him, unless He remit and impute not unto them their sins. (OFSB, 1.44)

But perhaps, through some special perception of my own, I have said that sin is a sacrifice for sin. Let those who have read it be free to acknowledge it; let not those who have not read it be backward; let them not, I say, be backward to read that they may be truthful in judging. For when God gave commandment about the offering of sacrifices for sin, in which sacrifices there was no expiation of sins, but the shadow of things to come, the self-same sacrifices, the self-same offerings, the self-same victims, the self-same animals, which were brought forward to be slain for sins, and in whose blood that [true] blood was prefigured, are themselves called sins by the law; and that to such an extent that in certain passages it is written in these terms, that the priests, when about to sacrifice, were to lay their hands on the head of the sin, that is, on the head of the victim about to be sacrificed for sin. Such sin, then, that is, such a sacrifice for sin, was our Lord Jesus Christ made, “who knew no sin” (OGJ, 41.6).

So sin means a bad action deserving punishment, and death the consequence of sin. Christ has no sin in the sense of deserving death, but He bore for our sakes sin in the sense of death as brought on human nature by sin.... By Christ’s taking our sin in this sense, its condemnation is our deliverance, while to remain in subjection to sin is to be condemned. (RFM, 14.3)

Anselm

To remit sin in this manner is nothing else than not to punish; and since it is not right to cancel sin without compensation or punishment; if it be not punished, then is it passed by undischarged. (CDH, I.XII)

So heinous is our sin whenever we knowingly oppose the will of God even in the slightest thing; since we are always in his sight, and he always enjoins it upon us not to sin.... Therefore you make no satisfaction unless you restore something greater than the amount of that obligation, which should restrain you from committing the sin. (ibid., I.XXI)

[Thus,] the restoring of mankind ought not to take place, and could not, without man paid [paying] the debt which he owed God for his sin. And this debt was so great that, while none but man must solve the debt, none but God was able to do it; so that he who does it must be both God and man. And hence arises a necessity that God should take man into unity with his own person; so that he who in his own nature was bound to pay the debt, but could not, might be able to do it in the person of God.... Moreover, you have clearly shown the life of this man [Jesus] to have been so excellent and so glorious as to make ample satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and even infinitely more, (ibid., I.XVIII.a)

Yes, it is of all things most proper that such a Father should acquiesce with such a Son in his desire, if it be praiseworthy as relates to the honor of God, and useful for man's salvation, which would not otherwise be effected, (ibid., I.X)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

Wherefore, in order to accomplish a full expiation, he made his soul asham, i.e., a propitiatory victim for sin, (as the prophet says—Isa. 53:5, 10), on which the guilt and penalty being in a manner laid, ceases to be imputed to us. The Apostle declares this more plainly when he says that “he made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him” (2 Cor. 5:21 KJV). For the Son of God, though spotlessly pure, took upon him the disgrace and ignominy of our iniquities, and in return clothed us with his purity. (ICR, II.XVI.VI)

To satisfy our ransom, it was necessary to select a mode of death in which he might deliver us, both by giving himself up to condemnations and undertaking our expiation. Had he been cut off by assassins, or slain in a seditious tumult, there could have been no kind of satisfaction in such a death. But when he is placed as a criminal at the bar, where witnesses are brought to give evidence against him, and the mouth of the judge condemns him to die, we see him sustaining the character of an offender and evil-doer, (ibid., II.XVI.V)

It is now clear what the prophet means when he says that “the Lord has laid upon Him the iniquity of us all” [Isa. 53:6]; namely, that as he was to wash away the pollution of sins, they were transferred to him by imputation. (ibid., op. cit)

Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758)

The necessity of satisfaction for sin, and the reasonableness of that Christian doctrine, may appear from the following considerations: Justice requires that sin be punished, because sin deserves punishment. (WJE, 2.565)

Hence, “the satisfaction of Christ by his death is certainly a very rational thing” (ibid, 2.569).

Christ is often represented as bearing our sins for us: Isaiah 53:4, “Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows.” Isaiah 53:11, “For he shall bear their iniquities.” Isaiah 53:12, “He bare the sin of many” (ibid., 2.570).

Further, “the laying on of hands on the head of the sacrifice was a token of putting the guilt of sin upon a person; agreeably to the customary signification of the imputation of guilt among Hebrews” (ibid.).

Post-Reformation Teachers

William G. T. Shedd (1820–1894)

It is Divine justice that demands satisfaction, and it is the Divine compassion that makes the satisfaction. God is the one who holds man in a righteous captivity, and He is the one who pays the ransom that frees him from it. God is the holy Judge of man who requires satisfaction for sin; and God is the merciful Father of man who provides it for him. (DT, 2.392–93)

Not until the Holy One has been “propitiated” by an atonement, can the penalty be “released.” Neither of these effects can exist without the antecedent cause. The Bible knows nothing of the remission of punishment arbitrarily: that is without a ground or reason. Penal suffering in Scripture is released, or not inflicted upon the guilty, because it has been endured by a substitute. If penalty was remitted by sovereignty merely, without any judicial ground or reason whatever; if it were inflicted neither upon the sinner nor his substitute; this would be the abolition of penalty, not the remission of it. (ibid., 2.392)

According to this doctrine the work of Christ is a real satisfaction, of infinite inherent merit, to the vindicatory justice of God; so that He saves his people by doing for them, and in their stead, what they were unable to do for themselves, satisfying the demands of the law in their behalf, and bearing its penalty in their stead; whereby they are reconciled to God, receive the Holy Ghost, and are made partakers of the life of Christ to their present sanctification and eternal salvation.

This doctrine provides for both [of these great objects].... It shows how the curse of the law is removed by Christ’s being made a curse for us; and how in virtue of this reconciliation with God we become, through the Spirit, partakers of the life of Christ, [and] He is made unto us not only righteousness, but sanctification. We are cleansed by his blood from guilt, and renewed by his Spirit after the image of God. Having died in Him, we live in Him. Participation of his death secures participation of his life. (ST, 563–64)

Lewis Sperry Chafer (1871–1952)

In all these temporary coverings of sin is anticipation of the final sacrifice of Christ on the cross. Through the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, the concept of covering is no longer accurate, and the New Testament uses other terms. While the Old Testament sacrifices provided temporary covering from divine judgment, the death of Christ takes away the sin of the world [John 1:29; 1 John 3:5]. (ST, 2.83–84)

Millard Erickson (b. 1932)

We have seen that Christ’s death is interpreted in a wide variety of ways. Each of the theories we have examined seizes upon a significant aspect of his work. While we may have major objections to some of the theories, we recognize that each one possesses a dimension of the truth. In his death Christ (1) gave us a perfect example of the type of dedication God desires of us, (2) demonstrated the great extent of God’s love, (3) underscored the seriousness of sin and the severity of God’s righteousness, (4) triumphed over the forces of sin and death, liberating us from their power, and (5) rendered satisfaction to the Father for our sins. All of these things we as humans needed done for us, and Christ did them all. (CT, 799)

CONCLUSION

The Bible is a soteriological book that begins in eternity with God's acts of foreknowledge, predestination, and election. Even before we are saved, God is at work in prevenient grace and conviction. When by faith one receives the initial act of salvation (justification), at that very instant he or she is sealed by the Holy Spirit, baptized into the body of Christ, redeemed, regenerated, born again, adopted into God's family, reconciled to God, and forgiven of sin based on the mediation and atonement of Christ. All of these saving acts are made possible only because of the substitutionary death of Jesus on behalf of our sins, whereby the Just died for the unjust in order that God's justice may be satisfied and His mercy justify the unjust.

Salvation does not end with a single act of justification; this is only the first stage, by which one is saved from the penalty of sin. Salvation also involves a lifelong process of sanctification, by which we are saved from the power of sin. At death, our redemption climaxes with an act of glorification that saves us from the very presence of sin. At this point we will see God face-to-face (in the Beatific Vision) and become like Him, for then we shall see Him as He is.

CHAPTER TEN

THE EVIDENCE OF SALVATION

Virtually all Christian theologians believe that those who are saved should manifest their faith in good works. However, there is a significant intramural controversy as to (1) the scope and characteristics of this manifestation and (2) the actual connection between faith and works. The primary debate is between the Roman Catholic and Protestant views; a secondary discussion continues between lordship-salvation proponents and the free-grace group.<sup>2</sup>

THE HISTORIC CONTEXT OF THE CATHOLIC/PROTESTANT DEBATE ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAITH AND WORKS

In spite of the common core of Augustinian belief in the necessity of God's grace for salvation, Catholics and Protestants have had strong disagreement over the relationship between faith and works. As we have seen, the heart cry of the Protestant Reformation was "justification by faith alone!" The Roman Catholic Church responded with the declaration that "by his good works the justified man really acquires a claim to supernatural reward from God" (from the Council of Trent, as cited in Ott, FCD, 264).

Even within Protestant circles there is considerable discrepancy on the topic. While most evangelicals believe that saving faith reveals itself through good works, they differ as to the precise connection. Some hold that the performance of works automatically results from faith, while others claim that at times there is no observable evidence confirming that a person is saved. Some see good works as flowing inevitably, rather than automatically, from saving faith, while still others maintain that the doing of good works accompanies but does not result by necessity from it.

In contrast to all these Protestant views, Roman Catholics argue that performing good works is a condition for salvation rather than a consequence of it. Protestants insist that while we are saved for works, we are not saved by works.

The Catholic position on the relationship between justification and works was made infallible dogma in the sixteenth century at the Council of Trent, which was a reaction to Martin Luther's proclamation that "the just shall live by faith—alone." Luther was initially upset by the Roman Catholic sale of indulgences. In his region, an overzealous salesman named Johann Tetzel was promising potential purchasers that "when in the box the penny rings, the soul from purgatory springs." Luther's subsequent outcry (protest) sparked the Protestant Reformation.

Luther's Position

Before Martin Luther, standard (Augustinian) doctrine stressed intrinsic justification: The believer was made righteous by God's grace. Extrinsic justification, by which a sinner is legally declared righteous, was less conspicuous in pre-Reformation Christendom. With Luther, the situation did change dramatically; however, as noted by Peter Toon (b. 1939): “Luther does not employ forensic [legal] terms to explain this imputation of alien righteousness. This development will come later, from others” (FFJS, 58).

Luther was directed by Johann von Staupitz (c. 1460–1524), an abbot who in some ways supported him, to lecture (from 1515 to 1517) on Paul’s letters to the Romans and Galatians. The result of this study led Luther to a new view of God: The All-Terrible is also the All-Merciful. Luther found that in Paul’s Greek usage, the word justice has different meanings:

[The first meaning is a strict enforcement of the law, and the last is] a process of the sort which sometimes takes place if the judge suspends the sentence ... and thereby instills such resolve that the [guilty] man is reclaimed, (in ibid., 49)

This second meaning of the word justice is necessary because the sinner cannot ever attain any righteousness of his own: he merits or deserves only condemnation.... [But God has] freely opted to receive us to Himself ... to a fellowship that we from our side had broken and could never mend, (in Atkinson, MLPCC, 133)

When studying the meaning of Romans 1:16–17, Luther came to the following revolutionary discovery:

Night and day I pondered until I saw the connection between the justice of God and the statement that “the just shall live by faith.” Then I grasped that the justice of God is that righteousness by which through grace and sheer mercy God justifies us through faith. Thereupon I felt myself to be reborn and to have gone through open doors into paradise. The whole of Scripture took on new meaning, and whereas before the “justice of God” had filled me with hate, now it became to me inexpressibly sweet in great love. This passage became to me the gate to heaven, (in Bainton, HISLML, 65)

In spite of Luther’s findings, it is sometimes forgotten that he, like Roman Catholics, believed in a progressive definition of justification. For example, he said, “We understand that a man who is justified is not already righteous but moving toward righteousness” (LW, 34, 152). Further, “Our justification is not yet complete.... It is still under construction. It shall, however, be completed in the resurrection of the dead” (in Althaus, TML, 237). This sense of “progressive justification” is what many Protestants call “sanctification,” the process by which one is made righteous (intrinsicly), to be distinguished from an initial act (of justification from God) by which one is declared righteous (extrinsicly). Toon adds,

Justification by faith is both an event and a process. What later Protestants were to divide, Luther kept together. He is quite clear that there is a moment when a sinner is actually justified by faith. [The sinner] then possesses the righteousness of another, the alien righteousness of Christ, imputed to him.... [However,] this is the beginning of a journey toward a time (following the resurrection of the dead in the age to come) when he will in fact possess a perfect righteousness created in him by the Spirit of God. (FFJS, 58–59)

The Catholic Response to Luther

Again, the Council of Trent was the Catholic retort to Luther’s belief that one is saved by faith alone, apart from works. Trent considered the following questions concerning justification:

- (1) Is justification only judicial [or legal] in nature (extrinsic), or is there also an intrinsic (sanctifying) work involved?
- (2) What is the relationship between faith and good works?
- (3) Does the [human] will have an active role in justification?
- (4) How are justification and sacraments such as the Eucharist, baptism, and penance related?
- (5) Can the believer know with certainty that he is justified?
- (6) Can man incline himself toward justification, and, if so, is this inclination to be understood as meritorious? (from ibid., 69)

Plainly, most of these speak to the relationship between faith and works.

On January 9, 1547, council participants agreed on a final formula for justification. We will examine their conclusions based on the six questions mentioned above.

First, although several members recognized an extrinsic element in justification (thereby approaching the view of the Reformers on this point), the consensus view was that “the opinion that a sinner may be justified solely as a matter of ... imputation ... is rejected” (ibid., 72). Therefore, “justification is thus defined in terms of a man becoming, and not merely being reputed as, righteous” (ibid., emphasis added).

Second, in that Trent presented justification in two senses (the first being what Protestants [the Reformed] understand as justification and the second corresponding to the Protestant doctrine of sanctification), the latter (second justification) requires good works: “It is thus both possible and necessary to keep the law of God [for salvation]” (ibid., 84).

Third, Trent, taking original sin into account, stated that evil has affected the human race, and therefore, “man is incapable of redeeming himself. Free will is not destroyed, but is weakened and debilitated by the Fall” (ibid., 81). Luther rejected debilitation in his Bondage of the Will. According to Trent,

If anyone shall say that man’s free will moved and aroused by God does not cooperate by assenting to God who looses and calls... let him be anathema [i.e., “be hereby excommunicated, needing to either recant or go to hell”], (in Toon, ibid.)

So as one Catholic author put it, “The sinner indeed cooperates with this grace, at least in the sense of not sinfully rejecting it” (Anderson, JF, 34). While most Protestants agree, Calvinists quickly add (as would Catholic thomists) that it is God, by His grace, who brings about this cooperation.<sup>11</sup>

Fourth, the subject of the sacraments was addressed at Session VII (March 3, 1547). In order to comprehend these pronouncements, we must remember that Trent understood justification in two ways: The first phase and the second phase. Baptism is operative in the first way, since grace to overcome original sin is “mediated” to us through baptism. Both the Eucharist and penance pertain to the second sense of justification, and Catholics hold that such justification (i.e., righteousness) is “increased” (or “enhanced”) by participation in these sacraments.

Fifth, due to the Reformers’ stress on the assurance of salvation, Trent was forced to deal with the matter. Alister McGrath (b. 1953) claims that they issued “an explicit condemnation of the Lutheran doctrine of assurance as an assertion contrary to proper Christian humility” (ID, 2.78). However, the “explicit condemnation” deals with “infallible certainty” of salvation, which many Catholic scholars point out is not necessary but perhaps possible. In fact, “in many ways Roman [Catholic] dogmatics have pointed out that Rome’s rejection of personal assurance of salvation does not mean the proclamation of a religion of uninterrupted anxiety” (Berkouwer, CWR, 114). For the Roman Catholic, “there is an intermediate position between the assurance of faith and doubt. This position is that of moral certainty which excludes any anxiety and despair” (Bartmann, LD, 2.109, cited in ibid., 115). Thus, according to Catholicism, Christians can be said to have “relative” but not “absolute” (i.e., “infallible”) certainty of their salvation.

Sixth, and finally, Trent stated that our initial (first) justification must be seen as a “gift.” Therefore, it comes as a surprise to many Protestants that Roman Catholics believe “If anyone shall say that man can be justified before God by his own works which are done ... without divine grace through Christ Jesus: let him be anathema” (in Denzinger, SCD, 811, emphasis added). Further, Catholics maintain,

Nothing that precedes justification, whether faith or works, merits the grace of justification. For if it is by grace, it is no more by works; otherwise, as the apostle says, grace is no more grace, (in ibid., chapter 8, emphasis added)

In this connection it is only fair to point out that when Catholic scholars cite James 2:24 (“A man is justified by works” NKJV), they do not mean the initial, first justification (at baptism), which comes only by God’s grace. Rather, they are referring to the second, progressive justification (growth in righteousness) that Protestants call sanctification. On the other hand, Trent did assert that the performance of works is necessary for salvation in the progressive and eventual senses, and with this Protestants disagree strongly. Indeed, as we have seen, it is Catholic dogma that “by his good works the justified man really acquires a claim to supernatural reward from God” (in Ott, FCD, 264).

Since the defense of forensic (legal, judicial) justification is directly connected with Protestant rejection of the Roman Catholic teaching on merit, we must first discuss the Catholic doctrine of good works. As with previous chapters, the examination will be divided into biblical/theological and historical (traditional) arguments.

Catholic Appeals to the Bible for Meritorious Justification

Roman Catholic authority Ludwig Ott (b. 1906) argues, “According to Holy Writ, eternal blessedness in heaven is the reward for good works performed on this earth, and rewards and merit are correlative concepts” (ibid.). Ott offers the following Scripture in support:

“Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven” (Matt. 5:12 RSV); “Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat” (Matt. 25:34–35 KJV).

He adds,

St. Paul, who stresses grace so much, also emphasized, on the other hand, the meritorious nature of good works performed with grace, by teaching that the reward is in proportion to the works: “He [God] will render to every man according to his own labor” [Rom. 2:6] (ibid., 265).

Ott cites other similar passages (1 Cor. 3:8; Col. 3:24; Heb. 10:35; 11:6) and concludes, “The good works of the just establish a legal claim (meritum de condigno) to reward on God” [cf. Heb. 6:10] (ibid.).

Of course, this “claim” (‘demand’) is not intrinsic; our supposed right to reward is only real because God has placed Himself in this situation through His promise to compensate us for our good works. Nonetheless, eternal life is given to us on the grounds of our good works.<sup>14</sup> Thus, the Council of Trent declared:

To those who work well “unto the end” [Matt. 10:22], and who trust in God, life eternal is to be proposed, both as a grace mercifully promised to the sons of God through Christ Jesus, “and as a recompense” ... faithfully given to their good works and merit. (in Denzinger, SCD, 809.257)

Read this statement (from Trent doctrine) again:

If anyone shall say that the good works of the man justified are in such a way the gift of God that they are not also the good merits of him who is justified, or that the one justified by the good works ... does not truly merit increase of grace, eternal life, and the attainment of eternal life (if he should die in grace), and also an increase of glory; let him be anathema, (in ibid., 842.261)

Catholic Appeals to History (Tradition) for Meritorious Justification

Catholic theology claims: “From the times of the Apostolic Fathers, Tradition attests the meritoriousness of good works” (Geisler and MacKenzie, RCE, 228). For example, Ignatius of Antioch wrote to Polycarp: “Where there is great effort there is rich gain” (EP, I.I.3). Justin Martyr is also cited in defense of merit, and Tertullian asserted, “The man who performs good works can be said to make God his debtor” (OR, 1.323.44–46). Of course, in Catholic belief, these works grow out of faith, but the performance of works is the stated basis for the merit necessary for obtaining eternal life. Ott claims,

Natural reason cannot prove the reality of supernatural merit since this rests on the free Divine promise of reward... [Nevertheless,] the general conscience of men bears witness to the appropriateness of a supernatural reward for supernaturally good deeds freely performed. (FCD, 265)

AN EVANGELICAL CRITIQUE OF THE DOCTRINE OF MERITORIOUS JUSTIFICATION

We have already noted the Catholic declaration that the doing of works prior to justification is not meritorious. Nonetheless, with all due recognition to the shared Augustinian core of the necessity of grace, several substantial differences remain between the official Roman Catholic and orthodox Protestant views on salvation. Before stating the grounds for the Protestant position, we will respond to the Catholic arguments in favor of meritorious justification.

The Catholic View Confuses Reward and *Merit

The English word reward has an equivocal sense that has led to confusion. While Catholic theology rightly points out that the Bible sometimes refers to eternal life as a reward (e.g., Gal. 6:8) that can be inherited (e.g., Luke 18:18), the New Testament also refers to eternal life regarding the kind or degree of reward that one will inherit. This is based on the works that one performs, and Galatians 6:6–10 seems to fit into this category, since it speaks of believers reaping what they sow while on earth.

Nevertheless, in this sense the performance of works is not a condition but a consequence of salvation. No person works for an inheritance; an inheritance, by design, is graciously given by a benefactor. If a man is “rewarded” with salvation for his work, then eternal life is not truly and solely out of God's grace, despite Catholic protests to the contrary. When one is rewarded for works, the reward is not grace—payment is owed (at least in part) for services rendered.

In this way the New Testament emphatically rejects the idea of salvation as a reward (wage) for duty performed: A worker's wages "are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation" (Rom. 4:4). If the Catholic concept of merit were accurate, the bestowal of the grace of sanctification would be on the basis of good works. Again, however, what is worked for is not of grace, and what is given by grace is not obtained by works (Rom. 4:4; Eph. 2:8–9). The Catholic belief in merit as a necessary condition for eternal life (or ultimate justification) is contrary to the clear affirmation of Holy Writ.

The Catholic View Makes Works a Condition of Eternal Life

As we have seen, the Council of Trent declared:

To those who work well "unto the end" [Matt. 10:22], and who trust in God, life eternal is to be proposed, both as a grace mercifully promised to the sons of God through Christ Jesus, "and as a recompense" which is ... to be faithfully given to their good works and merit, (in Denzinger, SCD, 809.257)

The Bible, by contrast, declares, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 6:23).

Further, in direct opposition to the Catholic position, Scripture guarantees eternal life as a present possession of those who believe. Jesus said:

Truly, truly, I say to you, he who hears My word, and believes Him who sent Me has [present tense] eternal life, and does not come into judgment, but has [already] passed out of death into life. (John 5:24 NASB)

This same truth—that eternal life is a present position of the believer—is frequently repeated: "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life" (John 3:36); "I write these things to you ... so that you may know that you have eternal life" (1 John 5:13). Catholic dogma excludes any believer from claiming that he can be sure, right now, that if he were to die he would have salvation; he must await a final justification at death to have assurance that he possesses everlasting life and will not see God's condemnation.

In John's entire gospel, only one condition is laid down for obtaining eternal life: belief (3:16, 36; 5:24; 20:31; et al.). If salvation were not by faith alone, the whole message of John would be deceptive in stating that there is only one condition (faith) when there are actually two (faith plus works). Indeed, John overtly states that the only "work" necessary for eternal life is the act of believing. When asked, "What shall we do, that we may work the works of God?" Jesus replied, "This is the work of God, that you believe in Him whom He sent" (John 6:29 NKJV). There is simply nothing else we must do for our justification—Jesus did it all (John 19:31; cf. Heb. 10:14–15). It is important to note that belief and faith are the same, coming from the Greek root pisteuo.

The Catholic View Makes Works of Sanctification a Condition of Salvation

Again, the Council of Trent affirmed:

When he [Paul] characterizes the eternal reward as “the crown of justice which the Lord, the just judge, will render” (2 Tim. 4:8), he thereby shows that the good works of the just establish a legal claim to reward on God. (in Ott, FCD, 265)

Of course, as already established, this “legal claim” is not intrinsic to us but is a reality because God has promised it. Nonetheless, according to the Catholic argument, this is a promise to give us salvation based on our works; the fact is, one cannot work for a gift:

When a man works, his wages are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation. However, to the man who does not work but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited as righteousness. (Rom. 4:4–5)

We work from our salvation but never for it (cf. Gal. 3:11; Eph. 2:8–10).

Even granting (as Catholicism teaches) that for baptized infants the performance of works is not a condition for receiving initial righteousness (justification), even so, according to Catholic theology it is a condition for progressive righteousness (sanctification). In other words, one cannot receive a right standing before God (by which he has the divine promise of eternal life) without engaging in works of righteousness. But that is precisely what Scripture says is not the case: It is “not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us” (Titus 3:5 NKJV). This cannot, as Catholics claim, apply only to initial justification, because the present tense (Gk: anakainoseos, renewal) is used in this verse. Righteousness before God comes by grace through faith alone: It is “not of works, lest anyone should boast” (Eph. 2:9 NKJV). Catholicism’s overreaction to Luther obfuscated the purity and clarity of the gospel and conflicted with their own earlier Second Council of Orange (529), which denied semi-Pelagianism.

Catholics have responded by pointing out that not all Protestants agree that a Christian has the promise of heaven on the basis of justification alone—Arminians, for example, maintain that a true believer can lose his salvation. However, this objection misses the mark, for the question at hand is not how we keep salvation after we receive it but how we obtain it in the first place. That anyone believes a Christian can lose eternal life in no way validates or supports the Catholic insistence that eternal life cannot be obtained without meritorious works. Once again, eternal life—not just initial (or, as some say, forfeitable) justification—is a present gift to, and possession of, believers (cf. Luke 23:42–43; John 3:16; 5:24; Rom. 6:23).

After verbal ambiguity is cleared up, the official Catholic position is clearly unbiblical. Its insistence that the performance of works is necessary for salvation—a condition for receiving a right standing before God that entails the promise of heaven—is precisely what the Reformation rightly rejected.

The Catholic View Confuses Working for Salvation and Working From Salvation

Put in traditional terms, Catholicism fails to recognize the important difference between working for salvation and working from salvation. We do not work in order to obtain salvation; we work because we have already been given it. God works salvation in us by His justification, and we work out our salvation through sanctification by His grace (Phil. 2:12–13).

In spite of the fact that the Catholic understanding of salvation does not logically eliminate forensic justification, it does nevertheless obscure it. By failing to make a clear distinction between forensic (legal) justification and practical (applicational) sanctification, Catholic belief blurs the truth that the only necessary action required of us for justification is faith. Perhaps this is why hundreds of thousands of Catholics have come to personally know Jesus Christ outside of the Catholic Church. In fact, this may be why Catholicism has not produced any of the great evangelists and has not widely circulated an outline of the process of salvation.

The Catholic View Makes a False Distinction Between Works and *Works of the Law

The New Testament teaching against the concept of salvation by works is starkly opposed to the Catholic doctrine that salvation can be merited. In order to counter this, Roman Catholic scholars have made an artificial distinction between keeping the works of the law (which they admit is not a condition for salvation) and the performance of works (which they insist is a condition for salvation). Nevertheless, Paul's statements against works for salvation cannot be limited only to works of the [Mosaic] law (such as circumcision)—they extend equally to all kinds of meritorious good works. Every good work, in one way or another, is in accordance with God's law, for no work is good unless it fulfills God's standard of goodness (His law).

Since God is the standard of all righteousness, it follows that all true works of righteousness will be according to His nature. It is only our righteousness (self-righteousness) that is abhorrent in God's eyes (cf. Isa. 64:6; Rom. 10:3). Catholicism holds that part of the basis for obtaining eternal life is meritorious works; it makes no difference whether or not a work is prompted by grace—if the accomplishment of meritorious works is a condition for eternal life, then salvation is not solely based on God's grace. According to His Word (Rom. 4:5), we are saved only through faith (Lat: sola fidei) and only by grace (Lat: sola gratia).

Further, when condemning the idea of works for salvation, Paul does not limit it to “works of the law” but sometimes simply refers to “works” or “works of righteousness” (cf. Eph. 2:8–9; Titus 3:5–7). Contrary to the Catholic view, the Ephesians passage is clearly aimed at “Gentiles” who had been “aliens from the commonwealth of Israel” (2:11–12 KJV), with no suggestion of works in adherence to Jewish law. Nor does the Jew-Gentile conflict diminish the reality that Paul is speaking to Gentiles about “works” other than those unique to Jewish law; the argument offered by some Catholics that “boasting” (in Eph. 2:9) refers to Jewish boasting (since they boasted about “works of the law”) is implausible for several reasons.

For one thing, unbelieving Jews are not the only ones who boast in their good works. Pride is a condition of all fallen creatures (cf. 1 John 2:15).

Furthermore, in this very context Paul explicitly addresses alienated Gentiles (Eph. 2:11–12), and the Titus text (3:5–7 NKJV) does not point to “works of the law” but rather “works of righteousness.” That the Greek past tense is applied to “salvation” does not bolster the Catholic explanation that this passage refers only to what Protestants call justification (and not to sanctification), for Paul is speaking to people who have already been saved—use of the past tense is natural.

In addition, the Catholic claim that “works” is occasionally an abbreviation for “works of the law” (Rom. 3:27–28 KJV) fails.

First, that all “works of the law” are here summarized as “works” does not mean the reverse is necessarily true. All works of the law are works, but not all works are works of the law.

Second, when Paul is speaking to Gentiles (who, as Romans 2:14 says, “have not the [Mosaic] law”), he does not note their performance of works of the Mosaic Law (e.g., Eph. 2:8–9)—they likewise are said not to be justified by works (Rom. 3:21–24). To be sure, “works” often arise in the New Testament in the context of circumcision (cf. Rom. 4; Gal. 3); this occurs when specific situations occasioned Paul's condemnation of any kind of works deemed necessary for salvation (cf. Acts 15:5). To limit all of Paul's rejections of “works” to “works of the law of Moses” is akin to limiting God’s Old Testament condemnation of homosexual behavior to Israel because such passages occur only in the Pentateuch, written to Jews.

Third, the same is true of Paul’s rejection of meritorious “works” as a means of salvation. To limit Paul’s condemnation to “works of self-righteousness” as opposed to “meritorious works” is an example of eisegesis. What is more, if our works had even a small part in obtaining salvation, we would have grounds to boast and, hence, would still come under condemnation.

Fourth, and finally, the basic moral character of God expressed in the Ten Commandments is the same as that expressed through natural law to all humanity: That someone is not consciously or deliberately doing works according to the law of Moses does not mean the basic moral standard is different. Therefore, in this sense, all moral works are “works of the law,” for they are in accord with the moral principles expressed in Mosaic Law.

This is why “when Gentiles, who do not have the law [of Moses], by nature do the things in the law [of Moses], these ... show the work of the law written in their hearts” (Rom. 2:14–15 NKJV).

In the final analysis, when it comes to the moral demands of the law, there is no substantial discrepancy between “works of righteousness” and “works of the law.” Consequently, the Catholic contention that Paul meant the latter but not the former is a distinction without a difference. The simple truth is that no works of any kind merit salvation: Eternal life is a gift received only by faith (cf. John 3:16, 36; 5:24; Rom. 6:23).

The Catholic View Is Similar to the Error of Galatianism

By insisting that the achievement of works is not a condition for obtaining justification (initial righteousness) but only for obtaining sanctification (progressive righteousness), Catholics do not avoid the charge of serious soteriological error. The claim that sanctification is by works seems to be akin to the falsehood Paul addressed in the book of Galatians. The Galatians were already justified or, to use Catholic terminology, had already received initial justification. They were “brethren” (1:11; 6:1 KJV); they were “in Christ” (2:4); hence, they would not be in danger of falling from grace (5:4) unless they were already within it. They were secure in their justification (initial righteousness) but were in danger of losing their sanctification (progressive righteousness).

Further, we argue that the apostle’s warning to them related to their sanctification because his fear was not that they would lose their justification but that they would fall back into “bondage” to the law (2:4). Paul was not afraid his Galatian children (4:19) would fall from grace in the sense of obtaining salvation; they had already received it (3:2). Rather, his concern was that they would lose sight of grace as a means of continuing in their Christian life (3:3). Paul’s pivotal plea is “Having begun in the Spirit, are you now being made perfect by the flesh?” (3:3 NKJV). Their initial righteousness was given by grace through faith, so why should they think they could progress in righteousness through any other means than by grace through faith? (1:6). Paul did not want them to fall from grace in their path to holiness and purity. In other words, the central message of Galatians is: You are not only justified by grace, but you are also being sanctified by grace. Neither initial righteousness (justification) nor progressive righteousness (sanctification) is received by or conditioned on meritorious works. Both are received by grace through faith alone.

It should be noted in this connection that Paul’s reference to “false brothers” (Gk: pseudadelphos) is not to the believers in Galatia who had adopted the Judaizers’ erroneous teaching that converts needed to keep the law of Moses as a means of sanctification. Paul was actually pointing to the false teachers who were “secretly brought in” from the outside (2:4

NKJV). Since the Galatians had already been justified by faith, the danger of the false teaching was that the true believers at Galatia would adopt the Judaizers' additions or supplements to the gospel (1:7–9) as a means of progressive sanctification. This grave distortion was obscuring the pure grace of God that was as necessary for their progressive sanctification as it was for their initial justification.

The Catholic View Confuses the Reward of Salvation With Rewards for Service

The texts cited by Catholics about “reward for works” do not highlight the reward of salvation (whether justification or sanctification); they are talking about service rewards. It is true that all who are saved by God's grace through faith (Eph. 2:8–9) will be rewarded for their works done in honor of Christ (1 Cor. 3:11ff.; 2 Cor. 5:10). These works, however, have no relation to whether we will be in heaven—they have to do with what status we will have once we are there (Luke 19:17, 19). All believers will be in His kingdom. By contrast, in Roman Catholic theology one's progressive sanctification does bear on whether he will make it to heaven. For Catholics, what one obtains at the moment of initial justification does not suffice (unless, of course, he dies immediately after regeneration).

Further, works-for-reward comes under sanctification, not justification: We do works as a result of being saved, not in order to become saved (i.e., to receive eternal life). In other words, merit makes sense if understood in the context of someone already justified before God and working out salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12), but not in the context of working for it. Even here, the doing of works is not a condition for being sanctified but a manifestation of it. Catholicism, then, is left in de facto denial of the grace it officially claims is necessary for both justification and sanctification.

The Catholic View Loads Works Into Its Concept of Faith

Roman Catholic biblical scholars acknowledge that “the absence of any reference to sacraments and good works in Paul's thesis in [Rom. 1:16ff.] has often been noticed.” To this they respond by redefining faith to include works:

Omission causes no difficulty if faith be understood in the sense of dogmatic faith, which accepts all the doctrines of the Gospel as true and obeys all its precepts as divine commandments. For in this faith sacraments and good works are included. (Orchard, CCHS, 1049)

This is another definitive instance of eisegesis. Remember that Paul goes on to confirm “the one who does not work, but believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness” (Rom. 4:5 NASB) and “a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the LAW” (Rom. 3:28 NASB). Nevertheless, when commenting on this very verse, A Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture emphatically teaches:

Another conclusion from [Rom. 3:28] that had to be rejected by the Council of Trent is that before justification only faith is necessary [for adults] as a preparation and no other good works. (Orchard, 1055)

The commentary insists that faith is only the “immediate” preparation for justification—a “remote” preparation is also necessary, including “a resolution to receive the Sacrament of baptism and to keep the commandments” (ibid., emphasis added). Nothing could be more contrary to the plainly evident meaning of the Romans text.

Consequently, in spite of commendable emphasis on the necessity of grace for salvation and the need for explicit faith as a precondition for our justification, Roman Catholics still maintain that even justification (in adults, not baptized infants) is preconditioned on faith plus works. Furthermore, for Roman Catholics, ultimate salvation—glorification, eternal life—always requires both faith and works.

The Catholic View Makes Works Necessary for Re-Justification

Catholic doctrine also makes it clear that the accomplishment of works is a condition for receiving re-justification, which is necessary after one commits a mortal sin (otherwise, salvation will be lost). Since the Roman Catholic Church does not believe in re-baptism, it must offer another way for a wayward soul to come back into the fold. This is provided by penance. The Council of Trent declared,

This sacrament of penance, moreover, is necessary (normatively) for the salvation of those who have fallen after baptism, as baptism itself is for those as yet not regenerated. (Canon 6, in Denzinger, SCD, 895.273)

Penance is a form of works; hence, in this sense, the performance of works is a condition for re-justification—the re-saving of those who have lost their initial justification by a mortal sin. In view of this, one has to question why Catholics do not believe meritorious works are also necessary for initial justification. At least part of the answer lies in the teaching that justification (regeneration) comes at baptism, which is performed on infants who cannot yet believe. Infants are not even self-conscious (to say nothing of God-conscious), nor have they yet developed the power of moral choice, since they aren’t morally aware. One must ask, then, “If baptism were only for adults, would works (e.g., penance) also be a precondition for salvation?” The answer seems to be yes, for “doing penance” is explicitly listed by the Catholic Church as a precondition for adults who wish to be saved. The Council of Trent cited both Jesus and Peter in proof of this point:

The Lord also said: “Unless you do penance you shall all likewise perish” (Luke 13:3), and the prince of the apostles, Peter, recommending penance to sinners about to receive baptism, said: “Do penance and be baptized, every one of you” (Acts 2:38). (in Denzinger, SCD, 894.272)

The Catholic View Mitigates Grace by Making Works a Condition of Progressive Justification

Another way to make the point is to note that while Catholic theology admits grace is necessary for the initial stage of salvation (which Protestants call justification), nonetheless, the doing of works is necessary for the subsequent stage of salvation (which Protestants call sanctification). To be sure, Catholics believe this transformation (which they call progressive justification) is not possible unless one is moved by God’s grace. However, arguing for the necessity of works for sanctification negates in practice the doctrine of grace that Catholicism confesses in principle. Whether the doing of works is prompted by grace (Catholics and Protestants agree that it is) isn’t the issue—when one cannot be saved without meritorious good works, these works become a condition to obtain eternal life.

Again, the Protestant view holds that the carrying out of good works flows from justification but is not a condition for sanctification, even though saving faith will be confirmed through action. Even Protestants (e.g., Arminians) who believe we can lose salvation do not believe the performance of works is necessary for obtaining salvation (whether justification or sanctification). Sanctification is not obtained by good works, it is manifested in good works; the sanctified life results from faith prompted by grace (Rom. 4:4; cf. Gal. 3:3), and we do not work for God’s grace but from it.

The Protestant presentation of the way of salvation, following the unmistakable biblical distinction between justification (in the forensic sense) and sanctification (in the practical sense), is more cogent, much more purely preserving the doctrine of grace. Once a believer knows he has right standing before God (i.e., is justified) by faith alone, his mind is not cluttered with works he must perform in order to be assured that all his sins (past, present, and future) are forgiven and that he has been promised eternity with the Lord. While Catholics acknowledge that there is an initial act of justification, they also maintain that one must work to faithfully avoid mortal sin in order to achieve final justification. This is not conducive to the assurance of salvation by which we “know ... [we] have eternal life” (1 John 5:13) and by which we are inseparably connected with God by His love (Rom. 8:1, 36–39).

The Catholic View Decreases Motivation to Perform Good Works

Ironically, Catholic insistence on good works to attain progressive and final justification does not provide the proper motive toward good works: Knowing we are justified by grace alone through faith alone is the highest motivation to sanctification. In recognizing God’s grace, which declares one righteous apart from any merit, a believer is most highly energized for service. The love of Christ “controls us” (2 Cor. 5:14 NASB), and “we love him because [we realize that] He first loved us” (1 John 4:19 NKJV); the grace of God not only brings us salvation (Titus 2:11) but also “teaches us to say “No” to ungodliness and worldly passions (2:12). Keeping laws to obtain grace only brings one into further bondage (cf. Col. 2:22; Rom. 8:2–3; Gal. 4:3–4). In the words of the chorus, those who recognize they are saved only by grace can sing,

How can I do less than give Him my best and live for Him completely after all He’s done for me.

The Catholic View Argues for Sacramental Salvation

While Roman Catholic theology claims there is no salvation apart from God’s grace, its view of the sacraments tends once more to take away with the left hand in practice what it has affirmed with the right hand in principle. The Catholic view of a sacrament, unchanged by the Council of Vatican II (1962–1965), is that it is given “not merely as a sign but as a cause of grace” (in Ott, FCD, 325). Catholic dogma maintains:

If anyone shall say that the sacraments of the New Law do not contain the grace which they signify, or that they do not confer that grace on those who do not place any obstacle in the way, as though they were only outward signs of grace or justice, received through faith ... let him be anathema, (in Denzinger, SCD, canon 6, 849.262)

Furthermore, according to Catholic doctrine, it is anathema to believe that “grace is not conferred from the work which has been worked” but has come from “faith alone” (in ibid., canon 8, 851.263). This being the case, according to Catholic doctrine, salvation is by sacraments—God’s normative method of saving sinners is through the Catholic sacramental system. This is, in effect and for the most part, an institutionally mediated salvation, piece by piece, until the sacraments are received throughout the course of life.

Roman Catholics believe that sacraments are effective objectively regardless of whether their efficacy is experienced subjectively: “Sacraments confer grace immediately, without the mediation of fiducial faith.” In order to designate this, Catholic theology coined the phrase ex opere operato (Lat: “by the work that is worked”); meaning, “the Sacraments operate by the power of the completed sacramental rite” (in ibid., canon 8, 851.263). Trent’s adoption of ex opere operato was vigorously opposed by the Reformers, for the phrase means the sacraments “move God to bestow the grace by their objective value. As soon as the sacramental sign is validly accomplished God bestows the grace” (Ott, FCD, 331). In other words, salvation is dependent on performing the works of the sacramental system—it does not come by grace alone through faith alone.

The Catholic View Holds That the Roman Catholic Church Is the Institution of Salvation

The sacraments, of course, are mediated through the Church, which is believed to bestow the grace of God on its recipients in stages from birth (baptism) to death (extreme unction). Catholicism does recognize the validity of two sacraments—baptism and marriage—that are widely practiced outside its jurisdiction and also allows that grace can be dispensed through the Lord’s Supper. The institutionalized sacraments are necessary for salvation (Denzinger, canon 4, 847.262).

The Roman Catholic Church teaches that “except for Baptism and Matrimony, a special priestly or episcopal power, conferred by Holy Orders, is necessary for the valid ministration of the Sacraments” (Ott, FCD, 341). While both Catholic laypersons (e.g., nurses or doctors) and even Protestant ministers may administer baptism in the name of the Trinity, the Council of Trent soundly condemned the belief that “all Christians have the power to administer all the sacraments” (ibid.). Only the Roman Catholic Church has the right.

Trent made it infallible dogma that Catholicism is God’s chosen organization to mete out God’s sacramental grace, bit by bit, from birth to death. Consequently, the Roman Catholic Church is the institution of salvation—something to which Protestants take strong exception. The Eucharist is a prime example: Not only does the Church (through its priesthood) claim to be the only divinely appointed organization that can administer this sacrament, but it also insists it has the God-given power to actually transform the physical elements of bread and wine into the literal body and blood of Christ (transubstantiation). Perhaps one must stand outside the Roman Catholic system to be appropriately impressed by the utter inappropriateness of this presumption about the institutionalization of salvation.

The Catholic View of the Eucharist As Sacrifice Vitiates Salvation by Grace

Roman Catholics view the Eucharistic Feast as an “unbloody sacrifice,” an idea found in the writings of some early medieval Fathers (see Ott, ibid., 405–07). Gregory the Great (c. 540–604), considered “the father of the medieval papacy” (Cross, ed. ODCC, 594–95), held that at every mass Christ was sacrificed afresh, and “this notion of the mass as sacrifice eventually became standard doctrine of the Western church—until it was rejected by Protestants in the sixteenth century” (González, SC, 1.247).

Protestants reject “Eucharistic Mass as sacrifice.” Lutheran theology, for example, declares: “Since Christ died and atoned for sin once and for all, and since the believer is justified by faith on the basis of that one-time sacrifice, there is no need for repeated sacrifices” (Luther, BC, 140).

Sacerdotalism is also denied: “The presence of Christ’s body and blood is not a result of the priest’s actions. It is instead a consequence of the power of Jesus Christ” (ibid.).

Of course, Catholics argue that the priest does not consecrate by his own power but by the power of God invested in him. The Protestant objection does not stem from whether the priest is truly an efficient cause or merely an occasional cause of God’s power; the problem is the Catholic belief that such divine power is given to the administration of the Roman priesthood. Here again, Catholicism has institutionalized salvation and thus corrupted the pure grace of God by placing it under the control of a human hierarchy.

SUMMARY OF AGREEMENTS AND DIFFERENCES

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAITH AND WORKS

Now that we have studied the historic battle between Catholics and Protestants, we will examine the intramural debate among Protestants on the relationship between faith and works. All agree that the performance of works is not a condition for but a result of salvation. It is the precise connection between faith and works that awaits discussion.

Whatever the connection between faith and works, it is clear that the Bible repeatedly emphasizes the believer's need to manifest good works: "In the same way, let your light shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and praise your Father in heaven" (Matt. 5:16). "God is able to make all grace abound to you, so that in all things at all times, having all that you need, you will abound in every good work" (2 Cor. 9:8). "We are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do" (Eph. 2:10). "[I am] confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:6). "We pray [for you to receive wisdom and understanding] in order that you may live a life worthy of the Lord and may please him in every way: bearing fruit in every good work, growing in the knowledge of God" (Col. 1:10). "I also want women ... [to practice] good deeds, appropriate for women who profess to worship God" (1 Tim. 2:9–10). "No widow may be put on the list of widows unless she ... is well known for her good deeds" (1 Tim. 5:9–10). "Good deeds are obvious, and even those that are not cannot be hidden" (1 Tim. 5:25). "Stress these things, so that those who have trusted in God may be careful to devote themselves to doing what is good" (Titus 3:8).

True Believers Manifest Their Faith in Good Works

There are crucial differences between the proponents of various Protestant views on the relationship between faith and works. Many strong Calvinists hold that as a believer is moved by God's grace, saving faith automatically produces good works. Other Protestants hold that doing good works flows inevitably from saving faith but not automatically (a free choice is involved). Still others prefer to say that works flow naturally from saving faith. Some free-grace proponents claim that the accomplishment of good works usually accompanies saving faith, even though it is not a direct (or mandatory) result. Others insist that works are neither automatic nor necessary.

Why Works Do Not Flow Automatically From Saving Faith

There are many reasons for rejecting strong Calvinism's insistence that works flow automatically from saving faith.

First, sanctification is a process involving obedience, and obedience is not automatic but is an act of the will (cf. Rom. 6:16; Eph. 6:5; 1 John 2:3, 22, 24). Even the strong Calvinist acknowledges that grace works cooperatively (with our free will) after justification. Accordingly, it cannot be automatic.

Second, sanctification is a manifestation of our love for God, and love is not an automatic act but a free one (cf. Matt. 22:37–39; John 15:10; 1 John 5:3).

Third, again, strong Calvinists admit that sanctification involves cooperative grace, which signifies a synergistic ("working together") act of God's grace and the human will.

Fourth, Romans 6:16 describes sanctification as a free action in which we are directed to "offer [our] selves."

Fifth, other acts of goodness are described as free and uncoerced—such as "entirely on their own" (2 Cor. 8:3) or "spontaneous and not forced" (Philem. 1:14; cf. 1 Cor. 7:37, 39).

Sixth, sanctification is a duty, and every responsibility implies the ability to respond, if not in our own strength, then by God's grace.

Seventh, we are rewarded for good works (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11ff.; Rev. 22:12), and it is meaningless to reward someone for actions that come automatically (i.e., without choice).

Eighth, and finally, we suffer loss of rewards for bad actions (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11ff.), and it is senseless to punish someone for what could not have been avoided (since, again, it allegedly came automatically).

Why Works Do Flow Naturally From Saving Faith

While works do not flow automatically from saving faith, they do flow naturally, just as buds come naturally from a living bush. As Charles Ryrie (b. 1925) correctly observes,

Every Christian will bear fruit.... Otherwise he or she is not a true believer.... Fruit, then, furnishes evidence of saving faith. The evidence may be strong or weak, erratic or regular, visible or not, but a saving faith works. (SGS, 42–43, emphasis added)

Even if circumstances put faith into a dormant state of survival for a time, there will be signs of life. With a true believer, as with other kinds of vitality, spiritual life can neither hide completely nor for long—it naturally blooms forth. Of course, to be fruitful it must be cultivated (2 Peter 3:18), and this is supported by many lines of scriptural evidence.

First, saving faith is likened to a seed that grows naturally in good soil (Luke 8:11–18; cf. 1 Peter 1:23).

Second, activity follows naturally from one’s nature, and the true believer receives a new nature (2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:10).

Third, true believers are “born again” (John 3:3, 7), and, as such, they manifest a desire to grow by their hunger for nourishment.

Fourth, the undeniable biblical connection between faith and works indicates that the achievement of works flows naturally from the faith that saves.

Fifth, it is widely acknowledged, even by free-grace proponents, that saving faith involves trust. Trust leads naturally to good actions toward the one who is trusted.

Sixth, saving faith involves true repentance (Acts 17:30–31; 20:21; cf. 19:4), and true repentance will naturally lead to good works (Matt. 3:8; Acts 26:20).

Seventh, that true faith involves love for God (Matt. 22:37; John 4:7) reveals that it will result in actions. True love naturally expresses itself (1 Cor. 13:1ff.).

Eighth, true faith is not mere mental (intellectual, mind-based) assent. Since true faith also includes the emotions and will (Ryrie, SGS, 110–11), good works flow from the genuine belief of the whole person.

Ninth, that true faith involves obedience shows that belief naturally expresses itself in action.

Tenth, James says explicitly:

What good is it, my brothers, if a man claims to have faith but has no deeds? Can such faith save him? [No.] ... In the same way, faith by itself, if it is not accompanied by action, is dead.... You see that [Abraham’s] faith and his actions were working together, and his faith was made complete by what he did. (James 2:14, 17, 22)

Eleventh, and finally, we are sanctified the same way we are justified—by faith (see Gal. 3:4, 11). However, sanctification is conditioned on our “obedience, which leads to righteousness” (Rom. 6:16; cf. Eph. 6:5; 1 John 2:3, 22, 24).

Some have objected that if doing good works naturally flows from faith, then the Bible has no need to exhort us in that regard (which it does—e.g., Titus 3:8). The reason Scripture so encourages us is that while the accomplishment of good works does come naturally from saving faith, it does not come forth automatically. Furthermore, while some actions come naturally, additional fruit comes by the arduous work of cultivating, fertilizing, watering, and pruning (cf. John 15:2). Again, without these actions, spiritual life can become dormant and stunted.

Similarly, some have observed that grace is said to be a teacher of godliness (Titus 2:11–12) and subsequently argued that if godliness follows naturally from saving faith, one has no need of grace to teach him to do good works. However, teaching helps to produce better fruit (John 15:2); also, nature will naturally produce some fruit, but not as much as if it is lovingly tended (cf. 1 Cor. 3:6; 2 Peter 3:18). As Ryrie states, “Saving faith is a working faith, and those works justify believers in the courtroom on earth [as opposed to “in heaven”].... Unproductive faith is a spurious faith” (SGS, 121, emphasis added).

True Believers Can Fall Into Sin

All of this is not to say that true believers cannot “backslide” (Jer. 3:14 NKJV) or be “overtaken in any trespass” (Gal. 6:1 NKJV) or commit “sins” (1 John 1:8–9). David did (2 Sam. 11), and he paid dearly (2 Sam. 12). Lot, who lived in Sodom, was “a righteous man” (2 Pet. 2:7), but he fell into sin, as did Noah, a great man of faith (Gen. 9). Likewise, Abraham, “the father of many nations,” was beset by deceit and unbelief (Gen. 20–21).

In the New Testament, even John the Baptist, the herald of the Messiah, had his doubts (Luke 7:19), but Jesus said he would be in the kingdom of God (Matt. 11:11). Peter, who denied the Lord three times, did not lose his salvation (John 21:15–19; cf. Matt. 26:34–36). He was still “wheat,” and he still had his “faith” (cf. Luke 22:31–32). Paul speaks of “carnal” believers (1 Cor. 3:1, 3 KJV); indeed, the Corinthian church as a whole was living in various kinds of sin, yet Paul addressed them as “saints” (1:2 KJV). Even the believer who committed incest was rescued (5:5). Of course, not all Christians will receive rewards in heaven (3:12–14); some will be saved “as through fire” (v. 15 NKJV).

True Believers Are Disciplined When They Sin

Sometimes the sola gratia view is confronted with the charge that it leads to a libertine or licentious life. Paul himself faced this accusation and asked, “What shall we say, then? Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase? By no means! We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?” (Rom. 6:1–2). Grace does not prompt godlessness by godliness.

For one thing, as we have seen, true grace gives us the motivation to live righteous lives. Paul says:

The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men. It teaches us to say “No” to ungodliness and worldly passions, and to live self-controlled, upright and godly lives in this present age. (Titus 2:11–12)

Further, believers who fail to avail themselves of God’s grace receive His discipline as His children. Hebrews tells us: “The Lord disciplines those he loves, and he punishes everyone he accepts as a son” (12:6). God spans His wayward children: “What son is not disciplined by his father? If you are not disciplined (and everyone undergoes discipline), then you are illegitimate children and not true sons” (vv. 7–8).

“The Lord knows those who are his,” and, “everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness” (2 Tim. 2:19). In short, when a believer falls into sin he is disciplined, and if he persists, God may even take his physical life so as to save His Name from further dishonor. Paul told the Corinthians that their abuse of the Lord's Table had resulted in the deaths of some among them (1 Cor. 11:30; cf. 15:20). This may be what John was referring to in saying, "There is a sin that leads to death." I am not saying that [the interceding brother] should pray [on behalf of his fallen brother for this sin] (1 John 5:16). Perhaps the one who'd sinned had gone so far that God would no longer entertain prayer to save his life. This also may be what James was warning about when he said, "Remember this: Whoever turns a sinner from the error of his way will save him from death and cover over a multitude of sins" (James 5:20).

Pointing out one Corinthian Christian's horrific sin, Paul instructed the congregation to "hand this man over to Satan, so that the sinful nature may be destroyed and his spirit saved on the day of the Lord" (1 Cor. 5:5). Two things are evident here: First, in spite of his great sin, he would be ultimately saved (cf. Heb. 12). Second, he was to receive severe discipline for his sin (cf. 1 Cor. 11:30–32). Paul was also writing to believers when he said, "Do not be deceived: God cannot be mocked. A man reaps what he sows" (Gal. 6:7; cf. v. 8).

In brief, no believer gets away with sin: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due to him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10). At this judgment seat,

[Our] work will be shown for what it is, because the Day will bring it to light. It will be revealed with fire, and the fire will test the quality of each man's work. If what he has built survives, he will receive his reward. If it is burned up, he will suffer loss; he himself will be saved, but only as one escaping through the flames. (1 Cor. 3:13–15)

Note (from v. 15) that all who have been truly saved will always be saved. God does not renege on His promises (Rom. 11:29), nor does He begin a project He does not complete (Phil. 1:6). There isn't anyone declared righteous by God who has cause to doubt eternity: "Those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:30).

Can True Believers Ever Lose their Faith Completely?

One question not yet specifically addressed, one that divides even proponents of sola gratia, is whether continual faith in Christ throughout one's life is a necessary indication that one is truly saved. Or, put negatively: Can one be a true believer (i.e., be saved) and "lose" his faith?

Continued Faith Is Not a Condition for Keeping One's Salvation

In distinction from Arminians and Roman Catholics, Calvinists of different varieties answer no: There are no conditions of any kind on our eternal security. Salvation is an unconditional gift (Rom. 11:29), and while continued faith and its fruit in good works is a manifestation of true faith, it is not a condition of it.

Zane Hodges (b. 1932), Charles Stanley (b. 1933), and other freegrace proponents agree that continued faith is not a necessary sign of the elect. Stanley affirms that "God does not require a constant attitude of faith in order to be saved—only an act of faith" (ES, 80). With this we concur, but that is not the issue at hand—the question is "Must a believer exercise continual belief in Christ throughout his whole life in order to be shown to be one of the elect?" Hodges and Stanley again say no: "Hodges argues that "Satan can completely shipwreck a believer's faith but that this in no way affects the believer's security" (ibid., 91, emphasis added). Stanley asserts, “The Bible clearly teaches that God’s love for His people is of such magnitude that even those who walk away from the faith have not the slightest chance of slipping from His hand” (ibid., 74, emphasis added).

True faith may become dormant for a time, as has been presented above. In addition, the true believer’s eternity is unquestionably secure. However, it is highly doubtful that, as Stanley suggests, a true believer can ever totally lose his faith.

First, as already shown, continued works are the natural result of saving faith.

Second, true faith is the kind that produces (manifests itself in) good works. James (see 2:14–22) states this overtly: Faith without works is dead.

Third, as Jesus said in the parable of the soils, saving faith is not in those “who believe for a while” but in those who “bear fruit” (Luke 8:13, 15 NKJV). As Ryrie says, faith is not a work, but true faith continues to work.

Fourth, true faith will persevere to the end because it is “through faith [we] are shielded by God’s power until the coming of the salvation that is ready to be revealed in the last time” (1 Peter 1:5; cf. Phil. 1:6).

Fifth, the Bible records that true believers who did falter didn’t lose eternal hope (cf. Matt. 11:11; John 21:15–19). Once again, Peter denied to several people that he knew Christ, but he never stopped believing in Him (Luke 22:32). John the Baptist had questions about whether Jesus was the Messiah (Matt. 11:1–4), but he didn’t reject Him and turn away; rather, he sent messengers to ask his question and have his wavering faith confirmed.

Sixth, the Bible declares, “No one who is born of God will continually sin because God’s seed abides in him; he cannot go on sinning because he has been born of God” (1 John 3:9). To avoid continual sin one must be in continual faith, for faith is the victory that overcomes the world (1 John 5:4).

Seventh, and finally, those who “depart from the faith” entirely were never truly within it: “[The false teachers] went out from us, but they did not really belong to us. For if they had belonged to us, they would have remained with us” (1 John 2:19).

Charles Ryrie clarifies,

To be sure, justification is proved by personal purity, [for] once justified, we show this by changes in our lives. “He who has died is freed [literally, ‘justified’] from sin” (Rom. 6:7)....

Justification before the bar of God is demonstrated by changes in our lives here on earth before the bar of men. (SGS, 132)

True Believers Are Not Always Faithful

Continuing in faith and continuing in faithfulness are not the same: One can continue to believe in Christ, and manifest a modicum of good works springing from that faith, without being a faithful and fruitful Christian. True believers are not always faithful, but when they are unfaithful to the Lord they do not lose their salvation: “If we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself” (2 Tim. 2:13).

The true believers of the biblical era were unfaithful at times. They were untrue to one or more of God’s commandments, but none of them was without faith in the God of the commandments. No matter how dormant or suppressed anyone’s faith may have become, there are no undisputed scriptural examples of anyone known to be saved who completely gave up his faith in God. People who permanently turn from the faith are professing, not possessing,

Christians; that is, they were never saved. They fall into the category of those about whom Jesus said, “I never knew you” (Matt. 7:23).

Good Works That Are Evidence of Personal Salvation

While the doing of good works is an evidence of (not a condition for) salvation in general, nonetheless, certain specific kinds of works are scripturally singled out. These are sometimes taken as tokens of one’s assurance of having eternal life; the apostle John enumerates several in his first epistle with the introductory phrase, “By this you know” (cf. 2:3; 3:14, 19, 24; 4:2, 13; 5:2, 13, 18–20). Biblically, these include love for the brethren, keeping God’s commandments, and the “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22–23), which is “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control.”

A more extensive discussion on this point is reserved for chapter 11. Two brief observations will suffice here.

First, whatever role these kinds of works may play in providing assurance, they are all the fruit and not the root of salvation.

Second, these are at best the subjective grounds for knowing we are saved; the objective basis is the saving work of Jesus Christ on our behalf.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAITH AND WORKS

There are many theological arguments beneath the evangelical view that the carrying out of good works is the evidence of, but not a condition for, saving faith. First, we will look at three theological reasons for works not being a condition for salvation, then we will present two theological reasons for works being a natural result (evidence, manifestation) of true faith.

The Nature of God’s Grace

The God of Scripture is the totally self-sufficient, uncaused Cause of all things. He is the Source and Sustainer—He created all, and He sustains all. We have nothing we did not receive from Him, and we cannot give to Him what He has not already given to us: God “is not served by human hands, as if he needed anything, because he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else” (Acts 17:25). “From him and through him and to him are all things” (Rom. 11:36). “Everything comes from you, and we have given you only what comes from your hand” (1 Chron. 29:14).

Eternal life, then, cannot be of our works: “Salvation is of the Lord” (Jonah 2:9 NKJV). Even though it must be received by faith (Eph. 2:8; Acts 16:31; Rom. 3:25), nonetheless, salvation does not originate with our will (cf. John 1:13; Rom. 9:16) but with Him who is the Source of all that has been created. Without grace initiating and executing the plan of salvation, no one would ever be saved: Our eternal life finds its origin only in grace (sola gratia).

The Nature of Human Depravity

Total depravity means (among other things) that fallen humanity—the whole human race—is totally incapable of achieving salvation. If humans are to be justified before God, He must both initiate and accomplish it.

The Nature of Faith

Faith is the only condition (sola fidei) for receiving God’s gracious gift of salvation (Rom. 4:5; cf. Eph. 2:8–9; Titus 3:3–7). Saving faith involves dependence only on God for our salvation, acknowledging that He and He alone is the Source and Sufficiency of eternal life.

The Nature of the Results of Faith

Saving faith involves trust and commitment, so naturally doing good works flows from it. As we have seen, an act of trust or commitment, by its very nature, is one that tends to result in a change of action (behavior, work). Persons we trust are persons toward whom we act appropriately (because we trust them, we respond in ways that signify trust) and for whom we act beneficially (because we trust them, we act in ways that convey and proliferate goodness). Persons we are committed to are persons toward whom we act positively and for whom we respond lovingly and sacrificially.

The Nature of Salvation

Salvation, once again, is an act of God’s grace, and grace, by its very nature, tends to soften the heart and change the actions of the one receiving it. This softening change causes us to be more favorably disposed—grateful and responsive—to the Gracious One. “The goodness of God leads you to repentance” (Rom. 2:4 NKJV), and “the love of Christ controls us” (2 Cor. 5:14 NASB); our Lord said that those who are forgiven much will love much, “but to whom little is forgiven, the same loves little” (Luke 7:47 NKJV). It follows, then, that the intrinsic nature of salvation as a gracious and loving act of God tends naturally to produce good works in the lives of those who receive it (cf. Titus 1:11–13).

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAITH AND WORKS—WORKS ARE NOT A CONDITION OF SALVATION

There is a firm and continuous tradition from the beginning of Christian teaching that while true faith should (and naturally does) result in good works, the performance of works is not a condition of salvation. All who are ever saved are saved apart from their good works and in spite of their bad works.

Early Fathers

According to the patristic Fathers, salvation cannot be earned. Nothing we can do merits God's gracious gift of salvation.

Clement of Rome (c. A.D. first century)

We, therefore, who have been called by His will in Christ Jesus, are not justified by ourselves, neither by our wisdom or understanding or piety, nor by the works we have wrought in holiness of heart. (LC in FEF, 1.9.16 as cited in Oden, ACCSNT)

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

Vain, too, are Marcion and his followers when they seek to exclude Abraham from the inheritance, to which the Spirit through many men, and now by Paul, bears witness, that “he believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness” (AH 4.8.1 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF, 1:470).

Origen (c. 185–c. 254)

We hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of the law. If an example is required I think it must suffice to mention the thief on the cross, who asked Christ to save him and was told: “Truly I say to you, this day you shall be with Me in Paradise” (Luke 23:43 NASB)... A man is justified by faith. The works of the law can make no contribution to this. (CER, on Rom. 3:28, 2.132–34 in Oden, ACCSNT, 6:104)

God is just, and therefore he could not justify the unjust. Therefore he required the intervention of a propitiator, so that by having faith in him those who could not be justified by their own works might be justified. (2.112 in ibid., 6:102–03).

Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 315–c. 387)

“Just as a writing-pen or a dart has need of one to employ it, so also does grace have need of believing hearts.... It is God’s part to confer grace, but yours to accept and guard it” (CL, 1.3–1.4 in FEF, 1:348.808; ibid.).

John Chrysostom (347–407)

The man who boasts in his works is boasting about himself, but the man who finds his honor in having faith in God has a much better reason for boasting, because he is boasting about God, not about himself. (HR in Schaff, NPNF, 1.11:385–86; ibid., 6:110)

In order to stop anyone from asking: “How can we be saved without contributing anything at all to our salvation?” Paul shows that in fact we do contribute a great deal toward it—we supply our faith! (ibid., on Rom. 7 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.11:377; ibid., 6:100)

So that you may not be elated by the magnitude of these benefits, see how Paul put you in your place. For “by grace you are saved,” he says, “through faith,” then, so as to not do injury to free will, he allots a role to us, then takes it away again, saying, “and this not of ourselves” (HE, on Eph. 2:8 [IOEP 2:160] in ibid., 8:13).

“This is God’s righteousness, that we are not justified by works (for then they would have to be perfect, which is impossible), but by grace, in which case all our sin is removed” (HEPC, 11:5 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.12:334; ibid., 7:252). “The righteousness is not ours but belongs to God, and in saying this, Paul hints to us that it is abundantly available and easy to obtain. For we do not get it by toil and labor but by believing” (HR, 2.17 in Schaff, NPNF, 1.11:349; ibid., 6:32).

Theodoret of Cyrrihus (c. 393–c. 466)

All we bring to grace is our faith.... For [Paul] adds, “and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast” (Eph. 2:8–9). It is not of our own accord that we have believed, but we have come to belief after having been called. (CEP as cited in FEF, 3:248–49.2163)

“The Lord Christ is both God and the mercy seat, both the priest and the lamb, and he performed the work of our salvation by his blood, demanding only faith from us” (ILR, 82 in Oden, ACCSNT, 6:102).

Caius Marius Victorinus (c. fourth century)

“The fact that you Ephesians are saved is not something that comes from yourselves. It is the gift of God. It is not from your works, but it is God’s grace and God’s gift, not from anything you have deserved” (EE, 1.2.9.152 in ibid., 8:134). “He did not make us deserving, since we did not receive things by our own merit but by the grace and goodness of God” (1.2.7.152 in ibid., 8:132).

Ambrose (339–397)

“For what does the Scripture say? ‘Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness.’ ” Abraham believed God. Let us also believe, so that we who are the heirs of his race may likewise be heirs of his faith. (ODHBS, 2.89 in FC, 22:236; ibid., 6:111)

Ambrosiaster (c. fourth century)

[God] justifies him who has faith in Jesus.... God gave what he promised in order to be revealed as righteous. For he had promised that he would justify those who believe in Christ, as he says in Habakkuk: “The righteous will live by faith in me.” Whoever has faith in God and Christ is righteous. (CPE in CCL, 81; ibid., 6:103)

Again, “They are justified freely, because they have not done anything nor given anything in return, but by faith alone they have been made holy by the gift of God” (CCL, 74 in ibid., 6:104).

Medieval Fathers

The medieval Fathers were no less definite about the impossibility of works being the basis of salvation. In this way they carried on the salvific tradition from the apostles and the patristics.

Jerome (c. 340–420)

“We are saved by grace rather than works, for we can give God nothing in return for what he has bestowed on us” (EE [PL] 26:468B [574] in ibid., 8:132). “[Paul] says this in case the secret thought should steal upon us that ‘if we are not saved by our own works, at least we are saved by our own faith, and so in another way our salvation is of ourselves’ ” (26:470A–B in ibid., 8:133). “Paul shows clearly that righteousness depends not on the merit of man, but on the grace of God, who accepts the faith of those who believe, without the works of the Law” (AP, 2.7 in FC, 53:306; ibid., 6:106).

Some say that if Paul is right in asserting that no one is justified by the works of the law but from faith in Christ, the patriarchs and prophets and saints who lived before Christ were imperfect. We should tell such people that those who are said not to have obtained righteousness are those who believe that they can be justified by works alone. The saints who lived long ago, however, were justified from faith in Christ, seeing (John 8:56) that Abraham saw in advance Christ's day. (EG [PL] 26:343C–D [412] in ibid., 8:30)

Augustine (c. 354–430)

Grace is given, not because we have done good works, but in order that we may have power to do them, not because we have fulfilled the Law, but in order that we may be able to fulfill it. (OSL in LCC; ibid., 8:206)

“Paul’s intention is perfectly clear—to accost the pride of man, that no one should take glory in human works, and that no one should glory in himself” (PS, 5.9 in FC, 86:228; ibid., 7:18). “It is not that the will or the deed is not ours, but without his aid we neither will nor do anything good” (OGC, 26 in PL, 44:373; ibid., 8:258). “It is certain that when we do a deed, the deed is ours; but he is the one who makes us do the deed by giving us strength fully sufficient to carry out our will” (OGFW, 32 in PL, 44:900–01; ibid., 8:258).

[It is not God’s will that] anyone should be forced against his will to do evil or good but that he should go to the bad, according to his own deserts, when God abandons him. For a person is not good if he does not will it, but the grace of God assists him even in willing. It is not without cause that it is written, “God is the one who works in you to will and to do, of his own good will” (TLP, 1.36 in PL, 44:567; ibid., 8:258).

Cyril of Alexandria (375–444)

“We do not say that Christ became a sinner, far from it, but being righteous (or rather righteousness, because he did not know sin at all), the Father made him a victim for the sins of the world” (L, 41:10 in FC, 76:174; ibid., 7:252).

Then what becomes of our boasting? It is excluded. On what principle? On the principle of works? No, but on the principle of faith.... For who will glory, or for what, when everyone has become worthless and gone out of the right way, and nobody does good works any more? Therefore he says that all glorying is excluded. (CR, 74 in ibid., 6:104)

Prosper of Aquitaine (c. 390–c. 463)

Just as there are no crimes so detestable that they can prevent the gift of grace, so too there can be no works so eminent that they are owed ... that which is given freely. Would it not be a debasement of redemption in Christ’s blood, and would not God’s mercy be made secondary to human works, if justification, which is through grace, were owed in view of preceding merits, so that it were not the gift of a Donor, but the wages of a laborer? (CAN, 1.17 in FEF, 3:195.2044)

Fulgentius (c. 467–533)

The blessed Paul argues that we are saved by faith, which he declares to be not from us but a gift from God. Thus there cannot possibly be true salvation where there is no true faith, and, since this faith is divinely enabled, it is without doubt bestowed by his free generosity. Where there is true belief through true faith, true salvation certainly accompanies it. (OI in CCL, 91:313 as cited in Oden, ACCSNT, 8:133–34)

“Law without grace, then, can expose disease, but cannot heal. It can reveal the wounds but does not administer the remedy. But so that the law’s precepts may be fulfilled, grace provides assistance within” (OTP, 1.41 in CCL, 91A:485, 980–83; ibid., 8:49).

Caesarius of Arles (c. 470–543)

“What does it mean to receive the grace of God in vain except to be unwilling to perform good works with the help of his grace?” (S, 126.5 in FC, 47:219; ibid., 7:254).

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274)

When [Paul] next says “and that not of yourselves,” he clarifies what he had spoken of: First, regarding faith, which is the foundation of the whole spiritual edifice. Secondly, regarding grace ([Eph.] 2:10)... Since he had said we are saved by faith, anyone can hold the opinion that faith itself originates within ourselves and that to believe is determined by our own wishes. Therefore to abolish this he states “and that not of yourselves.”

The second error he rejects is that anyone can believe that faith is given by God to us on the merit of our preceding actions. To exclude this he adds “Not of preceding works that we merited at one time to be saved; for this is the grace,” as was mentioned above, and according to Romans 11:6, “If by grace, it is not now by works; otherwise grace is no more grace.” He follows with the reason why God saves man by faith without any preceding merits, that no man may glory. (CE, 95–96)

Reformation Leaders

Martin Luther (1483–1546)

“To want to merit Grace by works which precede faith is to want to appease God by sins; which is nothing but adding sins to sins, laughing at God, and provoking His Wrath” (WLS, 604).

John Calvin (1509–1564)

“The reader now perceives with what fairness the Sophists of the present day cavil at our doctrine, when we say that a man is justified by faith alone” [Rom. 4:2] (ICR, 3.11.19).

“Faith is imputed for righteousness,” and therefore righteousness is not the reward of works, but is given without being due. Because “we are justified by faith,” boasting is excluded. “Had there been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe” (Gal. 3:21–22). Let them maintain, if they dare, that these things apply to ceremonies, and not to morals, and the very children will laugh at their effrontery. The true conclusion, therefore, is that the whole Law is spoken of when the power of justifying is denied to it. (ibid.)

Since a great part of mankind imagine a righteousness compounded of faith and works, let us here show that there is so wide a difference between justification by faith and by works that the establishment of the one necessarily overthrows the other. The Apostle says, “Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord” (ibid., 3.33.13).

The conclusion, therefore, is that [Abraham] was not justified by works. [Paul] then employs another argument from contraries, viz., when reward is paid to works, it is done of debt, not of grace; but the righteousness of faith is of grace: therefore it is not of the merit of works. Away, then, with the dream of those who invent a righteousness compounded of faith and works. (ACT)

Therefore, “no man is justified by works unless he has reached the summit of perfection, and cannot be convicted of even the smallest transgression” (ICR, 1.3.15.1).

Thus when the publican is said to have gone down to his house “justified” (Luke 18:14), it cannot be held that he obtained this justification by any merit of works. All that is said is that after obtaining the pardon of sins he was regarded in the sight of God as righteous. He was justified, therefore, not by any approval of works, but by gratuitous acquittal on the part of God. Hence Ambrose elegantly terms confession of sins “legal justification” (Ambrose on Psalm 118, Sermon 10; ibid., 3.11.1).

The Gospel differs from the Law in this, that it does not confine justification to works, but places it entirely in the mercy of God. In like manner, Paul contends, in the Epistle to the Romans, that Abraham had no ground of glorying, because faith was imputed to him for righteousness (Rom. 4:2); and he adds, in confirmation, that the proper place for justification by faith is where there are no works to which reward is due. “To him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt” (ibid., 3.11.18).

Post-Reformation Teachers

John Wesley (1703–1791)

“By grace are ye saved”: Ye are saved from your sins, from the guilt and power thereof, ye are restored to the favour and image of God, not for any works, merits, or deservings of yours, but by the free grace, the mere mercy of God, through the merits of his well-beloved Son: Ye are thus saved, not by any power, wisdom, or strength, which is in you, or in any other creature; but merely through the grace or power of the Holy Ghost, which worketh all in all. (MG, sermon 16)

Charles Spurgeon (1834–1892)

What is the heresy of Rome, but the addition of something to the perfect merits of Jesus Christ, the bringing in of the works of the flesh, to assist in our justification? And what is the heresy of Arminianism but the addition of something to the work of the Redeemer? Every heresy, if brought to the touch-stone, will discover itself here. (“DC” in CHSA, 5a)

Earl Radmacher (b. 1933)

Everyone prefers the feeling of being able to do something to be saved. And once the door is open to his kind of thinking, the whole emphasis shifts from salvation as a gift from God.

That kind of thinking accounts for the fact that none of the major religions of the world, with the exception of Christianity, offers salvation as a gift apart from any human effort at all. (S, 115)

Millard Erickson (b. 1932)

Even faith is not some good work which God must reward with salvation. It is God’s gift. It is not the cause of our salvation, but the means by which we receive it. And, contrary to the thinking of some, it has always been the means of salvation. (CT, 959)

“Another difficulty is that when humans do accept the principle that they do not have to work to receive salvation, there frequently is a tendency to overreact, all the way to antinomianism” [Rom. 6:1–2; Gal. 5:13–15] (ibid.).

Despite the fairly common opinion that there is tension between Paul and James, both make essentially the same point: that the genuineness of the faith that leads to justification becomes apparent in the results which issue from it. If there are no good works, there has been no real faith nor justification. We find support for this contention in the fact that justification is intimately linked with union with Christ. If we have become one with Christ, then we will not live according to the flesh, but rather by the Spirit. [Rom. 8:1–17] (ibid., 960)

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FAITH AND WORKS—WORKS ARE A *MANIFESTATION OF SALVATION

The fathers of the church were unanimous in supporting the view that saving faith ought to and naturally does manifest itself in good works. As this has already been documented at length, a few citations will demonstrate the point.

John Chrysostom

God’s mission was not to save people in order that they may remain barren or inert. For Scripture says that faith has saved us. Put better: since God willed it, faith has saved us. Now in what case, tell me, does faith save without itself doing anything at all? Faith’s workings themselves are a gift of God, lest anyone should boast. What then is Paul saying? Not that God has forbidden works, but forbidden us to be justified by works. No one, Paul says, is justified by works, precisely in order that the grace and benevolence of God may become apparent! (HE, 4.2.9 (IOEP) 2:140 as cited in Oden, ACCSNT, 8:134).

Anselm (1033–1109)

Hence, with however great confidence so important a truth is believed, the faith will be useless and, as it were, dead, unless it is strong and living through love. For that faith which is accompanied by sufficient love is by no means idle, if an opportunity of operation offers [itself], but rather exercises itself in an abundance of works. (M, LXXVII)

It is not absurd to say that operative faith is alive, because it has the life of love without which it could not operate; and that idle faith is not living, because it lacks that life of love, with which it would not be idle, (ibid.)

“It may, therefore, be said with sufficient fitness that living faith believes in that in which we ought to believe; while dead faith merely believes that which ought to be believed” (ibid.).

John Calvin

The faith by which alone, through the mercy of God, we obtain free justification, is not destitute of good works; and also to show the true nature of these good works on which this question partly turns ... the concept of justification. (ICR, 1.3.11.1)

In the same manner, a man will be said to be justified by works, if in his life there can be found a purity and holiness which merits an attestation of righteousness at the throne of God, or if by the perfection of his works he can answer and satisfy the divine justice. On the contrary, a man will be justified by faith when, excluded from the righteousness of works, he by faith lays hold of the righteousness of Christ, and clothed in it appears in the sight of God not as a sinner, but as righteous, (ibid., 1.3.11.2)

Charles Hodge (1797–1878)

On this subject there has never been any real difference of opinion among Protestants, although there was in the early Lutheran Church some misunderstanding.

First, it was universally admitted that good works are not necessary to our justification; that they are consequences and indirectly the fruits of justification, and, therefore, cannot be its ground.

Secondly, it was also agreed that faith, by which the sinner is justified, is not as a work, the reason why God pronounces the sinner just. It is the act by which the sinner receives and rests upon the righteousness of Christ, the imputation of which renders him righteous in the sight of God.

Thirdly, faith does not justify because it includes or is the root or principle of good works; not as, fides obsequiosa.

Fourthly, it was agreed that it is only a living faith, i.e., a faith which works by love and purifies the heart, that unites the soul to Christ and secures our reconciliation with God.

Fifthly, it was universally admitted that an immoral life is inconsistent with a state of grace; that those who willfully continue in the practice of sin shall not inherit the kingdom of God....

The “Form of Concord,” in which this and other controversies in the Lutheran Church were finally adjusted, took the true ground on this subject, midway between the two extreme views. It rejects the unqualified proposition that good works are necessary to salvation, as men may be saved who have no opportunity to testify to their faith by their works. On the other hand, it utterly condemns the unwarrantable declaration that good works are hurtful to salvation; which it pronounces to be pernicious and full of scandal. (ST, 3.18.5)

Earl Radmacher

Many Christians either overemphasize works by saying they are essential for a person to be saved from sin’s penalty, or they de-emphasize works, failing to see that works give evidence of faith and of ongoing salvation from sin’s power. (S, 172–73)

Millard Erickson

“Good deeds done to others are represented as what follows from salvation, not as what we must do to receive it” (CT, 1013). “Genuine faith will necessarily issue in works. Faith and works are inseparable” (ibid., 1014).

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

Roman Catholicism argues that, in addition to faith, one must work for salvation, but the Bible is clear that this is false: We cannot work for our salvation but only from it. We are not saved by works but for works. In other words, it is impossible to work for grace; we can work only from grace (Rom. 11:6).

As for orthodox Protestants, there is general agreement that salvation is by faith alone, apart from any works. There is also wide consensus that while we are saved by faith alone, the faith that saves us is not alone—it is accompanied by good works.

Even though there is considerable intramural disagreement on whether works flow automatically, inevitably, or merely naturally from saving faith, an examination of the biblical evidence favors the view that works flow naturally from saving faith. Faith can sometimes be dormant, like life in a cut-down bush; but if the bush is still alive, it will naturally bud out somewhere—given the right soil and sustenance.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

THE ASSURANCE OF SALVATION

In this chapter the assurance of salvation is both objectively and subjectively discussed. The first question is, can a truly regenerate person ever lose salvation? The second question is, if such a person cannot, then can he or she have assurance of salvation in this life?

TERMS FOR ASSURANCE OF SALVATION

The primary terms that relate to the certainty of salvation are assurance and security. However, there are other words or phrases often used, such as the perseverance of the saints; eternal security; once saved, always saved; and the assurance of the believers.

Perseverance

The traditional phrase perseverance of the saints represents the P in Calvinism's acrostic T-U-L-I-P. Perseverance of the saints illustrates the strong Calvinist belief that those who are truly among the elect will persevere in faith unto the end.

Eternal Security

Another term for the certainty of salvation is eternal security. This label is often used by moderate Calvinists to show that a true believer has more than present assurance of salvation. Christians can have current confidence that they will never lose their salvation—they are eternally secure.

Once Saved, Always Saved

More popularly, many believers speak of once saved, always saved. This phrase has the advantage of clarity, even though it is somewhat cumbersome.

The Assurance of the Believer

Another contemporary phrase in some circles is the assurance of the believer. However, this can be misleading—while Calvinists and Arminians agree that present assurance of salvation is possible, the latter insist that both assurance of eternal life and eternal life itself can be lost.

More precisely, the assurance of salvation is the subjective side of the issue, and eternal security is the objective side. Assurance deals with a feeling or sense or experience that one is saved, while security relates to the ultimate fact (truth, reality) about the matter.

Since most on both sides (Calvinist and Arminian) of the internal debate about eternal security hold that present assurance of salvation is possible for Christians, the focus here will be on the differences between the two, particularly whether one can actually lose salvation.

DIFFERENT VIEWS OF THE ASSURANCE OF SALVATION

Among evangelicals, there are at least four views on the topic of eternal security. We will briefly describe each before examining the related biblical data. There are some substantial intramural discrepancies; the two basic views, of course, are Calvinist and Arminian—the former affirms eternal security and the latter denies it.

In the words of the Westminster Confession of Faith, perseverance means:

They whom God hath accepted in his Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace; but shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved. (17.1)

In other words, all who are truly regenerate will enjoy eternity with God—“once saved, always saved.”

Strong Calvinism on the Assurance of Salvation

Strong Calvinists believe in the security of the elect. Nevertheless, they cannot, at present, be absolutely sure that they are among the elect. Each person, it is argued, can only prove his or her election by persevering to the end.

Moderate Calvinism on the Assurance of Salvation

Moderate Calvinists hold that they are eternally secure and can be presently sure of it. Hence, they claim to have both eternal security and present assurance.

Classical Arminianism on the Assurance of Salvation

Those who believe salvation can be lost are called Arminians. They are divided into two basic camps: Classical Arminians, who follow Jacob Arminius (1560–1609), and Wesleyan Arminians, who follow John Wesley (1703–1791). Classical Arminians maintain that a saved person can lose salvation but only by the sin of apostasy—a complete denial of Christ. Once someone has apostasized, he can never be saved again.

Wesleyan Arminianism on the Assurance of Salvation

Wesleyan Arminians argue that salvation can be lost through any serious intentional sin. John Wesley addressed the issue in several places: “I cannot believe . . . that there is a state attainable in this life from which a man cannot finally fall” (J [Aug. 1743] in WJW, 1.427); “I find no general promise in holy writ ‘that none who once believes shall finally fall’ ” (“PCC” in ibid., 9.242); “On this authority [Ezek. 18:24], I believe a saint may fall away; that one who is holy or righteous in the judgment of God himself may nevertheless so fall from God as to perish everlastingly” (“STPS” in ibid., 9.28). However, unlike classical Arminians, Wesleyans hold that one can regain salvation by repentance of that sin.

A Final Contrast

Ironically, Arminians and strong Calvinists have much in common on this issue. Both assert that professing believers living in gross, unrepentant sin are not truly saved. Both insist that a person cannot be living in serious sin at the end of his life if he is truly saved. And both maintain that no one living in grave sin can be sure of his salvation.

In regard to security and assurance, three primary views may be contrasted as follows:

Strong Calvinism	Arminianism	Moderate Calvinism
Security, but no Assurance	Assurance, but no Security	Security and assurance

Some strong Calvinists insist that they believe assurance is possible before death. However, this claim is seriously undermined by several factors within their own view.

First, they acknowledge that there can be “false grace” and “false assurance,” whereby one believes he is one of the elect when in fact he is not (Brooks, HE, 49).

Second, the very name of the doctrine of perseverance suggests that some who claim to be believers will not persevere to the end and, consequently, will not be saved.

Third, some of them admit to the possibility of apparent believers falling away before they die and thus being lost forever. They hold that all true believers will endure in their faithfulness to the end; those who do not endure in holiness were not true believers. This being the case, there is eternal security for the elect, but the catch is this: No one can really be sure he is one of the elect unless he remains faithful to the end.

This is different from what we present as the moderate Calvinist view (that all believers can be sure they are saved and will continue in their faith to the end). Scripture says that the presence of “faith” is “evidence” that one is truly saved (Heb. 11:1); faith is implanted in the heart by the Holy Spirit upon believing the Word of God (Rom. 10:9, 17). Strong Calvinists, though, argue that in addition to continuing to have faith, believers must continue to the end in faithfulness to God as evidence (proof) of salvation. Again, even though strong Calvinists say they believe assurance of salvation is possible, Puritan Thomas Brooks (1608–1680), for instance, maintained that true perseverance involves perseverance

- (1) in a holy profession of our faith;
- (2) in holy and spiritual principles; by abiding and continuing in the doctrine of Christ; and
- (3) by continuance in gracious actions. (HE, 272–74)

Fourth, and finally, these very elements offered by strong Calvinists as signs of true and enduring assurance make it impossible for one to know with certainty, before he dies, that he is saved. The truth of the matter is that it is practically impossible for anyone to be certain he has persevered faithfully in all of these to the point of death. To put it another way, anyone who is not doing all of this up to the time he dies cannot be sure he is one of the elect.

Assurance vs. Security

Another contrast is that while moderate Calvinists believe in both temporal assurance on earth and eternal security in heaven for the elect, some strong Calvinists hold only to the latter, since one cannot be really sure that he is one of the elect until he perseveres to the end. As Brooks noted,

Being in a state of grace will yield a man a heaven hereafter, but seeing himself in this state will yield him both a heaven here and a heaven hereafter.... [For] it is one thing for me to have faith, and another thing for me to know that I have faith. Now assurance flows from a clear, certain, evident knowledge that I have grace, and that I do believe, (ibid., 14)

Again, there is such a thing as “false assurance,” and “we may think that we have faith when in fact we have no faith” (Sproul, CG, 165–66).

A. A. Hodge (1823–1886) said,

Perseverance in holiness, therefore, in opposition to all weakness and temptations, is the only sure evidence of the genuineness of past experience, of the validity of our confidence as to our future salvation.... [There can be a] temporary withdrawal of restraining grace [while an elect person is] allowed to backslide for a time, [nonetheless,] in every such case they are graciously restored. (OT, 544–45, emphasis added)

This seems to imply that if someone backslides and does not return to faithfulness before he meets his Maker, it is proof that he was not truly saved. If so, then regardless of the evidence one may have manifested in his life for any number of years before this, he cannot have had true assurance that he was saved. In brief, for strong Calvinists on the knowledge of salvation, the proof of the pudding is in the persevering.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR ETERNAL SECURITY

Not only are there significant differences on the subject of eternal security between strong and moderate Calvinists, there are even more prominent disagreements between moderate Calvinists and Arminians. For instance, as we have seen, Arminianism affirms that a person can lose salvation. Arminian theologian H. Orton Wiley (1877–1961) taught that a believer could become “reprobate” and, “dying in such a state, may finally perish” (CT, 344, 351).

Arminian theologian Richard Watson (1781–1833) believed he had “established” and “proved from Scripture”:

True believers may turn back unto perdition, [and be] cast away, [and fall into a state in which it were better for them] never to have known the way of righteousness, [and thus] the number of the elect may be diminished. (CI, 340, emphasis added)

On the contrary, there are many arguments in favor of eternal security, along with present assurance, for all believers.

Biblical Arguments in Favor of Eternal Security

Moderate Calvinists insist that Christians can have true assurance of eternal salvation. Indeed, the Bible exhorts us to obtain it. Paul urged the Corinthians: “Examine yourselves to see whether you are in the faith; test yourselves. Do you not realize that Christ Jesus is in you—unless, of course, you fail the test?” (2 Cor. 13:5). Peter teaches, “Be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure. For if you do these things, you will never fall” (2 Peter 1:10). Jude adds, “Keep yourselves in God’s love as you wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ to bring you to eternal life” (Jude 21).

Just what is it that provides the basis of our assurance that we have saving faith? “Everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that through endurance and the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope” (Rom. 15:4). John declared, “I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God so that you may know that you have eternal life” (1 John 5:13).

The Bible is replete with affirmations that salvation can never be lost and that we can be sure of this while we are still living. Among them the following stand out.

Job 19:25–26

“I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth. And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God.”

Job was certain of two things: (1) that his Redeemer lived, and (2) that he would one day see God in his flesh (affirming resurrection). In other words, Job had present knowledge that he had been redeemed (“my Redeemer”) and that he would see Him in his heavenly resurrected body: I “know” (now) that I “will see God” (later, in heaven). Such knowledge implies his assurance of eternal security.

Ecclesiastes 3:14

Under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the wisest man who ever lived said, “I know that everything God does will endure forever; nothing can be added to it and nothing taken from it.” Scripture’s application of this principle to salvation (cf. Eph. 1:4) results in the doctrine of eternal security. If what God does is forever, and if salvation is a work of God (Jonah 2:10), then salvation is forever. If salvation can be lost, then it is not forever. Therefore, salvation cannot be lost.

John 3:18

“Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God’s one and only Son.”

The plain sense of this text is that if one believes now, he is not condemned (lost) now and will not be condemned later (cf. Rom. 8:1). John adds that such a man “will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life” (John 5:24, see below); likewise, if a man does not believe now, then he is “already” condemned (lost). In short, a present act of faith assures one of never being condemned. Just as one is condemned “already” for not believing in Christ, even so one is saved “already” for believing in Him.

John 5:24

“I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life.” That is, those who truly believe now can be certain now that they will be in heaven later. Everlasting life is a present possession the moment one believes, and this assures he will never be condemned.

John 6:37

“All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away.” Not only is everyone who comes saved, but everyone who is saved is saved permanently! God’s gift is a forever salvation.

John 6:39–40

This is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day. For my Father’s will is that everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.

Jesus says everyone who now “believes” in Him will be resurrected to life—saved. Further, He emphatically declares that He will never lose anyone given to Him by the Father. Thus, those who believe are as eternally secure as the promise of Christ. Believe now; be saved forever.

John 10:27–28

My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father’s hand.

What makes our salvation sure is not only God’s infinite love but also His everlasting omnipotence. We are not only saved by His unlimited love, but we are also kept by His unlimited power (1 Peter 1:5; cf. Jude 24). No one, not even ourselves, can pry us away from His promise.

Further, Jesus said His sheep (the saved) would never perish. Plainly, then, if any believer does lose his salvation, Jesus was wrong. If Jesus is the Son of God, this is impossible. Accordingly, our salvation is as eternally secure as the Word (Gk: logos)—Jesus Himself (John 1:1), who said, “Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away” (Matt. 24:35).

I pray for them. I am not praying for the world, but for those you have given me, for they are yours.... Holy Father, protect them by the power of your name—the name you gave me—so that they may be one as we are one.... I pray also for those who will believe in me.... Father, I want those you have given me to be with me where I am, and to see my glory, the glory you have given me because you loved me before the creation of the world, (vv. 9, 11, 20, 24)

It is noteworthy that Jesus’ prayer included believers not yet born as well (see v. 20). We are assured here that all true believers will be saved, for He said “none has been lost” (v. 12). Only those, like Judas (v. 12), doomed to destruction by their own unwillingness to repent, will be condemned (cf. 2 Peter 3:9). Since Jesus’ high-priestly prayer for us is efficacious (Heb. 7:25), as is His advocacy for us in heaven (1 John 2:1), it is impossible that any of His children will be taken from His hand. If they were, God would have failed to answer His Son’s petition, in direct contradiction to His Word’s assurance that He is pleased with what Jesus did for us (cf. Heb. 7:25–27; 1 John 2:1).

Romans 4:5–6

To the man who does not work but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited [imputed] as righteousness. David says the same thing when he speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom God credits [imputes] righteousness apart from works.

The doctrine of divine imputation, asserted here and elsewhere in Scripture, powerfully argues for eternal security. If we are already accounted as completely justified (because of Christ's righteousness imputed to us), then there is no sin that can keep us out of heaven. We have been dressed in Christ's perfection (2 Cor. 5:21), which is all sufficient.

Romans 8:29–30

For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of His Son.... And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified.

This “Golden Chain” is unbroken. The same persons who were foreknown and predestined were also called and justified and will be glorified (received into everlasting life). In order to discredit the doctrine of eternal security, one would have to insert the word some into the text—it isn't there. All who are justified will eventually be glorified.

Romans 8:33

“Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies.” Charles Ryrie's comment is to the point:

It makes no difference who in all the universe may try to charge us with whatever. It makes no difference as long as it is not God who charges us. And God does not. [God] has already announced the verdict in all instances when we are and will be charged. And that verdict is “not guilty” (SGS, 127).

Romans 8:35, 37–39

Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? ... No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

This passage needs little comment, merely contemplation. There is literally nothing “in all creation” that can separate a believer from Christ! Because of His unconditional love, the Creator won't do it, and no creature can do it.

1 Corinthians 12:13

“We were all baptized by one Spirit into one body—whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free—and we were all given the one Spirit to drink” (cf. Eph. 1:22–23; 4:4). As Charles Ryrie keenly notes,

At conversion the believer is joined to the body of Christ by the baptism of the Holy Spirit. If salvation can be lost, then one would have to be severed from the body, and the body of Christ would then be dismembered. (SGS, 129)

Romans 11:29

“God’s gifts and his call are irrevocable.” Salvation involves both the gift (Rom. 6:23) and the calling (Rom. 8:30) of God. Paul here declares that both are “irrevocable”—salvation can never be undone.

2 Corinthians 5:1–2

“Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands.” Paul says he not only knew he was destined for eternity with the Lord, but he knows it now. This present assurance of his future place “in heaven” is the confidence of eternal security.

2 Corinthians 5:5–6, 8

Now it is God who has made us for this very purpose and has given us the Spirit as a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come. Therefore we are always confident and know that as long as we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord.... We are confident, I say, and would prefer to be away from the body and at home with the Lord.

Here Paul expresses his certain knowledge that were he to die, he would be with Christ. This is an emphatic expression of his present assurance of eternal security, for God’s present “guarantee” is the Holy Spirit (see Eph. 4:30). To deny either the present assurance or the eternal security of the believer is to say that God’s promise—God’s very Spirit—is without value.

2 Corinthians 5:17, 21

Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come! ... God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God.

According to this text, we are already a new creation, which guarantees us a place in heaven. Indeed, we have been robed in “the righteousness of God”; thus, in His eyes, we are as perfect as we can be—not because of our merit but because of Christ’s work. In turn, since our sins have been imputed to Him and His righteousness to us, if anyone is to be kept out of heaven, it must be Christ. In the same way, if anyone is received into heaven because of Christ’s righteousness, it must be us.

Ephesians 1:4–5

He chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight. In love he predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will.

Believers are adopted into God’s family before the creation of time. God knew in advance everything that we would do, even after we had been saved, including all of our sins. Nevertheless, there is nothing that can undo an eternal decree of God (cf. Rom. 11:29). Hence, those who are adopted as His children are eternally secure—there is no such scriptural reality as unadoption. He chose us because He wanted us, even though He knew all things from eternity.

Ephesians 1:13–14

Having believed, you were marked in him with a seal, the promised Holy Spirit, who is a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance until the redemption of those who are God’s possession—to the praise of his glory, (cf. 4:30)

Elsewhere Paul says that all who have the Holy Spirit belong to Christ (Rom. 8:9). According to this text, having the Holy Spirit is a guarantee of ultimate redemption. Therefore, to argue that we can lose our salvation is tantamount to saying that God’s guarantee is no good (or can expire). Stated in the vernacular, God has placed His credibility on the fact that every believer is going to make it; He has guaranteed it with the presence of His own Spirit in our lives, who “himself testifies with our spirit that we are God’s children” (Rom. 8:16).

Ephesians 2:5–6

[God has] made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. And God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus.

According to this passage, the saved, positionally, are already in heaven. In addition, we are there not because we seated ourselves but because God confirmed our reservation. Again, our eternity is as secure as Christ’s: We can no more be kicked out of our everlasting inheritance than can Jesus be kicked out of heaven. As we have made clear, what we do practically should and will (at least to some degree) reflect this status, but it is in no way able to negate it.

Philippians 1:6

“[I am] confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus.” Paul expressed conviction that the God who initiated the salvific process would finish it. All the regenerate will be in heaven. God ends what He begins.

Philippians 4:3

Paul wrote:

Yes, and I ask you, loyal yokefellow, help these women who have contended at my side in the cause of the gospel, along with Clement and the rest of my fellow workers, whose names are in the book of life.

From this it is clear Paul taught that it is possible for us to know, here and now, whether we are on our way to heaven. Furthermore, since names in the Book of Life are there from eternity (Rev. 13:8), it is evident that God knows that the bearers are eternally secure. Indeed, John recorded that once one’s name is in this book, it will never be taken out (Rev. 3:5). Again, both present assurance of salvation and eternal security are found in these passages.

1 Thessalonians 1:4–5

“We know, brothers loved by God, that he has chosen you, because our gospel came to you not simply with words, but also with power, with the Holy Spirit and with deep conviction.”

Here, as in Romans 8:16, one's "deep conviction" that he or she is among the elect (i.e., is a chosen one) results from the omnipotent work of the Spirit. The Thessalonian believers had this assurance immediately upon conversion.

2 Timothy 1:12

Paul proclaimed: "I know whom I have believed, and am convinced that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day." Since our salvation does not depend on our faithfulness but on God's (2 Tim. 2:13), our perseverance is assured. Hence, we can know now that we will be glorified later, when He returns.

2 Timothy 4:18

Paul was certain: "The Lord will rescue me from every evil attack and will bring me safely to his heavenly kingdom." This assurance would not be possible if a believer could lose his salvation. How else could Paul possess the Spirit-inspired conviction that he would one day be with the Lord? Scripture promises that God will preserve all believers (Phil. 1:6; 1 Peter 1:5).

Hebrews 10:14

"By one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy." According to this passage, the one-time self-offering of Christ eternally secured the salvation of the elect. Since this certainty was obtained by the Cross, almost two thousand years before we were even born, it follows that any true believer can be assured now that he will be in heaven later. He is as perfect now, dressed in Christ's righteousness (2 Cor. 5:21), as he will ever be or needs to be for glorification in God's kingdom.

Hebrews 12:2

Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God.

God is both the Creator and the "finisher" (KJV) of our saving belief. He begins it, and He completes it (Phil. 1:6). Indeed, what the author of Hebrews calls "eternal redemption" (9:12) could not be everlasting if it were potentially temporal and if a person could lose it.

1 Peter 1:5

Peter speaks of those "who through faith are shielded by God's power until the coming of the salvation that is ready to be revealed in the last time." Once a man places his faith in Christ, he is protected by God's strength until he reaches heaven. Since God is omnipotent, it follows that nothing can penetrate this divine safeguard. Of course, this salvation is accomplished "through faith," which is strengthened by God's grace and assured in advance by His foreknowledge that it will come to pass (1 Peter 1:2).

1 John 3:9

John affirmed that "no one who is born of God will continue to sin, because God's seed remains in him; he cannot go on sinning, because he has been born of God."

This confirms moderate Calvinism's view of eternal security for two reasons.

First, anyone truly born of God cannot persist in evil. If someone does, then he is not born of God. That is, a Christian's perseverance in avoiding continual, habitual sin is a proof of his salvation.

Second, the word cannot indicates that a true believer has a divine nature that guarantees his ultimate salvation. God has planted a seed in each believer at conversion that will grow to fruition (cf. Phil. 1:6).

1 John 5:13

"I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God so that you may know that you have eternal life." Present knowledge of unending life in Christ is assurance of one's eternal security.

Jude 1–2

"Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called" (KJV).

Not only are the "beloved" (v. 3) believers "preserved" in Christ, but they are also already "sanctified" ("set apart") by the Lord.

Jude 24–25

To him who is able to keep you from falling and to present you before his glorious presence without fault and with great joy—to the only God our Savior be glory, majesty, power and authority, through Jesus Christ our Lord, before all ages, now and forevermore!

Whatever warnings the Bible may give about the potential for our falling, we are assured that a true believer will experience no failure that will involve the loss of heaven. An all-powerful God is able to prevent it!

Revelation 3:5

Jesus said of the believer, "I will never blot out his name from the book of life." This being the case, there is no fear of losing salvation once we receive it. Indeed, as we have seen, the names of the saved were written there from eternity (Rev. 13:8). Further, it is God who before the dawning of time wrote (and will never erase) the names of the elect in the Book of Life. No one whose name is contained had done anything to either gain or lose salvation, and the Lord knows the end from the beginning (Isa. 46:10). In His omniscient foreknowledge, God knew about every sin that the elect would commit after salvation, yet He eternally secured them anyway. He knew they would persevere in their faith.

Eternal Security and Present Assurance: Other Evidence of Salvation

Throughout his first epistle John lists ways we can know that we are one of God's elect:

- (1) if we keep His commandments (2:3);
- (2) if we keep His Word (2:4);
- (3) if we walk in love (2:5);
- (4) if we love the brethren (3:14);
- (5) if we love in deed, not only in word (3:19);

- (6) if we have the Holy Spirit within us (3:24);
- (7) if we love one another (4:13); and
- (8) if we don't continue in sin (5:18; cf. 3:9).

In short, if we manifest the fruit of the Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:22–23), we have the presence of the Spirit in our hearts and can be assured we are among the elect. We do not have to wait until we meet Christ to know that we belong to Him. The first fruit of the Spirit is agape love, and Paul details its unmistakable characteristics in 1 Corinthians 13.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR ETERNAL SECURITY

In addition to all of these passages that specifically support eternal security, there are many other Bible-based theological truths that ground this teaching. Some of the most prominent ones include the following.

Salvation Is of the Lord

Jonah (2:9 KJV) summarized the soteriology of Scripture: “Salvation is of the Lord.” Salvation does not derive from our strength but from the Lord’s will. The saved are “children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband’s will, but born of God” (John 1:13). As Paul said, “It does not, therefore, depend on man’s desire or effort, but on God’s mercy” (Rom. 9:16). Once again, if salvation does not depend on our efforts but only on God, our security is as eternal as He is.

God Cannot Deny Himself

The apostle declares: “If we are faithless, He remains faithful; He cannot deny himself” (2 Tim. 2:13 NKJV). This is a particularly poignant text in support of eternal security, for it directly addresses the Arminian challenge by declaring that even if our belief falters, the Lord’s faithfulness will not. We can no more lose our salvation than God can cease being God.

Election Was From Eternity

Salvation was not decided or gained in time, and it cannot be dissolved or lost in time. “[God] chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight” (Eph. 1:4). Christ was the “Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world” (Rev. 13:8). “This grace was given us in Christ Jesus before the beginning of time” (2 Tim. 1:9). Salvation was effected in eternity and for eternity.

God Has Infallible Foreknowledge

Both Calvinists and traditional (classical) Arminians agree that God has infallible foreknowledge (cf. Isa. 46:10). If this is correct, it seems unreasonable to assume (as Wesleyans do) that God regenerated people He knows will not persevere. The idea that God starts what He does not finish is contrary to His knowable character and recorded works.

Salvation Was Completed by Christ

What hymnist Elvira Hill wrote is strongly supported by Scripture: “Jesus paid it all”! Jesus, on the cross, said so Himself: “It is finished” (John 19:30). Anticipating His sacrifice, He declared to the Father: “I have finished the work which You have given Me to do” (John 17:4 NKJV). Again, the writer of Hebrews promised, “By one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy” (10:14).

From God’s perspective, the work of the Cross was an accomplished fact from all eternity (Rev. 13:8; Eph. 1:4). This means that in God’s eyes—in the eyes of Him who sees with infallible foreknowledge—all our sins (past, present, and future) were already covered before we were born. This being true, even the sins Arminians deem to be worthy of “the loss of salvation” were paid for by Jesus prior to our arrival in this world. If the Arminian view of perseverance were accurate, the loss of a person’s eternal life would by necessity also effect a loss in God’s omniscient foreknowledge (that this person would receive the gift of salvation). Contrary to Arminian claims, never does the Bible qualify the “all sins” for which Christ died by asserting that it is only “all sins up to the time believers were justified.” It is unwise to add to the Scriptures.

Salvation Is an Irrevocable Gift

As mentioned earlier, Paul emphatically states that “God’s gifts and his call are irrevocable” (Rom. 11:29), and he also says that salvation is “the gift of God” (Rom. 6:23; Eph. 2:9). Hence, God can never overturn salvation: He is bound by His own unconditional covenant to be faithful even if we are faithless (2 Tim. 2:13).

Salvation Is an Unconditional Promise

God’s unconditional promises are unbreakable, and salvation is an unconditional promise (Rom. 6:23; 11:29; Eph. 2:9). Hebrews declares:

Because God wanted to make the unchanging nature of his purpose very clear to the heirs of what was promised, he confirmed it with an oath. God did this so that, by two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we who have fled to take hold of the hope offered to us may be greatly encouraged. (6:17–18)

Salvation Cannot Be Gained or Lost by Our Good Works

We have seen, irrefutably, that salvation is not gained by good works (Eph. 2:8–9): “He saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy. He saved us through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit” (Titus 3:5). If salvation is not gained by our works, then how can it be lost by our works? Bad behavior, even the kind Arminians argue is sufficient for salvific loss, can no more cause us to lose eternal life than good behavior can help us to obtain it.

To the objection that salvation is received by our free choice and thus can be relinquished by our free choice, we note once more that salvation is an unconditional gift (Rom. 11:29) and, as such, cannot be taken back by God. Like the gift of physical life, after eternal life is received it cannot be given away. Only God has the power to reclaim it, and His character guarantees that He will never renege on His promise. Further, some tangible acts of freedom are one-way actions—obviously we can choose to get into situations that we cannot subsequently choose (i.e., have the power) to get out of (e.g., suicide).

Likewise, the fact that salvation is received by faith does not mean it can be lost by lack of faith. As we have already shown, receiving the gift of salvation is not dependent on a believer's continual faith; the initial act of faith is the means through which justification is applied (cf. Rom. 13:11). Thus, the gift of salvation (Rom. 6:23) is a present possession (John. 5:24), and God's gifts cannot be retracted (Rom. 11:29).

Arminianism Presents an Implicit Denial of Salvation by Grace Alone

Closely associated with the previous point is the fact that if believers are not eternally secure and, thus, can lose everlasting life because of bad actions, then Arminianism is a tacit form of salvation by works. H. Orton Wiley admitted this when he said, "Arminians deny the merit of good works but insist upon them as a condition of salvation." He even notes, "Mr. Wesley's formula was, 'works, not as a merit, but as a condition' " (CT, 373). Why are works a condition? Because, according to the Arminian view, a believer must maintain good works in order to keep his salvation; to guarantee his glorification, he must not, after he is saved, perform the kind of actions that precipitate salvific loss.

In fact, the Arminian position on this issue is similar to the Roman Catholic view, which demands that once one receives "initial justification" by grace alone, he must not commit a "mortal sin" or else he will lose his salvation. As already observed, if the performance of works is necessary for the maintenance of my salvation, how can I avoid the conclusion that I am saved by my good works?

ANSWERING ARGUMENTS AGAINST ETERNAL SECURITY

Arminians use certain texts and arguments to show that a Christian can lose his salvation; it is to these that a moderate Calvinist must respond. At the heart of the Arminian position is the contention that all of the biblical "salvation passages" are either implicitly or explicitly conditional.

The Argument That the Promise of Salvation Is Conditional

Noted Arminian Robert Shank (b. 1918) argues that there are at least eighty-five New Testament passages that establish the "Doctrine of Conditional Security." He stresses texts that speak, for example, of "continuing," "abiding," and "holding fast." Colossians 1:22–23 teaches: "But now he has reconciled you by Christ's physical body through death to present you holy in his sight ... if you continue in your faith, established and firm, not moved from the hope held out in the gospel." First Corinthians 15:2 says, "By this gospel you are saved, if you hold firmly to the word I preached to you." And Hebrews 3:12–14 affirms:

See to it, brothers, that none of you has a sinful, unbelieving heart that turns away from the living God. But encourage one another daily, as long as it is called Today, so that none of you may be hardened by sin's deceitfulness. We have come to share in Christ if we hold firmly till the end the confidence we had at first.

Moderate Calvinism counters that neither these nor any other passages assert that a true believer will ever lose his or her salvation. The context here indicates he is speaking about practical, progressive holiness rather than our positional, perfect holiness in Christ, though the former is to flow from the latter (cf. Eph. 1:4; Heb. 10:14). Paul speaks of being “presented blameless” and “irreproachable,” terms reminiscent of those he used in Ephesians when he said:

Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word, and to present her to himself as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless. (5:25–27)

Further, Paul’s reference to “continue in [the] faith” does not mean simply “to continue believing” but also “to continue to live out the Christian faith.” For example, he mentions being “grounded and steadfast” (Col. 1:23 NKJV), images that he uses elsewhere for a fruitful Christian life: “Stand firm. Let nothing move you. Always give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord, because you know that your labor in the Lord is not in vain” (1 Cor. 15:58). Since these figures of speech refer to working for God, and since we are not saved by works, the Colossians exhortation to continue steadfastly in the faith seems to be best taken as implying that if we so continue in the Christian faith, we will be rewarded by Christ when we are presented before His judgment seat (2 Cor. 5:10; 1 Cor. 3:11ff.).

Likewise, Paul’s admonition to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 15:2), implying that they would only be “saved” if they “hold firmly” to the word, doesn’t refer to positional justification (being saved from the penalty of sin) but to practical justification (being saved from the power of sin). This is clear from the context.

First, he is speaking to “brothers” (1 Cor. 15:1) who are already saved, not the unsaved, who need justification.

Second, they are “holy,” those who have been positionally set apart in Christ (1 Cor. 1:2).

Third, their salvation (justification) is referred to as past—“which you received” (1 Cor. 15:1).

Fourth, Paul concludes the fifteenth chapter by exhorting them to “stand firm” in the Christian life giving “yourselves fully to the work of the Lord,” the performance of which does not bring justification (Rom. 4:5; Eph. 2:8–9). John Walvoord (1910–2002) correctly noted that “the pres[ent] tense of the verb saved focuses on sanctification” (BKC, 2.542).

Also, other passages dealing with continued faithfulness in the Christian life also refer to faithfulness that yields rewards for service, not the gift of salvation (e.g., Rev. 2:10).

Finally, there is a difference between having faith to the end and being faithful to the end: Perseverance in faith entails the former but not necessarily the latter. If one is a true believer, he will continue to believe in Christ to the end. Jesus placed those who “believe for a while” among those who were not saved, in contrast to those who persevere in belief (cf. Luke 8:13, 15). Hence, while continuance in the faith is a demonstration of salvation, it is not a condition for being saved.

The Argument That Belief Is a Continual Process

Arminians observe that the Word of God employs the infinitive to believe (Gk: pisteuo) in the present tense rather than as a once-for-all, completed act when we were first justified. For example, the texts in John’s gospel that promise eternal life for “believing” speak of “belief” in the present tense, namely, as a continual process. As such, they can be translated, for example:

“God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever [continues to believe] in him shall not perish but have eternal life” (John 3:16).

In response to this, moderate Calvinists make several significant points.

First, the present tense does not necessarily mean perpetual action, only current action.

Second, Jesus’ use of the present tense in regard to drinking physical water (John 4:13) is an obvious example of an initial act that does not go on forever. No one who is continuously drinking gets thirsty again, but John 4:13 says they will thirst. If they will thirst again, they are not constantly drinking water.

Third, the present tense is sometimes used of a onetime event, like the Incarnation (cf. John 6:33, 38, 41–42). A present participle is often used of actions that have stopped (cf. Matt. 2:20; 5:16; 6:14; John 9:8; Gal. 1:23). So then, there is no contradiction in maintaining that the act of saving faith, a necessary condition for receiving salvation, is a moment of decision: It simply means that “one begins to believe in the present.”

Fourth, if an initial act of belief were not sufficient for salvation—that is, if salvation required belief as a continual process—then there is no way Scripture could pronounce that one has already received the gift of eternal life as a present possession, which it does (e.g., John 5:24). Perpetual faith after the initial obtaining of salvation is not a condition for retaining eternal life but a manifestation of its veracity. As Wiley noted, “The initial act becomes the permanent attitude of the regenerate man” (CT, 375), for God is able to keep us in a state of belief by His power (1 Peter 1:5; cf. Phil. 1:6).

Fifth, not all references to belief that brings salvation (salvific faith) are in the present tense. Some are aorist and do indicate a completed action (e.g., John 4:39–41). Romans 13:11 declares: “The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber, because our salvation [glorification] is nearer now than when we first believed.” Indeed, the famous Acts 16:31 passage is an example: “Believe [aorist] in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved.”

Sixth, since salvation is in three stages, it should come as no surprise that the Bible stresses belief in the present. We were saved in the past from the penalty of sin (justification), we are being saved in the present from the power of sin (sanctification), and we will be saved in the future from the presence of sin (glorification). Again, even though we must work out our own salvation in the present (Phil. 2:12), it is God “who works in [us]” both “to will and to act according to his good purpose” (2:13). As Paul explained, “I worked harder than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me” (1 Cor. 15:10).

Seventh, and finally, nowhere does the Word say that anyone who once truly believed will ever lose his salvation; it says that those who believe should continue to refine the salvation they already possess (Phil. 2:13).

The Argument for the Symmetrical Nature of Belief and Unbelief

Arminians also insist that if we can exercise faith to become “in Christ,” then we can use the same faith to become “out of Christ.” Just as we can get on and off a city bus at will, we can exercise our freedom to get off the salvation transit anywhere along the way. Allegedly, if we couldn’t do this, it would mean that once we are saved, we are no longer free. Freedom is symmetrical; if you have it to get saved, then you also have it to get lost.

However, as was shown above, this perspective is not biblically based; it is speculative, and therefore should be treated as such. In addition, it is not necessary to accept this reasoning even on a purely rational basis. As already established, some of our life decisions are one-way, with no possibility of reversal.

Furthermore, by this same logic, the Arminian would have to hold that we can be taken out of God's hand even after we enter heaven; if he did not, he would have to deny that we are free in heaven. If we are free in heaven and yet cannot be lost, then why is it logically impossible (as the Arminian insists) for us to be free on earth and yet be unable to lose our salvation? In both cases, the answer is that if we freely submit to God through saving faith, His omnipotent power will keep us from falling in accordance with our freedom (cf. Jude 24).

RESPONDING TO PASSAGES THAT ALLEGEDLY SHOW WE CAN LOSE ETERNAL LIFE

Many verses are used by Arminians to show that a believer can lose his salvation. Space does not permit a detailed explanation of each, but all of them fall into two broad categories.

Verses That Refer to “Professing but Not Possessing Believers”

First, there are the verses that deal with professing believers who never actually possessed saving faith.

Matthew 7:22–23

Jesus said, “Many will say to me on that day, ‘Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and in your name drive out demons and perform many miracles?’ Then I will tell them plainly, ‘I never knew you. Away from me, you evildoers!’ ”

In spite of their testimony and even wonders done in His name, it is clear from the emphasized words “I never knew you” that these people had not received salvation.

Matthew 10:1, 5–8

[Jesus] called his twelve disciples to him and gave them authority to drive out evil spirits and to heal every disease and sickness.... These twelve Jesus sent out with the following instructions.... “Go rather to the lost sheep of Israel. As you go, preach this message: ‘The kingdom of heaven is near.’ Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse those who have leprosy, drive out demons.”

It seems evident that these gifts were given to all the disciples, including Judas (v. 4), who also preached the message of Christ. We know from other references that he was Jesus' treasurer (John 13:29) and that, after he betrayed Christ, he was lost, being called “the son of perdition” (KJV). Jesus said it would have been better if Judas had never been born (Matt. 26:24), and Luke clarifies that, after hanging himself, he “left to go where he belongs” (Acts 1:25). Judas was obviously a professed follower of Christ, yet he finished in perdition (hell). Is this not an example of someone who received eternal life but then lost his salvation by betraying the Lord?

The answer is no. Judas was only a believer by profession (not by possession), a wolf in sheep's clothing. Jesus called him a “devil” (John 6:70) who was eventually indwelt by Satan himself (John 13:27). The Greek word used of his so-called sorry after his treachery against Christ (metamelomai) reveals that he was not a true believer—it means “regret,” not “repentance.” Jesus, in His high priestly prayer, excluded Judas from those who were truly His own (John 17:12).

Matthew 24:13

“He who stands firm to the end will be saved.” Matthew 10:22 says the same thing: “All men will hate you because of me, but he who stands firm to the end will be saved.”

Some scholars take this as speaking of the perseverance of the saints. If this were accurate, it still wouldn’t disprove eternal security but would merely affirm that the elect will persevere, since they are God’s chosen ones. Again, their perseverance is a sign of salvation, not a condition of it.

However, in context it appears that these verses do not refer to losing either salvation or rewards—they likely point to the believers who live through the Tribulation that will come at the “end of the age” (cf. Matt. 24:3, 29). If this is correct, then Scripture is saying that only those who live through the Great Distress will live into the thousand-year reign of Christ (Rev. 20:4–5).

Luke 8:4–15

“Those on the rock are the ones who receive the word with joy when they hear it, but they have no root. They believe for a while, but in the time of testing they fall away” (v. 13). On the face of it, this passage would seem to favor the Arminian view, since the persons were believers “for awhile” but then backslid.

However, there are two kinds of faith: nominal (nonsaving) belief and effectual (saving) belief. The former is mere belief that something is so, and the latter is belief in it. Again, James (in chapter 2) stresses that nominal faith does not lead to good works and is not saving faith. Zane Hodges, though, argues that James is not speaking of salvation from hell but from death; not justification but sanctification. Hodges believes the “dead” faith is the believer’s faith that lacks vitality, and that the performance of works is necessary for God’s blessing on our life. Therefore, he sees “justification” in James 2 as meaning justification before men, not in the eyes of God, as Paul meant in Roman 3–4 (AF, 74–75).

Nevertheless, even if this were so, James clearly says, “[Abraham’s] faith and his actions were working together, and his faith was made complete by what he did” (2:22), and James connects this with the same faith that alone justified Abraham. Where Hodges goes wrong is in assuming that we are justified by faith alone without works (true) but sanctified by faith plus works (false). This is neither the biblical nor the Reformed position; contrary to Hodges, faith—the same faith that alone justifies us by God’s grace—naturally and normally produces good works. We are not saved by works but by a faith that works.

Peter said, true believers “through faith are shielded by God’s power until the coming of the salvation that is ready to be revealed in the last time” (1 Peter 1:5). Only the faith that takes “root” produces “fruit” (cf. Luke 8:13, 15 KJV). Seed that does not become grounded in a heart of true belief is no better than seed that falls by the wayside, in which case “the devil comes and takes away the word from their hearts, so that they may not believe and be saved” (v. 12).

2 Thessalonians 2:3

Paul warned of a great apostasy from the faith, saying,

Don’t let anyone deceive you in any way, for that day will not come until the rebellion [apostasy] occurs and the man of lawlessness is revealed, the man doomed to destruction. (cf. v. 8)

It would appear from the context that apostasy leading to ultimate doom and destruction (i.e., hell) not only can but will occur. However, Paul indicates that those who comprise the “doomed group” were not true believers from the beginning, for this deception will take place among “those who are perishing... because they refused to love the truth and so be saved” (v. 10).

1 Timothy 4:1–2

The Spirit clearly says that in later times some will abandon the faith and follow deceiving spirits and things taught by demons. Such teachings come through hypocritical liars, whose consciences have been seared as with a hot iron.

Arminians point out that these people must have once had saving faith; otherwise they could not have later departed from it.

In response, “the faith” is used in the Pastoral Epistles (cf. 1 Tim. 3:9; 2 Tim. 2:18; Titus 1:13), in the Prison Letters (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; Eph. 4:13; Phil. 1:27; Col. 2:7), and in Acts (cf. 6:7; 13:8; 14:22) as the equivalent of “the Christian faith,” with all its essential doctrines (1 Tim. 3:9; 4:6) and ethics (1 Tim. 6:10). A person may give intellectual assent to the faith without making it his faith.

Further, in regard to “the faith,” the New Testament speaks of those who have “wandered from” it (1 Tim. 6:10), “denied” it (1 Tim. 5:8), “destroyed” it in others (2 Tim. 2:18), “turned from” it (Acts 13:8), “rejected” it (2 Tim. 3:8), “departed” from it (1 Tim. 4:1 NKJV), and “overthrown” it (2 Tim. 2:18 NKJV). Why is it difficult to believe that these terms and phrases describe people who are truly lost? If there is identity between the faith and the Christian faith, what we are taught is that a person can depart from the faith without it being his faith.

Consequently, we need only ask if there is indisputable evidence that God’s Word teaches that any of these individuals were ever true believers. An examination of these texts yields a negative answer. These were people who professed the Christian faith, but none of them were described as having once been actual Christ-followers. Like Simon the sorcerer, they may have “believed” and been “baptized” (Acts 8:13), but subsequent action demonstrated nominal (and not salvific) faith. Peter said:

May your money perish with you, because you thought you could buy the gift of God with money! You have no part or share in this ministry, because your heart is not right before God. (vv. 20–21)

Thus, like all unsaved people (cf. 17:30), Simon needed to “repent of this wickedness and pray to the Lord,” because he was full “of bitterness and captive to sin” (22–23).

Hebrews 12:14

“Make every effort to live in peace with all men and to be holy; without holiness no one will see the Lord.” As a result, how can we avoid the Arminian conclusion that sanctification is necessary for eternal life?

In response, there are several problems with taking this as a passage that teaches the possible loss of salvation. For instance, how holy does one have to be? Of whose holiness is Hebrews speaking? The answer is that all true believers are positionally dressed in Christ’s righteousness—they are as holy as anyone can become (2 Cor. 5:21). Indeed, Paul assured a presently unholy Corinthian church that they were already “sanctified in Christ Jesus” (1 Cor. 1:2), and Hebrews mentions those who, in spite of currently “being sanctified,” are nevertheless “perfected forever” (10:14 NKJV). If these passages are speaking of our righteousness (or holiness), then we are in eternal peril, for all of our supposed goodness is nothing but filthy rags in the eyes of God (Isa. 64:6).

It seems certain, despite Arminian claims to the contrary, that the New Testament does not mean every believer must attain perfection through practical holiness before he can be saved. Further, this would be a kind of salvation by works, which God’s Word repeatedly condemns. Perhaps we can be enlightened by comparing the words pursue and attain. We should pursue practical holiness, though we cannot in this life perfectly attain it. Even if this concept is not in view in these specific passages, the idea that we should practically pursue what only Christ has positionally achieved (on our behalf) is biblical. One truth is without question: Nowhere do these texts confirm that a believer will lose his salvation if he does not live a perfect life of holiness. The Arminian conundrum, then, is “How much holiness is enough?” Once again, the answer is that salvation is not about our righteousness—the work of Jesus will forever be sufficient.

2 Peter 2:1–22

Peter speaks of those who denied the “Lord who bought them” (v. 1) and who had “known the way of righteousness” (v. 21). This would seem to indicate, as Arminians argue, that the people being discussed were once truly saved and that their denial still led to their ultimate doom, since the “blackest darkness is reserved for them” (cf. v. 17). They are dogs (a term used for unbelievers in Revelation), not lambs (see v. 22); they are called “slaves of corruption” (v. 19 NKJV) rather than a “new creation” of God (2 Cor. 5:17).

In reply, a closer look at the context reveals that those who are denying the Lord (v. 1) were never true believers but instead “false teachers” and “false prophets” (v. 1). Hence, their knowledge of the Lord (v. 20) was obviously one of mental assent rather than heart commitment. They knew Christ as “the Lord and Savior” (v. 20 NKJV), not as their Lord and Savior. They were deceivers (Matt. 7:15).

Verses That Refer to True Believers Losing Rewards but Not Salvation

The second group of verses used by Arminians in regard to eternal security refers to those people who are truly saved but are said to be losing their rewards (fellowship, maturity, physical life) rather than their salvation.

Psalm 51:4, 9–12

After his terrible sins of murder and adultery, David prayed:

Against you [God], you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight, so that you are proved right when you speak and justified when you judge.... Hide your face from my sins and blot out all my iniquity. Create in me a pure heart, O God, and renew a steadfast spirit within me. Do not cast me from your presence or take your Holy Spirit from me. Restore to me the joy of your salvation and grant me a willing spirit, to sustain me.

It is suggested by some that when David chose evil he feared losing eternal life, as his prayer of confession might seem to indicate. The wording of his petition, though, is extremely important. Even in these gross sins, he did not lose his salvation but the joy of it (v. 12). Believers who are in sin lack happiness and peace; even though they are under the fatherly discipline of the Lord, they are still sons (Heb. 12:5–11; cf. 1 Cor. 11:28–32).

Psalm 69:27–28

“Charge them with crime upon crime; do not let them share in your salvation. May they be blotted out of the book of life and not be listed with the righteous.” Some believe this psalm is referring to the Lamb’s Book of [everlasting] Life (Rev. 13:8), which records the names of all the saved (cf. Rev. 3:5; 20:15). If this is the case, then David is praying that these people will lose their salvation. This is unlikely, however, for several reasons.

First, these individuals were God’s “enemies” (Psa. 69:4, 18–19) who did not “share in ... [His] salvation” (v. 27). Thus, they were unbelievers, whose names were never in the Lamb’s Book of Life.

Second, there are many “books” referred to in the Psalms. For instance, there is the book, or register, that counts all the living (87:6); the book, or scroll, that recounts the events of our life, even every tear (56:8); the book that holds all the days ordained for us (139:16); and the book that records the deeds of our life (51:1). None of these is the Lamb’s Book of Life, wherein the names of the elect are recorded from all eternity (Rev. 21:27).

Third, Psalm 69:28 cannot be referring to the Lamb’s Book of Life because Jesus promised no name can be removed from it (Rev. 3:5). Again, all the names of the elect have been in the Lamb’s Book of Life from all eternity (Rev. 13:8); since God knows the end from the beginning (Isa. 46:10), why would He, at any rate, initially enter their names if He knew He would eventually erase them?

Thus, it seems best to understand Psalm 69:28 in its Old Testament context of a book that records those who are alive. In addition, as God is in control of all life (Deut. 32:39; Job 1:21), David is referring to His book of physical existence, not eternal security. Charles Stanley summarizes succinctly:

First of all, the other things David asks God to do to his enemies are physical in nature (see vs. 22–26)... Second, to interpret “book of life” as the Lamb’s book of life implies that David’s enemies were believers.... Third, in the previous verse, David asks that his enemies “not come into God’s righteousness” (see Ps. 69:27). If their names were in the Lamb’s book of life, they would have already come into His righteousness. (ES, 189)

Matthew 10:33

“Whoever denies Me before men, him I will also deny before My Father who is in heaven” (NKJV). Many Arminians believe this is proof that one can lose salvation by betraying Christ. There are other ways to understand this verse that better fit both the context and the rest of the New Testament.

The NIV translates deny (Gk: arnesomai) as disown, but this rendering is too strong, since it is the root of the same term used in 2 Timothy 2:12 (Gk: arnesasthai), where it is applied to believers whom God will not disown, due to His faithfulness.

Also, a derivative of the same term is used of Peter’s denial of Jesus (Gk: aparnese, Matt. 26:34–36), but as we have seen, he did not lose everlasting life as a result of his betrayal. He was restored to fellowship with God (John 21), but his relationship with God had never ceased—again, he was still considered “wheat” and not a “tare” (Matt. 13:25 KJV). Furthermore, he retained his “faith” in Christ (cf. Luke 22:31–32) even when he denied that he knew Him (vv. 47–62).

It should also be observed that these individuals (in Matt. 10:33) are “in heaven”; they are being denied special recognition by the Father, not a place in His family. While they may not receive the approbation “Well done, good and faithful servant” from their Father (Matt. 25:23), they are His children and will forever live in His home.

Matthew 12:31–32

Jesus affirmed that there is unpardonable sin:

So I tell you, every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven. Anyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, but anyone who speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come.

Of the many facts that have been gleaned from this passage, nothing in them supports the Arminian position.

First, Arminians believe that one can regain salvation after losing it, but even if they were correct in maintaining that salvation can be undone, it is clear that eternal life could not, in any case, be “re-obtained” after a person has committed the unpardonable sin.

Second, there is no indication that believers can commit this sin. The context shows that what is unpardonable is done by hardhearted unbelievers, who attribute the work of the Holy Spirit through Christ to the devil (cf. Mark 3:30).

Third, it is possible that this sin cannot be committed today, that it was possible only when Jesus was physically present on earth and had the Holy Spirit working through Him.

Fourth, and finally, Jesus died for all our sins (John 1:29; 1 John 2:2). Consequently, if an unpardonable sin still exists, it must be the sin of not accepting Christ’s forgiveness. Believers have accepted it, and Jesus has promised them that they will “never perish” (John 10:28).

1 Corinthians 3:11–15

No one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ. If any man builds on this foundation using gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay or straw, his work will be shown for what it is, because the Day will bring it to light. It will be revealed with fire, and the fire will test the quality of each man’s work. If what he has built survives, he will receive his reward. If it is burned up, he will suffer loss.

The Arminian usage of this text doesn’t require much in the way of reply. Paul says true believers can lose their reward, not their salvation. Further, it speaks of a Christian’s “work,” which is never part of the basis for salvation (Eph. 2:8–9). In addition, Paul emphatically declares that he will be saved.

1 Corinthians 8:11

“This weak brother [who has a weak conscience], for whom Christ died, is destroyed by your knowledge [of freedom in the Spirit].” Also, “If your brother is distressed because of what you eat, you are no longer acting in love. Do not by your eating [of something that may cause him difficulty] destroy [Gk: apollue] your brother for whom Christ died” (Rom. 14:15). The Greek apollumi, translated destroy is sometimes (in the New Testament) used in regard to the condemnation of a person to hell (e.g., Matt. 10:28—apolesai). From this a careless interpreter might conclude that the “weak brother” can lose (or has lost) his salvation.

However, this is incorrect.

For one thing, grammatically the word destroy most often simply means to “lose something temporal,” such as physical life (Matt. 26:52) or self-centered convenience (Matt. 10:39).

Sometimes apollumi is used of the loss of a person's "reward" (Matt. 10:42) but never his salvation.

Further, the context in 1 Corinthians 8 (and Rom. 14) has to do with offending a weaker "brother" (v. 11) by partaking of food that had been offered to images of other gods. Paul is not referring to the loss of salvation because:

- (1) He speaks of "wound[ing] their weak conscience" (v. 12), not eliminating their salvation and sending them to hell;
- (2) This act of offense, while plainly a "sin against Christ," does not precipitate spirit-damning evil;
- (3) The description describes a "stumbling block" (v. 9) in the weaker brother's life, not his eternal condemnation—it is unfathomable that the Arminian might truly mean to suggest that if he were to "stumble" (v. 13 NKJV) in his Christian life, he would be forever separated from God;
- (4) The parallel passage in Romans 14 speaks of the offended brother being "made weak" (v. 21 KJV) or "distressed" (v. 15) (Gk: lupeitai) in his faith, not being stripped of (or relinquishing) everlasting life;
- (5) Whatever it is that our unloving act causes the "weaker" one to do, he is still a "brother" in Christ—he has not been (and will not be) unadopted.

1 Corinthians 9:27

"I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize." Again, Paul is speaking about loss of reward, not of salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 3:15; 2 Cor. 5:10)—note that he speaks of a "prize" to be won rather than a "gift" to be received (cf. Rom. 6:23). In any event, warnings to persevere are not inconsistent with our ability to have assurance of salvation any more than exhortations to "work out" our own salvation (Phil. 2:12) are contradictory to "God who works in you" (v. 13) to accomplish it (cf. 1 Cor. 15:10).

Galatians 5:4

"You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace." Many Arminians insist that this means the Galatians had lost their salvation. A careful contextual examination reveals the opposite.

For one thing, they are called "brethren" (6:1 NKJV) who had placed their "faith" in Christ (3:2 NKJV) for their justification (3:8). They were already saved.

For another, they had "begun in the Spirit" (3:3 NKJV) but were now "alienated" from the Spirit of Christ (5:4) as the means of their sanctification; they had gone back under the bondage of keeping the law (3:5, 10). They had not lost their salvation but had abandoned the true process of purification, since they were attempting to work for sanctifying grace rather than working from it.

Furthermore, if falling from grace means the loss of salvation, why does Paul not refer to hell? The threat mentioned is that of becoming subject to the "yoke of slavery" (5:1), not to eternal torment (cf. Rev. 20:10, 15).

1 Timothy 5:15

The apostle says, "Some have in fact already turned away to follow Satan." Even so, this verse does not support the Arminian view of salvific loss. "To follow Satan" is not a phrase that must mean a person is without eternal hope: Anyone who falls into sin, as all believers can (1 John 1:8), is following the devil's temptations (2 Cor. 2:11). For instance, Jesus responded to Peter's poorly motivated declaration with, "Get behind me, Satan!" for a sin nowhere close to apostasy (Matt. 16:22–23).

2 Timothy 2:12

"If we endure, we shall also reign with Him: if we deny Him, He also will deny us" (NKJV). Some Arminians take this to mean that believers who deny Jesus will be denied heaven. There is a better way, though, to understand Paul's teaching.

The immediate context reveals that he is speaking about a denial of reward, not of eternal life. The preceding phrase says, "If we endure, we shall also reign with Him." Reigning is part of a believer's reward (cf. Rev. 20:6; 22:12), and he has already received eternal life, whether he is rewarded or not (cf. 1 Cor. 3:15). Further, once again, the very next statement makes it absolutely clear that we cannot lose our salvation (v. 13).

2 Timothy 2:17–18

[The] teaching [of those who indulge in godless chatter] will spread like gangrene. Among them are Hymenaeus and Philetus, who have wandered away from the truth. They say that the resurrection has already taken place, and they destroy the faith of some.

This text does not point to a loss of salvation.

First, as we have demonstrated, only a few sentences earlier Paul gives one of the strongest biblical affirmations of eternal security (2 Tim. 2:13).

Second, the context focuses on resurrection faith; therefore, it may refer simply to loss of belief in resurrection as a future event (see v. 18).

Third, even if this passage does point to a loss of faith in general, it is not highlighting genuine faith (1 Tim. 1:5), which endures forever, but formal faith (2 Tim. 3:5), which even demons have (James 2:19), and which is not sufficient for salvation (cf. James 2:14ff.).

2 Timothy 4:7

"I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith." Paul seems to imply that there are those who do not keep the faith and, hence, will be lost. However, while he speaks of keeping the faith, he doesn't say that those who fail to do so won't be saved. Furthermore, in the very next verse he confirms that the result of keeping the faith is not salvation but reward—"the crown of righteousness." While those who aren't faithful won't receive this crown (1 Cor. 3:15) or other "crowns" awarded for faithfulness (Rev. 2:10), Paul by no means suggests that they have their salvation taken away (cf. Rev. 2:10).

Hebrews 2:1

"We must pay more careful attention, therefore, to what we have heard, so that we do not drift away." As with the other warnings in Hebrews, the context indicates that they are to believers and are once again about losing rewards, not salvation.<sup>41</sup> Hebrews calls them "heirs of salvation" (1:14 KJV) and "brethren" (2:17 KJV), and the use of "we" (2:1) signifies the author's inclusion. "Drift away" is not a figure of speech indicating an everlasting loss; later warnings to the same audience indicate the author is speaking of a deprivation of “maturity” (6:1; cf. 5:13–14).

Hebrews 6:4–6

It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age, if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance, because to their loss they are crucifying the Son of God all over again and subjecting him to public disgrace.

First of all, note that it is problematic to take this passage as referring to unbelievers. The writer calls those he is warning “beloved,” a term hardly appropriate for non-Christians. Further, while the description of their spiritual status differs from other New Testament expressions, some of the phrases are difficult to interpret in any other way than that the addressees were saved:

- (1) They had experienced “repentance” (6:6), which signifies salvation (cf. Acts 17:30);
- (2) They were “enlightened, and [had] tasted the heavenly gift” (6:4 NKJV);
- (3) They were “partakers of the Holy Spirit” (6:4 NKJV);
- (4) They had “tasted the good word of God” (6:5 NKJV); and
- (5) They had experienced the “powers of the age to come” (6:5 NKJV).

Of course, if they were believers, the question then arises as to their status after they had “fall[en] away” (v. 6). In response, it should be observed that this term (Gk: parapesontas) does not indicate a one-way (irreversible) action, which means that the status of those who have fallen away is not hopeless. In fact, that it is impossible for a fallen believer to repent again indicates the once-for-all nature of repentance—his already having “changed his mind” about (or “reversed his direction toward”) Christ has brought him “eternal redemption” (9:12).

What the text (6:6) seems to teach is that there is no more need for drifters (or backsliders) to re-repent and get re-saved than there is for Jesus to be re-sacrificed (cf. 7:27; 9:12, 25–27; 10:5–10). Few Arminians believe that once a person has backslidden, it is impossible for him to still be a Christian. In summary, this passage points not to loss of salvation but loss of maturity (6:1) and growth (5:13–14), which is precisely the context of the whole discussion.

Hebrews 10:26–29

If we deliberately keep on sinning after we have received the knowledge of the truth, no sacrifice for sins is left, but only a fearful expectation of judgment and of raging fire that will consume the enemies of God. Anyone who rejected the law of Moses died without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses. How much more severely do you think a man deserves to be punished who has trampled the Son of God under foot, who has treated as an unholy thing the blood of the covenant that sanctified him, and who has insulted the Spirit of grace?

This is likewise not a warning about loss of salvation but about loss of reward.

First, again, the persons involved are described as “brothers” (v. 19), “[God’s] people” (v. 30), those who have a high priest (Christ—9:11), and those who have a confession of hope given only to the “faithful” (v. 23).

Second, the author explicitly speaks not of salvation but of a “great reward” (v. 35 NASB).

Third, they have “a better and an enduring possession ... in heaven” (v. 34 NKJV).

Fourth, they had been “illuminated” by God (v. 32 NKJV) and possessed the “knowledge of the truth” (vv. 26, 32), indicating that they were believers.

Fifth, as believers they suffered with and had compassion for the author of the letter (vv. 33–34).

Sixth, they are described as those who were capable of doing the “will of God” (v. 36), something true only of believers (John 9:31).

Seventh, the reference to those who “insulted the Spirit of grace” (v. 29) implies that they were believers who had received Him.

Eighth, the illustration regarding those who died under the law of Moses (v. 28) speaks of physical death (an end of life in this world), not eternal death (everlasting separation from God), as a potential discipline for believers who disobey God (cf. 1 Cor. 11:30; 1 John 5:16).

Ninth, the “fearful expectation of judgment” (Heb. 10:27) fits the description of believers coming before Christ (2 Cor. 5:10), when their works will be tried by fire and they could suffer loss of reward (1 Cor. 3:13–14).

Tenth, if this passage does teach that salvation can be lost, then it does not support the Arminian view at any rate, for it says, in such a case, that “no sacrifice for sins is left.” In other words, if what Hebrews means is that whoever was saved and subsequently sins in this way cannot be restored but has lost his salvation eternally, then such a one cannot be restored from having fallen (or “backslidden”).

Eleventh, and finally, Hebrews 10 ends with the writer confidently affirming that believers will not be lost: “We are not of those who shrink back and are destroyed, but of those who believe and are saved” (v. 39).

2 Peter 2:20–21

If they have escaped the corruption of the world by knowing our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and are again entangled in it and overcome, they are worse off at the end than they were at the beginning. It would have been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than to have known it and then to turn their backs on the sacred command that was passed on to them.

That these people knew Christ as Lord and Savior and had “escaped the corruption of the world” seems to indicate that they were once believers.

In response, it should be observed that Peter does not say Christ was “their” Savior—he portrayed Him as “our” Savior. Thus, their “knowing” could have been nominal knowledge rather than saving belief, just as faith can be nonsalvific (cf. James 2:19). As we have seen, many believe that Christ is the Savior without making Him their Savior.

The persons in verse 22 are pictured as dogs (a symbol of the unsaved), not sheep (an image of the saved). Indeed, every description of them in this chapter speaks of those who do not belong to Christ: “false prophets,” “false teachers,” “[deniers of] the Lord,” “unjust,” “natural brute beasts,” those who have “forsaken the right way,” and those for whom “the mist of darkness is reserved for ever” (KJV).

2 Peter 3:17

“Therefore, dear friends ... be on your guard so that you may not be carried away by the error of lawless men and fall from your secure position.” This sounds very much like falling from one’s salvation, which is a secure position.

Upon examining the text, however, it is clear that the “fall” would be from a position of maturity (“steadfastness,” v. 17 KJV), not from salvation. The addressees are called “beloved” (vv. 14, 17 KJV), spiritual brothers of the apostle Paul (v. 15). Their potential failure was a loss of being able to “grow” (v. 18), not a lack of being saved.

2 John 1:8

John wrote to believers called spiritual “children” (1:2), saying: “Watch out that you do not lose what you have worked for, but that you may be rewarded fully.”

That this is speaking about loss of rewards is obvious from the emphasized words. They were warned about losing what they “worked for,” and salvation is not from works (cf. Rom. 4:5; Eph. 2:8–9; Titus 3:5–6).

Revelation 3:5

“He who overcomes will ... be dressed in white. I will never blot out his name from the book of life, but will acknowledge his name before my Father and his angels.” Some take this to imply that it is possible to have one’s name erased from the Book of Life—that is, those who do not overcome can lose their salvation.

In response, there are four other verses referring to the Book of Life (not counting Rev. 22:19 [see below], which may be rendered “tree of life”). Revelation 13:8 says, “All inhabitants of the earth will worship the beast—all whose names have not been written in the book of life belonging to the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world.” Revelation 20:12, 15 records:

I saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne, and books were opened. Another book was opened, which is the book of life. The dead were judged according to what they had done as recorded in the books.... If anyone’s name was not found written in the book of life, he was thrown into the lake of fire.

And Revelation 21:27 confirms: “Nothing impure will ever enter it, nor will anyone who does what is shameful or deceitful, but only those whose names are written in the Lamb’s book of life.”

Several noteworthy observations about these texts:

For one thing, John affirmed that anyone’s name, once written in the Book of Life, would never be erased (3:5). No believer, then, needs to fear losing salvation once he receives it.

Furthermore, as established previously, the names of the saved were written there from eternity (13:8); thus, there is literal eternal security for the elect. Once one knows that his name is there (viz., has personal assurance), he can be certain he will never lose his salvation.

In addition, as we have discussed, God indelibly entered the names of the elect into the Book of Life long before any of them did anything to either gain or lose salvation: He knows the end from the beginning (Isa. 46:10).

Hence, again, in His omniscient foreknowledge, God knew all sins that the elect would ever commit, yet He promised them everlasting life. He knew they would persevere, through everything, in their faith.

Therefore, rather than being denials of eternal security, these words from the Revelation are strong affirmations. The names of the elect are in the Book of Life (20:15), and God will never erase them (3:5).

Revelation 3:15–16

“I wish you were either [hot or cold]! So, because you are lukewarm—neither hot nor cold—I am about to spit you out of my mouth.” This caution from Jesus, which seemingly supports the Arminian view that God rejects those who reject Him, appears to be confirmed by the facts that (1) it was given “to the churches” (v. 22) and (2) that it references God’s warning to “chasten” (v. 19 KJV) any who do not repent of their sins.

In reply, even if true believers are in view, “spit you out” is not a phrase that speaks of hell. More likely it is addressed to those believers who have turned tepid in their walk with the Lord and need their fellowship restored.

This is reminiscent of another figure of speech (cf. John 15:4) where believers who are not abiding in Christ are said to wither on the vine and, hence, become useless to God. Jesus admonished, “If anyone does not remain in me, he is like a branch that is thrown away and withers; such branches are picked up, thrown into the fire and burned” (John 15:6). Notice He does not imply they are thrown by angels into the eternal flames (hell), but by men into a temporal “fire.” Paul spoke of such people as “castaways” (1 Cor. 9:27 KJV); they were like cracked vases that were put on the shelf because they were not serving their Master usefully.

Revelation 22:19

“If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book” (KJV). While some maintain that this indicates a loss of salvation, that conclusion does not follow for several reasons.

First, “book of life” is a disputed rendering; others (e.g. NIV,) render it “tree of life.” One should not use a disputed passage to prove a doctrine.

Second, John says elsewhere that God will not blot anyone’s name out of the book of life (Rev. 3:5).

Third, if “tree of life” is meant, then the warning is not about a loss of salvation but of rewards, for it’s not a question of whether they are in the holy city but what part they will have in it.

Fourth, if “book of life” is meant, then one can point to the indications that the warning is to unbelievers, since he also speaks of the “unjust” (v. 11) and those “outside” the city (v. 15). Regardless, it is not necessary to take this verse as proof that anyone can lose salvation.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR ETERNAL SECURITY

Eternal security is rooted in the Augustinian position on grace and predestination. However, before the Reformation, it was believed that only the elect, not all the regenerate, were secure. In its present formulation, eternal security of all the elect is a Reformation teaching, springing from John Calvin.<sup>47</sup>

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

Unless it had been God who had freely given salvation, we could never have possessed it securely. And unless man had been joined to God, he could never have become a partaker of incorruptibility. For it was incumbent upon the Mediator between God and men, by His relationship to both, to bring both to friendship and concord, and present man to God, while He revealed God to man. For, in what way could we be partakers of the adoption of sons? (AH, 1.3.18.7 in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF)

Clement of Alexandria (150–c. 215)

If one should captiously say, “And how is it possible for feeble flesh to resist the energies and spirits of the Powers?” well, let him know this, that, confiding in the Almighty and the Lord, we war against the principalities of darkness, and against death. “Whilst thou art yet speaking,” He says, “Lo, here am I.” See the invincible Helper who shields us. “Think it not strange, therefore, concerning the burning sent for your trial, as though some strange thing happened to you; but, as you are partakers in the sufferings of Christ, rejoice; that at the revelation of His glory ye may rejoice exultant. If ye be reproached in the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth on you.” As it is written, “Because for Thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us” (S, II.IV.VII).

Tertullian (c. 155–c. 225)

Tell me, is not all mankind one flock of God? Is not the same God both Lord and Shepherd of the universal nations? Who more “perishes” from God than the heathen, so long as he “errs?” Who is more “re-sought” by God than the heathen, when he is recalled by Christ? In fact, it is among heathens that this order finds antecedent place; if, that is, Christians are not otherwise made out of heathens than by being first “lost,” and “re-sought” by God, and “carried back” by Christ. So likewise ought this order to be kept, that we may interpret any such [figure] with reference to those in whom it finds prior place....

Nay, but this whole world is the one house of all; in which world it is more the heathen, who is found in darkness, whom the grace of God enlightens, than the Christian, who is already in God’s light. Finally, it is one “straying” which is ascribed to the ewe and the drachma (and this is an evidence in my favor); for if the parables had been composed with a view to a Christian sinner, after the loss of his faith, a second loss and restoration of them would have been noted....

I admit that the sinner portrayed in each parable is one who is already a Christian; yet not that on this account must he be affirmed to be ... one [that] can be restored, through repentance, from the crime of adultery and fornication. For although he be said to “have perished,” there will be the kind of perdition to treat; inasmuch as the “ewe” “perished” not by dying, but by straying; and the “drachma” not by being destroyed, but by being hidden. In this sense, a thing which is safe may be said to “have perished.” Therefore the believer, too, “perishes,” by lapsing out of [the right path]. (OM, IV.VIII)

Paul, when enumerating the innumerable causes which generally separate men from the love of Christ and from the love of God in Christ Jesus (to all of which, the love that was in himself rose superior), did not set down argument among the grounds of separation. For observe that he says, firstly: “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? (as it is written, ‘For Thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.’) Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us.”

And secondly, when laying down another series of causes which naturally tend to separate those who are not firmly grounded in their religion, he says: “For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.”

Now, truly, it is proper that we should feel elated because afflictions, or those other causes enumerated by Paul, do not separate us [from Christ]; but not that Paul and the other apostles, and any other resembling them, [should entertain that feeling], because they were far exalted above such things when they said, “In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us,” which is a stronger statement than that they are simply “conquerors.” But if it be proper for apostles to entertain a feeling of elation in not being separated from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord, that feeling will be entertained by them, because neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor any of the things that follow, can separate them from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. (AC, I.III–IV)

Medieval Fathers

Augustine (354–430)

When we come to Him, we come to the Father also, because through an equal an equal is known; and the Holy Spirit binds, and as it were seals us, so that we are able to rest permanently in the supreme and unchangeable Good. (OCD, 1.34)

Of two pious men, why to the one should be given perseverance unto the end, and to the other it should not be given, God’s judgments are even more unsearchable.... In respect of all these things, they were of us. Nevertheless, in respect of a certain other distinction, they were not of us, for if they had been of us, they certainly would have continued with us.... They were not of them because they had not been “called according to the purpose.” They had not been chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world; they had not gained a lot in him. They had not been predestined according to his purpose who works all things. (GP, 9:21)

In short, “By free will, since [unbelievers] have not received the gift of perseverance, they are sent away in God’s just and hidden judgment” (AG, 13).

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274)

Whether man possessed of grace needs the help of grace in order to persevere, I answer that Perseverance is taken in three ways. First, to signify a habit of the mind whereby a man stands steadfastly, lest he be moved by the assault of sadness from what is virtuous. And thus perseverance is to sadness as continence is to concupiscence and pleasure.... Secondly, perseverance may be called a habit, whereby a man has the purpose of persevering in good unto the end. And in both these ways perseverance is infused together with grace, even as continence and the other virtues are. Thirdly, perseverance is called the abiding in good to the end of life. And in order to have this perseverance man does not, indeed, need another habitual grace, but he needs the Divine assistance guiding and guarding him against the attacks of the passions, as appears from the preceding article. And hence after anyone has been justified by grace, he still needs to beseech God for the aforesaid gift of perseverance, that he may be kept from evil till the end of his life. For to many grace is given to whom perseverance in grace is not given. (ST, 1.2.109–10)

As Augustine says [ONG, xliii]: “In the original state man received a gift whereby he could persevere, but to persevere was not given him. But now, by the grace of Christ, many receive both the gift of grace whereby they may persevere, and the further gift of persevering.” ... Thus Christ’s gift is greater than Adam’s fault. Nevertheless it was easier for man to persevere, with the gift of grace in the state of innocence in which the flesh was not rebellious against the spirit, than it is now. For the restoration by Christ’s grace, although it is already begun in the mind, is not yet completed in the flesh, as it will be in heaven, where man will not merely be able to persevere but will be unable to sin. (ibid.)

Reformation Fathers

Although I had the merit of all saints, the holiness and purity of all virgins, and the piety of St. Peter besides, I would still consider my attainment nothing. Rather I must have a different foundation to build on, namely, these words: God has given His Son so that whosoever believe in Him whom that Father has sent of love shall be saved. And you must insist confidently (trotzen) that you will be preserved; and you must boldly take your stand on His words. (WLS, 67)

That I am to die and to be saved, I know for sure (praise God!), and neither the devil nor the gates of hell shall take this conviction from me.... This is certain; and miserable, aye, damned, is the person who allows this to be made uncertain to him. Since then, this is certain, we should not allow that other matter, which is uncertain, to worry us, namely how God will take us out of this life.... We should, therefore, not worry about this matter but should thank His grace day and night for the fact that we are taken care of after this life, (ibid., 372)

John Calvin (1509–1564)

When the Apostle says to the Philippians, “Being confident of this very thing, that he which has begun a good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ” (Phil. 1:6), there cannot be a doubt that by the good work thus begun, he means the very commencement of conversion in the will. God, therefore, begins the good work in us by exciting in our hearts a desire, a love, and a study of righteousness, or (to speak more correctly) by turning, training, and guiding our hearts unto righteousness; and he completes this good work by confirming us unto perseverance. (ICR, 1.2.3.6)

“That intermediate movement which the sophists imagine, a movement which every one is free to obey or to reject, is obviously excluded by the doctrine of effectual perseverance” (ibid., 1.2.3.10).

When we say that faith must be certain and secure, we certainly speak not of an assurance which is never affected by doubt, nor a security which anxiety never assails; we rather maintain that believers have a perpetual struggle with their own distrust, and are thus far from thinking that their consciences possess a placid quiet, uninterrupted by perturbation. On the other hand, whatever be the mode in which they are assailed, we deny that they fall off and abandon that sure confidence which they have formed in the mercy of God. (ibid., 1.3.2.17)

Paul says that, in the architecture of Christian doctrine, it is necessary to retain the foundation which he had laid with the Corinthians: “Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 3:11). What then is our foundation in Christ? Is it that he begins salvation and leaves us to complete it? Is it that he only opened up the way, and left us to follow it in our own strength? By no means, but as Paul had a little before declared, it is to acknowledge that he has been given us for righteousness. No man, therefore, is well founded in Christ who has not entire righteousness in him, since the Apostle says not that he was sent to assist us in procuring, but was himself to be our righteousness.

Thus, it is said that God “has chosen us in him before the foundation of the world,” not according to our merit, but “according to the good pleasure of his will”; that in him “we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins”; that peace has been made “through the blood of his cross”; that we are reconciled by his blood; that, placed under his protection, we are delivered from the danger of finally perishing; that thus ingrafted into him we are made partakers of eternal life, and hope for admission into the kingdom of God. (ibid., 1.2.15.5)

The whole, then, comes to this: As soon as the minutest particle of faith is instilled into our minds, we begin to behold the face of God placid, serene, and propitious; far off, indeed, but still so distinctly as to assure us that there is no delusion in it. (ibid., 1.3.2.19)

I deny not, as I lately said, that faith occasionally suffers certain interruptions when, by violent assault, its weakness is made to bend in this direction or in that; and its light is buried in the thick darkness of temptation. Still happen what may, faith ceases not to long after God. (ibid., 1.3.2.24)

Jacob Arminius (1560–1609)

Arminius never denied eternal security (his followers did), and he strongly affirmed the assurance of believers.

With regard to the certainty [or assurance] of salvation, my opinion is that it is possible for him who believes in Jesus Christ to be certain and persuaded, and, if his heart condemn him not, he is now in reality assured, that he is a son of God, and stands in the grace of Jesus Christ. Such a certainty is wrought in the mind, as well by the action of the Holy Spirit inwardly actuating the believer and by the fruits of faith, as from his own conscience, and the testimony of God’s Spirit witnessing together with his conscience. I also believe that it is possible for such a person, with an assured confidence in the grace of God and his mercy in Christ, to depart out of this life, and to appear before the throne of grace, without any anxious fear or terrific dread: and yet this person should constantly pray, “O Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant!” (WJA, 1.6).

My sentiments respecting the perseverance of the saints are that those persons who have been grafted into Christ by true faith, and have thus been made partakers of his life-giving Spirit, possess sufficient powers [or strength] to fight against Satan, sin, the world and their own flesh, and to gain the victory over these enemies—yet not without the assistance of the grace of the same Holy Spirit. Jesus Christ also by his Spirit assists them in all their temptations, and affords them the ready aid of his hand; and, provided they stand prepared for the battle, implore his help, and be not wanting to themselves, Christ preserves them from falling.... It is not possible for them, by any of the cunning craftiness or power of Satan, to be either seduced or dragged out of the hands of Christ....

Though I here openly and ingenuously affirm I never taught that a true believer can either totally or finally fall away from the faith, and perish; yet I will not conceal that there are passages of Scripture which seem to me to wear this aspect; and those answers to them which I have been permitted to see are not of such a kind as to approve themselves on all points to my understanding. On the other hand, certain passages are produced for the contrary doctrine of unconditional perseverance which are worthy of much consideration. (“PS” in WJA, I.254)

The Synod of Dort

Just as God himself is most wise, unchangeable, all-knowing, and almighty, so the election made by him can neither be suspended nor altered, revoked, or annulled; neither can his chosen ones be cast off, nor their number reduced. (CD, article 11)

Assurance of this, their eternal and unchangeable election to salvation, is given to the chosen in due time, though by various stages and in differing measure. Such assurance comes not by inquisitive searching into the hidden and deep things of God, but by noticing within themselves, with spiritual joy and holy delight, the unmistakable fruits of election pointed out in God's Word—such as a true faith in Christ, a childlike fear of God, a godly sorrow for their sins, a hunger and thirst for righteousness, and so on. (ibid., article 12)

In their awareness and assurance of this election God's children daily find greater cause to humble themselves before God, to adore the fathomless depth of his mercies, to cleanse themselves, and to give fervent love in return to him who first so greatly loved them, (ibid., article 13)

Post-Reformation Teachers

[One] effect attributed to faith in the Scriptures is security, or certainty of salvation. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16). "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life" (John 5:24). "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever" (John 6:51). "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.... And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:37, 40). "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand" [John 10:27–28] (ST, 3.110).

The whole of the eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans is designed to prove the certain salvation of all who believe. The proposition to be established is that there is "no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." That is, they can never perish; they can never be so separated from Christ as to come into condemnation. The Apostle's first argument to establish that proposition is that believers are delivered from the law by the sacrifice of Christ. The believer, therefore, is not under the law which condemns, as Paul had before said (Rom. 4:14)....

His second argument is that they have already within them the principle of eternal life. That principle is the Spirit of God; "the life-giving" as He was designated by the ancient Church. To be carnally minded is death....

The third argument for the security of believers is that they are the sons of God. As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. That is, they are partakers of his nature, the special objects of his love, and entitled to the inheritance which He gives. If sons then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. According to the Apostle's mode of thinking, that any of the sons of God should perish is impossible. If sons, they shall certainly be saved.

The fourth argument is from the purpose of God. Those whom He has predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son, them He calls to the exercise of faith and repentance; and whom He thus calls He justifies, He provides for them and imputes to them a righteousness which satisfies the demands of the law, and which entitles them in Christ and for his sake to eternal life; and those whom He justifies He glorifies. There is no flaw in this chain....

Paul's fifth argument is from the love of God. As stated above, the apostle argues from the greatness, the freeness, and the immutability of that love that its objects never can be lost. "He that spared not his Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?" "If He has done the greater, will He not do the less? If he gave even his Son, will He not give us faith to receive and constancy to persevere even unto the end?" A love so great as the love of God to his people cannot fail of its object....

The sixth argument of the Apostle is that as the love of God is infinitely great and altogether gratuitous, it is also immutable, and, therefore, believers shall certainly be saved. Hence the conclusion, "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

It will be seen that the Apostle does not rest the perseverance of the saints on the indestructible nature of faith, or on the imperishable nature of the principle of grace in the heart, or on the constancy of the believer's will, but solely on what is out of ourselves. Perseverance, he teaches us, is due to the purpose of God, to the work of Christ, to the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and to the primal source of all, the infinite, mysterious, and immutable love of God. We do not keep ourselves; we are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation. [1 Peter 1:5] (ibid., 3.110–18)

[The] eleven works of God demonstrate that a person who truly believes in Jesus Christ is eternally safe and will never lose his or her salvation. Four of these works relate to God the Father, three to God the Son, and four to God the Holy Spirit. The sovereign purpose of God.... The infinite power of God.... The immeasurable love of God.... The work of the Father.... The promise of the Son of God.... The Prayer of the Son of God.... The work of the Son of God.... The Holy Spirit regenerates us.... The Holy Spirit protects believers.... The Holy Spirit indwells His Church. The Holy Spirit seals His believers. (S, 190–200)

CONCLUSION

In contrast to Arminianism, moderate Calvinism demonstrates that there is strong biblical, theological, and historical support for the doctrine of eternal security. In distinction from the implication of strong Calvinism, moderate Calvinism shows that a believer can have real assurance that he is among the elect, that the issue is not his faithfulness but God's. Moderate Calvinists reject the view that there is security for the elect but no assurance that one is of the elect unless he endures.

In this regard, it is ironic that Arminians are more "Calvinistic" than strong Calvinists, for Arminianism holds that a believer can have assurance that he is now saved, even if he does not have security that he will ultimately be saved. By contrast, moderate Calvinism holds that we can have both present assurance and eternal security.

CHAPTER TWELVE

THE EXTENT OF SALVATION (LIMITED OR UNLIMITED ATONEMENT)

While there is wide evangelical agreement on the origin, nature, and purpose of the Atonement, there is considerable difference on its extent: Strong Calvinists maintain limited atonement, while the rest insist that the Atonement is unlimited in its availability. That is, the former believe that Christ died only for the elect, and the latter contend that Christ died for the sins of all human beings. Since this work defends the unlimited view of atonement, this chapter will begin with the evidence for that perspective and will then respond to the arguments for limited atonement.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR AN UNLIMITED ATONEMENT

The grounds for unlimited atonement fall into three categories: biblical, theological, and historical. We will begin with the biblical basis, addressing along with it the alternative textual understanding by strong Calvinists.

Isaiah 53:6

Isaiah wrote of the Messiah, “We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all.” The evident meaning of “all” is everyone in the human race since in the beginning of the sentence the same word all is used of those who go astray and are in need of salvation. Likewise, he uses the word many, which means all here and elsewhere (in Rom. 5:19), saying, “He bore the sins of many” (v. 12). Even John Calvin, commenting on this verse, said, “I approve of the ordinary reading, that he alone bore the punishment of many, because on him was laid the guilt of the whole world. It is evident from other passages, and especially from the fifth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, that many sometimes denotes “all.” (Calvin’s comments on Isaiah 53:12, emphasis added).

Matthew 22:14

Jesus said, “Many are called but few are chosen” (KJV). While God foreknew that only the elect would believe (Acts 13:48), He desired all people to be saved (2 Peter 3:9; 1 Tim. 2:4). Thus, “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son” (John 3:16 NKJV) to provide an atoning sacrifice for the sins of “the whole world” (1 John 2:2). God provided salvation for all and requires that all repent (Acts 17:30) and believe (Acts 16:31). It would be both deceptive and absurd for God to command everyone to be saved if He had not provided salvation for all.

Arguing for limited atonement, John Owen (1616–1683) offered the unlikely suggestion that “God’s commands and promises had revealed our duty, not his purpose; [that is, they revealed] what God would have us to do, and not what he will do” (DDDC, 200). However, this eloquent turn of phrase conceals hidden errors. For one thing, it implies that God commands the impossible, which would make the Omniscient irrational. For another, it overlooks the obvious, namely, that there is another alternative: God commands not only what He would have us to do but also what He desires (wills) to be done.

Matthew 23:37

Weeping over the city, Jesus lamented:

O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing.

How could it be more obvious that God wanted all of them, including the unrepentant, to be saved?

Extreme Calvinist John Gill (1697–1771) claimed that these words of Christ are to be understood not of gathering to salvation but only of gathering to hear Him preach and thus to be brought to historical faith “sufficient to preserve them from temporal ruin.” Likewise, the desire of Christ for them to come to Him “is not to be understood of his divine will... but of his human will, or of his will as a man; which ... [is] not always the same with [his divine will], nor always fulfilled.”

A clear exposition of this desperate interpretation is perhaps its most effective refutation: Its conclusion would have us believe that God’s concern for our temporal condition is greater than His concern for our eternal souls! Some try to blunt this result by maintaining that such a view merely confirms Jerusalem’s unwillingness to allow her “children” to respond positively, but this scarcely solves the problem. The truth remains: People who are not responding positively are doing so because of their unwillingness, not because God does not long for them to positively (willfully) respond to Him.

John 1:29

“The next day John saw Jesus coming toward him and said, ‘Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!’ ” In light of the context and other usage of the word world in John’s gospel, it is evident that the text does not mean only the church or the elect but all human beings. Again, Jesus said that “God so loved the world” that He gave His only Son, and He clarifies His use of world only three verses later: “This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil” (3:19). Jesus also said (16:8) that “when [the Holy Spirit] comes, he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment.”

Some extreme Calvinists have claimed that “often the Bible uses the words world and all in a restricted, limited sense.... It is clear that all is not ‘all’ ” (see Palmer, FPC, 52). In attempting to resist the biblical teaching of unlimited atonement, they cite passages (e.g., Luke 2:1–2) from another book, in another context, that use world in a geographical (rather than redemptive) sense. However, if all does not mean “all” in regard to God’s desire for our salvation, then what does it mean in Romans 3:23? “All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God.” Every human has sinned; evil is clearly not restricted to the elect.

John 3:16–17

God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him.

The plain statement is that God loved the world, and the clear implication is that Christ was given to die for the world (cf. v. 14). What is more, verse 17 makes it evident that world here means the whole fallen world, for it is the same world that is under God’s condemnation.

John Owen offered an astoundingly blunt retranslation on behalf of limited atonement: “God so loved his elect throughout the world, that he gave his Son with this intention, that by him believers might be saved” (DDDC, 214). For those who accept the clear meaning of the text, this needs only God’s own reminder: “Do not add to what I command you and do not subtract from it” (Deut. 4:2; cf. Rev. 22:18–19).

John 12:47

“I did not come to judge the world, but to save the world.” In both cases, world signifies the same fallen, sinful world that will be judged in “the last day” (v. 48).

As elsewhere, strong Calvinists claim that world is used in a limited sense, meaning “part of the world,” namely, the elect. They point to John 12:19 as an illustration: “The Pharisees said to one another, ‘See, this is getting us nowhere. Look how the whole world has gone after him!’ ” Nonetheless, this comparison fails.

For one thing, world in John 12:19 (Gk: kosmos) is used geographically, not generically.

For another, these are not the words of Jesus but of His opponents.

Furthermore, the words of the brothers of Jesus in John 7:4 are obviously hyperbole, and even extreme Calvinists admit this is not true of John 12:47, where it is Jesus’ statement that does refer to the whole fallen world.

Romans 5:6

Paul writes, “Christ died for the ungodly,” and in verse 10 he adds, “When we were God’s enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son.” Both the elect and the non-elect were ungodly enemies; therefore, either Christ died for the non-elect as well as for the elect, or Christ did not die for all His ungodly enemies. Further, if Paul meant to teach that Christ died only for the elect, he could easily have said so and thus avoided any potential misunderstanding.

The response of particularists (proponents of limited atonement) is that indefinite is not to be confused with unlimited (or universal). This misses the point: The issue is not whether everyone is actually saved but whether the sacrifice of Jesus made salvation available to all. For instance, Paul affirms that God “justifies the ungodly” (Rom. 4:5 NKJV), yet no one in this dispute believes that all the ungodly are actually justified. The context of Romans 5 indicates that Paul is speaking of all and all men as lost (5:12) and in need of salvation (v. 5:18).

Romans 5:18–19

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous.

Once again, observe the following comparison:

Person	Adam	Christ
Act	Sin (vv. 12, 14, 16) Offense (vv. 15–18)	Grace (v. 15) Righteousness (v. 18)

	Disobedience (v. 19)	Obedience (v. 19)
Physical results	Death for all (vv. 12, 14–15, 17)	Life for all (vv. 17–18, 21)
Moral results	Sin enters for all (v. 12) Sin reigns on all (v. 21)	Grace enters for all (v. 15) Grace reigns for all (v. 21)
Legal results	All made sinners (v. 19) Judgment for all (v. 18)	All made righteous (v. 19) Gift for all (v. 18)

Verse 18 makes a direct contrast between those who were condemned because of Adam’s sin and those who were provided life by Christ’s death. In both cases they are called all men. Hence, by every valid rule of interpreting a phrase—by the same author, in the same book, in the same context, in the same passage, and in direct parallel—the all men for whom Christ provided salvation is the entire human race who received condemnation as a result of Adam’s disobedience.

Paul’s reiteration of the point in verse 19 through the term the many clearly means “all,” because:

- (1) It is used in parallel with all (in v. 18);
- (2) It is the many in contrast to the few, not the many in contrast to the all; and
- (3) It is the many that is used of all in verse 15—or else we would have to conclude that only some humans die because of human sin, which is contrary to what Paul affirms in this very text (cf. v. 12).

Attempts to avoid this conclusion are even less convincing than those on other texts. Some otherwise articulate commentators don’t truly address the point of what all means. John Gill’s assertions are contradictory, since he refers to “both as extending to the whole of their several respective offspring—condemnation through Adam’s offense to all his natural seed, and justification of life through Christ’s righteousness to all his spiritual seed—the text makes no such distinction” (EONT, on Rom. 5:18). The passage does not say this; rather, it says all men, not merely all the elect, benefit from Christ’s death. Insisting that only some people benefit from the work of Christ clearly is reading limited atonement into the text—all men means everyone.

Others, like John Calvin himself, saw that Paul’s words taught unlimited atonement:

Paul makes grace common to all men, not because it in fact extends to all, but because it is offered to all. Although Christ suffered for the sins of the world, and is offered without distinction to all men, yet not all receive Him. (CC, 8.117–18)

Paul’s contrast of Adam and Christ reveals that the Atonement is both unlimited in its extent and limited in its application. That is, all are savable, but only those who believe will be saved. Paul twice uses the word justification<sup>9</sup> to describe what Christ provided for all human beings:

The judgment followed one sin and brought condemnation, but the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification. ... Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. (Rom. 5:16, 18)

Since it is scripturally evident that not all people will be saved, Paul must have meant, as already established, that because of what Christ did for them, everyone is potentially justifiable, not actually justified.

First, he clearly declares that some of the consequences of Adam's sin (such as physical death) are passed on to all human beings (5:12–14).

Second, as mentioned previously, the phrase “not like” (vv. 15–16) shows that the parallel is not exact.

Third, the phrase “those who receive” (v. 17) implies that not all do receive the gift of salvation and that only those who do will be saved.

Fourth, all of this fits with the context of the preceding chapter (cf. 4:3–5), which declares, as does the first verse of this chapter (5:1), that salvation only comes to those who believe.

Fifth, and finally, if the phrase “made righteous” (v. 19) is taken as actual, then universalism follows. Universalism is unbiblical; hence, everything on the right side of the chart above (under “Christ”) is potential for all persons: It is available for (offered to) all, but is only appropriated by (received by) some.

2 Corinthians 5:14–19

According to the apostle Paul,

Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died.... God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men's sins against them.... And he died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again, (vv. 14, 19, 15)

From this it seems evident that this reconciliation of all (“the world”) did not guarantee the salvation but the savability of all. Paul goes on to say that on the basis of what Christ accomplished through the Cross, we must still plead with the world: “We are therefore Christ's ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us. We implore you on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God” (2 Cor. 5:20). Thus, reconciliation by Christ makes salvation possible (v. 14); it is our faith that makes it actual.

In spite of this, strong Calvinist Edwin Palmer (d. 1980) seems to have imposed his own theological system onto the text:

Obviously, the all in both cases means all the believers—not the whole world, reprobate as well as elect.... The “all died” refers to the spiritual death of the believer.... [Hence,] the “all died” cannot refer to the natural death of all men, for Christ's death is not the cause of man's physical death. (FPC, 49)

This interpretation is eisegetical and extremely unlikely.

First, whatever the “all died” means in 2 Corinthians 5:14, it is clear that Paul identifies the object of Christ's reconciliation in verse 19 as “the world,” not believers only (or “the elect”).

Second, verse 15 contrasts the “those who live” (Christians) with the “all” for whom Christ died: “He died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves.”

Third, the connection in verse 14 between the “one [Christ] died for all” and the “all [who] died” is to show why Christ's love should compel us to reach them with a message of reconciliation, pleading with “the world” to be reconciled to God (vv. 19–20). Paul isn't teaching about our spiritual death but about our compassion for “the world,” which is spiritually dead and needs to be restored to a right relationship with God.

1 Timothy 2:3–4

“God our Savior ... wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth.” Even Charles Spurgeon (1834–1892), who believed in limited atonement, found it difficult to deny the clear meaning of 1 Timothy 2:3–4. Nonetheless, this text has been widely misconstrued by extreme Calvinists rooted in the later Augustine. Spurgeon summarized their attempts to avoid the obvious:

[Here is how] our older Calvinistic friends deal with this text. “All men,” say they—“that is, some men”: as if the Holy Ghost could not have said “some men” if he had meant some men. “All men,” say they—“that is, some of all sorts of men”: as if the Lord could not have said “All sorts of men” if he had meant that. The Holy Ghost by the apostle has written “all men,” and unquestionably he means “all men” (“CT” as cited by Iain Murray, SHC, 150).

Spurgeon added,

I was reading just now the exposition of a very able doctor who explains the text so as to explain it away: he applies grammatical gunpowder to it, and explodes it by way of expounding it. I thought when I read his exposition that it would have been a very capital comment upon the text if it had read, “Who will not have all men to be saved, nor come to a knowledge of the truth” (in ibid., 151).

Of course, the problem is that this is what the text should say if limited atonement were true—but it does not. Spurgeon was aware of his apparent inconsistency here, saying, “I do not know how that squares with this,” and adding, “I would sooner a hundred times over appear to be inconsistent with myself than be inconsistent with the word of God.”

1 Timothy 2:6

Paul affirms that Christ “gave himself as a ransom for all men—the testimony given in its proper time.” Whatever doubts one may have about Mark 10:45, it is plain here (in 1 Tim. 2) that Christ is a ransom for all. That is, He paid the price with His own precious blood (1 Peter 1:19) for the sins of everyone.

John Owen, who again offered the standard particularist view that all does not mean “all,” tactically diverted the issue to other passages where all is used geographically or hyperbolically. However, no one has produced a single biblical text where all is used limitedly or narrowly when it applies to a generic or redemptive (rather than geographic or hyperbolic) sense. At any rate, even if they had, the interpretation here, in 1 Timothy 2, must be determined by what it means in this context, regardless of what all may be intended to mean anywhere else. That Paul refers to the entire human race in 1 Timothy 2:4–6 is amply evidenced.

First, he could have chosen to use the word some, but he did not.

Second, his reference to men in verse 5 is clearly generic—meaning “all people”—since it is used as the opposite pole from God that the Mediator, Jesus Christ, brings together with Him. Generic utilizations of all in a redemptive context are usually, if not always, of the entire human race.

Third, God’s desire for “all” to be saved is parallel with that same desire expressed elsewhere (cf. 2 Peter 3:9).

Fourth, and finally, the Bible tells us that what hinders God’s desire from being fulfilled is not the lack of a universal scope in His love (cf. John 3:16) but rather the willful rejection of Him by some of His creatures (Matt. 22:37).

1 Timothy 4:10

“For this we labor and strive, that we have put our hope in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, and especially of those who believe.” This verse does not support limited atonement because the limited group is designated by the phrase “especially of those who believe.” These are the elect to whom the blessings are actual, since they “believe” and, hence, have had the benefits of Christ’s death applied to them. The word believe indicates that this text is to be understood soteriologically; thus, those who believe in Christ as Savior are the ones who are actually (not just potentially) saved (cf. Acts 16:31).

The outside or broader group is called “all men.” Since Paul clearly refers to more than the elect, there is no reason to believe it is any less than what he says—all. Christ is, in one sense, the Savior of everyone; however, as we have seen, He cannot be actually the Savior of all, since all are not saved. Indeed, Paul has just urged prayer for “all men” (v. 1 KJV), because God “desires all men to be saved” (v. 4). Therefore, because Christ died for all, it seems reasonable to conclude that all are saved potentially.

Some proponents of limited atonement don’t respond to this reasoning at all. Those who do often say things similar to the words of John Gill: “[Jesus] is the ‘Savior of all men’ in a providential way, giving them being and breath, upholding them in their beings, preserving their lives, and indulging them with the blessings and mercies of life.” Gill added, without support: “That he is the Savior of all men, with a spiritual and everlasting salvation, is not true in fact” (EONT, on 1 Tim. 4:10). This implausible interpretation is ruled out:

- (1) By its comparison to those who “believe” unto salvation;
- (2) By the reference to the “promise of the life to come” in the immediate context (v. 8);
- (3) By the standard New Testament meaning of the word Savior;
- (4) By the earlier reference to pray for the salvation of all men (2:1–2);
- (5) By the reference to Christ as the salvific Mediator (2:5);
- (6) By the whole context of 1 Timothy (e.g., 1:1; 2:3–6), which is speaking about spiritual salvation, not social preservation; and
- (7) By all the verses (given above) that support the unlimited provision (not application) of salvation.

Only raw theological dogmatism could be bold enough to contradict the plain meaning of this text: Christ’s redemptive work was for everyone.

Hebrews 2:9

“We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, now crowned with glory and honor because he suffered death, so that by the grace of God he might taste death for everyone.” It is plain from this that Christ died for everyone, not only the elect.

Responses to this conclusion follow the same line as those just discussed; it will suffice to add here only a few words about the context. First of all, it is a generic use of everyone (humanity), as is indicated not only by the contrast of humans to angels (2:7) but also by the reference to human “flesh and blood” (i.e., infleshed human nature—v. 14). Also, since the result of the death (and resurrection) of Christ destroys death and defeats the devil (v. 14), it must have reference to all of Adam’s race; otherwise, Christ would not have been victorious in reversing what Satan did. His victory would not have been complete, and therefore, God could not have been propitiated (satisfied) with His offering—but He is (2:17; cf. Rom 3:25; 1 John 4:10).

2 Peter 2:1

Here Peter speaks of Christ purchasing the redemption even of those who are apostate. Since all Calvinists agree that those who have truly been saved will never lose their salvation—and since this passage speaks clearly of lost persons—when Peter affirms that Christ “bought” these lost souls, he means the Atonement is not limited to the elect:

There were also false prophets among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you. They will secretly introduce destructive heresies, even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them—bringing swift destruction on themselves.

As mentioned previously, the terms used to describe these individuals leave little doubt that they are lost souls—none of these are scriptural descriptions of the elect. What is more, even though for them “the nether gloom of darkness has been reserved” (v. 17 RSV), it is these apostate, reprobate, non-elects that Christ “bought” with his own precious blood! (cf. 1 Peter 1:19).

John Owen skillfully but unsuccessfully attempted to shift the burden of proof onto those who acknowledge that (1) Lord (Gk: despotan) refers to Christ and/or that (2) bought (Gk: agorazo) refers to our salvific redemption (DDDC, 250–56).

As to the first point, Owen admitted that Lord is used elsewhere of Christ, and, as a matter of fact, other than the few times it is used of earthly masters (cf. 1 Tim. 6:1–2; Titus 2:9; 1 Peter 2:18), all other instances of despotan refer to Christ or God the Father. In the parallel book of Jude (v. 4), the reference is made clear:

Certain men whose condemnation was written about long ago have secretly slipped in among you. They are godless men, who change the grace of our God into a license for immorality and deny Jesus Christ our only Sovereign and Lord [despotan].

Two truths are evident: one, Jude is speaking of Christ, and two, Jude is speaking in a redemptive context, not just of earthly deliverance from the corruption of idolatry (as Owen suggests). Owen, in disputing that despotan refers to Jesus in 2 Peter 2:1, still affirmed that the word Lord is used of God, which amounts to the same thing. The Bible also speaks of God’s blood that was shed for our salvation (Acts 20:28), and even if it technically was not, since Christ is God, His blood is the blood of God in the same sense that the blood of Mary is the blood of the mother of God (cf. Luke 1:43). Christ’s blood is the blood of the person (Jesus) who is God, and Mary was the human mother of the person (Jesus) who is God.

As to the second point (whether bought [Gk: agorazo] refers to Christ’s redemptive work), why should the lost ones be lost unless they had denied Christ’s atoning sacrifice on their behalf? Other than when it signifies the buying of physical things (cf. Matt. 13:44; 21:12), agorazo is almost always used redemptively in the New Testament (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:1; 6:20; 7:23; Rev. 5:9) and never of socially redeeming a person from the pollution of idolatry (which is what Owen said Peter meant in verse 1). In the Revelation, John recorded:

No one could learn the song [of redemption] except the 144,000 who had been redeemed from the earth. These are those who did not defile themselves with women, for they kept themselves pure. They follow the Lamb wherever he goes. They were purchased from among men and offered as firstfruits to God and the Lamb. (14:3–4)

Consequently, in view of this predominant usage, the burden of proof rests on the extreme Calvinist to demonstrate that Peter, in this case, is not using agorazo in a redemptive sense.

2 Peter 3:9

God is love and as such, “He is not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance” (NKJV). Indeed, He “wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4). Contrary to the interpretation of those who hold to limited atonement, this does not mean “all classes of men” (viz., “the elect from all nations”). What meaning can language truly have if any, all men, and the whole world (cf. 1 John 2:2) are taken to represent only “some” or “a few”?

There are some who attempt to avoid the obvious impact of these verses by creating the artificial distinction that Christ died for all people without distinction but not all people without exception (Steele and Thomas, FPC, 46). This is merely a clever euphemism of their naked claim that all really means “some”—a distortion, again, that they would not tolerate in verses speaking of condemnation rather than salvation, such as Romans 3:23. Further, as we shall see, there is no basis in these texts to support such an interpretation.

Others, like R. C. Sproul (b. 1939), offer the even less plausible suggestion that “God does not will that any of us (the elect) perish.” God the Holy Spirit is unquestionably capable of saying some instead of all, if that is what He meant. He did not: “All people everywhere” are called upon to repent (Acts 17:30). Is it not absolutely absurd to suggest that “all people everywhere” actually means “some people everywhere” or “some people somewhere”?

“He [Christ] is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world.” It is difficult to see how anyone, without already established theology to the contrary, could come to the conclusion that this verse does not support unlimited atonement.

John Calvin (1509–1564), whose untenable claim that world (Gk: kosmos) here refers to “the Christian world” (the elect), somehow came to this eisegetical understanding: “Under the word all [John the apostle] does not include the reprobate, but refers to all who would believe and those who were scattered through various regions of the earth” (CC, 244). As already observed, one need only consult the generic (general, unlimited) usage of kosmos in John’s writings to confirm that he speaks here of the fallen, sinful world (cf. John 1:10–11; 3:19). In fact, John himself defines his use of kosmos only a few verses later:

Do not love the world or anything in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For everything in the world—the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting of what he has and does—comes not from the Father but from the world. (1 John 2:15–16)

This transparent description of fallen, sinful humanity clearly includes the non-elect for whom Christ died (v. 2). Later, John adds: “We know that we are children of God, and that the whole world is under the control of the evil one” (5:19). It goes far beyond the strain of one’s credulity to somehow conclude that kosmos in 1 John 2 refers only to the elect; if that interpretation is correct, only those whom God has chosen are under the power of the devil!

The doctrine of limited atonement claims that all for whom Christ died will be saved. However, the above passages and many others reveal, in contrast to limited atonement, that Christ did die for all and not all will be saved (e.g., cf. Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10). Therefore, it obviously follows that not all for whom Christ died will be saved, and the doctrine of limited atonement is apparently contradictory to the teaching of Scripture.

ANSWERING ALLEGED BIBLICAL OBJECTIONS TO UNLIMITED ATONEMENT

In spite of strong and repeated New Testament emphasis that Christ died for the sins of the entire world, proponents of limited atonement offer several passages that they believe support their view. A careful contextual examination reveals that evidence is lacking.

The Objection That Ephesians 1:4 Teaches Limited Atonement

“He chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight.” The Bible also asserts that Christ was “the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world” (Rev. 13:8 NKJV). From this it is argued that the Lamb was sacrificed only for the elect; to have died for anyone else would be a waste of His precious blood, for only the elect will be saved.

Response

That only believers were chosen in Christ before time began does not mean Jesus did not die for everyone. As we have previously established, God knows all things beforehand (Isa. 46:10) and thus knew exactly who would believe. Peter explicitly says that we “have been chosen according to the foreknowledge of God the Father” (1 Peter 1:2), and Paul affirms that “those God foreknew he also predestined” (Rom. 8:29). The Atonement is limited in its application, but it is unlimited in its extent. There is nothing in Ephesians 1:4 that teaches otherwise.

The Objection That 1 Corinthians 15:3 Teaches Limited Atonement

“What I received I passed on to you as of first importance: that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures” (cf. John 10:11; Rom. 4:25; 2 Cor. 5:21). The point made by extreme Calvinists is that when the Bible says Christ died for someone, it is pointedly limiting His work on the cross to only that group (believers): “lays down his life for the sheep” (John 10:11); “he chose us” (Eph. 1:4). Hence, it is said that the object of Christ’s death is only those who do or will believe in Him (cf. John 20:29; Gal. 1:3–4; Titus 2:14; 1 Peter 3:18).

Response

Once again, few New Testament truths are more evident than that God loves the world (John 3:16), that Christ died for the sins of all (cf. 1 John 2:2; 2 Peter 2:1), and that God desires everyone to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4–6; 2 Peter 3:9). The fact that only believers (the elect) are mentioned in some passages as the object of Christ’s death does not prove the Atonement is limited.

First, when the Bible uses terms like we, our, or us when speaking of the Atonement, it speaks of those to whom it has been applied, not of all those for whom it was provided. And in so doing, Scripture does not thereby limit the potential application of the Atonement to all people.

Second, the fact that Jesus loves and died for the church (Eph. 5:25) does not mean that God therefore does not also love the whole world (John 3:16) and desire everyone to be part of His bride (1 Tim. 4:4–6).

Third, this reasoning overlooks the passages declaring that Jesus died for more than the elect (e.g., John 3:16; Rom. 5:6; 5:18–19; 2 Cor. 5:19).

The Objection That John 5:21 Teaches Limited Atonement

“Just as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, even so the Son gives life to whom he is pleased to give it.” The inference of extreme Calvinists is that Christ gives spiritual life only to the elect, proving that the extent of the Atonement is limited (see Steele and Thomas, FPC, 51).

Response

First, John 5:21 makes no reference to the elect.

Second, the phrase “to whom he is pleased” does not mean Jesus wants to give life only to some; if it did, it would contradict the clear teaching of other Johannine statements (e.g., John 3:16; 1 John 2:2) as well as letters from other authors (e.g., Heb. 2:9; 2 Peter 2:1). All Calvinists believe that the Bible does not contradict itself.

Third, if John 5:21 referred only to the elect, it would be contrary to the context here, since Jesus said He would raise “all who are in their graves” (5:28), both saved and unsaved (v. 29).

Fourth, and finally, even if John 5:21 does refer only to the elect being regenerated (since only they believe), the Atonement is not shown to be limited in extent, for God loves all (John 3:16) and desires that all be saved (Matt. 23:37). The point of the passage is not to limit Jesus’ love but to show that His resurrection power is unlimited.

The Objection That John 6:37 Teaches Limited Atonement

Jesus said, “All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away.” Particularists argue that this verse is mistranslated, that whoever means “the ones coming to Christ,” namely, only the ones whom the Father has given Him.

Response

First, even granting this point grammatically does not establish the particularist view theologically; it would merely affirm that all of the elect will come to Christ. It says nothing about whether Christ died for more than the elect or how the elect will come to Him, i.e., whether unwillingly forced by irresistible grace or willingly (freely) by God’s persuasive and effectual grace. Bernard of Clairvaux said, “If there is no free will, there is nothing to save; if there is no free grace, there is nothing with which to save” (as cited in Ellicott, ECWB, 6.429).

Second, it should be carefully noted that the text does not say Christ died only for those whom the Father gives to Him. Indeed, if it did, it would contradict John and the rest of Scripture in the affirmations that God loves the world (cf. John 3:16), that Christ died for the sins of the world (cf. John 1:29), that the Holy Spirit is convicting the world of sin (cf. John 16:7–8), and that God desires everyone in the world to be saved (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4).

Third, the context itself indicates that those who come to Christ will be those who believe. Verse 40 says, “My Father’s will is that everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.” Therefore, those whom the Father gives will believe, and all who believe will be those whom the Father gives. Again, God’s Word repeatedly calls upon all persons, not just the elect, to believe (cf. John 3:16, 36; Acts 16:31; 17:30; etc.).

The Objection That John 17:9 Teaches Limited Atonement

“I pray for them. I am not praying for the world, but for those you have given me, for they are yours.” The “them” in this verse is plainly a reference to Christ’s disciples (v. 6), and extreme Calvinists claim that this is an explicit denial by Jesus Himself that He prayed for the “world” of unbelievers. If true, this would support the argument that the Atonement is limited to the elect (the only ones for whom Christ prayed), for if He had prayed for more (or even all), then more (or all) would have been saved, since God would not reject the prayer of His own Son.

Response

First, that Christ prayed only for the elect in this passage doesn’t prove that He never prayed for the non-elect. If, as even extreme Calvinists accept, Jesus could have received negative answers to His prayers (cf. Gill, CGT, 1.87–88, 2.77), why would John 17:9 demonstrate by necessity that He didn’t also pray for those who would not believe? John himself later implies that the biblical authors recorded only a fraction of the things that Jesus did (21:25).

Second, there is recorded evidence that Christ prayed for non-elect persons; for instance, His request that His Father “forgive them; for they know not what they do” (Luke 23:34 KJV) could have included such people. Further, Luke includes Jesus’ indirect prayer for the world, in which He directs us to “pray [that] the Lord of the harvest [will] send out laborers into His harvest” (10:2 NKJV), even though He knew that not all would be saved (Matt. 13:28–30).

Third, even if Jesus did not pray for the non-elect, other New Testament passages reveal that Paul did, and he exhorted us to do the same: “Brothers, my heart’s desire and prayer to God for the Israelites is that they may be saved” (Rom. 10:1). “I urge . . . that requests, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for everyone” (1 Tim. 2:1).

Fourth, and finally, Christ’s praying or not praying for the non-elect does not nullify His love for them or His death for their sins. His specific prayer for those who would become believers (v. 20) no more demonstrates that He doesn’t love the world than my saying “I pray daily for my children” proves that I don’t love the world’s children. My own have a special place in my prayers, just as Christ’s disciples had a special place in His. The important truth is that God wants everyone to become His child (cf. Matt. 23:39; 1 Tim. 2:4–6; 2 Peter 3:9).

The Objection That Ephesians 5:25 Teaches Limited Atonement

“Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her.” The focus of Christ’s love in this passage is the church, not the “unchurched”; Paul does not say that Christ loved “the world” and gave Himself up for her.

Response

Christ loves the church—no argument there. However, this fact does not conversely demonstrate that He doesn’t love the world. For one logical instance, that I love my children does not mean I don’t love children who are not mine; “I love my children and would die for them” puts specific focus on my love for them, but it doesn’t mean I wouldn’t help save the lives of other children.

In addition, Christ’s bride—the church—is a corpus of all persons who accept Him (John 1:12) and are baptized by the Holy Spirit into one body (1 Cor. 12:13). The door of the true church is open to all who will enter and join themselves to this special group that experiences His special love: “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ And let him who hears say, ‘Come!’ Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take the free gift of the water of life” (Rev. 22:17).

The Objection That Romans 5:15 Teaches Limited Atonement

If the many died by the trespass of the one man, how much more did God’s grace and the gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, overflow to the many! ... Just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous, (vv. 15, 19)

Extreme Calvinists argue that in both cases the benefit of Christ’s death is only for “the many” [the elect], not for “all” (cf. Heb. 9:28).

Response

As we have seen, it is noteworthy that the term many in Romans 5 is used in contrast with one (Adam or Christ) rather than in contrast to all. The fact that many is interchangeable with all is evident because:

- (1) The term all is used in this same passage (vv. 12, 18) as interchangeable with many;
- (2) On one occasion the two terms refer to the same thing—the “many died” in verse 15 refers to the same thing as the death came to “all men” in verse 12;
- (3) The contrast is between “one” and “all” (v. 18), Just as it is between “one” and “many” (v. 19).
- (4) If many means only “some” (as in limited atonement), then only some people, not all, are condemned because of Adam’s sin (v. 19). Yet all true Calvinists believe in the universality of sin. By the same logic, with the same word, in the same verse, they should likewise believe in the universal extent of the Atonement.

The Objection That Mark 10:45 Teaches Limited Atonement

“Even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many.” Extreme Calvinists insist that, logically, if Christ died for all, then all should be saved, for if Christ’s death substituted for the sins of all, then the debt is paid, and all are free. The Bible teaches that not all will be saved;<sup>36</sup> therefore, extreme Calvinists argue that Christ, in Mark 10:45, said “many” to signify that His death would not be a substitutionary ransom for the sins of all humankind.

Response

First, the conclusion that Christ did not offer Himself for everyone is not really an exposition of these passages (which say nothing about the Atonement being limited) but rather a speculative inference.

Second, the inference is not logically necessary. That a benefactor purchases a gift and offers it freely does not mean the intended receiver must receive it. Similarly, that Christ paid for our sins does not mean we must accept the forgiveness that was bought by His blood.

Third, as with Romans 5 (see above), the word many is inclusive: It is many as opposed to few, not many in contrast to all. Jesus said, “Many [all] are called but few chosen” (Matt. 20:16 NKJV).

Fourth, and finally, that Christ’s death made everyone savable does not thereby mean everyone is saved. The sacrifice for all made salvation possible but not actual—we receive justification by faith. This is not difficult to understand: Even though the elect were chosen in Christ before creation (Rev. 13:8; Eph. 1:4), they were not positionally saved until they were regenerated and justified. Before the chronological moment of regeneration, the elect were not saved but savable. Once again, salvation can be provided for all without its being applied to all. Jesus placed the Bread of Life on the world’s table, even though not everyone wills to be made full, and the Water of Life is flowing for “whoever” will drink (John 4:14), even though many refuse to quench their thirst.

The Objection That Romans 9:11–13 Teaches Limited Atonement

Before the twins [Jacob and Esau] were born or had done anything good or bad—in order that God’s purpose in election might stand: not by works but by him who calls—she [Rebekah] was told, “The older will serve the younger.” Just as it is written: “Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated.”

This passage appears to say that God not only loves the elect but that He hates the non-elect.

Response

We have already addressed this passage in regard to God’s omnibenevolence, and few verses are more misused by extreme Calvinists (especially those who hold to double-predestination).

First, again, God is not speaking about the individual Jacob but the nation of Jacob (Israel). In Genesis, when the prophecy was given (25:23 NKJV), Rebekah was told, “Two nations are in your womb, two peoples shall be separated from your body ... and the older shall serve the younger.” The reference is not to individual election but to the corporate election of the chosen nation (Israel).

Second, despite the corporate election of the Israelite nation, each individual had to accept the Messiah, by faith, to receive God’s salvation (cf. Rom. 11:20). Paul said, “I could wish that I myself were cursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, those of my own race, the people of Israel” (Rom. 9:3–4; cf. 10:1).

Third, God’s “love” for Jacob and “hate” for Esau is directed to the nations of Jacob (Israel) and Esau (Edom). What is more, Paul, in Romans 9:13, is speaking of them not before they were born (c. 2000 B.C.) but long after they lived—the citation is not from Genesis but from Malachi 1:2–3 (c. 400 B.C.). The deeds of the evil Edomites, perpetrated upon the Israelites, are well documented (e.g., Numbers 20), and even though it was for these actions that God “hated” them as a nation, Scripture does not teach that no Edomites would be saved. In fact, the Bible says there were believers from both Edom (cf. Amos 9:12) and the neighboring country of Moab (cf.

Ruth 1), as there will be people in heaven from every tribe, kindred, nation, and tongue (Rev. 7:9).

Fourth, the word translated into English as hated means “loved less.” To reillustrate, Scripture says that Jacob “loved also Rachel more than Leah.... And when the LORD saw that Leah was hated...” (Gen. 29:30–31 KJV). Similarly, Jesus said, “If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother ... he cannot be my disciple” (Luke 14:26). A parallel idea is expressed in Matthew 10:37: “Anyone who loves his father or mother more than me is not worthy of me.”

Fifth, and finally, the statement “I will have mercy on whom I have mercy” (Rom. 9:15; cf. Ex. 33:19) should be understood as intensive, not limiting. That is, the emphasis is on the intensity of the merciful action, not on the limits of its object. Clearly God loves all (cf. John 3:16; 1 John 2:2; 1 Tim. 2:4) and even “bore with great patience the objects of his wrath” (Rom. 9:22), waiting for them to repent (2 Peter 3:9).

Romans 9, then, does not teach that God hates the non-elect (or even that He does not love them) but instead that His love for those who do receive salvation is so amazing—so splendid, so magnificent—that His love for those who reject it looks like hatred by comparison.

The same loving stroke that makes a kitten purr seems like an expression of hatred if she turns the opposite direction and finds that her fur is being rubbed the wrong way. God’s expressed love is the same for both believer and unbeliever: The believer is already experiencing God’s love, while the Lord is patiently waiting for the unbeliever to repent (i.e., to turn his life in the right direction—toward Him) so that he can experience it as well.

“God is love” (1 John 4:16), and, as extensively demonstrated, while love can morally constrain (2 Cor. 5:14), it cannot physically compel. Love operates persuasively but never coercively. Once again, “forced love” is a contradiction in terms—forced love is not love, but assault. As I have said elsewhere, there are no shotgun weddings in heaven, and God is not a “Cosmic B. F. Skinner” who behaviorally modifies unwilling humans. If He could do so without violating both His integrity and the freedom He has given us, then everyone would be saved (2 Peter 3:9).

The Objection That 1 Corinthians 15:22 Teaches Limited Atonement

“For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive.” Some extreme Calvinists claim that all in this case must mean only the elect:

Although it is clear that every person in the world died in Adam (Rom. 5:12), it is equally clear that everybody in the world has not died in Christ. There are many people who have not been crucified in Christ. They hate Him. (Palmer, FPC, 53, emphasis added)

Somehow, “all will be made alive” is supposed to support limited atonement.

Response

There are at least three reasons why 1 Corinthians 15:22 does not teach that the extent of the Atonement is limited.

First, all means “all.” All does not mean “some.”

Second, there is a tight logical connection between the two alls in this verse, and it is generally acknowledged that the first all means “all fallen human beings.”

Third, the text is not even speaking about salvation but about the resurrection of everyone (“all will be made alive”). Some are resurrected to salvation, and some are raised to condemnation. As Jesus said,

I tell you the truth, a time is coming and has now come when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God and those who hear will live.... Do not be amazed at this, for a time is coming when all who are in their graves will hear his voice and come out—those who have done good will rise to live, and those who have done evil will rise to be condemned. (John 5:25, 28–29)

Introduced by these words, it could not be more clear that 1 Corinthians 15:22 is speaking of resurrection:

Christ has indeed been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep. For since death came through a man, the resurrection of the dead comes also through a man. (vv. 20–21).

The Objection That 1 Peter 3:18 and 2:24 Teach Limited Atonement

Christ died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, to bring you to God.... He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness; by his wounds you have been healed.

This implies a substitutionary atonement, and, as stated above, many limited atonement advocates insist that if Christ was substituted for all, then all must be saved. Since all Calvinists believe that only some, not all, will be saved, it follows for extreme Calvinists that Christ must have died only for the elect (see McGregor, NPS, 149ff). They often point to The Nature of the Atonement, by John McLeod Campbell (1800–1872), as a demonstration of the incompatibility of universal and substitutionary atonement.

Response

Because of its view of substitution, this objection is a form of special pleading. Of course everyone for whom Christ is substituted will be saved if the application of substitution is automatic, but it need not be. A penalty can be paid without the payment taking effect, just as a prisoner can be offered a governor’s pardon yet refuse to accept it, or a bankrupt man be offered money to pay his creditors and decline to receive it. Again, those (like me) who adhere to substitutionary atonement but reject limited atonement believe that Christ’s sacrifice for the sins of all humankind did not automatically save anyone but rather made them savable. It did not release God’s saving grace into anyone’s life but satisfied (propitiated) God on their behalf (1 John 2:2), awaiting their faith to receive the unconditional gift of salvation made possible by Christ’s atoning work.

THE THEOLOGICAL BASIS FOR AN UNLIMITED ATONEMENT

In addition to the extensive biblical support, unlimited atonement is also based firmly in the attributes of God, especially His omnibenevolence. The Bible affirms that He is all-loving, and since whoever is all-loving must love all, God must love all. Limited atonement (in general) claims that God loves only the elect salvifically, and double-predestination maintains that He not only doesn’t love but actually hates the non-elect. Hence, God’s omnibenevolence excludes limited atonement.

The Biblical Basis for God's Omnibenevolence

The biblical foundation for God's omnibenevolence is extensive. The following is only a selection of texts.

"God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16).

"God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?... I am convinced that neither death nor life ... nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:35, 38–39).

"Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died" (2 Cor. 5:14).

"When the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared, he saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (Titus 3:4).

"Dear friends, let us love one another, for love comes from God. Whoever does not love does not know God, because God is love... This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins" (1 John 4:7–8, 10).

The Theological Basis for God's Omnibenevolence

God's love is a moral attribute, but the fact that He is omnibenevolent follows from several of His metaphysical attributes. The above verses amply demonstrate that love is not only a characteristic of God but that He is all-loving.

God's Infinity Implies Omnibenevolence

God is infinite in His essence, and as love is of the essence of God (1 John 4:16), He is infinite love. His love can no more be limited than can His nature, which is unlimited.

God's Simplicity Implies Omnibenevolence

God is simple (indivisible, without parts) in His essence; therefore, God cannot be partly anything. Whatever a simple Being is, it is that wholly and completely. God, then, is wholly and completely loving, for love is of His simple essence.

God's Necessity Implies Omnibenevolence

God's necessity implies His omnibenevolence as well. A necessary Being is what it is by necessity, and as God is love, God necessarily is love. It is impossible for God not to love, for love is of His very essence.

In summary, both biblical and theological evidence clearly show that God is all-loving; consequently, He must love all. Because anything else would be contrary to His very nature, God's omnibenevolence is contrary to the doctrine of limited atonement.

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO GOD'S OMNIBENEVOLENCE

Objection One—Based on the Argument That Necessary Love Is Contradictory

Love is a free act flowing from free will. Since forced love is contradictory, it is said that love cannot flow from the essence of God to all human beings, because His essence is necessary. Consequently, the argument goes, it cannot be of the essence of God to love everyone, for then God would be forced to love, which is untenable. Stated another way, God loves because He wants (chooses, wills) to love when and whom He desires, not because He must. Isn't unlimited atonement, then, in opposition to the very nature of God as love?

Response to Objection One

Once again, love and necessity are not contradictory, but love and compulsion are. While it is necessary, then, that God loves all, it is also necessary that He loves freely. God's will is completely in accord with His nature; thus, His freely chosen love for all persons is in harmony with His necessary, unchanging nature. There is no conflict with God's love being both necessary and free.

Objection Two—Based on God's Unique Love for the Elect

Those who deny unlimited atonement claim that God does not salvifically love all people, pointing to His special love for the elect (e.g., Eph. 1:4; 5:25; 1 Cor. 15:3; John 10:11).

Response to Objection Two

In reply, we have already demonstrated that Christ's unique love for His bride does not negate His love for everyone else. Indeed, He desires all to be part of His bride, the church.

Further, as previously established, when the Bible speaks of those to whom the Atonement has been applied, it does not thereby limit the Atonement's possible application for all for whom it was provided.

What is more, again, that Jesus loves His bride and died for her does not mean He hates those who have not yet believed.

Objection Three—Based on the Idea That Unlimited Atonement Necessarily Leads to Universalism

If an all-powerful Being can do whatever He wants to do, and if a sovereign God is in control of all things,<sup>57</sup> then His will cannot be thwarted: He accomplishes whatever He purposes to do (Isa. 55:11). If God can accomplish whatever He desires, and if God desires to save all, then doesn't it follow that all will be saved (universalism)?

Response to Objection Three

Even though God's ultimate will is always accomplished, His immediate will is not. God wills some things conditionally and some unconditionally: Our justification is willed on the condition of our acceptance of His gift (John 1:12; Rom. 3:25; Matt. 23:37). God does not desire that anyone perish, wanting all to repent (2 Peter 3:9); nevertheless, not all will repent and, hence, not all will be saved (cf. Matt. 23:37).

In addition, God's omnipotence does not mean that He can do everything. As we have already noted, He cannot do what is contradictory, and He cannot go against His own nature

(Heb. 6:18; 2 Tim. 2:13). God, in accordance with His own self, cannot force someone to love Him; while He is all-powerful, He exercises His power in accordance with His love. Unlimited atonement need not lead to universalism.

Objection Four—Based on God Having Unused Power

Extreme Calvinists still insist that God does not have to exercise love toward everyone just because He is omnibenevolent any more than He must exercise His power toward everyone just because He is omnipotent. God, allegedly, can have more love than He displays, just as He has more power than He applies.

Response to Objection Four

Again, love is a moral attribute of God; power is nonmoral. Moral attributes, because they are moral, bind God to act in a certain way. Nonmoral attributes do not, and the confusion of the two is a category mistake.

Furthermore, as stated previously, it is inconsistent to hold (as extreme Calvinists do) that even though God must always act justly because He is all just, He need not always act lovingly because He is all-loving. If this were the case, God's justice would not obligate Him to condemn all sin. But it does, just as His omnibenevolence compels Him to love all sinners. Love is as essential to God as justice, and whatever attribute He has, He must have completely, necessarily, and infinitely.

Objection Five—Based on What Sinners Deserve

We are saved by God's grace, but grace isn't deserved by any sinner—justice demands that sin be condemned. Therefore, the doctrine of unlimited atonement, which maintains that God must love all, seems to be contrary to the doctrine of total depravity, which affirms that all human beings deserve God's condemnation.

Response to Objection Five

It is true that nothing in any sinner deserves or merits God's love. This is not the point; the point is that there is something in God that prompts His desire to save all sinners—His infinite love. God wants to save us because He is naturally (essentially, necessarily, unarbitrarily) all-loving, not because we have earned salvation or even His passion for our salvation (we haven't).

ESSENTIALISM VS. VOLUNTARISM

A second theological reason for rejecting limited atonement is its basis on the premise of theological voluntarism. There are two primary views of the relationship between God's nature and God's will: divine voluntarism and divine essentialism. Voluntarism, in which the doctrine of limited atonement is rooted, insists that something is right because God wills it; that is, God decides something is right, and then it is right. Essentialism, on the other hand, declares that God wills something because it is right; that is, it is already in accord with His unchanging nature. Divine voluntarism is without philosophical (rational), biblical, or practical foundation.

Philosophical Arguments for Divine Essentialism

Traditional theists maintain that God is unchangeable in His nature (“morally immutable”). Thomas Aquinas offered three basic arguments for God’s immutability.

The Argument From God’s Pure Actuality

The first argument for God’s unchangeability is based on the fact that a Being of pure actuality (“I AM-ness”) has no potentiality., Only that which has potentiality can change. Accordingly, God cannot change (Ex. 3:14), for He, as Pure Actuality, has no potential to actualize through change.

The Argument From God’s Perfection

The second argument for God’s unchangeability stems from His absolute perfection. Whatever changes acquires something new; God cannot acquire anything new, since He is, by His very nature, absolutely perfect (there is no way in which He could be better or improved). If God lacked any perfection, He would not be God, for to gain a new perfection is to have lacked it.

The Argument From God’s Simplicity

The third argument for God’s unchangeability follows from His simplicity. Everything that changes is composed of what does change and what does not change, but there can be no composition in an absolutely simple Being. Hence, God cannot change.

If everything about a being changed, it would no longer be the same being. In fact, that would not be change at all but the annihilation of one thing and the re-creation of something entirely new. If in every change something remains the same and something does not, the something that changes must be composed of these two elements. Since God, an absolutely simple Being, cannot have two elements, He cannot change.

Biblical Arguments for Divine Essentialism

The scriptural passages that support theistic essentialism are those that declare God to be unchangeable in His nature.

Old Testament Evidence of God’s Moral Immutability

The psalmist declared:

In the beginning you [Lord] laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of your hands. They will perish, but you remain; they will all wear out like a garment. Like clothing you will change them and they will be discarded. But you remain the same, and your years will never end. (102:25–27)

First Samuel 15:29 affirms, “He who is the Glory of Israel does not lie or change his mind; for he is not a man, that he should change his mind.” God confirmed, through the prophet, “I the Lord do not change” (Mal. 3:6).

New Testament Evidence of God’s Moral Immutability

The New Testament is equally strong about God's unchangeable nature. Hebrews 1:10–12 quotes Psalm 102 in confirmation. A few chapters later the author promises, "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18). Paul adds, in Titus 1:2, "God, who does not lie, promised before the beginning of time." James (1:17) assures, "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows."

If God's will is subject to His nature, and if God is unchangeable in His nature, then whatever God wills must be good and right in accordance with (and never contrary to) this nature. Consequently, divine essentialism must be correct.

Practical Arguments for Divine Essentialism

Two practical arguments in favor of divine essentialism are (1) the need for moral stability and (2) the moral repugnance of voluntarism. These are supported by what we experience of God's trustworthiness and the scriptural testimony that God can be relied upon not to change.

The Argument From the Need for Moral Stability

If all moral principles were based on God's changing will, there would be no moral security. How could one be committed to something if there was always the possibility that the rules might be altered? Indeed, how could we love and serve God if He could will, for instance, that our ultimate good was not to love Him but to hate Him?

The Argument From Moral Repugnance

Divine essentialists insist that it is morally repugnant to assume, as voluntarists do, that God could change His will on whether love is essentially good and decide instead that hate become a universal moral obligation. It is difficult to conceive how a morally perfect Being could arbitrarily determine that rape, injustice, or genocide are morally right. Since it is morally repugnant for us, made in God's image, to imagine such a change in His will, how much more must it be for the God in whose image we are made?

God's Trustworthiness

The Bible presents God as eminently trustworthy: When He makes an unconditional promise, He never fails to keep it (cf. Gen. 12:1–3; Heb. 6:16–18). Indeed, the gifts and callings of God are without the possibility of His changing His mind (Rom. 11:29); God is not a man (1 Sam. 15:29), and He can always be counted on to keep His word (Isa. 55:11). This absolute reliability would not be possible if God could change His will at any time about anything. What makes God morally bound to keep His word is His unchangeable nature; otherwise, He could decide at any moment, for example, to send all believers to hell, or to reward the wicked for murder and cruelty. Such a God would not be trustworthy; the God of the Bible is unchangeably good.

Objections to Divine Essentialism

Voluntaristic arguments against essentialism, such as those put forward by William of Ockham (c. 1285–c. 1349), chiefly center on the supremacy of God:

- (1) Either God wills something because it is right (essentialism), or else something is right because God wills it (voluntarism).
- (2) If He wills something because it is right (essentialism), then God is not supreme, because there is something outside Him to which He is subject.
- (3) Hence, something is right because God wills it (voluntarism).

There are at least two problems with this argument.

First of all, the first premise presents a false dilemma. It need not be “either/or”; it could be “both/and.” That is, if moral principles flow from the will of God as rooted in the nature of God, then a voluntaristic conclusion does not follow.

Also, the second premise wrongly assumes that the supreme ethical standard to which God’s will is subject is “outside” of God. If it is “inside” God—if the standard is His own supreme moral nature—the dilemma vanishes.

In conclusion, extreme Calvinism’s view of limited atonement is clearly based on a form of voluntarism, a belief without rational, biblical, or practical foundation. God cannot change in His nature, so whatever He wills must be in accord with His immutable nature. Since His nature is to love all whom He creates, He cannot limit His salvific desire to only some.

Irresistible Grace Plus Omnibenevolence Equals Universalism

Another serious theological problem for adherents to limited atonement is their view of irresistible grace, for they hold the following premises:

- (1) God can do anything He wills, including saving all He wills to save;
- (2) God wills only to save some people (the elect), not all people.

There is only one logical conclusion:

- (1) God is not all-loving. That is, He does not love everyone.

The problem can be restated as follows:

- (1) If God is all-powerful, He could save all persons.
- (2) If God is all-loving, He would save all persons.
- (3) All persons will not be saved.
- (4) Therefore, God is either not all-powerful or He is not all-loving.
- (5) God is all-powerful.
- (6) Thus, God is not all-loving.

If, on the one hand, an all-powerful God can save all but will not save all, then He does not love all. In this case, irresistible grace—exercised only on some, when it could be used on all—is a denial of God’s omnibenevolence. If, on the other hand, God is all-powerful, including the ability to irresistibly overrule people’s will in order to save them, and He is all-loving in that He wants to save all people, then irresistible grace creates universal salvation. Therefore, the paradigm of extreme Calvinism, when held to consistency, either leads to the denial of an all-loving God or to the affirmation of universalism.

Limited Atonement and Irresistible Grace Deny Free Will

Further, the doctrine of limited atonement is a rejection of God-given freedom. Because in this life free will for human beings entails the power of contrary choice, even an all-powerful God cannot force someone to act contrary to free choice. Forced liberty is an absurd notion, and irresistible grace on the unwilling is precisely that—contrary to the freedom God bestowed upon His human creatures.

To put it another way, since even an omnipotent Being cannot do what is contradictory, God cannot exercise irresistible grace on the unwilling. The only solution that preserves irresistible or persuasive grace is to hold that God exerts it only upon the willing. In this view, God can exercise persuasive grace on everyone, and only those willing to accept it will be saved. This would eliminate the possibility of universalism—since God can love all without everyone willingly receiving His unlimited love—and uphold the omnipotence and omnibenevolence of God, something unattainable for proponents of limited atonement.

Irresistible grace is contrary to human free will and to divine omnibenevolence. The heart of freedom is self-determination, and it is contrary to self-determination to have its actions determined (caused) by another being. Hence, if humans are free, then God, who gave them freedom, cannot exercise irresistible grace on them contrary to their will. This is precisely the result of extreme Calvinism’s “irresistible grace on the unwilling.”

THEOLOGICAL QUERIES POSED BY DEFENDERS OF LIMITED ATONEMENT

Spurgeon’s Argument

Charles Spurgeon (1834–1892) defended limited atonement by his insistence that it is the opponent who limits the Atonement: First, adherents to unlimited atonement do not believe that Christ died so as to secure the salvation of all, and second, they do not believe that Christ died to secure the salvation of any person in particular. Spurgeon then went on to boast that those who believe in limited atonement believe that Christ died for “multitudes [the elect] that no man can number” (cited by Steele and Thomas, FPC, 40).

In response, this inverted rationalization is an unfortunate illustration of Spurgeon’s eloquence gone to seed: Only an upside-down logic could force anyone to think twice about the idea that limited atonement is more unlimited than unlimited atonement! The first assertion—that unlimited atonement doesn’t teach Christ’s death as securing the salvation of all—diverts the issue. It isn’t a question of securing the salvation of all (as in universalism) but of providing salvation for all and securing it for the elect (as in moderate Calvinism and Arminianism). It is extreme Calvinism that maintains Christ died to provide and to secure the salvation only of the elect. Spurgeon, then, gave the right answer to the wrong question.

As to the second point—that unlimited atonement doesn’t teach that Christ died to secure the salvation of any specific person—Spurgeon gives the wrong answer to the right question. Both moderate Calvinist and classical Arminian opponents of limited atonement believe that Christ did die to secure the salvation of the elect and that God foreknew, from all eternity, exactly who they would be.

Sproul’s Argument

R. C. Sproul, another defender of limited atonement, believes the opposition is trapped by asking: “For whom was the atonement designed?” (CG, 205). If it was intended for all, as in unlimited atonement, then why are not all saved? How can a sovereign God’s intention be thwarted? If it was intended for only some (the elect), then limited atonement is correct. The dilemma can be stated as such:

- (1) Either the Atonement was intended for all or only for some (the elect).
- (2) If the Atonement was intended for all, then all will be saved (since God’s sovereign intentions will come to pass).
- (3) If the Atonement was not intended for all, then it was intended only for some (the elect).
- (4) Therefore, either universalism is true or limited atonement is true.

Therein lies the trap: Both moderate Calvinists and traditional Arminians deny universalism; therefore, they would seem by this logic to be driven to accept limited atonement.

In response, the first premise (either the Atonement was intended for all or only for some) is another false dilemma. As already stated, there is a third alternative: Christ’s sacrifice was intended both to provide salvation for all and to procure salvation for all who believe. The false dilemma wrongly assumes that there could only have been one intention for the Atonement. The denial that God desires the salvation of all whom He has created is a grave error.

THE HISTORICAL BASIS FOR AN UNLIMITED ATONEMENT

With one significant exception, the orthodox fathers of the Christian church have given unanimous support for the saving love of God for all human beings.

Early Fathers

Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165)

“The whole human race will be found to be under a curse.... The Father of all wished His Christ, for the whole human family, to take upon Him the curses of all” (as cited in Bercot, DECB, 42).

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

“He endowed His own handiwork with salvation, by destroying sin. For He is a most holy and merciful Lord, and He loves the human race” (in ibid., 43). “In the last times, the Son was made a man among men, and He re-formed the human race” (in ibid.).

Origen (c. 185–c. 254)

“He takes away sin until every enemy will be destroyed and death last of all—in order that the whole world may be free from sin” (in ibid., 45).

Medieval Fathers

Early Augustine (354–430)

There is, then, no natural efficient cause or, if I may be allowed the expression, no essential cause, of the evil will, since itself is the origin of evil in mutable spirits, by which the good of their nature is diminished and corrupted; and the will is made evil by nothing else than defection from God—a defection of which the cause, too, is certainly deficient. (CG, 12.9)

“God no doubt wishes all men to be saved and to come into the knowledge of the truth” (OSL, 57, emphasis added). Again,

If, indeed, it has happened that some are removed from the influence of this clearest light of truth, whose blindness requires its illumination, yet even to them, we doubt not, the same grace will find its steady way, however late, by the merciful favour of that God “who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth” (OPP, 48, xxiv, emphasis added).

Later Augustine

Working from his belief that infants could be saved and that donatist schismatics could be forced to believe against their free will, Augustine drew out the logic of these positions in his later views, laid forth in the following quotations.

“ ‘He wills all men to be saved,’ is so said that all the predestined may be understood by it, because every kind of man is among them” (ORG, 44).

Accordingly, when we hear and read in Scripture that He “will have all men to be saved,” although we know well that all men are not saved, we are not on that account to restrict the omnipotence of God, but are rather to understand the Scripture, “Who will have all men to be saved,” as meaning that no man is saved unless God wills his salvation: not that there is no man whose salvation He does not will, but that no man is saved apart from His will; and that, therefore, we should pray Him to will our salvation, because if He will it, it must necessarily be accomplished. (E, 103, emphasis added; cf. 97)

Our Lord says plainly, however, in the Gospel, when upbraiding the impious city: “How often would I have gathered thy children together; even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!” as if the will of God had been overcome by the will of men... But even though she was unwilling, He gathered together as many of her children as He wished: for He does not will some things and do them, and will others and do them not; but “He hath done all that He pleased in heaven and in earth” (ibid., 97, emphasis added).

Contrasting the Early and Later Augustine

There are many contrasts between the early Augustine and the later Augustine that bear on the origin of extreme Calvinism. The essential differences can be summarized as follows:

Early Augustine	Later Augustine
God wills all to be saved	God wills only some to be saved
God never compels free will	God compels free will
God loves all	God loves only some
Saving faith is not a special gift to some	Saving faith is a special gift to only some

Fallen people can receive salvation

Fallen people cannot receive salvation

Problematically, the later position of Augustine involves a denial of human freedom. As he himself stated earlier, “He that is willing is free from compulsion” (TSAM, 10.14, emphasis added). Again, “God does not work out salvation in us as if he were working in insensate stones, or in creatures in whom nature has placed neither reason nor will” (OFW, 2.6, emphasis added). He added insightfully, “We may not so defend grace as to seem to take away free will, or, on the other hand, so assert free will as to be judged ungrateful to the grace of God, in our arrogant impiety” (ibid., 2.29, emphasis added).

Anselm (1033–1109)

Moreover, you have clearly shown the life of this man [Jesus] to have been so excellent and so glorious as to make ample satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and even infinitely more. It now, therefore, remains to be shown how that payment is made to God for the sins of men. (CDH, II.XVIII)

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274)

Christ, suffering in loving and obedient spirit, offered more to God than was demanded in recompense for all the sins of mankind.... Christ’s passion, then, was not only sufficient but superabundant for the sins of mankind; as John says, “he is a propitiation for our sins, not for ours only but also for those of the whole world” (ST, 3a.48, 2).

Reformation Leaders

There is a break, beginning with the Reformers, from the almost unanimous view of unlimited atonement. Nevertheless, it is significant that the “Father of Calvinism” himself was not a Calvinist on the doctrine of limited atonement. As we shall see, John Calvin made unequivocal statements that Christ died for the sins of the whole human race. Rarely do other statements conflict with these emphatic pronouncements, and when they do, they can usually be understood as references to the application of the Atonement to the elect rather than the extent of the Atonement for all people.

Calvin: Christ’s Blood Expiated (Satisfied) God for All the Sins of the World

This is our liberty, this our glorying against death, that our sins are not imputed to us. He says that this redemption was procured by the blood of Christ, for by the sacrifice of His death all the sins of the world have been expiated. (CC, on Col. 1:15)

Calvin: Christ Provided Salvation for All Humanity

We must now see in what ways we become possessed of the blessings which God has bestowed on his only begotten Son, not for private use, but to enrich the poor and needy. And the first thing to be attended to is, that so long as we are without Christ and separated from him, nothing which he suffered and did for the salvation of the human race is of the least benefit to us. (ICR, 3.1.1)

Calvin: The “Many” for Whom Christ Died Is Everyone

We should note, however, that Paul does not here contrast the larger number with the many, for he is not speaking of the great number of mankind, but he argues that since the sin of Adam has destroyed many [all], the righteousness of Christ will be no less effective for the salvation of many [all]. (CC, on Rom. 5:15)

Calvin: The Guilt of the Whole World Was Laid on Christ

I approve of the ordinary reading, that he alone bore the punishment of many, because on him was laid the guilt of the whole world. It is evident from other passages, and especially from the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, that “many” sometimes denotes “all” (ibid., on Isa. 53:12).

Calvin: The “Many” Is the Whole Human Race

Mark 14:24 [says,] “This is my blood.” I have already warned, when the blood is said to be poured out (as in Matthew) for the remission of sins, how in these words we are directed to the sacrifice of Christ’s death, and to neglect this thought makes any due celebration of the Supper impossible. In no other way can faithful souls be satisfied, if they cannot believe that God is pleased in their regard. The word “many” does not mean a part of the world only, but the whole human race: he contrasts “many” with “one,” as if to say that he would not be the Redeemer of one man, but would meet death to deliver many of their cursed guilt. It is incontestable that Christ came for the expiation of the sins of the whole world. (EPG, IX.5)

Calvin: Salvation Is Limited in Its Effect, Not in Its Offer

If it is so (you will say), little faith can be put in the Gospel promises, which, in testifying concerning the will of God, declare that he wills what is contrary to his inviolable decree. Not at all; for however universal the promises of salvation may be, there is no discrepancy between them and the predestination of the reprobate, provided we attend to their effect. We know that the promises are effectual only when we receive them in faith, but, on the contrary, when faith is made void, the promise is of no effect. (ICR, 3.24.17)

Calvin: Christ’s Death Is Applied Only to the Righteous (by Faith)

Accordingly, he is called our Head, and the first-born among many brethren, while, on the other hand, we are said to be ingrafted into him and clothed with him, all which he possesses being, as I have said, nothing to us until we become one with him. And although it is true that we obtain this by faith, yet since we see that all do not indiscriminately embrace the offer of Christ which is made by the gospel, the very nature of the case teaches us to ascend higher, and inquire into the secret efficacy of the Spirit, to which it is owing that we enjoy Christ and all his blessings, (ibid., 3.1.1)

Calvin: Salvation Is Applied Only to Those Who Believe

The apostle indicates that the fruits of it do not come to any but to those who are obedient. In saying this he commends faith to us, for neither He nor His benefits become ours unless, and in so far as, we accept them and Him by faith. At the same time he has inserted the universal term “to all” to show that no one is excluded from this salvation who proves to be attentive and obedient to the Gospel of Christ. (CC, on Heb. 5:9)

Calvin: Even the Lost Were Purchased by Christ's Blood

“It is no small matter to have the souls perish who were bought by the blood of Christ” (MG, 83).

Calvin: No One Is Barred From Salvation

[Paul] had commanded Timothy that prayers should be regularly offered up in the church for kings and princes; but as it seemed somewhat absurd that prayer should be offered up for a class of men who were almost hopeless (all of them being not only aliens from the body of Christ, but doing their utmost to overthrow his kingdom), he adds, that it was acceptable to God, who will have all men to be saved. By this he assuredly means nothing more than that the way of salvation was not shut against any order of men; that, on the contrary, he had manifested his mercy in such a way, that he would have none debarred from it. (ICR, 3.24.16)

Calvin: Christ Suffered for the Sins of the World

“I would they were even cut off.” [Paul's] indignation increases and he prays for destruction on the imposters by whom the Galatians had been deceived. The word “cut off” seems to allude to the circumcision which they were pressing for. Chrysostom inclines to this view: “They tear the Church for the sake of circumcision; I wish they were cut off entirely.” But such a curse does not seem to fit the mildness of an apostle, who ought to wish that all should be saved and therefore that not one should perish. I reply that this is true when we have men in mind; for God commends to us the salvation of all men without exception, even as Christ suffered for the sins of the whole world. (CC, on Gal. 5:12)

When he says “the sin of the world,” he extends this kindness indiscriminately to the whole human race, that the Jews might not think the Redeemer has been sent to them alone. From this we infer that the whole world is bound in the same condemnation; and that since all men without exception are guilty of unrighteousness before God, they have need of reconciliation, (ibid., on John 1:29)

Calvin: Unbelief Is the Reason That Some Do Not Receive the Benefits of Christ's Death

Paul makes [the revelation of God's] grace common to all men, not because it in fact extends to all, but because it is offered to all. Although Christ suffered for the sins of the world, and is offered by the goodness of God without distinction to all men, yet not all receive Him. (ibid., on Rom. 5:18)

To bear the sins means to free those who have sinned from their guilt by his satisfaction. He says “many” meaning “all,” as in Rom. 5:15. It is of course certain that not all enjoy the fruits of Christ's death, but this happens because their unbelief hinders them, (ibid., on Heb. 9:28)

Calvin: Only Believers Enjoy the Benefit of Salvation

“I am come a light into the world.” The universal particle seems to have been put in deliberately, partly that all believers without exception might enjoy this benefit in common and partly to show that unbelievers perish in darkness because they flee from the light of their own accord, (ibid., on John 12:46)

Calvin: Universalism Is Untenable (Salvation Is Not Applied to All)

[John] put this in for amplification, that believers might be convinced that the expiation made by Christ extends to all who by faith embrace the Gospel. But here the question may be asked as to how the sins of the whole world have been expiated. I pass over the dreams of the fanatics, who make this a reason to extend salvation to all the reprobate and even to Satan himself. Such a monstrous idea is not worth refuting. Those who want to avoid this absurdity have said that Christ suffered sufficiently for the whole world but effectively only for the elect. This solution has commonly prevailed in the schools. Although I allow the truth of this, I deny that it fits this passage.

Calvin: Christ's "Blood" Received in Communion Is Not for Unbelievers

"How can the wicked drink Christ's blood 'which was not shed to expiate their sins' and Christ's flesh 'which was not crucified for them'?" (TT, 285).

In short, for Calvin, the Atonement is unlimited in extent and limited in application (to those who believe). Christ died for all, but only the elect will receive salvation.

Post-Reformation Teachers

Philip Schaff (1819–1893)

This is in harmony with the whole spirit and aim of this Epistle [Romans]. It is easier to make it prove a system of conditional universalism than a system of dualistic particularism. The very theme, 1:16, declares that the gospel is a power of God for the salvation, not of a particular class, but of "every one" that believeth. In drawing a parallel between the first and the second Adam (5:12–21), [Paul] represents the effect of the latter as equal in extent, and greater in intensity than the effect of the former; while in the Calvinistic system it would be less. We have no right to limit "the many" (hoi polloi) and the "all" (pantas) in one clause, and to take it literally in the other.

If, by the trespass of the one [Adam], death reigned through the one, much more shall they that receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life through the one, even Jesus Christ. So, then, as through one trespass the judgment came unto all men to condemnation; even so through one act of righteousness the free gift came unto all men to justification of life. For as through the one man's disobedience the many [i.e. all] were made sinners, even so through the obedience of the one shall the many [all] be made righteous. (5:17–19)

The same parallel, without any restriction, is more briefly expressed in the passage (1 Cor. 15:21): "As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive"; and in a different form in Rom. 11:32 and Gal. 3:22....

These passages contain, as in a nutshell, the theodicy of Paul. They dispel the darkness of Romans 9. They exclude all limitations of God's plan and intention to a particular class; they teach not, indeed, that all men will be actually saved—for many reject the divine offer, and die in impenitence—but that God sincerely desires and actually provides salvation for all. Whosoever is saved, is saved by grace; whosoever is lost, is lost by his own guilt of unbelief. (HCC, VIII.XIV.114)

This universal offer is also a genuine offer. The cross of Christ is broad enough and deep enough to cover all the sins of everyone who will come to Him. This general call to salvation is a part of common grace. It may or may not lead to saving faith in the mighty work that Christ accomplished on the cross for the sinner's eternal salvation. Even though the offer of this great gift from God is genuine and available to all, many do not receive it by believing in Jesus Christ. (S, 92)

Millard Erickson (b. 1932)

“We conclude that the hypothesis of universal atonement is able to account for a larger segment of the biblical witness with less distortion than is the hypothesis of limited atonement” (CT, 835).

Advocates of limited atonement face the somewhat awkward situation of contending that while the atonement is sufficient to cover the sins of the non-elect, Christ did not die for them. It is as if God, in giving a dinner, prepared far more food than was needed, yet refused to consider the possibility of inviting additional guests. Advocates of unlimited atonement, on the other hand, have no difficulty with the fact that Christ’s death is sufficient for everyone, for, in their view, Christ died for all persons, (ibid.)

The view that we are adopting here should not be construed as Arminianism. It is rather a moderate form of Calvinism. It is the view that God logically decides first to provide salvation, then elects some to receive it. This is essentially the sublapsarian position of theologians like Augustus Strong. Those who would construe this position as Arminianism need reminding that what distinguishes Calvinism from Arminianism is not the view of the relationship between the decree to provide salvation and the decree to confer salvation upon some and not upon others. Rather, the decisive point is whether the decree of election is based solely upon the free, sovereign choice of God himself (Calvinism) or based also in part upon his foreknowledge of merit and faith in the person elected [Arminianism]. (ibid.)

CONCLUSION

The biblical, theological, and historical bases for the universal (unlimited) extent of the Atonement are solid. With one notable and explainable exception (the later Augustine), there is no significant voice in the whole history of the church up to the Reformers that defended limited atonement. Indeed, the Bible is emphatic that God loved the whole fallen world and that Christ died for the same. The theological arguments springing from God’s omnibenevolence are powerfully in favor of unlimited atonement—that Christ died for the sins of all human beings. Any denial of this truth arbitrarily limits God’s love to only some and is based on an indefensible form of voluntarism.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

THE EXTENT OF SALVATION (UNIVERSALISM)

We now move from one end of the spectrum to the other. The last chapter examined the view that God desires to save and actually does save only some persons (limited atonement). This chapter addresses the position that God desires to save and actually does save all persons (universalism). Another view affirms, contrary to both of these extremes, that God desires to save all but that He actually saves only some—those who believe.

Unlike the other two views, the provision of unlimited atonement is in accord both with God's omnibenevolence (which affirms His desire to save all) and with the human freedom of those who reject God's offer (which makes it impossible for Him to save all). That is, the Atonement is unlimited in its extent (Christ died for all), but it is limited in its application, since not all believe, and God has willed that only those who believe can be saved.

DEFINITION OF UNIVERSALISM

Universalism, derived from the word apokatastasis (i.e., “restoration,” in Acts 3:21), is the belief that eventually everyone will be saved. It was first proposed by Origen (c. 185–c. 254), a partially unorthodox church father. One of the most famous theologians in modern times to embrace universalism was the neo-orthodox thinker Karl Barth (1886–1968); noted philosopher John Hick (b. 1922) is also a proponent of the view (see his EGL). Many liberal theologians, a good number of cults, and several aberrant religions hold to some form of universalism or annihilationism. Like universalists, annihilationists believe that no one will suffer eternal punishment, since everyone who does not believe will be annihilated. Even some noted evangelicals, such as Clark Pinnock (b. 1920), John Wenham (b. 1913), and John Stott (b. 1925) have embraced forms of annihilationism. Nevertheless, universalism is heretical, having been condemned at the Fifth Ecumenical Council of Constantinople in A.D. 553.

BIBLICAL ARGUMENTS OFFERED FOR UNIVERSALISM

To support their position, universalists generally appeal to widely held sentiment about God's love. While they cite several passages of Scripture, as we shall see, the verses offered for universalism are taken out of context. We will state and examine each.

The Contention That Psalm 110:1 Teaches Universalism

David said: “The LORD says to my Lord: ‘Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet.’ ” The inference drawn by some universalists is that if all Christ's enemies are eventually submissive to Him, then they must be saved: Salvation involves submission to the lordship of Christ.

Response

Despite the universalists' claim, this text does not support their position.

First, the lost are called “enemies,” which is not a description of the saved, who are called “friends” (John 15:15) and “sons” of God (John 1:12).

Second, in addition to their being “enemies,” they are spoken of as subjugated, not saved. They are called God's “footstool”—hardly an appropriate description of saints, who are co-heirs with Christ and have every spiritual blessing in the heavenly realms in Him (Eph. 1:3; Rom. 8:17).

Third, in the context, David is not speaking of the salvation of the lost. Rather, he refers explicitly to God's “wrath” on his “enemies” (Ps. 110:1, 110:5), not His blessings on His people.

The Contention That Acts 3:21 Teaches Universalism

Peter speaks of Jesus, who “must remain in heaven until the time comes for God to restore everything, as he promised long ago through his holy prophets.” This reference to the “restoration of all things” (NKJV) is taken by universalists to mean that all people will eventually be saved. Mormons say this passage points to a restoration of the church (through Joseph Smith), following a total apostasy.

Response

The context does not support any such conclusions.

For one thing, this verse does not uphold universalism. While the same author (Peter) affirms that God desires that all men be saved (2 Peter 3:9), as does the apostle Paul (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4), some people are simply not willing to accept God’s grace (cf. Matt. 23:37). Once again, since God is love (1 John 4:16) and humans are free, God cannot force them to freely love Him. God will allow the unrepentant to have it their way. As noted by C. S. Lewis (1898–1963), those who do not say to God, “Your will be done,” will eventually hear God declare to them, “Your will be done.” Such is the nature of hell, a place where the will of those who reject the Lord is fulfilled in opposition to His. The Bible nowhere holds out hope for those who refuse to accept God’s love.<sup>6</sup>

In addition, Acts 3 does not even remotely hint that there will be a total apostasy of the entire church, and other passages of Scripture totally refute such an idea. Jesus said the gates of hell would not prevail against the church (Matt. 16:18). He also promised His followers, “Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the age” (Matt. 28:20 NKJV). Jesus could not be with His followers to the end of the age if the church went into complete apostasy at some point after its founding. In Ephesians 3:21, Paul says, “To Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus to all generations, forever and ever” (NKJV). How could God be glorified in the church throughout all ages if the entire body abandoned and/or renounced Him? Ephesians 4:11–16 speaks of the church growing to spiritual maturity, not spiritual degeneracy.

What then does “the restoration of all things” mean? Peter, making reference to the “restoration of all things, which God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began” (Acts 3:21 NKJV), said it is speaking of the “covenant which God made with our [Jewish] fathers, saying to Abraham, ‘And in your seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed’ ” (v. 25). This Abrahamic covenant is unconditional, including the promises of possessing the Holy Land “forever” (Gen. 13:15). It is to the future fulfillment of this covenant that Peter refers. It is the restoration of all things to Israel, not to the salvation of all people. This is the restoration expected by Jesus’ disciples; the last thing they asked Him before He ascended to heaven was “Lord, are you at this time going to restore the kingdom to Israel?” His answer can be summarized as “Not yet, but meanwhile preach the gospel to the ends of the earth” (see Acts 1:6–7). Again, nothing is said here about the ultimate salvation of all human beings. To affirm otherwise is to totally deny the context. Jesus also spoke of this restoration when He said to the Twelve,

I tell you the truth, at the renewal of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. (Matt. 19:28)

This will be fulfilled in His literal future reign on earth.

The Contention That Romans 5:18–19 Teaches Universalism

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous.

From these verses many universalists infer that Christ's death for all guarantees the salvation of all.

Response

This conclusion, however, is contrary to the setting here and in Romans as a whole, as well as to the rest of God's Word.

First, even in this context Paul speaks of being "justified by faith" (v. 1), and not automatically by what Christ did for us. He also refers to salvation as "the gift" (v. 16), which is something that needs to be received. And in the preceding verse he declares that salvation comes only to those "who receive ... the gift of righteousness" (v. 17); not all receive the gift (cf. Matt. 23:37; 25:40–41).

Second, the rest of the epistle makes it unmistakably clear that not everyone will be saved. Romans 1–2 speaks of the heathen who are "without excuse" (1:20), upon whom the wrath of God falls (1:18). Paul declares that "as many as have sinned without law will also perish without law" (2:12 NKJV).

Third, the many [all] being "made righteous" does not refer to their actually being saved but rather their being made savable by the removal of judicial guilt inherited from Adam. That is, what the first Adam did by bringing legal condemnation to all humanity is reversed by what Christ, the "last Adam," accomplished—the savability (potential justification) of everyone. Actual salvation does not come automatically but by an act of "faith" (cf. 5:1).

Fourth, in the very heart of his argument, Paul concludes that apart from justification by faith the world is "guilty before God" (3:19 NKJV). Later, speaking of the destiny of both the saved and the lost, Paul affirms that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (6:23). Likewise, Paul recognized that in spite of his prayers, not all of his kinsmen would be saved (11:1ff.), but some would be "accursed" (9:3 NKJV). Indeed, the whole point of Romans is to show that only those who believe will be justified (1:17; cf. 3:21–26).

Fifth, Romans 9 declares that only the elect (not everyone) will be saved (cf. v. 14ff.) The rest God "endured with much longsuffering," waiting for them to repent (v. 9:22 NKJV; cf. 2 Peter 3:9) so they would not be "vessels of wrath prepared for destruction."

Sixth, and finally, there are numerous passages of Scripture that speak of the eternal destiny of lost people, including John's vivid vision at the end of the Revelation:

Then I saw a great white throne and him who was seated on it. Earth and sky fled from his presence, and there was no place for them. And I saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne, and books were opened. Another book was opened, which is the book of life. The dead were judged according to what they had done as recorded in the books. The sea gave up the dead that were in it, and death and Hades gave up the dead that were in them, and each person was judged according to what he had done. Then death and Hades were thrown into the lake of fire. The lake of fire is the second death. If anyone's name was not found written in the book of life, he was thrown into the lake of fire. (20:11–15)

In short, the evidence for universalism is lacking in Romans 5, and it is contrary to the clear teaching of other Scriptures. Furthermore, since the Bible does not contradict itself, the verses that can be interpreted in more than one way must be understood in the light of those that cannot.

The Contention That 1 Corinthians 15:24–25 Teaches Universalism

Then the end will come, when he [Jesus Christ] hands over the kingdom to God the Father after he has destroyed all dominion, authority and power. For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet.

Universalists claim this supports their thesis that eventually, in the end, everyone will be saved. On this text, Origen wrote:

If even that unreserved declaration of the apostle does not sufficiently inform us what is meant by “enemies being placed under His feet,” listen to what he says in the following words, “For all things must be put under Him.” What, then, is this “putting under by which all things must be made subject to Christ?” ... I am of the opinion that it is this very subjection by which we also wish to be subject to Him, by which the apostles also were subject, and all the saints who have been followers of Christ. (OFP, 1.6.1)

Response

It is clear from this text that Paul had no such idea in mind.

First, Paul is not speaking of the salvation of the lost but rather their condemnation. This is evident in words and phrases like destroy, put under his feet, put an end to all rule NKJV, and enemies. As we have seen, by contrast, the saved are called “friends” of God (cf. John 15:15).

Second, once again, these enemies are subjugated to God, not saved by Him. They are called God’s “footstool,” which doesn’t befit saints who will reign with Christ (cf. 2 Tim. 2:12), some even on their own thrones (cf. Matt. 19:28; Luke 19:17–19).

Third, it is “death” that will be “destroyed,” not the free choice of those who refuse to believe in God (cf. Matt. 23:37; 2 Peter 3:9). The only way to guarantee the ultimate salvation of all is for God to force the impenitent and reprobate, against their will, to submit to Him; He will not do this.

Fourth, that God will be “all in all” (1 Cor. 15:28) does not mean that all will be in God. Paul means that the Lord will reign supreme in all the universe, whether for salvation (of those who accept Him) or for subjugation (of those who reject Him).

Fifth, the phrase “all things” must be understood in its context. It does not say that all things will be saved, rather it simply asserts that “all things are made subject to Him” (v. 28 NKJV). But, again, they are made subject as “enemies” (v. 25). In fact, “all things” is used in parallel with “enemies” (in successive verses, 26–27).

Sixth, in this very passage Paul declares that only those who “believed” are “saved” (15:2). Indeed, he says in 1 Corinthians: “Do you not know that the wicked will not inherit the kingdom of God?” (6:9).

Seventh, and finally, heaven is not a place for God’s enemies, those He will have allegedly overpowered and forced against their will into the fold to love Him. This is precisely what a God of love cannot do; Jesus said so (cf. Matt. 23:37). First Corinthians 15 contains no hint of salvation for unbelievers.

The Contention That 2 Corinthians 5:19 Teaches Universalism

Paul told the Corinthians “that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men’s sins against them. And he has committed to us the message of reconciliation.” (Romans 11:15 also speaks of the reconciliation of the world.) On this basis universalists argue that “the world” was reconciled to God by Christ’s salvific work. Thus, all are saved on the basis of His sacrifice.

Response

In reply, one need only look at the context to see that universalism is not affirmed.

First, Paul indicates that actual reconciliation is for those who are “in Christ,” not for all human beings (v. 17).

Second, reconciliation is regarded as a process according to God’s purpose, not an accomplished fact for the whole world. It is God’s desire to save all (cf. 2 Peter 3:9), but all will not be saved (cf. Matt. 7:13–14; Rev. 20:11–15). The sense in which the whole world is reconciled to God is potential, not actual. That is, Christ’s death for all human beings made them reconcilable to God; otherwise, Paul would not be calling on them to “be reconciled to God” (v. 20).

Third, if all were already saved by what Christ did for them, what do we make of Paul’s exhortation to be “ambassadors for Christ” and to be “pleading” with the world to “be reconciled to God” (all (NKJV)? It is senseless to beg them to be reconciled to Him if in fact they already are in right relationship.

Fourth, and finally, to interpret this passage in favor of universalism is to say that Scripture contradicts itself, since many other passages clearly teach that all will not be saved.

The Contention That Ephesians 1:10 Teaches Universalism

Another verse misconstrued by universalists is Paul’s statement to the Ephesian Christians that in “the fullness of the times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; in Him” (NKJV).

Response

A careful examination of this text reveals that Paul is speaking here of believers, not unbelievers.

First, the context is about those “He chose ... in Him before the foundation of the world” (1:4 NKJV).

Second, the phrase in Christ is never used by Paul, or anywhere else in Scripture, of anyone but believers.

Third, that unbelievers are excluded is clear in that Paul does not refer to those “under the earth” as he does elsewhere when speaking of the lost (e.g., cf. Phil. 2:10).

Fourth, and finally, as already shown above, there is abundant evidence elsewhere in Paul’s writings (cf. 2 Thess. 1:7–9) and in the rest of Scripture that some will go to their eternal destiny without Christ.

The Contention That Philippians 2:10–11 Teaches Universalism

Paul foretells that one day at the name of Jesus every knee will bow, in heaven and on earth, and those under the earth, and every tongue will confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father, (NLT)

Universalists insist that unbelievers are clearly in view in the phrase “under the earth.” And if so, then all persons, even the wicked, will eventually be saved.

Response

While it is admitted by all that unbelievers will eventually confess that Jesus is Lord, nonetheless, there is no evidence here or elsewhere that they will be saved.

First of all, they will confess the fact that He is Lord; there is no reference to their believing in Him, which is necessary for salvation.

Also, even demons believe that God is, but they do not believe in God (cf. James 2:19). Likewise, believing that Jesus is Lord will not save anyone; only belief in Christ (James 2:21–26) brings salvation.

Furthermore, as for “those under the earth” in this text (i.e., the lost), their acknowledgment of Jesus will be a confession from their mouth. For salvation, Paul insists that one must both “confess with your mouth . . . and believe in your heart” (Rom. 10:9). Again, unbelievers will be subjugated; which indicates an unwilling act, whereas salvation is a free act.

The Contention That 1 Peter 3:18–20 Teaches Universalism

Christ died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, to bring you to God. He was put to death in the body but made alive by the Spirit, through whom also he went and preached to the spirits in prison who disobeyed long ago when God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built. In it only a few people, eight in all, were saved through water.

Response

Taken in its proper context, there is no support here for universalism.

First, there is no suggestion that Jesus offered the hope of salvation to these “spirits in prison.” The text does not say that Christ evangelized them, but simply that He proclaimed<sup>20</sup> the victory of His resurrection to them. This view fits the setting (the previous verse speaks of Christ’s victorious death and resurrection) and is in accord with the teaching of other New Testament texts (cf. Eph. 4:8; Col. 2:15).

Second, Peter is not speaking of all persons but a limited group “who disobeyed long ago when God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built” (v. 20).

Third, the Bible is clear that there is no second chance after death (cf. Heb. 9:27). The Revelation records the Great White Throne Judgment, in which those who are not found in the Book of Life are sent to the lake of fire (20:11–15). Luke records Christ’s teaching that once a person dies, he goes either to heaven or to hell (16:19–31), and that there is a great gulf fixed “so that those who want to pass” from one to the other cannot (v. 26 NKJV). The whole urgency of responding to God in this life, before we die, further supports the fact that there is no hope beyond the grave (cf. Prov. 29:1; John 3:36; 5:24).

Fourth, and finally, there is no good evidence that the phrase “spirits in prison” even refers to human beings. Nowhere else is such a phrase used of human beings in hell. Many scholars believe that the “spirits” who invaded humanity in “the days of Noah” were the “Sons of God” (used of angels in Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7). This fits with 2 Peter 2:4, where, immediately before he refers to the Flood, he mentions the angels sinning (v. 5; cf. Gen. 6:1–4). Whatever these “spirits” are, whether human or angelic, there is no foundation for the ideas that Peter is referring to all humankind or that all humans will be saved.

The Contention That 1 Peter 4:6 Teaches Universalism

“For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit” (KJV). It is argued by universalists that this passage is both (1) clearly referring to preaching the gospel and (2) preaching it to the dead. If so, then it implies a chance to be saved after death, which many universalists see as necessary to accomplish the salvation of all human beings.

Response

However, even granting these two points, it does not follow, for several reasons, that all will be saved.

First, Peter does not say that the gospel was preached to them after their death. This is an assumption not supported by the context or by other biblical texts. Indeed, the passage is better rendered, “For this is the reason the gospel was preached even to those who are now dead, so that they might be judged according to men in regard to the body, but live according to God in regard to the spirit.” In favor of this is the fact that the gospel “was preached” (in the past) to those who “are dead” (now, in the present).

Second, nowhere does Peter say that this alleged gospel preaching resulted in the salvation of all to whom it was given. This is another assumption not justified by this or any other scriptural statement. Indeed, there are numerous texts to the contrary.

Third, the implication of the passage is that not all will be saved. The preceding pronouncement (v. 5) speaks of the dead being judged and giving an “account” to God, not of their being unilaterally saved.

Fourth, and finally, the phrase “live according to God in the spirit” (NKJV) or “live according to God in regard to the spirit” does not necessarily denote salvation. When such phrases in the New Testament are used in connection with resurrection, they are teaching that, like Christ and because of His resurrection, everyone will be resurrected—not that everyone will be saved (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20–22). Indeed, Jesus said:

Do not be amazed at this, for a time is coming when all who are in their graves will hear his voice and come out—those who have done good will rise to live, and those who have done evil will rise to be condemned. (John 5:28–29)

In summary, all the texts offered in favor of universalism are found to be wanting. When each passage is carefully and contextually examined, there is no ground for concluding the ultimate and universal salvation for all humankind. In truth, when other passages of Scripture are also put forward, there is complete support of the view that not all persons will eventually be saved. Tragic as it is, the Bible clearly teaches that some persons will be lost forever.

THEOLOGICAL ARGUMENTS OFFERED FOR UNIVERSALISM

Faring no better are universalism's theological arguments, which are likewise inaccurate and insufficient. Each is based on a misconception of the nature of God and/or the nature of human beings.

The Argument From God's Omnibenevolence

Universalism is usually based on the notion that a God of love would never allow any of His creatures to perish. Love never fails, and it never gives up. The Hound of Heaven never stops pursuing until He captures us by His love. An omnibenevolent God not only loves all but does so for all time, both in this life and in the life to come. However long it takes His love to reach all His rebellious creatures, an all-loving God will take. So the universalist argues.

Response

However, as C. S. Lewis demonstrated, just the opposite is the case. While God does love the world (John 3:16) and doesn't desire that any should perish (cf. 2 Peter 3:9), nonetheless, His very nature as love demands that He not force His love on anyone (cf. Matt. 23:37).

When one says, "All will be saved," my reason retorts, "Without their will, or with it?" If I say, "Without their will," I at once perceive a contradiction; how can the supreme voluntary act of self-surrender be involuntary? If I say, "With their will," my reason replies, "How, if they will not give in?" (Lewis, PP, 106–07).

Once again, Lewis observed:

There are only two kinds of people in the end: those who say to God, "Thy will be done," and those to whom God says, "Thy will be done" (GD, 69).

Further, since God is omniscient and knows all future free acts, He knows that some people will never freely repent. Knowing they are irredeemable and reprobate, He knows His love will never win them over, no matter how long He pursues them. Hence, His "Spirit shall not strive with man forever" (Gen. 6:3 NKJV). There is a point of no return, and God knows it. Hence, "It is appointed for men to die once, but after this the judgment" (Heb. 9:27 NKJV).

What is more, the Bible makes it very clear that there will be an eternal hell and that there will be people in it (Matt. 25:41; 2 Thess. 1:7–9; Rev. 20:11–15). In fact, Jesus had more to say about hell than He did about heaven. He warned, "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather, be afraid of the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28). He added of those who reject Him, "As the weeds are pulled up and burned in the fire, so it will be at the end of the age" (Matt. 13:40). In His great Mount Olivet Discourse, our Lord declared, "Then he [God] will say to those on his left, 'Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels' " (Matt. 25:41). Elsewhere He affirmed: "If your hand causes you to sin, cut it off. It is better for you to enter life maimed than with two hands to go into hell, where the fire never goes out" (Mark 9:43). In a vivid, self-telling story that, unlike the parables, uses an actual person's name (Lazarus), Jesus said:

In hell, where [the rich man] was in torment, he looked up and saw Abraham far away, with Lazarus by his side. So he called to him, "Father Abraham, have pity on me and send Lazarus to dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue, because I am in agony in this fire."

But Abraham replied, “Son, remember that in your lifetime you received your good things, while Lazarus received bad things, but now he is comforted here and you are in agony. And besides all this, between us and you a great chasm has been fixed, so that those who want to go from here to you cannot, nor can anyone cross over from there to us.”

He answered, “Then I beg you, father, send Lazarus to my father’s house, for I have five brothers. Let him warn them, so that they will not also come to this place of torment.”

Abraham replied, “They have Moses and the Prophets; let them listen to them” (Luke 16:23–29).

The Argument From God’s Omnipotence

Some have also argued for universalism from God’s omnipotence. Origen declared: “Nothing is impossible to the Omnipotent, nor is anything incapable of restoration to its Creator” (OFP, 3.6.5). This, of course, implies that God desires by His goodness to do so, a position supported by many Scriptures (e.g., 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9). If God wants to save all, and if He can save all (i.e., He is all-powerful), it would seem to follow that He will save all.

Response

Two points should be made in reply.

First, God’s attributes do not operate in contradiction to one another. As we have repeatedly observed, He is internally consistent in His nature. This is why the Bible insists that “it is impossible for God to lie” (Heb. 6:18). This is also the reason that His power must be exercised in accord with His love; that is, God cannot do what is unloving.

Second, as already demonstrated above, it would be unloving and contradictory for God to force people to love Him. Love by its very nature can work persuasively but not coercively. If some refuse to be persuaded (as the Bible says some will), then God will not coerce them into His kingdom. Satan, in Paradise Lost by John Milton (1608–1674), declares: “Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven.” To add a final word, God will respond, “Have it your way.”

The Argument From the Reformatory View of Justice

Origen also argued that God’s justice has in view reformation, not punishment. He claimed that “the fury of God’s vengeance is profitable for the purgation of souls.... The punishment, also, which is said to be applied by fire, is understood to be applied with the object of healing” (OFP, 2.10.6). He added,

Those who have been removed from their primal state of blessedness have not been removed irrecoverably, but have been placed under the rule of those holy and blessed orders which we have described; and by availing themselves of the aid of these, and being remolded by salutary principles and discipline, they may recover themselves, and be restored to their condition of happiness. (ibid., 1.6.2)

Response

There are several problems with using God’s obvious desire that persons reform their lives to prove that all will be saved in the end.

First, contrary to both Scripture and fact, the reformatory view of justice assumes that all persons freely choose to be reformed (cf. Matt. 23:37; Rev. 20:10–15).

Second, again contrary to Scripture and fact, the reformatory view of justice predicates that no decisions are final. This is incorrect; as we have seen, suicide, for example, is both one-way and final. As previously cited, the Bible declares, regarding the afterlife, that “man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment” (Heb. 9:27).

Third, the reformatory view of justice is contrary to the reality of justice, which is penal, not reformatory. God’s absolute justice demands that a penalty be paid for sin (see Lev. 17:11; Ezek. 18:20).

Fourth, the reformatory view of justice is contrary to the substitutionary death of Christ. “Christ died for our sins” (1 Cor. 15:3). “Christ died for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, to bring you to God” (1 Peter 3:18). “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). To claim God is only interested in reforming sinners, and not punishing unrepentant sin, is contrary to the very concept of Christ’s vicarious atonement. If sin need not be punished, why did Jesus have to pay the awful price for sin?

Fifth, and finally, God is indeed interested in reformation: Reformation is what this life is all about. But if people refuse to be reformed during this life, then punishment is what the afterlife is about. This is why God is so longsuffering, not willing that any should perish (2 Peter 3:9).

The Argument From God’s Wisdom

Origen offered an argument for universalism from God’s wisdom:

God, by the ineffable skill of His wisdom, transforming and restoring all things, in whatever manner they are made, to some useful aim, and to the common advantage of all, recalls those very creatures which differed so much from each other in mental conformation to one agreement of labour and purpose; so that, although they are under the influence of different motives, they nevertheless complete the fullness and perfection of one world, and the very variety of minds tends to one end of perfection. [For] it is one power which grasps and holds together all the diversity of the world, and leads the different movements towards one work, lest so immense an undertaking as that of the world should be dissolved by the dissensions of souls. (Origen, OFP, IV.II.1)

Response

Here again the universalist overlooks several important truths.

For one thing, God’s wisdom does not act contrary to His love, which cannot force anyone to do something they do not choose to do.

For another, the fact that God is infinitely wise allows Him to know that not everyone will freely choose to serve Him. This being the case, it would be contrary to God’s wisdom to attempt to save people He knows will never freely accept His gracious offer of salvation.

In addition, there is a contradiction within the universalist view at this point. Many, like Origen, argue,

God, the Father of all things, in order to ensure the salvation of all His creatures through the ineffable plan of His word and wisdom, so arranged each of these, that every spirit, whether soul or rational existence, however called, should not be compelled by force, against the liberty of his own will, to any other course than that to which the motives of his own mind lead him (lest by so doing the power of exercising free-will should seem to be taken away, which certainly would produce a change in the nature of the being itself). (OFP, 2.1.2, emphasis added)

But this is precisely what God cannot do, namely (1) “ensure the salvation of all” and (2) “compel by force.” As long as someone refuses to freely accept His love, a loving God cannot ensure he will be saved. In this case, as C. S. Lewis aptly put it, there must be a “great divorce.”

AN EVALUATION OF UNIVERSALISM

In addition to the lack of biblical and theological support for universalism, there are many additional biblical and rational arguments against it.

Universalism Is Contrary to the Image of God

God made humankind in His image, which includes the freedom to choose. In order to guarantee that everyone will be saved, those who refuse to love God would have to be forced to love Him against their will, and “forced freedom” isn’t freedom at all.

Universalism Is Contrary to God’s Love

Forced love is not only contrary to freedom, it isn’t love at all, but hate. Forced love is a kind of assault. No one who is truly loving forces him-or herself on another.

Universalism Is Contrary to God’s Justice

God is absolutely holy, and as such He must punish sin. Therefore, as long as people are living in sin and rebellion against God, He must punish them.<sup>33</sup>

Universalism Is Contrary to Biblical Teaching on Hell

Once again, Jesus taught that not only is there a hell that was created for Satan and his angels, but, tragically, there will also be persons in it.

Universalism Is Without Scriptural Foundation

As shown above, universalism (1) is based on verses wrenched out of context, and (2) it ignores other clear passages that teach the opposite.

Universalism Is Based on a Kind of Freudian Illusion

Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) taught that any belief based on a mere wish that something be true is an illusion (see FI, chapter 6). No loving person would want anyone else to suffer in hell forever; however, strong desire to the contrary seems to be a primary impulse in universalist thinking, setting up an implausible and unbiblical system of belief.

THE HISTORIC FOUNDATION AGAINST UNIVERSALISM

As stated earlier, with rare exceptions (like Origen), it is difficult to find significant fathers in the long centuries of the church, up to and through the Reformation, who embraced this unorthodox teaching. Not until the rise of modern liberalism do we encounter substantial denial of eternal suffering for the unrepentant.

Early Fathers

Down through the centuries, the stalwarts of the church have almost universally supported the biblical position that some human beings (viz., the lost) will undergo conscious, eternal punishment. This is in contradiction to universalism, which insists that eventually all persons will be saved. As we have seen, those few who held contrary views (like Origen) fortunately were condemned by orthodox theologians and councils of the church.

Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165)

For among us the prince of the wicked spirits is called the serpent, and Satan, and the devil, as you can learn by looking into our writings. And that he would be sent into the fire with his host, and the men who follow him, and would be punished for an endless duration, Christ foretold. (FA, I. XXVIII in Roberts and Donaldson, ANF)

Irenaeus (c. 125–c. 202)

“Moreover,” he says, “the book of life was opened, and the dead were judged out of those things that were written in the books, according to their works; and death and hell were sent into the lake of fire, the second death.” Now this is what is called Gehenna, which the Lord styled eternal fire. “And if any one,” it is said, “was not found written in the book of life, he was sent into the lake of fire” (AH, I.V.XXXV in ibid.).

Cyprian (200–258)

For God, as He is merciful, so He exacts obedience to His precepts, and indeed carefully exacts it; and as He invites to the banquet, so the man that hath not a wedding garment He binds hands and feet, and casts him out beyond the assembly of the saints. He has prepared heaven, but He has also prepared hell. He has prepared places of refreshment, but He has also prepared eternal punishment. He has prepared the light that none can approach unto, but He has also prepared the vast and eternal gloom of perpetual night. (EC, V.XXX.VII in Schaff, NPNF)

Lactantius (c. 240–c. 320)

Both therefore spoke with truth, but yet both incorrectly; for the ways themselves ought to have been referred to life, their ends to death. We therefore speak better and more truly, who say that the two ways belong to heaven and hell, because immortality is promised to the righteous, and everlasting punishment is threatened to the unrighteous. (OTW, VII.III)

Medieval Fathers

Augustine (354–430)

For then he perceives that the whole human race was condemned in its rebellious head by a divine judgment so just, that if not a single member of the race had been redeemed, no one could justly have questioned the justice of God; and that it was right that those who are redeemed should be redeemed in such a way as to show, by the greater number who are unredeemed and left in their just condemnation, what the whole race deserved, and whither the deserved judgment of God would lead even the redeemed, did not His undeserved mercy interpose, so that every mouth might be stopped of those who wish to glory in their own merits, and that he that glorieth might glory in the Lord. (E, 99)

It is in vain, then, that some, indeed very many, make moan over the eternal punishment, and perpetual, unintermitted torments of the lost, and say they do not believe it shall be so; not, indeed, that they directly oppose themselves to Holy Scripture, but, at the suggestion of their own feelings, they soften down everything that seems hard, and give a milder turn to statements which they think are rather designed to terrify than to be received as literally true. (ibid.)

The will, of its own accord, may tend to an evil, through the removal of some obstacle: for instance, if a man be prevented from sinning, not through sin being in itself displeasing to him, but through hope of eternal life, or fear of hell, if hope give place to despair, or fear to presumption, he will end in sinning through certain malice, being freed from the bridle, as it were. (ST, II.78.2)

Further, a sin does not deserve greater punishment through being united to another sin; for Divine justice has allotted its punishment to each sin. Now a venial sin deserves eternal punishment if it be united to a mortal sin in a lost soul, because in hell there is no remission of sins. Therefore venial sin by itself deserves eternal punishment. (ibid., II.87.5)

Reformation Fathers

John Calvin (1509–1564)

God once established by his eternal and unchangeable plan those whom he long before determined once for all to receive into salvation, and those whom, on the other hand, he would devote to destruction.... He has barred the door of life to those whom he has given over to damnation. (ICR, III.21.7)

Indeed many ... accept election in such terms as to deny that anyone is condemned. But they do this very ignorantly and childishly, since election itself could not stand except as set over against reprobation. (ibid., III.23.1)

“Man falls according as God’s providence ordains, but he falls by his own fault” (ibid., III.23.8).

Post-Reformation Teachers

Jacob Arminius (1560–1609)

For if sin is a worse evil than damnation ... since the former is opposed to divine good, and the latter to human good, then truly it is greater to ordain one to sin than to ordain to hell, to create a man that he might sin, than that he might perish. If, however, accuracy of statement is to be sought, it should be affirmed that, if a man is ordained to commit sin, then he cannot sin. For sin is a voluntary act, and the decree of God in reference to sin introduces a necessity of sinning.

Further, if a man is created that he may be condemned, then he cannot be condemned by God. For condemnation is the act of a just judge. But a just judge does not condemn one unless he is wicked by his own fault, apart from necessity; and he is not wicked, apart from necessity, and of his own fault, who is created that he may sin, and thus perish. (WJA, III.377)

When addressing the issue, “It is urged that it cannot be consistent with the justice of God to inflict a really infinite penalty on such a creature of man,” Hodge wrote:

We are incompetent judges of the penalty which sin deserves. We have no adequate apprehension of its inherent guilt, of the dignity of the person against whom it is committed, or of the extent of the evil which it is suited to produce. The proper end of punishment is retribution and prevention. What is necessary for that end, God only knows; and, therefore, the penalty which He imposes on sin is the only just measure of its ill deserts.

It is often said that sin is an infinite evil because committed against a person of infinite dignity, and therefore deserves an infinite penalty.... If the evil of a single sin, and that the smallest, lasts forever, it is in one sense an infinite evil, although in comparison with other sins, or with the whole mass of sin ever committed, it may appear a mere trifle. The guilt of sin is infinite in the sense that we can set no limits to its turpitude or to the evil which it is adapted to produce....

Relief on this subject is sought from the consideration that as the lost continue to sin forever they may justly be punished forever. To this, however, it is answered that the retributions of eternity are threatened for the sins done in the body. This is true; nevertheless, it is also true, first, that sin in its nature is alienation and separation from God, and as God is the source of all holiness and happiness, separation from Him is of necessity the forfeiture of all good; secondly, that this separation is from its nature final and consequently involves endless sinfulness and misery. (ST, III.878)

William G. T. Shedd (1820–1894)

The punishment inflicted upon the lost was regarded by the Fathers of the Ancient Church, with very few exceptions, as endless.... The [Medieval] Church received the traditional doctrine respecting endless retribution. Heaven and hell were separated by an absolute and impassable gulf, but the intermediate space between them was subdivided into purgatory, which lies nearest to hell.... The Modern Church has accepted the traditional faith upon this subject. In proportion as the inspiration and infallibility of Revelation have been conceded, the doctrine of an absolute and therefore endless punishment of sin has maintained itself, it being impossible to eliminate the tenet from the Christian Scriptures, except by a mutilation of the canon, or a violently capricious exegesis. The denial of the eternity of future punishments, in modern times, has consequently been a characteristic of those parties and individuals who have rejected, either partially or entirely, the dogma of infible inspiration. (HCC, II.414–19)

Just as in the past, the question of the future state of the wicked has created a considerable amount of controversy in our day. The doctrine of an everlasting punishment appears to some to be an outmoded or sub-Christian view. It, together with angels and demons, is often one of the first topics of Christian belief to be demythologized. Part of the problem stems from what appears to be a tension between the love of God, a cardinal characteristic of God's nature, and His judgment. Yet, however we regard the doctrine of everlasting punishment, it is clearly taught in Scripture....

If there is one basic characteristic of hell, it is, in contrast to heaven, the absence of God or banishment from his presence. It is an experience of intense anguish, whether it involve physical suffering or mental distress or both. There are other aspects of the situation of the lost individual which contribute to its misery. One is a sense of loneliness, of having seen the glory and greatness of God, of having realized that he is the Lord of all, and then of being cut off. There is the realization that this separation is permanent.

Similarly, the condition of one's moral and spiritual self is permanent. Whatever one is at the end of life will continue for all eternity. There is no basis for expecting change for the better. Thus, hopelessness comes over the individual. (CT, 1234–35)

Earl Radmacher (b. 1933)

Ultimately, everyone, unregenerate and regenerate, will be judged by their works. At the Great White Throne Judgment the unregenerate dead, "small and great," will be resurrected to stand before God and to be "judged according to their works" (Rev. 20:12–13). Their works will demonstrate that they deserve eternal condemnation (20:15). Somehow in the infinite mind of God every work ever performed by every unsaved person is a matter of record. People who have taken their chances on their works as a means of gaining entrance to heaven will find that their works fall short of God's righteous demands for eternal fellowship with Him. When the "books" in heaven reveal that unbelievers fall short of what is required, another book, the Book of Life, will be opened to show that their names are not written there. (S, 173)

CONCLUSION

In summary, there is no support in Scripture for the illusory hope that everyone will be saved. The basic reason is rather simple: God created human beings with free will, and those who choose not to believe cannot be forced to believe. God is love, and love works persuasively, but never coercively. There is a hell; in the words of C. S. Lewis,

I willingly believe that the damned are, in one sense, successful rebels to the end; that the doors of hell are locked on the inside. I do not mean that the ghosts may not wish to come out of hell ... but they certainly do not will even the first preliminary stages of that self-abandonment through which alone the soul can reach any good. They enjoy forever the horrible freedom they have demanded, and are therefore self-enslaved. (PP, 115–16)

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

THE EXCLUSIVITY OF SALVATION (PLURALISM)

Christianity claims to be the true faith. Jesus says there is only one God (Mark 12:29) and that He is the only way to salvation (John 14:6; cf. 3:18; 10:1, 9–10). This is at odds with the dominant trend in modern comparative religion. Alister McGrath (b. 1953) succinctly summarizes the protest of pluralism:

How can Christianity's claims to truth be taken seriously when there are so many rival alternatives and when "truth" itself has become a devalued notion? ... [Allegedly,] no one can lay claim to possession of the truth. It is all a question of perspective. All claims to truth are equally valid. There is no universal or privileged vantage point that allows anyone to decide what is right and what is wrong. ("CPCCC" in JETS, 365)

For the exploration of this issue, several terms need to be distinguished.

Pluralism is the belief that every religion is true: Each provides a genuine encounter with the Ultimate, and while one may be better than others, all are adequate.

Relativism, similar to pluralism, claims that every religion is true for the one adhering to it. If there is no objective religious truth, then there are no criteria by which we can discern that one religion is true or better than another.

Inclusivism maintains that one religion is explicitly true, and all others are implicitly true.

Exclusivism holds that only one religion is true and that what is opposed to it in other religions is false.

That the unparalleled saving work of Christ is the only means of salvation is one of the great principles of Protestantism. Along with "Scripture alone" (Lat: sola scriptura) and "faith alone" (Lat: sola fidei), "salvation by grace alone through Christ alone" stands at the heart of evangelical theology.

THE BIBLICAL BASIS FOR THE EXCLUSIVITY OF CHRIST'S SALVIFIC WORK

The fully bloomed New Testament doctrine that our salvation is possible only through the work of Christ is rooted in the Old Testament. From the very first Old Testament prediction about Jesus (Gen. 3:15) to the final prophecy (Mal. 4:3, 5), there is one and only one way by which human beings can be restored to relationship with God—through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

The Exclusive Soteriological Claims of Christ

Jesus unequivocally states that He is the only means of salvation: "Whoever believes in [me] is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18). "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life, but whoever rejects the Son will not see life, for God's wrath remains on him" (3:36).

I tell you the truth, the man who does not enter the sheep pen by the gate, but climbs in by some other way, is a thief and a robber.... I am the gate; whoever enters through me will be saved. He will come in and go out, and find pasture. (10:1, 9)

Again: "If you do not believe that I am the one I claim to be, you will indeed die in your sins" (8:24). The declaration of Jesus couldn't be more clear: "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (14:6).

The Exclusive Soteriological Claims of Scripture

Not only does Jesus claim to be the only way to God, but His immediate followers also confirm His message: “Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved” (Peter, in Acts 4:12). Paul adds, “There is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tim. 2:5). The writer of Hebrews declares that “when [Christ] had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God ... because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy” (10:12, 14). John concludes:

Anyone who does not believe God has made him out to be a liar, because he has not believed the testimony God has given about his Son. And this is the testimony: God has given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have life. (1 John 5:10–12)

The Soteriological Necessity of Believing in Christ

It is noteworthy that not only is the work of Christ needed for our salvation, but so is believing in the Christ who performed that work. Peter says there is no salvation apart from His name (Acts 4:12). John emphasizes that believing in “the Son” [Christ] is salvifically mandated (John 3:18, 36; 1 John 5:10–12). As we have seen, Jesus Himself explicitly confirms this (John 8:24), and Paul also speaks about the need for knowledge of and belief in Christ:

“Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved.” How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them? (Rom. 10:13–14)

ANSWERING OBJECTIONS TO THE EXCLUSIVE CLAIMS OF CHRIST

Many protests have been raised against Christological exclusivism. From a biblical point of view, three are noteworthy.

Objection One—Based on Old Testament Saints Not Having Explicit Belief in Christ

It seems evident that not all of the Old Testament believers had explicit knowledge of the death and resurrection of Christ for their sins, yet the New Testament teaches that this is essential to salvation (cf. Rom. 10:9). Indeed, Paul claims this is the heart of the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1–6), which alone is the power of God to save (Rom. 1:16). In spite of some early predictions about Christ’s death (Dan. 9; Isa. 53; Zech. 12) and resurrection (Ps. 2, 16) and of somehow foreseeing His day (John 8:56), there is no indication that every pre-Christian believer understood and overtly believed that Jesus would die for his or her sins and then be raised from the dead. Certainly the Ninevites who repented in response to Jonah’s preaching did not have this knowledge (Jonah 3), but they were saved.

In addition, it is beyond unlikely that every Israelite who brought a lamb to the temple understood that the sacrifice foreshadowed the Messiah, the coming Lamb of God who would take away the sins of the world (cf. John 1:29). Hebrews 11:6 seems to indicate what is salvifically sufficient: “Anyone who comes to [God] must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him.” That is, soteriological necessity appears to be fulfilled if we believe (1) that God exists, and (2) that He will graciously save those who believe in Him. If this is correct, faith in Christ seems not to be needed for salvation.

Response to Objection One

First, there is a difference between what is absolutely necessary and what is normatively necessary. It does not appear from Scripture to be absolutely necessary for God to require all people in all times to have explicit belief in the death and resurrection of Christ for salvation. Nonetheless, there is no reason God cannot have decreed that such faith is normatively necessary after Christ came and was proclaimed to the world. Paul implies exactly this: “[God] has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed. He has given proof of this to all men by raising him from the dead” (Acts 17:31).

What was implicit in the Old Testament became explicit in the New Testament: Jesus of Nazareth, born of the Virgin Mary, was the long anticipated Passover Lamb (cf. John 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:7). When Old Testament typology (implicit) became New Testament reality (explicit)—when the One prophesied became present—God apparently required that everyone must now “believe in the Lord Jesus” in order to “be saved” (Acts 16:31). Paul confirmed, “I have declared to both Jews and Greeks that they must turn to God in repentance and have faith in our Lord Jesus” (Acts 20:21).

Second, there is a biblical progress of revelation. As time passed, God, the Creator of time, revealed more and more about His plan of redemption. For example, at first it was revealed that the coming Savior would be the seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15), then the descendent of Shem (9:26), the offspring of Abraham (12:3), from the tribe of Judah (49:10), the son of David (2 Sam. 7:12), and so forth. With each new revelation comes a new obligation for believers to embrace it, just as when a new law is officially promulgated, citizens are obligated to incorporate it and live by it. “Ignorance” of the law (or truth) is not a valid excuse; “now [God] commands all people everywhere to repent” (Acts 17:30).

Specifically, then, Christ’s fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy and typology makes it incumbent upon us to accept this revealed divine truth. For example, when the disciples of John the Baptist (who knew only of John’s baptism and hadn’t yet heard that the ascended Christ had sent the Holy Spirit) heard the message of Paul about this subsequent revelation, they were obligated to believe it. They did, and hence, received the Spirit (Acts 19:1–6).

Indeed, that progressive revelation brings progressive responsibility to believe seems to be the overall emphasis of the book of Hebrews. After showing the Jewish believers that Christ was “better than” the angels, Moses, Joshua, and the Old Testament priests, the author strongly exhorted them to believe this or they would receive the judgment of God. In no uncertain words, after instructing them that Christ offered “one sacrifice for sins forever” (10:12 NKJV), he warned them that “if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins” (10:26 NKJV). Thus, in view of progressive revelation, while it may not be absolutely necessary for a person to have explicit faith in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ in order to be saved, God has willed such belief to be normatively necessary.

Objection Two—Based on the Difference Between Fact and Knowledge of the Fact

Inclusivists argue that exclusivism overlooks the difference between the fact of Christ’s salvific work and the knowledge of the fact: They insist that a person cannot be saved without the former but can without the latter. For example, I can receive shoes as a gift, mailed to me from an unknown donor, without knowing who sent them (or, for that matter, which cow died to provide the leather). Why, then, can’t a person receive the gift of salvation, provided by the death of Christ, without knowing about His sacrifice or why it was made?

Response to Objection Two

Exclusivists do not deny the logical possibility of being saved without the knowledge of how salvation was made possible. In fact, as already mentioned, it appears that many Old Testament believers were not fully aware of Christ's someday sacrifice and resurrection. However, the question is not what is logically possible but what is actually true. What we're really asking is this: How much knowledge of His plan of salvation does God require of us in this present age as a condition for our receiving His gift of salvation? The answer, as the above verses indicate, appears to include explicit knowledge of the gospel.

Objection Three—Based on the Accusation That Exclusivism Is Unfair to the Unreached

If explicit knowledge of Christ's salvific work is a necessary condition for salvation, then isn't it unjust of God to condemn the unevangelized to eternal separation from Him? It seems blatantly unfair to punish people for irresponsibility in an area they didn't know they were responsible.

Response to Objection Three

A more complete response to this objection is provided later. It is sufficient here to note that the premise of the objection is wrong, for it assumes that the unevangelized are without awareness as to what God requires of them. To the contrary, He declares that they know, and know "clearly," and thus are "without excuse" (Rom. 1:19–20). Further, they have truth "written on their hearts" and will justly perish if they refuse to respond (2:12–15). The light of creation and conscience is sufficient for their condemnation, yet the Bible promises that should they respond to the light they have, God can provide the knowledge sufficient for salvation. As Peter said, "In every nation whoever fears Him [God] and works righteousness is accepted by Him" (Acts 10:35 NKJV). Hebrews adds that "he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him" (11:6 NKJV). Abraham reminds, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:25 KJV).

AN EXAMINATION OF THE CLAIMS OF RELIGIOUS PLURALISM

Against exclusivism, religious pluralism claims that every religion is true, since each one provides a genuine encounter with what its adherents consider to be the Ultimate [God]. One religion may be more or less better than the others, but all are adequate. As such, pluralism is diametrically opposed to biblical exclusivism, which claims that Christianity is true and that anything opposed to it is false. Again, herein is the problem that McGrath accurately captures:

How can Christianity's claims to truth be taken seriously when there are so many rival alternatives and when "truth" itself has become a devalued notion? ... [It is alleged that] no one can lay claim to possession of the truth. It is all a question of perspective. All claims to truth are equally valid. There is no universal or privileged vantage point that allows anyone to decide what is right and what is wrong. ("CPECC" in JETS, 365)

Pluralists set forth their arguments on several fronts. Each will be stated and treated in order. First, we will examine the claim of the alleged moral and spiritual equality of all religions.

The Argument That All Religions Teach Similar Truth

Pluralist John Hick (b. 1922) argues,

I have not found that the people of the other world religions are, in general, on a different moral and spiritual level from Christians.... The basic ideal of love and concern for others and of treating them as you would wish them to treat you is, in fact, taught by all the great religious traditions. (“PV” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 39)

Hick contends that this is proven by statements found in other religions that are similar to the Golden Rule (ibid., 39–40).

Response

First, it is questionable that “the fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22) can actually be found in non-Christian doctrines. While no one denies there are “good people” who adhere to other faiths, their “goodness” does not demonstrate that they are manifesting the highest moral standard of love (agape). A man’s generosity, kindness, and even death for his beliefs does not show that he lives out of true love (e.g., 1 Cor. 13:3). God’s common grace does enable even evil people to do good (e.g., Matt. 7:11); nevertheless, it is apparent that only God’s supernatural love (agape) can compel a person to express it (cf. John 15:13; Rom. 5:6–8; 1 John 4:7).

Likewise, while many believe that William James (1842–1910) proved the equality of all forms of goodness in Varieties of Religious Experience, Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), in Religious Affections, convincingly showed that Christian godliness provides unique manifestations. My own decades of observation seem to confirm that there is a difference in the highest level of Christian and non-Christian piety in favor of Christianity. For example, Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, and Islam have produced neither a Mother Teresa (1910–1997) nor the self-sacrificing agape love Jesus singles out as being unparalleled (John 15:13).

Second, even a demonstration of some sort of practiced moral equality among most adherents of the world’s prominent religions would not establish either the equality or inferiority of the Christian faith’s moral teachings.

For one thing, a person flawlessly practicing a lesser moral code may appear to be “better” than a person imperfectly living in accordance with a higher one. In order to make a fair comparison, one must do two things: (1) Consider the highest moral teachings of each religion, and (2) compare the lives of the adherents who best exemplify the standards of each. For instance, doing so with Christianity and Hinduism and then evaluating the lives of Mother Teresa and Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) demonstrates the matchlessness of Christian compassion for the needy.

What is more, we must differentiate between what was inherent in another religious paradigm before Christian influence and what was incorporated into it as the result of Christian example. Hinduism as a system does not generate social compassion; the societal beneficence found in some current forms of Hinduism are not indigenous. Such humanitarianism is an import from Christian faith and practice; in fact, the degree to which Gandhi himself displayed such compassion can be traced to his Christian training and to his self-confessed admiration for the teaching of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount.

Also, finding a moral principle akin to Judeo-Christianity’s Golden Rule (cf. Matt. 7:12) does not demonstrate the moral equality of all religions. This is a manifestation of general revelation, that is, the law of God written upon the hearts of all (Rom. 2:12–15). But general revelation neither contradicts nor equals special revelation. While applied Christian morality has produced dynamic social compassion, Eastern religions have produced stagnant societies, and Islam has created abusive and unloving ones.<sup>18</sup>

Third, Hick’s analysis begs the question: Only by assuming that the moral common denominator of all religions is the standard by which they should all be judged does he arrive at the obvious conclusion that they are all equal. He had to negate the unequaled aspects of Christian morality in order to show that Christianity is not superlative, which he seems to acknowledge in this confession:

[The] acceptance of some form of the pluralistic view prompts each to de-emphasize and eventually winnow out that aspect of its self-understanding that entails a claim to unique superiority among the religions of the world. (“PV” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 51)

Fourth, the moral manifestation of a belief does not settle the truth question. For example, the fact that there are “good” Mormons does not prove Joseph Smith (1805–1844) was a true prophet. Indeed, it is likely that he wasn’t, since, for instance, he gave demonstrably false prophecies.<sup>21</sup> How adherents live is, at best, a manifestation of their moral code, which may or may not have anything to do with whether their religion’s central teachings about God and salvation are true. Truth is what corresponds to reality; consequently, a worldview is true only if its fundamental tenets correspond to the real world, not if its followers live “good” lives.<sup>23</sup>

Fifth, and finally, the moral preeminence of Christianity does not rest on the imperfection of Christ’s followers but on the perfection of Jesus Christ Himself. The ultimate test is not based on our fallible morality but on His unblemished character. Accordingly, Christianity has a moral peerlessness that is recognized by even strongly non-evangelical theologians, such as Paul Tillich (1886–1965):

Is Jesus unique only because history or historical factors converge in a certain way—in a uniquely significant way—at the time of his life? ... No, no, no! I have now given already at least three answers to this. My chief answer was the lack of any “scar” which would show [in Jesus] an estrangement from God.... Another was the total self-sacrifice of him who is the Christ ... The third answer was that he shows the presence, in his suffering on the cross, of an utter humility. (UC, 156)

One could also add a life full of incomparable miracles that climaxes in Jesus’ resurrection from the dead.

The Argument for the Alleged Redemptive Equality of All Religions

Another argument set forth by pluralists insists that there is no significant salvific difference among the world’s renowned religions. Regarding the Christian belief in an exceptional mode of salvation, Hick suggests this either begs the question or is not practically evident:

If we define salvation as being forgiven and accepted by God because of Jesus’ death on the cross, then it becomes a tautology that Christianity alone knows and is able to preach the source of salvation. [And] if we define salvation as an actual human change, a gradual transformation from natural self-centeredness (with all the human evils that flow from this) to a radically new orientation centered in God and manifest in the “fruit of the Spirit,” then it seems clear that salvation is taking place within all of the world religions—and taking place, so far as we can tell, to more or less the same extent. (“PV” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 43)

Furthermore, what is allegedly common to all religions is an adequate response to the Ultimate:

[All religions] seem to constitute more or less equally authentic human awareness of and response to the Ultimate, the Real, the final ground and source of everything.... [There are] a plurality of religious traditions constituting different, but apparently more or less equally salvific, human responses to the Ultimate. These are the great world faiths, (ibid., 45, 47).

Response

Examination reveals several errors in his analysis.

First, Hick again begs the question—his whole argument is based on the a priori assumption that all religions have a proper (correct, acceptable) relation to what is truly Ultimate. In truth, perhaps they are not properly related or even connected at all to what is actually Ultimate. Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) pointed out in Future of an Illusion that deception is possible, and Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–1872) observed that “religion” can potentially be a simple projection of one’s own imagination (EC, chapter 1). Also, Paul Tillich noted that a person can have an ultimate commitment to what is less than Ultimate, which he calls “demonization” (UC, 5).

Second, Hick incorrectly posits that all religions are nothing but human response to the Ultimate. This too begs the question, this time in favor of an antisupernatural perspective. In fact, it assumes a pantheistic view of the Ultimate as that which, in the various world religions, transcends all particular (cultural) manifestations of It.

Third, denial of the truth of any specific religion is itself a form of exclusivism; in this case, the argument favors the particular view known as pantheism in order to deny the particularity of a view known as Christian theism. Even the pantheist makes a particular (specific, nongeneral, exclusivist) truth claim when his assertion opposes nonpantheistic views. Assuming this kind of pantheistic position as a basis for one’s analysis of all religions, including nonpantheistic worldviews, once again simply begs the question. When the pluralist denies that one particular religion is true as opposed to any others—in an effort to refute exclusivism—he himself thereby makes an exclusivist truth claim; the objection, therefore, is self-defeating.

Fourth, pluralism frequently degenerates to the position that whatever is sincerely believed is true. However, this would mean, for example, that it matters not if one is a passionate Satanist or white-supremacist—in any event, his view is truth. In refutation, sincerity is not a test of reality. As has been said countless times, many sincere people, on many issues, have been sincerely wrong. All truth is true, no matter how we choose to respond to it.

Fifth, and finally, Hick’s contention implies that all truth claims are a matter of both/and, not either/or. The fact is that opposites cannot both be true, for the opposite of true is false. For instance, Hindu pantheism and Christian theism cannot both be true, since they affirm mutually exclusive worldviews.<sup>30</sup> Likewise, Christianity, which affirms Christ’s literal death and resurrection, and Islam, which denies them, cannot both be correct.

The Argument That Christ Is Not Unique

Another pluralist objection to exclusivism is the allegation that Christ’s excellence does not surpass that of other religious leaders. This attempt to destroy the uniqueness of Christianity is based on a denial of the historicity of the New Testament. As for the Christian teaching about Christ as God incarnate in human flesh, Hick states that there are two primary problems.

The First Allegation

The first problem is that the historical Jesus did not teach this doctrine... Among mainline New Testament scholars there is today a general consensus that these are not pronouncements of the historical Jesus but words put in his mouth some sixty or seventy years later by a Christian writer expressing the theology that had developed in his part of the expanding church. (“PV” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 52–53)

Hick then presents a number of biblical writers who supposedly agreed that “Jesus did not claim deity for himself” (ibid., 53).

Response

Hick is dreadfully misinformed on the matter. The historicity and reliability of the New Testament documents have been abundantly confirmed. The related New Testament books were not written after the eyewitnesses were dead but while they were still alive. The gospel of John was written by John the apostle (21:24). The gospel of Luke was written by Doctor Luke, a contemporary disciple who knew the eyewitnesses (1:1–4). First Corinthians (which even biblical critics admit was written in A.D. 55–56) speaks of five hundred eyewitnesses (15:5–7), most of whom were living when Paul wrote it less than twenty-five years after Jesus’ death. Even the late John A. T. Robinson (1919–1981), a liberal New Testament scholar, dated some of the Gospels as early as A.D. 40–60, much too early to support Hick’s view of documents written by a later generation that had already formulated a view contrary to that of the historical Jesus. Therefore, since the Gospels are reporting, not creating, the words and deeds of Christ, there is firm support for His unique and specific claims to be God incarnate, and, thus, indescribably superior to other religious leaders.<sup>34</sup>

The Second Allegation

The second problem is that it has not proved possible, after some fifteen centuries of intermittent effort, to give any clear meaning to the idea that Jesus had two complete natures, one human and the other divine.... Is it really possible for infinite knowledge to be housed in a finite human brain? ... Do we really want to claim that Jesus was literally omnipotent but pretended not to be, as in Mark 6:5? ... While he was good, loving, wise, just, and merciful, there is an obvious problem about how a finite human being could have these qualities in an infinite degree. A finite being cannot have infinite attributes. (“PV” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 55–56)

Response

Hick falls short of claiming that the Incarnation involves an outright logical contradiction, though his language could be taken to imply the same. Even so, if the Incarnation is not a logical contradiction, then there is no demonstrated incoherence in the exclusivist view. Hick himself admits that “it is logically permissible to believe anything that is not self-contradictory” (MGI, 104).

As for the claim that it is difficult to show just how the Incarnation is a reality, on the same grounds one would have to reject much of our common experience and some of modern science, which has difficulty explaining how light can be both waves and particles. No scientist has been known to give up his belief in light in response to this challenge.

Also, Hick appears to be misinformed about the orthodox theistic view of the two natures of Jesus Christ, embracing an unorthodox view known as monophysitism, which confuses the divine and human natures. His question “Is it really possible for infinite knowledge to be housed in a finite human brain?” reveals this untenable entanglement, for classical theism does not claim there was infinite knowledge in the finite brain of Christ. Rather, it affirms that Christ possessed two distinct natures, one infinite and the other finite. The person of Jesus, then, had infinite knowledge only in His infinite nature. As God, He knew all things; as man, Jesus grew in knowledge (Luke 2:52). The same applies to His other attributes; for example, He was omnipotent as God but limited as man.

The Argument for the Supposed Intolerance of Exclusivism

A more severe tone is struck by pluralists when they engage in name-calling by charging that nonpluralists are intolerant. (Exclusivism, by nature, maintains that one view is true and that what is opposed to it in other views is false.) Why should one paradigm possess the truth while the others are disenfranchised?

Response

First, if holding an exclusivist view makes one intolerant, then pluralists are also intolerant, for they claim that their view is true to the exclusion of opposing views (like exclusivism). They certainly wouldn't tolerate the position that their pluralistic view and opposing (nonpluralistic) views were both true.

Second, if the charge of intolerance is leveled not because of the content of the view but rather the manner in which one holds it, then the argument is irrelevant—there is no single view that dominates intolerance, and a pluralist can be as intolerant as anyone else. For that matter, there could be both tolerant exclusivists and intolerant pluralists. All of this notwithstanding, the attitude with which one holds a view has no bearing on its truth value. Being intolerant about truth does not make it false any more than being tolerant about error makes it true. Studying under a dogmatic mathematician does not mean  $7 \times 3$  isn't 21, and studying under a broadminded mathematician does not mean  $8 + 6$  is 15.

Third, the very concept of tolerance implies an actual disagreement. We don't tolerate that with which we agree—we already affirm it. Tolerance suggests that there are opposing views in the first place; the very concept presupposes a nonpluralistic (i.e., exclusivist) view of truth.

The Argument for Exclusivism's Alleged Narrow-Mindedness

Pluralists constantly allege that nonpluralists are narrow-minded: They claim that their view is true, and everything that opposes it is in error. Again, this seems utterly presumptuous: Why should only exclusivists be in possession of the truth?

Response

Pluralists (P) and exclusivists (E) make an equal claim to truth and error—both claim that their view is true and whatever opposes it is false. For instance, if E is true, then all non-E is false. Likewise, if P is true, then all non-P is false. Exclusivism and pluralism are equally “narrow”; all truth is narrow. After all,  $2 + 3$  is not 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 or any other number to infinity except 5. There is only one true answer: This is narrow, and whether or not we like it, that's the way truth is.

The Argument for Exclusivism’s Supposed Intellectual Imperialism

Another charge against exclusivism is that of intellectual imperialism: Exclusivists, allegedly, are totalitarian with regard to truth, and they should be more open to input from other sources. Some pluralists go so far as to claim that not only truth but the very idea of meaning smacks of fascism (cited by McGrath, “CPCCC” in JETS).

Response

While this allegation has appeal, it is without merit with regard to determining what is true and what is false.

First, this accusation is often fallaciously presented ad hominem, attacking the person rather than the position.

Second, the objection has an unjustified presumption, namely, that truth should be more democratic. Reality check: Truth is not decided by majority vote! Again, truth is what corresponds to reality, whether most of us believe it or not.

Third, do pluralists really believe that all views are equally true and good? Are fascism and/or marxism as desirable as the preservation of human freedom? Should we have accepted the burning of Hindu widows during the funeral rites of their husbands? No, no, and no.

THE UNEVEN GROUND OF PLURALISM

Pluralism maintains several dubious premises, among which are the following.

That There Are Universally Agreed-Upon Trans-Religious Moral Criteria

In order to validate the argument for trans-religious moral equality, one must assume a set of moral criteria, not unique to any particular religion, by which all of them can be measured. However, pantheistic pluralists generally refuse to accept any universally binding moral law. If there were such an absolute morality, then there would also be an absolute Moral Lawgiver. As mentioned in Volume 1, only theistic-type religions accept these criteria, and even then some deny the absolutely perfect nature of God.

That All Religious Phenomena Can Be Naturalistically Explained

Beneath the pluralisms disdain for exclusivism is the preconceived premise that all religious phenomena can be accounted for through naturalistic explanation: Anything supernatural is simply and completely unacceptable. This before-the-fact naturalism, though, is without basis—miracles cannot be discounted a priori. Neither are miracles incredible, as was maintained by David Hume (1711–1776—see ECHU and THN). As we noted in Volume 1, not only is there evidence for miracles, but there is substantial evidence for both the astounding supernatural act of the world’s ex nihilo (“out of nothing”) creation and the earthshaking miracle of the resurrection of Jesus Christ.<sup>44</sup>

That the World Is “Religiously Ambiguous”

Again, John Hick maintains that “the universe, as presently accessible to us, is capable of being interpreted intellectually and experientially in both religious and naturalistic ways” (IR, 129). “The Real is perfectly undifferentiated; that is, it has no properties to which our concepts veridically [truly or truthfully] apply” (Geivett, “RJH” in Okholm and Phillips, FVSPW, 77).

In response, first, it is self-defeating to claim that we know that we cannot know the Real.

Second, that we do not know reality exhaustively doesn’t mean we cannot know it actually. Douglas Geivett (b. 1959) confirms: “To the extent that God is known at all, he is known truly” (ibid.).

Third, the very notion of an undifferentiated Real is at least implausible if not self-defeating. Hick’s suggestion that the Real can be illustrated by the concept of Buddhist sunyata<sup>48</sup> is a case in point: If the Real (Ultimate) is undifferentiated—if it has no correlation with our interpretation and understanding—how, then, can any symbol represent it?

Fourth, neither can the Real be manifested in various traditions (which Hick contends). In order for something to be manifested (displayed, presented, demonstrated), at least some of its characteristics must be revealed; the Real, as totally undifferentiated, has no discernible characteristics and, hence, could not be experientially expressed in any meaningful way (ibid.).

Fifth, and finally, there is a kind of mystical epistemology presumed in this “God is unknowable” approach, an imperialistic decree on how God can and cannot reveal Himself. One wonders what pipeline to metaphysical truth supplied this absolute information (ibid.).

That Pluralistic Dialogue Is the Only Way to Truth

Another erroneous presupposition is that pluralistic interreligious dialogue is the best (if not the only) valid way to discover truth. A concomitant fallacy is the assumption that no genuine religious discussion is possible if one assumes his belief is true in advance of the dialogue—this is taken as sure proof that he is not “open to truth.” True dialogue assumes that one is tolerant, open, humble, willing to listen and learn, engaging in a shared search for truth in a self-sacrificing, other-oriented love (Hick, IR, 239); exclusivism, allegedly, allows for none of these.

In response to this charge, it is necessary to point out, for one thing, that true dialogue is not dependent upon the adoption of a pluralistic position on truth. One can (and, according to Christian belief, must) have the attitude of love, humility, and openness without sacrificing his convictions. For example, one can have a philosophical discussion about the law of noncontradiction without giving up his belief that this precept is absolutely necessary for all cogent thought on either side of the dialogue. Furthermore, the pluralist violates his own imperative in that he is not willing to give up his commitment to pluralism as a condition for such dialogue. Again, the very concept of “tolerance” implies that some views are wrong—it is evil and error that are tolerated. It makes no more sense to say that we “tolerate truth” than it does to say that we “tolerate goodness.”

That Hick’s View Is Religiously Neutral

Pluralists like John Hick are frequently disguised in religious neutrality, yet no such thing exists. Pluralism is not religiously neutral but is patterned after Hinduism’s conception of the Transcendent and is antagonistic to the core principles of Christianity. Furthermore, pluralism does not actually encourage genuine dialogue between the traditions—it renders vacuous the notion of being part of a given “religious tradition.” According to pluralists, every tradition is essentially the same; to accept pluralism is not to “embrace openness” but to reject one’s own tradition for another—that is, the pluralist’s.

That a Relativistic View of Truth Is Correct

Beneath the pluralistic assertion that all major religions have equal claim to the truth is a relativistic view of truth itself. As we have seen, the denial of absolute truth is self-defeating. It claims that relativism is true for everyone, everywhere, and always. What is true for everyone, everywhere, and always is an absolute truth. Therefore, relativism suicidally claims that relativism is absolutely true.

CONCLUSION

Pluralism’s claim that all religions are true is self-refuting, for the undeniable law of noncontradiction affirms that opposites cannot both be correct. Consequently, for instance, since Islam claims there is only one person in God, and Christianity says there are three, both religions cannot be right on this point. Likewise, since Islam teaches that Jesus did not die on the cross and rise from the dead on the third day, and Christianity teaches that He did, one of them is wrong. The same is true of all core beliefs of all religions—some affirm there is a theistic God (e.g., Judaism, Christianity, and Islam), while others hold to a pantheistic God (e.g., Hinduism, Zen Buddhism, and Taoism). God cannot be both transcendent over the world (as in theism) and not transcendent over it (as in pantheism). If theism is true, then pantheism is false.<sup>53</sup>

Further, pluralism’s claim that all religions are equal is unsubstantiated, for in the process of making this charge pluralists maintain unproven presuppositions (such as naturalism and pantheism). They further argue contrary to fact by denying the historicity of the New Testament. What is more, they reduce all religions to their basic common denominator and then claim that none is unique. This begs the question because we cannot determine whether one religion is unique by neglecting uniqueness in favor of comparing it with other religions on the basis of what it has in common with them. In brief, pluralism fails both in fact and in philosophy.

Finally, and fatally, pluralism is hanged on its own gallows, for while it denies exclusivism on the grounds that no view can make an exclusive claim to truth, nonetheless, it claims that pluralism is exclusively true—that is, true to the exclusion of all forms of nonpluralism (such as exclusivism). If pluralism is exclusively true, then it is not actually pluralism but a form of exclusivism.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

THE RESULTS OF SALVATION (Infants and Heathen)

Salvation is all-encompassing, including the past, present, and future. It also affects all of creation, saved and unsaved, animate and inanimate, human and angelic. Part of this chapter is a summary outline designed to provide a more comprehensive and unified soteriological perspective. Most of it, however, directly and more thoroughly deals with two important topics: the redemptive status of the unborn and the state of the unevangelized (the heathen).

THE RESULTS OF SALVATION ON HUMAN BEINGS AND CREATION

Human beings are the definitive focus of God's magnificent plan of salvation. Nevertheless, the physical world, which stages the salvific saga, and the angelic world, which surrounds it, are likewise significant participants in the overall drama.

The Results of Salvation on the Saved

Of course, as demonstrated in part 1, salvation presupposes the Fall—there is no need to restore perfection unless we no longer have it. Therefore, salvation begins where the Fall ends; salvation is not a single event but an overarching process beginning in Genesis 3 (paradise lost) and continuing through Revelation 22 (paradise regained). Historically, salvation includes its Old Testament anticipation and its New Testament realization.

Salvation includes three spectacular events:

- (1) The official victory over sin by the Cross;
- (2) The practical victory over sin within believers;
- (3) The final victory over sin at the Second Coming.

As we observed in chapter 6, the first step provides justification (by which we are saved from the penalty of sin), the second is the process of sanctification (by which we are rescued from the power of sin), and the last will achieve glorification (by which we are delivered from the very presence of sin).

The Results of Salvation on the Lost

While those who reject Christ cannot be saved after death, nonetheless, they will be affected by the process of salvation. All humans, saved and unsaved, will be resurrected (cf. Dan. 12:1–3; John 5:28–29; Rev. 20:1–3); as we have seen, all people are made justifiable by virtue of Christ's death and resurrection (cf. Rom. 5:15–19; 2 Cor. 5:19; 1 Tim. 4:10). Even angels are affected by the marvel of God's plan of salvation for the world (cf. Eph. 3:10; 1 Peter 1:12).

Lost angels will be judged by human beings (1 Cor. 6:3), and lost human beings will be condemned by their refusal to accept the testimony of the saved (2 Thess. 1:1–9): “This will take place on the day when God will judge men's secrets through Jesus Christ” (Rom. 2:16). The very word of God is a savor of life unto life to those who believe, but it is a savor of death unto death to those who reject it. Jesus said, “There is a judge for the one who rejects me and does not accept my words; that very word which I spoke will condemn him at the last day” (John 12:48). In brief, Christ's work of salvation has an extensive influence on both the saved and the lost, positively and negatively.

The Condemnation of the Lost Is Just

God's condemnation of the lost will serve justice because His message was sent to all the world (Matt. 28:18–20; Acts 1:8). Paul said, “This is the gospel that you heard and that has been proclaimed to every creature under heaven, and of which I, Paul, have become a servant” (Col. 1:23). Jesus also told His disciples: “This gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come” (Matt. 24:14). Those who did not hear the gospel could have, for God rewards those who seek Him (Heb. 11:6) and, as Peter said, “I now realize how true it is that God does not show favoritism but accepts men from every nation who fear him and do what is right” (Acts 10:34–35). When people respond to the light of creation (Rom. 1:19–20) and/or conscience (Rom. 2:12–15), God provides the light of redemption—He knows exactly who will be where when the gospel is preached (Acts 17:26), and He knows that no one who would have received salvation did not have the opportunity.

The Condemnation of the Lost Is Final

As we have seen, Hebrews 9:27 teaches that every person “is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment.” In a story regarding the separation of heaven and hell, one of Jesus’ characters said, “Between us and you a great chasm has been fixed, so that those who want to go from here to you cannot, nor can anyone cross over from there to us” (Luke 16:26). Reflecting on the eternal state, John declares: “Let him who does wrong continue to do wrong; let him who is vile continue to be vile; let him who does right continue to do right; and let him who is holy continue to be holy” (Rev. 22:11). Both destinies are final—in the end the wheat will be separated from the chaff, the good from the evil, and the sheep from the goats.

The Condemnation of the Lost Is Eternal

The eventual state of the wicked is not only final, but it is also eternal (everlasting):

All the nations will be gathered before him [Christ], and he will separate the people one from another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats. He will put the sheep on his right and the goats on his left. Then the King will say to those on his right, “Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world....” Then he will say to those on his left, “Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:32–34, 41).

Paul adds,

This will happen when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven in blazing fire with his powerful angels. He will punish those who do not know God and do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They will be punished with everlasting destruction and shut out from the presence of the Lord and from the majesty of his power. (2 Thess. 1:7–9)

Two additional categories emerge for discussion: infants and the heathen. Both deserve special attention because of the unique difficulties they present.

The Question of Salvation for Infants

The eternal status of infants has always been a thorny issue in orthodox Christian theology. On the one hand, to many it seems eminently unjust to condemn babies to eternal flames. On the other hand, they are conceived in sin (Ps. 51:5) and, like the rest of Adam’s race, they are “by nature the children of wrath” (Eph. 2:3 KJV). Likewise, the Bible proclaims that faith is a condition for receiving God’s gift of salvation (John 3:16–18; Acts 16:31), and infants are not able to believe. What is more, Scripture seems to teach that all persons must make their decision in this life for the next one; infants who die as infants in this life are not old enough to have faith. The pros and cons of various views are discussed below in some detail.

The Question of Salvation for the Heathen

The matter of salvation for the unevangelized (heathen) poses a potential problem for God's omnibenevolence. If God is all-loving, how can He send to an eternal hell people who have never heard the Good News of salvation? This dilemma is made more acute by some estimates that a large portion of the world's more than six billion people have never heard a clear gospel presentation, at least not in their own language.

Christian apologists have offered two basic answers. Some believe the heathen can be saved apart from the gospel by responding to the light of general revelation (creation and conscience). Others believe that God provides the truth of the gospel (special revelation) to those who earnestly seek Him. This issue is also discussed more fully below.

The Results of Salvation on Angelic Beings

Angels, like human beings, have free will. Some used it to serve God, and others exercised it to rebel against Him. Those who chose to serve their Creator received the beatific vision; Jesus said that they "always see the face of my Father" (Matt. 18:10). Those who chose to follow Satan in his rebellion against God, leaving their "first estate" (Jude 6 KJV), received the wrath of the Father and are condemned to eternal damnation (Matt. 25:41). Both groups—faithful and unfaithful are affected by the Cross.

The Results of Salvation on Good Angels: The Beatific Vision

The reward of good angels is to see God face-to-face. In this beatified state, having beheld an absolute Good, they cannot now choose evil. Even though the angels who never sinned do not personally need the work of the Cross for their salvation, nonetheless, they rejoice when humans are saved (Luke 15:10) and join in when the song of redemption is sung in heaven (Rev. 5:9–11). God's salvation of the church, the bride of Christ, is the object of their heavenly inquiry (1 Peter 1:12; Eph. 3:10).

The Results of Salvation on Evil Angels: Eternal Suffering

Even though the wicked angels are irredeemable (Heb. 2:16), it is by the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus that His victory over them is pronounced:

Having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross. (Col. 2:14–15)

By virtue of our redeemed status, even we will be used in God's judgment on the angels of evil (1 Cor. 6:3).

The Results of Salvation on Creation

Although human beings (and only human beings) are the object and focus of biblical salvation (cf. Heb. 2:14–16), their physical surroundings were involved in the Fall (cf. Rom. 8:18ff.), and we will be the beneficiaries of their redemption. There will be both a restoration of paradise on earth and a renovation of the whole created heaven and earth (cf. Rev. 21).

The Restoration of Paradise

According to the Revelation, paradise lost will become paradise regained. What was lost by the first Adam will be regained by the Last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45). Death will be reversed, sin will be defeated and banished, and pain will be eliminated. As we have seen, John described it in these words:

Then I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away, and there was no longer any sea. I saw the Holy City, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband. And I heard a loud voice from the throne saying, "Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God. He will wipe every tear from their eyes. There will be no more death or mourning or crying or pain, for the old order of things has passed away" (Rev. 21:1–4).

Again, Paul saw it in terms of the liberation of all creation that had been subject to the Fall:

I consider that our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us. The creation waits in eager expectation for the sons of God to be revealed. For the creation was subjected to frustration, not by its own choice, but by the will of the one who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself will be liberated from its bondage to decay and brought into the glorious freedom of the children of God.

We know that the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth right up to the present time. Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies. (Rom. 8:18–23)

The Renovation of the Universe

Following Isaiah's prediction (Isa. 65:17), Peter recorded the broadening of the scope of salvation to include the entire created universe that has been infected by sin (cf. Job 15:15; Eph. 2:2; Dan. 8–9):

The day of the Lord will come like a thief. The heavens will disappear with a roar; the elements will be destroyed by fire, and the earth and everything in it will be laid bare.

Since everything will be destroyed in this way, what kind of people ought you to be? You ought to live holy and godly lives as you look forward to the day of God and speed its coming. That day will bring about the destruction of the heavens by fire, and the elements will melt in the heat. But in keeping with his promise we are looking forward to a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness. (2 Peter 3:10–13)

This will be the ultimate ecological redemption to which our most noble and commendable contemporary efforts will pale in significance.

THE RESULTS OF SALVATION ON INFANTS

We now return to soteriological questions regarding infants and the heathen. As to the former, several views have been proposed; we will examine the merits and difficulties of each.

The Baptized-Infant View (God Saves Only Baptized Infants)

This view is held only by sacramentalists who believe both (1) that infant baptism is efficacious and (2) that baptism is necessary for salvation. Some Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Anglicans espouse this position, and Ambrose (339–397) set it forth:

No one ascends into the kingdom of heaven, except by means of the sacrament of baptism.... Moreover to this there is no exception, not the infant, nor he who is unavoidably prevented [from being baptized].... They have, however, immunity from pains, (cited by Sanders, NON, 291)

Herein are the seeds of the limbo doctrine.

Augustine (354–430) has been given the dubious honor of being the first to teach the damnation of all unbaptized infants—essentially, the wrath of God abides on them (E, 46; 1.28, 33–35). He did allow, however, that unbaptized infants who die do not suffer as severely as those who live to adulthood and commit actual sins (ibid., 1.21).

The argument for the baptized-infant view is stark and straightforward: Baptism is essential for salvation; therefore, no unbaptized person—including infants—can be saved. Consequent to the position’s harshness, modifications were forthcoming. Pelagius (c. 354–c. 420), Augustine’s nemesis, reacted against the teaching of unbaptized infant damnation: “Where they are not, I know; where they are, I know not” (cited by Sanders, NON, 292). Eventually a “middle place” between heaven and hell was developed that was later called limbo. Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) upheld Augustine’s view but softened it by claiming that unbaptized infants who die do not experience the pain of hell. This, in practice, is virtually indistinguishable from limbo.

Other theologians have put forth the Catholic idea of “baptism of desire” to solve the problem—that is, people can be saved by their desire for baptism if they are prevented from obtaining it. Since the concept of infants desiring baptism is untenable, these apologists posit that the desire of their parents or the church is sufficient. “This idea goes back at least to Hincmar of Rheims (A.D. 860)” (Sanders, NON, 293). How, though, can the desire of someone else be effective, when an individual’s salvation is a personal matter? To many, vicariously desired baptism seems as meaningless as vicarious marriage.

Critique of the Baptized-Infant View

First, the entire scenario is dependent on a sacramental theology that demands infant baptism as a condition for salvation. Anabaptists reject this in favor of the premise that personal faith is the only condition for salvation.<sup>15</sup> After all, baptism is a work of “righteousness” (Matt. 3:15), and the Bible makes it clear that we are not saved by righteous works (cf. Rom. 4:5; Eph. 2:8–9; Titus 3:5–7). If baptism does not save, then neither does infant baptism.

Second, the baptized-infant view (that the only infants saved are those who are baptized) seems harsh and cruel because it portrays a merciless God. By contrast, the Bible reveals a God of infinite mercy, grace, and love.

Third, some have asked how a child who is innocent of any personal (actual) fault can be banned from heaven and cast into hell. Are not people held responsible only for their own sins? Ezekiel wrote: “The soul who sins is the one who will die.... The righteousness of the righteous man will be credited to him, and the wickedness of the wicked will be charged against him” (Ezek. 18:20; cf. Rom. 2:6; 14:12).

Fourth, and finally, the baptized-infant view does not adequately account for the body of scriptural teaching used to support the view that all infants, irrespective of baptism, go to heaven.

The Elect-Infant View (God Saves Only Elect Infants)

Another position asserts that the only deceased babies who go to heaven are the ones who are elect. Since Protestants believe in only two possible destinies, the elect-infant view implies that all non-elect infants go to hell. John Calvin (1509–1564), who rejected the baptized-infant view in favor of the elect-infant position (ICR, 4.16.17), contended that while salvation is ordinarily obtained through hearing the Word of God, nonetheless, God is not limited to that means. Infants who are saved are not granted salvation because they are innocent—no one is. The entire human race sinned in Adam (Rom. 5:12); some of the elect die in infancy, while others grow to become adults.

As for the argument that faith is absolutely necessary for salvation, Calvin replied that Paul (in Rom. 10:14ff.) is “only describing the usual economy and dispensation which the Lord is wont to employ in calling His people, and not laying down an invariable rule, for which no other method can be substituted” (ICR, 4.16.19, emphasis added). Infants, like adults, are saved by the divine regeneration of their souls, and Calvin taught that God can do this with or without their knowledge of His salvific plan or their placing of conscious faith in Christ (ibid., 4.16.17, 20–21).

In addition, Calvin believed that Jesus personally assured the salvation of elect infants: “Christ bids them be brought to him. Why so? Because he is life. Therefore, that he may quicken them, he makes them partners with himself” (ibid., 4.16.17). Further,

Christ was sanctified from earliest infancy, that he might sanctify his elect in himself at any age, without distinction.... If in Christ we have a perfect pattern of all the graces which God bestowed on all his children, in this instance we have proof that the age of infancy is not incapable of receiving sanctification. (ibid., 4.16.18)

Commenting on Matthew 19:14, Calvin said:

From this we gather that His grace reaches to this age of life also.... It would be too cruel to exclude that age from the grace of redemption.... From this it follows that they were regenerate by the Spirit in the hope of salvation. And finally, that he embraced them was a testimony that Christ reckoned them in His flock. (CC, 2.252)

Calvin nowhere affirmed that this regeneration extends to all children. We are left with the logical interpretation that as with adults, salvation is possible only for the elect: Non-elect children, like non-elect adults, will be lost.

Concurrently, the Calvinistic Canons of Dort offered the reassurance that “godly parents ought not to doubt the election and salvation of their children whom it pleased God to call out of this life in their infancy” (article 17). The Westminster Confession of Faith (1646–1648) likewise affirmed that “elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ” (10.3). This does not necessarily limit elect infants to elect parents, but it can be and has been taken to imply the same. Even so, the straightforward implication is that non-elect infants are eternally doomed.

The rationale for only elect infants being saved is that since God chose the elect before they were born, even before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4; cf. Rom. 8:29), it is reasonable to infer that He chose certain infants to be saved and not others. Ultimately, salvation does not come from human will (Rom. 9:16). Indeed, most Calvinists believe that God has to give faith itself to the elect, often citing Ephesians 2:8–9 and Philippians 1:29 in support. This being the case, it matters not that infants are too young to believe.

As for the justice of God, according to the elect-infant view, God justly condemns the whole human race because of Adam's sin (Rom. 5:12ff.). We are all, from the moment of conception (Ps. 51:5), sinners by nature (Eph. 2:3), who are deserving of eternal isolation from God. He has no obligation to save anyone, and it is only by His grace that He saves some. Among these, God chose to elect some who would die in infancy and some who would live to adulthood. These elect—and these elect alone—will be accepted into heaven.

Critique of the Elect-Infant View

The elect-infant view has not been met with wide acceptance outside extreme Calvinist circles; in fact, even some strong Calvinists oppose it.

First, the elect-infant view denies universally accessible salvation. Christ did not die only for the elect but for all, and salvation is not offered only to the elect but to all. As we have seen, John says that Christ “is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for [the sins of] the whole world” (1 John 2:2 NKJV). In the same context, he adds that world (from Gk: kosmos) means the entire unbelieving, fallen world (vv. 15–17). Peter spoke of the apostate as being “bought” by Christ's blood (2 Peter 2:1). If salvation is for all, then why posit its availability only for elect infants, excluding potential soteriological application for the rest? Indeed, as cited previously, John Calvin himself, the oft-called “father of Calvinism,” insisted:

We must now see in what ways we become possessed of the blessings which God has bestowed on his only begotten Son, not for private use, but to enrich the poor and needy. And the first thing to be attended to is, that so long as we are without Christ and separated from him, nothing which he suffered and did for the salvation of the human race is of the least benefit to us. (ICR, 3.1.1, emphasis added)

Furthermore,

We should note, however, that Paul does not here contrast the larger number with the many, for he is not speaking of the great number of mankind, but he argues that since the sin of Adam has destroyed many [all], the righteousness of Christ will be no less effective for the salvation of many [all]. (CC, on Rom. 5:15, emphasis added)

Thus,

I approve of the ordinary reading, that [Christ] alone bore the punishment of many, because on him was laid the guilt of the whole world. It is evident from other passages, and especially from the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, that “many” sometimes denotes “all” (ibid., on Isa. 53:12, emphasis added).

He added,

The word “many” does not mean a part of the world only, but the whole human race: [Paul] contrasts “many” with “one,” as if to say that [Jesus] would not be the Redeemer of one man, but would meet death to deliver many of their cursed guilt. It is incontestable that Christ came for the expiation of the sins of the whole world. (EPG, IX.5, emphasis added)

Second, Peter states that God desires to save everyone (2 Peter 3:9), and Paul confirms that God “wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4). If God desires all to receive salvation, and if it is possible to save some infants (i.e., the elect) apart from personal faith (as taught by the elect-infant view), then why would He not elect all of them to salvation?

Third, it is of little comfort for anyone other than elect parents to be assured that elect infants are saved. For example, teaching that infant salvation is limited to only those of believing parents offers no hope for the unevangelized. The heathen have not yet heard the gospel and, as such, are not part of the covenant family in general or covenant families in particular. It's possible that God is calling out a people for His sake—from “every nation, tribe, people and language” (Rev. 7:9)—from among infants in heathen lands as well.

Fourth, the elect-infant view presents an indescribably severe conceptualization of God's justice and mercy. While all orthodox theologians accept that humans are born in sin, not all of them see this as sufficient grounds for excluding God's love from anyone. Once again, while there is nothing in fallen humans that merits salvation, there is something in God—omnibenevolence—that prompts Him to seek the salvation of everyone He has created (cf. John 3:16; Rom. 5:6–8).

Fifth, the elect-infant view fails to distinguish between an inherited sin nature (on which all orthodox Christians agree) and a personal rebellion against God, which only those old enough to consciously sin can choose (cf. John 9:41). That is, the natural bent toward evil is one thing; living in rejection and defiance of God is another. Since infants have not exercised the latter, they are not in the same category as willfully rebellious adults.

Sixth, while our definition of “total depravity” entails all infants being born in sin, nevertheless, the Bible teaches that Christ reversed this curse (which we inherited from Adam—Rom. 5:12–19) and that God will judge human beings only on the sins they have actually and personally committed in this life. Infants have not committed such sins; hence, it seems to follow that God does not condemn those who die before adulthood.

Seventh, and finally, it is problematic to reconcile the elect-infant view with the seemingly universal demand that one must believe in order to be saved (e.g., John 3:36; Acts 16:31; Rom. 10:17). There appears to be no way a baby can express conscious, explicit faith in God. Relatedly, on two grounds, the verses that allegedly support the position that saving faith is a gift of God are rejected as evidence for the elect-infant view.

For one thing, none of them clearly teaches that saving faith is a gift God gives only to some. For example, in Ephesians 2:8–9 it is not faith that is God's gift but salvation.

Furthermore, it would contradict the rest of God's Word to say that saving faith is a gift given only to some: Scripture calls on all people to believe (e.g., Acts 16:31; 17:30; Rom. 10:13–14) and condemns them if they do not (John 3:18–19). This biblical mandate presumes that they have the ability to believe.

The Foreknown-Infant View (God Saves Only Those Infants He Foreknew Would Have Believed)

According to the foreknown-infant position, God, the omniscient Being, foreknows which infants would have believed if they had lived long enough to choose to do so. Accordingly, He will save only those infants; the rest are lost, since they would not have believed even if they had lived to adulthood.

The foreknown-infant argument has commonalities with both the electinfant view (see above) and the evangelized-after-death-infant view (see below). For instance, it affirms that God is omniscient (Ps. 139:1–6), and, as such, He knows “the end from the beginning” (Isa. 46:10); indeed, He “foreknew” the elect (Rom. 8:29). Adherents point out that there seems to be no logical reason why these foreknown ones could not have included those elect who would die in infancy.

One advantage the foreknown-infant position has over the elect-infant view is that it avoids the suggestion that God is unmerciful and/or unjust. Another strong point is that it takes faith into account as a condition for receiving salvation (cf. John 3:16–19) and thus avoids the declaration (or implication) that God saves some apart from their willingness to receive everlasting life. Another value of the foreknown-infant view is that it preserves God’s omnibenevolence, His universally manifest love.

Critique of the Foreknown-infant View

While the drawbacks with this position are perhaps not insurmountable, nonetheless, there are some difficulties that should be noted.

First, from a strong Calvinist perspective, it is objected that in the foreknown-infant view God’s foreknowledge is based on human freedom rather than on His absolute sovereignty (see Nash, WBD, 79). That is, the foreknown-infant view holds that God saves these babies because of their foreseen faith. This appears to negate the unmerited grace of God, who acts solely “according to the good pleasure of His will” (Eph. 1:5 NKJV) and not due to anything we determine or accomplish (Eph. 2:8–9).

Even for a strong Calvinist, though, this objection is not telling. One need not hold that God’s foreknowledge is based on anyone’s free will but simply, as the Scriptures say, in accord with it (cf. 1 Peter 1:2). In other words, foreknowledge and election are coordinate, co-eternal properties of God; for instance, He may have simply (and graciously) ordained that for the elect, potential free choice would be the means through which He would elect them.

Second, if the act of believing is a necessary condition for anyone to receive salvation, it is difficult to understand how it is sufficient for their salvation that God simply foreknew these infants would have believed had they lived longer lives (i.e., that He saves them in view of their potential faith). Of course, on the assumption that babies “grow up” in heaven (it’s difficult to picture eternal infants), they will have a chance to actually believe, which would resolve the question of how potential faith can be accepted (in advance) for actual faith. However, if this is the case, then technically the matter is no longer within the realm of infant salvation (salvation as infants), since they would not actually be saved until after infancy, namely, when they were old enough to believe for themselves.

Third, like the baptized-infant view, the foreknown-infant position lacks explicit biblical support. There are no passages declaring this is in fact what God will do with infants; hence, it seems to be more suited to the category of theological possibility.

Fourth, how can someone be saved by potential faith? Again, if faith is a necessary condition for salvation, either in this life or in the next, then God’s foreknowledge alone—His knowing that they would have believed—is insufficient. To respond by arguing that not only would they believe, given time in this life, but also that they do believe after death (when they “grow up”) is to reduce the foreknown-infant view to the evangelized-after-death-infant position.

Fifth, some modern Catholic theologians (and others) speak of infants as exercising “implicit faith,” but how can sense be made of this concept? How can someone whose cognitive and conscientious faculties are undeveloped possibly express any kind of faith? For example, while infants are dependent on their parents for meeting their many needs, they make no deliberate choice to trust or believe for this: it is instinctive. Faith, at least saving faith as scripturally described, is not automatic; it is a conscious, voluntary act.

Sixth, to many opponents this view involves the seemingly horrible injustice of condemning—to eternal damnation—those non-foreknown infants who have never actually sinned. In this sense it is comparable to the extreme Calvinist elect-infant view; to critics, such teaching seems eminently unloving.

In response, a proponent of the foreknown-infant view could argue for the undeniable possibility that all who die in infancy would have believed had they lived long enough. This modified position would blend into the all-infant salvation views.

THE ALL-INFANT SALVATION VIEWS

Since the seventeenth century more people (of variable theological persuasions) have held to universal infant salvation than to any other position, so much so that, strangely, even some Calvinists who maintain limited atonement embrace a form of it (e.g., see Nash, WBD, chapter 5). The all-infant salvation view has three basic types of adherents:

- (1) Those who base it on the premise that all infants either would have believed in this life or eventually will believe after death;
- (2) Those who base it on the premise that God has elected all infants (just as He has elected some adults) and, by the irresistible grace of regeneration (apart from faith), He will save everyone who doesn't reach the age of accountability;
- (3) Those who base it on the premise that God, because infants cannot believe, will save all of them (apart from the condition that they would have believed in this life).

Since the first view (that all infants either would have or will believe) has already been discussed above, the other two will be examined here.

The View That God Elects All Infants and Saves Them by Irresistible Grace Apart From Faith

This position, as presented by five-point Calvinist Ronald Nash (b. 1941), goes something like the following:

- (1) All who die before the age of accountability are incapable of moral good or evil;
- (2) God will only punish people (in the next life) on the basis of evils they have committed in this life;
- (3) All who die before the age of accountability, then, will not be punished in the next life (that is, they will be saved);
- (4) Arminians, however, hold that faith is a necessary condition for salvation;
- (5) Those who die before the age of accountability cannot believe (that is, have faith);
- (6) Hence, according to Arminian doctrine, no one dying before the age of accountability can be saved;
- (7) Calvinism teaches that God can regenerate people without their consent (faith);
- (8) Consequently, only a Calvinist can consistently maintain that all who die before the age of accountability will be saved. (ibid.)

To support Nash's first premise (that all who die before the age of accountability are incapable of moral good or evil), both Scripture and reason can be mobilized. The Bible speaks of an age before which an individual is not morally accountable. For instance, Nash cites

Deuteronomy 1:39: “The little ones that you said would be taken captive, your children who do not yet know good from bad—they will enter the land. I will give it to them and they will take possession of it.”

The second premise (that the only punishment in the next life will be on the basis of evils committed in this life) is also scripturally based. Second Corinthians 5:10 declares that “we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad.” Since many believe that this passage specifically refers to believers, Revelation 20:12–13 is more to the point:

I saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne, and books were opened. Another book was opened, which is the book of life. The dead were judged according to what they had done as recorded in the books. The sea gave up the dead that were in it, and death and Hades gave up the dead that were in them, and each person was judged according to what he had done.

The third premise (that all persons dying before the age of accountability will be saved) follows logically and is likewise biblically grounded. Nash cites Matthew 19:13–14—“The kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these” (little children, v. 14)—and Mark 10:13–16 and Luke 18:15–17, where “babies” (infants) were brought to Jesus and He said: “I tell you the truth, anyone who will not receive the kingdom of God like a little child will never enter it.”

Following John Calvin, Nash also offers more disputable examples such as Jeremiah 1:5 and Luke 1:15. While these texts do indicate that God, from the womb, had set these children apart, they neither say that these infants were regenerated at this time nor that all babies in die womb are saved. Given that, according to strong Calvinism, God only loves, elects, and irresistibly saves some adults (the elect), Nash offers no solid evidence for his belief that all infants are elect. Nonetheless, his conclusion to this point (as stated by the third premise—that all who die before the age of accountability will be saved) appears to be sound.

The remaining premises and conclusion, though, are seriously problematic and should be rejected on several grounds.

First, the fourth premise (that “Arminians” believe faith is a necessary condition for salvation)—is not exclusively “Arminian.” Many moderate Calvinists, for example, also maintain this view.

Second, and more to the heart of the issue, Nash’s presentation of the fourth premise is based on an unjustified presupposition, namely, that belief in this life is an absolute condition for salvation. Even John Calvin denied this (as cited above), pointing out that faith may be the customary salvific condition but not an absolute one. In addition, Nash and most other strong Calvinists insist that regeneration logically occurs prior to belief.

To put the rebuttal in different terms, there is no heaven for those who will not believe—that is, rebellious persons who are morally accountable in this life. However, there is heaven for those who cannot believe—that is, persons who are not morally accountable and hence are not yet able to believe in this life.

Third, there is reason to believe that those who were morally unaccountable in this life will “grow up” in the next; hence, they will be able to believe after they are in heaven. Even Nash agrees that infants will mature:

The Bible describes the redeemed in heaven as possessing glorified bodies.... [These] bodies will represent that dimension of our humanity at its best. I believe this means that children who die in infancy will greet us in heaven as mature adults. (ibid., 105)

Nevertheless, how could they be “mature” without being rationally and morally accountable? Consequently, Nash has no sufficient basis on which to deny that those elect who cannot believe in this life will believe in the next. In short, faith—as a condition for receiving salvation—is only absolute in this life for those who are old enough to believe. It can be stated, then, that for the elect who don’t live long enough to believe, faith is an ultimate condition in the next life.

Fourth, Nash’s sixth premise (the conclusion that, according to Arminian teaching, no one who dies before the age of accountability can receive salvation) fails, because it assumes the truth of the fifth premise (that those who die before they reach moral responsibility cannot believe), which, on Nash’s conditions, is not justified. On the grounds that babies who die will one day have the ability to believe, Arminians and moderate Calvinists can hold to infant salvation (even universal infant salvation) without contradiction.

Fifth, the seventh premise (the extreme Calvinist dogma that God can regenerate people apart from their will) is untenable, contradicting the clear biblical teaching that faith is prior to regeneration rather than the reverse. We are “justified by faith” (Rom. 5:1 NKJV); meaning faith leads to justification, not vice versa. This is the uniform New Testament pattern: A person must believe in order to be saved (e.g., John 3:16, 18; 3:36; 5:24; Acts 16:31; et al.). Again, no one has ever scripturally demonstrated that we must be saved in order to believe.

Sixth, in connection with the previous point, Nash’s overall paradigm is based on the incoherent premise that God’s grace can be irresistible without being coercive (WBD, 96). This is in opposition to a biblical and rationally justifiable view of human freedom as self-determining. Extreme Calvinism argues that infants can be saved without their consent in the same way God allegedly saves adults (by regenerating them before they believe). However, if someone does not will to believe, irresistibly forcing him to “believe” is to force his choice. Again, a “forced choice,” not being a free choice, is an absurd proposition.<sup>45</sup>

Seventh, and finally, even if all of his premises were correct, Nash cannot legitimize the salvation of all infants and still maintain the consistency of his own position, since he adheres to a limited atonement (ibid., 93). Accordingly, because of this stance, he has no reliable reason to believe that God’s election is any broader among infants than it is among adults. If Christ only died for some adults, as extreme Calvinism posits, then why should we assume that He died for all infants?

The View That God Will Save All Infants Because They Cannot Believe

Proponents of this teaching affirm that there is no heaven for those who will not believe; those who willingly reject God’s offer of salvation will perish (cf. 2 Peter 3:9; John 3:18). The Bible nowhere teaches, however, that those who don’t live long enough to be able to believe will be excluded from heaven. Defenders of this view, such as Robert Lightner (b. 1931), appeal to a number of passages for support.

Little Children Are Part of the Kingdom of God

Jesus said, “Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of God belongs to such as these” (Mark 10:14). Jesus also made it clear that “no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again” (John 3:3). Thus, it would follow that “little children” will be in heaven, and since the text places no limits on the children who will be there, it is suggested that Jesus includes every little child in His kingdom.

Those who object to this position argue there is no proof that the term children refers to infants or to those prior to an “age of belief.” Further, opponents contend that Christ’s words (“the kingdom of God belongs to such as these”) could be a form of similitude rather than literalism; that is, in order to enter the kingdom, we all must become like little children (in humbling ourselves—cf. Matt. 18:4). However, Luke, by name (explicitly), mentions “infants” or “babies” as being included among those who will be in the kingdom.

David’s Infant Son Went to Heaven

King David prayed fervently for his dying infant son; when the baby died, David immediately ceased praying: “Now that he is dead, why should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I will go to him, but he will not return to me” (2 Sam. 12:23). David went to heaven (cf. Ps. 16:10–11; Heb. 11:32), and surely his knowledge of being reunited with his child encompassed more than their deceased bodies being placed in the same grave. If this inference is correct, then David’s baby went to heaven.

Critics of this interpretation point out that “I will go to him, but he will not return to me” might mean nothing more than “The dead do not return to us; rather, we go to be with the dead.” They also note that the Old Testament conception of the afterlife was not highly developed. Even so, neither of these is a telling point, since David clearly anticipated a blissful afterlife (Ps. 16:10–11), as did other Old Testament writers (cf. Job 19:25–26).

Babies Are Known of God and Are Written in His Book

David, in Psalm 139:13–16, speaks of God having created him in his mother’s womb and being written in “your [God’s] book” (v. 16). David refers to himself as a person, an “I” in the womb. This is taken by some to mean that God personally knows embryos and infants and eternally covers them with His love.

Critics argue that “your book” may simply be a figure of speech regarding God’s omniscience or the “book” of His remembrance. True, there is no clear textual indication that David is pointing to the Book of Life, in which are written all the names of the saved (Rev. 20:12). Nonetheless, this caveat does not negate that the child who dies is a person known and loved from conception by a God who wants everyone to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4).

The Bible Speaks of Children Too Young to Know Good or Evil

As to the age of accountability, Isaiah refers to a little child before “he knows enough to reject the wrong and choose the right” (Isa. 7:15). As mentioned previously, Moses does the same: “The little ones that you said would be taken captive, your children who do not yet know good from bad—they will enter the land. I will give it to them and they will take possession of it” (Deut. 1:39). These texts seem to imply that there is an age of moral accountability. Even of adults, Jesus said, “If you were blind, you would not be guilty of sin; but now that you claim you can see, your guilt remains” (John 9:41). How much more would this apply to infants who cannot yet know right from wrong.

In response, opponents observe that even if Isaiah is highlighting an age of accountability, it does not thereby show that all infants are saved. There are still at least two other all-infants-are-saved premises that must be proven: (1) that inherited depravity in and of itself is not sufficient for eternal condemnation, and (2) that faith in this life is not absolutely essential for eternal salvation. Stated briefly, then, Isaiah’s reference to a young child without moral awareness may refer only to personal or social guilt rather than to either inherited sin or ultimate salvation.

Romans 5 Says “All” Were “Made Righteous”

As previously observed, Paul declares:

Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men. For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many [i.e., all] were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many [i.e., all] will be made righteous. (vv. 18–19)

Since Paul’s unmistakable teaching is that we all are somehow “made righteous” by Christ’s obedient death, it remains then for us to ask in what sense this is true.

Since universalism is clearly excluded by both the immediate context and other passages, Paul cannot mean that all were actually (rather than potentially) made righteous. Further, it does not appear that Paul is referring to the declaration of our righteousness in the sense of justification, which comes only by faith (cf. Rom. 1:17; 3:21–26), and which infants, being infants, cannot exercise. It can mean, however, that the original sin brought about by Adam’s choice is canceled by the work of Christ. If this is the case, humans are no longer hell-bound solely due to inherited depravity; they must commit their own personal sins to eventuate in condemnation. Consequently, since infants have not committed actual sins, they could all be saved even though not yet able to believe.

According to this argument, the judicial condemnation brought by Adam upon all humanity (Rom. 5:12) was reversed by Christ, and thus God, no longer bound to condemn, need not condemn any infant. Be this as it may, as was contended earlier, God’s condemnation is not based on inherited depravity but on the evil that one actually chooses in this life (cf. Rev. 20:12–13). Infants have committed no morally accountable sinful deeds; therefore, God can save all infants because they have been made savable through Christ’s finished work.

Critics of this view emphasize its novelty and deny its necessity, noting that it tends toward universalism and eliminates faith as an absolutely necessary salvific condition in this life.<sup>58</sup> They also contend that it is both possible and traditional to interpret Romans 5:18–19 in other ways.

Summary Evaluation of Universal Infant Salvation Apart From Belief

One merit of this view is that it both satisfies God’s justice and magnifies His omnibenevolence. In addition, it presents a conceivable biblical basis. Nonetheless, opponents raise several criticisms.

First, critics object that, according to this view, infants are saved without faith, while the Bible seems to teach that faith is a necessary condition for receiving the gift of eternal life (e.g., John 3:36; Acts 16:31; Heb. 11:6).

In response, as already observed, some have argued that faith is a normative but not absolute requirement for salvation. Or, it may be absolutely necessary in this life for those who can believe but not for those (like infants) who cannot. For those who die prior to accountability, the choice could be left to the next life; this takes nothing away from the emphatic scriptural exhortations to those who can believe that they must believe before death (cf. John 3:18, 36; 5:24; Heb. 9:27).

Second, it is argued that, by its very nature, the salvation of free creatures involves a free consent. Saving infants against their will is no more possible than saving adults against their will (cf. Matt. 23:37; John 5:40).

In response, defenders make two observations. For one thing, according to this position, infants are not saved against their will but apart from their will—they are too young to believe. For another, it is always possible that all infants are in the class of those who would have believed had they been old enough to do so; that they will be given the opportunity to do so when they “mature” in heaven, it is contended, resolves the problem of faith and freedom.

Third, critics insist that nowhere does God’s Word spell out any age of accountability and, thus, it is purely speculative.

In response, there is some biblical evidence that there is some point in one’s life at which he or she becomes morally responsible (cited above). Furthermore, both experience and common consent inform us that tiny children are not morally responsible, which is why they do not stand trial for their wrongs. Psychologically, infants and small children do not have sufficiently developed rational faculties to discern good from evil.

Also, that we may not be able to point to a precise age at which moral accountability begins is not an overwhelming difficulty. Consider, for example, self-consciousness: Even if we do not know precisely when it occurs, we nevertheless know that it occurs. The exact age of accountability may differ for individuals, depending on their moral development. Perhaps it is earlier for those who are more quickly exposed to explicit truth. At any rate, while it theoretically occurs for most people between the ages of four and twelve, it doesn’t arrive at all for those who never reach that stage of intellectual and moral maturity. The age of accountability arrives when an individual is able to understand the difference between right and wrong and the consequences of making moral choices.

The criticisms of this view are by no means definitive. That God will save all those who never (in this life) reach the point of moral accountability is both theologically possible and biblically plausible. The most problematic issues are (1) the need for these infants (or small children) to eventually exercise their own conscious faith and (2) the apparent exception to the necessity for making a decision, before death, to believe in Jesus Christ. These questions, however, are not unanswerable, especially in view of the possibility that God foreknew that those who die too young to have faith would all be among those who would eventually mature and believe.

The Limbo-Infant View (Infants Are Neither Saved Nor Lost)

The positions presented above all assume that there are only two possible destinations for infants. Perhaps there is a third place (or condition)—limbo. Some Roman Catholic theologians have posited limbo for babies who die unbaptized (and, accordingly, unsaved). It is possible to detach the doctrine of limbo from a sacramental paradigm and instead simply argue that all non-elect babies who die go there, or at least all those who would not have believed had they reached the developmental point of being able to exercise faith.

However, even proponents find it difficult to locate scriptural support of any kind of limbo, which is more than anything a result of theological speculation. The hypothesis seems to be that regarding infants who die, God can neither justly allow them into heaven nor mercifully send them into hell, so He sends them to a sort of neutral state.

Critique of the Limbo-Infant View

First, even some contemporary Catholic theologians reject limbo, admitting to both its lack of support and its speculative status.

Second, the Bible is void of references to any such view; any statements that can be adduced to support limbo speak merely of the baby not yet having reached a state of world-consciousness (e.g., Job 3).

Third, why should God not do the same for those who have not heard the gospel? After all, like infants, they have not rejected Christ, since they haven't even heard of Him. Neither is there evidence, however, that God has a limbo for the unevangelized.

Fourth, and finally, the very nature of limbo is hazy, raising both serious questions and objections. For instance, would it be a place of annihilation? Are its inhabitants alive but not conscious, as though comatose?

The Evangelized-After-Death-Infant View

The remaining position contends that infants will mature after death (perhaps immediately) and will then be given an opportunity to believe. Those who believe will be saved, and those who do not (if there are any) will be lost. The possibility that all infants who die before the age of accountability are those whom God knew would have believed involves so-called implicit or potential faith, which will mature into actual faith at the moment of their decision.

According to the evangelized-after-death-infant view, those who die before moral responsibility will be allowed, after death, to “grow up,” hear the Gospel, and decide for themselves where they will spend eternity. This belief, going back at least to Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335-c. 395) and now held by some Roman Catholic theologians, has four primary bases:

- (1) People are condemned to hell for their own willful sin; (2) Jesus died for all people, including young children who die; (3) all people receive sufficient grace for salvation; and (4) the act of faith is necessary for salvation. (Sanders, NON, 298)

Proponents of the evangelized-after-death-infant view contend that it is one of few positions upholding justice to all four premises.

Critique of the Evangelized-After-Death-Infant View

First, there is a conspicuous absence of biblical texts asserting that infants will mature after death, although, in response, this is not an uncommon belief as applied to the resurrection body. It is reasonable to assume that small children (who have believed) will “grow up” and have adult bodies in heaven; why, then, cannot those who die in infancy be given an opportunity to believe at that time? Furthermore, proponents of the view note that neither are there biblical texts explicitly stating, for instance, the doctrine of the Trinity, and this does not mean it has no scriptural foundation. Doctrines can be properly deduced or inferred from other, more overt biblical teachings.

Second, even if infants do mature after death, there is no evidence that they will then be evangelized: The only biblically cited evangelistic forum is earth (cf. Matt. 28:18–20, etc.). In response, however, it is possible that these texts refer only to the evangelization of those who do not die in infancy and the like. Thus, the necessity that the decision for salvation must take place before death could be normative but not absolute.<sup>70</sup>

Third, Scripture plainly teaches that there is no hope for salvation beyond the grave (e.g., Heb. 9:27; cf. Luke 16:26–31; John 8:24). In response, perhaps these texts apply only to those who have lived to reach an age of moral accountability and have rejected the light God has given them.

Fourth, and most to the point, the evangelized-after-death-infant view, in not positing that all infants will be saved, overlooks the array of passages (presented above) that point to the universal salvation of everyone who dies without realizing accountability.

Summary and Conclusion

None of the views is without difficulties. The baptized-infant and elect-infant positions have serious problems. The limbo-infant doctrine lacks any real basis. The foreknown-infant, all-infant, and evangelized-after-death-infant views seem to be the most viable in terms of theological merit and biblical support. There are at least three crucial factors in determining which of these positions is correct.

Is Faith an Absolute Condition for Salvation?

There is a distinction between the personal innocence of infants and the conscious rejection of salvation by adults, if faith is not absolutely essential but is instead normatively necessary for salvation. If the latter (normative necessity) is correct, it makes sense to speak of all infants being saved without believing simply because of the work of Christ on their behalf.

On the other hand, if faith is an absolute essential for salvation before death—and many biblical passages (cited above) have been understood this way—then there is no heaven for those who cannot believe any more than for those who do not believe. Infants cannot believe, and we know that some, if not all, will be saved. In this case, it makes more sense to believe that infants will mature after death and be given a chance to make their decision.

Does God Always Offer Everyone the Opportunity to Believe?

If God does not give everyone the chance to believe, then the baptized-infant and elect-infant views make sense. However, the Bible is filled with affirmations that God offers salvation to all; therefore, it appears to logically follow (as well as be inferred by God's love) that those who would believe if they could but die before they can will be given a chance to do so after they leave this life.

Is Inherited Depravity Alone Sufficient for Condemnation?

If original sin is enough to send anyone to hell, then the baptized-infant and elect-infant views are more plausible. If, however, one's own personal decision in rejecting God's message is necessary, then those two positions lose their credibility. The feasibility of the all-infant salvation views depends on this fact, for without it universal infant salvation cannot be easily justified. As demonstrated above, (1) the arguments for the savability of all infants (Rom. 5:18–19), (2) the fact that people are only condemned on the basis of acts done in this life (Rev. 20:12–13), and (3) God's omnibenevolence and perfect justice all argue against inherited depravity as solely sufficient for sending people (including infants) to hell.

It is worth noting that the views allowing for the possible salvation of all infants are not only compatible with God's justice and love, but they also help solve the question of heathen salvation. Since God is just, and since no one can be saved without Jesus Christ, and since many heathen lands have not heard the Gospel, it is reasonable to infer that God's elect—who will come from every tribe, kindred, and tongue—could include those who die in infancy. Because it is estimated that among some heathen peoples up to half of all babies die before becoming morally accountable, it potentially follows that there will be innumerable heathen in heaven who never heard the Gospel while on earth.

THE RESULTS OF SALVATION ON THE HEATHEN

As to the salvation of the unevangelized, we will examine two main perspectives. The traditional orthodox view is that salvation is only possible by special soteriological revelation from God; general revelation is sufficient only for condemnation.

Other theologians, however, hold that if one does not receive God's special revelation regarding the plan of salvation, then what he understands and accepts through general revelation is sufficient for eternal life. Of course, the basis for his salvation is still the work of Christ, even though he may not be aware of what Christ has done for him.

The General-Revelation View (That the Heathen Can Be Saved Through God's Creation)

Those who believe today's unevangelized can be saved apart from hearing the gospel (that Jesus died for their sins and rose from the dead—cf. 1 Cor. 15:1–5) reason in the following manner.

The Love and Justice of God

Arguing from God's attributes of love and justice, some Christian apologists insist that He would not condemn those who have never heard the gospel of Christ. They emphasize biblical affirmations of God's justice (e.g., Gen. 18:25; Ps. 33:5), that He is "no respecter of persons" (Acts 10:34 KJV) and "does not show favoritism" (Rom. 2:11). Further, God is omnibenevolent (2 Peter 3:9); He loves the whole world and sent His only Son to die for it (John 3:16).

Acts 10:35

Peter told Cornelius, a Gentile who had never heard the gospel, that God "accepts men from every nation who fear him and do what is right." The text indicates that Cornelius had "feared God" (v. 2 KJV) and was accepted by Him even though he had not yet explicitly heard the Good News.

Hebrews 11:6

"Anyone who comes to [God] must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him." This would seem to include those who have never heard the gospel.

Acts 19:2–5

This passage tells of believers, years after the time of Christ, who were saved even though they had not yet received the Holy Spirit. When Paul asked them, "Did you receive the Holy Spirit when you believed?" they replied, "No, we have not even heard that there is a Holy Spirit" (v. 2). So Paul declared the truth to them and, "on hearing this, they were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus" (v. 5). They were called "disciples" (i.e., believers) even before Paul preached to them (v. 1).

Galatians 3:8

According to Paul, “The Scripture foresaw that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, and announced the gospel in advance to Abraham: ‘All nations will be blessed through you.’ ” There is no evidence that the “gospel” Abraham heard contained the explicit message that Christ would die and be raised from the dead. When Abraham believed, the text simply says, “[The LORD] took him outside and said, ‘Look up at the heavens and count the stars—if indeed you can count them..... So shall your offspring be’ ” (Gen. 15:5). Abraham was not required to believe on the death and resurrection of Jesus before he could be saved.

Revelation 14:6

John recorded: “Then I saw another angel flying in midair, and he had the eternal gospel to proclaim to those who live on the earth—to every nation, tribe, language and people.” If the gospel by which these people were saved is eternal, then it was the same ultimate proclamation as in the Old Testament (which, as the next text indicates, did not have the same developed content as the more-fully-revealed New Testament gospel (1 Cor. 15:1–5). Nevertheless, people were saved by believing the good news that God is gracious.

Jonah 3:1–10

The Old Testament contains an explicit account of heathen salvation. Jonah, the Israelite prophet, was told to go to Nineveh (in Assyria) and announce their coming doom:

[Jonah] proclaimed: “Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned.” The Ninevites believed God. They declared a fast, and all of them, from the greatest to the least, put on sackcloth.... When God saw what they did and how they turned from their evil ways, he had compassion and did not bring upon them the destruction he had threatened, (vv. 4–5, 10)

Jonah later said of their conversion, “I knew that you are a gracious and compassionate God, slow to anger and abounding in love, a God who relents from sending calamity” (4:2). There is no indication whatsoever that the content of the message they believed was more than trust in a gracious God who forgives those who turn to Him in faith from their sins.

Psalms 19:1–4

David indicates that the very heavens proclaim the gospel to all people:

The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands. Day after day they pour forth speech; night after night they display knowledge. There is no speech or language where their voice is not heard. Their voice goes out into all the earth, their words to the ends of the world.

This passage appears to teach that everyone, everywhere, has heard the “gospel of creation” (general revelation) by which they can be saved. Interestingly, however, this is the very passage Paul references in saying that no one can hear without a preacher (i.e., special revelation—Rom. 10:18).

The Gospel in the Stars

Some, following E. W. Bullinger (1837–1913) in The Witness of the Stars, have even contended that the gospel is spelled out in the constellations, later distorted into what we know as the signs of the zodiac.<sup>76</sup> There are several serious problems with this view.

First, the so-called “gospel in the stars” obviously is not clear to everyone, as the Bible says general revelation is to all (Rom. 1:19). Many people, including this author, confess to not being able to see the plan of salvation in the sky, even when it is explained by proponents of the view.
